TAXATION

CONVENTION BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES SIGNED AT WASHINGTON MARCH 4

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, for the information of the house I would like to make the following announcement:

A tax convention was signed at Washington on the 4th day of March between Canada and the United States for the equalization of tax deductions at the source, for the avoidance of double taxation, for the prevention of fiscal evasion and for the general promotion of the flow of commerce between the two countries.

This convention follows along the lines of the previous convention which existed from, and during, 1936 until April of 1941.

Deduction at the source in the United States was increased in 1941 to 27½ per cent on dividends, interest, rents, royalties and other periodic payments coming to residents in Canada. The present convention reduces this to 15 per cent as and from the first day of January, 1941. Canada also deducts 15 per cent in respect of interest, dividends and royalties going to the United States, so that there now exists substantial equality of deduction at the source between the two countries.

Individuals, resident in Canada, who are not citizens of the United States, are not subject to the graduated rates of tax in the United States and are not required to file United States returns, unless they have an office or place of business therein.

For parent companies in Canada, receiving dividends from wholly-owned subsidiaries in the United States, the tax deduction at the source is reduced to 5 per cent. Dividends from Canadian subsidiary companies are, as heretofore, transmitted to parent companies in the United States free of any tax deduction at the source, but the Canadian government will be free to tax these dividends as it chooses, at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent.

As the convention comes into force on the first day of January, 1941, a refund will be made of all taxes deducted at the source in excess of the said 15 per cent or 5 per cent rate, without application being made therefor, as the refunds will be made by direction of the government of the United States through the medium of corporations and institutions which initially made the deductions.

The convention shall remain effective for a period of at least three years in respect of all its features, and continuously beyond the three years until at least six months' notice of termination has been given by either country, in which case the termination becomes effective on the first day of January following the expiration of the said six months' period.

However, after the fixed period of three years, the rate of 15 per cent may thereafter be altered without notice and without affecting other parts of the agreement, as it was felt that neither country wished to preclude a change in the tax rates at any time, if a subsequent parliament or congress desired to change them.

Canada for some time has been making representations in connection with tax claims raised by the revenue authorities of the United States on profits or gains made by Canadians trading in securities and commodities in the United States. The tax was claimed, even though in subsequent years losses were sustained which more than offset the prior years of profits on which the tax claim was based. While the profits were in hand, Canadians had no knowledge of their liability. In fact, there was a general belief that no such liability could be raised or would be raised.

Now by reason of this convention, all such persons may effect a settlement with the United States revenue officials on a basis of paying 5 per cent on the dividend and interest yield received by such investors in the years during which they held the securities, provided they file a request for settlement with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Washington, within two years from the date of signature—not the effective date—of this convention. Otherwise they will not receive the benefit of this convention.

This is in effect a change from a capital gains tax to a 5 per cent deduction at the source, based on net revenue, if any, received from such securities.

Capital gains by Canadian residents derived from sources within the United States shall not be subject to tax therein, provided such Canadians have no permanent establishment in the United States.

There are certain extra-territorial features of the revenue laws of the United States, included not only in the 1941 act but in prior acts of that country, which impinged upon any Canadian company if 50 per cent or more of the income of the Canadian company were derived from sources within the United States. These extra-territorial features also impinged upon such Canadian company paying dividends to a Canadian resident, and also upon any such Canadian company accumulating undistributed income.

These are technical in character and the technical features need not now be mentioned in this general announcement. Those particularly interested should refer to the terms of the convention itself.

All these extra-territorial features, so far as Canadians, and Canadian-controlled companies, are concerned, have been eliminated by the terms of the convention.

Charitable organizations are exempt from deduction at the source, if the organization is a charitable organization within the meaning of the laws of each country, when read together. If a charity is such within the meaning of the United States law only, the terms of which perhaps are a little wider than the Canadian definition of charity, but is not a charitable institution within the meaning of the Canadian law, then the deduction at the source would not be waived. The charitable organization must be such within the meaning of our law as well as within the meaning of the United States law.

All persons in the employ of the dominion or provincial governments, or any political subdivision, agency or instrumentality thereof, whose duties require them to reside in the United States are to be taxed by the Canadian government, while like officials of the United States government, or any political subdivision, agency or instrumentality thereof, residing in Canada and paid from the United States are not to be taxed in Canada.

On the other hand, pensions shall be taxed in the country where the recipient resides and not in the country where the pensions arise. Life annuities also will be taxed only in the country where the recipient resides.

[Mr. Gibson.]

Each country will refrain from taxing any person from the other country, in respect only of compensation for labour or personal services, if such person—

(a) remains for a period or periods not exceeding 183 days, and
(b) receives $5,000 or less in the aggregate during such stay;
or
(a) remains for a period or periods not exceeding 90 days, and
(b) receives $1,500 or less in the aggregate during such stay.

This is intended to exempt a number of persons who are for a short time in industrial activities, but the convention by special mention does not grant exemption in respect of professional earnings such as those received by actors, artists, musicians, and professional athletes who are taxable in the country in which they exercise their skill.

The income derived from the operation of ships or aircraft shall be taxed in the country of registration.

Students or business apprentices are exempt from tax in the country in which they are studying in respect of remittances received by them for the purpose of their maintenance or studies.

Any actual case of double taxation within the purview of this agreement, and not otherwise dealt with, may be dealt with by consultation and appropriate adjustment between the countries.

Each country undertakes to supply the other country with information in respect of dividends, interest, rents, royalties and other periodic payments passing from one to the other.

There is provision in special cases, and at the request of either government, for consultation where the authorities of one country might desire information in respect of any particular taxpayer's activities in the other country.

Finally, there is provision for equality of treatment, namely that the citizens of one of the contracting states residing within the other shall not be subject to the payment of more burdensome taxes than those which are borne by the citizens of the other contracting state, or in other words, citizens of the United States within Canada are not to be discriminated against by more burdensome taxation than that imposed upon our own citizens within Canada.

It should perhaps again be stated that all moneys that have been deducted and collected at the source under the 16½ per cent rate that arose immediately after the repeal of the former convention on the 29th April last, and all moneys collected under the 27½ per cent rate as provided by the 1941 United States revenue laws, are to be refunded to Canadian residents to the extent that they are over the basic 15 per cent or, in the case of parent companies, over the 5 per cent rate now agreed upon, without application having to be made therefor. Hereafter, only 15 per cent will be deducted.

From a reading of the convention, it will be realized that this is probably the most extensive fiscal convention that has yet been entered into on the subject of direct taxation. It is tangible evidence of the growing intimacy between Canada and the United States.

The agreement itself, which, as I stated, was signed yesterday, will be tabled at the earliest possible date.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I was about to ask the minister, on the orders of the day, a question with respect to this convention. He has referred, I assume, to all the salient features of the convention and we shall be able to study it when it is tabled. There is, however, just one question that I should like to ask him at the moment. According to a newspaper report it is stated among other things that the convention also provides for a reduction in certain rates of taxation, and, it goes on:

—for the establishment of an exchange of information between the United States and Canada in the field of income taxation.

I am interested to know just how far that goes, having regard to the practice and rule that income tax returns are secret. I can visualize this as a breach of the practice heretofore. May I call the minister's attention to the fact that income tax returns are not even divulged to the succession duties authorities of a province without the consent of the estate of the taxpayer. I am wondering how far this will go to take away the secrecy which heretofore has surrounded the filing of income tax returns.

Mr. GIBSON: The convention itself will be tabled. It goes quite far in the exchange of information. Each country realizes that every effort should be made to avoid any loss of revenue from evasion of taxation, and my hon. friend will see the convention for himself when it is tabled. I do not think that I can go into particulars at this stage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would point out to the minister, if I am permitted to do so, that income returns are public property in the United States. They have never been public property in Canada, and there should be some reservation. I should think, if it has not been arranged, it should be arranged that information with respect to Canadian taxpayers should be kept secret by the United States authorities at least as long as we keep it secret.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not going to enter into a discussion on that. There is a principle involved. We have maintained that principle, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has defended it on many occasions, as all finance ministers have done. As a matter of fact it is usually used in the United States to satisfy curiosity.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is legitimate curiosity.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, it is not. It is no one's business how much my income is as long as I get it honestly.

Mr. GIBSON: It is my business too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to intervene beyond saying that I recall that when this matter was under consideration some time before, the information in question related entirely to investments in one country of nationals of the other. It does not mean the disclosure of the entire income of any individual.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is reassuring.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The purpose as I understand it is simply to see that nationals of one country who have investments in another country are not taking advantage of that situation to escape paying the taxes they ought to pay to their own country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no objection to that.

PREPARATION OF CANADIAN INCOME TAX RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): In connection with the statement made by the minister with regard to the collection of taxes at the source, will the minister say just what the Canadian income tax payer is to put on his tax return for 1941, since the tax at present is 27½ per cent, which has been deducted, and it is not likely that refunds will be made for some months to come.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a question of the kind which should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. GIBSON: If the question could be placed on the order paper, I will answer it later.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

*CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—RACIAL ORIGIN

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. What is the racial origin of those serving in the active service forces?
2. What is the racial origin of those serving in the reserve forces?

Mr. RALSTON: So far as the army is concerned the records concerning attestation papers do not contain information as to racial origin, and hon. members will understand that one would have to go back into the genealogy of an individual in order to ascertain his racial origin, that is whether he is of the Dutch, Scandinavian, Ukrainian, Polish or the many other races that are in this country. The only method by which it could be done—and it would not be at all accurate—would be simply to guess at the person's racial origin from his name, and I do not think that would be a satisfactory way to arrive at a matter of this kind. I can only say that at the present moment the department is not in a position to undertake to procure the information in that rough and ready way.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—CONTRIBUTORY LIFE INSURANCE

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

What action has the government taken with regard to the advisability of making available to the general list of airmen, pilots and officers on active service, officers and other ranks of the army, or the personnel of the navy and merchant marine, some scheme of contributory life insurance such as that in effect in the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: The suggestion indicated in the question has been considered but no action has been taken.

FRUIT AND VEGETABLE IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. What was the total value of the imports of fresh fruits from the United States into Canada during the calendar year 1941?
2. What was the total value of citrus fruits and fruits of a class or kind not grown in Canada imported from the United States during the said period?
3. What was the total value of fresh vegetables so imported during the said year?
4. How much grapefruit juice was imported from the United States in 1941, and what was the total value of such importations?
5. What was the amount and value of the importations of all other kinds of fruit and vegetable juices from the United States during the year 1941?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

	Unit	Quantity	Value
1. Fresh fruits	$	....	$15,669,430
2. Citrus fruits and fruits of a class or kind not grown in Canada	$	....	11,692,087
3. Fresh vegetables	$	....	5,716,510
4. Grapefruit juice	Gal.	2,087,436	769,642
5. Other fruit juices	Gal.	459,705	408,629

BANFF AND JASPER NATIONAL PARKS

Mr. KUHL:

What was the amount of revenue derived by the government from the Banff national park and Jasper national park, for each of the years 1937, 1938, 1939, 1940 and 1941?

Mr. CRERAR:

	Banff park	Jasper park
1937-38	$137,948 11	$40,127 76
1938-39	153,154 77	50,737 62
1939-40	161,696 50	49,625 15
1940-41	181,892 14	63,137 66
1941-42*	206,179 78	60,354 67

*At Feb. 23, 1942.

The amounts indicated do not include gasoline, liquor, licence and other revenues collected by the government of Alberta since this information is not available.

[Mr. Gibson.]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WEYBURN, SASK., BARRACKS

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. What is the total amount of money that has been spent by the government in connection with the International Harvester building used for a barracks at Weyburn, Saskatchewan?
2. What is the total amount paid for rent and what is the monthly rate?
3. How much was paid for alterations and installations when the building was taken over in 1939-40?
4. How much was paid for repairs and maintenance?
5. How much was paid for taking out installations and restoring building to former condition in fall of 1941?
6. To what persons was this money paid and how much was paid to each?

Mr. RALSTON: Return tabled.

2. How many men have been discharged from (a) the army, (b) the navy, (c) the air force, since the war began, by reason of (i) physical unfitness; (ii) injuries or wounds received while on active service?
3. How many pensions have been granted for disabilities incurred while on active service in the present war?

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

Mr. REID:

1. What harbour boards in Canada are under the jurisdiction of the national harbours board?
2. What amounts of money have been loaned to the various harbour commissions and ports up to the end of 1941?
3. What is the amount outstanding to the government by the various harbour commissions in Canada up to the end of 1941, in (a) principal, (b) interest?

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, inter alia,

1. That sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 be granted to his majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1943, for—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communicatons, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever; and

(d) the carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the existence of a state of war.

2. That the governor in council be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of $2,000,000,000 as may be required for the purpose of defraying such expenses or making such advances or loans, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

3. That the governor in council be empowered to reexpend advance or loan moneys that may be received by way of refund or repayment of advances, loans or expenditure under the war appropriation acts of 1939 (second session), 1940, 1941 and 1942.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That a special committee consisting of Messrs. Bruce, Donnelly, Edwards, Fraser (Peterborough West), Lafontaine, Leger, McCulloch, Marier, Martin, Mitchell, Noseworthy, O'Brien, Reid, Shaw and Winkler be appointed to consider a bill intituled: "An Act to assist in the carrying on and coordination of vocational training" and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is this not a departure from the usual practice—the setting up of a special committee before the bill is introduced?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The bill is referred to in resolution No. 9 under government orders.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The resolution is on the order paper, but to set up the committee before the resolution preceding the bill is introduced is, I think, unusual. I think this should stand until we get the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO BUILDING AND FINANCING OF PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Prime Minister based on a Washington dispatch and to inquire what if anything is taking place or has taken place with respect to the Alaska highway, and whether he has any announcement to make in that regard. Which country will build and finance it? The dispatches indicate that a definite agreement has been made to do the work with the troops.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I made a reference to the Alaska highway a day or two ago, and there is nothing I can add to what I said at that time. My statement then was to the effect that the matter was under consideration and negotiation, but that no information of a public nature could be given out at present.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And that is the position to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the position to-day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do I understand, then, that negotiations are still proceeding, and no agreement has been reached?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No agreement that I am aware of, and I think I would be aware of the agreement if there were any.

PRISONERS OF WAR

INTRODUCTION OF AIR LETTER CARD SERVICE FOR CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the house that arrangements are being made for the introduction of an air letter card service for correspondence with prisoners of war. A fee of ten cents will cover air conveyance in Canada, transatlantic air conveyance and transportation by all available air services beyond Lisbon. This service will be introduced as soon as the necessary forms can be made available. It is believed that this privilege will prove to be an important facility for those corresponding with relatives who are prisoners of war. Negotiations are being initiated with a view to securing reciprocal arrangements under which prisoners and internees in Germany, Italy or Canada may correspond with their homeland by air letter card.

SUNDAY LABOUR

LAKE ST. JOHN PULP AND PAPER COMPANY PLANT AT DOLBEAU, P.Q.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to read a letter which I have received from the National Catholic union of the paper manufacturing industry and to draw thereto the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent):

Dolbeau, P.Q., March 3, 1942.

Mr. Liguori Lacombe, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,

Having read an article published by you some time ago, we send you herewith a copy of a letter from the Department of Justice addressed to Mr. P. J. Martel, secretary of the central diocesan council, Chicoutimi, and copy of which has been forwarded to all the syndicates of the Chicoutimi district.

We should like to know why, in spite of the act referred to, the Lake St. John Pulp and Paper Company has manufactured newsprint at its Dolbeau plant on Sunday last March the 1st.

Yours very truly,
The members of the National Catholic Union of the pulp and paper industry of Dolbeau, Inc.
By L. Dumais,
Secretary.

This is the letter from the Deputy Minister of Justice:

Department of Justice, Canada,
Ottawa, January 29, 1942.

Mr. P. J. Martel, secretary,
Central council of . . .

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I understand that the hon. member has read a communication from himself to the minister and is reading the reply he received from the minister. He is entitled to ask a question, but he should not take too long to lay the foundation. I think now that he has read the letter to the minister he should proceed to ask the question categorically.

Mr. LACOMBE: Very well; I will direct the question to the Minister of Justice.

(Translation): In view of the fact that again on Sunday last the Lake St. John Pulp and Paper company manufactured paper at Dolbeau, will the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) take immediate steps to ensure the observation of the law in respect of Sunday labour?

Hon. L. S. St. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, having been unable to understand sufficiently the letters which the hon. member has read, I regret that I cannot give him an immediate answer. I will read them in the transcription of the reporter's notes and will endeavour to give him a reply to-morrow.

WHEAT

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY FOR PRESENT YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I am sorry I did not have an opportunity to send him notice. Before coming into the chamber I received a telegram with regard to meetings of farmers in my constituency, and asking when an announcement might be made with regard to the wheat policy of the government for the present year. I wonder if the minister could give any indication as to when this information may be made available to the farmers.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I believe the resolution dealing with this matter will be on the order paper to-morrow, and will be proceeded with as rapidly as possible.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY—PICKETING AND ARRESTS AT WINDSOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): According to the Toronto and Windsor newspapers, picketing is in progress at the Motor Products plant in Windsor, and arrests already have been made. On Tuesday the minister told us that the men at that plant had volunteered to return to work but that the management refused to take them back. Will the minister now tell us what success his department has had so far in getting these men back to work in a vital war industry?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) asked me the same question this morning. I have no further knowledge than I had when the hon. member asked the question the other day. At that time I pointed out to him that these men were on an illegal strike; that they had been so informed by myself, and advised to return to work. I forwarded a telegram to the company suggesting that they take these men back to work, and at the moment Mr. Louis Fine, Toronto industrial disputes inquiry commissioner, is in Windsor dealing with the matter.

CANADIAN ARMY

REFERENCE TO STATEMENTS OF MR. POULIOT AND MR. TUSTIN IN DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I want to refer to two matters which have arisen in the house in my absence. There was a statement made by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), during the course of a speech which he delivered on March 2, in which he intimated or left the impression that the inspector general for western Canada, Major-General Griesbach, had some responsibility for the dispatch of the expedition to Hong Kong. I can say to the house that Major-General Griesbach had nothing whatever to do with that expedition.

During the course of that same speech the hon. member read a letter from some young man at a training camp at Brantford, complaining that he had been subjected to some persecution on account of speaking French, and that in the course of an altercation which occurred he was arrested and put into the guard room. I have had a report from the training camp at Brantford, and the information I get is that a check of the guard reports reveals that only two men were confined in the guard room over the week-end of February 1, 1942, which was the date referred to, these being two drunks. Neither of these men was a French-Canadian. Inquiries made of all concerned reveal no knowledge of any such fracas as that described. There is no officer at this training centre by name of Lieutenant Wisseman, which is the name of the officer referred to by the hon. member in his speech.

Yesterday the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Tustin) referred to an order for a return passed on February 2, showing the number of men enlisted in the Canadian expeditionary force during each month of the great war, 1914-1918, and the Prime Minister promised to inquire with regard to it. I may say that that return was filed; the figures which were made up were checked, and it was pointed out that there was some discrepancy between the figures in the return and the figures in other papers or documents which had been published. The reason for the delay is to see that the figures are checked, and I expect to be able to file the returns to-morrow.

With regard to the matters about which I spoke first, may I point out that I have been attending the Hong Kong inquiry, and it is impossible to be in two places at the same time. That is why I was not in my seat to speak about these matters when the hon. member for Témiscouata spoke.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): With respect to a question raised about something which may have occurred in Brantford, may I point out that there is a service flying school there. It may be that the air force is involved, and I shall make inquiries.

TRANSFERS FROM RESERVE TO ACTIVE ARMY AT BRANTFORD TRAINING CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak to a question of privilege. In view of the fact that the training centre at Brantford has been brought to the attention of the house, I feel it my duty to point out to hon. members the fact that last week there appeared in the Brantford Expositor a statement to the effect that one entire platoon in the camp had gone active. I am happy to read in this morning's Globe and Mail that a second platoon has also gone active. I believe this reflects great credit not only upon the commanding officer, but also upon the other officers, non-commissioned officers and men, for the splendid spirit which resulted in this action.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

EVACUATION FROM PROTECTED AREAS—BRITISH COLUMBIA SECURITY COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Justice if he has a reply to the question I put yesterday.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Yesterday the leader of the opposition asked who was to support the Japanese population now being removed from protected areas. The British Columbia security commission is empowered to prepare plans dealing with all the details of evacuation and care of that population. Pending the receipt of the plan there is no information I can give my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has been pointed out that many of these Japanese nationals are quite capable of supporting themselves, and that they have assets in this country.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The security commission has working with it an advisory committee of twenty prominent persons residing in British Columbia, and I have no doubt they will have complete information on the whole problem.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have full jurisdiction?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are required to prepare a plan for submission to the minister, and when the plan is approved they will have full jurisdiction to carry it out.

WHEAT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE ACREAGE REDUCTION AND CERTAIN PAYMENTS TO FARMERS

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting wheat acreage reduction, to provide for the payment of certain sums to farmers in connection therewith, and for the administration of the act.

He said: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I should like to explain that a suggestion has been made to me that this resolution, another resolution introduced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and a bill on prairie farm assistance, which I shall introduce tomorrow, should all be advanced to the same stage before a general discussion takes place. This suggestion is made because there is some association among these measures. It is suggested that that should be the stage at which the bills are in the hands of hon. members.

I have discussed the matter with the three groups opposite, and I understand that the suggestion will meet with the approval of hon. members in those groups. If so I should like now to have this resolution advance to the stage where it will be possible to introduce the bill to be based upon it.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): A few days ago I made the suggestion to the Minister of Agriculture that since this matter was being handled this session by way of bills rather than by orders in council, it would be satisfactory if we could see the bills before any discussion took place. These matters are interwoven, and all the measures would have reference to practically the same thing, namely the producing and marketing of wheat. I believe we could not segregate the two questions.

This is now March 5, and seeding will commence in western Canada in about a month. The farmers out there want to know what they are going to be asked to do with respect to reducing their wheat acreage, and also they wish information as to prices. If these bills were to go through in the ordinary way, and discussion were to take place on each before going to committee, any one of them might be delayed for three weeks or so. Therefore in order to facilitate the passage of these measures

I have suggested that both ministers should make their statements, that we should advance all measures at least to first reading, and have any general discussion at that stage. If that is agreeable, I am sure our group would be willing so to proceed. I should like to hear a statement from each minister, so that in the discussion there will be no overlapping and repetition. It might all very well be done at one and the same time.

Mr. COLDWELL: I can assure the hon. member for Qu'Appelle we have given our assurance to the minister that the procedure he has suggested is satisfactory to us. I believe that is the best way to proceed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Our group hold the same view. We are very anxious to hear the government's policy at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The arrangement is that both ministers shall make their statements to-day?

Mr. GARDINER: No, that we make our statements on first reading.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If that is understood, I am agreeable.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May we have some information from the government as to how soon the ministers will be in a position to make their statements? We are perfectly willing to follow this procedure, but the minister must know that we are receiving letters from all parts of Saskatchewan which indicate that matters are in a serious condition, and feeling is running high. This resolution has been on the order paper about a week. We would like to know particularly when the Minister of Trade and Commerce will make his statement.

Mr. GARDINER: There is a resolution which has been advanced one stage, and in connection with which a bill will be introduced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. So long as consent of the house is given to a change being made in the wording, so as to advance matters to-morrow, it will be possible to bring in the statements on Monday. If these resolutions can be advanced to-day and to-morrow, then those statements can be made by both ministers on Monday, and we can proceed from that point.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want to understand the situation. Apparently all parties are in agreement, and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle is of the same opinion. He wishes to see the bills, and to have statements from the ministers. The usual practice is for a minister to make a statement in the resolution stage, and personally I do not see any reason to depart from that procedure. But if my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle is satisfied, I am.

Mr. GARDINER: I believe what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle says is true, namely that it is difficult to discuss one without the other. One would have to ask questions with respect to one bill before he could make a decision with respect to the others. The suggestion is made that we have all bills before hon. members before we start, so that we may read them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And hear the ministers' statements.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Resolution reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the report be received?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is understood that the ministers will make their statements on the first readings, and that they will be made on the same day—on Monday.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of hon. members to the fact that when a bill is read the first time there is no debate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is just the point; that is the whole thing. We are departing from the rule. Let us stick to the rules; what are they there for?

Mr. TUCKER: By consent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is an impossible position.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I point out to my hon. friend that it is quite usual for ministers to explain the principle on the first reading and then the bill can be turned over for debate on the second reading.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is very helpful.

Resolution read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 12, respecting wheat acreage reduction.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASED RATE PER BUSHEL ON WHEAT DELIVERED BY PRODUCERS

On the order, "Government notices of motions."

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In order to facilitate what has been agreed to, and in order that a statement may be made on Monday by the minister with respect to its subject matter, I would direct the attention of hon. members to the following resolution under government notices of motions which stands in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, by making provision for the payment of an increased rate per bushel on wheat delivered by producers and in addition the payment of a further sum by warrant in respect of wheat grown in the western division in 1942.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce intended to amend this resolution by omitting certain of its words. If the house will agree to return to government notices of motion and allow me to move that the resolution in the name of the minister, as amended by the omission of the words "and in addition the payment of a further sum by warrant in respect of wheat grown in the western division in 1942," be considered at the next sitting of the house, I will do so. The resolution would then appear on the order paper to-morrow under government orders.

I would say that His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I understand the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) has intimated to the minister that he is agreeable to this, but the procedure is wrong. It is in defiance of the rules of the house and should not be considered a precedent for the future. The minute we depart from the rules we run up against snags in the future development of legislation and I think in the future we should observe the rules.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You do it every day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the trouble; at the request of the government it is done every day. We are violating the rules of this house every day. They do not seem to mean very much now.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): We have been here well on to two months and there has been enough delay. There has been so much discussion on the plebiscite bill and on the address that I agreed to this for the purpose of getting something done so that the people in western Canada would know where they are at and where they are going to get off this spring. Take my own case for example; this will likely change my whole programme of farming this summer. I did this only to facilitate matters and get it through. I am not urging any further breaches of the rules. I simply want us to get on with this matter so that we can do something.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It has been most difficult to hear down at this end of the chamber what has been going on in the last half hour. I am not too clear about what it was the Prime Minister wished to do with respect to this resolution. It is simply impossible to hear what is going on. If the Prime Minister wishes to amend this resolution I should like to know just what the amendment is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I am seeking to do on behalf of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is to advance one stage the resolution which stands in his name. It is the first under government notices of motion. My motion is for the purpose of advancing the resolution one stage through complying with the formality whereby the minister declares that His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of the resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house. That is all I am seeking to do, except also to ask that the resolution be amended by striking out the words, "and in addition the payment of a further sum by warrant in respect of wheat grown in the western division in 1942." The minister wishes those words to be stricken out. I am seeking to have the resolution thus amended advanced one stage.

Mr. PERLEY: Does this mean that the minister is going to change the bill altogether? The impression you get from this resolution is that there is going to be a price fixed and then provision is to be made for a bonus afterwards. Now you are going to eliminate that part of the resolution that provides for the payment of a bonus, so that the bill that will follow will be only half the resolution, so to speak. I do not think we should agree to that now. I think we should follow it up in the proper way. This changes the whole bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was simply trying to meet my hon. friend's wishes. If he prefers not to proceed now, this resolution will be withdrawn to-day and another substituted for it to-morrow with the few words I have indicated omitted. The minister does not wish to have those words form part of the resolution. When the bill is introduced he will state exactly what its provisions are. The bill is prepared and the minister is ready to introduce it to-morrow so that it can be discussed on Monday, but the resolution would have to be advanced one stage to-day. Otherwise, we would have to wait until Tuesday, before a statement could be made on the bill.

Mr. PERLEY: It would not be the same bill that is indicated by this resolution. There would be a change of policy.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think we should agree to it, because if the resolution is withdrawn, and the government has the power to do it to make the changes, it would mean another delay. I must say that we did not hear what was said just now, but lately we have not been listening to a lot of the discussion that has taken place across the floor of the chamber because some of it seemed entirely too long and of little consequence.

Motion as amended agreed to.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, 5th March, 1942.

Sir:—I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. Sir Lyman P. Duff, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-day, Thursday the 5th March, at 5.50 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

REINSTATEMENT IN CIVIL EMPLOYMENT OF PERSONS WHO ENLIST IN HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mitchell for the second reading of Bill No. 5, to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who enlist for service in his majesty's forces or who perform essential war employment.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, the house is addressing itself to Bill No. 5, the principle of which is to secure to men in the active armed forces of Canada reinstatement in the civil positions which they occupied prior to enlistment upon their honourable discharge from military service. I wish to express my hearty sympathy with the object and purposes of this bill. The plight of the returned soldier, after months or perhaps years in the routine of camp and perhaps the din of battle, coming back to Canada and endeavouring to reinstate and reestablish himself in civil life, is one which should commend itself to the sympathy of all members of this house. To me this has always been and is now a matter of special and peculiar interest. I can imagine no more difficult and undesirable position in which to be placed than to be told that your time is worthless or your work is no good, that for you there is no place in the sun.

The last war, Mr. Speaker, was a terrible disaster. Undoubtedly, when you add up all the factors, I have described it correctly as a great disaster. But it does seem to me, and I will venture the statement that the long period of unemployment which followed the great war was a greater disaster; that, notwithstanding the loss of life of the great war and its tremendous cost in human flesh and blood, the moral degradation, the destruction of human fibre, was greater in those years of extensive unemployment than it was in the fighting period. That is perhaps a broad statement, but I believe that most hon. members who went through that period and associated with and saw the struggles of those attempting to find work to support their families, will agree with me.

It would be very easy indeed to criticize destructively the weakness and the insufficiency of this bill, if any public purpose were to be served by so doing. There are three outstanding weaknesses, or shall I say insufficiencies, in the bill.

In the first place, the bill seeks to grant its benefits only to those who held positions before enlisting, so that it entirely overlooks the very large number of men who unfortunately, and possibly only temporarily, were without jobs at the time they entered his majesty's service.

Second, it assures to those who did hold jobs at the time of enlistment no better jobs than they had when they went away, irrespective of how poorly they were paid at that time and irrespective of changing conditions; with this exception only, that it does respect the seniority rights of those who enlisted, if such rights of seniority ever existed —and of course they exist in only a few cases.

A third insufficiency of this bill is that it does not make provision—and of course it could not do so—for those whose jobs will no longer exist by the time they return from war, and that may well be so in a very large number of instances, in the rapidly changing economic and social conditions of to-day.

The bill is little more than a gesture; on the other hand it is a good gesture; it is in the right direction, and it shows that the new Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) at least realizes the existence of the problem which Canada at some time must confront, that is to say, the return and demobilization of a large number of men.

The realization of the general problem, which is more interesting perhaps than the bill itself, is to be found in the preamble. The first words which I wish to quote are as follows:

> . . . a great national problem will be presented when the members of those forces complete their service and are to be returned to civil employment.

And the next words, at the bottom of the paragraph:

> . . . it is deemed expedient for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada that provision should be made for the orderly reinstatement in their previous employment of such persons aforesaid;

Now, if it is expedient that men should be returned to employment who had employment previously, surely the expediency is not confined to those persons only. It is expedient —most expedient—that all men on discharge from the armed forces of Canada be given employment. The importance is attached to employment for all, not merely to reinstatement for some.

The government evidently has realized one aspect of the problem, and I suggest that surely the government also recognizes the other horn of the dilemma.

Nor is that expediency to which I have referred limited to those leaving the armed forces. I am sometimes appalled at the thought of what will occur when we demobilize the army of Canada and perhaps half a million men are thrown suddenly on the labour market, to join some seven hundred thousand men and women discharged from the munitions factories. So, Mr. Speaker, you have a picture of possibly 1,200,000 soldiers of Canada, workers if you like, those in uniform and those in overalls, all contributing at present to Canada's war effort, suddenly discharged upon the streets to be enlisted in the army of the unemployed. That is the picture which, I submit to this house, may well appal the boldest who looks forward—something at which the stoutest heart may quail, as we look into the future and contemplate what may happen and what will happen if nothing is done to prevent it.

It is the duty of this parliament to study diligently that problem and to see to it, if it is within our power to do so, that no such post-war catastrophe shall occur in this country. That study should commence right here and now. It is a high task to which we are called. We are not alone in being called to that task. We are not alone in the concern which I am expressing and which all hon. members must feel, nor are we alone in the vision which some people at least are catching, not of the disaster which is ahead of us if we are so foolish as to allow it to overtake us, but rather the vision of a new order and a better world which we can create if we have the wisdom to do so.

These thoughts are stirring everywhere. It may be that some other hon. members do not meet the evidences of this thought—though perhaps I am in no special position—as much as I do. I say "perhaps" because I see welling up around me on every side discouragement and discontent and the desire to meet in some way the problem which everyone feels is coming upon us.

May I call attention to one of the greatest documents of modern history; I refer to the Atlantic declaration. It has been referred to as the modern magna charta of human freedom, and perhaps the description was justified. It was promulgated by the two great leaders of democracy, the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States. It was approved by the self-governing dominions and by Russia. It was described by the Prime Minister of Great Britain as "a rough and ready goal towards which the democracies are marching."

I pass over the political clauses of the declaration, although they are of historic import, and I call the attention of the house to paragraphs 4, 5 and 6, because they embody the economic declarations of the charter and apply in general principle, or are of interest in a general way, to the principle of this bill. May I read these three short paragraphs from the declaration:

4. They—

When we read "they" it means the two signatories to the document, and behind them the great nations which they represent.

4. They will endeavour, with due respect for their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment by all states, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access on equal terms to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity.

5. They desire to bring about the fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field, with the object of securing for all improved labour standards, economic advancement and social security.

Social security is the object of this bill.

6. After the final destruction of the nazi tyranny they hope to see established a peace which will afford to all nations the means of dwelling in safety within their own boundaries and which will afford assurance that all the men in all the lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want.

The declaration seems to recognize the disastrous part which social injustice plays as a basic cause for war and world upheaval, and it gives certain assurance that we, the members of this house—because included in those represented at that meeting are the members of this house—it gives the assurance, by ourselves and others, to both the victor and the vanquished, of access on equal terms to the trade and raw materials of the world which are needed for their prosperity, to the end that all men may live their lives in freedom from fear and from want.

The objects of the signers of the treaty are improved labour standards, economic adjustments, and, above all, security such as we would give to the young men discharged from the ranks of our soldier forces.

If that means anything, Mr. Speaker, it means greater freedom of trade, not a narrow protectionist doctrine such as I heard at least referred to in yesterday afternoon's debate by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) —freedom of trade, greater freedom at least, and not as he would have, greater restrictions.

If that means anything, it means equal access by all to the raw materials of the world; and of course access to the raw materials of the world can be secured only by access to the lands, forests, mines and other natural resources of the world, from which those raw materials are derived.

Speaking about unjust social conditions as a cause for war, surely we may assume that the German armies could never have been induced to make their attack upon the lands of Russia had they not been themselves debarred in some way from free access to their own lands, debarred by unrestricted rents and prices of land charged to the poor German people by the junker class.

I give expression to these thoughts because they seem to apply to what I think are the three principles of social reconstruction which we must observe on the conclusion of this war, if we are not to run into great trouble and great cost. There are three points which I would mention seriatim.

In the first instance there must be a sufficient clearing of the avenues of trade to allow all commodities to pass freely within our own land and from our own land to other lands and back. For that purpose there must be a reduction in tariff levies, in quotas and restrictions of that nature; and then I suggest that there must be every possible improvement that we can make in the facilities for communication and transportation. I mention in that connection the St. Lawrence waterway. We should develop that great highway of traffic in order that it may contribute to our greater freedom of trade, the transporting of our commodities, the making of our inland lakes into ocean passages for freight, and the harbours of the inland lakes into ocean ports. That is one thing. We must have freedom of communication, and to the extent of our ability we must abolish, we must sweep away, obstructions to trade both physical and legal.

The next thing which we must do, it seems to me, is this. We must organize industry, and I include in that financial organization, so that business men may be prepared to launch enterprises which will make use of the raw materials of our land and thus absorb our population into profitable employment.

There is also a third principle—and this is the last point I am making in this series. There should be such governmental interference as may be necessary to ensure that Canada's natural resources shall be held by the owners in trust for use and not alone for profit. That is the most important of the three statements I have made. First, freedom of trade and communication; second, organization of industry and finance so that the captains of industry may plan in advance the enterprises which are required for the use of our materials and the employment of our population; third, a recognition, individually and collectively by our people, recognition by our parliaments and in our legislation, that ownership is for use and not alone for profit. To keep any natural facilities out of use is at least an unpatriotic act.

Canada is standing on the threshold of a great opportunity, an opportunity which if neglected or misused means disaster, but which if seized by the men in control, with the agreement of those who support us, and used with judgment and energy, may make of this country one of the greatest in the whole family of nations.

I want to compliment the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) upon the most excellent speech which he made yesterday afternoon, with the spirit of which I most heartily agree. He is my next-door neighbour; is a good neighbour, and I like to see him address himself to problems of this kind. I think that he and I have the same outlook, if not the same philosophy. He expressed the hope that at the close of this war we shall not face the kind of conditions through which we passed at the close of the last war. Of course I echo that hope, but hope alone is not enough; what is needed is thought, serious thought, and thought followed by resolute action.

"Where there is no vision the people perish." We should be thinking of this problem now. To leave it until the war is ended and the disaster is upon us is not good enough; it will be too late. We should be thinking about this matter now and should be planning developments. We should see to it, to the extent of our ability, that we go on with the St. Lawrence waterway, thus adding some two or three thousand miles of coast line to our already extensive seaboard, and giving to the province of Ontario another million horse-power of electric energy. Let us combine this vast supply of electric energy with these unexampled facilities for trade, and then organize industry to make use of these wonderful facilities.

I wonder if this house catches the vision of these great lakes and the areas which surround them, the vision of a great industrial population, great cities, teeming populations of active and happy men engaged in production, if we but see to it that these resources are made available, that they are used and not simply held, and that the captains of industry intelligently apply their thought to the problem of bringing about the enterprises which are necessary to use the natural resources and employ our people.

I suggest to the Minister of Labour that he should be planning now—not little bills like this, although I heartily approve of this bill; he should be planning, if we are to avoid disaster, the broader development which should come to this country at the close of this war. We must plan the use of the lands, the forests and the mines to this general end; the conversion of the factories which are now making munitions of war to the production of food and clothing and the distribution of the goods, and the general principles which apply in both cases.

[Mr. Roebuck.]

Let us plan for the peace—for peace must come some time. During the course of the war between the north and the south, which to them was the disaster of history, Abraham Lincoln assured his people that "even this will pass"; and so will the disaster of the present war. Even this will pass; perhaps earlier than we can at this moment realize, that time will be upon us, and we should to-day be planning for the days of peace with the meticulous care for detail and with the energy and foresight with which Hitler planned for war. We can do it, but if we are to win the victories of peace we must not approach the problem in the lackadaisical way in which we approached the problems of war.

I say to the Minister of Labour that he should at the present time be calling to his help and surrounding himself with men of knowledge, men of experience and judgment. There should be councils of workers and managers and owners and financiers, and these men should now be working out this problem. Work it out we can if we but give our unselfish devotion to it. Everyone who can contribute should be called around this council table to work out the details as well as the general principles.

This little bill is all right as a gesture; it may confer some benefit here and there, although it does seem to me that anything which the bill compels would be given voluntarily by any decent employer. There may be some employers who are not decent, and so far as they are concerned the compulsion applied by the bill will be of advantage. It is a step in the right direction, a step which I welcome, but only a step. If the Minister of Labour would attack the broader problem, he can solve the problem of employment. If he can organize in advance the industries which can employ these men, so as to avoid the disasters which followed the last war; if he can do this, the name of the present Minister of Labour will find a place in the history books of this country.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like to extend my congratulations to the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Roebuck) upon the very excellent speech he has made, and his far-seeing and prophetic outlook upon the post-war world. I only hope that the point of view he has expressed will be infectious and that some of his colleagues will catch it, particularly some of those who sit on the treasury benches.

The problem of reestablishing and rehabilitating the men who come back from the fighting services is probably the most important question, next to the winning of the war, that can engage the attention of members of this house. In view of the sad experiences after the last war I am sure a great many people in Canada felt that we would do better during and after this war. I doubt, however, if that hope has been realized. It is interesting to go back and see what we have done to care for and reestablish our returned men in the two and a half years that Canada has been at war. I remind the house that in the first two years we were at war, that is, prior to October 1 last, we did absolutely nothing for the men who were being discharged from the fighting services. The sum total of our contribution to their welfare was to hand them one month's pay and turn them loose to fend for themselves. I think the most pathetic sight I ever saw was in walking down the main street of my own town and meeting a man whom I had last seen in uniform. He was pale, shaky and walking very slowly. To my amazement I found that this man had been discharged from hospital still running a temperature, with a month's pay in his pocket and a cheap suit on his back. He was looking for a job, but was not physically capable of taking one if someone had offered it to him. I took up his case with the responsible authorities. After a long exchange of letters nothing was done, and the Canadian Legion in my district finally succeeded in helping him to secure some employment.

Our treatment of the men discharged from the fighting services in the first two years of this war is something that ought to make every member of this house blush for shame. I will say more; it has been a deterrent in our recruiting campaign. Nothing will tend more to keep young men who are thinking of joining the active service forces from doing so than to have returned to their community some man who cannot get a job and cannot rehabilitate himself, and for them to see him either going on relief or going from one government department to another to see if someone will not take care of him until he can find employment.

That is the situation. Hon. members will remember that in 1940, when this parliament was first convened, the Prime Minister had on the order paper a resolution calling for the setting up of a select committee of this house to study the whole problem of reconstruction and rehabilitation. For some reason which has never been explained to us, that motion was taken off the order paper. No committee was ever set up. I believe an interdepartmental committee was set up under the Department of Pensions and National Health, a committee composed of a number of university presidents and I believe a representative of one labour organization. But nothing has been done toward harnessing the abilities of this house, or of business, industry, labour and agriculture, to the problem of laying out a comprehensive and adequate scheme to take care not only of the dribble of men coming out of the armed services now but also of the hundreds of thousands of men who will be demobilized when peace comes.

To be fair, of course, one must say that there has been some change by the government in the past few months. On October 1, 1941, order in council P.C. 7633 was passed, marking the beginning of a recognition of the government's responsibility in respect to these men. Under this order in council returned men are given benefits under the unemployment insurance scheme, single men receiving $9 a week and married men $13 a week for periods varying in accordance with the length of their service but in no case to exceed fifty-two weeks. Under this scheme there is also some attempt to help these men get placed in civilian employment. But even here, tied up as it is with unemployment insurance, these men are finding it very difficult to be adequately taken care of. Only yesterday I received a wire from Edmonton, Alberta, which said:

> Discharged soldiers this war starving Edmonton. Unemployment insurance cheques delayed repeatedly at Calgary. Must have action now.

The difficulty is that the problem of reestablishment and reconstruction is tied up with the unemployment insurance scheme, with only one placement officer in the province, to whom these men have not access. These men come back; they are confronted with all sorts of red tape and find themselves either inadequately cared for or improperly reestablished in civilian life.

Now, coming to the bill itself, I would say that while there can be no quarrel with the principle of trying to reestablish men in civilian life, this bill is of course merely an improvisation. The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) called it a gesture, but a beautiful gesture. I think it might better be called a gesture but an empty gesture.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not fair to say that.

Mr. MARTIN: Was this bill not approved by the legion?

Mr. MITCHELL: It was approved by the legion.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): By whom it was approved is not the important thing. The important thing is whether or not it will contribute materially toward reestablishing and rehabilitating men coming back, not only now but after the war. While it is a gesture, and is to be commended, I think it will have to be a part of something much bigger if it is to have any real value in the way it is intended.

For a few moments I should like to direct attention to the bill itself. In the first place it should be pointed out that it covers only certain classifications. That is, it covers men who have been in active service or men who, having taken training under the National Resources Mobilization Act, have been put on garrison duty. As I understand it from reading the bill, it will not take care of men who have been taken out of civil employment for compulsory training and released upon the completion of that training. They will not benefit under this legislation. I hope when we reach the committee stage the minister will tell us why these men who have been compelled to leave their jobs—

Mr. MITCHELL: I can tell my hon. friend now, if he will permit me. It is because they are already covered in the regulations dealing with men called up for military training, in somewhat similar but briefer language than this.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have a wire here from a man in Regina who was working for a certain concern, and who was called up for training. At the end of two and a half months, his health not being able to stand it, he is discharged as medically unfit. He goes to get his job back, and they say to him, "Your job has been filled, but we can give you another job." After working two weeks they say, "You are not physically fit to take the other job, because it requires a much stronger person"—and he is discharged. This man has no means by which he can compel the firm for which he was working prior to his being called for training to rehire him in his former position. All his attempts have been in vain, and that is the position in which he finds himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Whom was he working for?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I shall send the letter to the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Every single case which has come to my attention has been reinstated.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many of them?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not very many have come to our attention.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Most employers are very generous.

[Mr. T. C. Douglas]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, and in every case they have taken the men back. If my hon. friend would give me privately the facts concerning the case he mentions, I will see that the man is reinstated.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I thank the minister for that. But the case has already been referred once or twice to government authorities.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Has it come to my attention?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I do not think it has come to the attention of the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Every single case—one hundred per cent of them—has been reinstated, under the order in council. There has not been a single refusal.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Representations have been made to the Minister of National War Services and Minister of National Defence.

Mr. GOLDING: When a quotation is made from a letter it should be laid on the table.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The letter can be laid on the table. But if the hon. member who is scratching with his pen would listen to the debate, instead of merely popping up and displaying his general ignorance of procedure in the house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): —it would be more to the point. Further, I did not quote from the letter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but there is authority under the old order in council which this bill now supplants. I must repeat that no case has come to my attention which has not been reinstated. I would ask him as a matter of kindness to bring to my attention the case he has in mind, and I will guarantee action on it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I thank the minister for that.

Mr. GOLDING: With reference to the hon. member's uncomplimentary remarks about myself, I do not think it is out of place to ask that any letter from which a quotation is made should be laid on the table.

Mr. COLDWELL: But it was not quoted from.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I did not quote from the letter; I merely referred to a case.

I wish to thank the Minister of Pensions and National Health for saying that the matter will be given attention.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I do not think the hon. member for Weyburn should have used the word "ignorance". He should be asked to withdraw.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I shall be glad to withdraw the word "ignorance" with respect to the hon. member.

Mr. MARTIN: Let us all control our tempers.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Of necessity the bill is very limited as to the number of returned men who will be affected by it. As I have already said, it will not touch, for instance, men who were unemployed prior to enlistment. That covers a large number. Any of us who remember the fall of 1939, and the thousands of men—

Mr. MARTIN: That will be covered in the other bills.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There are other measures to look after that situation. There are many other measures. I sent a circular letter to every hon. member in the house with reference to the terms of an order in council passed on October 1, 1941, in which there are specific measures for looking after those who were unemployed before.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister was out of the house when I referred to order in council P.C. 7633, and the provisions in respect thereto. But if he wishes, I shall pick up the thread of my argument.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The order in council in question cares for men who come under the unemployment insurance scheme for only a period of time equivalent to their length of service, but not more than fifty-two weeks.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is only one of six specific benefits enumerated in the order in council.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is quite correct. But let us consider the man who was unemployed prior to enlistment, and who now finds that when he leaves the army he receives the benefits under the order in council to which the minister has referred. He may be in a position to take the vocational training. But there will have to be something much more comprehensive if we are to guarantee him two things: we have either to guarantee him care, and be responsible for him until he can be placed—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is exactly what the order in council does.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I must differ from the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not think my hon. friend is familiar with P.C. 91, which was complementary to the order in council of October 1.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have it here as a matter of fact. I am pointing out that the whole problem of rehabilitation boils down to three things. First, the government must be prepared to accept complete responsibility for the men until such time as they are gainfully employed, irrespective of the length of time required for that purpose. Second, the government is responsible for the training of these people, so that they can be put into some—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is all arranged for.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let him finish.

Mr. MARTIN: This whole discussion is out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am surprised that my hon. friend is not more familiar with what has already been done.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. The minister will have ample opportunity to reply to the statements made by the hon. member for Weyburn, and I suggest he ought not to interrupt, unless he has permission from the chair to do so. There is no hon. member in the house who rises more frequently to points of order with respect to other people than does the minister himself. I would ask him too to observe the rules.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I thought I was rising with the consent of the hon. member for Weyburn.

Mr. MARTIN: I rise to a point of order. This is an important discussion, but hon. members have not come prepared to discuss the whole question. The question before us now is Bill No. 5, which has to do with a relatively small but specific problem related to the whole matter. I do not wish in any way to interrupt the discussion, because it is an important one, and one in which I purpose taking part. But we ought to discuss only the subject matter which has been given us, and that is the subject matter of Bill No. 5. The hon. member may be discussing important matters, but surely he is not discussing the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a point of order—

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no point of order. This is debate on the second reading of a bill, and the hon. member is speaking within the rules.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On second reading of a bill surely it is the right of an hon. member to discuss its deficiencies. Surely he is permitted to discuss what is lacking in the bill. He could discuss alternatives in matters of policy.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, but that is not what is being done.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already ruled that the hon. member is in order, and I would ask that he be allowed to continue without further interruptions.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I did not hear what Your Honour said.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He says you are all right; go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have said that the argument of the hon. member is in order, and that he is entitled to proceed without further interruptions.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I point out that the hon. member for Trinity discussed the Atlantic charter.

Mr. MARTIN: He was certainly at sea.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The following words appear in the preamble to the bill:

> Whereas in view of the necessity of raising large military forces for service in the present war and for the defence of Canada, a great national problem will be presented when the members of those forces complete their service and are to be returned to civil employment.

I take it that the principle of the bill before us has to do with the whole question of reestablishment and rehabilitation. I have no desire to enter into any controversy with the Minister of Pensions and National Health or with the Minister of Labour, but we should have from both ministers statements prefacing this bill and the bill respecting vocational training which is to come later.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I promised the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) at the last session that I would make such a statement. It was my intention to make it when the war appropriation bill was before us, because I thought that that would be a more appropriate occasion than this to deal with the whole question of rehabilitation and reconstruction. The argument has broadened out this afternoon and it may be necessary to make this statement before then.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): My point was that this bill, the bill dealing with vocational training, and the bill dealing with soldier land settlement ought to have been prefaced by a comprehensive statement by one or more ministers outlining the whole scheme. No person can discuss this particular bill by itself. It is a small part of a great picture, and perhaps I was putting it too strongly when I said that it represented only a gesture; it is not much more than a gesture taken by itself. It must be considered in the light of what the government proposes to do in the whole field. This bill will touch only a limited number of people; it will touch only those who had jobs before the war. It cannot do anything for the man who joined the army from college or high school. This bill deals specifically with that group of men who had employment and who were not filling jobs that had been held previously by other men who had joined the army. As I say, this is only a small part of a complicated jig-saw puzzle, and I think the ministers might have given us a panoramic view of the whole thing and then brought down the different measures they had in mind. Instead of that, we are going forward on a piece by piece basis, and it is not as easy to see the scheme they have in mind.

It does seem to me that of necessity there are two weaknesses in the bill. The loopholes left for the employer are very wide. It may not be easy to narrow them down, but they certainly are too wide at present. For instance, section 4 reads:

> In any proceedings for the violation of section 3 of this act, it shall be a defence for the employer to prove,—
> (c) that, by reason of a change of circumstances, other than the engagement of some other person to replace him, it was not reasonably practicable to reinstate him or that his reinstatement in an occupation and under conditions not less favourable to him than those which would have been applicable to him had he not been accepted for services with the armed forces was impracticable,

The difficulty, of course, will be to prove whether or not it is practicable to reinstate a man. I am not a lawyer, but I imagine that a good lawyer could drive through that with a two-ton truck. Then the next clause reads:

> (d) that he was physically or mentally incapable of performing work available in the employer's service.

That leaves pretty wide latitude to the employer. All he has to do is to prove that a man who has done service, who comes back as many men came back from the last war, not disabled but having undergone the rigours of three or four years in a theatre of war, is not physically or mentally capable of performing work. Then again:

> In any proceedings for the violation of section 3 of this act, it shall be a defence for the employer to prove,—
> (e) that he was employed to take the place of an employee who had been previously accepted for service in his majesty's forces and that such employee had been reinstated in his employment.

The same problem will arise there. Many men who will join the service from now on are at present holding jobs of men who joined the service before. When they come back, this bill will have no application.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is provided for.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): All the points raised by the hon. member are embodied in regulations which have been in effect since last June. I have had no difficulty at all in meeting any of these cases in administration.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): One would have to know how many cases the minister has been able to handle.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): All those that came to my attention.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What percentage were those in relation to the whole? One would have to know that before one could say that this is working successfully. One would have to know what percentage of returned men have been successfully placed in employment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I can give that information later on in this debate.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It seems to me that the second weakness is the fact that there is no machinery set up under which a man could take the necessary steps to secure reemployment in the event of his former employer not employing him voluntarily. Again, I am not a lawyer, but I imagine that since a fine is provided for, this would come under the criminal code and the case would have to be taken through the courts.

Mr. MARTIN: The department has placement officers.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That may be true, but what will be the modus operandi? Will a man have to start proceedings in the courts? Will he have tc go to the attorney-general of the province to have proceedings instituted, or will the placement officer institute proceedings in case reemployment is refused? When this bill comes into committee I think the minister should be able to set out clearly just what machinery will be available to these people. The average man has a dread of courts and lawyers.

Mr. MARTIN: Oh, no. You do not fear me, for instance.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No, because I have not got into trouble yet.

Mr. MARTIN: And you are just an average man.

Mr. SLAGHT: No honest man has a dread of the courts.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Machinery should be set up which would be automatically available for a man who is not reemployed by his former employer. He should be able to go to the placement officer—I suggest to the minister that more will have to be appointed because one in Regina for the province of Saskatchewan will mean a great deal of travelling which these people cannot afford—and lodge his complaint and then the placement officer would have the responsibility of taking the necessary legal proceedings to see that the man was rehired or justice given to him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To-day it is no one's duty.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): As it is now, it is no one's business. The average man, not knowing what to do, will do nothing. He will simply grouch about it a bit and then put up with it. He will not know to whom to go, he will not know who is his champion, he will not know who is his advocate, so he will let the thing drop.

I was glad to hear the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) say that he proposes to make a statement on the appropriation bill. I hope we shall have an opportunity, not only to hear the minister but to discuss the government's scheme as a whole with reference to reconstruction, reestablishment and rehabilitation. This is a tremendous problem and it is going to tax the resources of this government. I am sorry the government has not seen fit to keep a standing committee in session during the years of the war. Such a committee would have been able to study the problem and to prepare and lay plans for the coming of peace.

As has been said, we are going to have, when peace comes, the greatest problem, apart from the war itself, which has ever faced this country. By the end of this year there will be close to three-quarters of a million men in the fighting services. The number engaged in munitions factories and other war industries is probably close to three-quarters of a million. So we shall have anywhere from one and a quarter to one and a half million men thrown on the labour market following the "cease fire". That is going to create a problem which will tax all the capacities of this country, and we cannot afford to blunder along and wait until it is upon us.

There are a great many things to be done. Development of the St. Lawrence waterway has already been mentioned. This country from one end to the other is crying out for the building of houses; in practically every city there is a housing shortage. In this province of Ontario, according to a statement made the other day by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), there is a power shortage—this, in a country which has more potential hydro-electric power than any other nation in the world. That ought not to be. Plans should be laid for a tremendous electrification programme with the coming of peace.

Schemes should be worked out without delay to provide, I would say, three things:

First, to accept complete responsibility for these men from the time they are discharged.

Second, to accept responsibility for training those who want to be trained.

Third, to get these men placed as quickly as possible either in private industry or in some government projects.

Personally I believe it will be necessary, following the war, to institute a great programme of public works to absorb the employment slack until industry can be reorganized to take care of it. I trust that the government will not content itself with the odd little bits of legislation such as the bill now before us, but that it will give the house the entire scheme which it has in mind; that it will take some steps to set up a committee of this house before which various bodies in this country such as the Canadian Legion, representatives of labour, agriculture and industry can attend—a committee that will advance their plans and lay their schemes against the time when the problems of rehabilitation and reestablishment will be even more gigantic than they are to-day.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make only a very few and general remarks on this bill.

As far as the principle of the bill is concerned, I am sure that all hon. members, irrespective of party, and whether or not they are returned soldiers, will approve what we are trying to do for the soldiers now in the armed forces, because I know that every hon. gentleman is only too anxious to help in their reestablishment and rehabilitation.

I concur in many of the remarks made by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) as to both the advantages and the disadvantages of the proposed legislation. The one thing which I did not quite agree with, or did not quite understand, was what he said about being afraid of the lawyers—perhaps because he is a parson, or for some other unexplained reason.

The bill as presented is very broad in its application, but, as has already been pointed out, it will cover only a limited number of the men now serving in the armed forces. Large numbers of them have already been discharged, and because of the time limit in the bill they will be excluded. It also fails to provide for those who have enlisted just after leaving school or college, or who have left farms and have been employed in various industries which have been closed because of the war. Other categories are not provided for, including those who had no employment when they enlisted.

A feature of the bill which strikes me as most important is the various exemptions which it allows. While it is not clear what procedure is to be followed, no doubt it will be by way of hearings before a magistrate or a judge, which leaves these particular sections open to many and different interpretations. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Weyburn, the provisions are so broad that unless they are greatly restricted, either in the bill itself or under the regulations, many men who are only too anxious to do their bit will be deprived of the very benefits which the minister and the house are anxious to confer upon them.

The subject of rehabilitation has been raised in connection with that of reestablishment. I believe all hon. members will agree that the two must go hand in hand. While some steps may have been taken in the matter of rehabilitation, they fall far short of what we should do. At the present time a soldier receives, upon discharge, in addition to a small clothing allowance, one month's pay and allowances. If he is unmarried it amounts to about thirty-nine or forty dollars. Surely the very least that any soldier is entitled to in this connection is six months' pay. Hon. members can easily recall cases in the present war of soldiers who, upon return from overseas, have been discharged and received a small rehabilitation grant and have been unable within the one-month period to reestablish themselves. Many of those boys have had to accept help, or charity, from the municipalities. No one desires to impose upon any discharged soldier the necessity of accepting charity. Many of the boys were discharged with a lower medical category than they had at the time they enlisted, and so were unable to resume their former occupation. I fear that many more will fall into that category, and under the relevant section of the bill they will be excluded from the benefits of the measure. To give one instance, a lawyer might argue that if a man when he left employment was in category A, to get his position back he would have to be in the same category. I believe there are few who will contend that it is possible for any man who serves in the armed forces and goes through a period of many months or perhaps some years of actual fighting, to be in category A when he returns to his civil occupation.

No doubt, after the war is over, extensive public works will be carried on by both the dominion and the various provincial governments. I wonder whether the minister has any plan whereby some commission or board will be set up on which the different provinces will be represented so that in the undertaking of all these various public works, on which large sums of money will be expended, some preference or special consideration will be given to soldiers who do not come within the benefits of the bill we are now considering.

I have a further suggestion to make to the minister. After the bill is passed, his department should prepare a small book or pamphlet giving an explanation of the measure, the various benefits it confers, and so on, and a copy of that should be given to each soldier at the time he obtains his discharge certificate.

I should like to make one further suggestion somewhat along the lines discussed by the hon. member for Weyburn. When the house goes into committee of the whole it would be well for the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) to give a general statement as to precisely what has been accomplished to date in the reestablishment of the many thousands of soldiers already discharged, how their present plans have worked out, and what further plans or schemes the government may have in mind to take care of the thousands of soldiers who will not come within the benefits of this measure. I am sure that if they would consider that suggestion and make such a statement, it would greatly assist in dealing with the bill in committee of the whole.

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Ottawa West): This bill is one of the measures being taken by the government for the rehabilitation of the service men now in our active forces and is something for which the government is to be commended. There are, however, two matters connected with the whole problem to which I desire to refer briefly. One has been mentioned this afternoon; it relates to the provisions made through the Department of Pensions and National Health: The rehabilitation grant of thirty days' pay and allowances for those having served not less than six months in the forces, which is to be found in P.C. 7521; the order granting free medical treatment to all those who served, for twelve months after discharge, which will be found in P.C. 2763; the establishment of a welfare division of the Department of Pensions and National Health; and the post-discharge reestablishment order, which will be found in P.C. 7633.

For some reason or another these provisions have received very little publicity, though they go much further than is generally thought. It would be useful if they could be brought before this house by the minister in such a way as to permit a full discussion of the whole subject matter of the rehabilitation of our men in the armed forces; and not only that, but in such a way as to place on the record a systematic indication of what steps have already been taken in that regard.

The second matter to which I desire to make very brief reference arises out of the remarks and the line of argument taken yesterday by my good friend the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). As I followed his argument, he took the position that he was for protection; and by protection he seemed to refer to tariff protection as applied prior to the outbreak of this war. He argued that protection would have to be the backbone of this bill; that if protection was not the backbone of the bill, it would fail and would have nothing to support it. He went on to develop that argument by pointing out that we are now making agreements with other countries which will practically establish free trade and so injure businesses which might qualify under this measure. Then he went back to urge a return to the old days of protection. He went a step further in his argument and, referring to the Atlantic charter, declared that that document would interfere with and, indeed, kill the present bill. His reason for that was that the Atlantic charter proposes the abolition of tariffs on the south and north American continents. He referred specifically to two paragraphs of the Atlantic charter, paragraphs 4 and 8. Perhaps it would be useful to put these two paragraphs on the record at this stage. Paragraph 4 reads:

They will endeavour, with due respect for their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment by all states, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity.

The next paragraph to which the hon. member referred, paragraph 8 reads:

They believe that all of the nations of the world, for realistic as well as spiritual reasons, must come to the abandonment of the use of force. Since no future peace can be maintained if land, sea or air armaments continue to be employed by nations which threaten, or may threaten, aggression outside of their frontiers, they believe, pending the establishment of a wider and permanent system of general security, that the disarmament of such nations is essential. They will likewise aid and encourage all other practicable measures which will lighten for peace-loving peoples the crushing burden of armaments.

Mr. Speaker, may I say very briefly, with respect to these paragraphs and the arguments of my hon. friend, that the old order of tariff protection as he has set it forth is gone. We probably cannot properly discuss that subject on the bill which is now before the house, but I cannot allow this occasion to pass without stating my belief that the old order is gone. Not only do I believe it is gone, but I should not like it to be thought that by silence either the house generally or I myself in particular agree with the hon. member for Broadview in his statements on this subject. If there is one thing which the history of the last ten years has shown above all others, it is that such views on protection and trade restriction are no longer tenable and have disappeared.

An hon. MEMBER: Forever.

Mr. McILRAITH: Yes, forever; and the young people will see that they do not make their appearance again. Not only that, but the men in the armed forces for whose benefit this particular bill is designed will make sure that the old order is gone. Indeed, it is the sure and certain knowledge that we are not returning to those pre-war ideas and conditions of the old order, and the vision of a new order, that will sustain us in the hours of difficulty ahead and inspire us to greater action.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): In my opinion one need not apologize for taking a little time when this important matter of reestablishment and rehabilitation is under consideration. I have listened with a good deal of interest to the various points of view which have been put forward by hon. members on both sides of the house. I wish in particular to congratulate the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) upon his fine discourse. I trust that he will bring pressure to bear upon those with whom he is associated on that side of the house so that his opinion may be felt and understood and appreciated by them.

Two points of view are expressed with regard to rehabilitation, or perhaps I should say with regard to the discussion of rehabilitation. On the one hand are those who believe that such matters should not be discussed at this time, for, as they say in effect, we may lose the war, and then all our efforts in that connection will have been in vain. I feel like the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) who stated yesterday that he is not a defeatist. None of us should allow ourselves to become defeatists; we must win this war. And in the light of that realization we must to-day prepare for the aftermath of the war.

On the other hand there are those who believe that now is the time to prepare for the days to follow the war. I am pleased to associate myself with that view. Many responsible persons in high office feel similarly. Reference has been made to the Atlantic charter. Surely that has been indicated to us as a step towards post-war reconstruction. We heard the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) say in effect that those who believe that conditions which prevailed prior to the outbreak of the war are going to be allowed to prevail after the war are going to be sadly disillusioned. We have also had the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) refer to the new heaven and the new earth. Therefore, to-day many are thinking of post-war reconstruction. Our attention, however, should not be centred entirely upon measures to meet conditions likely to prevail after the war; some of our energy should be directed towards making post-war conditions what we want them to be. The measure now before us is, in principle, commendable, especially, I think, to those who view world matters from a purely orthodox point of view. Any attempt on the part of any government to reinstate in civil employment those who left civil employment to join the services is commendable. But in that connection I deeply regretted hearing the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) say yesterday that he intended to move that the latter portion of the preamble, which has to do with the reinstatement in civil employment of those who perform essential war work, be struck out. He did mention a further proposal to take care of that difficulty when it arises.

I believe we are all able to appreciate the fact that, prior to the passing of the order in council of last June, many of our young men who left civil employment to join the services felt very uneasy because there was no guarantee of reinstatement in that employment. I am also satisfied that many occupying positions in civil life did not volunteer for service prior to that time because there was no guarantee that they would be given proper consideration in regard to reinstatement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the hon. member allow me to say a word?

Mr. SHAW: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was going to ask my hon. friend if he would agree, provided the house is agreeable to his doing so, to adjourn the debate at the moment in order that the house may consider the amendments to the Plebiscite bill which have been made in the senate. They are amendments which, I believe, will meet with the approval of the house, and if that were done it would enable assent to be given at six o'clock.

Mr. SHAW: I am pleased to accede to the Prime Minister's request.

On motion of Mr. Shaw the debate was adjourned.

PLEBISCITE ACT

PROVISION FOR THE TAKING OF A VOTE ON ANY QUESTION SUBMITTED BY WAY OF PLEBISCITE —CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 10, respecting the taking of a plebiscite in every electoral district in Canada and the taking of the votes at such plebiscite of Canadian service voters stationed within and without Canada.

He said: While there are a number of amendments, I believe they are of a nature and character that the other house thought would improve the draftsmanship of the bill. With this I believe there can be no quarrel whatever. It makes the bill perhaps more acceptable. There is no change whatever, in so far as I am aware, in principle.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): In the main I would say that the statement made by the Secretary of State is correct. I received these proposed amendments only a few moments ago; there are a great many and it is difficult to follow them all quickly.

The senate have changed the definitions; they have compressed them in a degree, and some appear to have been eliminated.

Mr. McLARTY: I think those that have been eliminated have been reinserted, elsewhere, if the hon. leader of the opposition would refer to amendments to section 8.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, they have been taken out of their context. Some, perhaps not all, have been placed in other sections. Section 4, subsection 2, paragraph (b) has been changed in what, it seems, may be a substantial degree by inserting the provisions of section 17 or 18 of the national war services regulations. I have not those before me at the moment. The present bill, dealing with the question of disqualification, provides that persons disqualified from voting as ordinary voters shall include:

(b) every person who shall have applied pursuant to sections 18 or 19 of the national war services regulations, 1940 (recruits), or any amendment thereto for an order or direction of the board, as defined in the said regulations, postponing his military training, whether or not an order or direction shall have been granted, and unless and until it has been refused.

They propose a new paragraph (b) in which they substitute sections 17 or 18 in lieu of sections 18 or 19. I have not those sections before me, and my memory does not carry what they are. I think the minister should make that plain. Then section 5 has been redrafted, and at the moment I am unable to determine—

Mr. McLARTY: It has been redrafted in the same way.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But as yet we do not know the effect of it. With respect to the other items, section 8 has been redrafted, and there have been superimposed upon that section certain subsections defining the duties of the chief electoral officer. I do not think there is anything objectionable in that, but what is the effect of the addition of section 17 of the war service regulations?

Mr. McLARTY: The purpose that was in mind in making this amendment to this section, which also applies to section 5 of the act, is this. In the original bill we described sections 18 and 19 under the consolidation which took place in 1941. The other house felt that it might be of advantage to go back beyond the consolidation and refer to the original orders in council that were passed in the first instance. There is no change whatever in the intention, but in the original orders they were sections 17 and 18, while in the consolidation they are sections 18 and 19.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Should we not adhere to what is the law to-day under the regulations?

Mr. McLARTY: I think my hon. friend will agree that in the matter of statute law, where there is a consolidation that becomes the law. Where orders in council are consolidated, some question might arise, and it was merely for greater certainty that the other house suggested that we refer not only to the consolidated order in council but to the original orders in council as well. In other words, this merely makes it more certain, but it does not in any way affect the operation of the bill when it becomes an act.

Mr. MacINNIS: This is a most unsatisfactory method of dealing with these amendments. They may be quite minor, but they are amendments to a bill which we discussed for several days in this house. Instead of the leader of the opposition reading something that no one can hear or understand, I would suggest that, since we have the original bill before us, the Secretary of State should take each amendment and read it, so that we may understand its effect on the section or clause to which it belongs. Then we shall be in a position either to approve or disapprove it; but it is unfair to ask us to approve amendments that we have not seen and about which we consequently know nothing.

Mr. FAIR: I should like very much to add my words to those of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. After all, we are the elected representatives of the people, and I do not think we should approve changes that have been made by others, who are not elected representatives, without knowing exactly what we are doing.

Mr. McLARTY: I have no objection to that. In section 2, certain subsections are struck out; that is, subsections (a), "Canadian service voter"; (b) "chief plebiscite officer," and (c) "during the plebiscite." Inserted instead are the following:

(a) "Canadian service voter" means every person qualified to vote by virtue of the provisions of section 6 of this act, and "voter" or "ordinary voter" means any person qualified to vote in any electoral district other than a Canadian service voter.

The effect of that is to combine the definitions of "Canadian service voter" in (a) and "ordinary voter" in (h). In connection with (b), where "chief plebiscite officer" is stricken out of the definition clause, it is inserted later as a subclause of section 8. Paragraph (c) "during the plebiscite" was stricken out for the reason that in no particular place in the act is that phrase specifically referred to. "Electoral district" is again defined in section 8 as amended.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

I need not take the time of the house to read the amendment in regard to the re-lettering of the sections consequent on these changes; that follows naturally.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I ask why the definition of "Canadian service voter" in paragraph (a) is struck out?

Mr. McLARTY: It is not stricken out; the "Canadian service voter" and the "ordinary voter" are put in one and the same definition, in one paragraph. It is not deleted at all.

Then there are some minor amendments, purely matters of wording. For instance, subsection 5 of section 3 of the original act provides that the proclamation shall be published forthwith, and so on. The amendment provides that it shall be published forthwith in a special copy of the Gazette and in two succeeding regular copies. The objection is purely a matter of wording. It is suggested that you cannot publish it forthwith both in a special copy and in other copies which will not be published until a week or two later. Consequently that amendment is made, and it is perfectly proper and in order.

Then there is a very minor amendment in subsection 4. The words "as defined in this act" in line 24 are deleted. That also is purely a matter of wording and does not affect the meaning or intent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that makes for certainty.

Mr. McLARTY: Exactly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The elimination of these words removes the certainty, to a degree.

Mr. McLARTY: I have already dealt with the amendment to paragraph (b), subsection 2 of section 4, in answer to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask a question in that regard, to see that I have the minister's interpretation aright? I understand that sections 17 and 18 of the war service regulations are identical with sections 18 and 19 of these regulations in their consolidated form?

Mr. McLARTY: That, I believe, is correct, and the same amendment applies to section 5 of the act. In section 6, at line 17, the words "taken under this act" are deleted for the same reason that applied in the preceding paragraphs. Then in section 8 these words are added, taken from the definition section and put into the substantive section:

The chief electoral officer under the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, shall be the chief plebiscite officer for the purposes of this act, and the returning officers appointed under the said act shall be returning officers for the purposes of this act.

Both these definitions were previously included in section 2. Then another subsection is added dealing with the administrative district of Yellowknife. It was thought that a more precise definition should be given of this administrative district. I do not think it will be necessary to read the section, because it is purely for purposes of clarity.

Mr. HAZEN: Is it long?

Mr. McLARTY: No; I shall be glad to read it. It is as follows:

(2) For the purposes of taking the plebiscite only, the governor in council may appoint a returning officer for the Yellowknife administrative district, who shall have the powers and perform the duties of a returning officer under the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

I believe the suggestion is that it gives a more positive right for the appointment of an electoral officer than is found in the defining section of the bill, where the Yellowknife electoral district is described.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That seems to be an improvement.

Mr. McLARTY: Yes, I agree with my hon. friend.

Then, subsection 3 of section 8 in the bill, as returned from the other house, is the same, with the exception of some minor amendments, as the original section 8 in the bill.

Then section 9 is amended by striking out the words "for the purposes of this act" and the further words "for the effectual taking of the plebiscite" and inserting the words "for the purposes of this act." I believe that somewhat abbreviates this section, and no exception can be taken.

There appear to be no amendments to paragraphs 2 and 3 of section 9. There is however the addition of the following as subsection 4:

(4) The governor in council may prescribe the penalties that may be imposed for violations of regulations made under this act, and may also prescribe whether such penalties shall be imposed upon summary conviction or upon indictment.

The only purpose of that is to make more clear and definite any power to enact the penalties provided in subsection 2 of section 9.

I believe that substantially completes the list of the amendments.

Mr. HAZEN: May I refer to the changes made in section 2 (a) and (h). Those are changes made with respect to "Canadian service voter" and "voter." I understand those are lumped together.

Mr. McLARTY: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: Would that in any way affect a Canadian service voter on leave?

Mr. McLARTY: No; I believe I can say definitely that it will not. It is merely a consolidation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I refer to the question of penalty as set out in the new subsection, namely subsection 4 of section 9? The difference is that at the moment the penalties appear in the regulations; the change is that it is now left to the governor in council to prescribe penalties which may be imposed for violation of the regulations made under the act. The governor in council may also prescribe whether such penalties shall be imposed upon summary conviction or upon indictment.

I suggest to the minister that that is an entirely new principle, and one just as objectionable as the one to which I referred before. This gives the governor in council power to impose penalties. I do not recall—and I speak from memory; possibly it is not very good memory—that the governor in council was ever empowered to impose or create penalties. Can the Prime Minister remember a case of that kind?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe there have been cases.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to hear of one; I do not think one can be found. This is a bad principle. It may not work out badly, but in principle it is indefensible.

Mr. McLARTY: I would remind my hon. friend that the new subsection is subject to subsection 2 in the same section, which states that any regulations made must conform as nearly as possible to the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act of 1938.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But that does not answer the objection at all.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): With reference to the amendment allowing the governor in council to prescribe penalties, to-night's Evening Citizen says this:

A new section was inserted giving the governor in council power to prescribe penalties for violations of regulations made under the act. It placed, however, the maximum penalty at a fine of $2,000, or two years' imprisonment, or both fine and imprisonment. The other changes were of an interpretive and clarifying nature, and in no way affect the principle of the legislation.

Do the amendments provide those penalties?

Mr. McLARTY: The point to which my hon. friend refers is something which might have received consideration in the committee of the other house. However, no amendment fixing the quantum of the penalty has been inserted in the amendments forwarded to this house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is to be done after the bill becomes law.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Mr. C. H. Larose, Assistant Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate.

And having returned.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bill:

An act respecting the taking of a plebiscite in every electoral district in Canada and the taking of the votes at such plebiscite of Canadian service voters stationed within and without Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

REINSTATEMENT IN CIVIL EMPLOYMENT OF PERSONS WHO ENLIST IN HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mitchell for the second reading of Bill No. 5, to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who enlist for service in his majesty's forces or who perform essential war employment.

Mr. SHAW: Just before the debate was adjourned at 5.30 p.m. I had offered the observation that this civil reestablishment measure had served thus far to allay some of the fears which were felt by many of our boys who enlisted in the earlier stages of the war. I also stated that many of those who feared to join the services because no guarantee had been given regarding their reinstatement in civil employment had now seen fit to join one or other of the different branches of the service. While this measure, I am sure, undoubtedly serves to allay these fears, or many of them, I personally am not equally satisfied that it is going to meet the conditions in a manner possibly anticipated by those who drafted it. I realize that a great national problem is going to face the people and the government of Canada when the period of demobilization arrives. I realize too, as stated in the original order in council, that a measure of this kind may to a certain degree be deemed expedient for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada. But I think that possibly altogether too much emphasis has been placed upon the measure in that regard.

Personally I fail to see how a single measure designed to meet only a fractional part of the difficulties which are going to confront us can have such beneficial effects with regard to the security of the state, the defence of the state, the peace of the state and so on. I am sure that such a measure will assist to a degree during that wild scramble for a precarious existence which I am satisfied many are going to find themselves faced with at demobilization. In my opinion the transitional period following cessation of hostilities is going to be a dreadful one. I say that because I feel that the government of the day has not learned the full lesson which should have been learned as a consequence of the experiences which we had in this country following the cessation of hostilities after the last great war.

I think the measure itself anticipates a difficult situation in connection with post war unemployment, but I do not think it is going to alleviate unemployment to any great degree, because, as has already been stated here to-day, for every man reestablished under this scheme, the one who took his place at the time of his enlistment is going to become unemployed. Even if this measure has ever so many favourable features, the administration of it, the interpretation placed upon it, will be one of the most important aspects of its treatment. The permanent success of any arrangement of this kind will depend directly upon the character of the personnel who administer it. I have in mind boards or commissions or individuals assigned to offices, witih duties attached, having to do with the administration of the measure.

I suggest that all too frequently we have witnessed the spectacle of a well-designed piece of legislation, possibly lofty in purpose, being placed in the hands of what we are sometimes wont to call a high-powered, highly paid board, whose attitude towards the people in whose interests they are supposed to hold office, is a scarcely veiled antagonism, tempered only by fear of the consequences which may come as a result of their actions. I have already said that we must give consideration to more than a measure which is designed to meet certain conditions that may exist. I believe that we should pay some attention to those conditions which we may wish to be the type of conditions which we shall want to see prevail at that time.

I do not believe that a series of measures, which I may call patches, are going to meet satisfactorily the conditions which are bound to prevail after the war. I feel that possibly our attention is directed toward, let us say, palliatives or makeshift measures to meet a situation only for the moment. We must go deeper. We should take upon ourselves the responsibility and the duty of seeing to it that when the period of demobilization comes, we shall shift from a war-time to a peace-time basis. We must concentrate, not upon the shutting down of industry but upon the expansion of industry, so that in place of the production of machines of war for destructive purposes we shall revert to the production of those things required by the civilians of the country—something which we failed to do before the outbreak of the war, but something which we must not fail to do after the war.

Someone stated earlier to-day that no satisfactory provision is being made to take care of many of those who found themselves unemployed at the time the war broke out. Last night the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) stated that many unemployed men joined the services in 1939 and during the months that followed. He said something to this effect: "I do not want you to believe that I think they joined because they were out of work." Well, we know all too well—and we are not casting any reflection upon their patriotism when we say this—that many of them did join because of the fact that they were unemployed.

In my humble judgment a very heavy responsibility rests upon us all. I believe that even though we did not see fit prior to 1939 to give to these young men of ours the consideration which was their right, a consideration which we, living in a vast country with such untold wealth, were capable of giving them, it is not a moment too late for us to realize that the very least we can do for them is to say to them that when this war is over they shall not have to return to those conditions of degradation in which they found themselves before the war.

I do not want to leave the impression that I am not aware and appreciative of the patriotism of our boys serving in the army, the air force or the navy; but when they come to me and say, "We are the heroes of to-day, but what were we yesterday and what are we going to be to-morrow?" it gives one cause for thought. Prior to 1939 we used the excuse day in and day out, week in and week out, that for various reasons which we enumerated, the affairs of this country could not possibly be adjusted to absorb the unemployed and to give at least a square deal to all. Those men in uniform now recall that when war broke out there was no question of the inability of the government to give them employment. The argument advanced at that time that we could not possibly finance any reestablishment programme simply will not hold when this war is over. Having seen millions and even billions go for destruction, they are certainly going to demand that, not perhaps equal amounts of money, but large amounts at any rate, be made available for construction.

This is going to require that we have a plan, an over-all plan, of reconstruction and re-establishment. Even though it is intimated by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) that the government have enacted about six orders in council dealing with various classes of people who may be faced with difficulties, I do not consider that this is going to solve the over-all problem with which we shall be confronted after the war. Each of these proposals may have its place in a broad, all-embracing plan. There may be such a plan; it may be that I am criticizing too soon, but we can only speak on the basis of the information we have.

When I talk of a plan I have in mind that we have a land, shall I say slightly in excess of three million square miles in area, with a population of less than twelve million people, with broad expanses of countryside yet unsettled and vast potential resources. In view of that, surely it is no exaggeration to say that there is no logical excuse for a government claiming inability to set up a plan for properly taking care of our people.

If the government cannot do it, then I shall have to ask why they cannot? Is there some force over the government, some sinister influence behind the government? If so, I would say it is the duty of the government to indicate who and what those sinister forces are.

I fear the situation when this war is over. On the one hand we are going to have vastly expanded industrial equipment, a greater ability to produce and satisfy the needs of our people than we had before the war, and on the other, a colossal financial debt resting upon Canada. I fear that the government, realizing the physical ability of the country to support a plan, will be told by the forces on the other side of the ledger that inasmuch as we have a huge financial debt, it is impossible for the government to use the resources of the country to satisfy the needs of our returned soldiers and others. If any government, regardless of its complexion, accepts a statement of that kind and fails to do the right thing, it will be absolute tragedy. It is a fact proven by history many times over that when the government of a country contemplates any major scheme of action it must procure permission somewhere. I have seen, in my short experience in this world, that statesmen are oftentimes dictated to; politicians are oftentimes dictated to; even journalists and jurists are dictated to, with the result that so frequently we have members of parliament saying, "I feel so frustrated; I came here with an idea that we might be able to do something really worth while." That frustration must be traceable to something; we must undertake to ferret out the cause of it.

Some hon. members may have an inkling of what I am leading up to. I have in mind the words of the Right Hon. David Lloyd George, Prime Minister of Great Britain during the last war, when, speaking of a certain phase of post-war reconstruction, he made this astonishing and astounding statement. Before I read it, let me say that I do not believe there is anyone in this house who would question the source of the statement, or who would be so bold as to question the fact stated. He said:

> The international bankers swept statesmen, politicians, journalists and jurists all on one side, and issued their orders with the imperiousness of absolute monarchs who know that there is no appeal against their ruthless decrees.

I am satisfied that the Right Hon. David Lloyd George put his hand directly on the cause of the frustration which many governments experience when they undertake to solve some of the major problems with which they are faced. I say that the only solution of our post-war problems lies in our determination actually to give this dominion economic democracy. It will be quite an experience for the people of this country, and I believe it will be quite an experience for the country itself, because I am one of those who subscribe to the idea that while we have had our political democracy, economic democracy has yet to be experienced. It is utterly ridiculous for the government of Canada, or the politicians of Canada, and the thinkers of Canada, to allow themselves to be held in serfdom to the exigencies of any financial policy which may be dictated to them, because stooping to a condition of serfdom is not something very much to their credit or something that should be looked upon with any feeling other than one of disgust.

[Mr. Shaw.]

If unemployment, with all its associated evils is to be banished from this fair land of ours then I say that the government will have to face the issue. The government will not succeed in that endeavour by bringing down innumerable orders in council, many of which are quite irrelevant. The government will not succeed in properly establishing our boys who return from the war if they do not face facts. Therefore I say, let us once and for all wake up to the fact that the chaotic condition with which we were confronted in this country between 1929 and 1939, and many of the difficulties with which we are confronted at the present time, can be traced directly to a financial system which in my estimation is neither democratic, Christian nor humane. I realize that this is rather a strong charge. I realize that to say that a financial system is not democratic is a serious statement to make. To say that it is not Christian is also serious, and to say that it is not humane is equally so. But I have yet to hear any member of this house, particularly any hon. member who associates himself with those on the other side of the house, stand on a public platform or rise in his place here and endeavour to prove that there is anything democratic, Christian or humane about our financial system.

In order to substantiate one or two of the remarks I have made, let us go back to that period from 1929 to 1939. I believe it is directly associated with the problem now before us, because surely we learned something from that period which we can utilize in meeting the conditions which will prevail later on. During those ten years there was nothing wrong with the productive ability or capacity of this dominion or of its people. At that time I had an opportunity to see a goodly part of this country, including agricultural, mining and various other areas. For the life of me I could not see anything wrong with our ability to produce. On the other hand I saw something seriously wrong with our right to consume. At that time we had a vast abundance of real wealth on every hand, yet we saw the national debt of this country increase by leaps and bounds until it reached the staggering net total of something in excess of three billion dollars. The financial institutions of this country did not worry very much about those twenty cents a day relief camps. They did not worry very much about the soup-kitchens or our young men riding the rods, to use the common western expression. They did not seem to care very much about the loss of homes, farms and businesses.

Let us take the present period of war, and I should like to make just one observation.

The Canadian people are making and are willing to make a great effort on behalf of freedom. They are offering their lives; they are offering many of the conveniences of pre-war life. They are not complaining. They see lives lost; they see tanks, guns, shells, ships and planes destroyed, all of which are entered on their side of the ledger as debits. On the other hand we see certain financial institutions in this country, privately controlled, entering on their side of the ledger huge profits, with interest attached. In other words, our loss is their gain, so it would appear that we are working at cross-purposes.

In conclusion, let me voice the opinion that if we are to reestablish our men; if we are to give our people that new heaven and new earth; if we are to astonish those people who now believe we may have chaotic conditions after the war, let us say once and for all that we will see that the financial system of this country, which to-day is privately owned and controlled, which to-day has a life-and-death hold over this country, is made an instrument of the people, through their government. Then, Mr. Speaker, and only then, I say, are we going to be able to deal with post-war problems in a realistic and effective manner.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to address the house on the subject of this bill, and would not have done so but for two addresses that have been delivered here to-day. The first was by my good friend the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck), who, I am sorry to say, is not in his seat at the moment. The hon. gentleman occupied a very important position as attorney-general of Ontario, and in that position he had a record in the protection of the interests of the working men and of the soldiers of which he may well be proud. It is with some regret that I differ with him because of his treatment of this bill. With much that he said looking to the future I agree, and it is with regret that I differ with him, in the strongest possible manner, when he describes the bill introduced by our new Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), the first piece of legislation introduced by him, if my memory serves me correctly, as a mere gesture—just a gesture.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SLAGHT: I hear some very mild and modest "hear, hear's" from hon. gentlemen to my right. I shall be treating with one of their heroes in just a moment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. gentlemen angularly opposite to your right.

Mr. SLAGHT: I mean the two groups, for whose leaders I have great respect.

Mr. MacINNIS: Why not the rank and file?

Mr. SLAGHT: I said across, but to my right. Nobody is in doubt as to whom I am directing these observations.

I say to the hon. member for Trinity that the great development of his speech was a brilliant description of his ambition as to the future legislation and the future course which should be adopted in this country. With that development in his speech I am in full accord. But let me say to him that to use a phrase of that kind, namely, that the bill is a mere gesture, when it is introduced by our Minister of Labour, may, while not intended by my hon. friend so to do, work evil in the country. That will have an effect, more than the statements to which I shall refer in a moment or two, and which have come from across the floor.

Is it a mere gesture that a bill which, if it becomes law, requires employers to reinstate employees under conditions not less favourable to them than those which would have been applicable had they not enlisted, should be placed on the statute books? Is that a mere gesture? Is it a cause of complaint, voiced in a mild manner, that there have been selected the members of the armed forces as those of primary concern? Is it a cause of complaint that they shall first be reinstated in positions where they can earn their living? Is it a mere gesture that sections 5 and 6 of the bill would prevent an employer without reasonable cause from terminating the employment of his employee? Is it a mere gesture that under section 6 an employer may not terminate employment, in expectancy that the employee might enlist? Those are not mere gestures; they are definite statutory provisions.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They turn out to be, though.

Mr. SLAGHT: A doubting Thomas over there says they may turn out to be.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am judging from your past action, from the way you treated the soldiers in the last war.

Mr. SLAGHT: You are?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. SLAGHT: You are not judging from my past action.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am judging from the past action of the government.

Mr. SLAGHT: Are you? Well, if it is your philosophy of life that you must attack a bill which contains a plain provision, in language which anybody in high school could understand, simply because you think it is brought in by a government whose past action you do not approve—if that is your philosophy of life, then let me refer you to some other country, a European country, where you would belong.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If this country were going to be under Liberal government all the time, I might do that.

Mr. REID: If there is going to be a free-for-all, let us have it.

Mr. SLAGHT: May I request my hon. friend to leave the hon. member opposite to me.

I am not here to make a provocative speech. I want to lead the way for the hon. member for Trinity and the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas).

Mr. REID: You are doing fine.

Mr. SLAGHT: Now, it comes to this: The hon. member for Weyburn used these expressions, if I heard him correctly: "The bill is a mere improvisation"; "the bill is an empty gesture." Is he reassuring the soldiers in the armed forces when he tells parliament and the country that this bill is a mere empty gesture. Is that the way to promote recruiting?

Mr. JACKMAN: Is that what it is called?

Mr. SLAGHT: We are developing a number of humorists in the house! I regard the bill introduced by the Minister of Labour, whose shoe-strings the attacking member over there is not fit to tie, as one which ought to stand, and ought to receive the serious consideration of the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a little too strong.

Mr. SLAGHT: The hon. member for Weyburn says it does not matter whether the legion or labour approves the bill. When did he appoint himself to indict the approval of the legion in this country? Is he, like an absent leader, a self-appointed gentleman who will say to the legion of this country that they do not understand what they are doing when they approve the bill—or when labour approves it?

I only wish my hon. friend and other hon. members could understand that great harm can be done by that sort of loose attack. Of course it is loose attack. I find from the parliamentary guide that he has been here seven years. He came in 1935, when I did. He has many admirable qualities, and makes some excellent suggestions, with one of which the other day I agreed. But let me say this—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That does not make them excellent—because you agree with them.

Mr. SLAGHT: Oh, what wit! What magnificent satire! Mark Twain must bow his head to my hon. friend!

We are not here to listen to cheap witticisms. I think my hon. friend has occupied his seat pretty regularly for seven years. When a bill comes along which in sections 3, 5 and 6—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And 4.

Mr. SLAGHT: Yes, and 4—when a bill comes along which in sections 3, 4, 5 and 6 gives splendid recognition of the men who have worked, and the men who have been in the armed forces, he wants the country to understand that it is an empty gesture. Where was he for five years, up until the time war broke out? He could have introduced a bill of this kind.

Mr. MacINNIS: Oh, no, he couldn't.

Mr. SLAGHT: Oh, yes, he could; make no mistake about that. It is not a money bill.

Mr. MacINNIS: Of course it is.

Mr. SLAGHT: He could have introduced a bill of this kind up until war broke out.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Absolutely.

Mr. SLAGHT: He could have introduced a resolution providing care for those men, but he was as silent as the grave. Yet when the new minister, of whom he ought to be proud, introduces his first bill in the House of Commons, my hon. friend thinks it a smart thing to describe it as an empty gesture. Please do not let us try to get along in this way. I give my hon. friend great credit for desiring to be helpful. I paid a tribute to all three groups the other day and I repeat it. I pay a tribute to my hon. friend's leader. He would not have made the speech my hon. friend made this afternoon. I rise only to say that if we are to get along, I do not believe that disruptive and provocative speeches such as we have listened to from the hon. member for Weyburn will reassure either the workingmen of this country or the soldiers in our armed forces.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief, but I want to make a few remarks on this bill, notwithstanding what the previous speaker has said. This bill is to provide for the reinstatement in civil life of individuals who enlist for service in his majesty's forces. In my opinion it is simply a gesture, but I think it is a gesture in the right direction.

Mr. SLAGHT: You are getting into bad company.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I want to get into company that will get us along farther than we have so far with this bill. I agree with the bill in principle, but in my opinion it does not go far enough to protect the ex-service person or the employee. We must remember that those who join the armed forces to-day give up a great deal of their natural freedom. They must adjust themselves to a different mode of life under army discipline. They are away from their families and must do without many of the things which we enjoy. In many instances they do this for a greatly decreased remuneration. These people offer their all in defence of the worthwhile things of this life that we enjoy and, therefore, they are entitled to every consideration by the government of the day.

I think it has been recognized by authorities that those who served in the actual theatre of war from 1914 to 1918 have had their life span decreased on the average by at least ten years. Many of those people were not physically or probably mentally fit in some instances for reemployment, and they are entitled to consideration by the state. There has been some discussion about the statement made this afternoon by the hon. member for Weyburn. I feel, and I think the legion itself feels, that the manner in which some of those men have been discharged from the army of to-day is nothing short of disgraceful. To discharge those people with one month's pay and a small clothing allowance, to put them and their families on municipal relief, is not good enough for a nation such as this.

Ex-service people who have rendered a special national service should not have to become a municipal charge. As I have said already, those people have offered their all in defence of this country and they should not become a public charge. They should be taken care of by the state. Like the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) who spoke the other day, I am of opinion that those men should not give up their uniforms until they are assured of reemployment or some satisfactory future security. I am sure that none of us looks forward with any degree of enjoyment to the readjustment period, but during this period the government should undertake the development of our natural resources in a big way. Certain public works should be undertaken, and financial assistance should be given to municipalities for the construction, development or improvement of worth-while community projects. The extension of power sites, increased electrification, the construction of public highways and buildings, water conservation projects, reforestation projects, the construction of recreational grounds and other matters should be carried out. These undertakings would be quite beneficial and bring about a betterment in the lives of these communities. These people must be taken care of in connection with employment.

I think we all realize that great social problems will have to be faced in the future by the government and the state. Reference has been made to certain sections of this bill. Section 4 places the onus upon the employee of instituting action if his employer does not want to take him back. Many employees will not take this action because they will fear that if they do so they will prejudice their chances of future employment somewhere else. In my opinion tribunals should be set up to handle these cases. Section 5 deals with prosecutions, and here again the onus is placed upon the employee. I think these sections are improper. The onus should not be placed upon the man who is trying to regain his former position.

In my opinion a committee of this house should be set up to study the matter of the rehabilitation of ex-service men and women in the broadest possible manner. That should be done immediately. Representatives of agriculture, industry, and other callings in Canada could give information to the committee.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I must say that when I looked at this bill I was pleased indeed. First, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) upon assuming his present position. I think he is in the right place. I remember the night when news was coming into this house from the recent by-elections, and I felt quite happy over the results for several reasons. First, I knew that the Minister of Labour understands labour, which is an absolutely essential characteristic of any Minister of Labour who hopes to do his work properly. I speak from experience. When we were in difficulty at the head of the lakes during the years of the depression, the late Hon. Norman Rogers did his best to formulate a youth training scheme. His assistant, the present Minister of Labour, was sent to the head of the lakes, and from the way in which he conducted himself at that time I knew that he would be kind and decent, that he had some backbone which a cabinet minister certainly needs when someone tries to put over on him something which is not on the square.

Because the minister had a hand in the setting up of the youth training scheme, I am glad he is where he is to-day. This legislation is a forerunner of what we may expect from the Minister of Labour. He is getting ready for the days that lie ahead. As the distinguished lawyer who has just spoken said, you know the law was before the province, therefore the law was before the ministers. This minister certainly has the vision to see ahead and get ready for it. I should like to quote a man for whom I have always had the most profound respect. He is a great man and a great parliamentarian. Lord Bennett, of the House of Lords, speaking on February 16 said:

> Unless we are prepared for what comes after the war we might as well not win it, because a war won without ability to carry on afterwards is equivalent to a war lost.

Whether this is the legislation which will be needed after the war is a question, because we are living in an age of change. I suppose that ideas which are expressed here this evening may be outmoded to some extent even before we read them in the paper to-morrow morning. Not so long ago most of us were unwilling to accept anything "red": we did not think very much of Russia. Yet to-day we take off our hats to the generalissimo and the generals of the Russian army and the men who follow their leadership; because of them we feel a little more secure. If I were a prophet I might be inclined to predict, looking a little bit ahead, though not perhaps very far, that when the Russians have defeated Germany, Germany will turn round and help us to overcome the yellow peril. To some that may seem imaginative, but I do not think it is improbable.

One important feature of this bill is that it provides for the future, and in that connection I wish to make a suggestion which may have been touched upon before; I do not know. The provisions of this bill should take in all soldiers, no matter whether they were or were not employed before enlistment. I know that at the beginning of the war many men in my district who had no jobs joined the 4th Field Ambulance. When they return, they will need to eat, so they will need to work; their wives will require the wherewithal to rear their families properly. I know that some men are good and some are not; some are efficient and some are not. But all need to live. Any soldier or any other man who is willing to give his best for his country should be made secure. I remember as a boy reading that old parable which tells us that a man who worked only one hour got paid for the whole day. I suppose the modern interpretation of that parable is that the Master Workman thought that that man and his wife and family needed to eat, therefore he required as much pay as the other men. I commend to the minister the suggestion that this legislation shall include all soldiers. We shall have something to say later on about legislation which will take in all unemployed who are willing to work. I know that the cost will be very heavy. After all, however, what good is money, whether of the "sound" variety or any other kind, if it does not help our fellow men to do their best work?

Another piece of advice I would offer the minister—it has been mentioned before—is that he surround himself with men who not only understand industry but understand labour. Have experts who are independent-thinking and have received their education in the school of hard knocks. I would not engage academic experts only, but practical men who know.

Another suggestion from me which the minister may pardon, for it comes from experience, is that he should have in his department one or two clergymen. They are the finest type of men in the country, bar none. They are men who have gone into the valley of poverty and helped their fellow citizens in difficulty and distress. Many of our finest citizens, like the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), have been born in humble surroundings, educated in the school of common sense and trained in the Christian faith, so that their outlook is fine.

I know that this will be a terrific job for the minister and those associated with him, but I do not believe there is one hon. member, no matter to what group he belongs, who will refuse to hold up his hand and strengthen him.

We speak of a new order. But a new order which will not provide employment for every last human being is not, to my mind, worth the paper it is written on.

The hon. member for Davenport has said that industry is willing to cooperate. I have found that to be true in a great many instances, although not in all. Every industrialist is not like the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), who looks after his men when they are unemployed.

I hope the Minister of Labour will surround himself with the right kind of experts, and with industrialists who have the will to work and a love of humanity which will help them to rise to their highest and best.

It should not be overlooked that a scheme of this kind will certainly aid recruiting. The man who is about to sign up will know that the government is providing legislation for the security of himself and his family. Whatever may happen to him, those who depend upon him will be secure. The man who gives his best deserves that the best shall be done for him.

I commend the minister for this legislation. I judge from what I know of him that no matter what the criticisms may be, or what bumps he may get, he is a man who can "take it" and go along and do better in the future; and I wish him the best kind of success, with the blessing of the Master Workman.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I want to say a few words on this bill, although nothing in the way of specific criticism. That does not mean I am at all satisfied that it is what is required at the present time.

The purpose of the bill is the specific one of reinstating in their former employment persons who have served in the armed forces. But, as pointed out in the preamble of the bill, the fundamental reason for introducing it is that it may be part of a scheme to deal with some of the national problems which will confront us when this war is over.

The nature of our problem has been stated or intimated by a number of speakers, and I am not going to spend any great amount of time on it.

I would, however, point out that although the problem will be somewhat like the one we had to face after the last war, and more particularly something like the problem we had to deal with between the years 1929 and 1939, it will in some respects be a different problem, because the psychology of many of the people concerned will be altogether different from anything that has confronted us up to now. Members of this house who have had an opportunity of travelling across the country, from one end to the other, during the last ten years no doubt have some inkling of what that problem will be.

From 1930 to 1939, we had a great many unemployed in the country—I do not think there is anyone in the house more conversant with this than the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell)—and most of them were young men who were living in the most deplorable conditions. As one hon. member has already mentioned, when those young men travelled from one place to another they travelled in boxcars, or some other kind of freight cars. We could see them by hundreds, in dirt and squalor, as we travelled in the ordinary mode of conveyance. But those of us who are travelling across the country to-day see these same young men under altogether different circumstances. They are well dressed and well fed, and when they travel from one place to another they do not ride in boxcars but in the day coaches, in the standard cars, in tourist cars; and they eat in the dining car like other civilized people. Let me tell the members of this house that these men are not going back to boxcars when the war is over. That is what we have to face. These men to-day are well fed, well clothed and well housed, and they are living dangerously; and I say they will not be satisfied with boxcars, unemployment camps and soup-kitchens after this war is over.

An hon. MEMBER: Why should they?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, why should they? That is what the members of this house have to keep in mind in dealing with this matter. If this bill is merely an item in a whole scheme for the building of a new social order after the war is over, then it is all right in its time and place and I have no criticism to offer.

Prior to the commencement of the war, when we were suggesting better treatment for the unemployed, what did we hear? There was no money. Since the war began, I have heard members blaming this little group because the country was not better prepared for the war when it came. They said that we opposed rearmament—as if the government did not have a majority sufficient to do anything they wanted. This group did not prevent parliament from giving a better deal to the unemployed, but the unemployed did not get a better deal. This group did not prevent old age pensioners from getting better pensions, but the old age pensioners are not getting better pensions, though we have always been asking for it.

I believe it was in the first session after the Liberal government came into office that we made certain proposals in the house to deal with the unemployment situation that then confronted us, and the late Hon. Norman Rogers, speaking to the house on the question of unemployment, after making some reference to these proposals made the following statement as reported in Hansard of 1936, March 30, page 1593:

I believe it is useless for us to repair the superstructure of our economic life, as represented by our secondary industries, if its foundation as represented by our primary industries is crumbling away. I am not going to speak at length as to what may be done by public employment to meet the economic problem to which I have referred. I may state however that I am quite sure it has been proved by the experience of all countries that public employment of itself is not a solution. I repeat, it is not a solution. It would cost this country somewhere between $300,000,000 and $400,000,000 to put at work the employables in the category to which I have just referred.

Mr. Bennett: Per annum?

Mr. Rogers: Yes, per annum. It is conceivable that this country might pursue a policy of that kind this year and the year after, but it is not conceivable that this or any other country could continue a policy of that kind without adopting with all its implications the philosophy of socialism.

I direct the attention of the house to that statement. It would cost $300,000,000 or $400,000,000, Mr. Rogers said, to put into effect—what? A wealth creating programme such as we were suggesting, the building of houses and schools, the building of hospitals, the building of roads. We could not stand that, we were told. But in 1940, I believe, the war expenditures of the country were $800,000,000—I am not quite sure of the figures. In 1941 we passed a bill for $1,300,000,000, and that was not all. This year we have before us an appropriation bill for $2,000,000,000. But is anyone talking about the country going bankrupt? No; what we are afraid of is that when the time comes for demobilization, when we are not spending billions of dollars on destruction, we shall have to spend a little bit of money to create more wealth, and we are afraid that we shall not be able to stand it and that a terrible calamity will overtake us. Surely we must be crazy. This war must have taught us that if once we can get it finished, we are ready to say that never again need the people of this country face unemployment, poverty, misery or want, because we have everything here necessary to satisfy all our needs. We are proving that every day of our lives now.

I should like to make a suggestion to the minister. But first I would say I am glad, as is the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) that there is at the present time a member of the cabinet who at least should understand labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does, not should.

Mr. MacINNIS: All right; we will watch you on that—who at least should understand labour. Until he came into the cabinet there was not a man in it who had any understanding of the labour problem either from experience or from study or from any other source. That fact is certainly reflected in the labour policies which have been followed in this country ever since the war began.

What I was going to say to the minister is that if he will get his colleagues in the cabinet to bring proposals before this house, be they ever so progressive, or radical if you like, this house will give them support, because this house is more progressive than the cabinet. I would not be surprised if the country is more progressive than the house. My hon. friend's position in the cabinet may be something like that of President Roosevelt and congress; although not having the same power, the minister is perhaps in a better position for getting his measures accepted as far as this house goes than President Roosevelt is in relation to congress, because congress is far less progressive than the president is. The president had great difficulty in getting congress to accept his new deal policies, as great difficulty in convincing them in that regard as he had in convincing them where their duty and interest lay during the last two years. The minister need not, therefore, be afraid, so far as this house is concerned, to bring before it any measure of social reform or social security.

The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck), speaking this afternoon—and I think his speech must have been better than I thought at the time it was, because of the criticism it has received—referred to the problems that will confront us when the war is over. He said they would be such as to make the stoutest heart quail. I believe he would agree with this, that they could make us quail only if we insist on adhering to old ideas and outworn institutions; but that if we are prepared to look forward, to take advantage of the knowledge and experience we have gained concerning production since the war began, there is nothing, so far as the problems of production are concerned, and surely there is nothing so far as the problem of organization is concerned, that we cannot easily handle.

I wish to make one other point, not in regard to legislation that may be brought before this house but in regard to its administration. We must be very careful not to pit the returned men against those who did not go to war, as was done on so many occasions after the last war, when the returned men were made pawns of in order to support the selfish ends of vested interests. This must not happen again. I am satisfied that it will not happen again, because the returned men to-day and the men who will return from this war will be wiser than the men who returned from the last war and will not be so easily hoodwinked.

With these few words I shall leave the bill until it reaches the committee stage. I accept it as an almost infinitesimal part of the measures that will be required to meet successfully the problems with which we are and shall be confronted until we learn how to deal with them.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I have very few remarks to make on this bill. It has been variously characterized by hon. members who have spoken; the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) characterized it as a mere gesture, the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), who undertook to spank him, thought it was a fine piece of legislation. I do not think it is worthy either of great blame or great praise; it is but an instalment; I do not suppose it is intended to be anything more. I think that is a fair statement of the position. This bill, as every one who has followed it will know, is in compliance with the promise made by the former Minister of Labour in June last when he brought down a certain order in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): A promise made to my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Exactly so. We had an undertaking—I do not remember exactly how it came about—that that order in council would be followed by legislation at this session to give effect to its terms, and so far as I have been able to appreciate the bill, it is in fulfilment of that requirement. But to say it is a complete measure of rehabilitation for the returned soldier who finds himself out of employment would be far from the mark. This bill, and the order in council upon which it is founded, follow precisely a measure which was introduced in England, and it was merely—and I do not use that word in any derogatory sense—one short step to meet a situation which had emerged. I think the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) and the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will bear me out when I say that, taking it by and large, employers of labour have cooperated with the government in an exceedingly fine spirit.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In no instance have we had any occasion to impose the order in reference to any large employer of labour in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad the minister says that, because that clarifies the position, and corroborates what I thought was the case. There may have been an odd instance where there has been refusal or inability to reinstate returned soldiers in their former employment. But I am glad to hear the minister say what he has said, that there have been very few cases in which application has been made to him to use the compulsory powers that are given in this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mostly in cases of municipalities and institutions, not in connection with industry.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then that gives industry a clean sheet, though I did not rise to ask for a clean sheet for industry. If this, however, is intended to be a rehabilitation measure for all the armed forces, I say to the minister that it falls lamentably short. I do not think it was ever so intended; and the minister is grappling, not with the most important problem but with a minor part of it. He can say what he likes; we can all say what we like, but let us not blind ourselves to that fact.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): It is a necessary part, though.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree, and I am not condemning the principle of this bill; the hon. member must not misunderstand me. It is good as far as it goes, though I want to tell the minister this—and I am going to have something more to say about it a little later on—that I think I could drive a coach and four through this bill in defending an action under it.

Mr. MITCHELL: You could with any bill; that is what they have lawyers for.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is a frank admission on the part of the minister. I doubt if any case will ever come before the courts under this bill. I hope it may never be necessary; but just by the way, who is going to take the action? The bill is absolutely silent as to that; the machinery is not there. It is deficient in that respect. But that is a detail which perhaps I should not discuss in dealing with the principle. I call it to the attention of the minister now, so that at a later date he may give us some information as to the intention of the government in that regard.

May I say what perhaps I should have said in the very beginning, that I am glad to welcome the minister, as I have told him privately. He and I were in the House of Commons together a number of years ago. I do not propose to pour upon him any fulsome flattery to-night. The minister understands something about labour problems, but I should not like him to arrogate to himself what I thought he was inclined to do just a moment ago, full knowledge of everything in relation to labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: I never said that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps I misunderstood the minister. I am going to try to help him in connection with this bill. In the committee stage I am going to point out some of the good features of it and some of its weaknesses. But the bill only touches the fringes of a problem with which this country will be confronted increasingly day by day during the war and in the post-war period.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We agree with that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This afternoon the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) made a speech which unfortunately I did not hear in whole, but which dealt in a measure with the larger aspects of this question of rehabilitation. With a great deal of what the hon. gentleman said I am in agreement. It may interest him to know, however, in relation to his remarks about the Atlantic charter, it is the opinion of many persons, including one man who was in very high authority on the other side but who has recently ceased to hold office, that there will be as many interpretations of the Atlantic charter as there are bodies sitting in at the conference. That did not sound very good to me.

Mr. ROEBUCK: That is the case also in connection with the bible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose that is true, and as long as we are individualists and think for ourselves, that is quite proper. But it is not all going to be as easy as some people seem to imagine.

Coming back to this bill, I do not intend to deal with the whole question of rehabilitation in the post-war period. That, Mr. Speaker, is a mighty problem, and it is going to take the best minds and brains of the nationals not only of this country but of every democratic country in the world to solve these problems. But I do reaffirm what I said not many days ago in this house, that if industry and labour and governmental authority are wise; if they survey the situation sufficiently in advance, and if they make proper plans, there need not be a recurrence of the conditions we experienced after the last war. Therefore, as citizens of this country, as men earnestly wanting to do the right thing by our fellow citizens, it behooves us to begin to study these questions now. It is not too soon to talk about them; it is not too soon to study them. I commend the suggestion that was made in this house to-day, I think by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), who I thought hardly deserved all the condemnation that was heaped upon him by my hon. and learned friend the member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) with respect to his observations on this bill. It is not too soon for this parliament to set up a committee of this house to begin now to study and explore what may be done for rehabilitation in this country, especially of the armed forces. Begin now. Let the Minister of Labour give us a lead and give the private members of this house an opportunity to show what is in them. There will be ideas come forward, in a body of 245 men like this. I never had any difficulty in solving problems if I had ideas. The trouble with most of us is paucity of ideas. I have never in my life had any difficulty in clothing my ideas with proper language. My weakness has always been that I never had the right ideas, or enough of them, and I think that is the case with most of us. Originality is almost wanting in most of us, but let us get down to business and begin now to study the question of rehabilitation.

This bill will do something to take care of the soldier who had a job before he went to war and who comes back disabled. There are many soldiers in the armed forces. I shall not impugn their patriotism, but I suggest that at least fifty per cent of the men who enlisted in New Brunswick in the early stages of the war did so because they had no jobs. I have talked to many of them. I have had boys come into my office and ask me what they should do. They have had it figured out on a slip of paper, how much they were going to get out of it. I have always tried to tell them it was not a question of dollars and cents, that it was a question of their conscience, the duty they owed to their country, and that the mere pittance the country paid them was not the real consideration at all.

Mr. MAYHEW: Does my hon. friend think that was the spirit shown at Dunkirk?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; that was not the spirit shown at Dunkirk, and that would not be the spirit of these young men after they got into the army and saw some action. They would be just as patriotic as anyone else; but there is no doubt that numbers of men went from this country—let us be honest about it—because they were unemployed. That applies principally to the communities where there was no war employment. I do not know about the central provinces, where there was a great deal of war employment, but undoubtedly that was true in certain parts of the country. But do not let that be considered as a reflection on the patriotism of those young men who enlisted. That was not the sole motive; but they knew they would receive certain considerations, that their families would be looked after, and they joined up. That is nothing at all against them; but those men do not come under this statute. It is admitted; the minister will, of course, agree with that. That is the problem I suggest he has to face in the future. What about the reestablishment of the men who did not have jobs when they enlisted? That is the feature which I believe the hon. member for Weyburn was trying to impress upon the minister. I am not going to discuss the point he raised. I suggest that this bill is just a measure—

Mr. ROWE: Just a gesture.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; it is perhaps more than a gesture. It is in fulfilment of a pledge given in June last when the order in council was passed. I believe the order in council was passed because of the pressure of public opinion upon the government to do something more than had been done. I believe it was very distressing in the early days of the war, when men were sent back, and especially those who had been overseas, because of physical disabilities. They were given what? They were given a month's pay and allowances.

One of the real difficulties the minister is going to find under the bill—and I point it out to him now so that the government may have an opportunity to think about it—one of the real difficulties to be encountered in operating under this bill is the case of the civilian who had a job before he enlisted, who went overseas and who, by reason of climatic conditions or for some other reason, is not able to come back and fulfil the functions he performed prior to his enlistment. How many of them there are, I do not know. How many there may be, I cannot guess. But that is going to present a real problem to the government. If the returned man cannot perform the functions he performed prior to his enlistment, then that is a cause for rejecting him under one of the sections of this bill.

Those are problem cases. I am sure the Minister of Pensions and National Health realizes what the situation is. I hope the Minister of Labour will understand it, too. Those are going to be the difficult cases to deal with. The man who is competent, the man who can come back to his lathe or to his job—there will be no difficulties about him. The real difficulty comes from the man who wants to work, but cannot work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Problem cases.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You may call them problem cases, or whatever you like, but you may rest assured that there will be a great many of them, even though these men have not been through the rigours of battle. They have to be taken care of. What is the government offering them? It is offering nothing under this bill.

There are a number of aspects with which one might deal in discussing the bill. I believe the biggest problem of all is the man who enlisted, and who at the time of his enlistment did not have a job. He will come back, and unless there is something more than this bill offers, he will still be without a job.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I had intended reserving what I have to say for the committee stage, had it not been for the remarks of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght). I think they were misleading. In his remarks, when addressing the jury, he makes the observation that this bill was endorsed by the Canadian Legion, and that it was endorsed by labour. Definitely and specifically he made that statement.

At the time he made it I was sceptical. I am a member of the Canadian Legion. I understand the machinery of that organization, and I have had considerable correspondence with it, in that section of the country from which I come. I am reasonably sure that there has never been a branch of that organization consulted as to whether they disapprove or approve this bill. In addition, there is only one democratic way of consulting labour, and that is through the medium of their organization. I do not believe any of the organized sections of the trade union movement in Canada have been consulted.

I do not think this bill is necessary, and in that respect I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson).

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It ought not to be necessary.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not necessary at this time, in the form in which it is presented to the house. The men we should be concerned about, as the leader of the opposition and others have pointed out, are those in that disinherited generation which rode the rods for twenty years prior to the outbreak of the war, the men who were the first to go into uniform. To date no provision has been made for them, except to relegate them back to the ranks of the unemployed whence they came.

The man who had a job when he enlisted will not have difficulty, upon discharge, in securing the employment he left. The order in council passed at the last session served the purpose in that connection. I have seen no difficulty, as far as they are concerned, in the different parts of Canada in which I have moved. But there are hundreds of men who did not have jobs and who are back with discharge certificates. The employers do not want them because they are not physically fit. They are told their discharge is not worth the paper it is written on.

The Department of Pensions and National Health is trying to do something, and it is my personal opinion that it is a mistake to shift the problem of rehabilitation from that department to the Department of Labour.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. GILLIS: Because the Department of Pensions and National Health have made a start on it. They have set up a committee. They have set out certain regulations. If that department were handling the whole problem, it could be considered as a whole. But if the problem is to be divided up, by juggling it from one department to another, we shall wind up with accomplishing nothing, and with no one accepting responsibility.

As far as my experience in the house is concerned, the Department of Labour is the only department of government which is not enforcing the legislation it is supposed to enforce. As a worker I am badly disappointed with that department. Outside the house I have always indicated that department specifically as the one to which the worker may turn when in difficulties. But my experience in the house has been that the name of the department should be changed. It might to-day properly be called the employers' protective association. I say that because in that department there is legislation which directly applies to the difficulties which the workers have been getting into from time to time. It is very clear and plain to me that that legislation could be enforced by the department, if they were so inclined. But they seem to take the reverse stand, and it is the employer they are concerned about at all times. I need not elaborate upon that point. It has been demonstrated time and again—Windsor to-day; Kirkland Lake last week. It has been that way right along for the past two and a half years.

I had the pleasure of serving on a parliamentary committee on pensions and national health, and I listened to the discussion with respect to rehabilitation. I heard the minister speak. A report was presented by that committee, which dealt with the rehabilitation of the man who comes back from service. I believe that committee made the best start that could be made when it tabled its supplementary report in the house on Friday, June 13, 1941. That committee was representative of all political parties in this house, and its membership was made up almost entirely of ex-service men. It dealt specifically with the question of rehabilitation which we are discussing under this bill, and recommended:

> That consideration be given to the retaining in the service for a period not exceeding six months after the date on which they would otherwise be discharged, non-pensionable and non-disability members of the forces with no assurance of immediate post-discharge employment, with the object of enabling such members of the forces to obtain employment and to be reestablished in civil life.

If this bill contained something of that kind, it would be a start in establishing a new order of society. It is rather disillusioning and it lowers the prestige of those in this house who attempt to speak for the people when phrases like "the old order of things", "the new order of society that must come forth", "the new ideals and new concepts" and so on are used. We have heard phrases such as these from all sides since the outbreak of the war. But each and every time those in authority should bring forward something by way of legislation that would lead us to believe that they were sincere in making these pronouncements or in giving this lip-service, or that they believed in a new deal after this war is over, they come back with exactly the same old story.

No consideration is given in this bill to the man who did not have a job. This is simply legislation to maintain the status quo. A man without a job is prepared to lay down his life for the institutions of this country. The committee on rehabilitation in Great Britain have recommended that the man who fights this war, who comes through Singapore, Hong Kong and the other battles that will have to be fought before this war is over, is not to come back to the ranks of the unemployed. The Department of Pensions and National Health have made a start. A man is entitled to $9 a week if he is single and $13, if married. That is a start, but it is still relief. At the expiry of the relief term there is no guarantee of a job.

Eighteen months after the war is over, public sentiment begins to cool off. People begin to forget that a man has fought. The men who came back from the last war had to take off their buttons in order to get jobs, and it was not very long before they had to do that. Ex-service men were considered as tramps and bums, and they were called that by many influential people. We do not want a repetition of that. We must make a start toward bringing in a new order of society. We must have this on paper by way of legislation. We must demonstrate to the people that we are not merely talking about this matter in order to fool them.

There are many sections of this bill to which I can give my own meaning. For example, section 2 can be used as a lever for conscription. The trainee is excluded. A man who is on a job and is called up for training, if he does not volunteer for overseas service he can be ruled out when he comes back from training. There is no protection for him in this bill as far as his job is concerned.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to point out that the trainee is protected under the regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order in council, P.C. 7680 of October 7, 1941, brings such men within the provisions of the compulsory reinstatement order, P.C. 4758.

Mr. GILLIS: I would be quite agreeable if this still remains within the jurisdiction of the Department of Pensions and National Health. Why is that not in the bill? My main objection to the bill is that it shifts responsibility which should remain with the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. MARTIN: Not necessarily; read section 11, subsection 2.

Mr. GILLIS: The trouble to-day is that so many boards are functioning and so many orders in council are passed we do not understand exactly where we are going. Before this war is on for another year we shall have to hire lawyers to sit at our elbows and interpret the laws of this country. I am not blaming the Minister of Labour for this, because I know he did not write it. The chances are that he disagrees with it as much as we do.

Mr. MITCHELL: I want to tell my hon. friend that I do not disagree with it as much as he does.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is just a matter of degree.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not a matter of degree.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not want to waste any more time because we shall have an opportunity to discuss the sections in committee.

An hon. MEMBER: You have wasted enough.

Mr. GILLIS: That is your opinion. I earnestly suggest that the parliamentary committee which was set up by this house should continue to function in cooperation with the subcommittee that is functioning now. This whole matter of vocational training and everything pertaining to rehabilitation should remain under the Department of Pensions and National Health. I do not believe in giving bouquets, but since coming into this house my experience has been that in connection with any matter pertaining to ex-service men or any problem that I have had to present, the minister has been most efficient. He is on the job, and he understands the problem of the ex-service man, being one himself. This department has been working on this problem for two years, and it should remain there.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, my first observation is to welcome our old colleague (Mr. Mitchell) back in the house in the position which he now holds. Perhaps we all look forward on behalf of Canada and our people particularly for some legislation of merit which will take some cognizance of the human element in our population rather than letting ourselves drift so easily into the channel of matters which are materialistic. I feel that this bill is only one step among many others, some of which have been taken and many more which will have to be taken before the unemployment probability becomes a problem. Yes; I would say more; we may not have an opportunity to face this problem if we do not conduct ourselves in the matter of the affairs of the nation in connection with one major matter which is in the minds, not only of us assembled here but of all the Canadian people. The fact that there is a war on, that the world is in flames; let us get through with legislation of this kind as quickly and as expeditiously as possible.

My words will be brief. I hesitate even to recite some of the ideas that run through my mind with regard to what will happen when the war is over. Where are these employers going to be? Some may be in bankruptcy and others will be out of business. As one generation succeeds another, many will fall by the wayside. This bill only touches, as someone said a moment or two ago, the fringe of the matters that are concerned. Let us then relate this bill to the war effort. Let us be sincere and genuine in anything that we promise these soldiers when they return. Do not promise them that certain things will happen when they return just to get them in the army, but rather establish confidence in them so that when they are in the army they will know, as the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) said, that their places in business or in the employment market will be ready for them when they return. Not only that, but establish confidence in those who are left behind—the mothers, brothers, sisters and others—so that the morale of our people may be kept on a very high plane.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) referred to the new order. The new order is already here, or what parts of it are not here are coming along very fast; we welcome them and are anxious that they shall prevail. We consider the employment of these men when they return; of course we do. Is there one of us whose pleasure it is to have a payroll who has not said to his employee when he enlisted, "Good luck, and God be with you; and when you come back, as we pray God you will, you will be put back to your job with all the seniority rights which go along with it." A little while ago the hon. member for Red Deer made a speech, the first half of which was very good; but as he went on he seemed to suggest, to my mind, that industry had no soul; he seemed to think that those charged with responsibility of the pay envelope for large numbers of employees did not give much thought to them. I asked him to go into a huddle with his seat mate, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka). It was my pleasure, when he came to Toronto some months ago, to take him round to certain establishments, where he was shown payrolls, not of ten or fifteen employees but of 200 in one establishment and the same number in another. When he went over their employment cards he found that these men knew no other boss, they knew no other job. He will say, I believe, that there are some industries, may I say most industries, in Canada to-day that have a soul, that have a heart, and that are anxious to do something on behalf of their employees.

MR. SHAW: On a point of order, may I say to my hon. friend that I did not cast any reflections on industry or the part which industry is playing; I criticized the financial system and the financial institutions of this country.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that is not a point of order, but I will try to answer the implication which is made. I wonder just how much the hon. member was helping employees and employers —financiers, if you will—and those who subscribe to victory loans and to everything else which go to make up our present war effort, when he questioned whether there was a sinister influence behind the government. Where are the sinister forces; where are these money barons who promote or suggest to administrations ruthless decrees as to how our country shall be operated? Did that help the idea which is in the minds of one and all of us at this time? I congratulate the hon. member upon the first half of his speech, but I ask him, before he gets over into the funny money ideas, to give some thought to the war picture as it obtains to-day.

When my hon. leader observed that this bill ought not to be necessary, he propounded a question; he did not say that it was not necessary. In every line of endeavour there are those who have to be tapped on the shoulder and told to observe the rules; they may be quacks in the medical profession; they may be persons operating without a licence; but in every vocation you find those who have to be told. For those who have no soul in their business, who are not concerned about the rights of others, by all means put such legislation on the statute books. The minister must exercise his authority to remind people of this type, whom he may let me call "pikers"

[Mr. J. H. Harris.]

—the minister and I understand that term— that there is a law on the statute books. Therefore I say, put this bill and other measures of a like nature on the statute books and you will help the general situation.

Let me go one step further. There is legislation, well worth-while legislation, known as unemployment insurance. I think perhaps you should have some employment insurance. There is provision in the statutes to-day for making inventory reserves in your financial set-up. I just wonder whether it would not be good business to legislate to permit employment of financial reserves to take care of post-war problems of this kind. If you are going to consider unemployment insurance for the employees, perhaps you might also give consideration to employment insurance for the employers, to see that they are kept in business to take care of the armed forces when they return.

The period we are now going through is just the close of another phase of the business cycle. We had a business cycle wherein efficiency engineers of all kinds came to the front and took charge of industry throughout Canada. They sat with stop-watches over an employee and his particular vocation to show how production might be speeded up, for example, from forty units to forty-five units an hour. These proceedings were necessary because the shareholders owning businesses were demanding returns on their investments. But one circumstance which was not, to my mind, put in the balance in that equation was the fact that the employees could not stand the pressure and the strain of high efficiency. When labour is plentiful that system may obtain, but when labour is scarce they slacken down on the degree of efficiency they demand from their employees. When labour is plentiful the soul of business goes out of the window; when labour is scarce the soul creeps back in. To my mind this legislation, in common with other laws of a like nature will help to keep some soul in business, and in the final analysis will go a long way toward meeting the post-war conditions which we now fear.

In the meantime I say to the administration, all the elements in this bill which will help the war effort are commendable, but let us get on with everything which has to do with the direct prosecution of this war, so that in the days to come it may be our privilege to meet in the broadest possible way the situation which we are thinking about now, rather than, perhaps, have someone else, the dictator, say what we are going to do—and that individual will be soulless.

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City): It is my intention to make just a few observations on this important piece of legislation. Before doing so, may I take this opportunity of thanking hon. members in all parts of the house who were very kind in offering words of congratulation to me when I had the honour of seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Those words were all too flattering but nonetheless greatly appreciated. I also wish to thank my friends in the press gallery for the complimentary references they made about my speech. Many of them represent newspapers, the policy of which is diametrically opposed to some of the ideas I expressed, but they were in every instance most fair to me. This speaks volumes for those of our friends who sit in the press gallery doing an important piece of work. It is impossible for them to quote all the words said in this house; nevertheless it is their duty to interpret to the public what goes on here, and all members will agree with me when I say they discharge an important task very well indeed.

I should like to join with the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) in congratulating the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) upon bringing down this legislation, and I think it is to be noted that the first measure brought down by the new minister is one dealing with returned men. That will be to his undying glory. Of course it is natural that he should bring down this legislation, for he himself was a sailor and sailed on British ships during the last war.

It has been suggested, I believe almost entirely from outside this house, that this legislation should be left until the war is finished or almost finished. I am in full accord with prosecuting this war with all vigour and doing all we can to win it. Nothing must be left undone; no one must be taken from any service which would contribute to the winning of the war. That is our first aim, our important task at the present time. But there are doubtless some whose service cannot be used at this time directly in the winning of the war, and those people should, I believe, devote their time and their minds to the introduction of legislation which will assist in rehabilitating those who are giving their all at this time of the nation's peril.

In Great Britain great attention is being given to the question of rehabilitation. It was my privilege, together with five other members of this house, to be in the House of Lords when His Gracious Majesty delivered the speech opening parliament, and I will quote some of the words of that speech:

> My government, in consultation with the allied governments, and with the goodwill of the government of the United States of America are considering the urgent problems which will face them when the nations now enduring the tyranny of the oppressor have regained their freedom.

In Great Britain, therefore, it would appear that they are not leaving this problem until the war is over or almost over, but are tackling it now. We all recall that after the last war men were discharged from the army and had no employment. We have heard to-day from many members of instances they know of where men were discharged and never did regain employment. We do not want that condition to prevail when this war is over. Men must not be discharged from the army until they have some tangible means of supporting themselves.

I would join with the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) in paying a tribute to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). I also sat on the committee on pensions and rehabilitation which functioned during the last session of parliament. I know something of the interest which the minister took in that committee, and I join entirely with all that the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said with regard to the minister. I know that the minister is devoting a great deal of his time towards devising ways and means so that the lot of the returned soldier will be made easier when the war is over. But not only must we consider the lot of the returned man; we must think of all of the working people of the country.

It has been said that this is a war of machines. Accordingly there are thousands of men now working in armament plants of various kinds who will be thrown out of work after the war. It should be the duty of this house to consider ways and means whereby these men will have other work to which they can go. None of us wants to live over again the years from 1932 to 1936, when thousands of people in this country were unemployed. The city of Brantford, which I represent, was before this war the fourth export city of the dominion. It is essentially an industrial city. But I recall that in the years from 1932 to 1936 practically twenty-five per cent of the people of that great industrial centre were on relief through no fault of their own. They suffered long continued and enforced idleness while their women and children suffered with them; and what was true of Brantford was true of practically every other industrial city, not only in this dominion, but throughout the world.

I remember that in England there were three million people unemployed, and it is said that in the United States there were 13,000,000 unemployed. I also remember reading that in Germany there were 7,000,000 unemployed.

It has occurred to me that the nazis could not have come into power in Germany if it had not been for the great masses of the people who were unemployed. Germany used those men to create instruments of destruction, and those men have now practically become slaves of the state. Our unemployed did retain their spiritual and political freedom, and now it should be our aim to assure them of economic security. As other speakers have said, it is not going to be an easy task. It cannot be done by the waving of a wand. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has pointed out how difficult it will be. Nevertheless we cannot shrink from the task; we must endeavour to provide security for those who are now employed.

Our men are fighting for better living conditions for all. They do not want to come back to the conditions of 1932-1936. In fact they have been encouraged by the words of the Atlantic charter. This charter has been referred to by many hon. members to-day, more especially by my friend the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck). Let me just mention two points of that charter; the fifth principle is: "Security for all, improved labour standards, economic advancement and social security." The sixth—and this is very important—is, "That all may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want."

Subsequently to the Atlantic charter, representatives from twenty-six nations gathered in Washington and signed what has come to be known as the Allied Washington agreement. It was signed on January 2. The representatives from these nations bound themselves for their respective countries, to certain common principles in national policy, on which they based their hopes for a better future for the world. If we combine the thought of the Atlantic charter and the Washington conference, we get the words delivered by the President of the United States when he said:

> Our own objectives are clear: the objective of smashing the militarism imposed by war lords upon their enslaved peoples; the objective of liberating the subjugated nations; the objective of establishing and securing freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom from want and freedom from fear anywhere in the world.

He went on:

> When I say that this time we are determined not only to win the war, but also to maintain the security of the peace which will follow. . . . We of the United Nations are not making all this sacrifice of human effort and human lives to return to the kind of world we had after the last war.

The men who are enlisting to-day are not offering their lives to return to the kind of world in which they lived immediately preceding this war. We have a great country; we have great resources. Our problem is to see that everyone, irrespective of his station in life, gets a fair share of the good things of this great land.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I had not intended to take any part in this debate, but owing to the trend of the discussion I feel obliged to say a few words.

We have heard a good deal about a new social order that is to come after the war. But this bill proves conclusively that the government totally fails to comprehend the objective of any new order. For instance, is our objective merely to find jobs for people? Is that our objective to-day? Our objective to-day is to bring about a maximum war effort, not to find jobs. In order to maintain a maximum war effort we are actually having to conserve labour, and in order to make that maximum war effort the government has guaranteed that all financial restrictions shall be removed, that no financial restriction shall be allowed to cripple our war effort. All right; then when peace comes, let the government still declare that in order to maintain a maximum peace effort no financial restriction shall be allowed to impede that effort. If that is done, we shall not be worrying about jobs but, just as to-day, it will be a matter of where to get the labour to maintain our maximum peace effort. Let us get away from this defeatist psychology of wondering where we can find jobs and how to maintain our maximum effort. Let us use a little common sense in dealing with this question.

When the end of the war comes, Canada will be ready for the greatest era of prosperity in its history, provided, of course, the country is not invaded. At the end of the war our productive capacity will be greater than ever before in the history of the country; we shall have more skilled labour; it will be merely a question of diverting production from war needs to peace needs. We shall be able to give the people the full enjoyment of that productive capacity. Yet we hear people worrying about what the people are going to do at the end of the war, just as though we are bound to curtail production and go back into depression. I would remind the house of what Mr. Evans, administrator of the triple A in the United States of America said in their recent convention. He said, in effect: "America will never go back to the depression of 1932 for the very reason that if it did there would be a revolution." People will not stand for a return to that condition, because the people know that depressions are not made by God, they are made by men, and everything made by man can be changed.

It is just as well, in trying to reassure ourselves that depression need not come back after the war, to make an analysis of what brought the last depression, why it continued and why we did not cure it. Let us go back to the period 1928-29. At that time we did not hear anything about unemployment. We had very few agricultural problems; generally speaking, agriculture was prosperous and production was being maintained near its maximum. Then what happened? In the spring of 1929, all of a sudden, without any warning at all, people's line of credit at the banks was curtailed. People who had been in the habit of going to the bank year after year and getting a line of credit suddenly found that credit cut off. From 1929 to 1932 $900,000,000 was withdrawn from circulation. Anyone who was in business at that time knows that that statement is correct. Men were discharged on account of industry having to curtail production; that reduced purchasing power and resulted in reduced sales, and we went into the vicious spiral of deflation.

It was a common thing during the period from 1935 to 1939 to hear members of this house and the then Minister of Finance criticize industry for not having sufficient confidence to expand production. But could you blame industry? Industry at that time was having a very hard job to sell the goods it was producing; industry knew only too well during that period that if it increased production it would just have a surplus on its hands. To-day even most economists admit that the reason that condition existed was that owing to certain practices inherent in the capitalistic system, industry does not and cannot create an effective demand for its own production, except in times of abnormal capital goods production; and during that period our production of capital goods dropped to a very low level. Therefore we are faced with one of two alternatives; either we have to follow the practice of all capitalist countries and try to maintain a large favourable balance of payments, or, on the other hand, we have to issue additional purchasing power outside the industrial system to make up the deficiency of purchasing power. The policy of this government has always been to try to maintain a favourable balance of payments, and from 1925 to 1929 we had an average of $200,000,000 a year. I remember in the banking and commerce committee asking Mr. Towers, the governor of the Bank of Canada this question: Is there any reason why we could not put into operation $200,000,000 of national projects financed by the Bank of Canada so that the money paid out on these projects will create a demand for the goods for which we have a credit abroad of $200,000,000? Then importers knowing that these goods can be sold if brought in would bring them in. Mr. Towers answered:

That is a matter of government policy.

He did not try to deny it. If the government had decided to maintain an even balance of payments to build up the wealth of the country and issue enough purchasing power to assure that the goods, once produced, could be purchased, it could very well have put the people to work on national projects by expending at least $200,000,000 so that there would have been a demand for the goods we already had a credit for abroad.

But, as we know, that policy was not followed. It may be interesting to note the extent to which other countries have gone in order to bring about prosperity by the practice of expanding foreign trade and maintaining a large favourable balance of payments. The country I have in mind, the outstanding country in that regard, is England. I should like to read a statement which was made by Reginald McKenna to the American Bankers' association on October 5, 1922:

For over two centuries British capital, that is, credit, had been lent to other countries; year by year England produced more than she either consumed herself or could exchange for the products of other nations, and she could not obtain a market for the surplus unless she gave the purchaser a long credit. Foreign loans and foreign issues were taken up in England and the proceeds were spent in paying for the surplus production. British factories and workshops were kept in good employment, but it was a condition of their prosperity that a part of their output should be disposed of in this way.

I should like to read also a statement made by Sir Arthur Samuel, former secretary to the treasury in the Conservative government, writing in the Times supplement under date of November 1, 1930:

During the last sixty years fleets of ships have carried abroad millions of tons of merchandise, shown in the board of trade returns as exports, but the nation has lost an important portion of their total value. That can be proved by the fact that our surviving overseas investments prior to the war amounted to only £4,000 million. Of that amount we parted with £1,000 million owing to the war. That total ought, however, in my opinion, to be very much larger—not less than £6,000 million at the very least. Therefore, at a cautious estimate, I say we have lost not less than £2,000 million in overseas investments during the last sixty years. It is not unlikely that our loss has been much heavier, perhaps even £4,000 million.

The interesting point there is that even though England lost possibly four thousand million pounds in foreign investments, that condition brought prosperity because it provided for greater employment in that country. Nearly everyone had work to do; the industries were all running at full capacity. But I would point out how much greater the prosperity of the people of England could have been if that large amount of wealth which was shipped abroad and lost had been made available to the people of England by instituting, we will say, large national projects in the form of slum clearance, parks and so on. Mr. P. C. Loftus, M.P., commenting on that statement in the British House of Commons, pointed out that this was just as much a loss as though the goods had been taken to the middle of the Atlantic and sunk.

Another reason why we can condemn that type of policy carried on in this country is that there can be no justification for maintaining a favourable balance of payments to the extent of $200,000,000, while at the same time we had in the country a million people on relief. In other words, we were depriving those people of $200,000,000 worth of goods. As a result of that policy; as a result of our insane desire to maintain a favourable balance of payments, what did we do in this country? In 1938 and 1939 we exported scrap iron to Japan; we shipped oil to nations that we knew would be our enemies sooner or later. But apparently, in order to maintain that favourable balance of trade, we were prepared to ship goods to any nation, no matter whether or not those goods were likely to be used against us in the future. To-day we are having the scrap iron we shipped to Japan sent back to us, with interest in the form of shells and bombs used against our fighting forces.

I want now to point out the other alternative, which, as I said, would have been to issue purchasing power outside the industrial system in order to make up the deficiency of purchasing power, so as to create an effective demand against the production of the country, as has been done or attempted by Mr. Roosevelt. We all know that Roosevelt's policy in the past has been to institute large national projects in order to try to increase the purchasing power of the people so that it will take care of the production of the country. Time and again in broadcast speeches he has made the statement that his policy is to maintain an effective demand against the production of the country. Whether or not he has accomplished that, at least we can congratulate him upon his sincerity of purpose and upon the distance he has travelled in that direction.

Supposing we had adopted that policy in this country and had issued purchasing power outside the industrial system in order to increase the effective demand of the people. It will be remembered that from 1935 to 1939 we had an average of half a million people unemployed, with industry running in low gear. We could very well have put two hundred thousand of those men, we will say, at work building up the defences of the country, financed by the Bank of Canada. That would have increased the effective demand against production. As the demand for goods increased we could have put another hundred thousand men at work in the increased production of consumer goods; and as our production of consumer goods exceeded the demand, we could have put more men at work building up our highways, eliminating our slums, and carrying out various other projects. We could have had a commission or board for the purpose of at all times investigating the relationship between the production of capital goods and the production of consumer goods. Any time the demand for goods fell down we could have increased our production of capital goods, and any time the demand for goods exceeded the supply we could have expanded our production of consumer goods. In addition to that, the board, in order to maintain an equilibrium, could have put into operation a discount whenever the demand for goods fell below the supply. That policy has been adopted to a certain extent in the United States, under what is known as the stamp plan. In that country they had large surpluses of certain products. On the other hand they had large numbers of people on relief, with very low standards of living. So they instituted what was known as the stamp plan. When a person was paid a dollar while on relief he was also given a blue stamp worth fifty cents, and with that stamp he could buy fifty cents worth of goods that were listed as surplus. The amount of money issued in stamps was sufficient to take care of that surplus. The same idea could be expanded to take care of all surplus production as it occurred.

A programme of that kind would have made it possible for us in this country to maintain our production from 1935 to 1939 at its maximum level and make that production available to the Canadian people. Surely, Mr. Speaker, when we start worrying about what is going to happen after the war, all that is necessary is for the government to say that as soon as they have no further need of a maximum war effort they will divert their energies to a maximum peace effort. Then, if all financial restrictions are removed as they are supposed to be to-day, we can go ahead with a programme under which a proper balance will be maintained as between the production of capital and consumer goods, so that the effective demand against goods will always be equal to the supply. If industry is assured of that situation, I am satisfied that we shall not need to worry about whether or not people will be able to get jobs. I should say that under a policy of that kind the only thing we would be short of in this country would be labour. There would be no question of looking for jobs in order to maintain a policy of that sort; we would be short of men in order to expand it to a greater degree, thereby giving the people a maximum standard of living.

Our policy in regard to foreign trade would be to exchange our goods for the goods of other nations. Until we get away from that idea of maintaining a favourable balance of trade, we shall always have trouble. To-day we must accept our share of the responsibility for this war, because any time nations refuse to accept goods in payment for goods they are stirring up international friction which leads to war. That was one of the principal causes of this war. It is all very well to say that Hitler started it; but if it had not been Hitler, it would have been someone else; he just happened to be there. Remember what President Wilson said of the last war, that it had been caused by keen industrial rivalry. As long as you have nations in cut-throat competition for markets, refusing to accept goods in return for goods, you are causing international friction. At the end of this war not only have we to try to maintain a high standard of living in Canada, but we have to try to maintain a policy which will bring international peace and goodwill. And you will never do that as long as you insist upon maintaining a favourable balance of payments at the expense of other nations.

It will be remembered that Mr. Leigh, secretary of the London Chamber of Commerce, in England, has been emphatic upon that point. He has said that nations must be prepared to accept goods in payment for exports. He has pointed out that you have to get away from the gold standard. He went further and said that a nation which exported a million dollars worth of goods to another nation should never get payment until it accepted a million dollars worth of goods in return. And if it refuses to accept the goods in return, then that debt should be cancelled over a period of years. If we had a policy of that kind, there would be far less international friction in the world to-day and in the future than there has been in the past.

To come back to the bill; the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) has referred to the fact that the legion has endorsed the proposal. I do not believe the legion endorsed this bill, although it is true that in the past the legion did state that it was in favour of some measure whereby industry would be compelled to take back their former employees who have enlisted in the armed forces. On the other hand I should like to tell the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that last year this question was raised in the special committee of the house on pensions, and it was the general opinion of the members who sat on that committee that, whilst desirable, the suggestion was impracticable, and a recommendation was not made. The matter was discussed at great length, but we did not make any recommendation. We could not see our way clear, although we liked the idea, with respect to any recommendation to compel industry to take back even former employees at the end of the war. Many objections were raised. Whilst such a course was very desirable, as the leader of the opposition has said, I believe it is impracticable, and it is doubtful whether a case could be made in law to support it.

It is my opinion that the whole question will have to be dealt with in a much broader way. Instead of trying to see how we are going to put the men back to work, let us devote all our energy toward finding out how we are going to maintain the production and services of this country at their maximum level, and then find the ways and means by which that production and those services can be made available to the people. If we do that, we shall not need to worry about unemployment; unemployment will disappear. That, I claim, is the only sound solution of the problem.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, this bill is one of some importance, and I am surprised that the minister in charge has sat practically silent throughout the whole debate on the second reading. I assume that he will now give the committee his ideas with respect to the bill, what purposes it will achieve, how far he thinks it goes, and what more is to be done to take care of the problems outlined.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Chairman, I had intended to speak, but when the motion for second reading was put I was engaged in conversation with the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), and I had not an opportunity to rise in my place.

I deeply appreciate the sentiment expressed on both sides of the house with respect to the bill. I believe it can be fairly stated that all parties in the house agree as to its principle. It was never intended to be a rehabilitation measure, in the sense that we understand the broad question of rehabilitation. As indicated, the bill has been introduced largely because of the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition with respect to the order in council drafted about a year ago.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the condition that the order would die.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. As I explained, this bill follows the legislation in Great Britain, the United States, New Zealand and Australia. I believe it could be fairly stated that they have found legislation at this time necessary, and that it was not altogether an empty gesture on their part. They must have felt, as we have felt, that legislation of this kind would be necessary to give leadership to industry, and to comment generally on the policy to be adopted at the conclusion of the war in connection with the return of the men in the fighting forces.

If the hon. member for Cape Breton South will examine the bill carefully, he will see the imprint of organized labour in it. It may be said, too, that in the bill will be found evidence of the work of the special committee on demobilization which sat under the chairmanship of the Minister of Pensions and National Health. As a matter of fact, the bill was approved by that committee. It was approved, too, by the national labour supply council, an organization representative of industry and labour, and all shades of opinion in those groups. It was approved by representatives of dominant employers' organizations in the dominion. It was also approved by the labour coordination committee, which crystalizes the viewpoint of the various departments on legislation of this kind.

The bill is sponsored by the labour department rather than by the Department of Pensions and National Health because the idea was born within the labour coordination committee, and then was passed on to the national labour supply council for official approval of representatives of industry and labour.

As is customary in connection with legislation of this kind, both sides of the house took a broad view of the question. I believe that is the wise and sound thing to do in respect of any legislation or policy affecting the returned men in the armed forces. I say that because, after all is said and done, no political party in Canada has a first mortgage on the will to render assistance to the men who make it possible for this parliament to sit to-night.

As I said earlier, it is not my intention to speak at length. As the bill is discussed section by section its various aspects will be discussed. Criticism will be offered and met. When we are discussing returned soldiers' problems I think we must keep in mind the desperate position in which free people of the world find themselves to-day. One hon. member this afternoon mentioned that he had lived dangerously. I think most hon. members who served in the last war, who had the will to live and the will to sacrifice and to drive forward had to live dangerously. I believe the same spirit will drive forward the men at present in our armed forces. My only hope and wish is that the same will to sacrifice, in greater and greater degree, may be inculcated in the minds of our civil population, so that we may pass through this most terrible period in the history of our civilization.

I do not think I should say anything more at this late hour. I believe I should permit the committee to proceed with the business of discussing the bill section by section.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am surprised that the minister has not gone more deeply into the matter. Perhaps questions by hon. members will elicit further discussion. I should like to ask the minister if in his opinion this bill does not reaffirm the principle that private enterprise not only owes a duty to provide employment but is the best agency to provide employment. We heard a good deal in this discussion, and we have heard it elsewhere, that the government should embark on vast enterprises of public expenditures when this war is over.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) said that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, he was among those who did, and I am not disparaging the idea at all. I suggest to the minister that he should give to the committee and the country his views as to what agency is best capable of providing employment, having regard to the demand for employment that there will be from these men who come back.

Mr. SLAGHT: Let us get on and win the war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think that interjection was called for any more than was the speech this evening of the hon. member for Parry Sound, if he will allow me to say so. I am trying to get from the minister the merits, to put it baldly, of government expenditures as opposed to private enterprise.

Mr. SLAGHT: What has that to do with this bill?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that interjection is of a kind with the last one.

Mr. SLAGHT: It is a question if I am permitted to ask it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has quite a lot to do with this bill, and I shall try to make it clear. This bill primarily is based on two theories. First, there is the duty of private enterprise and the theory that that is the best way by which these men can be rehabilitated. What I want to get from the minister is his views as to how we can best rehabilitate these men, through what agencies that can be done, whether part government and part private or whether all private. I want to know if he thinks the encouragement of private enterprise would provide the avenue through which employment might be obtained for these men.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With all due respect to my hon. friend, I hardly think that his question deals with this bill. His question has to do with economic policy, and I suggest to my hon. friend, with the utmost deference, that any government in power must work with the economic system in existence until that system is changed. The purpose of this bill is to give the government the opportunity to avail itself of the resources of free enterprise until that might be changed by the free opinion of the people. Surely, to ask the minister whether a system of free enterprise or a system of socialism would be the best to get results is not germane either to the principle or to any particular section of this bill. I might say quite frankly that as far as I am concerned I think the duty of any government is to use to the utmost all the resources of free enterprise by cooperation with free enterprise.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is partly an answer to my question. I do not think the minister objects to answering the question. I invite him to give us his opinion.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is quite a large question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know it is, and I think the minister has some ideas.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have a lot of ideas, but most of them are predicated upon whether or not we win the war, and I say that with all sincerity.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not taking it otherwise.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think it is a fair question to ask on a bill of this description.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out that it is out of order. We are in committee, and under standing order 58 we must study the bill clause by clause. The question put by the leader of the opposition is beyond the scope of the bill and is clearly out of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have not said anything on this bill. I was going to comment on the question asked by the leader of the opposition, but since, Mr. Chairman, you have ruled on it as you have, I do not propose to deal with that except to say in one brief sentence that if we are going to discuss the implication of the bill within our economic structure, I want to make a speech. But this is not the place to do that. In my opinion the people are expecting us to get along with the business of this house with more rapidity than we have shown in the past month or five weeks.

Mr. MARTIN: You should have supported me when I objected to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas).

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member for Weyburn was not called to order by the Chair or anyone else; the Speaker ruled that he was in order. I think we might get the minister to explain what he proposes to do when this bill is passed. Who is to be responsible for its enforcement?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is covered by the last section.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am quite aware that it is, but there is no indication in the bill as to who will be charged with that responsibility. I think the bill was properly described this afternoon by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) and by the hon. member for Weyburn as a gesture. There was nothing improper in characterizing it in that way because the minister himself indicated that this was but a beginning, as it were, and in that respect it might be termed a gesture. The bill is to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who enlist for service in his majesty's forces or who perform essential war employment.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister has announced that he is going to wipe out that last part.

Mr. COLDWELL: The last part is to be struck out, and I regret it because I think the men who are doing essential war work are performing almost as vital a service as the men serving in the armed forces.

Mr. TURGEON: Not the same nature.

Mr. COLDWELL: Or not the same risk; I grant that immediately. I think we have forgotten to some extent that this war can be won only by those nations which can gear up their productive machinery to an extent that will provide the necessary goods. Consequently, the men who are engaged in these productive enterprises are performing a vital part in our war effort and ought to be provided for when war ends. Again I say that in all fairness it can be said that while the men engaged in industry are performing a vital work, they are not taking the risks of the men engaged in active service. I think the original intention of this bill should be carried out. The reinstatement in employment of men now in the armed forces will be only a part of the general problem of reemployment that we shall have to face when this war ends.

I am in accord with those who have urged to-day that a committee of this house should be established to go into the whole matter of post-war reconstruction and human rehabilitation. I think, too, that it would give many private members of this house an outlet for the energy which they have, energy which they feel has been to some degree frustrated. But as far as the beginnings go, the bill is a step in the right direction.

It is called the Civil Employment Reinstatement Act, and the very title of it would seem to indicate that the two groups should have been considered in the one bill, and that a mistake has been made in cutting off from this particular measure those who perform essential war employment.

I am not going to speak at any length to-night, because, as has already been said, the hour is late, and we shall have an opportunity of saying more on the various clauses as they are discussed. But I did want to bring to the attention of the committee that one point which I have very much in mind, that this problem of reemployment will involve not only the men who are engaged in the armed forces, but all those who are engaged in essential war effort of every description; and, if I may say so, I do not believe that reliance on private enterprise will either solve this problem or win the war. Before we can win the war against the totalitarian powers, we shall have to have a total war effort, and that, in my opinion, will compel us to take out of the hands of private enterprise war industries and organize them as essential national enterprises.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We have done much of that already.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In the preamble, in lines 10 and 11, it states:

. . . with conditions not less favourable to the employee than he would have attained had he not enlisted. . . .

It seems to me that this is slightly ambiguous. On page two—

The CHAIRMAN: We are not on the preamble. We are on section 1, "short title".

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): We are just on the short title? Well, in that regard I should like to ask, will the men who enlisted, who used to work in the House of Commons, be covered under this bill? Will they be taken back in their former positions?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to know that, because a number have gone from the employment of this house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They do not come under this bill.

Mr. GREEN (Vancouver South): Under this clause I want to ask a question which will take some minutes. I wonder whether consideration of the clause can be set over until to-morrow.

Mr. HANSELL: Just before we close, I am a little hazy as to a point of order here.

The CHAIRMAN: There is no point of order before the Chair.

Mr. HANSELL: I am raising the point, because I should like to know. We are on section 1. I wish to know when we take the preamble.

The CHAIRMAN: After all the clauses of the bill, we come to the preamble.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 6, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST AND SECOND REPORTS OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Chambly-Rouville) presented the first and second reports of the joint committee of both houses on the printing of parliament, and moved that the reports be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

RECOMMENDATIONS OF JOINT DEFENCE BOARD—ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Since I answered a question of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) yesterday regarding the status of the discussions with reference to the construction of a highway to Alaska, a recommendation of the Canadian section of the permanent joint board on defence on this subject, which had been referred to the appropriate military authorities for examination, has been considered and approved by the war committee of the cabinet. I am now therefore in a position to make a statement on the subject to the house.

The advisability from a military standpoint of constructing a highway to Alaska has been under review by the defence services of Canada and the United States. After final consideration by the permanent joint board on defence on February 25 and 26, a unanimous recommendation favouring the construction of such a road was addressed to the two governments. This recommendation has now been examined and approved by both Canada and the United States.

The recommendation of the defence board, which has been endorsed by the military authorities in each country and approved by the respective governments, is based on purely military considerations. The dimensions of the road, the type of construction and the route chosen have all been selected on this basis and this basis only.

The road as approved will start at Fort St. John in northern British Columbia and follow the general line of the airports which Canada has constructed at Fort Nelson, Watson Lake and Whitehorse; and thence via Boundary and Big Delta to Fairbanks. The highway will thus connect with the existing road systems of Canada and Alaska.

The United States government, appreciating the burden of war expenditure already incurred by Canada since her entry into the war, and in particular on the construction of the air route to Alaska, has offered to undertake the building and war-time maintenance of the highway. At the conclusion of the war that part of the highway which is in Canada will, of course, become in all respects an integral part of the Canadian highway system. This offer has been accepted, and its terms will be set forth in an exchange of notes which will be signed and made public in the very near future. Canada will, of course, provide all necessary facilities, including the right of way for the road. Meanwhile, United States engineers who have been selected to make the survey and to lay out a pioneer road have been authorized to commence work without further delay.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Following the question asked of the Prime Minister yesterday afternoon by the hon. leader of the opposition, as I feel quite keenly on the subject of the Alaska highway I took it upon myself to write a letter to the Prime Minister on the subject. Probably he has not seen it yet. In the letter I referred to what he quoted to-day, that the road will begin at Fort St. John and go north through Canada, out of the valley of the Mackenzie river into the Yukon, and thence into Alaska. It will be about 1,200 miles in length. It goes for the most part over tundra and muskeg, the most difficult and expensive terrain on which to build a serviceable road. If the United States want to take more men and supplies to Alaska now—and I think they should, although to my knowledge, because I have seen them go, vast numbers of men and great quantities of war materials have already gone there by sea and air—the way to do it is to take them by rail to Prince Rupert, now, not next year or the year after, and from Prince Rupert send them by sea—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): If hon. members will allow me for a moment; up to the present the matter of time has not been much of a consideration in this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As a matter of privilege let the hon. member finish.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is the wish of the house that the hon. member be allowed to make this explanation on the orders of the day, of course the Chair will accede to it. But I wish to point out that exception has already been taken in the house to questions and statements following the answer to a question put on the orders of the day and leading almost to the proportions of a debate. I do not think that is a proper procedure. If the Prime Minister wishes that the hon. member continue his statement—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In this case I think my hon. friend wishes to bring out a matter that he feels is of urgent and immediate importance, and if the house will permit him to make his statement I think it would be helpful.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member is perhaps asking a question on the orders of the day covering the matter referred to, and the statement of the Prime Minister dealing with the same subject rather foreclosed him. Perhaps the house will be good enough to hear him for three minutes longer.

Mr. HANSELL: I rise to a point of order. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman making a statement, perhaps a very necessary one, but if one hon. member is allowed to make a statement others may wish to discuss the same matter. There is more than one hon. member who is interested in this particular matter, and if it is a question of discussing routes and so forth there is a good deal that may be said. I suggest that the Prime Minister provide some opportunity for discussion of this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is following on the lines of what I have already mentioned. The Chair is in the hands of the house; in this case the leader of the government has consented to the hon. gentleman's completing his statement, and I take it he has now practically completed it. In this case therefore there might be an exception, but I wish to point out that the Chair should not be placed in the position of having to discriminate between hon. members in matters of this kind.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I was saying that if men and equipment are taken by rail to Prince Rupert they can be shipped from Prince Rupert to Skagway by what is virtually an inland passage, a series of islands all the way on a run that could be easily protected. From Skagway they are taken across the pass by rail to Whitehorse, where a road is now being used to transport goods and passengers from Whitehorse to Dawson, and from Dawson to Fairbanks, which is the centre of activity for Alaska and from which railways and good roads radiate. It is only a short jump from there, and if they want quick action that is the way to go.

I am not opposed to the ultimate construction of the road from Fort St. John north. It is a splendid thing to have, but it cannot be done in a hurry.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): May I ask a question of the Prime Minister arising out of his statement? He said nothing whatever about any terms of the agreement covering the actual construction of the road, whether it is to be built by Canadians or by citizens of the United States. Has any agreement been reached on this point?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the statement which I made to the house a moment ago I said that the offer of the United States government has been accepted, and its terms will be set forth in an exchange of notes which will be signed and made public in the very near future.

Mr. GREEN: Can the Prime Minister not give that information in the meantime?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would have to be given in both countries at the same time. I am making this announcement to-day because it is being made simultaneously in Washington.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): The Prime Minister has stated that the Alaska highway will start at Fort St. John. By what route will the road south of Fort St. John reach that point? There is only one bridge over the Peace river, and that is at the town of Peace River. Is the road to go through Peace River?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I regret that I cannot answer my hon. friend's question at the moment. Full information will be given in due course; that is all I can say.

WHEAT

INITIAL PRICE—REPORT AS TO CLOSING OF WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, based on a report emanating from Winnipeg this morning, to the effect that the Canadian wheat board gave notice this morning to the Winnipeg grain exchange that the initial price paid by the board would be advanced and it suggested the closing of the exchange and freezing prices at yesterday's close. Yesterday No. 1 northern closed at 77⅞, and May wheat at 79¼. The idea of freezing the price was to arrange for settlement of trades, this to be done pending a further definite announcement by the government. Is this report correct? Has any representation been made by hon. members of this house to have the Winnipeg grain exchange closed permanently or for the duration of the war, and if so does the government propose doing so?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member is essentially right in his reference to the directions that have been given by the wheat board to the Winnipeg grain exchange. I purpose introducing to-day a bill to advance the price of wheat, and I hope to be able to speak on the bill at the very earliest opportunity the house will give me. As to the second question, regarding the closing of the Winnipeg grain exchange, no such representations have been made that I know of.

MAGNESIUM

DEVELOPMENT OF EAST LAKE AINSLIE, N.S., DOLOMITE DEPOSITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): May I ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) whether, in view of the importance of magnesium in our war industry, the government has under consideration the advisability of developing the valuable and extensive dolomite deposits at East Lake Ainslie, Inverness-Richmond?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): We have not considered it. We have ample supplies of dolomite located adjacent to hydro power. I might say that the supplies of dolomite in this country greatly exceed the possibilities of manufacturing it into magnesium.

GASOLINE

DEVELOPMENT OF OIL SHALE IN COUNTY OF ALBERT, N.B.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply if his department or the oil controller have given any consideration to the further development of the oil shales in the county of Albert, New Brunswick, having regard to the gasoline situation?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I believe I have a report from the oil controller regarding that situation, but it does not seem to favour any such development at the present time.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

REPORTED INFLUX INTO PROVINCE OF ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Has any report reached the Minister of Justice concerning an influx of Japanese into the province of Alberta, travelling in their own cars and trucks? If so, will the minister inform the house to what extent such report is based upon fact? If the report is correct, what measures has the minister taken to deal with the situation?

Hon. L. S. St. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): No such report has reached the department. I inquired of the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as to whether he had any information at all regarding it and he told me that he had not, but would communicate with his chief officer in that province to see if there is any local information in respect of this matter.

PRIVILEGE—MR. D. G. ROSS

TRANSFERS FROM RESERVE TO ACTIVE ARMY AT BRANTFORD TRAINING CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yesterday the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) referred to an article appearing in the Toronto Globe and Mail which he said stated that a full platoon stepped up, one hundred per cent, to go active. He neglected to read further from the article, which says—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This is a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I ask if it is a question of privilege by which the hon. member is directly affected?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The point is that of the fifty-nine men in the platoon, fifteen were from Toronto, most of them from my own riding.

PLEBISCITE ACT

AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE SENATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): As a private Liberal member of this hon. house, referring to page 1066 of Hansard for yesterday and page 131 of the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday, on a question of order may I ask the Secretary of State why, while reading the senate amendments to the plebiscite bill, he omitted to mention the thirteenth amendment, which related to a change in the wording of the French question?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I think those who were in the chamber yesterday will realize that I did not undertake to give an exhaustive reading of all the amendments. There were a limited number of changes in the wording, changes which I was advised were calculated to make clearer the intention of the act. If I overlooked any one it was purely by reason of the fact that I thought any such amendment as the one mentioned—and I must say it was not called to my attention at the time—was one of those amendments made for the purpose of clarification only.

Mr. POULIOT: It was only one word.

INTERNMENTS

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION AND RELEASE OF INTERNED ANTI-FASCISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Having in mind the brief presented to the Minister of Justice by a delegation of twenty-five persons from the national conference on democratic rights, has the government taken any action to investigate the cases of interned anti-fascists, on their individual merit, to the end that those held merely on the charge of having been members of the communist party may be released?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This is a question of the kind which is not capable of an immediate answer without previous notice. I suggest that it be placed on the order paper.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASED RATE PER BUSHEL ON WHEAT DELIVERED BY PRODUCERS

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, by making provision for the payment of an increased rate per bushel on wheat delivered by producers.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I understood from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) yesterday that a statement would be made on Monday covering all the details. The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce said it would be some time soon. Monday is to be the day, is it?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It will be discussed on Monday if it can be brought on that day.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. McLarty.]

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

REINSTATEMENT IN CIVIL EMPLOYMENT OF PERSONS WHO ENLIST IN HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES

The house resumed from Thursday, March 5, consideration in committee of Bill No. 5, to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who enlist for service in his majesty's forces or who perform essential war employment—Mr. Mitchell—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 1—short title.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to help the men of the fighting forces to get jobs upon their return to civilian life. I believe there is no doubt that all hon. members are in favour of everything possible being done along that line, because we recognize that these men of the fighting forces will have done a great service for the nation, that they will have made sacrifices, and that in trying to become reestablished in civilian life they will be handicapped to a certain extent.

Therefore this bill says to employers, "You must"—it does not say "Will you please?"—it says "You must back up this fighting man who was your employee when he enlisted." I do not think it is asking too much of the government to suggest that it say to all its civil servants, including employees in this House of Commons, that it will go equally far. At the present time there may be an order in council which provides such protection for civil servants, but if there is I am not aware of it; I do suggest, that the government, in order to make its own position clear, should pass an order in council giving these civil servants just as much protection as we are forcing private employers to give to their employees.

But the government is failing to back up the men of the fighting forces in another way. It is failing to back up other fighting men who are even more numerous than those who will be benefited by this measure. I do hope I shall only have to draw this to the attention of the ministry in order to have the necessary steps taken to remedy the situation. I refer to the men of the fighting forces who try to get work through our new national employment agencies. After all, the great majority of the returned men who will get work will get it through those agencies. Those men will have given the same service to the nation and will have made the same sacrifices as the men protected by this bill. Nevertheless under our present laws, when they go to the national employment agencies they must take their chances with civilians seeking employment through the same agencies.

In other words, the Department of Labour —and I am afraid it is that department rather than the Department of Pensions and National Health which is the sinner—has not adopted a policy whereby men of the fighting forces shall receive the preference in these new national employment agencies. It is true that in a few of the larger agencies—I believe only about fourteen or fifteen—provision has been made whereby the Department of Pensions and National Health may install an official known as a veterans' welfare officer. This official sits in the national employment agency, but he cannot do any actual placement work. In other words, if a returned soldier goes to the agency looking for a job, the veterans' welfare officer cannot accept his as a special case, and go out and find the work. For some reason or another the Department of Labour will not allow the official of the Department of Pensions and National Health to do that.

The same point was under discussion before the special committee on the Pension Act which met last year. I would refer hon. members to page 672 of the proceedings of that committee, at which point I asked Mr. Woods certain questions. Mr. Woods was in charge of the veterans' welfare division of the Department of Pensions and National Health. These are the questions and answers:

Q. If an employer sends in for five men under the new plan that request will go to the general employment officers?

A. Yes.

Q. And there will be no preference for the ex-service man; he just takes his chance with everybody else who is registered there?

A. Unless the employer registers a preference.

Q. In most cases probably the employer will not. In other words, you are trying to put the onus on the employer to ask for the soldier. Suppose he does not. Then the returned man will just be treated as another individual, and your welfare officer sitting in that same office will not have the power to go out and seek jobs for the returned men.

A. No, not under the new set-up of the dominion employment service.

That means, to sum up, that no preference is given in our dominion employment offices to the men of the fighting forces; and that, in my opinion, is wrong, and should be remedied without further delay.

This committee brought in recommendations, and the Minister of Labour will find at page 503 of the Votes and Proceedings for last session a recommendation as follows:

We recommend that the Department of Labour instruct and require their placement or employment officers to cooperate with the veterans' welfare division officers and to give preference in employment to ex-service men.

Furthermore, the Department of Pensions and National Health has set up honorary committees across Canada, and has asked those committees to try to find ways of placing these men of the fighting forces. The inference has been throughout that the work of the honorary committees was to persuade employers to give preference to returned men. I believe the Minister of Pensions and National Health will agree with me when I say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: We have such a committee in Vancouver, and there are similar committees in other parts of the country. They have run up against this very problem. I quote from a report made last December by a subcommittee of these citizens. I might add that Mr. Woods was present at the meeting. I might state, further, that I do not believe there is a more efficient or more progressive man in the civil service than Mr. Walter S. Woods. We find this statement in the report of the committee of citizens:

It has been generally recognized by this committee that where possible veterans should receive preference in all employment openings. We think that a definite policy should be laid down by the Department of Labour in this question and that staffs should be instructed accordingly.

That is not the condition at the present time.

Then this committee go on to explain the reasons for their recommendation. I quote again from the report, for the information of the Minister of Labour:

We are always aware of the psychological effect on the veteran when registering for employment. He feels, and always will feel, that he is entitled to just a little more consideration than is given to those who did not serve in the active forces. So, if we can give him some direct service, we will go a long way toward dispelling the ever present fear that he is going to be the "forgotten man". Therefore we feel that some authority should be instituted right in the unemployment office to see that the veteran gets his fair share and percentage of employment.

That means, in effect, that the government is not backing up these men of the fighting forces who go to the national employment agencies seeking work.

The Minister of Labour is a new man on the job and I believe he is a very able administrator. I urge upon him most sincerely that he remedy this situation at once; that he direct his employment offices right across Canada to give preference to the men of the fighting forces. Further, where there is a representative of the Department of Pensions and National Health in an employment office, the Minister of Labour should direct that such man from the other department shall have the utmost freedom in going out to find jobs and in acting as a placement officer.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I must say that I am in substantial agreement with almost everything my hon. friend has said. I realize that he brought up this question last year before the committee of this house. At that time the issue was as to the actual placement of ex-service men. I must say that even with the limitations existing, the work performed by the veterans' welfare officers has been magnificent. They placed a thousand men in January alone. According to our records, of nearly 45,000 men discharged from the forces, there are 1,062 out of employment at the present time. That is a marvellous record for the Dominion of Canada. Of course, there are exceptional conditions prevailing in the country at the present time.

I agree with the suggestion that the actual placement of these men should be in the hands of those who are charged with that special responsibility. My colleague (Mr. Mitchell), who is himself a returned man, I am sure will agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). I hope the condition to which reference has been made will be corrected as soon as possible. There should be absolute cooperation between the departments, and the placement of ex-service men should be in the hands of ex-service men themselves.

Mr. GREEN: Can we take it that this will be the policy of the Department of Labour from now on?

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend can rest assured that there will be absolute cooperation between the two departments. Anything that is practicable will be done for the returned men of this country.

Mr. GREEN: The Minister understands my question?

Mr. MITCHELL: I understand it clearly.

Mr. GREEN: I am asking that the representative of the Department of Pensions and National Health shall be free to go out and seek jobs. After all, the effectiveness of this plan will be decided only when there are many more men being discharged than have been discharged to date.

Mr. MITCHELL: I understand the question.

Mr. GREEN: My other suggestion was that in the national employment agencies preference should be given to returned men.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I will try to advocate that as strongly as I possibly can. I think the principle of this bill should be applied as widely as possible.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. MARTIN: How many veterans' placement offices are there in Ontario?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I could not say offhand, but I think there are about six. There is one in each of the main centres. I understand there is one in Windsor.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think there are about six or eight in Ontario.

Mr. MARTIN: It strikes me that that is an inadequate number of placement offices for a population of 3,000,000 people. There is a very good officer in Windsor, but it is not very convenient for people who live many miles outside the city to come to see him. As a matter of fact, I have had some experience in this connection. There is not enough publicity given to the existence of this officer or to the existence of the office. I think the minister should consider increasing the staff.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to give attention to it.

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of Pensions and National Health has gone part way, but he has not answered my question. He says he will advocate that men from the fighting forces be given preference in the employment agencies, but he may not be a successful advocate.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That happens frequently.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to know from the Minister of Labour whether or not his department will change its policy. These business men who are helping you to place soldiers are worried about this. They are the ones who have brought the question to a head. One of them sums it up by saying:

> At present when a man is through with the department of pensions and health and goes to register with the Department of Labour, there is no follow-up programme. The staff of the employment service includes many veterans who quite naturally will give a discharged man every consideration. But the Department of Labour has not established it as a policy that veterans shall receive preference, although the dominion government have asked industry to do so.

That is exactly the point. Will the Department of Labour announce a policy and give directions to its employment agencies that preference shall be given to the returned man who comes seeking a job? This is a point which is vital to many men and the ministry should make up their minds about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What was the date of the statement which my hon. friend just read?

Mr. GREEN: This letter was written in January.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is not correct.

Mr. GREEN: It is correct in Vancouver, unless conditions have been changed since I left there.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am sorry, but I must disagree. The Department of Pensions and National Health are charged with the responsibility of following up every discharged man who is not employed. There are four or five different classes of benefits available to him, such as vocational training, education and otherwise. If he is not able to take advantage of any of these, the department is charged with the responsibility of finding him employment. If it cannot find him employment, it provides him with benefits for fifty-two weeks within a period of eighteen months of his discharge. So, whoever wrote that letter was not very familiar with the actual terms of the legislation.

Mr. GREEN: That was written by a man who is on a committee which is helping my hon. friend to place these men. The fact is that in the majority of the employment offices across Canada there is no representative of the Department of Pensions and National Health; they are staffed entirely by the Department of Labour. The Department of Labour have not said to their employment offices that preference in jobs shall be given to men coming back from the forces. I submit that instructions to that effect should go out to every employment office across Canada. The result would then be that when a returned man goes into an employment office, no matter where it may be and whether or not there is a veterans' welfare officer there, he will receive first consideration. If there are two or three men applying for one job, the preference will go to the soldier. My question is perfectly simple: Is the government prepared to direct its agencies to that effect, or is the government not prepared to do so?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I say to my hon. friend that as far as the department of pensions is concerned, we follow up every discharged case. Where employment is not provided, it is our duty as a department to follow up the case. This is done through our welfare officers. If we cannot find employment, there are four or five other ways of looking after the case.

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of Pensions and National Health should be supporting me instead of trying to knock me down.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am.

Mr. GREEN: The position is that the representatives of the Department of Labour in these agencies have not had instructions to give preference to the men sent to them by the Minister of Pensions and National Health. I am asking that the Department of Labour give their men those instructions. That would help the Minister of Pensions and National Health when he has 50,000 men, instead of 1,000, to handle. He will need all the help he can get from the Department of Labour. I should like to know from the Minister of Labour whether instructions to that effect will be given.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think I can go any further with my hon. friend than I did last time, and say that so far as the Department of Labour is concerned there will be the closest cooperation with the Department of Pensions and National Health. Everything practical that can be done for the returned soldier will be done. I take it from the statements of my hon. friend that up to the present moment there has been very little or no criticism of the treatment of the returned soldiers.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister look into this question of instructing his agencies to give a preference to the returned men?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Certainly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there one of these placement officers in New Brunswick, and if so, where is he located?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have not the full details because this is really not my bill; but if any hon. member feels that the welfare officers in any province are insufficient in number to look after the situation adequately, I shall be very glad to recommend an increase in their number in any centres which are appropriate for the purpose of looking after our returning soldiers.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether this discussion is strictly in order, but yesterday evening I called attention to the danger we are in of dividing the returned men, on the one side, from the ordinary workers on the other. I saw too much of that after the last war. If we are going to take the position now that there are not going to be sufficient jobs to go round after the war, and that consequently people are going to find themselves in difficult circumstances, we are at once admitting defeat in our attempts to reorganize society after the war is over. The position we shall have to take in this house is that in this Dominion of Canada one of two things must be done: employment must be provided or, failing that, adequate maintenance for every man who is willing to work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Hear, hear.

Mr. MacINNIS: I base my position in this house on that principle. It may be good policy from a political point of view to advocate a preference for the returned men.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is not fair.

Mr. GREEN: On a question of order, Mr. Chairman, the member is making an unfair implication.

Mr. MacINNIS: I make no implication, but if my hon. friend is so touchy, I will not put it in that way.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If I may interrupt, for the last twenty-five years every single party in this House of Commons has agreed on a preference for the ex-service men.

Mr. MacINNIS: I agree and have always agreed on a preference for the ex-service men in the civil service and in various other services. But you will find employers who will be quite willing to say that they want to give a preference to the returned men, but who, when the war is over and demobilization comes, will pit the returned men against the men who did not go to the front.

Mr. HOMUTH: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then disprove it. I know it, from what happened after the last war. I have seen returned men used to break up workingmen's organizations, and come pretty near to killing men at that, too.

The first thing you will be confronted with, and particularly in connection with your employment offices—that is altogether a different thing from the civil service, to which I shall refer later—is this: On the one hand you will have elderly men looking for work, men who could not get into the armed services. On the other hand you will have young men who were not of an age to go into the armed services. Why in the matter of employment should you discriminate against the young man who was not old enough to go into the armed services, and who, if he had been, would have enlisted or, if he had not, would have been conscripted into the forces? The employment offices are definitely a part of the unemployment insurance scheme. The man who, when working and a contributor under the scheme, becomes unemployed, if he does not get a job through the employment offices, will receive unemployment insurance benefits. Would it not be better, instead of making a division between the men who went to the war and the men who did not go to the war, to pay adequate maintenance to the returned man until such time as there is a proper employment for him? To do otherwise would be only for the benefit of those who want to make a division in labour's ranks. While the war is on, and before this problem is pressing upon us, we should first decide on the principle and then stick to that principle that every man, woman and child in Canada who is willing to work shall get work or adequate maintenance.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not agree with the argument of the hon. member who has just spoken. I do not see how this legislation causes any cleavage whatsoever. As the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) has said, the members of this house, regardless of party, have given lip-allegiance at least for the last twenty-five years to the principle of a preference to the men who have served their country, and I for one do not want to see that principle departed from regardless of the argument advanced by the hon. member.

A reading of this legislation shows that while it is a step in the right direction, it is rather haphazardly put together. Without regard to party all hon. members believe that the surest guarantee that men will be employed after the war is the arousing of a public sense of responsibility now. We know that in the transition period from war to peace great difficulties will be experienced in order to assure to those who serve their country the right which their country owes them of receiving back the job they gave up in order to go to war. We do not want these men to return to the humiliation and despair of unemployment and to an economic struggle once more against those whose physical standards will be very much better than theirs.

I think, too, that this bill is designed to prevent the exploitation of the returned men by any employer who would take advantage of their situation. Looking over the bill, however, I find it difficult to understand why many changes have not been made in order to provide against a large number of contingencies, not possible contingencies, but those that face us even now. I am not going to be critical and say that this is piecemeal legislation. But I do think the house should approach the whole problem of rehabilitation of service men after discharge at once.

Let me run over the bill, without going into unnecessary detail. I would point out first that it merely touches the fringe, the very outskirts of the problem. It does not include that vast army of men who, when war broke out, were unemployed and enlisted in the armed services. Again, it does not include all those who were employed; it covers only those who were employed on September 9, 1939, in other than a temporary position. In other words, the man who was employed on September 9, 1939, does not come under this legislation at all unless he was then permanently employed. Again, it does not include all those who were unemployed on September 9, 1939, but secured employment after that date. It covers only those who were employed after that date for at least six months in other than a temporary position. Therefore, as far as the bill before us goes, it pertains to only one group of the men—those who had jobs that were permanent jobs.

It does not cover men who had temporary jobs or those hired from week to week or month to month. It is well to know that of the men who have returned from overseas since the outbreak of this war, as unfit for service, numbering 3,932, only 1,109 had been pensioned, and it would be of interest if the minister could tell us how many of those men who have come back from overseas, who are not now in the army in Canada, and who are not now receiving pensions, are unemployed.

I do not very often pay compliments, but in fairness to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) I want to compliment him upon the sympathetic assistance he has invariably given in order to relieve situations such as the one to which I will direct the attention of the committee provided, of course, he possesses the necessary legislative authority. But this is one in respect of which he cannot give relief because of the law as it now is.

A man in my own constituency joined the veterans' guard in July, 1940, served for seventeen months, and was discharged as unfit for further service. At the time he joined he had land under the soldier settlement board. Like so many soldiers settled after the last war, he did not pay his indebtedness and was still indebted at the outbreak of the present war. When he joined the veterans' guard an order in council which had been passed some years ago was resorted to by the board, and his wife's dependent's allowance was reduced by $15 a month during the time he was in service, and was applied on account of his indebtedness to the government of Canada. When he came back from service unfit for service there was only one place to which he could go and that was back to the farm.

This bill is based upon an order in council passed in June, 1941, which is in almost identical words. Neither the bill nor the order in council covers the position of a man in this ex-soldier's position. He went back to his farm after discharge from the army. He has not had a crop for several years and applied for some assistance, and I would refer the committee to a letter he received from the district rehabilitation board in reply. He said to them that he could not get employment and was not entitled to unemployment insurance—such as the minister referred to as being payable in certain cases—and was in a bad financial plight. This is the answer he received:

> Applicant was established on soldier settlement board farm at the time of his enlistment, July 8, 1940. During his period of service his wife carried on with the operation of the farm with the aid of hired help, and when discharged Hemmings returned to the farm to continue farming operations on the same basis as at the time of enlistment. Under these circumstances an award cannot be made under section 3, and if the family is in need it is a case for the municipal authorities.

That was February 18, 1942.

Mr. MARTIN: What branch of the service was he in?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The veterans' guard.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Was he overseas?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: He was overseas in the last war, but not in this one. He was fit when he joined; he gave service, and now that he is discharged he does not get a pension. During the time he was in the army, $15 was being deducted from his wife's dependents allowance, and he is now advised to ask for relief assistance. I know that all hon. members will agree with me that relief is neither the award nor recompense that he deserves, and, I repeat, this bill affords him no consideration, and to take relief is all that remains for him.

Let me give another instance, that of a man who returned from overseas, invalided home in 1941 and discharged at Regina, on December 23, 1941. His pay ceased on his discharge, and his wife's allowance was thereupon discontinued. The stores in his district cannot be expected to continue to give him credit, and he is now compelled to apply for relief, after having been in the service of his country overseas for a very considerable period of time.

These are two examples of men who have enlisted and who have been honourably discharged, and there is nothing whatever to cover their plight under this bill. They are not entitled to pension. There are three cardinal principles that guide all governments who are trying to do their part for these men. Those principles are these: Measures designed to assist soldiers in resoration to health, or pensions to be paid for disability; training the ex-soldiers for trades, giving students an opportunity to complete their education; and finally employment assured to discharged soldiers or in default of employment, the payment of unemployment insurance.

If the conditions to-day are such as I have described, when we have so few men discharged, what would happen if the war should end now and 400,000 men were discharged from the army, the navy and the air force, and 700,000 men in war industries became unemployed because the industries in which they are employed were no longer necessary.

I find nothing to indicate that the experience of the last nine or ten months since the order in council came into being, the experience of Canada since even the outbreak of the war, has in any way resulted in the embodying of the results of such experience in this bill. As a matter of fact, it is based on the British act which was passed at the outbreak of the war before Britain had any experience at all. The provisions of the order in council of June, 1941, are unchanged. This bill does nothing but embody the terms of the order in council because of a promise to that effect that was given at the time by the then minister of labour. My suggestion is this: None of us wants these men to return to the relief rolls. But this bill will only prevent our ex-soldiers returning to the relief rolls in the event of their coming within the ambit of the bill which is very limited in its application in that it refers to ex-soldiers who were not in temporary employment when they enlisted.

I suggest that the whole bill be submitted to a committee of the house, as was the plebiscite bill. Let it be redrafted and made to cover the various contingencies and eventualities that can arise and have already arisen. Other legislation is being introduced in connection with ex-soldier problems such as land settlement and the like—I believe it is to be introduced next week. Have the whole matter of service men's rehabilitation placed before a committee of this house and hold up the bill for the time being. No harm will occur, as the order in council is still in effect. There is no rush in having it passed. Let this parliament produce a bill that will give hope and courage to the men of the armed forces, and will provide in unmistakable terms for every contingency and eventuality that may arise or has arisen in connection with the whole problem of rehabilitation of our soldiers upon their return to civilian life.

I entirely agree with my leader's statement that as it stands at present the bill is difficult of enforcement, because there are loopholes in practically every section. Without going into details now I would point to section 4 which defines the circumstances under which an employer must reemploy a returned soldier who was formerly in his employ. It contains several loopholes, as do several other sections to which I shall make reference when the individual sections are being discussed. Experience has proven in my opinion that parliament cannot legislate a people into doing that which public opinion does not demand or sanction and actively support.

If this debate has done nothing else, I believe it will rivet the attention of the people of Canada to this problem of rehabilitation. If we are going to discharge our responsibilities in fairness and equity towards these men before the problem becomes too great and with the experience we have already had, I suggest that the whole matter should be submitted to a committee of the house so that the fullest consideration will be given to this problem. The whole matter should be canvassed now before it is too late, in the interest of the men who are in service overseas and seeking to prevent the difficulties that will arise when the war ends unless action is taken now, and in order to remove the feeling of resentment that must inevitably arise in a community where men in the position I have referred to return and find themselves on relief. We do not want our men to receive as their recompense for military service overseas the opportunity to go on relief rolls.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think no group or member of the house would deny that we should endeavour to give this bill and its principle every support. But as the hon. member for Lake Centre has said, it touches only the fringe of a very large subject.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We admit that.

Mr. COLDWELL: His suggestion is not new; it has been made in this house on a number of occasions, although I am glad he repeated it this afternoon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was not made before on this bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: But this bill touches only the fringe of the problem that has been referred to many times in this house. The suggestion is that a committee of the house should be set up to go into the whole matter of reestablishment, rehabilitation and so on, both now and after the war. I believe that we shall be faced with a grave problem following the war. The hon. member for Vancouver East a few moments ago pointed out that we may set one group of men against another group, which would be not only wrong but deplorable and against the public interest. We must see that that does not happen; we must see that we do not divide the people of this country.

In discussing this matter let us keep clearly in mind that at the conclusion of the last war we failed to provide for the returned men, for their rehabilitation, and failed to provide for the men and women who had performed a service to industry. While to-day the men on the battle front take the greatest risks and suffer the greatest dangers and privations, let us not forget that the men who remain here tilling the soil and providing the food, and the men and women who work in the factories engaged in the production of essential munitions and supplies, render a service that is also essential to the winning of the war.

To my mind we are going about this problem in the wrong way. It cannot be tackled piecemeal. We must consider the whole picture, and when we do, we shall find that many more things will have to be done than we have yet dreamed of doing. This war, let me repeat, is in the minds of many of our people not a war in the ordinarily accepted sense of the term. It is a revolution in the best sense of the word. People throughout the world, particularly in the democratic countries, are becoming more and more determined—and this parliament must awaken to a realization of the fact—that we have to formulate a policy which will prevent our people from going back to relief lines. As the hon. member for Lake Centre has said, our young men are not encouraged to enlist voluntarily when they see other men demobilized and going on relief, or even obtaining from the unemployment insurance fund assistance which after all is limited to fifty-two weeks or the number of weeks the man has served in the armed forces. I know from correspondence I have received and the hon. member for Lake Centre says he has received, that the return of men to the relief lines here and there in the country, and, may I add, the treatment of widowed mothers who are unable to get the same provisions that wives get by way of separation allowance, have militated against recruiting.

A bill of this description is insufficient to meet the needs of the situation. We must do something in a bigger way. It is about time that this parliament told the government that we want the ablest committee that can be established to go into the whole problem of present rehabilitation and post-war reconstruction and rehabilitation. If we approach the problem with open minds we may find that we can and must do much more than is provided by this bill.

When I was in England last autumn, as other hon. members of the delegation will remember, we found many committees working on this problem of post-war reconstruction.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Just one.

Mr. COLDWELL: They were not all government committees. The government committee was acting as a sort of clearing house for all other committees established by various organizations all over the country. We have nothing here yet comparable with that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, we have.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have not the same sort of committees operating to the same extent—not as many and not as representative. We have a committee established by the government, and while it comprises some very fine men it consists substantially of only one type of individual—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, no.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, to a large extent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Organized labour is represented, and industry, and agriculture.

Mr. COLDWELL: One man from labour.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): One out of six.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is that the proportion labour bears to the rest of the dominion?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Would my hon. friend say that Tom Moore is not a good man to represent labour interests?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes; I have already stated so publicly, but he is only one man in six.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the same thing apply to agriculture?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Agriculture has one out of six, too.

Mr. COLDWELL: Let me point out to the minister that these representatives of groups or bodies should be chosen by the body or group itself, rather than nominated by the government. If they are going to represent agriculture, let them be chosen by agriculture. If they are going to represent labour, let them be chosen by labour. Then we shall know that they are representative of those groups.

I want to say as clearly as I can that in my opinion this bill, while the principle can be approved, is utterly inadequate even to meet the situation which it pretends to meet. I believe we should urge upon the ministers who are here this afternoon and upon the government on every possible occasion—and I am taking this opportunity now—that from the membership of this House of Commons we should appoint the ablest committee we can select in order to formulate plans for the care of the men who return from overseas or who come from the armed forces in Canada; for the care of those who are incapacitated in industry and are no longer able to serve in that field, for they are serving, too; and that we should make plans now for the post-war situation. Surely that is our responsibility. If we fail to make adequate plans, I dread to think what the conditions will be when this war ends.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just before the minister speaks I should like to say something, and I believe the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has something to say. I rise not for the purpose of discussing further the principle of this bill, but to give my earnest support to the suggestion that has been offered by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I believe this bill and all the subjects related thereto; the proposed bill with respect to land settlement, which is a rehabilitation measure; the vocational training bill, which is a rehabilitation measure, and all kindred subjects should be submitted to the best committee, to use the words of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, that this house can select. Let them make a study of it. Then we shall get away from the charge of having piecemeal legislation. It will be much more than a gesture; it will show the country that the House of Commons, with the government backing it, is getting down to a real study of a problem which is bound to raise its head more and more as the war goes on and men are sent back to this country from the various armed forces. I earnestly beseech the two ministers who are guiding this measure that they withdraw this bill at the moment and have the cabinet give consideration to this suggestion over the week-end. They will get the support of every group in this house and every body of public opinion if they show that they want to meet this problem now in a wholehearted manner and try to cover the whole field, as far as it can be foreseen. That is the suggestion I make to the minister, that he withdraw this bill and send this whole question to a committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There seems to be among hon. members of this house a tremendous misconception about this bill. It was never intended to be a major part or portion of the reconstruction programme. It was introduced, only at the specific request of the leader of the opposition himself, to implement an order in council which has been in effect since June, 1941. Many persons have already found employment under the provisions of the order in council. Surely no one thinks for a second that this bill could be considered as a major portion of the reestablishment provisions. It is only very, very limited in its scope. But I must correct certain observations which have been made by various hon. gentlemen. I was very much disappointed yesterday to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) and the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck), both of whom displayed a complete lack of knowledge of the terms of the order in council passed by this government on October 1, 1941.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They are not in this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They were not intended to be in this bill; but I want to tell my hon. friend that if he studies the specific benefits conferred under that order in council, he will find that in our legislation we have gone further than any other part of the British empire or any of the allied nations in our attempt to help those serving their country in the armed forces. Instead of displaying a complete lack of knowledge of the order in council, which I personally directed to them by mail for their information in case they should miss seeing it in the Canada Gazette; instead of paying so much attention to some flaws—for there will always be flaws and deficiencies in pensions and reestablishment legislation—they should have some pride in what this country has done in regard to the men serving it to-day. I met the reconstruction committees in England, as did the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar; I told them what we had done in Canada in regard to reconstruction and reestablishment proposals, and they all told me we were more advanced in Canada than they were in England or in any other part of the empire.

Look at the provisions of the order in council of October 1. Look at the provisions with regard to education; for assisting a man who is awaiting the return from his enterprise on the farm; for vocational training; for putting men back on a parity with those in insured employment; for looking after men by way of out-of-work compensation; for free medical treatment for one year. I say, and I will not hesitate to say it to those who are competent to discern, that in this dominion we have done more in the last year for those serving their country than we did in the previous twenty-five years. Hon. gentlemen should be proud of that, instead of finding fault. Any case that comes to my attention that can be met will be met, as the hon. member for Lake Centre was kind enough to say, and I greatly appreciated his remarks. The hon. member for Weyburn mentioned a case yesterday, which only reached me after he had spoken. That case will be met. Any case that it is within my power to meet will be met and will receive the most sympathetic treatment possible. But I think at this serious time of war hon. members should be constructive in directing attention to these problems, instead of creating among those who may be considering enlisting the impression that Canada is not being generous or sympathetic or fair to the men who are going to fight the battles of freedom in the years to come.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar mentioned a committee on reconstruction, and the leader of the opposition applauded his suggestion. Do you recall, Mr. Chairman, that in 1940 the Prime Minister placed upon the order paper a resolution providing for the very committee for which my hon. friend is asking. Does the hon. gentleman remember what happened? We came upon very dark days in the war; we had the tragic episode of Dunkirk, and after consultation it was decided by this house, and I think properly at that time, that we should devote all our energies to the immediate problems connected with that great disaster and with the mobilization of Canadian men for war purposes. Therefore that resolution was withdrawn from the order paper. I ask my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, as I ask the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar: Is the situation to-day brighter than it was at the time of Dunkirk, when hon. members unanimously concurred in the withdrawal of that resolution in regard to post-war problems? I tell my hon. friends that the great thing to-day is to secure victory; otherwise we shall not have a word to say in deciding post-war problems in the Dominion of Canada. That is where our energies must be directed. If, however, the judgment of this committee is to the effect that we should have a committee such as that, I shall be very glad indeed to bring it to the attention of my right hon. leader, and to recommend it to him.

We have a committee now—a committee of six eminent Canadians. I am sorry if they are not in good odour with my hon. friends.

Mr. COLDWELL: No; that is not right; I want to correct that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I accept the correction, gladly.

Mr. COLDWELL: But the committee is not extensive enough, not representative enough.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Well, let us see. The committee represents labour, in the person of the finest champion of organized labour in Canada. I refer to Mr. Tom Moore. The representative of industry is Mr. J. S. McLean. Education is represented by the principals of McGill and Queen's and the secretary-general of Montreal university. It is representative of agriculture, through a gentleman bearing a fine old Scotch name, namely Mr. Donald G. M. Mackenzie of Winnipeg. That committee has formed numerous subcommittees dealing with questions of agriculture, production and finance, and in due course their representations will be received by the government.

May I say to my hon. friend that we have gone much farther with reference to the problem of reconstruction than they have gone in England. We are in touch with organizations such as he may have visualized, including the economic section of the League of Nations and others. We have carried on the work in regard to the specific problem of the rehabilitation of soldiers.

It is my considered judgment—and I believe the committee knows where my heart lies—that once the measures to be introduced in the house have passed we shall have all the legislation necessary to look after the problem of the reestablishment of ex-service men. The administration may fall down, but the power is there; the legislation is there. There will always be things which must be corrected, but the general purpose and general purport of our legislation is not to-day approached in any part of the British empire. I defy any hon. member who knows what has happened in the other dominions to prove I am wrong in that.

So let us all work together. In years gone by we have given much attention to this problem of ex-service men. It has not been and it should not be a party question. The present bill should not be a party question. Special committees of the house have always studied measures I have introduced. It will be so with the land settlement bill.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I must say that I deprecate the engendering of any feeling of pessimism and defeatism in regard to the will and the purpose of this dominion, and any questioning of my honourable intentions with respect to these matters. There is no doubt as to what Canada should do for those who are now serving her. The whole resources of the nation should be mobilized to see to it that economic security shall be the least we can assure them upon their return. Let us assure them of a condition of national vitality, and that they will not return to a devitalized homeland.

I trust that in making this explanation I have exploded the myth that the government has been somewhat hesitant with respect to legislation for ex-service men. We are doing this. It may be a slow thing, but we shall do more, and more and more as the years go by. In our effort I trust we shall receive the cooperation of all hon. members, to ensure that those who are now fighting our battles will come back to a land that will give them the best that Canada can give.

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, my chief purpose in rising is to ask the Minister of Labour a question, but before doing so I should like to refer to a statement made a short time ago by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, a statement which has been repeated on one or two occasions. These hon. members have pointed out that the men who were doing war work in factories were just as essential to the war as others. With that I am in accord. But I think I must say that, after all, there is nothing which can take the place of the man who offers his life.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said that last night.

Mr. REID: Every hon. member has his own reason for not taking part in this war, or the last one. But I can say, as one who was in charge of making shells and guns, that I would not for one minute suggest that my work was comparable with that of the man who takes his life in his hands when he flies in the air to meet the enemy, meets him on the high seas or in the trenches. There has been the suggestion that those in this country who are earning high wages are on the same plane as those who are offering their lives. The suggestion has been repeated on one or two occasions. However, I do not believe the hon. member who repeated it a few moments ago had that in mind.

Mr. COLDWELL: I qualified it.

Mr. REID: We could not for one minute begin to offer full payment to our returned men which would be adequate for the sacrifice they are making. But we can do something, and the minister has pointed out that this measure represents but one of the first steps.

We say to the man who has left his occupation, "We will give you an insurance, of some kind, so that when you come back you will have your job." The very fact that the government has seen fit to introduce a measure of this kind seems to show that after the last war there must have been some employers who were not friendly to ex-service men. True, I know and every hon. member knows of many employers who were not favourable to the employment of ex-service men. But I would point out to the Minister of Labour that this bill will not entirely solve the problem of those who leave, and then come back.

It will bring other problems as well. I have in mind men who saw service in the last war, and who are taking the place of men who are now serving in this war. I know that representations have been made to me respecting these men. I have been asked, "Why is special privilege being given to men enlisting in the present war? Some of them saw three years' service in the last war, in France, but could not get a job; but now that they have one, we are going to take this job away from them after the war, and give it to someone who saw service in this war." I draw this point to the attention of the committee and the minister.

Someone has said that you could drive a coach and four through this legislation. Well, I am not a lawyer, but I have heard enough to believe that that could be said of almost any act on our statute books. A lawyer, if he saw fit to do so, and if his fee was large enough to prompt him to do so, could drive a coach and four through any act.

At the present time this bill is very popular, and it will remain popular as long as the war lasts. But I am wondering just how popular it will be after the war, with a certain class of employers. How popular will it be after the anxiety and excitement die down?

My question to the minister is this: Has the government considered what position this bill will occupy in the country if someone raises the point that it is not constitutional for the dominion government to impose this legislation upon the provinces? Personally I want employers to be placed in a position where they will be compelled to take the men back, if they are not willing to take them back voluntarily.

But I have heard arguments about old age pensions and other acts being unconstitutional, and ultra vires of the dominion government. I am wondering if the Minister of Labour has considered that point of view, and if he has placed safeguards in the bill, so that no one may raise a constitutional question. No doubt other hon. members have heard constitutional questions raised, but we do not want that to happen with legislation of this kind.

Mr. MITCHELL: That thought was in our minds when the bill was drafted. If the hon. member will turn to the preamble he will find these words:

And whereas it is deemed expedient for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada that provision should be made for the orderly reinstatement in their previous employment of such persons aforesaid.

These words were incorporated in the preamble to take care of the point raised by the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. REID: I am glad that has been done, because it may pave the way for further social legislation.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to address a few brief remarks to the Minister of Pensions and National Health. I hope he does not misunderstand the temper of those of us who are discussing this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. COLDWELL: He spoke with considerable heat just now. I want to assure him that so far as we are concerned we want to give every cooperation we can to the solution of these problems. We are not discussing them from a partisan point of view at all. I do not care who gets the credit for doing some of these things that need to be done; I just want to express my opinion as strongly as I can that certain things should be done.

I agree with the hon. member for New Westminster that the men who are in the line, on the sea or who fly, are subject not only to many dangers but to a mental strain that few of us realize. I shall not forget the night we spent at a bomber station. You will remember it quite well, Mr. Chairman. I can still see the strained look on the faces of those young men who were flying over Germany night after night. Many of those boys will come back unable to cope immediately with civilian life, and we want plans prepared to deal with every situation that may arise.

The minister said a few moments ago that we were doing more in Canada than was being done in any part of the British empire. I am not going to dispute that statement. I was just a little bit disappointed with what I found in Great Britain in that regard. I am just going to make that statement and go no further. I think I know the reason why, but I shall not discuss it. I do not want to see our country, no matter what may happen in other parts of the commonwealth, fail to prepare for this post-war condition. I warmly support the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), and others who with us have urged—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) suggested it first—

Mr. COLDWELL: —upon the government the establishment of a committee to study the situation and prepare for the post-war condition. This is not showing a want of confidence in what is being done now; it is simply that we want to feel that we are doing our part in making these preparations for the circumstances that will arise hereafter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I just want a moment to deal with the constitutional point which has been raised. I had it on the tip of my tongue to raise this yesterday, but I did not want to interject into this discussion a question which might be deemed to be outside the purview of the intent of the bill.

I should like to point out to the minister certain decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada, and especially of the privy council, on this question of the use of the powers under the British North America Act in connection with peace, order and good government. What is the pith and substance of the legislation? That, in the final analysis, is the criterion which the privy council has applied to legislation of this kind. In war time there is no question that this legislation is constitutional, but having regard to the decisions that have been made as to the conferring of legislative powers upon the federal parliament under that general clause of the constitution, which I think is right and properly used in given cases, the fact remains that the decisions of the privy council have narrowed and whittled them down until they could not be applied. We found that out in connection with the legislation for the so-called new deal. I may tell my hon. friend that some of those decisions were a great shock to me. I redrafted the preambles of two or three of those measures to strengthen if possible in the recitals the legislative jurisdiction under the peace, order and good government clauses of the constitution. I thought we had gone the whole limit and that we were on entirely safe ground, only to find out that notwithstanding the magnificent judgment of the chief justice of this country, the privy council had narrowed the viewpoint down to the old pith and substance principle. My hon. friend may find that that may happen here. I hope that will not be the case. If the ministry is going on with this bill I hope no one will attack it after the war on the grounds of constitutionality. I agree with the justice of this bill, but I am just pointing out a possible danger.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I be allowed to inform my hon. friend that we did take this up definitely with the Department of Justice. I had some reservations in connection with the point he mentions. The opinion of the department reads in part as follows:

Matters relating to employment are, as you suggest, ordinarily provincial, and fall to be regulated by provincial legislation. The bill under consideration, however, relates primarily to the military forces; conferring rights upon the members thereof and imposing obligations, enforceable by criminal proceedings, on those persons who employed them at the time of enlistment. The bill requires employers to reinstate former employees who have served in the military forces and have been honourably discharged therefrom. The pith and substance of the proposal is, as is stated in the preamble, to relieve persons who have left employment to enlist of any cause for concern in regard to their reinstatement in employment, and that there should be uniformity of treatment in the matter of such reinstatement.

Parliament has exclusive power to legislate in relation to militia, military and naval service and defence and in relation to the criminal law. The bill would appear to me to constitute a valid exercise of these powers, but, in any event, can readily be supported as an exercise of emergency power to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada, and is consequently valid, even though constituting an invasion of the provincial field.

Mr. MARSHALL: As I listened to the remarks of the Minister of Pensions and National Health a few moments ago, I wondered whether we should place this baby on his doorstep or on the doorstep of the Minister of Labour. After hearing his remarks I am satisfied that he is the father of the bill; consequently I shall direct my remarks to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not correct.

Mr. MacNICOL: You are not disowning the baby, are you?

Mr. MARSHALL: When the bill received second reading yesterday we in this corner of the house consented to its passing, thereby placing our stamp of approval upon the proposals embodied in it. The Minister of Pensions and National Health has stated time and time again that the proposals embodied in this measure are only a small part of a large general scheme which has been formulated or which is in the process of being formulated to take care of the problems of the post-war period. The Minister of Labour concurred entirely in the views expressed by the Minister of Pensions and National Health.

For a minute or two I should like to examine this planning for the post-war period, which after all is exactly what we are doing. To-day under the strain and stress of war we are apt to allow ourselves to be carried away by high-sounding phrases. We have had ample evidence of that within the last two or three weeks during the victory loan campaign.

Planning for the post-war period sounds well, but it has sinister implications. Yesterday we heard a violent diatribe from the member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), who in effect accused those of us who sit on the opposition benches of using tactics tending to delay and hinder the war effort, and suggested that such an innocent and inoffensive measure as the one which we are now discussing should be passed without delay. "Let us get on with the war," he shouted. I should like to tell the hon. member that he should direct that warning to the leader of his own party. We have a right, I believe, to scrutinize any measure and every bill with meticulous care to see whether or not it will solve in its entirety or solve only partly the problems with which it deals. The expression "planning for the post-war period" has much the same meaning as if I were to use the expression to my room-mate, the member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), "I am laying plans for next year." If I were to repeat that to him a sufficient number of times I am satisfied that very soon he would ask me something like this, "What are you planning to do? What objective have you in mind?" When an engineer is going to build a bridge or a painter is going to paint a picture, or when I am going to build a house, each of us has an objective or goal and each of us prepares his plans with this specific goal or objective constantly before him. Hitler and the German nation have a goal or objective towards which they are relentlessly driving. Their plans have been carefully and thoroughly made to enable them to reach their objective. That objective I believe is the complete annihilation of the British empire. The taking of Norway, Belgium, Holland and France were just small bits and pieces of their general plan.

The Japanese to-day have an objective or goal, which seems to be the domination of the Pacific, and ruthlessly they are driving towards that objective. The destruction of Pearl Harbour, the fall of Singapore, Hong Kong and Java are only bits and pieces of their entire general plan, not for the post-war period, but for the war period. But "the best laid schemes o' mice and men gang aft a-gley," as Bobbie Burns says.

Now look at this question from the point of view of the allies. The allies thus far have not yet fixed their goal or objective, and in consequence they have no definite plan.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did they not do it in the Atlantic charter?

Mr. MARSHALL: I do not believe so, and if the hon. member will wait a moment I shall enlarge upon what I have just said. The allies are being kept too busy withstanding the onrushing hordes of barbarians. The point I wish to emphasize and drive home is that the essence of a plan is that it is a means to an end and not an end in itself. A plan presupposes an objective, an objective which has already been decided upon. The planning of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) reminds me of the common expression: "We don't know where we're going but we're on our way."

Mr. MITCHELL: I agree with my hon. friend that he does not know where he is going but he is on his way.

Mr. MARSHALL: Then we are in the same boat, but I think the minister is worse off than I am.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to know, Mr. Chairman, what strategy in the Pacific has to do with this bill?

Mr. MARSHALL: If the hon. gentleman will wait a moment I shall show him what it has to do with this bill. Considerable latitude, Mr. Chairman, has been allowed in the discussion so far and I do not see why I should not be allowed to develop my point.

Press reports tell us that the cabinet has set up a special subcommittee within itself to form plans for the post-war period. The time has come when the government must tell us what our objective or goal is in relation to the post-war period. What do you aim at with these various bills that you propose to bring in? What is the objective? What is the goal? Having settled upon the question of the objective, we should then be given a broad outline of the general principles of the means by which the government proposes to reach that objective. Surely a subcommittee of the cabinet composed entirely of Liberals should not have a complete monopoly of the formulation of the plans for the post-war period. If we are to continue as a united nation we must be taken into the confidence of the government in respect to its plans. Until this is done we cannot conscientiously give our assent to a plan which is being presented to us in bits and pieces. By giving our assent to this bill we are blindly endorsing something which might perhaps in the general scheme of things be dangerous and detrimental to the welfare and future happiness of the people of this country and to the men in the fighting forces. We might wake up some fine morning to realize that we had been gradually eased into state capitalism, so cunningly called socialism. There is a sinister movement on foot to-day to bring about a union of nations in which these nations would lose some of their rights, with the government centred in a body having at its back an international police force to force its will upon any nation. Is this what we are heading for? If it is, then these plans which are being introduced in bits and pieces should be definitely halted until we can get the whole picture in its true perspective.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health made a speech in Toronto on August 27 of last year. On that occasion he dealt with the proposals embodied in this bill. He said:

> The first essential is to provide adequate employment opportunities for our returning service men and those who are no longer required in the munition factories of the nation.

With this sentiment I entirely agree. But he also said:

> Collective security would be based upon collective force and collective preparedness and not upon collective idealism.

Further along in the same speech he said:

> Reconstruction plans must be coordinated with those in the United States and other portions of the empire.

Then again:

> The standard of living that is low in some nations should be universalized and maintained by a real league of nations or a freedom area which shall be the guardian of the liberties and comforts of mankind.

Now that we are embarking on broad plans, before we proceed any further with those plans I think I have a right to know, parliament has a right to know, the people of Canada have a right to know, what the minister meant. How far have we gone towards the consummation of the ideas which he expressed on that occasion? What does he mean by collective force? How far has the subcommittee of the cabinet gone in its plans of coordination with the United States and the British empire? I wonder what significance would be attached to the expression when the minister places the United States before the British empire.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that in the bill?

Mr. MARSHALL: No, but I think it is relevant to the bill. What does he mean when he says the standard of living must be universalized and maintained by a real league of nations? We must have an explanation from him, and I should be glad if at this time he would give me an explanation.

I suggest that we must drag these planners and their plans right out into the open. We must know, and the Minister of Pensions and National Health must tell us, what is going on behind the scenes. We must know if these things as set forth in this speech of his are the objective or the goal towards which we are striving. If they are, that declaration should be made on the floor of the House of Commons instead of on a public platform somewhere in Toronto.

We must first declare positively and in no uncertain terms what our objective or goal is with respect to post-war rehabilitation; secondly, having decided upon our objective—and that in my opinion is the main thing—we must formulate plans, and not until then; and thirdly, we should then employ experts to carry out these plans, freed from the fettering influences of bureaucracy. Until this is done, all talk of democracy is idle and futile, and all plans must be relegated to the waste-paper basket where they rightfully belong.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I wish to ask the minister a question, but I might make an observation with regard to his recent outburst. I think the Minister of Pensions and National Health totally misunderstood the mind of the house, because I am sure there was no wish on the part of members in this corner to find fault with him or to cast aspersions on the conduct of his department with reference to returned men.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I make an explanation? I think my hon. friend said yesterday that nothing had been done for two years until 1941. Here I have the complete file of orders in council—a bulky file it is—of the actual attempts made to meet the problem before the time my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes, but the really effective work has been done by the minister's department under P.C. 7633—which was not passed until October 1, two years after we entered the war—and subsequent amendments.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): But much was done before then.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But not the effective work that is being done now. What was done left much to be desired, as the minister must agree. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said last night what was in the minds of most of us. We have always found the minister not only courteous and prompt in any matters referred to him, but one of the most sympathetic ministers in the cabinet in dealing with returned soldiers' problems. I do not want him to get the wrong impression. But I would say to the minister that when hon. members, whether on the government or on the opposition side, are trying to present a point of view, it does not help for any of us to get up and blow off steam. Impassioned speeches will not solve this problem.

The minister is not fair when he says hon. members have spoken with complete lack of knowledge of the orders in council. Hon. members who spoke from this corner were perfectly familiar with the orders in council to which the minister referred. What the minister did not understand was that we were pointing out, not that these things had not been taken care of in orders in council, but that the provisions were not in this bill. The minister says that no one in the government said they were. That is true. But what we are contending is that we should have legislation. These orders in council are passed under the annual War Appropriations Act, but they are not permanent legislation. We ought to have permanent legislation covering the whole field, both the immediate situation and the post-war situation. I think on reflection the minister himself will agree with that point of view. What is going to happen if something is not done now to centralize this whole problem is that after the war it will be split up among many different departments, and the average man is going to get what the soldier calls "the run-around". We are getting it to some extent now. We have, for instance, a soldier settlement board under the Minister of Pensions and National Health, vocational training under the Minister of Labour—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is under my control and that of the Minister of Mines and Resources.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): —and something else under the Minister of National War Services. The result is that men often do not know under which department a particular matter comes. I should like to see this whole question of rehabilitation put under the Minister of Pensions and National Health, or under a separate department or commission or some specific body, not scattered over half a dozen departments and so requiring a coordinating committee to hook them up. Every hon. member knows what it means when a particular matter is split up among departments; we run from one branch to another and from one department to another.

I still think that the suggestion made by other hon. members and by myself could be carried out. These measures having to do with rehabilitation should be referred to a committee. Provision is already on the order paper for two committees, one for vocational training and one for soldier settlement. These committees could be lumped together, probably enlarged to forty-five or fifty members and then broken up into subcommittees to deal with vocational training and resettlement under 7633. The subcommittees could come together for general discussion, and all legislation dealing with related matters could be referred to them. The whole picture would then be presented. The objection is not that the government has ever said that this bill is all-inclusive, but that we have not had anything that is all-inclusive.

What machinery does the government propose to set up under this bill to make it operative? I said yesterday that this bill is an empty gesture, and the Minister of Labour said that was not fair. But I ask the minister to look at it. I am not a lawyer, but I cannot find anything in the bill providing for the setting up of the administration to make it operative. I asked yesterday across the floor what a man who finds that his former employer will not reemploy him does to make this bill operative.

An hon. MEMBER: He goes to the placement officer.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The placement officer operates under the Unemployment Insurance Act. So far as I can see, this bill does not envisage any machinery for carrying out its purposes.

Mr. MARTIN: He goes to the crown attorney.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It does not even say under what department or what minister it will operate. What will be the procedure by which a man wishing to avail himself of the benefits of this legislation can do so? To whom will he go? Does he have to lay a charge before the attorney general?

Mr. MARTIN: The crown attorney.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Unless we have a statement as to the machinery that will be set up and how it will operate, this bill will be just a dead letter. It can be worth something, and that is why we want the minister to give some content to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Under section 11 of the bill some contingent powers are provided. The department over which I preside has administered the order in council since last June and has not had the slightest difficulty. Our welfare officers all over Canada are instructed that if any cases of complaint come to them of an employer or municipality or school board refusing to reinstate an ex-service man, immediate action shall be taken. A case came to my attention yesterday afternoon, and that will be dealt with. There is no necessity to report to any legal tribunal. We will take the necessary action.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If we had had that explanation earlier it would have cleared the point up. But the bill does not say it will be operated by the minister's department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was in the past.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): As I understand the set-up now under order in council P.C. 4758, the Minister of Pensions and National Health is directly chargeable, but this bill does not say so.

Mr. MITCHELL: The bill is to be discussed clause by clause. This would come under the last clause, and I shall be prepared to answer at that time.

Mr. MacNICOL: The short title indicates that this bill relates to returned soldiers and their reinstatement in civil employment. I think the minister should make a comprehensive statement on this clause. I pointed out the other day, from experience following the last war, that returned soldiers will not all be reinstated in industry. Some will; a large number may not. I hoped that the minister would tell us just what is going to be done, because the bill does not tell it. Some hon. member this afternoon pointed out something that is very clear to me now, but I did not think of it before—that a large number of returned soldiers from the last war are at present employed in industries. I know many myself, hundreds, perhaps; many of those men might be displaced by men coming back who have to be provided with work similar to that in which they were engaged before they enlisted. Neither the minister nor anyone else wants returned soldiers of the first world war to be displaced. There should be some provision to take care of those men.

To-day the hon. member for Lake Centre made an excellent suggestion; I had made it myself on Wednesday last. In the United States they are setting up a research committee or board which I take it would correspond with what the hon. member has in mind. It is imperative that some board or committee, either of this house or outside, men qualified to deal with industrial employment, should be set up to discuss and present to the minister a plan under which returned men can be reemployed. On Wednesday last I said, as reported at page 1037 of Hansard:

> I suggest that the minister set up a committee. I shall be glad to serve on any research committee free of charge in connection with the job of providing jobs. The munitions plants should be kept going if at all possible.

In the United States part of the work of the research committee now operating there is to compile thousands upon thousands of things which can be made in those plants that will cease operating when the war ends. Then I went on:

I suggest, therefore, that some research board or committee be put into operation to look for opportunities to keep these plants going, which ordinarily will cease production at the end of the war and consequently throw men on the streets.

In a word, it seems to me very clear that one of two or three things must be done in the interim or transition period, from the time the men return until they are absorbed into industry, either in their old plants, which must take place within three months, or in the making of new lines in the present large munition plants. In the first place they might be kept enrolled in the services under pay and allowances, if that is the correct military term, or at any rate maintained until they have something to do. I would not limit the period to three months, for I remember very well what happened after the last war when the men came back to the plant in which I had the great privilege of serving. Many of them were not able to go back to the plant in three, four or six months. It was not that all had been wounded; the nerves of many had been so wrought up by shot and shell that they were not able to steady themselves sufficiently to return to work. But in due course they came back, and I believe they were all reestablished, in the plant with which I was associated. So there is an interim period for which provision must be made, for I hope and pray that they will not be allowed to wander about the streets with nothing to sustain them.

In the second place I said the other day, and I repeat now, that there are countless thousands of jobs that can be provided by the government covering the interim period, in connection with works that will be self-liquidating. Someone said the other day that this could not be done, but I have had a great deal of experience in these matters and I know it can be done. These works can be paid for, and I know that in the last analysis they will not cost the country anything. Above all, no matter what it costs, it is essential that these returned soldiers be employed either by the government or by industry, or else be maintained with pay and allowances. I had hoped that before this section passed, the minister might tell us something about just how the interim or transition period is going to be dealt with.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Was my hon. friend in his seat when I spoke previously this afternoon?

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, I was, and I appreciated very much what the minister said.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Later in the session I had intended to go comprehensively into the discussions we have been having—they are only discussions so far—exactly in reference to the point now raised by my hon. friend. The estimate of very prominent men in industry to-day is that 40 per cent of those now working in war industries will be displaced when peace comes again. Therefore in my judgment it is the primary duty of any government to lay plans to see that provision is made for the care of these men during that transition period, which is exactly the point raised by my hon. friend, as I followed him. Just as we transferred from a peace-time to a war-time industry, with all the organization necessary to complete that process, so I think we should have control boards in every industry of Canada to start now, or in the very near future, to prepare plans for the reorganiaztion back from war-time to peace-time industry. Later on I hope to expand on that theory, but I thought this bill was a very minor piece of legislation, and I was not prepared to deal with that matter in a comprehensive way.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Probably a word or two still needs to be said before we leave this stage of the bill. A wide latitude has been allowed in this discussion, and I think rightly so. We are just beginning to confront the real problem that is going to face us, and there should be a good deal of frank and unimpassioned discussion among hon. members, with the object of trying to find a solution.

During the discussion a good deal has been said concerning a new order. Last spring we had the Prime Minister, I believe, speaking of a "new heaven and a new earth." Last night I listened to the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) talking about a new order. I listened closely, to try to find out what he had in mind regarding the new order, but I was not at all satisfied. I am afraid that this good man, for whom I have a great deal of respect, represents in his uncertainty a very large cross-section of Canadian public opinion. Let me draw to the attention of the minister something which I am sure he does not need to have drawn to his attention; the fact that we cannot have a new order by just talking about it. First you have to know what you mean by your new order, and then you must devise means by which you can achieve that new order. I wish the Prime Minister had taken a little more trouble to tell us, and perhaps he may do so yet, what he conceives to be the new order. In a way we in the west were all built up over his "new order" speech. Then, as I recall it, he spoke in Edmonton and quite dashed our hopes, for there he gave us to understand that all that was in his mind was the unemployment insurance bill, and that was a terrible let-down.

With respect to this new order the ministers have in mind, I wonder whether this measure, together with half a dozen others that are proposed to be introduced, constitute what they regard as the new order. If that is so, I wonder in what respect the new order is going to differ from the old order that ruined us during the twenty years following the last war. Once they have determined what really the new order is to be, I wish one of the ministers would give us some inkling as to how this new order is to be brought about and how it is to be maintained.

I should like to say just a word or two about the bill before I discuss further what I have suggested in my remarks thus far. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) and the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) that this bill is simply a gesture, and a very empty gesture—a very hollow reed upon which the men will break and fall as soon as they begin to lean upon it.

The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) seemed to be indignant last night because some of us had criticized the bill. The idea conveyed by his remarks and, I am afraid, by those of the Minister of Pensions and National Health, seemed to be that by criticizing this bill we are going to destroy the boys' confidence in the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad the minister negates that. No words which could be uttered in the house would disillusion the boys any more than they are already disillusioned. If anyone imagines that the bright, clear-minded, upstanding, fact-facing young men who are to-day in our army are deceived by all the mummery we are going through in this chamber, then he ought to get in contact with a few of them. Just spend a day in the smoking car on any railway train. The ministers ought to remember that members of the air force in Canada have to pass a rather rigid educational test before they can become members of that force. The boys are using that education in thinking out what is going to happen in the future. Things like this bill are simply nauseating to them.

All a man needs to do is to use the illustration which a fine young schoolteacher now in the air force used in my presence. He said, "in the school from which I came, already two former teachers have enlisted; I am the third one. When the time comes to give us back the job, which of the three of us is going to get it—or is the man who has gone in after me, going to get it?" That is enough to illustrate how trashy and flimsy is the bill. I do not wish to be unkind, but it is flimsy. As the leader of the opposition has said, it is altogether too easy for an employer to excuse himself—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. If I heard him rightly, the hon. member used the words "trashy and flimsy".

Mr. BLACKMORE: You heard me aright.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I suggest to my hon. friend that the genesis of this bill was a resolution submitted to the government on September 1, 1939, and resubmitted in March, 1940, by the Canadian Legion, representing the organized ex-service men in Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What is the point of order?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That these epithets as applied to this legislation are uncalled for and unjustified. The recommendation of the legion was as follows:

> Statutory provision that every man enlisting shall on his return from service, if not incapacitated for his former occupation, be entitled as of right to reinstatement in his original employment if still existing, with the same rights and seniority as when he enlisted, with appropriate penalties, including compensation, if he is discharged without cause, say within three years after reengagement.

We have carried out exactly the request of the organized ex-service men of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All that has been done in this bill is that an attempt has been made to carry out that request. Those men were not recommending the bill before us; they were recommending a principle.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would you say the British bill is trashy—or the Australian bill, or the New Zealand bill?

Mr. BLACKMORE: We are not discussing the Australian bill.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is the same thing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have plenty to occupy my time, by devoting my attention only to our Canadian bills.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is the same thing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have not had a chance to get the wording of the Australian or the British bill; I may do so later on. I am merely giving my views in reference to this bill.

Mr. HANSELL: He did not say it was trashy, either; he said it was flimsy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He said it was trashy, too. I think I heard him rightly. I will withdraw immediately, if I am wrong.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He admits "flimsy" but not "trashy".

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is altogether too easy for an employer to escape responsibility under this bill. That will be found just as soon as the men begin to have recourse to it, in any considerable numbers.

I wish to say a word or two about the new order concerning which there has been some talk. This is one of the high-sounding phrases being used throughout the country, not only in Canada but in the United States.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): May I interrupt the hon. member? Great latitude has been given in the discussion of section 1 of the bill, but I suggest that such latitude should bear some relation to the subject matter of the bill. I cannot see where a discussion of any new order or new system has any relation to the bill, and I would ask the hon. member to direct his remarks to the subject matter before the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with that. I was peremptorily called to order by the Deputy Speaker, and I was wondering how long this was going to continue.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): I think this is the end of it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have been sitting here all afternoon expecting that the minute I began to talk about anything real I would be ruled out of order. This is no reflection on yourself, Mr. Chairman.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): I would ask the hon. member not to cast reflections on the Chair; I believe I have been tolerant.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not reflect upon you; I suspect others would have done just the same. But this is an all-important question which must be asked, not only regarding this bill but regarding every measure which is proposed. How are you going to do it? Where are you going to get the money to do it?

Mr. MacNICOL: Where we are getting it to fight the war.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Someone says that we shall get it from the same source from which we are getting it to fight the war. Were we using that source during the dreadful years of the depression? No; of course not. We could not use that source even to prepare ourselves effectively to fight a potential enemy. The Minister of Pensions and National Health knows the truth of that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No one knows better.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No one in Canada has suffered more because of that than this same minister.

Mr. McNEVIN: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Gladly.

Mr. McNEVIN: Would he care to tax that $25 a month?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Order. The question was out of order, and I am sure the answer would be out of order, too.

Mr. BLACKMORE: At present the money with which this war is being fought is being borrowed. I believe it is proposed that we are to borrow $900,000,000 in the present loan. Let me ask any hon. member if he supposes that a proposal to raise a similar amount of money would receive any consideration, if the war were to come to a close?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What was the hon. member's question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let us suppose that we have finished the second war, and that we are a year beyond it. Let us suppose that we are endeavouring to pay the interest on the colossal debt we are now amassing. Would a loan like this be considered for a moment to care for essential services? No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Am I supposed to answer that question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I can only express my personal opinion. I am not speaking for the government at all, but I believe that after this conflict has been concluded, the people of the Dominion of Canada will insist upon obtaining the necessary finances for social security as they are now obtained for war purposes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad to hear that, but I ask the minister if he believes that the people of Canada will insist on lending the money with which to do it?

Mr. HANSELL: Will the minister insist that the government get the money?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I cannot deal with a hypothetical or contingent question as to what the people of Canada may decide to do. The people of Canada are always in control of whatever government may be in office. They will decide that according to their sound judgment, as is evidenced by the formation of this parliament.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The same general principle will apply to this bill. If a government coming in after this government sees fit to sabotage this bill, it will be sabotaged.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is not fair.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no foundation for that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We will just leave that aside. Considering the main motion, let us keep in mind that the great sums of money which the government is able to collect to-day by way of taxes and loans are in a large measure the result of huge expenditures by the government, which expenditures have resulted in a greatly increased national income. As soon as the war is over and government expenditures on their present scale cease—and according to the minister's own speech which I have read and regarding which I should like to commend him for its beauty—these expenditures absorb forty per cent of the production of Canada—the national income of Canada will fall off at such an astonishing and disconcerting rate that it will be impossible to get the money. I hope I am not being gloomy in my forecast, but I lived through the last war as did the minister. We can judge what is likely to come in the future only by what has happened in the past. With respect to where the money could come from, I am not free to discuss that at the moment. If I said anything about that, I would be ruled out of order immediately.

Mr. GRANT: You are out of order already.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is a brilliant remark. We must face the fact that the money must come from somewhere. Unless some provision is made for a source of income other than the one which we now have in sight under our orthodox system, namely borrowing and taxation, this and other measures will be simply impossible. I have in my hand the order in council which has been discussed lately, and the small sheet which has been distributed to hon. members, the Department of Pensions and National Health information leaflet. I have, too, the post-discharge reestablishment order. If the wastage of this war is anything comparable with that of the last, the total amount needed to meet the promises in these two documents will be simply staggering. These promises are not worth the paper they are written on unless we have some means of rendering financially possible what is physically possible in Canada. I think I have said all that I rose to say on this aspect of the question. I hope the members of this house and the people of this country will ask this inflexible question every time a proposal is made: How are you going to do it, and where is the money coming from? Until you can answer those questions, it is idle to talk about what is to happen.

An hon. MEMBER: You ought to know.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think I know where the money could come from, but I do not think my hon. friend knows.

I am going to make one short reference to the committee which has been set up to examine into ways and means. In his speech the minister has said that economists and scholars are at work. I am not very much impressed with the knowledge or ability of those economists and scholars. There are two groups in this house that represent some sort of an approach to the new order. At least they have some new ideas. However, neither group is represented on this committee, nor is there anyone on the committee who knows what these groups know. If the recommendation of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) is to be taken in good faith and executed with sincerity, surely anyone who has a new idea as to how a new economic system might be brought about ought to be invited in.

Mr. MARTIN: Would the hon. member include Principal Wallace of Queens university?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to know something about what Principal Wallace knows. I would say with all respect to Principal Wallace and gentlemen in his position that they are bound hand and foot. They dare not say what is in their minds because they know that there are university chancellors whose opinions may not agree with theirs.

Mr. MARTIN: Does the hon. gentleman know Principal Wallace?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not saying anything about Principal Wallace except that if he expressed ideas which did not agree with those of the chancellor of Queens, in all probability he would soon cease to be Principal Wallace. All one has to do is to consider what happened in another great university in Canada within the last ten years. But we will leave that aside. If the minister is going to play fair with the people of Canada with respect to this committee; if he is going to play fair with the millions of young people who are rising in this country; if he is going to maintain respect for himself and his committee, he must bring in men with new vision, men who are ready to try something new. I shall reserve what else I have to say for a later occasion.

Mr. BOUCHER: I should like to refer to two aspects of this bill. The bill is predicated upon the employer having a duty to take back his employee, and that limits its scope. It might be enlarged if it were predicated upon the industry or the enterprise.

Mr. MITCHELL: What section is the hon. gentleman talking about?

Mr. BOUCHER: I was referring particularly to section 2.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why not discuss that when we get to the section?

Mr. BOUCHER: What I have to say really refers to the whole bill. The onus is on the employer to take back his employee, and there is only one possible employer whom the bill will affect—the one who is not nobly doing his part by the returned soldier, and whose attitude is abhorrent to the Canadian people. Taking in as it does the body corporate or politic, the bill refers to kinds of enterprises, but only so far as the management of the business is concerned, not the business itself. Reference should be made in the bill to the actual enterprise or business which the man left to enter the armed forces, so that it will be the duty of that enterprise, as best it can, to take the man back into employment, even though the personnel governing the enterprise may have changed.

With respect to enforcement, the type of case that will come up for prosecution under this enactment will be that of an employer who does not show the right spirit in the matter of assistance and support for the returned soldier, and fails to do his duty as a Canadian citizen, thus compelling the soldier to have recourse to the courts. A measure of this kind should be administered by the government along the lines of the fair wage legislation. In every large community at least the government should appoint a man who would investigate these cases and institute prosecutions. It should not be left to the individual soldier to do so, at his own expense, and perhaps to his own ignominy. The returned soldier should not have to hale his employer into court at his own cost. The government should go a lot farther in that regard. I trust that these two points will be taken into consideration in enlarging the scope of the bill for the very purpose for which it has been introduced.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): By order in council the Department of Pensions and National Health has always taken the responsibility of bringing prosecutions where prosecution was necessary. The onus was not on the individual in any case.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think sufficient has been said on this bill to let those who are responsible for it know that there is something very seriously wrong with it. We agree with it in principle, but the objection is that the bill does not carry out the principle which is professed in the preamble. The bill is not progressive enough. It places the onus upon industry to provide work for the returning men, and industry will not provide work unless there is profit. Industry as it is organized in this country has failed to do so in the past. We are not forgetting that there were over one million unemployed in Canada and over a million on relief at a time when industry should have been employed in providing goods and services which were needed, and in the production of which man-power was essential. But industry is not concerned about the welfare of humanity.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is altogether an unrighteous statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Humanity and industry are inseparable.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Industry and humanity, I say, are very separable. Industry was not much concerned about the unemployed that we had in Canada for a period of ten years.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is that so? I have seen men go without work and our people in need of food, clothing and shelter, when industry would not turn its wheels, and when industry should have been operating to provide those needs if it had any interest in the welfare of the people. That old set-up has failed. Industry refuses to operate unless there are profits.

Mr. PURDY: What did my hon. friend do for industry?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If you want to make your little speech go right ahead. I am talking of what I saw of unemployed people in this country.

Mr. PURDY: What did you do to provide work for those who were unemployed?

Mr. MacNICOL: Did you ever give a man a job?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I have found it hard enough to find a little job for myself. But I know that there were a million unemployed people in this country. This bill is just like trying to put a patch on an old worn-out tire. The bill provides that after the returned soldiers have forced their former employers to give them work, the employers must keep them in work for six months. What happens after that? We do not know. There is no question that the reestablishment and rehabilitation of the returning men is most important, but I want to tell the administration and those who are responsible for this bill that the working men and soldiers of Canada do not want a reestablishment of the old set-up that they had in Canada a few years ago. The right of every man to exchange his labour for a decent living must be recognized.

Mr. MacNICOL: I agree with that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But that right has not been recognized in the past, and unless we do something to see that the men shall have that opportunity—and this bill does not provide it—then I say we are failing to do our duty.

Section stands.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENT OF PROVISION RESPECTING DECLARATION OF EMERGENCY YEAR

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 14, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

He said: The bill contains only one section. It provides for the removal of section 3 (1), which reads as follows:

Any crop year in which the average price is less than eighty cents per bushel may be declared by the governor in council as an emergency year under this act.

And substitutes therefor:

The governor in council may for the purpose of this act declare any crop year to be an emergency year.

It takes out the restriction of eighty cents a bushel.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

NATIONAL REGISTRATION—SKILLED AND UNSKILLED LABOUR

Mr. KUHL:

1. Has the government used the information obtained in the national registration to compile statistics which will show, (a) the number of skilled man-hours of work which are available; (b) the extent to which these hours of work are being utilized; (c) the manner in which they are being utilized; (d) the number of unskilled man-hours of work available; (e) the manner in which and the extent to which they are being utilized; (f) the extent to which the unskilled labour is being trained?
2. If so, what statistics are available?

Mr. THORSON:

1. (a) No.
(b) See answer to "a".
(c) See answer to "a".
(d) No.
(e) See answer to "d".
(f) No.
2. None.

BRITISH IMMIGRANTS

Mr. LECLERC:

1. How many British immigrants have entered Canada each year since 1935?

2. Of that number, how many are of military age?

1.

Fiscal years	From overseas	From U.S.A.	Totals
1935-36.....	2,049	3,103	5,152
1936-37.....	2,264	3,063	5,327
1937-38.....	2,972	3,341	6,313
1938-39.....	3,373	3,317	6,690
1939-40.....	3,566	3,365	6,931
1940-41.....	3,104	4,898	8,002
Totals.....	17,328	21,087	38,415

The term "from overseas" includes British immigrants from all parts of the world, except the United States.

2. The total (38,415) includes males and females. There were 8,948 males between the ages of 20 and 50, as indicated in the following groups—

Ages	From overseas	From U.S.A.	Totals
20-24.....	1,078	748	1,826
25-29.....	1,072	795	1,867
30-39.....	1,390	1,641	3,031
Totals.....	4,324	4,624	8,948

No figures are available to show from what countries the British immigrants from overseas came. However, recently a special compilation was made for the calendar year 1941 to ascertain how many male immigrants over the age of 18 had arrived in Canada. The total was 774. Of these, 96 came from the British Isles, 470 from Newfoundland and 208 from other countries. Of the 96 from the British Isles—

18 were from 18 to 29 years of age
38 were from 30 to 40 years of age
40 were 41 years of age or over.

GOLDEN BALL GARAGE, SAINT JOHN, N.B.

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Has the government paid any money to General Realty Company, Limited, Saint John, New Brunswick, on account of rental for that part of the Golden Ball garage it leased on January 15, 1941?

2. If so, how much and when?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

[Mr. Thorson.]

CANADIAN PRISONERS OF WAR—JAPAN

Mr. REID:

Have any steps been taken by the government to send food supplies for the use of Canadian soldiers now held prisoners of war by Japan?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Allied governments, the nationals of whose countries are prisoners of war of Japan, are alike concerned with the Canadian government in the matter of sending food supplies for the use of soldiers now held prisoners of war in the far east. The Canadian government is associated with the other governments concerned in taking every possible step in this matter.

PURCHASE OF CHOCOLATE FOR CANADIAN ARMY

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Has the government awarded a contract for the supply of chocolate for the army?
2. If so, to whom was this contract awarded?
3. Was it sublet?
4. If so, to whom?
5. What will be the total expenditure in connection with this contract?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.

2, 3, 4 and 5. Answered by 1.

PURCHASE OF PORK AND BACON FROM CANADA PACKERS

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Did the government purchase pork and bacon from Canada Packers during the years 1939, 1940, 1941 and 1942 for use of the army?
2. If so, what amount in each of these years?
3. At what price per pound?
4. Were all of such materials used entirely by the army?
5. Were the sides or fat portions used for the needs of the army?
6. If not, were they resold?
7. To whom and at what price?

Mr. RALSTON: I want to ask my hon. friend to drop this question in the form in which it now appears. If you will look at it, Mr. Speaker, you will see that it would involve work which I am sure my hon. friend would not ask to have done at this particular time. He wants to know the pork and bacon purchased by the government from Canada Packers for the use of the army during 1939, 1940, 1941 and 1942; the amounts for each year; the price per pound—and the price per pound varies I think every three months; then he comes to what I believe must be the real text of his question, whether the materials were used entirely for the army and whether any were resold. If my hon. friend would reframe his question, giving particulars of the place or district to which he is referring and also the particular period, I think we could handle the matter all right. As it is now we would have to go to every military district in Canada, as well as to Newfoundland, to get the information for which he asks.

Question dropped.

SHEEP RAISING

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. In view of the rumoured danger of the development of a shortage of wool in Canada, will the minister tell the house what steps his department has taken to prevent the slaughter of ewes?

2. What steps have been taken to import suitable breeding stock?

3. What steps have been taken to assist, through advances of credit or otherwise, those who would go into the sheep business?

4. What has been done in the way of guaranteeing and stabilizing prices of wool and mutton over a period of years?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. No steps of the nature indicated have as yet been taken to avoid the possible development of a shortage of wool in Canada. The Canadian wool situation is at present being considered by the Department of Agriculture and the Wool Administrator in consultation with representatives of the sheep industry.

2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

*INTERNED ANTI-FASCISTS

Mr. QUELCH:

Has the government taken any action to investigate the cases of interned anti-fascists, on their own individual merit, to the end that those held merely on the charge of having been members of the communist party, may be released?

Mr. St. LAURENT: No persons have been interned as anti-fascists, nor are any being held as such. The cases of all internees under regulation 21 of the defence of Canada regulations who have requested a rehearing, or for whom such a request has been made, have been or are being investigated by advisory committees, on the individual merits of each, to the end that each may be dealt with by the Minister of Justice in view of the recommendation of the committee.

NATIONAL LABOUR SUPPLY COUNCIL

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Does the national labour supply council still function?

2. Who are the present members of the council, (a) representatives of industry, (b) representatives of labour?

3. How many meetings have been held by the national labour supply council since November 1, 1941, to date?

4. What matters were referred to the said council from November 1, 1941, to date?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. No.

2, 3 and 4. None.

Explanation: Due to the establishment of the national war labour board and following representations of organized labour, order in council P.C. 2686 was revoked and the functions formerly performed by the national labour supply council are now largely undertaken by the national war labour board and the regional war labour boards.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WOMEN IN WAR WORK

Mrs. NIELSEN:

1. Are women employed by the federal government in organizing women, (a) for war work; (b) to take over civilian duties to release men for the armed forces?

2. If so, how many such women under each of the above categories?

3. Who are such organizers, listing names, addresses or where employed, qualifications, duties and salary of each?

4. Of these women who registered with the voluntary registration bureau of the government, now called national registration division, how many have been placed with, (a) the auxiliary services of the forces; (b) war industries, (c) civilian services?

Mr. THORSON: It would require an enormous amount of correspondence to attempt to answer part 4 of this question, and even then I think it would be impossible to comply with the request. I would ask that part 4 be dropped, and that the remainder of the question stand as an order for return.

Mr. SPEAKER: Parts 1, 2 and 3 stand as an order for return; part 4 dropped.

HOUSING LOANS

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. How many loans each year have been made under the provisions of the National Housing Act since the said act went into operation?

2. How much money was loaned (a) by the financial institutions, (b) by the government, in connection with the said loans in each of the said years, by provinces?

3. During the year 1941, how many loans under the provisions of the National Housing Act were made in the county of Peel?

4. What was the total amount so invested (a) by financial institutions, (b) by the government, in the said county?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—SAVING OF PAPER

Mr. PURDY:

1. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation recently issued a series of advertising booklets under the heading, "Five Years of Achievement"?

2. If so, what is the total cost of this publication, including distribution, and including any of the series not yet distributed?

3. Who is the minister of the crown responsible to parliament for the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

4. Has he taken appropriate steps to curtail further expenses of this corporation for non-essentials?

5. Has any department of the government recently distributed a bulletin stating that—"Every scrap of paper that can be saved and every scrap that can be salvaged will help the war effort"?

6. If so, by what department was this distributed?

7. Have steps been taken to make sure that all departments of the government and government owned or controlled corporations carry out the above suggestions as to saving paper, as well as all savings advocated for private business by government sources?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SECOND VICTORY LOAN—SUBSCRIPTIONS OF OVER $100,000

Mr. MARSHALL:

For a statement showing the names of all persons, firms and corporations, including loan companies, insurance companies and banks, who subscribed $100,000 or more to Canada's second victory loan, setting forth the amount subscribed by each.

Mr. ILSLEY: It has never been the practice to disclose the names of purchasers of bonds, except with the consent of the purchaser, so that I shall have to take exception to this motion. I suggest that if the hon. gentleman would like to know the amount taken by loan companies as a class, or by insurance companies as a class, or by banks as a class, there would be no objection to giving that information. Nor is there any objection to giving the information which has been given in the press releases, because that has been given with the consent of the subscribers. Further than that, however, I would not care to go.

WAR EXCHANGE CONSERVATION ACT
ALLOWANCES FOR DEPRECIATION

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

For a return showing the names of individuals, partnerships or corporations, and the amounts of any special tax credits and/or special allowances for depreciation or depletion agreed to between the Minister of Finance and individuals, partnerships or corporations under the War Exchange Conservation Act, between June 14, 1941, and January 30, 1942.

Mr. ILSLEY: Again in regard to this motion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the hon. gentlemen's attention to the fact that all agreements must be tabled within a short time after they are entered into, and therefore all this information is available to every hon. gentleman in this house. To comply with this motion it would be necessary for the government to make a precis of information which is already before the house; that is the only function the government would be discharging. I will ask, therefore, that the motion be dropped.

GASOLINE RATIONING

Mr. CARDIFF:

For a copy of all orders in council and all regulations made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, the oil controller and/or any other official of the Department of Munitions and Supply with reference to the proposed rationing of gasoline.

TIRE RATIONING

Mr. CARDIFF:

For a copy of all orders in council and all regulations made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, the controller of supplies and/or any other official of the Department of Munitions and Supply with reference to the rationing of tires for motor vehicles.

SUNDAY LABOUR

LAKE ST. JOHN PULP AND PAPER COMPANY PLANT AT DOLBEAU, P.Q.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on the 5th of March the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) read to the house a letter addressed to him on March 3 by Mr. L. Dumais, secretary of the National Catholic Union of the pulp and paper industry, of Dolbeau, informing him that a pulp and paper company had carried on manufacturing operations at that place on Sunday, May 1. The hon. member asked whether the Minister of Justice would take immediate steps to ensure the observance of the law prohibiting Sunday labour.

Mr. Dumais' letter refers to a communication from the Department of Justice addressed to Mr. P. J. Martel of Chicoutimi on January 21 last, informing him that the government had not passed any order in council amending the Lord's Day Act. In this letter the deputy minister of justice added that he had no personal knowledge of the paper industry having been classed as an essential war industry.

It would be a complete answer to the hon. member's question to point out to him that the administration of justice is a provincial matter and that the Lord's Day Act expressly states that no action or prosecution for a violation of the act shall be commenced without the leave of the attorney general for the province in which the offence is alleged to have been committed. However, believing that the hon. member wished to obtain the fullest possible information on the point, not only for himself but for all those who are interested in the question of Sunday observance, I have endeavoured to procure it for him.

The hon. member knows that, notwithstanding the general provisions of the act, section 11 allows the performance on Sunday of any "work of necessity or mercy." In paragraphs (a) to (x) of section 11 various kinds of work are given as examples. Since the outbreak of the war the question has frequently arisen whether the urgent need of certain products was sufficient reason to continue their manufacture on Sundays. So long as the dominion government has not made any specific enactment in the matter, each case is one for the attorney general of the province to decide when, an apparent violation of the act having occurred, he is requested to authorize the taking of an action or a prosecution in the premises. Should he allow proceedings to be taken, the courts will decide the issue.

I am informed that in many instances manufacturers pressed by the Department of Munitions and Supply to increase their output have asked that department whether, in order to do so, they would be allowed to carry on their work on Sundays. Of course, the Department of Munitions and Supply could not give a certificate of immunity to anybody, but the officers of that department could express their opinion as to whether or not the work in question was sufficiently urgent to be classified as "work of necessity or mercy." I am told that in many instances officers of that department have written to manufacturers letters expressing an affirmative opinion and that the bearers of such letters communicated them to the attorney general of the province in which their plants were situated, who accepted the opinion of the Department of Munitions and Supply as sufficient reason for the exercise by him of the discretionary power to deny authorization to prosecute, conferred upon him by section 16 of the act.

I do not know whether or not the company operating the pulp and paper plant at Dolbeau has obtained from the Department of Munitions and Supply a statement of opinion as to the urgency of increasing the volume of its production, but I know in a general way that, wishing to accelerate as much as possible the output of pulp and paper, that department has informed several manufacturers that it considered the urgency sufficiently great to justify their requesting the attorney general of their province not to authorize proceedings against them in respect of work done on Sundays for the purpose of increasing available stocks of their product.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether he will draw the attention of the attorney general of the province of Quebec to the non-essential work performed by the Lake St. John Pulp and Paper Company Limited?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is the duty of the Minister of Justice to take the action requested by the hon. member. Any citizen of a province may draw the attorney general's attention to anything occurring in his province.

(Text) Mr. HOMUTH: In view of the fact that the answer given by the Minister of Justice has a bearing on all industry in Canada, would he give the house a summary in English of the answer he has given, so that all hon. members may be familiar with it?

Mr. St. LAURENT: Perhaps it will suffice if I tell the hon. member that the translation will be printed in the English Debates.

Mr. HOMUTH: Could we not have a synopsis of it?

Mr. St. LAURENT: I can send my hon. friend now a rough translation if he wishes to have it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is all right.

WAR EXPENDITURES

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask the Prime Minister if at this session a special committee will be set up to look into war expenditures? A number of hon. members are anxious that such a committee be formed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it is the intention to have a committee on war expenditures.

Mr. HOMUTH: Will the committee to be set up act as a secret committee, as the last one did, or is it to be one which will function openly so that the people will know what is going on?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member's question might well be put on the order paper.

AIR RAID PRECAUTIONS

CONDITIONS ON PARLIAMENT HILL OWING TO PARTIAL BLACKOUT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which might properly be directed to the Department of Public Works, having reference to the partial blackout as it is applied to the parliament buildings.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is complete.

Mr. HANSELL: Perhaps it is complete. The steps in front of the main building leading down to the promenade are very dangerous at night. Could a little light not be thrown on those steps? Some night somebody is going to have a serious accident there. Will the government attend to the matter?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sure the Minister of Public Works will note what my hon. friend has said and will find a way of affording more light.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASED RATE PER BUSHEL ON WHEAT DELIVERED BY PRODUCERS

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

He said: For the greater part of the past decade wheat has been a difficult and an extremely complicated problem for the dominion government. It has been possible to decide upon each year's programme only after weighing all the factors capable of measurement or accurate appraisal. For several months now this government has given very serious consideration to all phases of our present wheat position and I can say frankly that the decision this year has had to be made in the face of the most difficult set of circumstances which has, I believe, ever confronted this country in regard to wheat.

In arriving at our decision we have most carefully considered the various representations which have been made to us by different groups from the western provinces and have been in almost continuous consultation with advisers of the government as well as between members of the wheat committee of the cabinet and of the whole cabinet. This has resulted in a most comprehensive research into the whole wheat situation. The many recommendations we have received have been carefully analysed and the present decisions have only been arrived at after the most thoughtful consideration of every angle of the problem.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Five major factors have had to be considered. These factors were:

(1) The necessary steps to be taken to improve the position of wheat producers who constitute such a large and important group in Canada, and on whom in large measure depend the well-being of the economy of the prairie provinces as well as of Canada as a whole.

(2) The extent to which the dominion government could act in respect to the wheat problem without detracting from our immediate objectives in respect to the war.

(3) The extent to which we could count on export markets during 1942-43.

(4) The responsibility which we bear to ourselves and to our allies in this war in maintaining a reserve of wheat in Canada sufficient to meet unforeseen contingencies.

(5) The relative importance of wheat production in 1942 as compared to other farm products under the stress of wartime conditions.

While other factors entered into our consideration of our present wheat problem, these five factors emerge as the most significant in relation to the decision which the dominion government had to make. Let me deal briefly with each of these points.

In regard to the position of the wheat industry and wheat producers in the prairie provinces, the government has throughout its consideration of 1942-43 wheat policy, been very sympathetic to, and in fact strongly in favour of additional financial support to wheat producers and the western economy through an enlarged income from wheat. This decision in itself was not difficult to make because the government has been aware that wheat prices were low when Canada entered the present war, and since the outbreak of the war the fixed initial price of wheat under the Canadian Wheat Board Act has been continued at 70 cents per bushel No. 1 northern in store Fort William and Vancouver. Additional assistance in 1941-42 does not alter the government's attitude toward the price of wheat. During these war years production costs have increased for the wheat producer as for practically all primary producers in Canada, and therefore, it is only reasonable that at the proper time an adjustment should be made in the income derived from the production of wheat.

As far as this government is concerned, the only question in regard to this phase of the wheat problem was by how much and in what manner it would be possible to improve the income of wheat producers with due regard to the other obligations of the government in respect to the all-important question of the successful prosecution of the war. No one in Canada, and certainly not the wheat producers of the prairie provinces, suggest that anything should be done in respect to wheat which will in any way limit the capacity of this government to meet the immediate responsibilities and burdens of the war.

In connection with the second point we have had to carefully examine the possibilities of moving our wheat into export trade. Under existing conditions, export markets for Canadian wheat are definitely limited; that is inevitable in the present phase of the war. Our principal market last year was, and this year will be the United Kingdom, and in forecasting our export possibilities we can only see in sight the immediate requirements of the British isles, and rather small exports to other countries.

The government has kept in mind at all times, in addition to these immediate considerations, the more general responsibility which Canada must assume in respect to providing adequate reserves of wheat for the United Kingdom, and our allies and against possible contingencies. At the end of last July Canada had a carryover of 480 million bushels of wheat in all positions, the largest year-end stock of wheat ever held by this country. We expect to have about 400 million bushels of wheat on hand at the end of the present crop year, or when the 1942 crop is ready for harvest. The government believes that this stock of wheat constitutes an adequate reserve of Canadian wheat, and does not feel that Canada can be called upon to maintain wartime reserves in excess of this amount. If we maintain a reserve in these proportions we are doing all that can be expected of us at this stage of the war. In addition to the reserves of wheat which we shall hold in Canada on July 31st next, the United States will have the largest carryover in its history—slightly over 600 million bushels—and it is estimated that Argentina and Australia will hold stocks of 360 million bushels. At the end of next July, the four chief wheat exporting countries will have a carryover of 1,300,000,000 bushels of wheat in addition to the surpluses which may arise from 1942 production. In the face of this situation there should be no anxiety as to the supplies of wheat available in normally exporting countries, and in particular in Canada and the United States.

With permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to place on Hansard a table showing the carryovers of the four chief exporting countries from July 31, 1938 to 1942.

July 31 each year	Canada[1]	United States[2]	Argentina[2]	Australia[2]	Total
1938	25	153	72	50	300
1940	301	282	75	130	788
1941	480	387	175	70	1,112
*1942	400	610	215	145	1,370

[1] Official statistics.
[2] Food research institute.
* Estimated.

Note.—Figures in million bushels.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would indicate, would it not that this is not a special war problem?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes. I would point out particularly that at the end of 1938 the carryover in Canada, the United States, Argentina and Australia amounted to 300 million bushels, but at the end of 1942, and this is a conservative estimate, the carryover of these same countries will have risen to 1,370 million bushels. The government had to give further serious consideration to the relative importance of various farm products in connection with our war effort. No one disputes the value of wheat as a food product; no one disputes the advisability of carrying a substantial reserve of wheat under present conditions; and no one disputes the fact that of all farm products wheat can be most effectively stored. But with 480 million bushels of wheat on hand last July, and with the prospect of 400 million bushels of wheat on hand next July at the time when the 1942 crop will be ready for harvest, and in view of the lack of large export possibilities, wheat production in 1942 cannot be regarded as an extremely urgent matter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Could the minister give the stock in Canada available for export as of February 1?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am not just sure that I can give the figures offhand. I think it would be about 480 million bushels.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister said that that would be the figure on July 31. I am trying to follow his figures and I find it a little difficult. My understanding was that he said there would be a carryover on July 31 of 480 million bushels.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): 400 million bushels.

Mr. CRERAR: 480 million bushels last July.

Mr. GARDINER: 400 million bushels next July.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The statement I am placing on Hansard sets this information out in detail.

As I was saying, wheat production in 1942 cannot be regarded as an extremely urgent matter. This cannot be said, however, in respect to practically all other farm products produced in the prairie provinces. We urgently need more hogs; we urgently need more feed grains; we urgently need more milk, butter and cheese. If the government were to establish priorities in respect to the production of farm products in 1942, it would be necessary to place wheat well down on the list, topped in point of urgency by feed grains, live stock and live stock products. My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, will be dealing with the coarse grain situation but the situation is a most vital one and had to be considered along with our wheat policy. I stress this point deliberately in order to make it clear that an undue expansion in wheat acreage and wheat production in 1942 is not advisable, and at the same time to strongly urge every producer in the prairie provinces to make certain that the government's wheat policy does not influence him one iota to cease, or in any way interfere with his efforts to increase feed grain and live stock production to the limit of his resources.

When the full grain programme for 1942 is before the house it will be seen that the government has made provision for encouraging farm production along the lines most urgently required, and provision will be made whereby wheat producers may benefit from the 1942-43 wheat programme without unduly expanding wheat acreage.

Before dealing with the 1942-43 programme, I would like to briefly review the wheat position in the present crop year, 1941-42.

As I have already noted, Canada ended the crop year 1940-41 with a carryover of 480 million bushels (on July 31, 1941). This was a smaller carryover than we had expected to have earlier in that crop year as it seemed inevitable that our carryover on July 31, 1941, would be about 550 million bushels. As a result of increased exports, mainly in April, Kingdom, total exports in 1940-41 amounted to 230 million bushels, whereas we had expected exports, at best, of about 180 million bushels. This increase in exports to the United Kingdom, substantial flour exports to Britain and other countries, and a somewhat larger domestic demand for wheat made it possible for us to bring our July 31 carryover down to the 480 million bushel level.

The 1941 wheat crop in the prairie provinces and in Ontario was very small. Canadian production in 1941 is now estimated at 299 million bushels, as compared with 540 million bushels harvested in 1940. Despite this the wheat problem has persisted in a very difficult form. The following figures show the quantities of wheat available in Canada in 1940 and 1941:

Carryover, July 31.....	301	480
New crop.....	540	299

Taking carryovers into account, we had 841 million bushels of wheat with which to deal in 1940-41, after harvesting the second largest crop in history. During the present crop year we have had 779 million bushels of wheat with which to deal after harvesting a relatively small crop. These statistics show that the increase in carryover between July 31, 1940 and July 31st, 1941, largely offset decreased production in 1941. In spite of the small crop in 1941 we have only 62 million bushels less wheat to handle during the present crop year, as compared with the previous crop year when production was so high. The house will appreciate from these statistics the extent of the wheat problem for which we had to prepare, and for which we were prepared, in 1941-42. If the 1941 wheat crop had been 400 million bushels instead of 299 million bushels, we would have had to deal with nearly 900 million bushels of wheat during the present crop year. If yields of 1940 had been repeated in 1941, we would have had to deal with over a billion bushels of wheat in Canada.

One of the effects of the small crop harvested in 1941 was to materially ease the grain storage problem in Canada, and the Canadian wheat board was able to rapidly advance delivery quotas during the fall of 1941. The crop year commenced with a general delivery quota of 5 bushels per authorized acre; on October 7th the general quota was raised to 8 bushels per authorized acre; on October 16th to 12 bushels per authorized acre; and on November 21st to 15 bushels per authorized acre. Finally, on December 6th, quotas were removed and all delivery points in the prairie provinces were placed on an "open delivery" basis. In addition to the increases in the general quota, the delivery quotas at individual stations were raised throughout the fall months as soon as local storage permitted.

The dominion government undertook to limit deliveries in all of Canada to 230 million bushels, which would mean about 223 million bushels deliverable in the prairie provinces. Since the prairie wheat crop amounted to 279 million bushels in 1941, it was apparent from the commencement of the new crop year, that marketings would not exceed the maximum established by the dominion government, making it possible to take delivery of all surplus wheat in the prairie provinces. It is expected that total deliveries for the crop year 1941-42 will amount to about 200 million bushels, which will be well within the limit prescribed for the prairie provinces.

Up until February 27th country deliveries of wheat had amounted to 166 million bushels, leaving a balance of about 34 million bushels to be delivered before July 31st, 1942.

Exports are running somewhat higher than for the corresponding period of 1940-41. Up to February 27th export clearances of wheat had amounted to 84 million bushels as compared with 65 million bushels for the corresponding period of last year. In addition during the six months ending January, flour exports in terms of wheat had amounted to 22 million bushels this crop year, as compared with 15 million bushels for the same months in 1940-41. It may be said, therefore, that our exports of wheat and flour are running about 25 million bushels ahead of the same period in 1940-41. We must remember, however, that exports were very light up to this time a year ago, and did not run into substantial volume until the last four months of the crop year. As the crop year progresses, therefore, it is very likely that our exports will be less favourable as compared with a year ago. I would not attempt to forecast our wheat exports for the crop year 1941-42 because the volume of these exports depends so largely upon the requirements of the United Kingdom and the ability to provide the necessary shipping.

In announcing the government's 1942-43 wheat programme, I shall deal with that part of the programme which comes within the jurisdiction of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Following my statement, my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), will deal with other forms of assistance which will be administered by his department.

I wish to make it quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that the announcements to be made by my colleague and this announcement by me are closely related. There are not two plans but one plan carefully worked out, each in relation to the other on the basis of the needs as we see them of the whole of the western provinces.

In so far as the wheat programme is concerned, no attempt has been made to formulate a long term policy. This would be virtually impossible in the light of the many factors which have a direct bearing on our policy at the present time but which may or may not exist after the cessation of hostilities. In the studies which have been made in regard to the whole agricultural policy to be followed in the west, a possible long term programme has been reviewed but, as I say, under present circumstances it is not possible to implement a programme which might be dislocated within six months of its announcement.

It is my responsibility to announce the government's decision in respect to the price which will be paid to the farmers for wheat in 1942-43, the volume of wheat which we propose to accept in that crop year and decisions which have been made in regard to price of certain coarse grains and flaxseed.

The government proposes that the fixed initial price for wheat delivered in 1942-43 under authorized delivery quotas shall be 90 cents per bushel, basis No. 1 northern wheat in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver.

In reaching its decision in regard to the fixed price per bushel of wheat, the government has taken into account the position of producers who, by virtue of geographical location, and established farm practice, must depend mainly upon wheat production in their farm operations. Producers in this position have not been able to take as much advantage as producers in other areas of remunerative markets which have existed for live stock and live stock products. With due regard to the percentage of total wheat acreage in the prairie provinces which is normally seeded to wheat in these areas, the government feels that an increase in the per bushel price is an effective way of assisting those who need assistance most.

It is not the intention of the government that domestic buyers of wheat and wheat products shall be deprived of the protection of the price control policy.

Accordingly, the Canadian wheat board will continue to sell wheat to domestic buyers for flour or other use at a price which conforms to the spirit and intention of the maximum prices regulations and is an appropriate price in relation to the domestic selling prices of goods made from wheat or in the production of which wheat is used.

The wartime prices and trade board, in the discharge of its responsibilities under the maximum prices regulations and the wartime prices and trade regulations, will have the duty of determining the price at which wheat will be sold to domestic buyers in accordance with these principles.

The wartime prices and trade board will discharge this duty from time to time after consultation with the Canadian wheat board.

Since the resolution on the order paper on March 5 indicated an increase in the fixed initial price of wheat, the Canadian wheat board has taken steps to prevent any speculative profits that might arise from the government's decision and to that end sent the following wire to the secretary of the Winnipeg grain exchange before the opening of the market on March 6:

J. T. Irving,
Secretary, Winnipeg Grain Exchange,
Winnipeg, Man.

A resolution placed on the order paper for March 5th 1942 indicates the government's intention to increase the initial price of wheat. This is an official notification of our intention that all open wheat futures will be adjusted to the new level of wheat prices on or before July 31st 1942 and that all open wheat futures will be cleared on or before this date at the closing prices of Thursday March 5th, that is May wheat futures at 79¼ cents and or July wheat futures at 80⅝ cents. If this action is not taken until July 31st suitable carrying charges will be allowed to holders of cash wheat for the elapsed period during the month of July. Unhedged cash wheat will be adjusted on the same basis. In the meantime holders of cash wheat as well as futures may continue to carry on with their normal business bearing in mind the above.

The Canadian Wheat Board

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the minister approached that portion of his remarks with respect to the grain exchange, he suggested that there might be a deficiency between the initial price of wheat and the price fixed by the wartime prices and trade board. He has not made it quite clear who is to absorb that deficiency, if any. I think he ought to tell the Canadian people on whom that burden is to rest. Is it to be on the millers, on the bakers, on the general public by way of some increase, or is it to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund; and how much?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Investigations have been in progress and are continuing as to the point raised by the leader of the opposition, and an announcement will be made just as soon as a decision is arrived at.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When will that be?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Well, that should be shortly.

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before this bill goes through?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am not sure of that, but I expect that it will be shortly.

In announcing the government's decision in regard to price, I may once again reiterate the fact that this new price is not to be considered as warranting undue expansion in wheat acreage. I will go one step further. This is the highest government-guaranteed price for Canadian wheat at any time since the last war. Wheat producers must accept the responsibility of keeping wheat acreage at reasonable levels.

In proposing a price of 90 cents per bushel for No. 1 northern in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver, the government is going as far as it feels it can go, with due regard to its immediate and unprecedented financial responsibilities in connection with the prosecution of the war. I need not remind this house of the present financial commitments of the government in respect to wheat. The annual report of the Canadian wheat board, recently tabled in this house, showed on July 31, 1941, deficits in respect to 1938, 1939 and 1940 crops amounting to $79,972,814.45. A substantial proportion of Canadian wheat supplies is held by the Canadian wheat board and is a direct responsibility of the dominion government.

In addition to these exceedingly large commitments in respect to wheat, the new fixed price will add materially to the government's obligations in respect to wheat during 1942-43.

In addition to increasing the fixed price per bushel of wheat, the government proposes to substantially increase authorized deliveries of wheat in the prairie provinces and British Columbia during 1942-43 to a total of 280 million bushels.

This figure is based upon estimated domestic and export demand but it is extremely difficult to accurately forecast exports a year and a half in advance. The government is guided by estimates of exports and domestic demand and is fixing authorized deliveries at 280 million bushels. This figure will not be changed on the basis of later estimates of the 1942-43 demand for Canadian wheat. The government thinks it is more satisfactory from the producers' standpoint to name a definite figure for marketings in 1942-43, rather than make it conditional upon factors which can only be estimated.

The authorized deliveries of 280 million bushels will apply only to the prairie provinces and part of British Columbia. The government does not propose to regulate marketings in eastern Canada because of the large demand for soft wheat for milling purposes, and because of the volume of grain required for live stock feeding in eastern Canada.

In the main, the government's proposal to permit marketings of 280 million bushels in the prairie provinces and British Columbia during 1942-43 was designed to limit such marketings to about the quantity which will go into export trade or domestic consumption in Canada. As a result, the government does not anticipate much change in year-end stocks on July 31, 1943, as compared with stocks which will be carried on July 31, 1942.

Delivery Quotas.—As long as maximum authorized deliveries are established for the prairie provinces, it will be necessary to provide for the limitation of farm deliveries. This is the only way in which total deliveries may be regulated.

The government, in consultation with the Canadian wheat board, proposes that individual deliveries in the prairie provinces and British Columbia will be based upon authorized acreage of each individual producer, as established in 1941-42. On this basis the authorized acreage of the prairie provinces and British Columbia for delivery purposes will be about 20,000,000 acres.

The per-bushel quotas to be estimated on authorized acreage in 1942-43 will be determined in an equitable manner when 1942 seeded acreages are known and when the general pattern of the 1942 crop is established. It is the desire of the government and the board that the simplest possible quota plan be established for 1942-43, consistent with the obligation of distributing marketings of 280 million bushels equitably among approximately 240,000 wheat farmers in the prairie provinces.

In connection with establishing delivery quotas it will be necessary for all wheat producers who are operating new farms in 1942; or who are operating more land in 1942 than in 1941; or who are operating less land in 1942 than in 1941; or who did not take out permits in 1941, to advise the Canadian wheat board at the earliest possible moment of changes in their farms or of the fact that they do not hold 1941 permits. This is necessary in order that authorized acreages may be properly established and in order that there be as little delay as possible in issuing permits to deliver wheat in 1942-43.

Before leaving the matter of the price of wheat for 1942-43, and authorized marketings, I would like to indicate broadly the effect of the new price upon potential income in the prairie provinces. I say "potential" for the reason that we cannot be assured of how much wheat will be produced in 1942-43 when the new price basis becomes effective. In 1941-42 the dominion government permitted the marketing of 230 million bushels, which at the fixed price of 70 cents per bushel provided for farm income from wheat of about $125,000,000. Since a very short crop was harvested in 1941, wheat deliveries will probably not exceed 200 million bushels, and the return to wheat producers will be about $106,000,000, exclusive of other forms of assistance.

In raising the per-bushel return from wheat and the amount of wheat permitted to be marketed from 230 million bushels to 280 million bushels, the potential wheat income of the prairie provinces will be raised from $125,000,000 in 1941-42 to about $205,000,000 in 1942-43, provided the full amount of the authorized marketings is available. The government's proposals in connection with price and authorized marketings therefore involve a very substantial increase in the income of wheat producers. When this increase in income from wheat is placed alongside of a very large income which is now accruing to producers of the prairie provinces from the sale of live stock, live-stock products, and grains other than wheat, western Canada should be assured of a very substantial farm income in 1942-43 provided crop conditions are reasonably good. If farm revenues from sources other than wheat increase moderately and if an average crop is harvested in 1942-43 farm revenues should reach $475,000,000 in the prairie provinces during the coming crop year, as compared with about $350,000,000 in 1941-42, exclusive of direct dominion government subsidies in both years.

So far I have dealt mainly with that phase of the government's grain programme which deals primarily with the desire of the government to increase farm income and add greater security to the position of the wheat producer. I now wish to submit three additional and important proposals for the particular purpose of securing increased production of three farm products which are necessary to our national war effort.

These proposals are:

1. That a minimum price level for barley be established. This minimum price level will be 60c. per bushel basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur for Winnipeg barley futures as well as for all cash barley, basis No. 2 C.W. 6 row at 60 cents. The Canadian wheat board will be empowered to carry out this policy and regulations will be prepared in due course.

2. That a minimum price level for oats be established. This minimum price level will be 45 cents per bushel basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur for Winnipeg oats futures as well as for all cash oats, basis No. 2 C.W. at 45 cents. As in the case of barley the Canadian wheat board will be empowered to administer this policy and regulations will be issued in due course.

3. That the price of flaxseed be fixed at $2.25 per bushel basis No. 1 C.W., flaxseed in store Fort William/Port Arthur. The dominion government will empower the Canadian wheat board to purchase and handle all flaxseed delivered by producers in Canada in 1942-43. Trading in futures and cash flax will be stopped on all Canadian markets at some date to be determined. An order in council has been passed which prohibits any person under very heavy penalty from moving flaxseed from any licensed or unlicensed elevator or mill in Canada, and also prohibits any operator of any elevator or mill from utilizing flaxseed without the written authority of the Canadian wheat board. Needless to say there will be no interference with the processing of flaxseed in Canada. In the near future regulations will be issued for the handling of flaxseed under the new plan.

In connection with the minimum prices being established for oats and barley the government wishes to give a measure of assurance and security to those producers who co-operate in producing an ample supply of feed grain in 1942 in a patriotic endeavour to maintain our live stock production at high levels. Producers generally will face the new crop year with the assurance that whatever the production of oats and barley is in 1942, the market will be supported on the basis I have outlined.

Mr. McNEVIN: Would the minister state how that compares with the present price?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think it is a few cents below the present price.

The government's proposal in connection with flaxseed is designed to stimulate maximum production in 1942. Canada and the United States must take steps to increase their supply of vegetable oils to replace sources of supply now cut off by the war. Flaxseed is not an easy crop to produce. The seed is expensive, land must be well cultivated and flax is not ordinarily a high-yielding crop. With these facts in mind the government feels that a relatively high price should be established for flaxseed in 1942 and consequently has decided on the $2.25 per bushel basis.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the reason that trading in flax futures is to be forbidden?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The handling of flax is being made a monopoly of the Canadian wheat board, to avoid speculative profits by people in possession of flax acquired at very much lower prices.

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: Why not also wheat and all other grains?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Corresponding procedure has been adopted to prevent speculation in wheat, for the same reason.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Except the closing of the exchange.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not think the closing or holding open of the exchange has anything to do with the question.

Mr. PERLEY: It might be a debatable subject.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Possibly. In any event I do not think it is relevant to the matter I am placing before the house at the moment.

No participation certificates will be issued in connection with marketings of oats, barley and flaxseed. Any losses accruing to the government from these operations will be charged to the consolidated revenue fund and in the case of flaxseed any profits resulting from the government's operations will accrue to the credit of the same fund. In the case of oats and barley, any profits will accrue to this fund to apply against government disbursements under the general programme.

When the grain policy which I have outlined is supplemented by the statement which will be made by the Minister of Agriculture, I am sure that the house will agree that this is the most comprehensive grain programme ever presented to parliament. As I have said each step, each stage, has been carefully considered and the implications thoroughly worked out. Broadly, the programme which I have placed before the house seeks to give assistance where it is needed, to give greater assurance to the farmers of western Canada, to indicate the lines of production which should be emphasized in 1942-43, and finally to facilitate the production of needed farm products. I have every confidence that our programme is practical and will commend itself in the present emergency, and meet with the full cooperation of grain producers of western Canada.

Mr. DONNELLY: Has there been any floor or ceiling fixed in regard to rye?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No. I think my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, will be dealing with matters in connection with rye in his presentation.

It is my intention as soon as the principle of this legislation is approved by the house on second reading to ask that the bill be referred to the standing committee on agriculture for consideration and report.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): We have just listened to a very interesting statement and review of the situation from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). To one who had advocated many of the principles now adopted for three or four years or more it is very interesting. As the minister has given a multiplicity of figures and has stated that his end of the question, so to speak, is related to what the Minister of Agriculture is going to say, I now move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

WHEAT

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, respecting wheat acreage reduction.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when the measure which has just been moved to second reading by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr MacKinnon) and the one which I am about to move to second reading were in the resolution stage, it was arranged in the house that these bills should be brought to the point where they would appear on the order paper for second reading; that statements then would be made by the ministers concerned, and that in the discussion following some leeway would be allowed in order that it might not be necessary to deliver three speeches on the three bills that will be before the house. In accordance with that understanding it is my intention at the moment to discuss the three measures, one of which has been advanced on the order paper for second reading and the other two of which now stand for second reading. I shall try to confine my remarks to matters which may concern one or other of these three bills, as they may relate one to another.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) has just moved the adjournment of the debate on one of these measures. I presume that he and other hon. members are in a position to speak on the second reading of either this or the other bill, that someone will move the adjournment of the debate on this measure in due course, and that we shall attempt as far as possible to have only the one discussion dealing with all matters having to do with the wheat policy.

The action being taken in the house this session in relation to the handling of wheat and other grains is along the line of the policy laid down at the beginning of the war. I mention "other grains" because in his statement the Minister of Trade and Commerce dealt with the handling not only of wheat but also of coarse grains and flax. The discussion therefore will deal with matters other than wheat. The bill providing for wheat acreage reduction also has to do with the production of coarse grains, so that it will be possible to discuss matters having to do with other farm products as well as wheat.

The action we are now taking is the final step in a policy which was laid down at the beginning of the war and which has been consistently adhered to up to the present time. It was stated then that before every war difficulties developed for agriculture, in countries which finally become involved in the war, and more particularly in countries which are suppliers of food commodities to the nations participating in the war. For that reason we in the Department of Agriculture in Canada have been very much concerned during the last two and a half years in developing the agricultural policy of this country to a point where increased prices and quantity would give reasonable returns to farmers. It was realized that prices of farm products were very low before the war. They were low during the first five-year period of preparation for war in Europe from 1930 to 1934. They were not quite so low during the second five-year period from 1935 to 1939. During the two years since the beginning of war prices have gradually advanced on all farm products excepting wheat. There are reasons why wheat should be the last to advance in price.

It will be remembered that just before war was declared, wheat had reached the low level of about 50 cents a bushel. Immediately following the declaration of war wheat gradually began to advance in price, and continued to do so until the spring of 1940. It reached the level of approximately 90 cents a bushel. After the fall of France, the price of wheat dropped very rapidly to the level of about 60 cents a bushel. That drop occurred in a very few days, and then the government of Canada, through the wheat board, pegged the price at 70 cents a bushel, where it has remained ever since.

I cite these facts with regard to wheat in order to indicate that when it was expected that France would continue in the war and that the battles of this war would be fought on the plains of northern France and in Belgium, as was the case in the last war, it was thought that there would be a fairly rapid advance in the price of wheat and that in due course wheat farmers would obtain reasonable prices for their product. But the war has not developed in that way. Up to the present time we have not been able to choose the battlefields. Our enemy has been choosing them, and during the period of our preparation we have not been feeding the people we expected to. The result is that there has not been a rise in the demand for wheat, because those great agricultural areas are still producing.

From the very beginning of the war it was realized that if farmers in Canada were to be able to maintain themselves and develop agriculture to the point where it could take its proper place in providing food for allied countries, prices in due course must advance. Very early in the war we embarked upon a policy of trying to establish floors under various farm products. The first product under which we were able to establish a floor was hogs. That floor was established by entering into an agreement with the British government in the fall of 1939, the first fall of the war. The second product under which we were able to establish a floor was cheese; it was established in the spring of 1940, when a price of 14 cents a pound at Montreal was agreed upon with the British government. The third product under which we were able to establish a floor was wheat, when we pegged it at 70 cents in 1940. The fourth product was butter for which in the spring of 1941 we were able to establish a price of approximately 30 cents a pound for that summer. Finally, toward the fall of 1941, we were able to establish a floor under eggs, by making an arrangement with Britain under which we shipped eggs at 28 cents in certain of the summer months and 32 cents in the winter months, which prices were increased a short time ago to 31 and 35 cents a dozen.

So that down to the fall of 1941 we were able to establish floors for various farm products, and I should like to place on Hansard a table indicating the range of prices which brought about the result I have just indicated. For example, from 1930 to 1934 the average price of wheat was 74·2 cents a bushel. For the next five-year period the average price was 96·5 cents. In 1939-40 the price was 76·5; in 1940-41 it was 74 cents, while the average price for the period from 1926 to 1929 was $1.41·7. I am stating the average prices for the period 1926-29 in order that I may say that I believe it has been the established policy of organized agriculture, from one end of Canada to the other, that the government should have as its objective the establishment of prices for farm products in Canada equal at least to the level of farm prices for the average period between 1926 and 1929.

Now, the average price for wheat in the period 1926-29 was about $1.41 per bushel. I have before me a list of prices for other years, and I would ask that when these figures are placed on Hansard they appear in tabulated form, as they appear in my notes, so that they may be more intelligible to hon. members. The tabulation is as follows:

	c. bus.	c. bus.	c. bus.	c. bus.	c. bus.	c. bus.

Barley 1Fd. (Winnipeg).....	38·7	49·7	42·5	44·0	73·6	64·8

These figures, it will be noted, are for the crop years, and the prices are Winnipeg prices or what are more generally known as Fort William prices.

The table showing the figures for other farm products gives the prices for the calendar years. They are as follows:

	Calendar year

(1) Highest wholesale jobbing price during basic period.
(2) F.O.B. country shipping point.
(3) Spot cash delivered Montreal. This price 2 to 3 cents lower than wholesale quotation.
(4) For greater part of year price was 14·4 cents under contract, plus 1·6 cents Dominion bonus, plus 2 cents provincial bonus, plus Dominion quality premiums which average 1 cent pound for No. 1 cheese—Total, 19 cents.

I place these prices on record to emphasize the fact that while the prices of farm products have been going up, during the first two years of the war, on an average during the second year of the war they were much lower than the average prices for the period 1926-29.

I have placed on record another set of figures, because they demonstrate something else. We will have in mind the fact that ceiling prices have been placed on certain farm commodities. Those ceiling prices are set out in the tables I have placed on Hansard, and I direct the attention of hon. members particularly to them.

May I make these further comments with respect to the ceiling prices. It will be noted that while the ceiling price for oats has been placed at 51·5 cents, the average for the 1926-29 period was 59·7. The ceiling on barley is 64·8, and the average for the period I have indicated was 73·6. No ceiling prices have been placed on wheat or cattle or hogs. However a ceiling of 35·3 cents has been placed on butter, as compared with 38·2 for the period 1926-29. The ceiling price on cheese is 25 cents, as compared with the average of 18·9 cents for the period indicated. The ceiling on eggs stands at 46 cents, compared with 48·2 cents.

I believe it will be found on examination of these figures that in so far as they have been established on products other than grain the ceiling prices are almost the same as the average prices found in the 1926-29 period. When one takes into consideration the increased volume, it will be realized that these products probably bring a higher net income to the farmer than they did at the average price between 1926-29.

There are certain farm products on which no ceiling prices have been established. In this list are wheat, cattle and hogs. No ceiling has been established upon those products as sold by the farmers; but there has been a ceiling established on beef, on pork, and on bread. Although it is not true of bread, it is true of beef and pork that the ceilings established on these products will make possible a price which will be somewhat higher than the average prices for hogs and cattle in the period 1926-29.

I wish now to make a statement to bring to the attention of hon. members the present position of agriculture. I have been speaking of the condition in which agriculture was at the end of the second year of the war. We are now six months into the third year of the war. May I say that there has been a higher floor placed under farm products since the beginning of the third year of the war. The floor prices for the third year of the war are higher than they were in 1941.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has just stated that for wheat the advance or floor is to be 90 cents. That is a much higher advance than we had as a floor under wheat during the first two years of the war. He has also announced that the floor under oats will be 45 cents a bushel. May I point out that down to the present time there has been no floor under oats. This simply assures that any farmer who grows oats, whether in eastern or western Canada, will obtain a price based upon the floor of 45 cents a bushel at Fort William. The floor under barley is now 60 cents. In the past there has been no floor under barley. It will be noted, therefore, that for the third crop year of the war there has been established a floor of 60 cents under barley.

The only floor we have had under beef since the beginning of the war has been the agreement with the United States under which we offer our product to the market in the United States at approximately the United States price, less the reduced duty upon cattle going into that country. During recent weeks and at the present time that has given us a floor under cattle, at Toronto, of $9.90. This price is above the average of the period at which we have been aiming.

The price of hogs is $11.63 at Toronto. This is approximately the level at which we had been aiming under our policy of the first two years. Butter is 35¼ cents per pound, which is just about three cents below that average level of 1926-29. Cheese is 25 cents per pound, just a little more than six cents above that average level. Eggs are 32 cents, somewhat below that average level of 1926-29. This brings live stock products, on the average, to approximately the 1926-29 level. In the case of flax, which was dealt with to-day, the average price for that period was, I think, $2.05 a bushel, so that the price which will prevail in 1942 of $2.25 is 20 cents a bushel above the average price for the four-year period 1926-29.

Let me repeat that wheat and coarse grains are the two products which we have not yet advanced to prices which bear favourable comparison with the average prices for 1926-29. The fact that coarse grains have not advanced to the 1926-29 level is not so serious a problem from the point of view of the farmer as is the fact that wheat has not advanced to the level of 1926-29. The reason is that by far the greater part of all coarse grains grown in Canada are fed on the farms where they are grown. Those which are not fed on the farms where they are grown are being transported at the present time from one farm to another, whether it be an adjoining farm or a farm at the other end of Canada.

If it is a farm at the other end of Canada, the government is paying a very considerable part of the freight rate to move it from the one farm to the other. So that the prices of coarse grains in themselves do not play as important a part in the building up of income for the farmer as do products which are produced through feeding coarse grains, such as, butter, cheese, hogs, cattle, and so on. These products, occupying the position that they do in the price level, make it possible for the farmer to grow coarse grains and dispose of them indirectly at a price which approximates the price of 1926-29.

But the wheat growers are in a different class. They are growing a product which is used largely for the purpose of making bread or for human consumption. The price obtained for this product is the only income which the wheat farmer can obtain for by far the greater part of his investment and labour.

May I say that the prices which I have given to this house do not tell the whole story. When I say that to-day we are producing in Canada more than twice as many hogs as we produced in the last year before the war, you will realize that price does not tell the whole story in relation to the income obtained in Canada from hogs. When I say that there has been an increase in the production of nearly every other farm product since the beginning of the war, you will realize that volume as well as price plays a considerable part in the return which the farmer receives for the things which he has to sell.

The result is that the total farm income for 1941, including assistance given by federal and provincial governments—this includes acreage payments or subsidies paid for the production of hogs in Ontario and Nova Scotia, subsidies on cheese in Ontario and Quebec, and premiums paid by this government on cheese—taking all these into consideration, the result is that the total farm income in 1941 was $921 million as compared with an average of $966 million for the four-year period 1926-29. I cite these figures in order to emphasize that our farms across Canada drew an income in 1941 of $921 million as against an average income for the four years at which we have been aiming, namely, 1926 to 1929, of $966 million.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the minister a breakdown of that $921 million?

Mr. GARDINER: No, but I am going on to deal with it as related to wheat.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has the minister the figures for 1939-40?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: I gave the prices for all years.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Have you the total figures?

Mr. GARDINER: Not at the moment, but I know they are considerably lower than that. This means that the annual average return per farm for the 1926-29 period was $1,368, while the average for 1941 was $1,245. A few more farms were being operated in the 1941 period than in the 1926-29 period. I would ask the house to contrast these returns, including those from wheat farming, along with all others, with wheat itself.

The average annual return for wheat in 1926-29 was $405 million, whereas the return in 1941, including all acreage payments, was only $210 million. That is, the return for wheat in 1941 was just a little more than half the average return in 1926-29. The average annual return for all farm products other than wheat during the 1926-29 period was $561 million, whereas the return in 1941 was $711 million. On the one hand, you have one product produced by the farmers of Canada, the income from which dropped from $405 million to $210 million. On the other hand, you have another set of products produced by the farmers of Canada, the income from which in the same period increased from $561 to $711 million. The annual return per farm in the first period was $795, whereas in 1941 it was $961. These figures leave wheat out of the picture. In other words, the return from products outside wheat in 1941 was better than the return in 1926-29, whereas the return from wheat in 1941 was only a little better than fifty per cent of the return in 1926-29. I should like hon. members to keep this fact in mind when we are dealing with the assistance that is to be given to wheat growers by means of the increase in the advance mentioned a few moments ago by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and also under the provisions of the two bills to which before I sit down I am going to ask the house to give second reading.

It is to improve the position of the farmer who depends largely upon wheat that the advance on wheat has been increased from 70 to 90 cents. This, however, will only improve the position of the wheat farmer, on 280 million bushels of wheat, being the maximum of which we will receive delivery under the advance of 20 cents per bushel, by an increase in revenue of a maximum of $56 million, which will still leave the wheat farmer at least $176 million below the 1926-29 level. If we add the $20 million which he will receive under wheat acreage reduction and the estimated $10 million under prairie farm assistance, he will still be $146 million below the 1926-29 level.

As I say, that part of the farmer's operations which is related to wheat will be down by about $176 million. We are going to try to improve this position by taking two steps. We are going to pay $2 an acre for wheat acreage reduction, which on the basis of our 1941 experience will bring $20 million. You will naturally ask me how that improves the position of the wheat farmer. Well, it would not if the government were prepared to take all the wheat the farmer could grow. But we are saying to him: No matter how good your crop is, we are going to take only 280 million bushels of wheat this year. It is quite a common thing in western Canada to produce on the average 15 bushels to the acre, and an average of 15 bushels to the acre on 20 million acres will produce 300 million bushels of wheat. It is possible therefore that if the farmers seeded 29 million acres in wheat, as some estimate they did in 1940, and grew even less than 15 bushels to the acre, they might have a very considerable amount of wheat which during this year they would not be able to market. So that the government is saying to the farmer, "we are prepared to pay $2 an acre for a reduction in wheat acreage, which may net you less income than the wheat would."

I should like to correct an impression that seems to have been abroad throughout Canada during this last year that this government was paying for summer-fallow. This government was not paying for summer-fallow last year. We were paying the farmer to reduce his wheat acreage. The discussion in the house last session by those who were in favour of the policy which was then brought before the house was to the effect that we had an enormous carryover, this was referred to by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon, a carryover which induced many of us to say last year that by the end of the crop year 1941-42, on July 31 next, we might have an amount of wheat on hand very much in excess of what the figures now indicate will be carried over. I think there were a few who prophesied a carryover of 700 million bushels, and some prophesied that we might even run close to the billion bushel mark. But with a short crop, and the reduced acreage under the wheat acreage reduction plan of last year, we are going to be down to about 400 million bushels at the end of this present crop year. We helped to bring about that reduction through a wheat acreage reduction policy.

The government still feels that it would be a mistake in this third year of the war to put the wheat acreage back to where it was in 1940. There is a difference of opinion as to what the wheat acreage was in 1940. Statistics have estimated that it was something over 27 million acres. The wheat board, I think, basing the figures on their permits, have figured it at something over 29 million acres, and the prairie farm assistance organization of the Department of Agriculture have estimated that the reduction from 1940 was approximately 9 million acres, which would place the total at about 29 million. So that if the wheat board's estimate of the average for 1940 is correct, and if our reduction figure, the actual amount of reduced acreage on which we shall be paying, is correct the wheat acreage at the present time should be somewhere around 20 or 21 million acres. It is the desire of the government this year to attempt to hold it at around 20 or 21 million acres. I want to emphasize that, because I noticed a newspaper article the other day in which it was suggested that the present act raised the proposed acreage from 65 to 80 per cent of 1940. That is not the intention of the present act, nor is it in accordance with the terms of the present act. The 80 per cent in the present act has only to do with farmers who in 1940 put practically all their land into wheat. On those particular farms they are only allowed to start their reduction from 80 per cent and work from there down, to earn the $2 an acre that is paid to those who put their reduced wheat acreage into summer-fallow or into coarse grains. Last year we paid $4 an acre when the acres. Last year we paid $4 an acre when the acreage taken out of wheat was put into summer-fallow, and this year we are paying only $2 an acre. Last year we paid $2 an acre on all coarse grains including flax. This year we are paying $2 on all coarse grains excluding flax. In other words we are paying $2 on the rye which was mentioned while the Minister of Trade and Commerce was speaking, but we are not paying $2 on flax because the government is prepared to guarantee a price of $2.25 a bushel for flax which it is hoped will induce the production of all the flax that is required.

It might be asked why we are anxious to have an increase in the production of flax and an increase in the production of coarse grains this year. The reason is found in what has been happening in the war in recent months. We had lengthy discussions last year as to the amount of coarse grains that would be required, and whether we could get rid of all our coarse grains if grown in the quantities per acre in which they are sometimes grown. We also had lengthy discussions on the question whether we should increase the production of flax. I think I am correct when I say that the flax which we did produce last year was more than twice the amount required to keep the crushers which we have in Canada running, so that if nothing had happened which we did not expect at that time probably those who were then arguing on the other side would have turned out to be right. But many things have happened. Japan has taken possession of by far the greater part of the areas from which vegetable oils come, and immediately Japan took possession of those areas vegetable oils were not available to the allies. Those allies included all the democracies fighting on our side in this war. The United States will suffer from a shortage of oil, Canada will suffer from a shortage of oil, Great Britain will suffer from a shortage of oil, and so will all the other countries fighting on our side. The appeal is made to us to produce animal fats in the northern part of this continent, where it is very difficult to produce vegetable oils. We can produce more flax and soya beans. We can produce sunflowers from which oil can be taken. But we can produce more animal fats through increasing our hogs and dairy products and even through the production of beef. So we are making an appeal to our people this year, by putting a floor under the price of oats and barley; offering $2 an acre on land converted from wheat to coarse grains in order that we may produce animal fats to take the place of the vegetable oils which for the time being we are not going to be able to get. We are asking for more flax to increase vegetable oils. That is the reason for our action in that regard. It will be realized at once that the proposal does cut down somewhat on the return which the wheat farmer will get from the production of wheat. We are asking him to transfer from the production of wheat into the production of coarse grains and flax and hope he will make up by that means some, if not all, of the $146 million he is still below the average 1926-29 level.

I do not know whether members of the house fully understand the situation in western Canada, but I am quite certain that many of those outside the house who discussed the question and who have not been in that part of the country do not understand the problem which there is in western Canada. If you draw a line from Morden in the southern part of Manitoba straight to Lloydminster, which is on the boundary line between Alberta and Saskatchewan, up near the North Saskatchewan river, and then draw another straight line from there down to Calgary, and then from Calgary down to the United States boundary line, you will have mapped out south of that line what is known as the Palliser triangle in which it is difficult to produce anything in great volume except wheat. That is because of the nature of the soil, and because, too, of the climate in that particular area.

The important fact is that a million people are living south of that line. South of that line you have cities such as Regina and Saskatoon in Saskatchewan, and, over in the province of Alberta, Calgary, and many other smaller cities and towns in all the provinces. In that area, too, is a vast agricultural population. It is a greater agricultural area in one block than can be found in any other continuous block in Canada. When people are talking about closing up that area, as some do, they are talking about taking care of a million people; and if they are proposing to take care only of those who are on the farms, and on farms upon which only wheat can be grown to advantage, they are going to be asked to take care of at least half a million people. It is not so easy, therefore, to do as some people seem to suppose. They say, "Let them stop growing wheat while the war is on." But there is no way in which these farmers can make a living unless they can grow wheat, and if they cannot be left where they are they must be taken somewhere else where a living can be found for them.

With that picture in front of us, may I say that it is for these people particularly that twenty cents a bushel has been added to the advance which was placed upon wheat. Of course those who grow wheat in the districts just outside the area to the north will benefit to some extent, but that is not where the great bulk of wheat which flows out of western Canada comes from. It comes from the area to the south. As to the others, they are not only getting the twenty cents a bushel for the limited amount of wheat which they grow, but they are receiving an increased price for their live-stock products; increased returns for their coarse grains, if they have a surplus to sell; and in addition to that, what every farmer in western Canada is proud to do at the present time, they are serving the allies. It was not the $4 an acre which was paid for land taken out of wheat and put into summer-fallow, or the $2 an acre for land which was taken out of wheat and put into coarse grains, which induced the farmers of western Canada to do something which has not been done by any farming population anywhere else in the world either since this war started or before it—to take almost one-third of the acreage out of any one crop and to put it to other use. It was not because they were going to make money by doing so—they were not—but because they were told it would help to win the war if they did do it, and they did it for that purpose. As I said last year when we were asking them to do it, it took at least a hundred million dollars out of their pockets, and we did not by any means manage to put all of it back in. We attempted to do so, it is true, but the poor crops of last year made it impossible. Not all of what was taken out went back by any indirect means. But this year again all these farmers are going to rise to the appeal which is made by this house, by the government of Canada, but more particularly by the British government and by the other allied countries by whose side we are fighting, to produce live-stock products in even greater quantity than they were produced last year. We have to do that if we are to meet the programme which has been marked out for us. We are asked to produce 600 million pounds of Wiltshire sides, to be placed at Saint John or Montreal to be shipped to Britain during this third year of the war. That is, we shall have to send each week four times as much as we sent to Britain in each week of the last year before the war.

This will give you some idea of the enormous task which the farmers of Canada have attempted. As you know, the hog year begins on the first of October, so that we are now in the sixth month of the operation, and up to the present time the agreed upon amount has been sent. It is going to be more difficult for them during the months which are ahead, but we believe that the farmers will place that amount of pork products at the harbours of Canada to be shipped to Britain during the summer months, thus bringing the total by the end of the year up to 600 million pounds.

Again we are going to be asked to produce, not for consumption here but for shipment to Britain, 125 million pounds of cheese, and the British and Canadian governments will agree on the price to be paid for it. I am not in a position to-day to announce the price, because the negotiations between this country and Great Britain are now proceeding, but it will be a price which will induce a production in Canada during the third summer of the war of at least 125 million pounds of cheese for the British market. You know what that means. It is 25 million pounds more than Canada produced in 1935, and it required more than we have produced in any year since 1925. Our production of cheese had been on the downgrade ever since the last war, but during the last five or six years it has been on the upgrade, and this year we shall send much more cheese to Britain than we produced only a few years ago.

We are not asked to send butter, but we have been requested to ship canned milk. That will be forwarded in increased volume. More and more of the food products of this country will be sent to Britain, but more particularly products which carry animal fats, to take the place of the vegetable oils which cannot now be obtained from other parts of the world, and thus assist in feeding the British people and contribute to the winning of the war.

The legislation—and by the way, it is not all legislation; some of these measures which were placed before you this afternoon by the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be carried out by order in council under the War Measures Act — assists toward that end. It will have the effect of giving a higher return to the farmers in the area from which most of our grain crops come. The regulations which will be enacted by order in council will also assist in the production of coarse grains, and of flax, from which vegetable oil can be taken. The measures which I have placed before you will have the effect of encouraging also the production of coarse grains and hence live stock.

I know that some hon. members would be interested in knowing something of the latest returns with regard to wheat acreage reduction during the last year. I will cite a few figures in this connection in order to make it possible for them to discuss the questions which are before them.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Will the Minister of Agriculture explain the situation with regard to rye?

Mr. GARDINER: I said we were paying $2 an acre on rye raised on land which is taken out of wheat, and an additional $2 if it is still in rye in July, 1943.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is all that will be done?

Mr. GARDINER: That is all the encouragement we are giving this year. As a matter of fact there has been some difficulty, which I think can better be discussed in committee than here, with regard to handling rye in the last year.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There has been no ceiling on it; is that it?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know that one has ever been announced.

Farmers to the number of 186,892 applied for payment under the wheat acreage reduction regulations of last year. Of these 135,157 have been paid in full and about 50,000 have been paid in part. The part paid is I think in nearly all cases, if not all, 75 per cent of the total, and some adjustments have to be made on the other 25 per cent. Claims not paid are 2,000, making a total of 187,000 in round figures. The amount paid out, $26,813,718.75, is the total up to February 28.

Under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 41,727 farmers have been paid $5,722,832.97. That will represent 60 per cent of the total to be paid out to these particular farmers. The other 40 per cent will be paid after March 1.

On prairie farm income the total number of farmers to whom payment has been made up to date is 147,137. The total amount paid, again on a 60 per cent basis, is $6,932,659.79.

In the bill to which I am going to ask the house to give second reading are embodied the principles of the regulations of last year. There will be some changes in the terms of the measure as compared with the regulations. The regulations attempted to average the acreage as between 1939 and 1940. There is an attempt in this bill to establish the acreages for 1940, and to go back to 1939 only in cases where there was no wheat in 1940, making payment on the basis of 1940 acreage in all other cases. The reason is to try to avoid some of the delays that occurred in the administration of the regulations this year.

Mr. BENCE: In connection with the payments under the wheat acreage reduction plan, has the minister any information regarding the payments to landlords?

Mr. GARDINER: Claims of landlords have been paid numbering 43,000, divided as follows: Alberta 11,000; Saskatchewan 26,000; Manitoba 6,000. There are some others to be paid.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Could the minister give the totals of the payments that will be made on these three accounts for last year?

Mr. GARDINER: The total for wheat acreage reduction is estimated at around $30,000,000. We cannot yet give it exactly. Some adjustments have still to be made.

The total for income will be between 16 and 20 million dollars. I am not in a position to give it any more exactly at the moment. The applications have not all been considered, hon. members will see. There were 186,000 that had reductions in wheat acreage, so that there will be a considerable number more to be paid.

Mr. QUELCH: From the work already done has not the government a record giving acreage average for 1939 and 1940 instead of taking 1940?

Mr. GARDINER: We have the established acreage for 1940 based upon the average, but a considerable number of farmers who did not apply last year may come in this year. It would bring in the same complications we had a year ago. I would prefer to leave these matters until we reach the committee stage. The intention is to send this bill to the agriculture committee and have these matters discussed there. It is our hope that the decision will be reached to base the calculations on the 1940 acreage. There is not a great deal of difference in the amount paid; the greater part of the difference concerns the difficulty in administering the act.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. LEADER: May I ask—

Mr. GARDINER: I wish hon. members would allow me to finish, and ask these questions in committee. I was just going to move that the bill be now given second reading and referred to the agriculture committee.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): In following the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) this afternoon in the first speech by a private member on this policy, I should like to set before the house certain information which I think will be of value in the debate which will follow here and in the committee.

First of all I should like to give the average price for wheat at Fort William-Port Arthur for the last thirty-two years, 1910 to 1941 inclusive. That price is $1.22 a bushel, basis No. 1 northern Fort William. That makes the average price at the farm in western Canada $1.07 for wheat, basis No. 1 northern, for the past thirty-two years.

For four years, 1915, 1916, 1917 and 1918, during the last war, the average price of wheat was $1.77 a bushel, and in 1917 on the open market wheat rose to, I think, $3.12 a bushel, basis No. 1 northern, Fort William.

Mr. GLADSTONE: What was the price of sugar then?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): About $30 a bag. Wheat rose to the price of $3.12 a bushel, but the government of the day immediately decreased the price to $2.21. I am not saying that was an improper thing to do.

Mr. PERLEY: Same old stuff.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I know it all by heart.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I am endeavouring to show that during the last war, because there was a scarcity of wheat, the government of Canada thought it proper to reduce the price from that which could have been obtained in the world market. By the same token I say that in this war the government has the responsibility of seeing that the price of wheat does not go too low because there is a surplus.

The average price of wheat for twenty-eight years of the last thirty-two, excluding the four war years, was $1.07 a bushel, basis No. 1 northern Fort William, or 92 cents at the farm in western Canada.

The average amount of wheat from the western inspection division which is milled for consumption in Canada as flour amounts to about ten to fifteen per cent of the western wheat crop in any one year. Therefore the remainder of eighty-five to ninety per cent of the western wheat crop is not used for the production of flour for domestic use in Canada. Eastern wheat is practically all used for domestic purposes in Canada. Ordinarily about 6 million to 7 million bushels is milled for flour, mostly for pastry and cake flour, the remainder of the wheat crop of eastern Canada being used as feed. Therefore the whole wheat crop of eastern Canada is generally used for domestic purposes. The amount of the western wheat crop that goes into flour in Canada, to be used by the bakers, is from five to seven and a half per cent. The proportion of flour from the western wheat crop that is sold to the housewives of Canada amounts to about the same percentage; and by far the greater part of the flour sold to the housewives of Canada is purchased and used upon the farms of this country.

The position of the farmer in the last war was that his price was held down because of a scarcity. The price of wheat in the last war cannot be used as a guide for the price of wheat in this war, but it is surely reasonable to expect that in this war the government and people of Canada should see to it that the apparent surplus of wheat is not used to depress the price of wheat in this country to an unduly low level.

There is another thing I should like to say in connection with the wheat farmers of Canada. The greatest trouble we have encountered in our whole economy, and the economy of the allies during this war, is that we found practically no one who was organized to produce the amount of material we needed for the war. Our manufacturers, our producers of other farm products than wheat, our shipbuilders—none of these could turn over to the government of this country or to the allies the required amounts of any materials required for the war. Only one person stands out in this regard in our economy; that is the wheat farmer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about mechanical transport?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No. We could use a great deal more mechanical transport than we can get to-day.

Mr. GRAYDON: Please don't forget eastern agriculture.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I am not forgetting it, but I am saying that it did not have a surplus of anything that was required for the war effort. Further I say that no food commodity is so vitally needed during war time as wheat. The western farmer has been in this position, that he has produced not only what we have needed but also a surplus for our needs in the future. There has been no worry whatever on the part of Great Britain or our other allies in regard to bread during this war. Then we use that surplus, which we need and must have, as a basis for saying that economically wheat is not worth a certain price to-day, and as a result we depress the price of that wheat.

Mr. McNEVIN: Is that not due to the fact that there is a greatly reduced demand for wheat and a greatly increased demand for hogs and these other commodities?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Yes, because there was no surplus of hogs, but there was a surplus of wheat. To-day there is no surplus of hogs being produced, but there is a surplus of wheat. There was a surplus of hogs before the war, and there will be a shortage of wheat before this war is over, regardless of the figure that was given to-day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). I have said that wheat is a vital necessity during the war. If the position were reversed; if we did not have that surplus of wheat, the Minister of Trade and Commerce would have risen in his place in this house to-day and offered the western farmer anywhere from $2.50 to $3 a bushel in order to get the wheat that was required. That must be admitted.

An hon. MEMBER: Make it $4.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): During the last war they paid more than $4; the price was $4.40 at Liverpool. There has been a good deal of discussion throughout the country in regard to ceiling prices, and a few moments ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) discussed some phases of this matter. Ceiling prices were set for the purpose of preventing sudden rises throughout the country, and inflation; and I think we all admit that it was a proper thing to do. But when these prices were frozen proper regard was not had for the relation between the price of one commodity and the price of another.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What the hon. member is saying is that it was an uneven price level?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Surely.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with the hon. member.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): At that time western wheat was at a much lower level, in comparison, than any other commodity in Canada.

Mr. PERLEY: Where will 90 cents take it, then?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): There has been no ceiling price set on wheat, which I think is a perfectly proper position for the government to take at this time.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said there was.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friend will have a chance to make his speech shortly.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Minister of Finance said there was.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I do not know what the Minister of Finance said; I say there is no ceiling price for wheat in Canada. There are many reasons why there should be no such ceiling on wheat. In the first place there are the figures I gave in the early part of my remarks. Only from 10 to 15 per cent of the western wheat crop is used for the purpose of milling wheat into domestic flour in Canada. Therefore it would not be logical to set a ceiling price on a commodity of which only about 15 per cent is used in this country, while the other 85 to 90 per cent is exported. Another argument is that at no time in this country has the domestic price for wheat set the price of western Canadian wheat. The price of that wheat has always been set in the world market, in competition with other countries. The amount of wheat sold in Canada has had very little to do with the price of western wheat at any time. We are the greatest exporter of wheat and wheat flour in the world, and surely it would be a ridiculous position for us to take to set a ceiling on a commodity of which we export such tremendous quantities. In effect we would be saying to the world, "We do not believe this product is worth any more than a certain set price, which has some relation to the use of wheat for milling domestic flour in Canada." As a western representative I must say this, that I will not accept, nor will the people of western Canada accept, any economy for western Canada based on 90-cent wheat at Fort William, or anything near that figure, for the duration of the war.

There is no ceiling price on hogs but, as the minister said a moment ago, there are ceiling prices on pork, bacon and ham. There is no ceiling price on live cattle, but there is on beef over the counter. There is no ceiling price on wheat. We may need a ceiling on the products of wheat consumed in Canada. It may be necessary to hold to the ceilings as set to-day for flour and bread in this country, but I do not admit that wheat for domestic consumption as flour or bread must be sold as low as 90 cents a bushel, basis Fort William, to protect those ceilings. Nor do I admit, either, that the present ceilings on flour or bread in Canada are necessary to maintain ceilings on wages in industry.

In order to clarify that statement I should like to place on record a few figures with respect to wheat, flour, bread and industrial wages over a period of years. I hold in my hand a table prepared by the bureau of statistics giving prices on wheat No. 1 northern, basis in store Fort William; flour, first patent, per barrel, Montreal rate points; dominion average retail cash price per pound of standard white wrapped bread, and average wages paid in manufacturing industries of Canada, per year. The table I would ask permission to place on Hansard is as follows:

	No. 1 northern wheat, basis in store Fort William-Port Arthur	Flour first patent per 2—98's jute basis l.c.l. Montreal rate points	Dominion average retail cash price per pound of standard white wrapped bread	Average wages paid in the manufacturing industries of Canada

Dominion Bureau of Statistics, March 7, 1942.

(a) Includes processing levy. (b) Not yet available.

It will be noted that when wheat sold at $1.34 in 1929 the price of bread was 7·4 cents, or exactly the same as it was when wheat sold at $1.50. Then, in 1938 the price of bread was 6·7 cents per pound, or one-tenth of a cent per pound higher when wheat was $1.02 per bushel than when it was $1.34 per bushel, in the preceding year.

Reference to the table will show that in 1941 the price of wheat was 75 cents a bushel and that of bread, 6·5 cents a pound, whereas in 1937 when wheat was priced at $1.34 a bushel bread stood at 6·6 cents a pound, or one-tenth of a cent more to make the difference between 75-cent wheat at Fort William and $1.34 wheat at the same point.

Mr. McNEVIN: Does the processing tax affect these prices?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The processing tax does not appear in the second table, but it does in the first, and there is a note to that effect at the bottom.

The second table I should like to place on Hansard was prepared by the bureau of statistics, and has reference to the wholesale prices of wheat, wheat flour and bread for the calendar years 1910 to 1941 inclusive. If I have the permission of the house I should like to place the table on Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member has the consent of the house he may place the table on Hansard, but I wish to point out that this is a practice which should not be encouraged, and if it is continued unduly it will have to be forbidden. If the table is to be placed on Hansard it will have to be done with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I thank hon. members for their courtesy. The table is as follows:

(2) 1910-18 delivered Toronto; 1918 to date car lot f.o.b. Montreal and Ontario lake and rail points.

Source: Prices and Price Indexes, Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

Reference to this table will indicate that in 1910 flour sold in Montreal and Toronto for almost the same price at which it is selling in those cities to-day. In 1911, with wheat at 95·5 cents a bushel, flour sold in Montreal and Toronto at $5.31 a barrel, or 29 cents a barrel less than to-day's price.

It will be noted that in 1922, with wheat at $1.23 a bushel, bread at 5·2 cents a pound was selling at one-tenth of a cent less than it did in 1941, with wheat at 74·7 cents a bushel.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the hon. member offer any explanation for the apparent discrepancies? There is the question of taxation, cost of doing business, and other things which enter into these differentials.

Mr. TUCKER: The farmer is affected by those things. He has to take the rap; that is what the hon. member is pointing out.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): As I follow through, my hon. friend may see some reason. An examination of these figures shows that prices of wheat and flour bear little relationship to the price of bread. They show clearly that the flour price to the baker could be raised considerably without affecting the price of bread in Canada to-day. The figures show clearly also that with wheat prices considerably above 90 cents Fort William, flour has in the past been sold at prices per barrel Montreal and Toronto which were under present ceiling prices.

I wish to be absolutely fair to both millers and bakers of Canada. If the war-time prices and trade board maintain that present ceilings for bread and flour must be continued in order that Canadian consumers may be fairly dealt with, then wheat should be sold to the millers for the production of flour to be consumed in Canada at 90 cents a bushel Fort William until such time as the millers can prove that that is not the proper price for wheat to be milled and sold as flour under present ceiling prices. At no time should the Canadian miller pay more than can be procured elsewhere for wheat to be milled into flour. At no time should the wheat producer sell to the Canadian miller at a lower net price than can be obtained elsewhere. We must bear in mind, of course, that the war has upset our regular markets, that it is difficult to ship, but these factors should not detract too much from the value of wheat in our hands at the present time.

If it is found necessary to subsidize the Canadian miller in order to maintain the ceiling price of flour so that the Canadian consumer can be placed in a preferred position in regard to bread and flour, the responsibility is that of the Dominion of Canada, not of the wheat producers of Canada. Before a proper price for flour to the baker can be determined, many economies in that industry will have to be effected. Wrapping, slicing and delivery could be greatly curtailed. It certainly looks like a waste to see two, three or four bread carts or trucks covering the same block in a city day after day. All these expenses enter into the cost of a loaf of bread. More people in this country could carry home their bread. There are people in a great many parts of the world who would walk quite a distance to-day to get even a part of a loaf of bread. A one-pound loaf of bread contains only about one-half pound of flour. At the present price to bakers in Canada, that one-half pound of flour is worth exactly one and a quarter cents, or about fifteen per cent of the cost of the loaf of bread. You cannot make any great economy there, you have to make it somewhere else. So, before you start to economize on the wheat or the flour that goes into the bread, you must first look at the other costs. The flour that bakers use is second patent, which is sold at a much lower cost than the first patent flour which is used by the housewife.

In connection with the milling industry, before we start to economize on wheat there are possible savings which might be surveyed in connection with packaging and methods of sale and distribution. First of all, we must determine the proper price relationship between first patent flour used by the housewife and second patent flour used by the miller, or the baker. I did not make a mistake altogether there because in many cases in this country the bakers are the millers. We must consider the price of export flour in relation to both types of flour sold in Canada, the prices of feed flour, bran, shorts and middlings; all these factors and many more must be taken into consideration before the price of wheat can be determined to maintain flour at ceiling prices.

The prices of other grains as set forth to-day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce bear a fairly proper relationship to the advance of ninety cents a bushel for wheat. Coarse grains are badly needed, and a floor of forty-five cents under oats would assure the farmer of his position in growing oats in relation to wheat. A floor of sixty cents under barley would assure the farmer of his position there and, in my opinion, would switch many farmers in the coming year from the growing of wheat to the growing of barley. A price of $2.25 a bushel for flax may appear high to some, but it will not greatly increase the production of flax because of price alone. Flax is a speculative crop. It is difficult to produce and handle and it is of low average yield.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the hon. member to the ruling I gave in connection with reading speeches.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I cannot see very well and the type is quite large in my notes. As I say, a price of $2.25 a bushel for flax will not greatly increase the production of that grain in Canada. But if this government tells the western farmers that flax is needed badly to augment the supply of vegetable oils in this country, that it is the patriotic duty of the farmers of western Canada to produce large quantities of flax regardless of the price offered this afternoon by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the western farmers will go out and do their part in that regard. The western farmer is the best citizen we have in this country and wants to pull his weight during this war.

The wheat acreage reduction enunciated by the Minister of Agriculture is a common-sense policy that will tend to increase the production of badly needed coarse grains. The amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act are there to protect producers of low yielding crops. The amendment made in order to allow the Minister of Agriculture to declare an emergency year regardless of price is a proper one because the farmer who will have a low yield this year has it because he has no control whatsoever over the circumstances. He will do the same job that any other farmer will do, but if climatic conditions are such that his yield will be low he should be protected and kept in a position to be ready to produce again as quickly as possible.

I still consider that a proper price for wheat in Canada is at least $1.20 a bushel, basis Fort William, in comparison with prices of other commodities in this country. I have not time at the moment to quote from a booklet I have here, but I would advise all members of the house to read it. It is put out by one of the western grain companies, and is known as the Searle Grain Index. It gives a complete picture of the western wheat grower and shows that whereas costs of living to the industrial workers have risen from 100 in 1913-14 to 146 to-day and their wages to considerably above that figure of 146, the western wheat grower whose costs were 100 in 1913-14 has costs of 150 to-day, and under the old price of wheat, 74 cents a bushel, basis Fort William, his revenue from wheat amounts to 81 per cent of what it was in 1913-14.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If the hon. member will permit a question, is that price of $1.20 basis Fort William, which he said was a proper price, his estimate of a parity price for wheat at the present time?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That is my estimate of the proper price for wheat in comparison with present prices of other commodities in Canada.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Then go to work on the government.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Maybe I have done more work than you have.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): How much headway have you made with the minister?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Along with others in this House of Commons I have endeavoured for some years to inform the Canadian people and the members of the House of Commons of the position of the western farmer in our economy: I have tried to show them the advisability of meting out justice and fair play to the western farmer, and we have made substantial gains in that regard both in this house and in the country. I am certain that there has been a great change in the attitude of members from all parts of the dominion in regard to the plight of the people of western Canada and that to-day they are better informed and more sympathetic. Slowly but surely the members of this House of Commons and the people of Canada generally are coming to see that the present wheat surplus is not a burden but a great asset to this country.

Wheat is the most valuable food in wartime. The Secretary of Agriculture of the United States has stated that food will write the peace. It will, and food, especially wheat, will help to fight this war. The promise of food, notably wheat, to the enslaved peoples of Europe will do wonders for the allies once they start to invade Europe, and that surplus of wheat now held in our elevators in Canada can then be used to great advantage. A large part of that surplus will be badly needed by our valiant ally, Russia, in the very near future. Governments of European countries which have been overrun are to-day carrying in other parts of the world large sums of money which they can and will use for the purpose of buying wheat for their peoples just as quickly as they can be liberated. Much of that money will be used to purchase wheat from this continent as soon as that is made possible. As a matter of fact, the government of one overrun country in Europe to-day have purchased some millions of bushels of wheat and some millions of bushels of barley, and they have that wheat and barley, not as an option, but bought and paid for and stored to-day in Canada and the United States against the day when their people are liberated. Wheat is valuable and will be valuable. Gradually the people of Canada are coming to see that it is a short-sighted policy to gauge wheat as a burden at this time.

With these thoughts in mind, Mr. Speaker, and looking at the broad picture of agriculture in Canada to-day, taking into account the assured position of the farmer in regard to butter, milk and milk products, cheese, cattle, hogs, wool, eggs, flax, barley, and oats, and an advanced price for wheat of 90 cents a bushel, which is still too low in my estimation, and in addition the wheat acreage reduction policy announced to-day by the Minister of Agriculture and amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, I commend both the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the information which he has given to the house and the policy he has brought down to-day, and the Minister of Agriculture, and I say to the government that on the whole they have done a good job and I am going to support them on all these measures.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I should first of all like to express to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) the appreciation of myself and my constituents of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Some weeks ago I communicated with several of my constituents as to what they thought the proper wheat policy should be for this year. I did so for the reason that I believed there was too much concentration on the question of price and not enough attention paid to some of the other things which had been done by the Minister of Agriculture and this government. I got 194 replies, seventy beseeching me at all costs to see that nothing was done to detract in any way from the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, that it should be left as it is, if not improved, but that payments under it might be a little more liberal. Of the others, eighty said they wanted to be sure that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was left in force, and they would like an increase in the price if it were possible for the government to grant it. Of the 194 letters which I got, 150 therefore laid their main emphasis on the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Many of them said it was the first time that any government had done anything to add a certain amount of security to the position of the farmer on our western plains, subject as he is to the continual fear of crop failure.

The situation so far as the present Minister of Agriculture is concerned has been this, as I see it: that he, coming from western Canada, knows as well as anybody living in that country the difficult position of the western farmers; but, being a member of a government which must govern with the consent of a majority of the people of Canada, naturally he cannot dictate the policy of that government, and it has only been possible for him to secure the adoption of some of the ideas which he thought necessary. For that reason, because everything was not done which we in western Canada advocated and which, I believe, the minister would have liked to see done, there has been a tendency on the part of some elements to concentrate their attacks upon him and to pretend that he has not done his best for the western farmers. In my humble judgment the present Minister of Agriculture has done more for the farmers of the west than any other Minister of Agriculture since confederation. I would like those who attack him to remember that no matter what government is in power, be it Liberal, Conservative, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation or Social Credit, of necessity a majority of their parliamentary supporters would come from elsewhere than western Canada, and that the west cannot hope to dictate to a dominion government, no matter of what political stripe. If we are to have fairness in public life we must give credit where credit is due.

Further, to what does this sort of campaign lead in a country like ours? The man who takes the initiative in fighting for a minority, such as are the western farmers, finds that the more he gets in the public eye, the more severely he is condemned. The result of such attacks is to create a tendency on the part of many public men to take the attitude that the less we do, the less we are in the public eye. If we are in a position such as western representatives find themselves in, the less we are in the public eye, the less likely we are to provoke attack, and therefore the best way to get by is to do as little as possible.

Another thing to be remembered is that the history of representatives from western Canada shows that time after time, after they have fought their very best to get a square deal for the west, the fact that they were not able to get all that westerners thought they should get has been the basis of charges that they had "sold out" the people and not represented them as they should have done. As a result, we have destroyed some of the best fighters for western Canada who ever came to parliament. The effect of this kind of thing is that western representatives, including those supporting a Cooperative Commonwealth Federation government, if ever there is one in this country, will be advised by the cynic, "Don't fight too hard for your western farmers, because you will never satisfy them, you will not be able to get the rest of the country to agree with what you want to do, and ultimately you will be 'crucified' no matter how hard you work or what you accomplish."

I suggest to our people in the west that they try to sort out their friends from their enemies, that they distinguish the people who are trying to serve them to the best of their ability and are getting results, even if not all they would like, from the people who pretend that if they were in office all would be like paradise as far as western Canada is concerned. I hope the people of the west will not be misled by the campaign which has been carried on, as I see it, against a man who, in the position of Minister of Agriculture, has worked harder for western Canada than any man who previously occupied that position.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. TUCKER: When the house rose I was dealing with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and I wish to deal further with it for a few minutes before I pass on to the price of wheat.

As I understood the minister, the suggestion is made that the government is taking power to declare an emergency year even if the average price of wheat is over 80 cents, basis No. 1 northern Fort William, during the three fall months; but it is not proposed to change subsection 1 of section 2 of the act, which provides that the amount that may be paid in townships which have an average yield of eight to twelve bushels to the acre shall be paid on the basis of the average price of wheat between 70 to 80 cents. In other words, as the act now stands, if the average price during the three fall months is, say 72 cents No. 1 northern, Fort William, the amount paid in townships in that category, the 8 to 12 bushel, would be 80 cents per acre on one-half the cultivated acreage. If the price were 75 cents, the price that could be allotted in the townships from 8 to 12 bushels average per acre would be 50 cents per acre. If the initial price of wheat is raised to 90 cents and if the grain exchange functions at all, I presume it will function at a price over 90 cents, so by that very fact, unless this section is amended, the people who have received assistance in the past in the 8 to 12 bushel category will not get it any more. The reason for no change being made is, I believe, that the price being raised to 90 cents, you do not need to worry very much about the person in the 8 to 12 bushel category. I do not agree, for anyone in that category, supposing he had 8 bushels per acre, would have only six bushels for sale, and that would mean he would not have very much income.

I suggest that very serious consideration should be given to amending this so that in an emergency year anyone in the 8 to 12 bushel category should get a dollar just the same as anyone in the 4 to 8 bushel category would get $1.50 for half his cultivated acreage.

Some may think that would mean a tremendous drain on the treasury. I took the trouble to look up the relative amounts paid in the various categories in the last two years, namely, 1939-40 and 1940-41. The year 1941-42 is not yet complete, so I have not those figures.

I found that the total amount actually paid out in those years was as follows:

Amount paid out under all categories	$ 6,712,201
Amount collected from the farmers	2,582,687
Cost to the treasury of Prairie Farm Assistance Act		$ 4,129,514
1940-41
Amount paid out under all categories	$ 9,904,300
Amount collected from the farmers	2,421,507
Cost to treasury of Prairie Farm Assistance Act		$ 7,482,793

Therefore the total cost of this act, which has meant so much in the way of security to the farmers of western Canada during those two years, was only $11,612,307. That meant actually a subsidizing of the price of wheat by the treasury of this country to the extent of a little over one cent a bushel.

Actually in all the categories, the payments were as follows: In the eight to twelve category during those two years payments were made to 69,783 farmers; in all the other categories, including the crop failure categories, payments were made to 40,353 farmers, so that actually there were 50 per cent more farmers who got payments in the 8 to 12 category than in all other categories put together. The amount involved was as follows:

In the eight to twelve category..	$7,466,668
In all the other categories, including the crop failure categories..	9,149,828

Therefore if amendment is not made to leave the eight to twelve category in, you will eliminate more than half the farmers who drew benefits during those two years from the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. If you have similar years in future, you are eliminating almost half of the money paid out under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

I submit that in view of the fact that this policy cost the treasury of this country only a little over one cent a bushel (spread over all wheat marketed) and that it means so much in the way of security to the western farmer, and has cost the treasury in two years only a little over eleven and a half million dollars, when you are increasing the price to the farmer who has wheat you should not deprive the farmer who has a small crop of eight to twelve bushels of the bit of protection he has already.

I most earnestly urge the government to make an amendment so that you do not take away from the farmer in the eight to twelve category the bit of protection he has under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

The benefit received under this act in the case of crop failure is $2.50 per acre; on half your acreage that is $1.25 an acre. Anyone who knows anything about farming in western Canada knows that is not adequate for a farmer to pay for his loss of crop and keep himself and family during the next year.

Instead of cutting down the payment I earnestly suggest that the government consider increasing the payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and particularly in that category, and that the protection now given in the eight to twelve category should not be taken away.

Coming now to the question of the price of wheat, I should like to urge this House of Commons to approach the matter of dealing with our western Canadian farmer in the same spirit as that in which we asked our people to approach the problem of dealing with people in other countries. We know that last August the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Right Hon. Winston Churchill, and the President of the United States, met and signed what is known as the Atlantic charter. Clause 6 of that charter reads:

> After the final destruction of the nazi tyranny they hope to see established a peace which will afford to all nations the means of dwelling in safety within their own boundaries, and which will afford assurance that all the men in all the lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want.

Mr. Speaker, if that is the objective for which we are fighting this war, that the people in all lands of the world should be able to live out their lives in freedom from fear and want, is it not time that the members of this house should actually say that they will apply that to their own fellow Canadians? Continually I am meeting fellow Canadians in western Canada who say, "Here are the noble principles of the Atlantic charter; Canadians in western Canada are sending their men in as large a proportion as any other part of Canada to fight for these principles; if we cannot get them at home, what real hope is there of getting them established in the world at large?"

Some one may say that I am exaggerating the situation. I have not much time to prove my point, but I think I can give some figures that will establish it to any fair-minded man in this house.

The province of Saskatchewan made a submission to the Sirois commission, and in that connection they made a very careful survey of their debt situation. They found that the agricultural debt in Saskatchewan in 1937 was $525,000,000. I need not go into the reason for that, except to say that no doubt the interest being charged was too high. Many people were paying more than eight per cent. If the interest had been five per cent and the debts had been amortized, there would have been very little debt comparatively in western Canada in 1937. But be that as it may, the debt upon Saskatchewan farming was $525,000,000, or $15 for every acre of cultivated land in that province.

Everyone knows also that during the past several years, with prices so low, certainly the farmer needed the two-thirds of the crop he was allowed to retain to live on and the one-third left would often barely pay taxes and perhaps a very little on the principal and interest. What has been the situation, then? I wish this to be considered by people in the other parts of Canada. Year after year men who went into that country in the early days, who worked there during all their lives and had their families working with them, who lived on a very low standard of living, have seen their equity being cut down, until finally someone has come along and said, "You no longer have any equity left in your land." Then what happens? When they get around seventy years of age they are told, "You might as well let us foreclose, and you can live on the old age pension," or something to that effect. I venture to say that seventy-five per cent of the farmers in Saskatchewan have seen their equities in their land and their homes gradually disappear. The farmer has no place to go with his family, unless he wishes to go on relief in the cities and towns. He sees his equity vanishing; he sees the time approaching when he will be told that his equity is gone and that he might as well let himself be foreclosed. Could anyone in this house say that those farmers, seeing their equity reduced inexorably year after year, were free from fear, the fear of losing their homes and, with their families, being cast out? I know it will be said that there is debt adjustment legislation which is intended to prevent these foreclosures; but when the equity is wiped out, the tendency is for the man to be told, "You no longer have an equity, and you might as well quit struggling."

This is something we should all consider. I absolutely agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that if we are not well on the way to a new order in Canada before this war ends, then our chances of getting it after the war are not so good. I ask the government, as I ask every hon. member, in approaching this question of the price of wheat to bear in mind the situation which prevails in western Canada, and to determine that we in this house will apply the principles of the Atlantic charter to our fellow Canadians.

As an example of what is happening, not only on western farms but all over Canada, in the 1941 "Canada Year Book" I find that the average value of farms and equipment in Canada in 1941 is given as $13,814. For 1931 it is given as $7,185, a drop of over $6,000 for the average Canadian farm and equipment, or almost fifty per cent. If you have operating also an increase in debt due to inability to pay interest and principal, you can see how equities can be reduced year by year. Someone may say, "Well, your western farmer lives too extravagantly." Again I go to the year book; I cannot give all the figures, but I should like to compare the western farmer with the Ontario farmer in certain respects. I find that according to the census of 1931 Ontario farmers having cars comprised 65·4 per cent of the farmers of Ontario, while the farmers of Saskatchewan having cars comprised only 47·7 per cent. Ontario farmers with telephones comprised 54·1 per cent; in Saskatchewan the figure was 34·2 per cent. In Ontario 21·5 per cent of the farmers had radios; in Saskatchewan 20·2 per cent had radios. Ontario farmers having gas or electricity totalled 16·8 per cent, while in Saskatchewan the figure was 2·8 per cent. Farmers having piped water in their kitchens, and so on, totalled 10·4 per cent in Ontario and only 1·4 per cent in Saskatchewan.

This situation is reflected in our educational services, our medical services and all the other services we give our people. To-day it is extremely difficult to get doctors to stay in rural districts; it is very difficult to keep rural schools open in more outlying districts particularly. Here is the situation, and I put it to members of this house point blank. Would you, for any reason, I do not care what it is, say you are going to have one first-class type of citizen in Canada and then another, a second-class type, who cannot afford the same education, who cannot afford the same medical services as people in other parts of the country, at the same time that you are asking these young men to go out and give their lives, together with the first-class citizens of Canada? These may be regarded as harsh words. We can close our ears to them if we wish, but the facts are there, for every member of this house to see. We are all members of the Canadian parliament, and we should not close our eyes to the situation that is before us.

Someone may say, "Well, you have not proved that your income is low in Saskatchewan." I should like to give a great many figures, but I might give just enough to indicate that there is real truth in what I am saying. I have before me figures as to the per capita national income by provinces in 1927 and 1940; I have them for all the provinces, but I cannot take time to give all those figures. The average per capita income in Ontario in 1927 is $511. In Saskatchewan, in the same year, the average per capita income was $466. Then we come to 1940. In that year the average per capita national income in Ontario had dropped to $505, but in Saskatchewan it dropped to $261, or by almost fifty per cent. Then we might take the receipts from the sale of farm products, by provinces, which will give the gross agricultural income, based on the average from 1926 to 1929. In Quebec the average income during that period was $101,000,000, in round figures. In 1941 that income had increased to $136,000,000. The average agricultural income in Ontario from 1926 to 1929 was $260,000,000, and in 1941 it had increased to $284,000,000. In other words, there was an increase in both Ontario and Quebec in the gross agricultural income. What was the situation in Saskatchewan? The average income from 1926 to 1929 was $280,000,000, but in 1941 that income shrank to $156,000,000. I ask any hon. members representing Ontario and Quebec just what their farmers would do to them if the agricultural income of their provinces, instead of going up, had shrunk by almost half; and I ask hon. members representing eastern farming communities, who may oppose some measure of justice for the western farmer, what they would do if they were in our position.

Then I might quote some figures as to the index number of receipts from the sale of farm products, using the period 1926 to 1929 as 100. In Quebec the index number in 1941 was 134·6; in Ontario it was 109·3; in Saskatchewan, 55·9, and in Manitoba, 98·1. After all, Saskatchewan is the province that suffers most in the present situation because in 1940, for example, 76 per cent of our total agricultural income was derived from wheat, while in 1941, 71 per cent of our income came from wheat which is most depressed in price of any agricultural product. I would speak to the labouring people of this country—and I am glad the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is interested. No farmer objects to labour being well treated, but we ask labour to have some sympathy for us when we ask for a fair deal, too.

I have before me a report of the Searle Grain Company, to which reference was made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross). I am going to read only two paragraphs from it:

Looking at the two charts—

It gives a chart showing camparative receipts of labour and farmers.

—it will be observed that for wheat to have the same purchasing power as it had in 1913 and 1914, . . . the price should now be one dollar. This is at the average country point. . . .

In other words, the parity price for wheat, if it is to have the same purchasing power as it did in 1913 and 1914, should be one dollar to the farmer—and that means $1.20 a bushel at Fort William. That would put the farmer in the same position as he occupied back in 1913 and 1914—not the good old days between 1926 and 1929. He has reached a point where he is almost 50 per cent worse off than he was in 1913.

We now turn to the industrial worker. This is where I say he should give some support to the position taken by the farmers. The industrial worker's average hourly wage, if it is to have the same purchasing power as it did in 1913 and 1914, should now stand at the index number of 145. In other words, where the industrial labour got $100 in 1913, to purchase the same amount of goods to-day he should get $145. What is he getting? He is actually getting $210. In other words, the industrial worker to-day is better off by 44 per cent than he was in 1913-1914, and the farmer is roughly 45 per cent worse off—that is wheat at the price prevailing last year.

The suggestion was made that we should freeze the farmer in that inferior position. At a time when the industrial labourer would be getting only $145 compared with $100 in 1913-14, to be as well off, and when in fact he is actually receiving $210, the suggestion is that the farmer should get only $54 where he got $100, and that his position should be frozen there. Is it any wonder that the hon. member for Moose Jaw and every other western farmer says that we refuse to be placed in that position of inferiority compared with the rest of Canada? Is it any wonder that the west takes that attitude? We have children to look after and to educate; we have medical services to obtain; we are human beings, just the same as the industrial workers.

Mark this: whereas the total average income per farm in 1926-29 was $1,007 a year, the average yearly earning of industrial workers was $1,017, or roughly $10 more a year. That was the condition, in spite of the fact that the farmer has an investment in his land. During the period 1930-40 that had shrunk to an average income per farmer of $468 a year, while that of the industrial worker was $902. During that time the average investment in farms was $7,185, and the average income per farm during the same ten years had fallen from $1,007 to $468.

In spite of the investment involved, and in spite of the fact that that is total farm income, for, let us remember, the farmer works, his wife works and his children work. It seems to me that the time has come when everybody in Canada should know those figures, and act according to the principle laid down in the Atlantic charter. We should act, as well as talk in that regard.

What objections are made? One objection is that there is too much wheat. I believe the hon. member for Moose Jaw dealt thoroughly with this point this afternoon. Let me read what Mr. Churchill had to say:

We shall do our best to encourage the building up of reserves of food all over the world, so that there will always be held before the eyes of the people of Europe, including the Germans, the certainty that the shattering of nazi power would bring them all immediate food, freedom and peace.

In other words, one of the weapons for the destruction of nazi tyranny is the tremendous over-supply of wheat we have built up in Canada. Mr. Churchill says that we will encourage that. Are we encouraging it when we say that we will pay less than the cost of production for that wheat, just because the farmer is doing the very thing that Mr. Churchill, that incomparable leader of democracy, has said we will do? That is all I shall have to say on the suggestion that we have too much wheat. But the day will come when every bushel of wheat will feed some hungry mouth that will be very happy to receive it.

It is suggested that we should go into other lines of production. Well, I shall not take time to give figures, but I might point out in passing that Saskatchewan hog marketing increased from 312,000 head in 1939 to 857,000 head in 1941. That is an increase of well over 200 per cent, and if she went on increasing at the same rate during the next two years she would produce as many hogs as Ontario does now.

For those who say that we should turn our entire effort to the production of mixed products, I have some interesting figures. Assuming that to-day we can use 230,000,000 bushels of wheat, that our average crop would be 450,000,000 bushels, and that we turned the remaining 220,000,000 bushels to the production of hog products, we would produce in hogs alone 2,640,000,000 pounds. Yes, think of it—2,640,000,000 pounds! Our entire marketings last year amounted to only 1,245,000,000 pounds of hog products. In other words, if we turned our entire excess wheat production to the feeding of hogs, we would produce in Saskatchewan alone more than twice the total amount of hogs marketed in all of Canada. I say to hon. members from Ontario: Supposing you drive the Saskatchewan farmer to do that, in what position will it leave your constituents when we in Saskatchewan produce twice as much as the whole of Canada combined? That is a point which must be faced.

Mr. BLAIR: Don't worry about us; we shall be all right.

Mr. TUCKER: An hon. member says, "Don't worry about us, we shall be all right." Well, I am glad he is so optimistic. But I suggest that the path of true statesmanship is not to shove your head in the sand and say, "We shall be all right."

There is the further suggestion that wheat is no advantage to Canada. Between the years 1910 and 1936 the value of grain marketed from western Canada alone was $10,278,000,000. That went to build up eastern Canada, as no other single factor has built it up. In the days ahead, when we get out of this period of interference with markets, western Canada once more will make a vital contribution to the upbuilding of the rest of Canada. Do not drive that country, which has done so much to build up Canada as a whole, away from the industry it has developed.

Then the suggestion is made that we should swing over to manufacturing. I have something to say in that regard which is aside from the subject. Hon. members will perhaps bear with me for a moment, or maybe permit me to have a minute or two extra to deal with it. There are 20,000,000,000 tons of coal in Estevan, perhaps one of the largest deposits of soft coal in the world. I suggest to the government: if you are having a total war effort, why do you not develop a tremendous head of power at the Estevan mine and have the advantage of all the by-products that would be obtained? Some of those by-products I believe could be used to make synthetic rubber. Probably a half-million people could be put to work in industry as a result who now have no chance to participate in the war effort.

I grant that it might cost a little more to manufacture in western Canada, but while a tank that costs fifty per cent more to make may do something to the national debt of this country; it will kill a nazi just the same as a tank manufactured more cheaply in eastern Canada. We have not a total war effort when the prairie provinces have only a few hundred thousand dollars worth of munition contracts. All we in Saskatchewan have been permitted to do in the war is to send our young men to enlist or our young men and women to the coast or down to eastern Canada to work. But some of them cannot leave home and they would be very glad to engage in industry. I know the answer will be that we have not the management.

An hon. MEMBER: We have not the steel.

Mr. TUCKER: We can ship steel out to the west just the same as we can ship it to the east. Surely we can get it. After all, if we are not going to lay the foundation for stepping up our production to a one hundred per cent effort, then we are not doing our part toward the people of this country. I ask my hon. friend who has just interrupted me: Does he think that because it cost extra money to establish industries behind the Ural mountains, Russia hesitated to do it when the very life of that country was at stake? Did they consider the question of money and the cost of doing these things? I ask the government, which I am proud and pleased to follow, in this time of world crisis, to do the thing that is necessary to mobilize this country's industrial capacity one hundred per cent.

On the question of management, we know that we had not the management at the outbreak of this war, for example, to provide an armoured division for Canada. You have to train management in industry the same as you are training men for an armoured division or in the commonwealth air training scheme. Once you have trained your management in eastern Canada, can it not be moved in part out west to establish industries there alongside these tremendous coal fields? Some people who may feel that they are wiser than I, and properly so, will say that this is going to cost more money, that it will be difficult and so on. I say that it might be the last ounce of strength put into the effort that will win this war. Many of us at one time or another have had our car stuck. We have tried to get it out and have almost succeeded. If a little child had come along and put his shoulder to the car, it would have come out, but for the lack of that extra few pounds pressure, the car rolled back into the hole and it probably finally required a tractor to pull it out.

The same situation exists so far as our position in this war is concerned. Anyone who is a soldier knows that when the battle trembles in the balance, one man thrown into the fray might turn the tide. I think Canada should make up her mind to put her whole strength into this war. She should make sure that western Canada is given a chance to do what it can do as well as any other part of the country. If you say to western Canada, "turn to other things," we will reply that we will turn to other things if you will only give us a chance to do so.

I have exceeded my time by two or three minutes, and I shall not impose upon the goodwill of the house more than to say a few words in conclusion. In my opinion the proper price for wheat when compared with other things would be $1.20 a bushel, basis Fort William. To pay that price would cost $75,000,000 a year. For three years, the total cost would be $225,000,000. Would it make much difference three years from now whether the debt of this country was, say $10,200,000,000 or $10,425,000,000? The people of western Canada are in this war just the same as any other Canadians, but they see farmers across the line in the United States getting 10 per cent over parity prices for their wheat. They ask whether they are not fighting just the same as those people across the line. I suggest to the government that it would be a good thing for the unity of this country if we treated our western farmers just as well as the United States treat their western farmers. I suggest that the actual cost to the taxpayers of this country would be nil because that debt will be renewed from time to time. A difference of $225,000,000 in a debt of the size it will be at the end of the war will not make much difference to the Minister of Finance of that day.

But the difference in the attitude of the people of western Canada, their ability to support the war and their feeling that they are felt by the rest of Canada to be a real part of this country will be tremendous. I appeal to the government to bear in mind the fact that these loyal, honest, hard-working people are one with you in the great fight which we face. I ask you to treat them as first-class citizens, as fellow Canadians, as brothers in arms—do not treat them as second-class citizens—and the result will be tenfold in the response that you will get, in the strength that you will get as we all get together as a united people to fight the battles that lie ahead.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the dinner recess has done things to some of us, particularly our western representatives. Before we adjourned at six o'clock I heard the hon. member who has just taken his seat say that those who represented minorities such as western Canada should not talk too loudly or too much, that if they did, perhaps after a while they would be left at home. I am convinced that since coming in here at eight o'clock he has felt ashamed of himself and the policy of the government which a few moments ago he told us he was bound and pleased to follow.

Mr. TUCKER: I am not ashamed of anything. I think everything I said before the dinner recess was absolutely true. I believe the Minister of Agriculture feels as strongly as I do that more should be done for western Canada than is being done.

Mr. FAIR: I am not complaining at all of anything the hon gentleman has said since the dinner recess, but I do not think he should discourage anyone from standing up and fighting for what he believes is right. The remarks he made before the dinner recess were to that effect. Again I say that he must be ashamed of the Liberal policy and is frightened of losing his seat in the next election when he tells some of the rest of us not to get up and fight.

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. gentleman should not impute motives.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FAIR: The hon. gentleman said—

Mr. TUCKER: I ask the hon. member to take that back.

Mr. FAIR: I did not say whether it was a provincial or federal election.

Mr. TUCKER: It does not matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should not make such statements.

Mr. FAIR: I suppose the hon. gentleman is all tuckered out because he had more than his time.

Mr. TUCKER: The suggestion was, Mr. Speaker, that I had spoken as I did because I was afraid of an election that was coming. I absolutely deny that, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member made that suggestion I think he will have to withdraw it.

Mr. FAIR: I was just expressing my own opinion, Mr. Speaker, but if the hat does not fit the hon. gentleman he need not wear it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member should withdraw the statement complained of by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker).

Mr. FAIR: I will withdraw the hat if it does not fit him.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Speaker, this has come to a point where it does not concern me alone but every member of the house if an hon. member is allowed to persist in disobeying the ruling of Your Honour. It goes far beyond anything that affects me personally, and I ask Your Honour to see that the member obeys the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. FAIR: If the hon. gentleman's conscience is pricking him I withdraw the statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. As the hon. member for Rosthern has said, this has got beyond the stage where it can be treated as a joke. The hon. member for Rosthern has complained of the hon. gentleman's statement and he should withdraw it, without any reservations.

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it. I was just having a little joke and I think, if we had a few little jokes of that kind instead of the kind more often practised in this house, we would have a much healthier atmosphere here. But what I have to say with regard to the agricultural policy I do not intend to apologize for or to withdraw.

The agricultural policy of this country for a number of years has been very truly described by the hon. gentleman who got so warm at my statement just now and insisted upon my withdrawing it. I think he made a very good case for the farmers of western Canada and Canadians generally, because in putting up the case for the western farmer I realize, as must every other hon. member, that a case is being put up for all of Canada. We cannot have poor relations in this country, as agriculture might well be described, if we are to have that Canadian unity which has been shouted about so loud and so long in this house.

As they gave us their policies for agriculture this afternoon I was wondering just who were the advisers of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), and I wondered because agriculture is not getting the same treatment as other classes in Canada. I attended a banquet at the Chateau Laurier not very long ago, on January 29, I believe, when we had the pleasure and profit of listening to Mr. R. M. Evans, Administrator of Agricultural Adjustment and Conservation, United States Department of Agriculture. I was very glad to hear this gentleman who had been invited to Canada, and I was also very glad to see sitting on the platform with him the Minister of Agriculture. I have the speech of Mr. Evans here, and while I shall not read all of it, I should like to quote a few paragraphs from his address because I think they are well worth noting. He said:

> It is all very well to talk about men being free in a democracy—for in a true democracy, they are. But it is only a matter of being realistic—for the protection of democracy itself—to recognize that when farmers who produce the food that a nation needs must sell their products at low prices, over which they have no control, and then lose their farms, their homes, and family security because they cannot meet their obligations—then those men are not truly free. They do not have economic freedom, and without it political freedom cannot long endure. Democracy needs bread and butter as well as ballots.

At the present time, when our young men and our young women are overseas fighting for democracy, I think it is only right that we should practise that same democracy here at home. A little further along Mr. Evans had this to say in connection with reserves:

> To carry these reserves, as well as to smooth out the flow of crops to market, commodity loans are made to producers who have complied with their acreage allotments. These loans are based upon 85 per cent of the parity price for the commodity. For wheat, this has meant a loan rate of $1.15 per bushel for No. 2 hard winter at Chicago this year. At this price, the wheat in an average loaf of bread costs about one and three-quarters cents. The fact that wheat for some time now has been above the loan rate would seem to indicate that our farmers have succeeded in making it their market.
> Under normal circumstances, this system of marketing appears to be adequate. But when the surplus of any basic commodity reaches a danger point, the law requires that a marketing quota be declared. The quota must be approved by two-thirds of the affected producers voting in a referendum.

I may point out that in this country the producers have not one thing to say about quotas. Instead, a policy of totalitarianism is practised. Mr. Evans went on to say:

> Rounding out this programme of protection for the producer is crop insurance against losses from natural, unavoidable hazards. It insures yield only, not price. Crop insurance was provided on wheat for the first time in 1939 and is being extended to cotton this year.

In concluding my references to Mr. Evans' address, I should like to summarize the six points of the United States farm programme, as follows:

1. Conservation based upon sound soil improving crops and practices with payment in proportion to the work accomplished.

2. Acreage allotments to adjust production to need—with payments for adjustment and to improve income.

3. Marketing loans with farm storage allowances.

4. Marketing quotas when supplies hit danger levels.

5. Crop insurance—now offered on cotton and wheat.

6. Market expansion programme including school lunches, food stamp plan and direct distribution to low income groups as well as export assistance when necessary.

A little further on he says:

> During November, AAA farmer committeemen visited every one of their six million neighbours to sign them up in the AAA farm programme for 1942. Each farmer prepared a farm plan and indicated how much of each crop or product he intended to produce next year. The reports now show that our farmers intend to meet or exceed the goals we have set for the production of "food for freedom" in 1942.

Just one other quotation from his address:

In every county and community, our programme is run by farmer committeemen elected by their neighbours. From the ranks of these 130,000 committeemen, our state committees are appointed by the secretary of agriculture. Many of the men in administrative, policy-forming positions in our Department of Agriculture are farmers who have come up through the ranks of our farm programme in these past eight or nine years.

I have pleasure in commending this address of Mr. Evans to the Minister of Agriculture and his colleagues in the government. Following that up, I should like to read a section of the statute which has been passed by congress dealing with parity prices. Section 3 (a) of the price control bill which became law in the United States on January 30 last states:

Sec. 3 (a) No maximum price shall be established or maintained for any agricultural commodity below the highest of any of the following prices, as determined and published by the Secretary of Agriculture: (1) 110 per centum of the parity price for such commodity, adjusted by the Secretary of Agriculture for grade, location, and seasonal differentials, or, in case a comparable price has been determined for such commodity under subsection (b), 110 per centum of such comparable price, adjusted in the same manner, in lieu of 110 per centum of the parity price so adjusted; (2) the market price prevailing for such commodity on October 1, 1941; (3) the market price prevailing for such commodity on December 15, 1941; or (4) the average price for such commodity during the period July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1929.

I believe that in this respect we should follow the action of the United States—because we always seem to wait for somebody else to take the lead, and then we follow. The United States has given us a very good lead in this case, and I commend it to the Minister of Agriculture and the government.

From time to time delegations representing the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and similar bodies have come to Ottawa. One of the last to appear here were the 400 or so representatives from Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. This delegation was organized, I believe, by the Saskatchewan wheat pool, and included, as well as the Saskatchewan delegation, representatives of Manitoba farm and other organizations, the United Farmers of Alberta, the United Farmers of Canada, Alberta section, and the Alberta wheat pool. When the representatives of these bodies met the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and some members of his cabinet they were, I understand, very favourably received. They were told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) that their demands were just and reasonable, and none other than the Prime Minister himself told the delegation, according to press reports, that the wheat question was one with which Canada should deal, that it was Canada's responsibility. Now we are asking that Canada shoulder this responsibility. Some seem to think that we are too persistent in pressing this matter, but I believe that those who express this opinion do not really understand the situation in the west, as it has been so well described by the hon. member who preceded me. I have here a little poem which originated in North Dakota. It reads as follows:

I hate to be a kicker, I always long for peace,
But the wheel that does the squeaking is the one that gets the grease.
It's nice to be a peaceful soul, and not too hard to please,
But the dog that's always scratching is the one that has the fleas.
The art of soft soap spreading is the thing that palls and stales,
But the guy who wields the hammer is the one who drives the nails.
Let us not put any notions that are harmful in your head,
But the baby that keeps yelling is the baby that gets fed!

An hon. MEMBER: That is as old as the hills.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Quite applicable, though, over there.

Mr. FAIR: A great many "babies" have been crying in Canada, and a whole lot of them must have been fed, because we do not hear them crying any more. So, now that everybody else has been satisfied, perhaps Canada will see to it that the farmer receives a little of what is coming to him.

I have here a publication which was put out by the Searle Grain company, of Winnipeg, dealing with prices and amounts which have been received by the farmers. I will read the following extract:

During the past eleven crop years our farmers have delivered to market 3,084 million bushels of grain. They have received for this in cash 1,709 million dollars. Had all these bushels of wheat enjoyed the same purchasing power as a bushel of wheat did in 1913-14 or been at so-called "parity" level—and no one considers wheat had too great a purchasing power in 1913-14—our farmers would have been able to pay for additional goods, commodities, services, debts and so forth to the additional value of 1,127 million dollars.

That is the amount which has been legally stolen from our western farmers; it is money which they would have received if they were getting the treatment to which they were entitled:

. . . our farmers would have been able to pay for additional goods, commodities, services, debts and so forth to the additional value of 1,127 million dollars.

That sum, I believe, would have supplied a whole lot of milk and have satisfied a great many "babies" and kept them from crying.

Had any other class or group in Canada been deprived of any such amount as that, I believe you would have had, as we had in 1939, a sit-down strike. I am referring to what industry threatened when profits were restricted to five per cent. But we farmers have continued ever since 1929 to produce below cost of production and we have not yet gone on a sit-down strike. So I believe we are loyal citizens; we have been just a little too "easy" for our own good; we should get the consideration now which all those other "babies" have received who have now been satisfied.

According to other information contained in this booklet, Canadian wheat, to be at the 1913-14 parity, would require a price of about $1.20 for No. 1 northern in store Fort William. "To-day"—this book was written last fall—"No. 1 northern Fort William is 72⅞ cents a bushel". In the United States, for wheat to be at the 1913-14 parity, it would require a price of approximately $1.22 in store Chicago. At that time May wheat, Chicago, was actually $1.19 a bushel. I think you will notice that United States wheat, although not as good as ours, has been approximately 50 cents higher for quite a long time.

The same booklet, dealing with wheat growers and industrial labour, has this to say:

> The average hourly rates of industrial wages, as set out by the Department of Labour for 1940, were twice as high as, actually 104 per cent higher than, in 1913-14, and in 1941 wages have been raised still further, and in addition industrial labour has received substantial "costs of living" bonuses.
> Some say that it is not fair for the government to give assistance to our wheat growers. With all courtesy, however, we draw attention to the fact that all the high wages and cost of living bonuses given to industrial workers who work directly and indirectly on war production, are themselves paid for by the government, for the government itself buys and pays for all the products of these workers.

I am not complaining about this being received by labour in industry in Canada to-day. Neither am I complaining of the cost of living bonus that is being paid. I have, however, a complaint that that cost of living bonus is not extended far enough. For instance, helpers in stores where only a few are employed, or in other industries where only a few are employed, should also have the cost of living bonus.

I understand that at the present time an arrangement between Canada and the United States provides for quite an easement of tariff restrictions as far as war material is concerned. I wonder why the same could not apply to farm implements, both now and for a number of years past. We have not heard very much about tariffs for quite a while, and some of the "crying babies" of the past have not said anything about it either. For the information of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) who has not been very long in his position I shall give a few figures, and I hope he takes them into consideration. I am sorry this table is not up to date, but it is the best we have been able to get. It relates to tariffs in the only year in which I know they were investigated, namely, 1931. I might say that 1931 was one of the years when we had poor crops and very poor prices, so that if a normal year were taken the various costs would be higher than I am about to quote.

In 1931 Manitoba paid by way of tariffs $29,185,40, or $13.25 per capita. In the same year Saskatchewan paid $29,228,285, or $28.16 per capita. Alberta paid $27,909,396, or $26.93 per capita. British Columbia paid $37,737,247, or $22.33 per capita.

That is to say, in that one year alone it cost the four western provinces $124,060,668 by way of tariffs, which amount would pay a great part of the wheat subsidies that we have been given in the past and should shut off a great deal of the criticism that has been offered.

Let me give some figures regarding the part of the country from which much of the criticism has been coming. The province of Quebec, as far as tariffs are concerned, had a gain of $31,685,885, which is equal to $11.03 per capita. That wonderful milch cow, Ontario, which western Canada has been feeding for the last number of years, had a gain of $51,989,761, equal to $15.15 per capita.

Perhaps that is enough; the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been listening patiently, and I hope he gets these figures and takes them into consideration in dealing further with our initial price of wheat.

A number of arguments are put up against raising the price of wheat. During the period 1926-1941 we had an average of 14·3 bushels per acre. For the years 1926-1929 the average was 18·4 bushels per acre.

The average price per bushel for 1926-1941 was 67½ cents. The average price for 1926-1929, on which period labour wages are based, was 96½ cents, or 29 cents higher than the average for 1926-1941.

The value per acre 1926-1941 was $9.65, whereas the figure for 1926-1929 inclusive was $17.44, or a drop in value per acre of $7.79.

The purchasing power index for 1926-1941 was 59 per cent, whereas the purchasing power index for 1926-1929 was 84 per cent, or a drop of 25 per cent for the 1926-1941 period.

I have here some other figures which, with the consent of the house, I should like to have placed on Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Mr. FAIR: This statement gives corresponding figures for other years:

	Yield per acre bushels	Farm price per bushel cents	Value per acre dollars	Purchasing power index numbers 1913=100

YIELD PER ACRE, PRICE PER BUSHEL AND VALUE PER ACRE OF WHEAT IN THE PRAIRIE PROVINCES

In 1939 the three prairie provinces received for their grain crops $264,145,000. In 1940 we received $278,770,000. In 1941 the year in which the Minister of Agriculture told us we received over 90 cents a bushel, we received $141,680,000.

The people should not be led astray and made to believe that farmers in Canada all received over 90 cents a bushel. As a practical farmer myself, the wheat which I have sold to date has netted me 48½ cents a bushel, and I have not received one cent of bonus since the bonus system was introduced in 1939.

Mr. GARDINER: You are not an average farmer.

Mr. FAIR: Well, I do my best; I try to be.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): You are better than the average.

Mr. FAIR: I am still holding the farm, which a number of others have not been able to do.

Mr. GARDINER: The income from wheat was $210,000,000.

Mr. FAIR: Well, the minister is trying to make an argument, and for his benefit and the benefit of the house I might point out that if one man gets 48½ cents a bushel for his wheat and another gets $1.25, which is possible under the bonus system provided he has a small enough yield, it does not mean that the average farmer gets 90 cents or over. The people should not be misled, because the farmers who are getting a wheat crop do not get the benefit of the bonus.

Mr. GARDINER: If the hon. member will permit, if all the farmers in western Canada got $200,000,000 on account of wheat and there were less than 200,000,000 bushels, the average amount received was more than $1 a bushel.

Mr. FAIR: That is all very well, but as I said, it does not average up. The man who benefits by the prairie farm assistance bonus does not benefit by the high price of wheat, because in order to qualify for the bonus, the crop in his township must be below twelve bushels per acre. On the other hand, the man who gets a large yield, above twelve bushels to the acre, cannot benefit either. So we have two distinct problems to deal with, a higher price for wheat for the farmer who gets a crop, and a better bonus system for the farmer who does not. Averaging up and calling everyone satisfied does not work, and some change must be made before you can have a satisfactory and prosperous agriculture.

We have had a number of organizations pressing recently for a better price for wheat. First, the Saskatchewan delegation that came here asked for an initial price of $1, and final settlement to be made on parity price basis. I am quite satisfied with that, but the group with which I am associated and I myself have consistently advocated not less than 95 cents a bushel, and this past year or two, since the war, when costs of production have increased, we have consistently argued for and demanded $1 a bushel at the local elevator in order that farmers may live.

The Saskatchewan delegation wanted $1, with the balance to be settled as I have already mentioned. The Searle Grain Company believes that $1.20 is the parity price for wheat, while the Northwest Line Elevators set their figure at $1.22⅛. I do not know how anyone can expect to put up an argument that will stand analysis, to make us believe that we can grow wheat at less than $1 a bushel and hold our farms and homes. In my opinion, after close to thirty years of experience in that line of work, it cannot be done.

Perhaps someone may think we are paying our farm help too much. The average farm wage, from 1926 to 1941 inclusive, was $26.90 a month, for all of Canada. During this period the lowest wages were paid in 1933, when they averaged only $10 a month, or less than some of our "crying babies" receive as living allowance for one day, and the average in 1941 was $29.42 a month. The average during the whole period for wages and board was $46.75 a month; the lowest figure was in 1933, when it was $20, and the average for 1941 was $46.58. Then we are faced with the further problem that farmers' sons are taken off the land for the army, even though only one son is left on the farm. In many cases the farmer is too old to operate the power machinery he has bought recently, and under our present set-up the only son may be taken from the farm and put in the army. I do not for a moment say that farmers' sons should not serve. I think if an analysis could be made of all enlistments it would be found that the farmers have contributed a higher percentage than any other group in Canada; but in the interests of agriculture, in the interests of Canada and of the united nations I say that a boy who is the only help left on a farm should be allowed to stay there, because he is just as much a key man as any man in industry.

Then the minister told us that we would receive 90 cents a bushel for wheat. The average price per bushel at Fort William from 1926 to 1929 was $1.35. That was not the highest price paid during that period, but the average. For oats we are to receive 45 cents for the 1942 crop. The average for 1926 to 1929 was 60 cents, or 15 cents more than the price offered this year. For barley we are to receive 60 cents a bushel, while the average price for 1926 to 1929 was 71.6 cents, and during that period we had fairly normal times in Canada. Then we are offered $2.25 for flax as against an average of $2.08 from 1926 to 1929. If I understood the minister aright, we cannot be paid any more because if the farmers were given the prices to which they are entitled we would not have enough money left with which to prosecute the war successfully. The minister told us that last year we lost not less than $100,000,000 because of the price that was set. I do not think he made that amount nearly large enough.

Mr. GARDINER: We dropped that on wheat, but we got some of it back from other sources.

Mr. FAIR: I do not think the minister's addition was very good when he went to school, because $100,000,000 was not nearly enough.

Mr. GARDINER: It does not matter what it was when I went to school; it is all right now.

Mr. FAIR: I do not think it has improved, considering the company he has kept since he left school. Some hon. gentlemen around me say that the minister is a magician. If I should read some of the letters I have received I do not think he would feel very much like a magician or a wizard.

Mr. GARDINER: I can read you mine, too.

Mr. FAIR: Little men usually have a pretty big opinion of themselves, but they do not always stack up. Then, Mr. Speaker, I said I had not received a bonus yet, and in that connection I should like to read a letter I received only a couple of days ago:

I am writing you in regards to the summer-fallow bonus. I think that it is a crime the trouble E. L. Gray is putting the farmers to, to get their bonus.

I am not blaming Mr. E. L. Gray entirely; I am just reading this letter to give hon. members an idea of how some of the farmers feel, and I do not say that Mr. Gray is responsible for all the trouble.

Myself, I have made five trips to the municipal office and each trip is thirty miles, and one to Edmonton, and still I am waiting for my bonuses, and there is quite a lot in this district that are still waiting for theirs, and I was told yesterday that we would have to go to Vermilion on February 24 and meet an inspector if we wanted our bonus. Now we have not been notified about this as they only wrote to the secretary, and I only heard it last night by a neighbour who has not got one dollar yet.

Now, Bob, you know that a lot of us in this district had almost a total crop failure, and yet a lot of us have not received a dollar bonus yet, although we are supposed to get three of them, and here it is the end of February. How in the world do they expect people to try and help in a war effort and buy victory bonds and then treat us like this?

This man must be saving, because I notice he has written on both sides of his stationery, which is not done by a number of others throughout the country. Then he goes on:

I had less than 750 bushels of wheat from 160 acres and no coarse grains on 200 acres, and yet I had about $600 in wages and $300 taxes to pay as well as my living and operating expenses.

The secretary also told me that a farmer with fifty head of cattle would not get the 75 cents cost of living bonus, yet there is a lot of farmers that have sold as high as 500 pigs who do get it. I wonder where the difference is, and the man raising cattle has been doing so at a loss for about eight years, and most farmers have only increased their cattle the last year.

That is a sample of the letters we are getting in connection with the bonuses. I have taken up a number of cases and have practically all of them cleared up after a little time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my time is almost gone—

Mr. GRANT: That's good.

Mr. FAIR: There are some people in this house who have not yet made a speech. Some folks call them laughing hyenas, I believe though I do not know what a laughing hyena looks like. I think it would pay these hon. gentlemen to sit quietly and keep their seats warm, because they are not doing any good anyway. They simply display a lack of the education they should have received at their mother's knee.

In summing up, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that we consider the following points, which are the policies of the group with which I am associated. The first is international cooperation between the four exporting countries, the United States, Australia, Argentina and Canada. This has been worked upon for some time, and I do not know what were the final results at Washington. I believe that would be much better than the competitive system which we have followed in the past.

Then there should be parity prices established for all agricultural products. I am not asking for any unreasonable profits, but certainly there is no reason why one class should produce below cost of production and stand all the loss. We are willing to produce, and to do everything else to win the war, but in doing so there is no reason why we should run the risk of losing our farms, our homes and our morale.

I believe we should have loans on grain, as well as storage. I believe the storage could be reduced, because when we come to figure the cost of elevators, and what they bring in by way of storage charges, there is no doubt that that amount can be reduced considerably.

I believe in a policy of quotas, when necessary, because we cannot expect the government to take over all the wheat we may grow. I do not believe, however, that the growing of wheat should be restricted to so great an extent, because it may be needed in the very near future.

Then, I believe that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be amended in three or four different ways. These points I shall discuss in greater detail when we are in committee of the whole. If that act were administered by local committees, in the same way that some agricultural policies are being administered in the United States, I believe we would have far better protection. I believe the township basis, on which we are now operating, is too large and that it should be on an individual basis. If we had local committees administering the act, the individual farmers would be compelled to do a far better job for themselves, and for the country as well. The limit of three thousand bushels and the live stock restriction under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be removed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. FAIR: I was interrupted on several occasions, and with the consent of the house I should like to have two or three more minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is agreed, the hon. member may proceed. I would point out, however, that we are beginning to do in this debate something which I called to the attention of hon. members in an earlier debate. The forty-minute rule should not be disregarded, even with the consent of the house.

Mr. FAIR: I should also like to see the grain exchange at Winnipeg closed not only for the duration of the war, but for good. As I have pointed out on several occasions, right after the war broke out the exchange in England was closed. I notice that the Argentine republic passed a decree on November 14 of last year by which they closed their grain exchange, too. Now that we have others leading, perhaps we can follow the way, and do away with our gambling den and a number of parasites.

I should also like to see representatives of organized agriculture on all boards having to do with agricultural problems. For some time we have argued in favour of this procedure, and have consistently talked about it. I should hope the government would see fit to bring that policy into operation.

Canadian unity should be maintained, and the winning of the war should not be neglected to do any of the things I have mentioned. But the policy being handed out to agriculture to-day is forcing a large part of western Canada to a condition of starvation and relief.

With two verses from a poem entitled "When Babies Die," I would conclude. They are as follows:

> The babies nazis kill:
> Are they more dead
> Than those who perish in
> The days of peace,
> Because that grasping fails
> To leave them food,
> Because the greed of gold
> Knows no surcease?
> When nazi bombs are stilled,
> And on the graves
> Of millions dead the wheat
> Is Gold again,
> Will man have learned a child
> Is just as dead
> By deprivation as
> By cannon slain?

Mr. GRANT: Sing a song now.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River) You don't understand it, anyway.

On motion of Mr. Wright the debate was adjourned.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

REINSTATEMENT IN CIVIL EMPLOYMENT OF PERSONS WHO ENLIST IN HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES

The house resumed from Friday, March 6, consideration in committee of Bill No. 5, to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who enlist for service in his majesty's forces or who perform essential war employment—Mr. Mitchell—Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—short title.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Mr. Chairman, on Friday this bill was being discussed when the house adjourned at 6 o'clock, and at that time we were pointing out that we did not think the bill would be effective in solving the problem of reestablishing the soldiers in labour and industry. Differences of opinion were expressed throughout the house as to whether industry recognized any responsibility to humanity, and as to whether the onus should be placed upon industry to take care of this problem. The bill when in force will attempt to compel industry to accept these men on their return.

I believe we can best judge the ability of industry to do that job properly by looking into its past history. Apparently those champions of industry who sit in the house cast aspersions on some of the statements I made, and suggested that I did not know much about it. Well, I spent some time over the week-end going through a report of the royal commission on price spreads, which was tabled in the house a few years ago, and I recommend this volume to the careful study of those persons who do not know what it contains. After having read five hundred pages of it I think they will agree with me that industry does not care very much for the welfare of the people generally in Canada who have their labour to sell. The main object of industry is to see how little it can pay labour to get the most work out of it, and to accept very little responsibility for the welfare of the people as a whole.

Industry in Canada has failed us in times of peace. I refer hon. members to page 118, where they will find this:

> . . . in February, 1934, the average wage rate for all male workers was 10 cents per hour; where 93 per cent of all male workers in 1934 were paid less than the minimum rate for female workers; where, on a 55-hour basis, the average full time weekly earnings in 1934 for male and female employees was $5.72.

The whole record of this book is an utter condemnation of the place industry has played in the life of Canada.

Again, referring to the operations of certain chain stores, it says:

> In fact the absence of any personal relationship between the central management which determines operating standards, and the employees in the stores tends to render the central management oblivious to the human element involved in their policies. This was made obvious by the evidence given before the commission by the chief executive of one of the largest chains.

And so on, all the way through the story of the tobacco industry, the lumber industry, the textile industry, production and distribution.

For more recent evidence as to the conduct of industry in Canada we need to go back no farther than 1939. At that time, when Canada was expressing a need for war equipment, the government placed on the statute books a bill limiting armament profits to 5 per cent. In September the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) made the statement that although the department had appealed to the patriotism of industry, it had been unsuccessful to the extent of being unable to place a single contract.

If we want something more recent respecting the attitude of industry, and particularly its attitude toward the very point with which we are now dealing, let me refer to information received from Kirkland Lake no less recently than last Friday, which tells of twenty-five ex-service men who have not been rehired merely because they took part in a strike to establish the right to collective bargaining through a union of their own choice. These men had had from two to eighteen years' service in the mine. Every one was an ex-service man, and in four cases their sons are in the army. I maintain and I repeat that I do not think industry has proved itself fit to solve a problem as important as this.

What we need is a complete survey of the raw materials and resources of this country and what the nation is going to need. That should have been taken before because we need it badly now, but we shall need it even more during the reconstruction period. Some form of planned economy should also be provided with the object of finding out what the main needs of the people of Canada are, what they are going to require in the way of food, clothing and shelter, and the making of decent homes. To correlate these two ideas may require some change in the status quo, perhaps some change in the motive which is the driving force of our economic and industrial life. The motive of service rather than of profit is one that should present itself to the government at the present time. Some privileges will have to be surrendered.

Labour will have to have its share in the industrial life and the machinery of production of this country. Labour must feel that the plant and machinery of production are something which it owns in part and that the resources of this dominion are the birthright of the Canadian people, not merely some privilege to be handed over to groups of selfish people to be exploited for profit. This bill does not begin to approach the large subject that lies underneath it. I do not blame the minister altogether for this. I think it is a sort of anaemic foundling which he found on his doorstep when he came into office.

Mr. MITCHELL: I want to take exception to that statement.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is merely my opinion.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not my opinion.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I have the floor and I have just about finished. Reading the preamble of this bill is like approaching a dinner when you are very hungry. You find a lot of gravy and a lot of dressing, and you think you are going to have a fine dinner, but when you dig into it you find nothing but tripe. I repeat that the people of Canada are looking to this house for a proper approach to this matter of reestablishment which is so vital at this time. The men in the army and the people at home depend upon the vision and the leadership of this house, and they deserve something better than what is being presented in this bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Interpretation.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This section reads:

In this act and in any order or regulation made thereunder, unless the context otherwise requires,

(a) "service in his majesty's forces" includes service since the commencement of the present war in or out of Canada in any capacity, in pursuance of any enactment relating to the naval, military or air forces, except service during a definite period of military training in pursuance of the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, and shall include service in the Canadian Women's Army Corps or in the Canadian Women's Auxiliary Air Force.

I drew the attention of the minister the other day to the fact that this bill would not cover those taking training under the National Resources Mobilization Act and he pointed out that the regulations governing that training provided for that. I want to point out to the minister that this is another illustration of the point I was trying to make the other day. One man who has taken his training, has had a few months garrison duty and has been discharged, will find, when he wants redress under this legislation, that he will have to go to the minister who will be responsible for this legislation, that is, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). Another man who has been taking training but who has been discharged before his training is completed, or at the completion of his training, will find, if he wants redress, that he must take action under the regulations of the National Resources Mobilization Act and go to the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson). Two men wanting the same thing should be able to go to the same agency. I notice in the order in council upon which this piece of legislation is founded that there was no such provision. Order in council P.C. 4758, reads in part as follows:

(a) "service in his majesty's forces" includes service since the commencement of the present war in or out of Canada in any capacity, in pursuance of any enactment relating to the military, naval or air forces.

I wonder whether it would not be better from the point of view of administration to take out that clause and to have this apply to any man or woman who is connected in any way with any of the armed services. If you do not do that, you are going to have one man applying to one minister, and another man, under different circumstances, applying to another minister.

Mr. MITCHELL: That matter was considered, and it was decided that under section 21 of the national war services regulations the machinery was provided to enforce the employers' liability. This measure covers a much broader field in that it applies to the navy, the air force and the men in what might be termed the permanent forces rather than those called up for the four months' training.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): A good illustration was the one I gave the other day. A letter concerning the discharge of a man who was in the middle of this training was sent across the floor to the Minister of National War Services, and nothing was done. It was sent to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), and nothing was done. It was passed over the other day to the Minister of Pensions and National Health, and I want to thank him for taking immediate action. That is an illustration of how a thing may get a runaround. It would be much better to have it all under one minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) quoted one order in council, but the other day I referred to supplementary order in council, P.C. 7680, of October 7, 1941, which brings the men under compulsory training within the provisions of the compulsory reinstatement order, P.C. 7458. The statute as proposed does not go as far as the two supplementary orders in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what he said. He said men would have to go to different agencies.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I was merely making the point that it should all come under the one minister rather than two. Irrespective of whether a man is in the process of training or has finished his training, he should be able to get redress from the same minister. One man would apply to the Minister of National War Services for redress, and another would make application to the Minister of Pensions and National Health. There ought to be just the one agency operating under one piece of legislation.

Mr. POULIOT: I have just one question to ask the minister, and then after that I may have to have further details. Upon reading this section I wonder whether a distinction is not being established between men and women. The men who will come under this section are those who are serving in his majesty's forces anywhere, in any country. Looking closely at the section it means that men who enlist in the British army, in his majesty's forces anywhere in the world, will be able to take advantage of this legislation. Is that right or not?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is right.

Mr. POULIOT: I consider it a shame. Under previous legislation it was required that a person should have resided in Canada for some time prior to the great war to enjoy a preference in appointment to the civil service, and under that legislation the civil service has been filled with people who were not born in this country and who are now occupying the finest positions in the land. Canada has become the dumping ground for all the nations of the world.

There is a distinction made in the legislation before us—and the minister was honest enough to admit it—between men and women. Men may come from all over the world to take advantage of this legislation and get something from this government, but for women service in his majesty's forces shall include service in the Canadian Women's Army Corps or in the Canadian Women's Auxiliary Air Force. There is a distinction clearly made between men and women, and how the minister can bring legislation like that before this house and this committee I cannot understand. He is a new minister, and I was quite open-minded because he was my colleague in the house for a certain length of time, but I cannot conceive that his idea of Canadian citizenship is that this country shall become the dumping ground of all the nations of the world and that it is to be enough for a man to get into his majesty's forces anywhere, in central Africa or anywhere else, to be entitled to the same privileges as a red-blooded Canadian who enlists in the Canadian army. This I cannot conceive to be right, and I do not know any Canadian citizen, born in Canada, who would pilot legislation like that through this house. I do not know any member who is not enough of a Canadian to protest strongly and bitterly against it until it is defeated in this committee and in this house. I have never before spoken like this, but it is time that we opened our eyes and stopped making fools of ourselves.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Sit down then.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask the hon. member to keep quiet while I am speaking. If he has anything to say he can say it afterwards. I shall not use any stronger language than he did. He interrupts continually, but I am addressing him for the first time, and I use the third person in addressing my hon. friend. It is never too late to tell the truth.

I find this legislation scandalous. It is time that we stopped making Canada nothing more than a dumping ground for all the nations of the world.

Mr. MITCHELL: In reply to my hon. friend the member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who has talked about Canada being a dumping ground, let me say that the Minister of Labour is one of those who were dumped, and I am proud of it.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister is a credit to Canada, too.

Mr. MITCHELL: I might add that I have recently been through a by-election in Welland, and in speaking to the good people of that constituency I dwelt on the difficulty of governing a nation made up of all of the finest blood streams of Europe, including my own and my hon. friend's blood streams. My grandfather was a Frenchman and I am proud of it. At this very difficult time through which we are passing, when the very life of our institutions which it has taken centuries to build up is at stake, I do not think it is well that utterances should go forth from this House of Commons which would have for their purpose the splitting of this nation, not into two racial groups only, but into dozens of racial groups.

Whether my hon. friend likes it or not, the democratic nations of the world are in the most desperate position in their history. If we win this war it will be a miracle. But miracles have been performed by our peoples before and they will be undertaken by them again. In this very difficult period I do not think it lies in the mouth of any member of this house to rise in his place and cast reflections on men and women who have made a distinct contribution in building up this Dominion of Canada. I do not take second place to my hon. friend or anyone else in this house or in this dominion in loyalty to our institutions. I have been around this old world and have seen the institutions which have been built up by the British peoples. I believe that the science of government which has been handed down to the rest of the world by the British peoples has been the greatest contribution to government in the whole history of the civilized world, and I hope that everyone in this dominion, irrespective of race, religion or colour, will do everything he can to help weld us together so that we may move forward through these difficult times to preserve and maintain our freedom and, when the war is over to extend the blessings of democratic government as we understand it.

I think my hon. friend misunderstands the tenor of the particular clause to which he refers, because it provides that a man must have worked in Canada before he can get the benefits of this legislation. I know some of our finest Canadian boys who at this moment are serving in the Royal Air Force and with the British navy and I think it is only right that these young men after they have completed their term of service should receive the same treatment, if they come within the four corners of this legislation, as those Canadians who join a distinctly Canadian force. That is elementary justice. We have always been credited with fairness and surely to God we are going to be fair to our own flesh and blood. We are not going to differentiate between them simply because some of our young fellows are serving in the British forces. If it were not for these young chaps up in an aeroplane to-day, this house would not be in session and probably I would be dead; I do not know what others would be doing. I think it is absolutely sound that we should treat these young men the same as we treat the young fellows who join distinctly Canadian forces, whether on the land or on the sea or in the air.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see that the minister is applauded by the Tory members of the house. I have been a member of this house for seventeen years; the members know very well that I have never spoken of race or religion in this house, and I am not to do so now.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What are you doing now?

Mr. POULIOT: I am going to teach my hon. friend a lesson in Canadianism. It is true that we are two races in this country, and the only way to have a perfect understanding between them is to believe in equal rights. In my humble view those who were born in Canada and those who have lived here for a long time, whether they speak English, French or any other language, provided that they have taken the oath of allegiance to His Majesty the King and are loyal citizens should have a preference over anyone who comes here from outside. That is my humble opinion. It is time to remind the Minister of Labour—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This does not apply.

Mr. POULIOT: It is quite appropriate, because it relates to the very section.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It does not apply.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask the minister to keep quiet. He knows very well that I make an exception for him, and that I have said concerning him, that there were some people who were not born in Canada who are better Canadians than some who were born in this country. In that I referred to him.

I want now to continue and finish what I have to say. I will not be hard upon the Minister of Labour, because he has been out of the house for a long time. But when he referred to his election in Welland, let me say I am sure that the present legislation was never mentioned to the good electors of that constituency. I should like to have known their verdict if it had been.

I want everyone in this country to be just as happy as possible under the present dire circumstances which we have to confront; and after the war I want every Canadian to have an opportunity to live and not to be the servant of anybody who comes from anywhere else.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about Hitler?

Mr. POULIOT: That is my humble point of view. Whether it is to be explained to the electors of York-Sunbury, where the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), resides, or to any constituency of the city of Toronto, let me say that I am ready to have a joint meeting with the Minister of Labour in his new constituency of Welland, in York-Sunbury where my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has his residence, or in any constituency in Toronto and discuss the matter with any member of the House of Commons. What I want is that every Canadian citizen shall be given the first opportunity in this country.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I should like to know what this discussion has to do with the bill now before the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have asked the Chairman, not the hon. member.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask my hon. friend—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I asked the Chairman, not you.

Mr. POULIOT: I ask the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) to take the trouble in the first place to read the rules of the house.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member for Témiscouata wish to speak on the point of order?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Well, then, speak.

Mr. POULIOT: Section 2 reads thus:

2. In this act and in any order or regulation made thereunder, unless the context otherwise requires,

(a) "service in his majesty's forces" includes service since the commencement of the present war in or out of Canada in any capacity, in pursuance of any enactment relating to the naval, military or air forces, except service during a definite period of military training in pursuance of the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, and shall include service in the Canadian Women's Army Corps or in the Canadian Women's Auxiliary Air Force;

The second part of this section, paragraph (b), refers to employers.

My argument, sir, was that the people mentioned in the first place could have been non-Canadians excepting for a short residence in Canada, and the point was confirmed by the Minister of Labour himself when I asked him the question whether all those in his majesty's forces could enjoy the advantages of this legislation if they were men; his answer was, "yes." It was after that that I said that red-blooded Canadian citizens were entitled to a preference over anybody coming from any other country to this country. That was my contention. At that point the hon. member for Fraser Valley—my good friend, except for five minutes a month—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are on a point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: —rose on a question of order and complained that I was not in order in discussing this matter. I claim that his objection is unfounded and, sir, I await your ruling with confidence.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I say one word? I am willing that the hon. member should proceed.

Mr. POULIOT: I am dealing with a point of order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Let the hon. member talk. He will talk, anyhow.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) desire to speak on the point of order?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Yes. I am willing to withdraw my objection. The hon. member for Témiscouata is going to have his say anyway. Let him have it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I say a word, Mr. Chairman, before you rule on the point of order? This is entirely on a question of viewpoint and policy. As I understand it, the hon. member for Témiscouata says in effect that if a person has been only a short time in Canada, even though in employment, if he enlists in the forces of his majesty he is not entitled to the benefits of this legislation. This legislation gives him the right to reemployment in Canada provided he has been in actual employment before enlisting in the service of His Majesty the King, and I believe the whole house will agree with that.

The CHAIRMAN: Does any other hon. member desire to speak on the point of order?

The point of order is that the remarks of the hon. member for Témiscouata were not related to the section now before the committee. The reference is, clearly, to standing order 58 of the rules of the house. Section 2 of the bill defines the classes of persons who will have the benefits given by the measure. As Chairman, I am not supposed to pass judgment on the merits of the submission made by the hon. member for Témiscouata. I would think that the remarks would have been more appropriate, perhaps, under section 3, where the privilege so created is enacted. But I believe that the definition of the persons who are to benefit under section 3, being a limitation of these persons, is sufficiently broad to justify the hon. member in discussing the matters which he has discussed, under section 2. I think there is a sufficient relationship between his remarks and section 2 for me to rule that his remarks were within the provisions of the rules of the house.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, section 2, as you have said, in my judgment very appropriately, enumerates the various groups or classes of the returning soldier workers who are to benefit under this measure; and it is about that that I wish to speak for a moment or two. I have not any fault to find with those who are enumerated but rather as to those who are left out. I would refer for a moment or two to the paragraph of section 2 which reads:

(a) "service in his majesty's forces" includes service since the commencement of the present war. . . .

Then it describes that service in Canada prior to or immediately following the outbreak of war, in subparagraph (i) and of paragraph (b), where it is stated:

(i) had employee status on September 9, 1939.

Which means that any man or woman employed in industry prior to September 9 had what might be called a more or less permanent, or, as the bill says, employee status, and so comes under the benefits of this measure. Quite right, I support that. That means, when that particular group returns to Canada they shall under this measure be taken back into the factory in which they had been working when they enlisted, and if the old job is not in operation, I assume the bill says they are to have something equal to it. I agree with that. Then—

(ii) having been hired after September 9, 1939, was employed for at least six months. . . .

That is the second group. It means that any soldier worker, man or woman, who had been employed following the outbreak of the war for a period of six months, returning to Canada, shall be eligible to be put back on the job he or she gave up in order to enlist, or an equivalent job in the factory in which he or she had been employed. I have no objection to that. But I am wondering what is to happen to the multitude of young men who did not have employee status on September 9, 1939, or did not have employment for six months following September 9.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Provision had been made for the cases mentioned under the terms of the order in council of October 1, 1941, under which it is not of any consequence whether or not employment was had before enlisting in the service. Whether he had employment before he enlisted or not, we are charged with the responsibility of trying to find employment for him, and there are six specified benefits, by way of vocational training, educational training, awaiting the return of crops and others, made available to him under that order in council. If we fail to find employment for that man through any of these other five groups or benefits, then he is entitled to out-of-work benefit for fifty-two weeks after his discharge within a period not exceeding eighteen months after the time of discharge.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is splendid news. I had not heard of that before. But why is that not in the bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This was introduced only as a result of a promise made. This was an order in council passed in June, 1941; subsequently to that several others were passed. It is a matter of policy really whether it is wise to embody these orders in council in legislation during the progress of a war, because we may find it necessary to amend them from week to week and improve them. During the last war most of the legislation was deferred until the conclusion of the war. In regard to the provisions of the order in council of October 1, 1941, we thought it wise not to implement it by legislation, but there was an objection raised by the hon. leader of the opposition, and quite properly so, that we should implement this particular order in council by legislation. At that time the then Minister of Labour promised that this bill would be introduced implementing the order in council.

I do not want my hon. friend to have the idea that this is considered to be all-embracing; it is not. It is an infinitesimal part almost of the entire programme of reconstruction, and possibly it is unfortunate that it comes into the house at this time. I agree with the suggestion of some hon. members the other day that possibly the house would have a better conception of what is being done if we were able at the same time to take a comprehensive view of these orders in council before a committee. But this bill comes before the house as a result of a promise made and a promise kept. Its scope is very limited. It has been administered under order in council by my department for the last eight months, and although very few cases have come to our attention we have succeeded in every case in obtaining successful results. Therefore I would urge upon the committee again not to conclude that this is a major measure of reconstruction policy, because it is not.

Mr. MacNICOL: I think the bill is even better than the minister says.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We think it is good as far as it goes.

Mr. MacNICOL: It touches only the fringe, but it is a large fringe, because it provides employment for those who had employee status on September 9; that is not a small number—

Mr MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It will become more important as the years go on.

Mr. MacNICOL: —and it will provide employment for those who obtained employment in the following six months; that also will be a goodly number. It is a good start in the right direction; I would not minimize it. But there are many men coming home now who did not have employee status and whom I should like to see covered. What is being done just now I do not know, but the bill does not provide for those who did not have employee status. I am glad to hear the minister say that provision has been made for them by order in council, but I should like to have seen a provision in the bill. Since, however, my hon. leader said something about that, I would not for a moment differ from anything he said, because he has a great knowledge of law and the drafting of statutes and I have none, so probably the better way to do it is the way the minister has set out to do.

I think the minister has cleared up the question I wanted disposed of, concerning that large number of soldier young men who, through no fault of their own, never did a day's work because the work was not there for them to do, either before or after the outbreak of the war. I understand now that they are to be provided for, so I have nothing further to say about section 2.

Mr. FAIR: I should like the minister to give an outline or some definition of this. Paragraph (i) reads:

had employee status on September 9, 1939, or by reason of wage agreement or otherwise had a recognized position, other than a temporary position.

And paragraph (ii):

having been hired after September 9, 1939, was employed for at least six months in other than a temporary position (exclusive of any probationary period required by published regulation or agreement as of September 9, 1939) immediately before he was accepted for service in his majesty's forces.

At the present time and for years past I believe that in the civil service, for example, there are people who have been working for quite a long time but are still classed as temporaries. That qualification existing in that and other lines of business would perhaps deprive people who should be classed as having steady employment of benefits under this bill. Would the minister define what is meant by those two paragraphs which I have read?

Mr. MITCHELL: "Employee status" is generally understood in industry. Where there are wage agreements it is usually defined in the agreement. It differs from one industry to another. My experience has been, notwithstanding some hard things that have been said here to-night about industry, that there are decent, honest employers, and my view is that with this bill as leadership it will be found that the Canadian employer in the main and where it is practicable—there are always exceptions—will measure up to his responsibilities.

Mr. MacINNIS: Such as the Kirkland Lake employers.

Mr. MITCHELL: We will deal with that when the time comes. You have your say and I shall have mine. We are dealing now with this particular bill. I believe this bill will give leadership to Canadian employers. For the information of the committee I might say that our two railroads have not only adopted the principle of this bill already but have done even better than this bill. I have heard many hard things said about the railroads of this country, so I think it should be fairly stated in this house when an employer does treat his employees decently. I do not think you should convict the whole of Canadian industry because some employers do not play cricket. After all is said and done, that is a two-way street too; there are two phases of that matter.

Mr. MARTIN: The minister has forgotten the point raised by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. He pointed out that in paragraph (b) (ii), those holding temporary positions are not regarded as having "employee status", and then he goes on to point out that there are many people working in the civil service who are not permanent and who consequently could not take advantage of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that not a very technical interpretation?

Mr. FAIR: That is what I want cleared up. We have civil servants who have been employed for the last five years, but who are still temporary. On the other hand, a man or woman may be in some other job for only a month, yet he or she would be regarded as having a permanent position.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would this not be a fair thing to say about the civil service, that in the main you can almost call them permanent temporaries? It is a technical point, I think, but that is what I would call them. Many of these people in the civil service have worked for the government for a number of years. I agree that it is a contradiction in terms, but I am told that this is how they are described in the civil service itself.

Mr. COLDWELL: Some of them have been temporary for twenty years.

Mr. FAIR: My reason for wanting these technicalities cleared up is in order that no one may be deprived of the benefits of this legislation later on because of the technicalities that may exist in the bill as it stands.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to ask the minister one question, and then I will proceed with the remarks I have to make. Is this bill intended to cover not only those who have enlisted to date but also those who may enlist hereafter?

Mr. MITCHELL: Absolutely.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, Mr. Chairman, I submit that it will afford no protection in securing reinstatement to any man who enlists after this date. As I understand the situation, this statute is based on an order in council, and I am going to point out to the minister that the bill as it is now drafted will not protect any man after this date. In order to prepare a foundation for my argument, I first point to line 6 of the preamble, which reads:

. . . and whereas many employers of persons who have enlisted to serve in his majesty's forces in the present war have voluntarily undertaken to reinstate in employment such persons . . .

Then at line 12:

. . . and whereas it is desirable that all persons who have left employment to enlist should be relieved of any cause for concern in regard to their reinstatement in such employment, and that there should be uniformity of treatment in the matter of reinstatement in employment of those who have so enlisted; and whereas it is deemed expedient for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada that provision should be made for the orderly reinstatement in their previous employment of such persons aforesaid . . .

In every case in the preamble reference is made to persons who have enlisted prior to this date. In no case in the preamble is there any reference to the necessity of protecting the men who enlist after this date. While ordinarily the preamble is not regarded as part of the statute, nevertheless it will be looked at in the matter of interpretation. The preamble definitely refers only to those persons who have enlisted to date.

Mr. McLARTY: Would that not be taken to refer to the time at which they seek reinstatement, rather than the time of their enlistment?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, I will go on now to the definition of service in his majesty's forces. It does not say what this means, but it does say what it includes: It reads:

"service in his majesty's forces" includes service since the commencement of the present war in or out of Canada in any capacity, in pursuance of any enactment relating to the naval, military or air forces. . . .

That is service since the commencement of the present war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): At any time since the commencement of the war, up to the time of application for reinstatement.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, I am just pointing out the situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no question about that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It goes on to say:

. . . and shall include service in the Canadian Women's Army Corps or in the Canadian Women's Auxiliary Air Force.

Then I refer to section 3, which reads:

It shall be the duty of any employer by whom a person accepted for service in his majesty's forces was employed when accepted for such service, to reinstate him in employment after honourable discharge . . .

Reading that portion of section 3 with the preamble, and with section 2 (a), I say to the minister that in my opinion it refers only to those who have heretofore enlisted and does not cover those who may hereafter enlist, and as the matter stands at present I think it should be submitted to the law officers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I may inform my hon. friend that it has been very carefully reviewed by the law officers. The intention of the statute is most manifest, in that it relates to service at any time from September 9, 1939, until the soldier comes back and applies for reinstatement. This is only a bill concerning reinstatement in previous employment. It does not matter when the soldier comes back; his application for reinstatement is valid any time after he returns from service in his majesty's forces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like first of all to refer to the parentage of this bill. On many occasions the minister has said that this measure was brought down in response to a promise made to me. That promise was asked in order to give some permanency to this policy, because an order in council might be altered or rescinded overnight. So much for that.

I believe there is something more in the contention of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) than the minister appears to see. The interpretation of statutes is always a technical and difficult thing. If there is any doubt about it in the minds of legal men, it should be made clear. I must confess that I had not thought of the point mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre until he spoke to me about it, but I think it is a point that ought to be reviewed. On the spur of the moment the best thing I can suggest to the minister to help make it clear is to insert the word "shall" in line 13 of page 1, before the word "have" at the beginning of that line. Then it would read "shall have left employment to enlist." That might not have the effect I think it will have, but I was thinking quickly, and on the spur of the moment. The words "who have, or shall hereafter" would be still better.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have no objection to that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then, in line 17 I suggest the words, "those who have or shall hereafter have enlisted", or something like that. I would ask that those words be reviewed.

I have a question or two with regard to section 2. If I understood the minister correctly, there was a subsequent order in council which made provision for those who were not covered by the order in council which is being crystallized into this statute. Those who did not have employee status are being taken care of under special provisions, and under a special set-up. I believe that is a fair statement. Would it not have been well to have all the provisions incorporated in one statute, and one set-up, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Weyburn.

I have not heard any answer to that suggestion. The minister has made it quite clear that they have attempted to take care of the men by a different arrangement. I should think it would have been wise to place that arrangement in the same bill, and I ask that consideration be given the point. We all wish to accomplish the same purpose; it is a matter of method, more than anything else.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the point raised by the hon. member for Témiscouata I would say that any man who left Canada and a job, no matter what his nationality may have been, should be taken back, just like any other person. I believe that upon reflection the hon. member for Témiscouata will admit that that is so. When he first spoke I thought he had in mind those who had enlisted in the armed forces of the empire, but who perhaps had not employee status, or had not established residence. I do not think that can be so. I suggest, however, that he should not press the point, because it might raise a very unpleasant feeling throughout the country.

I have one further question with respect to section 2. Why in paragraph b (ii) do we find the expression "was employed for at least six months in other than a temporary position (exclusive of any probationary period required . . .)"—and so on. Why is there provision for a period as long as six months? If the person affected had a permanent job, is the element of six months important?

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Then the effective date with reference to employee status is September 9. Does this not rule out that number of men who resigned their jobs and who enlisted between August 30 and September 9? They could not be said to have employee status, once they resigned their positions, a few days in advance of the war. Some people knew it was coming, and prepared themselves to go. There is a gap in there, and there does not seem to be sufficient flexibility. I would ask that the minister give thought to these suggestions before the bill leaves the committee stage. Those people could not in law be said to have employee status on the day war broke out, if they had resigned before that with a view to enlistment, or taking up war service.

I am not quite sure what is meant by the last part of subparagraph (ii). I have been trying to understand it, but I believe I cannot until I know something more about the circumstances. What is contemplated by lines 21 to 24 inclusive, where we find the words:

. . . or any person carrying on any undertaking or service with which such undertaking or service has been amalgamated or in which it was comprised when the employee's service in his majesty's forces began.

What is visualized by those words? I do not understand them?

Mr. MITCHELL: There are some people who, if they succeed in making a bill so complicated they cannot understand it themselves, decide it will work. This was drafted by the law officers of the crown. The intention of the subparagraph is that if a firm is absorbed by another firm, a man retains his employee status in the amalgamation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With the succeeding firm.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. If the firm should split up into a number of smaller firms or partnerships, in the break-up the man will retain employee status in that particular branch of the firm.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the intended meaning.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let us suppose that Jones Brothers sold out, lock, stock and barrel, to Brown Brothers. Brown Brothers are then to assume the obligations of Jones Brothers. Is that the case it is intended to meet?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is the intention, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If it will work.

Mr. MARTIN: Is there not some merit in the suggestion of the leader of the opposition? I believe there is much merit in it. The important date in the bill is September 9, and yet parts of the British commonwealth were at war before that date. Many Canadians made arrangements for enlistment earlier.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To join the Royal Air Force, for instance.

Mr. MARTIN: Consequently, if they did resign before September 9 they could not be brought within the section. Since it is intended that they should be, I believe the suggestion of the leader of the opposition should be accepted.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am inclined to agree with that, myself. Possibly the insertion of the words "or who before that date left their employment for the purpose of serving overseas in his majesty's forces" would be satisfactory. However, the section should stand for consideration along that line.

Mr. REID: I was wondering whether this section is all-embracing. I know the measure is designed to take care of those who enlisted in the active forces, either of the army, the navy or the air force. But I have in mind a number of citizens serving in the mercantile marine, which is not connected with the military organization, in the strict sense of the term, but who have given faithful service on the high seas. For instance, I have in mind a man who left employment in New Westminster, and who while serving on the seas since that time, has been torpedoed on three occasions. Yet he is not connected in any practical way with the army, the navy or the air force. There are also men connected with fire brigades, who have gone abroad.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As civilians?

Mr. REID: They have gone to London. Will not those men upon their return look for the same consideration as the men who are being protected by this bill? I know the men in the mercantile marine lead hazardous lives, many of them serving on the high seas day in and day out. Will this section include those classes of persons?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would not take in the merchant marine; would it take in the fire-fighters?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Just the naval, military and air forces.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If the section is to stand, I would suggest again to the minister, without appearing unduly to press it, that he give consideration to striking out the words between the word "forces" at the end of line 31 and the figure "1940" in line 3 on the following page.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): To make it correspond with the previous order in council?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee suggests that section 2 stands.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We are entitled to know the implication of the hon. member's suggestion. He does not speak very distinctly.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): For the benefit of the hon. member I may say I am suggesting that the lines which debar men who were discharged while taking their compulsory training be taken out so as to allow them the benefits of this legislation instead of their having to avail themselves of section 21 of the compulsory training regulations. In that way all men making an appeal for reestablishment in civilian employment will come under one piece of legislation and under the administration of one minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend would not delete all the rest of the section; he would leave in the words—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): After the figure "1940" of line three, page two.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That will be considered.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will this cover the man who has worked as a hired man for ten or twelve years?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If he enlists?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Who enlists.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I certainly think it would apply to him. I thought my hon. friend meant a man who might be getting leave for work on a farm.

Mr. MITCHELL: It applies to everybody.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Supposing in the interval the farmer's son who was under age and could not enlist has taken the place of the hired man; what happens?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will take that hurdle when I come to it.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will it cover the man who has worked for the government in a temporary position?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It does not apply to the crown.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would think that the crown will be just as generous to its employees under this legislation as it expects employers in private industry to be.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Technically it does not apply to the crown.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I am referring to the men who work on the canals and who have employment for perhaps five or six months in the year. Many of them have been working for the government for fifteen or twenty years and they should be covered.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think we should take up too much time in trying to find out whether this is going to apply to government employees who enlist. It seems to me that this bill will come into operation only in certain specific cases. Where men are fairly well organized, such as in the railways, mentioned by the Minister of Labour, there will be no difficulty in regard to reinstatement. That would be arranged before they enlist. Employees know that they will maintain their seniority, and the companies will agree that they may come into their positions as they were when they left. This bill will apply largely to men who are not organized. That is the way the government could deal with their temporary employees. The government should decide what it is going to do; it would not need a bill of this kind. I think it would be rather an anomaly to put conditions like that in a bill. This is a very restricted bill and we should consider it in that way.

Mr. WHITE: The definition of "employer" in section 2 is any person carrying on any undertaking or service. Does the minister not think there should be some other definition to include corporations, companies and partnerships?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under the Interpretation Act, "person" includes corporation.

Mr. WHITE: This is the interpretation. If an action is taken later on, it may be found that a corporation is not covered by this definition.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The phraseology is exactly the same as that in the order in council, but that point will be considered with the law officers before the bill is disposed of in committee.

Mr. HAZEN: The leader of the opposition has suggested that lines 21 to 24 should be redrafted. I am sure that no one in this committee can interpret what those lines mean.

They should be clear in the bill and I think they should be redrafted.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the minister indicate what benefit would accrue to a man who had enlisted, served in England for one or two years, and then was discharged within the last three, four or five months?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This bill only covers reinstatement in civil employment, and that would mean only a small fraction of those coming back. There are other provisions, as I explained earlier in the evening, which are quite widespread in scope and which deal generally with those who are discharged. In the first place, those who are discharged and pensionable—

Mr. LOCKHART: Not pensionable.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am coming to that class immediately. In connection with those who are not pensionable, there are various grants to cover reconditioning. If they can be reconditioned back to a better physical position for civilian employment, that is carried on and they can receive pay and dependents' allowances for 122 days for their families, when they are discharged while still in hospital. There are grants to cover those whose education has been interrupted and who may wish to resume their studies at college or university. There is a grant to cover vocational training for those who would like to go on and take courses in industrial training. If none of these other benefits are available, then there are what we call out-of-work benefits which are paid as a last alternative and which amount to $9 and $13 a week for single and married men respectively. These apply to those men who are coming back under the provisions of the order in council of October 1. This bill applies only to one phase of the matter—the reinstatement by compulsion of those who were in previous employment.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Do I understand the minister to say that some provision will be made for, say a young fellow who had taken a year in a university and then joined the air force? What assistance will be given this man when he comes back if he wants to return to the university?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is all covered by the terms of the order in council.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What number is that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I sent a copy personally to every hon. member so that he would not have to depend upon the Canada Gazette to find out what these provisions were.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am afraid they do not read them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There are grants for exactly the type of case mentioned by my hon. friend. For those who come back and wish to resume their education which was interrupted by the war, subsistence grants are made to enable them to continue their course, and provision is made for paying the fees at the college or university while their education is being completed. That is one of the most far-reaching benefits that has been granted in any country.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I may be wrong, but as I understood the argument of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) the other night, he advocated that soldiers returning from overseas be treated exactly the same as men working in munition factories or shipyards. My question is, are the soldiers to receive separate consideration from those working in shipyards and munitions factories?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is a definite preference in the civil service already established by order in council for those who have served with his majesty's Canadian forces and were resident in Canada before going overseas. There is also a preference at the present time in government departments, particularly in the Department of Munitions and Supply and the Department of Public Works, for those who have served with his majesty's forces, and of course upon their return that will be a very substantial and far-reaching preference.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I understood from the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East that he objected to that. I am in favour of it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I never objected to a preference for the returned men in the way the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) has put it. He wants to make a little political capital in Fraser Valley, but I am prepared to go to Fraser Valley and make out my case to the perfect satisfaction of every man in that constituency.

Mr. GILLIS: Since this clause dealing specifically with the status of employees is to stand, I should like to make a few remarks now for the consideration of those who will be revising this clause.

As I see it, this bill has to do with one of the most important parts of rehabilitation, how the man who leaves his job is to be placed when he returns. The minister of pensions said a moment or two ago that all or most of the legislation with respect to rehabilitation after the last war was left until the war was over. I know that many of us have grown old seeking legislation to try to cure some of the ills, physical and economic, suffered by the men who went through the last war.

What I am concerned about now is this. The economy of Canada to-day is geared to curtail as much as possible consumption buying and the production of consumer goods, in the course of which many peace-time industries are being legislated out of the picture. In the rubber industry, for example, I believe that thousands of workers will soon be out of work. These men will not have a job.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member would not blame this legislation or government policy for that?

Mr. GILLIS: No; I am simply pointing out what is happening. Many men employed in the rubber industry will be without a job through no fault of their own and through no fault of the minister, because he has no control over the shortage of rubber. These men will then have no status as an employee. Numbers of them will probably go into the armed forces in order to get a job, and when they return after the war is over, they will have no status as an employee when they enlisted. I leave that thought with the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They have all the other rights.

Mr. MacNICOL: They would have established employee status by being at work on September 9, 1939, or having been employed for six months after September 9.

Mr. GILLIS: The retail gasoline industry is also being gradually legislated out of the picture. I know a lot of men who have enlisted and who had no status as an employee because the curtailment of their business forced them into unemployment. Having no status as an employee when they enlisted, they have no job under this bill when they return.

I have also in mind the men in Kirkland Lake who are unemployed to-day. Many of them since they became unemployed have perhaps already enlisted. They became unemployed because they obeyed the laws of Canada and accepted the government's proclamation by order in council that they had a right to do certain things and because the government urged them to organize and cooperate with industry. Many of these men who will go into the armed forces have now no status as employees. As I pointed out in the few remarks I made on the second reading of the bill, I think it was a mistake to have separated this bill from the department of pensions. I think it should have stayed in that department and with the committee who have been working on rehabilitation in the past.

There is another class of worker for whom I would speak. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) referred to them a few moments ago. The men in the merchant marine are performing, I believe, one of the most essential war services to-day. We would have no war abroad if it were not for the service these men are performing. In the section from which I come many men have left industry and gone into the merchant marine. They have some protection if serving on a Canadian ship, but otherwise they have none. I have known of many ships which have docked in the port of Sydney and whose captains have had to go out and recruit men before they could take their ships out again. For patriotic reasons men have left their ordinary employment and gone into that service, and I think that under this bill they should have the same protection after the war as the men in the armed forces. There is not a man in uniform or out of it who is performing a greater service and getting as little for it as the men in the merchant marine. I take off my hat to them. They are performing one of the most vital services in connection with the war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They saved the army at Dunkirk.

Mr. GILLIS: Exactly, and they are now feeding the army, under difficult circumstances. It takes a lot of courage to get on these boats even when they are in harbour, let alone crossing the ocean. I make these remarks for the purpose of provoking the thoughts of the minister, so that when clause 2 is under revision consideration may be given to the points I have raised.

Mr. LOCKHART: There is one point I should like the minister to clarify. He indicated very clearly the provisions of the order in council, but I have in mind several cases of men who enlisted one or two years ago in category A and have been discharged in category E. I referred one of these cases to one of the departments recently, but I do not know where it will be finally dealt with. These men will be going into hospitalization for six, eight or ten months, possibly a year. When they come out, will they still be qualified to benefit under this bill, as and when it is passed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am not sure whether I caught the point.

Mr. LOCKHART: It will probably be a year before these men have recovered their health sufficiently to get into employment again. Will their employer then have to take them back?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The point has not come to my attention before, but I would say yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: How can these men make application when in a state of convalescence except by anticipating their condition a year hence? The bill says that application must be made within a prescribed time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Were they demobilized or discharged?

Mr. LOCKHART: The man I have in mind was discharged on the seventeenth of February.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It would depend upon the interpretation of section 4, which says: "within three months after discharge". I would imagine that would only apply within three months after discharge from the forces. On the other hand, if the man were in one of our own hospitals awaiting discharge, he would apply within three months after discharge from the hospital.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would he get hospitalization after discharge?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, then, he would not be covered.

Mr. GREEN: Is that not a very important point, because many of these men who come back are not fit, and then they are discharged from the army and go under the Department of Pensions and National Health for treatment, and they are not able to work until they have completed that treatment? Surely section 4 should be amended to give the man three months, or whatever may be the time, after his discharge from the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We have not yet reached section 4 of the bill. But I think the point is very well taken and that this should be clarified.

Section stands.

On section 3—Duty of employer to reinstate employee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is the section which provides for reinstatement. It sets forth the duty of the employer to reinstate the employee, and there is a proviso which deals with the question of preserving the established rules of seniority in the employer's establishment. And it—

Mr. MARTIN: And it leaves out pension rights.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It leaves out pension rights. That is exactly what I am coming to. Suppose, for instance, a man has served for fifteen years in the employment of a particular firm and had established his right to pension in respect of that period of service; he then enlists, and at the conclusion of the war he returns to his previous employment. His pension rights are not preserved by the statute, and there is nothing in the statute which compels the employer to preserve the pension rights. He may have to begin over again. I do not know what the action would be on the part of an employer. To-day nearly every big establishment has some kind of a pension system. Some systems are contributory; some are not. I understand that all the railways now have contributory pension systems. A man has some vested rights there. I suggest that this section be redrafted to take care of pension rights just as much as seniority. It is very important to the men. I have often talked to railway men about their pension rights, and I do know that the older they grow, the more they value those rights. It is a kind of magna charta against old age. I should like to have the minister give attention to this question and let us have some undertaking with respect to it.

Mr. MITCHELL: The point raised by the leader of the opposition is one to which I have given some thought. However, the phrase "conditions not less favourable" on page 2, line 30, of the bill, implies the retention of pension and other rights, and regulations can be made under authority of section 11, which could define conditions not less favourable, explicitly to include the retention of such rights. If the bill should specify the retention of pension rights, it might be construed to mean that other unspecified rights were not retained. It might, therefore, be advisable to leave such matters to regulations, especially since different arrangements would be necessary with respect to contributory and non-contributory pensions, sick benefit insurance plans and other plans. I think my hon. friend can rest assured that the matter will not be overlooked.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, if I were construing this, I would suggest that the clause in the earlier part of section 3 which the minister quoted, "and under conditions not less favourable to him than those which would have been applicable to him had he not enlisted", do not apply to questions of seniority and the like. They apply to his working conditions and his pay and emoluments, and contractual relationships which exist between the parties. Especially is authority given to that contention in the succeeding proviso, which is really not an overriding proviso at all, but is intended, I think, to be an extension of the clause that the minister quoted, "provided, that the right to reinstatement shall be subject to established rules of seniority in the employer's establishment". Under the ejusdem generis rule "pension rights" ought to go in there. I press for that. I am not sure that you can by regulation under section 11 force an employer to give the man a pension.

Mr. MITCHELL: I want to say this to my hon. friend, that he is no more insistent than I would be that these men shall retain their pension rights.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is important.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes; it is important. The lawyers tell me that if it is specifically mentioned there, you must mention all the other things like insurance and sick benefit funds.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want to think about that a little. I want pensions in if I can get it in.

Mr. MITCHELL: As far as I am concerned it would be satisfactory to insert "pension rights" among the other rights specified.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, you had better consider it overnight.

TAXATION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I desire to table the text of the convention between Canada and the United States of America for the avoidance of double taxation and prevention of fiscal evasion, which was signed at Washington on March 4, 1942.

HONG KONG

TREATMENT OF MILITARY AND CIVILIAN PRISONERS BY JAPANESE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the United Kingdom secretary of state for foreign affairs made the following statement in the House of Commons at Westminster to-day in reply to an inquiry regarding the treatment of military prisoners and civilians by the Japanese army at Hong Kong after its capitulation:

Out of regard for the feelings of the thousands of relations of the victims, his majesty's government have been unwilling to publish any accounts of Japanese atrocities at Hong Kong until these had been confirmed beyond any possibility of doubt.

His Majesty's government are now in possession of statements by reliable eye witnesses who succeeded in escaping from Hong Kong towards the end of January or early in February. Their testimony established the fact that Japanese army at Hong Kong perpetrated against their helpless military prisoners and civil population, without distinction of race or colour, the same kind of barbarities which aroused the horror of the civilized world at the time of the Nanking massacre of 1937.

It is known that fifty officers and men of the British were bound hand and foot and then bayoneted to death. It is known that ten days after capitulation wounded were still being collected from the hills and Japanese were refusing permission to bury the dead. It is known that women, both Asiatic and European, were raped and murdered and that one entire Chinese district was declared a brothel, regardless of status of inhabitants.

All the survivors of the garrison including Indian, Chinese and Portuguese have been herded into a camp consisting of wrecked huts without doors, windows, light or sanitation. By the end of January 150 cases of dysentery had occurred but no drugs or medical facilities were supplied. The dead had to be buried in a corner of the camp. The Japanese guards are utterly callous and the repeated requests of General Maltby, the general officer commanding, for an interview with the Japanese commander have been curtly refused. This presumably means that the Japanese high command have connived at the conduct of their forces. The Japanese government stated at the end of February that numbers of prisoners in Hong Kong were British 5,072, Canadian 1,689, Indian 3,829, others 357, total 10,947.

Most of the European residents, including some who are seriously ill, have been interned, and like the military prisoners are being given only a little rice and water and occasionally scraps of other food.

There is some reason to believe that conditions have been slightly improved since date on which the eye-witnesses, whom I have quoted, escaped, but Japanese government have refused their consent to visit to Hong Kong of a representative of protecting power and no permission has yet been granted for such a visit by representative of International Red Cross Committee. They have in fact announced that they require all foreign consuls to withdraw from all territories they have invaded since the outbreak of the war. It is clear that their treatment of prisoners and civilians will not bear independent investigation.

I have no information as to condition of our prisoners of war and civilians in Malaya. The only report available is a statement by Japanese official news agency of March 3 stating that 77,699 Chinese have been arrested and subjected to what is described as "a severe examination." It is not difficult to imagine what that entails.

I am sorry that I have had to make such a statement to the house. Two things will be clear from it, to the house, to the country and to the world. The Japanese claim that their forces are animated by a lofty code of chivalry, bushido, is a nauseating hypocrisy. That is the first. The second is that the enemy must be utterly defeated. The house will agree with me that we can best express our sympathy with the victims of these appalling outrages by redoubling our efforts to ensure his utter and overwhelming defeat.

That is the end of Mr. Eden's statement. I am informed by our high commissioner in London that on the basis of information so far received, United Kingdom authorities agree that of all the reports of specific atrocities received to date none are alleged to have been committed against Canadians, but no reports show that in so far as general treatment of prisoners of war is concerned Japanese have made any differentiation between Canadians and other British troops.

Words cannot begin to express the sense of outrage and the feeling of bitter resentment to which this announcement of Japanese atrocities at Hong Kong is certain to give rise among civilized peoples everywhere, and nowhere more than in the different countries of the British empire and in the United States with which Japan is at war.

Retribution for barbaric behaviour of the kind will follow in full measure in due course. Meanwhile, numbers of Canadians, both soldiers and civilians, in Hong Kong and in other parts of the far east, are now and will continue for some time to be at the mercy of the Japanese forces. Remembering this fact, it is of the utmost importance that no act of vengeance should be permitted or taken against persons of Japanese origin in our country, since any such acts might be made an excuse for acts of retaliation upon Canadian soldiers or citizens in the orient.

I may add that the Canadian government, in conjunction with the governments of Australia, India, the United Kingdom and the United States, have been and are making every effort, both through the countries which are protecting their interests in enemy countries and through the International Red Cross, to get into personal touch with prisoners of war and others. The object of all these inquiries is twofold: to secure all possible authentic information, and also to bring such measure of relief in the nature of medical supplies, food and personal comforts as can possibly be arranged.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the facts related by Mr. Eden and detailed to this House of Commons will shock the whole world. But they will help us to renew our determination to end forever those systems of government under which such atrocities and barbarities are permitted to occur. I should like to express this further thought. Reprisals are unthinkable to those of us who believe in the Christian way of life; and I would sound a note of warning—that reprisals against Japanese nationals in Canada must not be contemplated. Let it never be forgotten that there are still Canadians and British in the hands of the Japanese foe.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to add a word to what has already been said. I am sure the recital we have just heard has filled each one of us with horror. The day must come when the officers and governments who have been responsible for these atrocities must be brought to the bar of justice and dealt with in a fitting manner.

I too would join with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) in expressing the hope that however much our people may be provoked against the Japanese, nowhere in Canada may there be any untoward act which would, as has already been said, give an excuse to the devilish men who are wreaking this kind of treatment upon those who are simply carrying on their activities both military and civil in war time in a fitting way. I cannot help thinking that the civilized world, which is shocked now, ought to have been equally shocked when similar outrages were committed at Nanking. That, however, is in the past, and I join in the expressions of horror and resentment expressed by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): In times like these it is easy for us to be unwise. The all-important thing for us to keep in mind is this, that because of mishaps, misconceptions and mismanagement in the past the British empire has allowed itself to become so weak that these things have been made possible. We are suffering from the results of our past mistakes. We cannot in any way atone for them, or extricate ourselves from the difficulties into which they have plunged us, by making others. The thing for us to do is to keep our minds calm and to concentrate with all the power of our being on the things we can do to retrieve ourselves from the disaster into which we are plunged. Certainly one of the things we should not do is indulge in any untoward act toward any national of Japanese origin in this country.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, may I say a word in the circumstances? I should like to ask the leaders of the first three parties who have spoken whether there has been the least suggestion from anyone in British Columbia, or in Canada, that we should take any action against Japanese which would invite retaliation or which could in even the faintest degree be comparable to the brutalities about which we have heard. What we have tried to do is to get the government to take steps, before it is too late, to protect our wives and children in British Columbia from atrocities that may come upon us.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I agree that the problem before us is a serious one, and I agree with what has been said by the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the leaders of the other groups. But I do wish to point out that members from British Columbia almost unanimously have tried to impress upon the government this very fact about which they have spoken. My information last night at 11 o'clock was that only some 700 Japanese have been moved from British Columbia. Mr. Speaker, that is not good enough. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has pointed out, some of us have our wives and children or families out there. We want to impress upon the government what the situation is. So far the government has not taken it seriously enough. It is not that we are advocating reprisals. But the government must bear the responsibility, and it is a most serious responsibility, if they do it well. We do not advocate reprisals; we deprecate them, and will do everything in our power to prevent any. But the government must wake up to the seriousness of the situation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I might say a lot more than I have, but I want to ask a question, which I am entitled to do, on the orders of the day—and I am more serious than I have ever been before with respect to anything I have said in this house. How many Japanese have been moved from the province of British Columbia since December 7?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was informed only at noon to-day that about 1,000 have been moved. I can assure my hon. friend that both the security commission of British Columbia and the department of government which has to do with this matter are leaving no stone unturned to see that every possible action is taken that will make for the security of the people of British Columbia.

MERCHANT SHIPPING

SINKING OF VESSELS OFF NOVA SCOTIA COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. As a member for a Nova Scotia coast constituency I want to ask whether reports are correct that several cargo ships have recently been sunk within sight of the Nova Scotia coast, and what steps are being taken to protect this coast and ships plying along it.

Hon. ANGUS A. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): I have just received notice of my hon. friend's question. In reply to the first part of it I can say it is true that ships have been sunk not far distant from the Nova Scotia coast. As to the second part, namely, what steps are being taken to protect this coast and the ships plying along it, I do not think that that is the sort of question to which a detailed public answer could be made. All I can say to my hon. friend is that steps are being taken, and that every facility at the command of the naval service and the Royal Canadian Air Force to guard our coastal waters is being used.

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS

WAR EXCHANGE TAX AND PRICES OF FARM TRACTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson), which I take to be of some importance in its general application. I have here the serial number of a tractor which was sold to a farmer in August, 1940. Under protest the purchaser paid a tax on this tractor of $70.80. I have as well a letter from an officer of the Department of National Revenue which states that this tractor was cleared through customs in April, 1940, and as such would not be subject to the war exchange tax. I have also the serial number of a second tractor that was purchased in 1940 and on which a tax of $66.20 was paid. I am not certain of the date on which this second tractor was cleared through customs, but I think it was early in the spring of 1940. I have also on my desk an article printed in a local newspaper which in effect states that some companies, or at least a company, imported large quantities of farm implements before the imposition of the war exchange tax. These implements have been kept in stock and apparently the policy has been practised of adding the amount of the war exchange tax to the price of the implements.

I would put my question to the minister in this way. First, has the department any knowledge which would lead it to believe that the practice just referred to has been followed by any farm implement company or companies? Second, will the department take steps to determine the correctness or otherwise of the assertion made? Third, if this tax was added to the price of the machinery, was the money so collected paid to the treasury? Fourth, if the tax was collected and not paid to the treasury, will the department take steps to (a) secure the money so collected for the benefit of the treasury, or (b) require the implement company or companies to reimburse the purchaser the amount of the tax so collected?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already referred to the fact that questions are asked on the orders of the day which should be placed on the order paper. We have an illustration this afternoon in this question which is not capable of being answered at the moment. I think hon. members must take into consideration that these questions, important though they may be, should be placed on the order paper. I would prefer that the minister should not reply to the question.

STRIKE IN MONTREAL PLANT OF CANADA BREAD COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. I regret that the circumstances are such as to have made it impossible for me to give him notice. Is it true that a strike of employees in the Montreal plant of Canada Bread, a company which is supplying many of the military camps, has taken place? If so, would the minister make a statement in this connection? Have any steps been taken to investigate the hours of labour and the rates of pay prevailing in the Ottawa branch of Canada Bread?

Mr. SPEAKER: This question is in the same category as the one just asked by the hon. member for Macdonald. It should be placed on the order paper.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENT OF PROVISION RESPECTING DECLARATION OF EMERGENCY YEAR

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 14, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We understood that Bill No. 13 would be called first.

Mr. GARDINER: We just want to advance this bill to the second reading and then we will call the other bill.

Mr. LACOMBE: I have an amendment to move.

Mr. GARDINER: The arrangement was made that the three wheat bills would all be brought to the stage of the second reading and then we would be able to discuss all three at the one time. This bill has now advanced to the stage where it can be moved for second reading. It is not my intention to make any remarks with regard to it other than I made in my speech the other day on Bill No. 12. I am moving that this bill be now read a second time and when it is read the second time in this house it will be referred to the agriculture committee.

Mr. LACOMBE: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Roy) that all the words after—

Mr. SPEAKER: It is moved by Mr. Gardiner that the bill be now read a second time.

Mr. WEIR: In order to carry out the understanding that was agreed to, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASED RATE PER BUSHEL ON WHEAT DELIVERED BY PRODUCERS

The house resumed from Monday, March 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West) for the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) made his statement on this bill I moved the adjournment of the debate. I wish now to make a few references to this measure. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has stated that by arrangement these three measures are to be more or less considered at the same time, so that any reference I may make to Bill No. 12 or to Bill No. 14 will be quite in order.

At the outset I should like to register a protest, as I have on former occasions, against the bringing down so late in the season of measures affecting the agricultural interests in western Canada. The farmers will have to change their programmes more or less to meet the provisions of the measures that will pass this house. This is March 10. Seeding will be taking place in another two or three weeks. Last year it was May before we finally decided on the regulations with respect to the wheat acreage reduction. It is hardly fair to ask the farmer to change his whole programme a few days before he starts seeding.

I believe that Bill No. 14 and Bill No. 12 could be proceeded with with considerable haste. Bill No. 13, the one I am speaking to particularly now, deals with the matter of price. As the farmer will not be affected by the provisions of this bill until next fall, I think we should take considerable time to consider it in committee. I do not think it is necessary that this bill should be reported back from committee as soon as the others. In committee we should have a good deal more information than we have had about this whole problem of wheat marketing, prices, and so on.

I think we are all agreed wheat is the chief commodity produced in Saskatchewan. In that province we have what might be termed a wheat economy. If you will consider the part that wheat plays in our national income you will realize the importance that should be attached to it. Only about five per cent of the national income goes to twenty per cent of the population of Canada who are depending on agriculture in western Canada. I think you will realize that there is something wrong. I hardly think I need state my position again. On many occasions I have gone on record in this house, and I think it is well understood just where I stand. I think I can say that my position is such that I have been the greatest champion of the producers of western Canada in this house. For fourteen consecutive sessions I have been a greater champion than any other member from western Canada.

It was very interesting for me to listen yesterday to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) make the somersault that he did. I recall that last year he supported 70-cent wheat, but yesterday he would not stop at 90 cents. No, sir; he would not establish the economy of western Canada on a basis of 90-cent wheat but would go up to $1.25 a bushel. I hope that when this bill comes back from the committee he will still be of the same mind and give that price his support.

However, he wound up by saying that he would support these measures which the government brought down yesterday.

Mr. REID: He is just outbidding the others.

Mr. PERLEY: Of course he is, and I hope he backs it up when the time comes.

Agriculture in this country entered the war in 1939 at practically an all-time low. It had taken a count of nine and was in no condition to stand the count of ten and a knock-out. But if we compare the state of agriculture in Canada with agriculture in the United States in 1939 when we entered the war, it will be realized that agriculture in the United States entered the war in a much better condition than we did in Canada, and has been dealt with more generously since. The United States are still continuing to look after agricultural producers in that country. I have a report here from Chicago, dated March 3 of this year, which states that the Commodity Credit Corporation of the United States has insisted that there shall be no further sales from the "ever normal" granary. They are not worrying about their surplus.

Great Britain, too, has been looking after its farmers. I have a report here from Liverpool stating that there will be an increased price of 16½ cents a bushel to the British farmer to encourage production in that country.

I recall, as will other hon. members, that in 1935 during the discussion on the Canadian Wheat Board Act which we are amending to-day, Right Hon. R. B. Bennett made the statement and produced figures to show that western Canada had produced in the preceding six years six billion dollars of new wealth, and he added that a country or any part of a country which was capable of that great production was a country worth saving. I hurl those remarks across the floor of this house to-day and say that the possibilities that exist in western Canada of producing a vast amount of new wealth annually makes it a country well worth while saving.

In western Canada we must stick to our wheat economy; for if we in the prairie provinces undertook instead to produce live stock to our full capacity, agriculture in Ontario and possibly throughout Canada would be ruined. So I say that we must not replace our wheat economy in the west by any other production policy.

I have one or two suggestions to make. In view of the present critical stage of this war and of what is taking place throughout the world, I submit that speculation on the stock and grain exchanges should cease immediately. Indeed it should have ceased when the war started. Costs of production, transportation, marketing, and every other feature of our price structure affecting the agricultural life of Canada, should be maintained as near to normal costs as possible, so that the greatest efforts on the part of our producers can be exerted at the least possible expenditure. As to retail prices, instead of talking so much about a ceiling, the government should put retail prices, or a great number of them, back to where they belong until parity is brought about with the prices of farm products.

The Minister of Agriculture yesterday made a clear-cut statement and gave a detailed review of the situation of agriculture. He went on to speak of the prices of cattle, hogs, butter, eggs, cheese, and so on, for all of which I commend him, although the credit is not due to him alone. There is a war on; there is a demand for these farm products; our western farmers promptly responded to that demand, and a great deal of the credit is due to them. Certainly with a war on prices must advance and have advanced.

The minister also reviewed farm income in Canada. He said—I hope he is right in his mathematics—that there will be a considerable increase in 1942 in individual farm incomes. In connection with his Bill No. 12, he stated that he was endeavouring to hold the acreage seeded to wheat this year around the twenty million mark. I think that is quite a reasonable figure, because with the increase in summer-fallow last year and the decreased acreage seeded to wheat, it is only reasonable to expect that we shall not exceed twenty million acres in wheat this year. If we have an average crop from that acreage it is quite possible that there will be no difficulty in absorbing all the wheat that will come on the market.

The minister also referred to vegetable oils. He emphasized the importance of encouraging the producers of stock, cattle, hogs and so on, in order that animal fats might be available. I shall leave any further reference to that part of his remarks to the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), who sits immediately in front of me, except to say that the hon. member for Danforth was about four years ahead of his time in the suggestions he made to the government about vegetable oils, and I claim that I was about three years ahead of my time in many of the suggestions I advanced with respect to the price of wheat and what our wheat policy should be.

May I refer briefly to the farmers' delegation which visited Ottawa in the early part of February last? They made a very reasonable presentation of their case, and their recommendations were undoubtedly fair. I have here a copy of their brief, but I shall refer to only a few paragraphs.

First they referred to farm income. They showed that during the period from 1926 to 1929 farm income in the three prairie provinces amounted to $530,000,000. Since that date and up to last year there was a very considerable reduction in farm income, and they estimated that with a reasonable return in 1942 there might be only $338,000,000 of farm income in the west. They also pointed out that owing to the importance of wheat to Saskatchewan that province had probably suffered most from the decrease in farm income, and to emphasize the importance of wheat to Saskatchewan they showed that while for the year ended July 31, 1941, there was a cash income from all farm products in the province of $180,000,000, seventy-one per cent of that amount, or $129,000,000, came from wheat. That emphasized the importance of wheat in relation to farm income in Saskatchewan.

They also pointed out in their brief, very fairly, I think, that this government dealt with war industry on a cost-plus basis and a fair return on the capital invested, and they considered that the farmer should be treated in somewhat the same manner. I think that is only a fair request.

Then they point out, what I believe also is reasonable, that too much emphasis is being placed on the fact that we have these carry-overs every year running between four and five hundred million bushels. Because too much emphasis is placed on that, I believe the pool was right in calling it to the attention of the government. Then the pool suggest a one dollar initial price, with a participation which would bring it to a parity, whatever that might be. I think they were reasonable in asking for that. They concluded by stating that if their recommendations were accepted by the government, as regards the segregating of the 1942 crop and the setting of a reasonable price, it would be unnecessary further to restrict the wheat acreage in the west, but that the farmer would govern himself accordingly and would have an opportunity of running his own affairs, so to speak.

Other organizations from western Canada have been making representations to the government, I have here the brief presented by the grain trade—the North-West Line elevators association. These gentlemen go a little further than the pool, because they ask for $1.02 net for the farmer. It was interesting to me to read that, because I recall how strongly, when they were down here in 1935, they opposed the Canada wheat board act as we were framing it then, and threw difficulties in the way of Mr. McFarland for two or three years while he was attempting to support the market; they had no regard for any policies of that kind. Yet now they are asking for $1.02 net to the farmer. It will be interesting to see whether the government will listen to them. I believe they have some friends in the cabinet.

Another very important document which I have here is the resolution introduced by the Saskatchewan government and passed by the legislature which is now in session, endorsing the representation which was made by the delegation of 430 who attended here in February. That, too, is interesting. It may be significant that the premier of Saskatchewan thought it necessary to fly to Ottawa and muster the Liberal members from that province. He did not see fit to call in any other western members of parliament, but he got together the Liberal members; apparently they had been kicking over the traces. He came down here and assisted the Minister of Agriculture; they went into caucus half a dozen times—I know there was a lot of movement around here—and they backed up their minister; at least they put a little intestinal fortitude into him. It would have been interesting had the minister recited to this house some of the discussions which took place with the wheat committee of the cabinet and the price control board. I understand that the minister threatened that if he did not get his way—and I am glad he is taking this attitude now—he might come across here and present the case from this side of the house. I do not know whether we would have agreed to take him in; however, knowing some of those from western Canada who were associated with him, and watching what has gone on in this house, I do not think we would have wished him to bring over to this side any of the other hon. gentlemen opposite.

I have here however a statement of the hon. gentleman in 1939, when, on May 5, speaking in this chamber in support of Bill No. 83, he quoted Professor Hope of Saskatchewan university to show that the farmer should get 95 cents net on the farm in order to meet the farm debt in western Canada and to carry on in a normal way. I see that now, two or three years later, he is coming around to that idea, but he does not go as far as he did when he suggested that it should be 95 cents net to the farmer.

I also have here statements made by the minister in October. There is a long report in the Regina Leader-Post of October 9 and October 14, wherein, speaking in western Canada, he assured the farmers that they were going to get a lot more for their wheat under the 1942 policy. But I am not going to read these statements, because he would challenge their accuracy; he would say that the press had misunderstood him and put a wrong interpretation on the language he used—because that is what he usually does. But the statement is there.

When the delegation of 430 farmers came here in February they thought, from what the Minister of Agriculture said from time to time, they were going to get dollar wheat. They asked for a parity price; and that is what we want. I have here the Searle index, showing that, taking the year 1913-14 as the index year, 147 items stand at 151 and wheat stands at 58. Surely we will admit that there is something wrong there. We want the parity price; that is what the pool asked for.

If you will add all the bonuses which the farmers of western Canada received during the crop year 1941 to the price received for the 1941 crop—I have here the figures tabled by the minister in answer to certain questions which I put on the order paper—you will find that the government have paid out some $36,000,000 on three particular bonuses. A considerable amount is yet to be paid, however, on that income bonus which was to be disbursed in December. It was to be a Christmas present, but all of it is not yet paid. But, giving the minister credit for all that, there is no way that he can use mathematics to make the farmer of western Canada—who knows—believe that he has received a dollar a bushel for the 1941 crop. They are not all fools out there, by any means, and you have to use some different system of arithmetic to convince them that they have received that much. Especially is that so—and this is an important thing which has not been taken into consideration in the discussion—if you allow for the estimated loss which the farmer has to sustain on the lower seeded acreage. Six or seven million acres less was seeded to wheat last year. If you estimate that at ten bushels to the acre at fifty cents a bushel, there is a loss of $30 million. There is no allowance either for the extra summer-fallowing of this land; and as the minister, who is a farmer, knows, it costs considerable to summer-fallow.

The farmers will do their part, as they have done in the past, but they should be given a fair price and left to carry on their business according to their own arrangements and their individual methods of farming. Last year many farmers were paid to do things which they would have done in any event. I may just cite my own case. I had planned to summer-fallow so much, a lot more than I needed to do under the bonus system, but that is what I intended to do. And I know many other farmers who had planned to put their farming on a fifty-fifty basis and were paid for doing so under this system. I do not think they wanted that.

I should like to ask the minister what further orders in council, if any, there are going to be to carry out this policy. The minister said yesterday that in connection with Bill No. 13 there would have to be a considerable number of orders in council. We should know what they are. The bill only makes two verbal changes—one is from "seventy" to "ninety", and the other adds the word "mills".

Mr. GARDINER: The statement I made yesterday was to the effect that in addition to the bill there were orders in council providing for such things as the setting of the floor for coarse grains.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Copies of those orders in council are being prepared and I believe they are ready by now. If not, they will be ready very shortly for distribution.

Mr. PERLEY: That is fine. We shall have them when the bills are in committee. I submit that when we are through with the bills this year that should be final, and the farmers should know exactly where they stand. Perhaps I may be asked why I say that. Well, I have here an order in council, P.C. 9201, dated November 27. This is interesting to eastern farmers. The final order in council with regulations with respect to bonus wheat acreage reduction was made some time in May—on the tenth, if I remember rightly. The farmers had to have their summer-fallow done by the first of August, if they were to follow the principles of proper husbandry. This order in council dated November 27 indicates that there were amendments to the orders in council of April 30 and May 10, deleting the definition of the term summer-fallow and giving a new definition to the effect that summer-fallow means the cultivation or management of fallow land in such a way as to conserve soil moisture or prevent soil drifting, or both. Now, on November 27 if a man could convince an inspector that he had allowed his farm to grow weeds in order to prevent soil drifting he was considered to have complied with the regulation with regard to summer-fallowing. That was not fair to the man who did his summer-fallowing in May, June or July and had it done on the first of August. If many farmers had known that this definition existed they would have altered their work considerably.

Mr. McNEVIN: Perhaps that was in an area where they could not properly summer-fallow. Perhaps it was drifting.

Mr. PERLEY: I maintain that if a good many farmers had known of the existence of this definition they would have altered their operations.

As to cost of administration, I will not go into that at the moment. It would take too long. The costs of administrating the bonus provisions are out of proportion and it only serves to set up a huge machine. May I refer the house to a return brought down for the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), No. 153A. I suggest that eastern members get this return and look it over. The Minister of Trade and Commerce made an interesting statement in which he set out the difficult circumstances that had to be coped with. He referred to a representation that had been made to him and the recommendations that had been taken into consideration, the result being this bill, No. 13, changing one word and adding another. He referred to the 400,000,000 bushels which would be the carry-over this year. That was the amount indicated, or thereabouts. He gave a fair statement, but there is a great deal that he did not tell us. There is a great deal of information that we shall require when this bill goes into committee, and I trust the minister at that time will be prepared to put all the facts before us.

The report I have in my hand, which was tabled a few days ago, is not up to date by any means; it goes up to the end of the crop year 1940. Reference is made to the liabilities in connection with agents, $145,000,000—that is, the grain exchange. I am referring, I may say, to the wheat board report tabled by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It also refers to the carrying cost, the storage charges. This we wish to have in detail instead of as it stands, so that we may have a comprehensive idea of the whole situation.

The minister read a wire that had been sent to the grain exchange on the morning of the fifth, which practically froze the price as of March 5. I have the wire here but I will not read it into Hansard. In my opinion, that wire was the death knell of the exchange —or to put it another way, it was the death certificate. All that is needed now is the permit to bury, because in my opinion events will show that to be the case. We are told that the trades will be cleared on the basis of that closing, March 5. There will be no further trading in cash wheat or futures on any other basis. If there is not, why will the exchange members—if they are buying wheat—have to hedge it? The government guarantees to take it to July 31 on that basis and therefore there is no further need for hedging. The minister has practically closed the exchange by that wire and I certainly do not believe that there will be any further use for it.

I was going to refer to certain questions answered by the minister in a return tabled with respect to certain carrying charges, storage charges. I asked some questions with reference to McCabe Brothers of Port Arthur. I wanted to know, for instance, what rent they paid. The answer was, $67,900 last year. I asked how much storage the government had paid that company for storing grain there. The reply is that there is no information. Does the minister regard that as a reasonable answer to put in a return that is tabled? Does he not know how much storage they paid McCabe Brothers for grain stored in their elevator? If he does not, then I suggest he will have to find out.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not think that was the question asked.

Mr. PERLEY: The question was:

> What amount of storage fees were paid to the said McCabe Bros. Grain Company, Limited, for grain stored in the said elevator during the years 1939, 1940 and 1941, and by whom was this amount paid?

The answer was "No information". That answer is about as sensible as another I have with respect to the advisory committee of the wheat board. The minister says that the information with respect to the recommendations they have made should not be given in the public interest. What then is the use of the committee? The government should take the whole thing over. When the war broke out in 1939 representations were made by the British authorities to close the exchange, and three or four months after that the minister in Canada said that representations had been made to have it continue open. I claim that the system employed now by the British cereals import committee is such that the grain exchange has nothing to do with the selling of our wheat or with delivering it to Britain. I will ask the minister: Who represents us, or who is forwarding agent for the British cereals import committee in Montreal? Who represents the British ministry of shipping in Montreal? What part do these different men play in the export of our wheat? Who represents the cereals import committee in Canada?

I make this statement, that the wheat board at Winnipeg is working in a dual capacity and represents the cereals import committee. The minister if he likes can explain the working of it. I state further that the announcement made in this report—the minister boasts that they sold 120,000,000 bushels at one time, 100,000,000 again and 150,000,000 bushels—would indicate that the cereals import committee, buying wheat in that quantity, sufficient for eight months' supply, or six months, do in effect set the price, so that the government here have nothing to do with it. The price they pay sets the price for the period. However, we shall get information in that regard.

I have here a question which I should like to have answered. How is the wheat board going to settle with the exchange? We should have some information on that point. It is suggested that it will be on the basis of the May and July close and the cash close of March 5. We want to know exactly where the board stands and why it is necessary to settle. Is the board short or long? We want to know the exact position and we cannot get it in a statement such as this. We shall have to get it when we go to the committee, and that is why I say that this bill, if any bill is held up, is the one that should be looked into very closely. I should like the minister to be prepared to give us a great deal of information when the time comes.

I recall, Mr. Speaker, that when we were discussing the wheat board bill in 1935 the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), then sitting on this side, said he would not allow the bill to pass until Mr. McFarland and other gentlemen were brought here to give evidence. I say now we want the chairman of the wheat board, representatives of the grain exchange and of the clearing house, and others; we want to get all this information.

Someone may ask what I would do, and to settle that question I will say what I would do. I would close the exchange. I would confiscate the wheat now held by the open trade, not at any of these prices or any future prices but at the prices they paid for it. I would confiscate the coarse grains they hold, the oats they bought last fall at 20 cents a bushel and all the other coarse grains. Then I would set a parity price for wheat and I would pass an order in council providing that no one could deal in wheat at less than a dollar a bushel. I would go further; I would commandeer the best business brains of the grain exchange—and they have some there—for the duration of the war at least to assist in carrying out this policy. I would take over this grain and issue participation certificates to the farmers who sold to the open trade last fall. That could be figured out very easily; they have a clerical staff who could do that almost overnight.

My time is slipping along. I make the statement, Mr. Speaker, that the wheat pit at Winnipeg is a joke, serving no useful purpose in war time. I have here the report of Judge Turgeon, who conducted an inquiry into the grain trade, in which he states that even in peace time it is doubtful whether the exchange serves any useful purpose and suggests that the wheat board is the only way to carry on. Certainly the exchange serves no useful purpose in a time of emergency. When this matter comes before the committee I am going to read this report to the members who come from the east, and I think they will be greatly enlightened when they really learn about this open market in Winnipeg.

I come now to the price of 90 cents for wheat, and the prices for oats and barley. I think those prices are pretty fair; but if they do not represent a ceiling; if the open trade should advance these prices after July, where will Mr. Gordon, the price controllers and the Minister of Agriculture get off at their next meeting? That is something I will leave with the minister for his consideration.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not catch the question.

Mr. PERLEY: I have not time to repeat it; it is just too bad if the minister cannot listen. I think the brief presented by the pools was reasonable. I have stated some of their recommendations, and I might add that it gives me considerable satisfaction to see the government taking these steps. They opposed my resolution year after year, asking for a price of 90 cents; they opposed my motion in 1938 for a long-range price of a dollar a bushel over a ten-year period, though I showed how it could be done and quoted some figures which I have not time to repeat now. Yesterday the hon. member for Moose Jaw spoke on this matter—I was about to say "the minister" for Moose Jaw. You know, Mr. Speaker, in making up an imaginary cabinet members of the press gallery selected the hon. member for Moose Jaw as minister of agriculture; but after hearing him yesterday, and after listening to the Minister of Agriculture, I do not think his name would appear in another cabinet made up by those gentlemen. In 1938 I gave wheat prices back to 1890, and showed that the average price for the last thirty-six years, exclusive of war years, had been $1.03½, while for the fifteen-year period from 1920 to 1935 it was $1.15¾. I further advocated that we should place coarse grains under complete control of the board, and that we should have supervision of the exchange and reduced handling and carrying charges. I would go so far as to say that those carrying charges could be reduced to one-quarter of the present rates, and I believe the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) will go at least half that distance with me.

I made those suggestions in 1938 and repeated them in 1940. I have before me a copy of a speech I made on November 18 of that year, suggesting a price of 90 cents. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that on March 26 last the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn)—who I regret to say is critically ill to-day—moved, seconded by myself, the adjournment of this house to discuss this all-important question of agricultural policy. Speaking at that time I advocated increased prices, a processing tax of 50 cents, and storage on the farm. I am glad that this suggestion has been followed to a certain extent, and I hope that when the bill comes back from the committee that provision will be included this year, as it was last year.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that if the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce had been on the job a little earlier and had brought to bear that influence which apparently some of the western members have brought to bear, we could have done very much better, and could have followed the recommendations of the pools. When this bill goes to committee we are going to ask for certain information. The income of western agriculture should be maintained in balance with the national income, because the wheat economy of western Canada must be maintained. As I have already stated, I believe the ideal system of handling wheat is through a national wheat board with full control over all human food grains, either manufactured or unmanufactured. That would be going quite a long way, but I think it should be done. Then I would have a processing tax, even on coarse grains; for I venture to say that a processing tax of 10 cents on oats would not add very much to the cost of the little bit of rolled oats you get in your plate up here in the restaurant every morning.

These are all matters which should come before the committee at the proper time. I intend to try to secure certain information. I hope the minister will be frank and give us the information we require, even if it should require the attendance of witnesses.

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Wood Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words—

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Wood Mountain has the floor.

Mr. LACOMBE: I submit respectfully that I have risen in my place this afternoon three times in an attempt to get the floor, and I have an amendment to move.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Wood Mountain has the floor now.

Mr. DONNELLY: It is not my intention to delay the house very long in connection with this question of wheat, because we will have ample opportunity to deal with the matter when these bills go to committee. Every hon. member from Saskatchewan is interested in the wheat question. We are interested in it for several reasons. First of all, Saskatchewan grows more wheat than any other province in Canada. The second reason is that the whole economy of Saskatchewan is built around wheat. We may, in fact we do, grow other things; we indulge in other forms of agriculture, but our chief agricultural product is wheat.

Let me illustrate what I mean by placing on record a few figures. In 1940 all farm produce of Saskatchewan was valued at $173,000,000, while the value of wheat alone was $132,000,000; in other words about 76 per cent of our agricultural activity was devoted to the production of wheat. In 1941 our total production of agricultural products was valued at $180,000,000, while that of wheat products alone stood at $128,000,000, or 71 per cent.

I would emphasize, too, that there are certain portions of Saskatchewan which can grow nothing but wheat, and there are other areas, such as park lands, where other farm products are grown. But on the great open plains, where most of the wheat is grown, there is no other activity, and there is no other crop we can grow except wheat. When we cannot grow wheat, we cannot grow anything at all. Because of that, those of us who are members of the house, and happen to live in that area are interested in wheat and in every angle of the question as it presents itself to us.

Since 1929 the wheat problem has worried the House of Commons. Every year we have looked forward to legislation of one kind or another. It has become a hardy annual. Every government has brought down legislation of some kind, but it has been only temporary, effective from year to year. That has been the procedure since 1929.

When the war began in 1939 we in western Canada, as wheat growers, thought that all our difficulties were solved. We thought, "We are through with them now. All the wheat growers' problems will be solved." But we soon found out that this war was not like the last one; it was absolutely different. There was no demand for our wheat. Instead of our wheat problem growing less and less, it has grown greater and greater. The export of wheat to the markets of the world grew smaller and smaller, and each year since the war began we have seen our wheat piling up more and more, until at the present time we have a large surplus.

Canada has in sight now something like 480,000,000 bushels. We expect to have a carryover of about 400,000,000 bushels. But that is not all there is in the world to-day. We expect the carryover in the Argentine will be about 234 or 235 million bushels, in Australia about 162 million bushels, and in the United States 610 to 680 million bushels. These make in all about a billion and a half bushels of wheat which we expect to have at the end of this crop year.

In our best exporting years we never exported more than 800 or 900 million bushels, and in many years of late we have not exported more than 500 million bushels. In fact in the last few years it has been less than 500 million bushels. It will be seen at once that we have in sight now what may appear to be all the wheat we shall be able to export in the next three years—two years, anyway. That is the problem which we must face; it is the one which confronts the wheat growers at the present time.

Naturally we ask ourselves what would happen if the government were not supporting the price of wheat. If all this wheat were to be thrown on the world's markets, where would the price go? Why, it would likely be worse than it was in 1932, when John I. McFarland was handling the wheat problem for R. B. Bennett. That was the time when it went down to 38 cents Fort William, or 19 cents at the farm.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was before Mr. McFarland began, or when the grain exchange ceased to support the markets. That was the cause of it. The government had to come to the rescue.

Mr. DONNELLY: But Mr. McFarland was there, handling it at that time.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That was before the Perley policy.

Mr. DONNELLY: They were not listening to him then. I ask the house this question: What would happen to our wheat if the government were to withdraw its support? In guaranteeing, as it has, the initial payment to the farmer of western Canada, the government has been doing useful and helpful work. It has cost a large amount of money. The minister told us the other day that the maintenance of the prices for the crops of 1938, 1939 and 1940 had cost $79,900,000. I suppose by this time, with the added interest, it will have reached $80,000,000. That was the cost for those three years.

In dealing with the wheat problem there are three questions we should ask ourselves, questions which are of grave importance. First of all it is essential that the man who has wheat should receive a price which will assure him a respectable living. The man who has a crop of wheat should have a price from the government or from someone which will assure him a reasonably decent living. There is no doubt about that.

The second point is this. The man who cultivates land and then through an act of Providence receives no return from it should be protected. Providence may step in, and it may develop that either through climatic conditions such as drought or hail, or through a plague of insects such as grasshoppers, sawflies or cut-worm, through no fault of his own the farmer may lose his crop. Those farmers should be looked after by the government, and in some way a living should be provided for them. It is not the farmer's fault that he has no crop. In my opinion he is more deserving of the sympathy of the government and the people generally than the man who has a crop who at least has something to show for his labour.

The third point to consider is this: What is the government going to do with the wheat when it is delivered? Where are they going to sell it? Where are they going to store it? How much will they pay for storage? These are matters which must be borne in mind when we are dealing with wheat.

Having in mind the three points I have enumerated, I should like to refer to what the government is doing for wheat growers in the present year and what it proposes to do in the year to come. First of all let us consider the year 1941-42. What has the government's legislation been? First the government has guaranteed an initial payment of 70 cents a bushel, with an additional participating certificate. This is the same provision as was made last year. I am not satisfied with that price; I was not satisfied with it last year. I said at that time that because the cost of living had increased between 10 and 15 per cent the price should be raised to the same extent, up to 78 cents, 80 cents, or somewhere in that neighbourhood. I said that we are entitled to that increase in price. I say it again. Labour is getting the increase; why should not the wheat grower receive the same consideration? If 70 cents was a right and proper price two years ago, then 70 cents is not a right and proper price to-day. That is one of the reasons for discontent in western Canada. The price is not quite high enough.

But there are other reasons for discontent, and they are far more important. One hardly ever hears it mentioned, but let me tell the house that in western Canada we have had one of the worst crop failures in years. So far this year we have marketed only 165,000,000 bushels of wheat, and we expect our total marketings will not go beyond 200,000,000 bushels. Last year we marketed 455 million bushels. There is quite a difference. The reason for the discontent is the crop failure we had this year in western Canada.

There is another reason—the low grades. These are the things we should look into. In my district, for example, practically all the wheat is combined. A farmer will go out and start his combine to-day and haul his wheat into the elevator and get No. 1 northern for it. During the night rain falls and washes the wheat and when he next goes out he finds this Thatcher wheat has bleached. This is a rust-resistant high grade wheat, but it is apt to bleach. He finds that he can get only No. 2 northern for that. If there is another rainfall, when he goes out again he finds he will get only No. 3 northern or No. 4. I have received only No. 4 for wheat grown in the same field from which I took wheat that graded No. 1. Nothing had happened to the wheat except washing by rain. I have asked some technical men about this bleached wheat and they assure me that as far as milling or baking qualities are concerned, it is just as good as any other wheat. This man is a member of the grades standard board and he tells me that whenever it meets he has asked that this matter be considered, that this wheat should not be given such low grades. Because of the low grades of wheat this year the average price received by the farmers has been 49 cents Fort William, whereas a year ago it was 52 to 54 cents. The lower grades of wheat caused the lower average price.

That is one thing the government has done. In addition, the government has asked the farmers to market on a quota basis. This is one of the most helpful pieces of legislation we have, and there has been very little criticism of it from the farmer. They say it is too bad that they did not have it during the good years. They contend that it has taught them how to finance. Previously they hauled their wheat in the fall of the year, received their money, spent it, and then when the spring came around and it was necessary to seed they had to borrow money. They say they do not want to see this quota system done away with; they hope it will be continued.

The next thing the government did was to institute a system of bonuses. The first of these is the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which has been in operation for three years. This is one of the most popular pieces of legislation for the farmers of western Canada that this or any other government has placed on the statute book. Outside of the Liberal members, however, it has received scanty support. It has received nothing but adverse criticism from the majority of members of this house, apart from members of the Liberal party. The fact of the matter is that many members went home to the west when this legislation was put through and said that the government would never pay, that it was done only to fool the public, to get their votes. Then when the payment was made, they contended it was done just to fool the people, that no more payments would be made. When the last payment was made they contended that the farmers would never have got it if they had not come down here and raised such a storm and so forced the government to pay. I heard statements like that. I have received hundreds of letters praising this Prairie Farm Assistance Act and asking that it be kept on the statute book, that it be enlarged or extended. The farmers ask that it should not be done away with because it is the only thing they have to help them. Have hon. members ever stopped to think that even with the small crop last year and the low grades, there is no relief in western Canada? Why? It is because these bonuses have been paid and have been evenly distributed among our farmers so that they are able to get by.

There are two schools of thought in western Canada with regard to this wheat question, and I shall deal with them in a moment.

I come now to the wheat acreage reduction plan. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act will cost the government something in the neighbourhood of $15,000,000. Under the wheat acreage reduction plan the government pays $4 per acre for each acre taken out of wheat and put into summer-fallow, and $2 per acre for every acre put into coarse grains. That will cost the government between $25,000,000 and $35,000,000. I understand that $25,000,000 has been paid out.

Mr. GARDINER: A total of $27,000,000 has been paid out, and it should run to about $30,000,000.

Mr. DONNELLY: The only people who complain about this wheat acreage reduction plan are those who did not do what the government asked them to do. A lot of these people thought they knew better; they thought the price of wheat was going up and they put all their acreage into wheat. Because of the poor crop and the poor grades they suffered, when they received no wheat acreage reduction bonus they began to howl like stuck pigs. They are squealing because they think they should be getting something when they did not do what they were told to do. Those who went into coarse grains got the $2 per acre as well as the higher price for coarse grains. By doing what the government told them to do, they were much better off; they were able to get by.

We come to the next, the prairie farm income plan to pay the farmer for his increased cost of living. It is expected that this will cost between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000—I understand it will cost about $16,000,000. If we take these three bonus plans together, $15,000,000 for the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, $30,000,000 for the wheat acreage plan and $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 for the prairie farm income plan, we have a total in the neighbourhood of $60,000,000. We expect to market 200 million bushels of wheat, and if we do it will mean that we have received about 30 cents per bushel by way of bonuses on an acreage basis. So it can be said that we are getting a dollar a bushel for our wheat. It is only a question of how it is to be paid, on an acreage or on a bushelage basis. This government is paying 70 cents on a bushelage basis and 30 cents on an acreage basis. I have a farmer in my constituency who farms about two and one-half sections of land and he told me that he received $9 per bushel for his wheat. He produced 300 bushels of wheat, and his wheat acreage reduction bonus, prairie farm assistance bonus and prairie farm income bonus amounted to $2,700. There are many farmers who received more than a dollar a bushel for their wheat; I can name hundreds of them. These are some of the things that the government has done this year for the wheat grower in western Canada.

I have spoken of what was done for the man who had wheat and what was done for the man who through climatic conditions had no wheat. I now come to the question of storage. We felt that we were not going to have enough storage, and so year by year we have been increasing our storage through the last few years. On January 1, 1939, our storage capacity was 422 million bushels; on January 1, 1940, it was 424 million bushels, and on January 1, 1941, 437 million bushels. Now, on January 1, 1942, we have a storage capacity of about 600 million bushels. Seeking to obtain this additional storage the government signed an agreement with the elevator companies that they would not decrease storage charges for two years. I am sorry that was ever done. I think it should not have been done. I think it was a mistake. I think that storage charges are too high, and they should be lowered. I shall deal with that more fully later. I wish to go on now to what is proposed for this year, because time is pressing.

The government proposes to take 280 million bushels of wheat this year, which is 50 million bushels more than the government proposed to take last year. How is it that the government expects to be able to take 50 million bushels more this year? First of all, as I have said, we have increased our storage capacity; we have more elevators. The second reason is that we are exporting more wheat. From August 1 to January 31, 1941-42, we exported 111 million bushels of wheat and flour; from August 1 to January 31, 1940-41, we exported 79 million bushels. The export for the whole world was 154 million bushels from August 1, 1941, to February 28, 1942. That is what we have done, and that is why the government is able to take more wheat this year.

We are also to have the quota system again this year. The next thing the government proposes is an initial price of 90 cents for wheat, instead of 70 cents, with participation certificates. That is an increase of 20 cents a bushel. It is a legitimate price, on which I believe the farmer ought to be able to make a living. I shall deal with that more fully later. We have the Prairie Farm Assistance Act again this year. We have also the wheat acreage reduction bonus, which will net the farmer $2 an acre for coarse grains, the same as last year, and cost the government about $15,000,000, and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act will cost another $15,000,000. That is worth another 10 cents a bushel to the farmer. So that the farmer is getting this year 90 cents a bushel as an initial payment and 10 cents by way of bonus, or altogether $1 a bushel, calculated in a different way. That is what is proposed with respect to wheat for this year.

In setting a price of 90 cents a bushel the government does not set a ceiling on the price of wheat. A ceiling has been or is likely to be set for flour and bread. I think that is one question that ought to be investigated. I remember that before this farm delegation came to Ottawa they held meetings throughout western Canada, and everywhere they went they pointed out that the price of bread was 7½ to 8 cents a loaf when wheat was selling at $2.50; that it was the same price when wheat was selling at $1.50 a bushel, and that it was still between 7½ and 8 cents with wheat at 70 cents a bushel. So they said there must be an Ethiopian in the wood-pile somewhere, and it is time we got him out. I think the whole question of the price of bread and flour as compared with the price of wheat should be investigated. The price control board and the wheat board ought to investigate this question together and decide what is a legitimate price for the milling of wheat and the baking of bread, and then a ceiling should be put on bread and flour, the finished product, leaving the raw product, wheat, where it is at the present time.

I come now to another matter. There are two schools of thought in western Canada with regard to the wheat problem. One school of thought thinks that all the assistance that is given to the wheat growers of western Canada should be on an acreage basis. The other contends that all the assistance given to the wheat growers of western Canada should be on a bushelage basis. This delegation of four hundred that came to Ottawa were all of one mind, representing one school of thought. They said that the assistance should be all on a bushelage basis. We want dollar wheat, they said, knowing that that was a popular slogan. But I have received hundreds of letters from farmers in western Canada saying: If we are going to have dollar wheat, all right, but do not do away with the bonus. There are two schools of thought, as I say. Those who think that the assistance should be entirely on an acreage basis say that two-thirds of the wheat crop of 1940 was grown on about 22 million acres. The government has surveyed and tabulated all this information and knows how much each farmer has. These people say: If you are going to give the farmers who came to Ottawa one dollar a bushel, an increase of 30 cents a bushel from 70 cents, that amounts to $90,000,000 on 300 million bushels. And if you are going to give them $90,000,000, they say, the right and proper way is to give it at $4 an acre, for two-thirds of the 1940 wheat crop, to everyone, instead of as an increase of thirty cents a bushel on wheat. What is the good, they say, of an increased payment on wheat if you have no wheat? The kind of hailstorm we have in western Canada sweeps through a strip five miles wide and will go from ten to forty miles. The man in the centre of that area who is hailed out and so has no wheat will not get a cent, but the man on the outside edge who had rain and not hail will have a better crop than usual, perhaps twenty-five to thirty bushels to the acre. If you concede what the delegation wants you will allow thirty cents a bushel, which means that if a man has thirty bushels to the acre he gets $9; if forty, $12; but the man who has no crop will have to go to the prairie farm assistance people for a grant of no more than $2 or $2.50 an acre. They ask, is that just, is that equitable, is that fair? The man who has no crop may be just as good a farmer in just as good a district, but he is so unfortunate as to be hailed out. By distributing the money on a bushelage instead of an acreage basis you will be requiring the man without a crop to live on $2.50 an acre, whereas the man with the big crop will receive $8 or $10 or more per acre to help him along. Dollar wheat is a first-class thing for the man who has thirty to forty bushels an acre and thirty to forty thousand bushels of wheat, but what is the good of it to the man who has no wheat? And the man who has no wheat, or a poor crop, is as much—and more—a charge of the government as the man who has a good crop; he should be and must be looked after.

These are some of the problems we have to contend with, some of the things which I am continuously being written about and asked to support. The government, however, this year has taken the middle course. It has given some increase in the price of wheat, from 70 cents up to 90 cents, and it is also maintaining the wheat acreage reduction plan, which farmers can participate in, and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act for the benefit of those who have no crop. So that some of their assistance is given on an acreage basis and some on a bushelage basis; and as a compromise I am ready and willing to support that. But I am one of those who favour the acreage basis rather than the bushelage basis, and I am not alone in that view. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle quoted Professor Hope a while ago. I, too, will quote from what the professor said, in regard to this. I refer to a statement in the national farm radio forum, prairie regional broadcast, on Monday, January 12. Speaking at that time, the professor said:

> I feel that the additional money required to raise the western farm income to a reasonable basis will be better spent on additional acreage bonuses rather than by raising the price per bushel of wheat.

There are some who say, "We do not want charity; we want the price of wheat raised. We do not want these bonuses; they are charity." I may be dense, but I cannot see the difference. If the government is going to raise the price of wheat to ninety cents the money will come out of the treasury, and whether the farmer receives it as a bonus added to the price of wheat or in the form of a grant at so much per acre, it is all the same. If one is charity, so is the other.

I regretted the reference of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) to what he called parity price. If you are going to speak of parity prices I would only point out this. If you take the price of labour in 1913-14 and compare it with what it is now, you find that labour received about 154 in 1938 where it got 100 in 1914. Without a doubt, agricultural products, especially wheat, are away below the parity price as it was in 1913-14. But so is the return on capital. Make no mistake about that. You know just as well as I do the difference between the present time and the last war. The first loan, in 1915, for $100,000,000, bore five per cent interest; the next in 1916, another $100,000,000, was also at five per cent interest; in 1917, $139,000,000, five per cent interest. The first victory loan, $398,000,000, yielded five and a half per cent; so also did the loan of $660,000,000 in 1918. All the three loans in 1917 and 1918 were tax free. That term cannot be applied to the loans of 1915 and 1916 because at that time we did not have any income tax. The United States began it in 1914, three years before they went into the war, but ours was not put on until 1917.

Another point should be borne in mind in this connection. If we are going to establish this parity for the farmer, capital too will want to be put on a parity. They are wide awake and looking after their interests. What about the mortgages in western Canada? What did we pay at the time of the last war? Eight and nine per cent; in some cases ten per cent. Now the rate is cut to five and six per cent. Do you want to go back to eight, nine and ten per cent? I do not think so. What we should ask for is a reasonable price rather than a parity price. I draw that to the attention of the house because I believe it is important.

I come now to the question of storage. In July, 1940, the rate for wheat storage was one-thirtieth of a cent a day. At that time the Liberal members from western Canada met and discussed the question, and we sent in a presentation to the grain commission asking that the rate be reduced. As a result it was reduced to one forty-fifth of a cent per day. As confirmation of that statement I have in my hand a press report which went out on July 28, 1940, from the chief commissioner of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada. I refer to it because my statement on this matter has been disputed on the platform. The wheat pool has taken credit for this having been reduced. I quote from the press release of the board:

> The annual tariff meeting of the Board of Grain Commissioners was held at Winnipeg on July 9th, when the board received submissions from the Northwest Grain Dealers' Association, Terminal Association, Saskatchewan Pool Elevators, and the Manitoba Pool Elevators, and also advanced the submission of the Alberta Pool Elevators.

Listen to what he says:

> These submissions dealt with the maintenance of the current tariff rates.

The submissions dealt with the present rate which is one-thirtieth of a cent. He goes on:

> Submissions were also received from certain western members of parliament in favour of reducing tariffs in the national interest.

He does not say anything about receiving submissions from any other elevator companies or line companies, but as a result of these submissions made to the grain commission they did reduce the carrying charges or storage charges on wheat from one thirtieth to one forty-fifth of a cent. For that reason I maintain that we western members are entitled to a certain amount of credit for it. In my opinion the charge of one-thirtieth of a cent may have been all right when our elevators were quite full for one month in the year and then half full for three or four months and empty the rest of the year; but now that the elevators are filled to the roof twelve months of the year one forty-fifth of a cent is too much. I suggest that it is time our grain handling charges were overhauled. I think they should be reduced. They should be cut in half. I agree with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exceeded his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. DONNELLY: I shall be glad if I may be allowed to go on for a minute longer. I am just about through.

As I was saying, it was all right when the farmers were receiving $1.25 or $1.50 or $2 a bushel that the rate of one-thirtieth of a cent should be paid, but now the farmer is up against it. He is having a hard time, living under depressed conditions, and these are times when everyone should bear a certain portion of the load. Why should the farmer be asked to carry the whole load?

We know that it costs about ten cents a year to carry a bushel of grain in storage. There is storage and there are other charges which bring it up to about ten cents a bushel. The visible supply for the last year, 1940, has been as follows:

	Bushels
December 31	516,000,000
March 31	499,000,000
June 30	482,000,000
September 30	499,000,000
December 31	531,000,000

That gives an average visible grain supply of about 500,000,000 bushels throughout the year. If it costs ten cents a bushel that means $50,000,000 or let us say $40,000,000—that is only $10,000,000 less, and what is $10,000,000 between friends. The elevators have received that, but they have also received ten or fifteen million dollars from handling this year's crop. Taking it in, cleaning it, loading it, diverting it, unloading and so on—all these involve charges, so that they are paid another ten or fifteen million dollars. There is no doubt therefore the elevators will be receiving in the neighbourhood of at least $50,000,000 for the handling of grain this year. On the other hand what does the farmer get? He gets less than fifty cents a bushel for 200,000,000 bushels. He will not receive $100,000,000; yet here is a man who does not do anything except handling the wheat and he is getting half as much as the farmer. These elevator charges, I repeat, should be cut in two, and the difference should be diverted to the farmer as an extra payment. I say that without hesitation. The time has come when that should be done.

The other day I picked up a financial paper and looked it over, and I found that a pool elevator with a capital of $18,000,000—$12,000,000 received from the farmers for elevator deduction and $6,000,000 for reserve—had declared a profit of $3,000,000—16 per cent. I want some of our financiers over there to tell me what they think of that. If that is not high finance, what is it?

An hon. MEMBER: Who gets it?

Mr. DONNELLY: I belong to the wheat pool and I have not received much of it yet. They do not pay any income tax or excess profit tax. How much did they take away from it in order to start an insurance company? They have some of my money. Can I get my capital back? You know I cannot. When I die my estate will get fifty cents on the dollar. That is what they are doing to-day. If these companies are able to make such profits other line companies can do the same and are doing the same, and therefore these charges should be cut to a reasonable amount. It is time this was done in view of the present condition of the farmers.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): At the end of my remarks I will move an amendment to the motion of the minister. Every hand is needed on the farm, and the farmer plays an essential part in the war effort in the defence of Canada. Farmers and farm labourers and those persons employed in industries relating to agriculture should therefore not be called up for military training. Whether the farmer be engaged in the production of food, in the raising of live stock or in lumbering operations, he provides our fighting men with food, clothing and shelter. I urge that we exempt farmers from military training. If the government persists in calling for the performance of military training, we shall soon see the ruin of agriculture in Canada.

This house is now discussing agricultural problems. It is examining a measure which I condemned last year and which I still condemn to-day, considering the best interests of the country. To reduce agricultural production in these difficult times would be a national crime. At a time when wheat flour and bread sell at very high prices, the government introduces the most disastrous laws for Canada and its people. Where are we going, Mr. Speaker? While farmers and consumers are shamefully exploited by the flour trusts, the baking trusts, the trusts of foodstuffs so necessary for producing bacon hog, butter and cheese, this government goes so far as to ask this parliament, on the one hand, to reduce wheat acreage and, on the other, to grant financial assistance to wheat growers. How inconsistent and contradictory! On the one hand the government decreases agricultural production; on the other it wastes public moneys to help those who would produce. On the one hand it smothers wheat production; on the other it pays a ransom to producers. This is a most condemnable policy. My words are too weak to brand, as they should be branded, laws so ridiculous and so anti-Canadian as these. In a country where rationing is already being felt severely; where labourer and farmer for many years have been exploited by the trusts which have dominated the policy of the government and the history of Canada, it is amazing that a government should dare introduce such laws.

Does the government know what will be the agricultural production next year? Does it know that our agricultural production has decreased—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I realize that the hon. member is speaking in other than his native tongue, but I must apply the rule as to the reading of speeches.

Mr. LACOMBE: I am not reading my speech, Mr. Speaker; I am referring to my notes. Does the government know that to continue calling up for military training farmers and farmers' sons at this period of the year, and at any time, is to ignore completely the needs of agriculture, of the army, and the defence of Canada? Does it know that the yield of the sugar bush will be considerably less this year because of lack of help? Is it aware that this is very unfortunate, at this period when sugar is rationed? Is it aware that at present vegetable growing is in full swing in hothouses? Is it aware that the drafting of farmers and farmers' sons will bring upon this country the worst disasters?

I know hundreds of pitiful cases of exploitation of young farmers, owners of their farms who are alone, who have been called for military training in spite of their requests for exemption, in spite of representations made by their parish priests, by their mayors and by their members. What has happened? They have been compelled to sell, at a loss, their farms and their cattle, which were led to the abattoir. I will give one of the most disgusting cases. Mr. Roland Beaudoin, from Ste. Rose, owner of a poultry farm and of an orchard in which his old father had invested all his savings, was called for military training after a postponement of two months. For many months his two brothers have been in the army as volunteers. Their father is ill, and 70 years of age. How shameful! The employees of the registrar's office in Montreal gave Mr. Beaudoin a postponement of one month to allow him to sell his farm, his poultry and his orchard. He is now at the military training camp. A few months ago the registrar's office in Montreal was selling for $500 and $600 exemptions to Roumanians and citizens of other countries now at war with Canada.

This tragic farce has lasted too long. The hour is near when immanent justice will prevail. Once more I request that the government exempt from military service farmers and farmers' sons. Consequently I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy):

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that the best ways of helping agriculture are "(a) to exempt from military training farmers and farmers' sons who are indispensable to agricultural production;

"(b) to establish in every constituency in Canada exemption tribunals whose object would be to examine the merits of all requests which might be presented before such tribunals by farmers and farmers' sons."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the first place I submit that the amendment as moved does not come under the terms of paragraph 755 of Beauchesne, which sets forth such amendments as may be moved to second reading. In the second place I suggest that it is out of order under standing order 60 and standing order 61, paragraphs 551 and 562, because it imposes a contingent charge upon the people by establishing exemption tribunals.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am faced with another question in connection with this amendment by reason of the fact that the hon. member who has moved it has on the order paper, under notices of motion, a resolution in the following terms:

[Mr. Lacombe.]

Whereas agriculture is essential to the upkeep of the armies and the welfare of the civil population.

Therefore be it resolved: That, in the opinion of this house, farmers, farm employees and all persons engaged in industries connected with agriculture or with war industries, should be exempt from military service and that exemption tribunals should be set up in each constituency in the country to investigate each case on its merits.

The rule is clear that no member may anticipate a discussion which may come before the house at a later date. I would not insist upon the observance of that rule in this case, because of the fact that the house has already adopted a resolution giving precedence to government business, and for that reason the resolution of the hon. member might not be reached this session. He has, in a measure, discussed it on his amendment which is now before the house. I would suggest, however, that having discussed it now, his motion should be withdrawn from the order paper.

With regard to the amendment itself, I think the rule is perfectly clear. The recommendation of the crown required for the imposition of charges upon the taxpayer is compulsory on committee as well as on the house itself. There is no exception. The inclusion in a bill of a provision authorizing the payment of public money is nothing but a statutory appropriation which can be made only upon the crown's recommendation and in committee of the whole house, under the provision of section 54 of the British North America Act.

It is hardly necessary to quote any authorities in support of such a clear declaration of the constitution of Canada. The principle therein set forth is one of the fundamental tenets of British parliamentary law, and it is observed in the United Kingdom as well as in all the dominion parliaments. Sir Erskine May's book entitled "Parliamentary Practice", 13th edition, says, at page 505:

If any motion, or bill, or proceeding is offered to be moved, whether in the house or in a committee, which requires but fails to receive the recommendation of the crown, it is the duty of the chair to announce that no question can be proposed upon the motion, or to direct the withdrawal of the bill.

Paragraph (b) of the hon. member's amendment asks for the establishment in every constituency in Canada of exemption tribunals, whose object would be to examine particularly all requests which might be presented before such tribunals by farmers' sons. It therefore falls under the rule I have stated, and I rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. LACOMBE: I regret that I have to appeal from your decision.

Mr. SPEAKER: The appeal must be supported by at least five members.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not sufficient members.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there will be widespread disappointment throughout western Canada as a result of the policy announced by the government yesterday for the disposal of the 1942-43 wheat crop. The people of western Canada had reason to feel in the past few months that a new deal was about to come into existence for agriculture. The visit of the farm delegation to Ottawa, the excellent press notices the delegation had and the sympathetic reception they received from cabinet council all gave the people of western Canada reason to feel that probably we were on the verge of a new deal for that part of the country. I am afraid there will be a feeling now that instead of a new deal we have received a dirty deal.

When I say that, of course I am not unmindful of the commendable features of the legislation. For some months back, hon. members on this side of the house, particularly the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) have been asking the government to put a floor under coarse grains, realizing that if we were to attempt to encourage the farmer to leave wheat production and go into the production of coarse grains, we could do so only by putting a floor under them. That is one of the commendable features of the legislation brought down yesterday.

But my main objection to the legislation is that the government is following its old policy of beating a sort of strategic retreat, like an army which holds a position until it is no longer tenable, and then when it is almost surrounded, makes a retreat to the next position it believes it can hold. It clings to that position as long as possible, and then makes another retreat. We have had that procedure now for five or six years—a series of strategic retreats rather than brilliant offensives.

An hon. MEMBER: A retreat forward.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It may be a retreat forward, but it has required a great deal of pressure to get any movement at all. I ask the house to take a glimpse at what has happened. In 1935, after long years of clamouring for it, the farmers were given a wheat board, a payment of 87½ cents a bushel, and participation certificates. In 1936 this government was in office; the 87½ cents was cut to 80 cents, and a new personnel was appointed to the wheat board. In 1937 an order in council was passed stating that farmers could not deliver their wheat to the wheat board, even if they wanted to, as long as the market price of wheat was above 90 cents. The same situation obtained in 1938.

Then in 1939 two bills were brought down, and we thought again we were getting some general improvement for agriculture. The first of those two bills was the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. At this point let me say just a word about that legislation. The hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) has taken to himself, and the party with which he is associated, the credit for supporting that piece of legislation. He intimated that nobody else wanted it, and that no one else was in favour of it. That suggestion of course is absolutely inaccurate. For a great many years before it was brought down, not only members of the group with which I am associated, but I should think members of almost all groups in the house were asking for some type of crop insurance. As a matter of fact, the previous year a resolution had been passed unanimously by the house endorsing the principle of crop insurance for farmers. Therefore, when the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was introduced it was acceptable to all parts of the house. But it was brought down in conjunction with legislation which was to provide an advance or cash payment of 60 cents a bushel. Those hon. members who were in the house at the time will remember the long struggle which took place not only here in the house but in western Canada. The result was that the minister withdrew the bill, substituting for it a new one raising the initial price to 70 cents. It will be recalled that again in 1940 we received an initial price of 70 cents.

By that time the war was upon us, and there was a feeling that the price ought to be higher, and that wheat had become a more valuable commodity. I would remind the house, for instance, of the speech made with respect to the price of wheat by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) during the election of 1940. I quote from the Regina Leader Post of March 12, 1940, an article headed "Gardiner talks wheat, correcting Manion mistakes". It reads as follows:

> Wheat could all be sold to Britain to-morrow at not less than 87 cents a bushel. If it were, the farmer could now obtain at least ten cents a bushel on his participation certificates.
> But the present government does not think it wise to sell all the Canadian wheat at 87 cents a bushel. The British government is not urging us to do so. If they bought it they would leave it right where it is in the elevators in Canada and pay the storage on it. While it would thus remain where it is it would be entirely out of the hands of the farmers. We believe that Britain will pay us more for our wheat when she is ready to take it.

Mr. GARDINER: Eighty-seven cents was the price of wheat on that day.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That does not alter what the minister said. I quote again from his speech the following in quotation marks:

"That wheat could all be sold to Britain to-morrow at not less than 87 cents a bushel. If it were, the farmer could now obtain at least 10 cents a bushel on his participation certificates. This would make his payment more than the 80 cents which was being discussed last summer.

"But the present government does not think it wise to sell all the Canadian wheat at 87 cents a bushel. The British government is not urging us to do so. If they bought it, they would leave it right where it is in the elevators in Canada and pay the storage on it. While it would thus remain where it is, it would be entirely out of the hands of the farmers.

"We believe that Britain will pay us more for our wheat when she is ready to take it for consumption in England and that the farmers would be well advised to allow the storage to be charged up to their participation certificates.

"In other words, we think we will get a better price for the wheat when Britain wants to take it, rather than by trying to force them to take it by making it a condition of anything we may do in the war."

That was the situation in 1940.

Mr. GARDINER: Before France fell.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes; that was before France fell. Then came 1941. Last year, in addition to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act legislation an acreage reduction programme was introduced. Again the hon. member for Wood Mountain tries to create the impression that there was a quarrel between those who wanted to give a bonus and those who wanted to increase the price of wheat. Nobody knows better than the hon. member for Wood Mountain that that is not correct. The wheat acreage reduction bonus was brought in, not in relation to the price of wheat, not as a subsidy to the price of wheat, but to encourage and persuade the farmer to leave the production of wheat and go into the production of coarse grains or to summerfallow for the conservation of the soil. That is how the situation stood up until last fall.

On October 18 the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) announced in a national broadcast that a price ceiling would be established which would have as its basis the prices in existence during the period September 15 to October 11. As I said in this house last fall, we in this group have never objected to the principle of control, especially in war time when such control is absolutely essential if we are to prevent the devastating spiral of inflation. But what we did ask was that any ceiling which might be established should be on an equitable price level and not on a price level whose basis was a twenty-seven-day period taken at random, during which period agricultural prices were lower than the general price level.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Very low.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes. A lot of statistics have been given in this debate and I do not want to follow that practice, but there are one or two which I think are necessary. Taking 1926 as being equal to 100, industrial wages during the last period for which we have any figures, 1940—the 1941 figures are not available—reached an index figure of 109·6. On the other hand, taking 1926 farm costs at 120—we do not have a 100 basis for that—farm costs on October last stood at 116, four points lower. On the other hand, taking the prices of all farm products in 1926 as 100, they had dropped to 74 last October. The picture is even worse when you realize that this 74 is an average. The index for field products stood at 57, while the index for animal products stood at 101. Seventy-five per cent of the income of western Canada comes from field rather than animal products, so the index of 74 would be much lower if it is to be balanced between the two. The price-ceiling period which has been accepted was a period of depressed prices for agriculture. Any attempt to use that as a standard basis as far as the western agricultural economy is concerned would be to fasten peasantry on the prairie farmer from now until the end of the war, and probably after the war.

I am sure most hon. members have looked at the comparison between agricultural prices in the 1926-29 period and the base period in 1941. I give these figures to the house merely so that they will be a matter of record. They are as follows:

	Base period	1926-29
Wheat	$ .77⅜	$1.41
2 C.W. oats	.50⅞	.60
2 C.W. barley	.62¼	.73
2 C.W. rye	.64⅛	1.00
1 C.W. flax	1.61½	2.07

I think these figures show the situation which has faced agriculture, not only since the war but prior to the outbreak of the war. Saskatchewan is probably more dependent upon income from wheat and field products than the other two prairie provinces, and as a result of this situation there has been a spontaneous uprising of all sections of the population which have insisted that something should be done to square the deal being given to agriculture with the deal being given to the rest of our national economy. Those who try to infer, as has been inferred this afternoon, that this was some chicanery on the part of any group of individuals are quite beside the point. Any hon. member who listened to the delegation here in Ottawa knows that it represented all classes and all shades of politics, that it transcended any religious group or any national or racial bonds. It was a response to a definite economic situation that had become so desperate that all classes of the population recognized that unless something was done, western economy was doomed to become nothing but a great depressed area in the heart of Canada.

Mass meetings were held last fall all over western Canada and I need hardly remind hon. members what was asked for. This will be found in the annual report of the wheat pool on page 27. They asked for an initial payment of $1 a bushel; they asked that stocks of wheat represented by the carryover should be taken off the market and held as a national emergency war reserve; they asked that from August 1, 1941, all sales of wheat should be credited to the crop year 1941-42, and they asked that the crop year 1941-42 should be declared an emergency year under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act irrespective of the market prices prevailing. It is old history that the first three things asked for did not materialize, while the fourth did.

As a result of these meetings and as a result of their failure to get any adequate response to their representations from the government, a delegation came to Ottawa. Some quotations have been given already from the brief which was submitted and I do not think it is necessary to quote it extensively. I should like, however, to remind the house of the general principles that were contained in that brief. First, and by all means the most important, was the request of the government to accept the principle of parity prices. That was far more important than anything else in the brief. Because one dollar stood out as an easy figure for people to trip on their tongues, they were in the habit of saying that this delegation was down here asking for dollar wheat. That was not the main representation. The main representation was that a parity price should be established for agricultural products. I should like to quote from page five as follows:

> With respect to the petition itself, the first section recommends that the government should recognize and accept the principle of parity prices for all agricultural commodities. This recommendation may have been discussed by the government with the Canadian federation of agriculture and it may not now be necessary to elaborate the proposal here. We fully realize the difficulties involved in establishing an adequate base for parity prices and also that changing conditions in our agricultural production make it difficult to establish actual parity. We also appreciate that on the generally accepted basis of 1926-29 price levels, there are certain agricultural commodities now at parity.

They continue with this statement:

> The delegation would strongly recommend that no price ceilings should be established on farm commodities below parity levels, using the word parity in the sense that a parity price for farm commodities would be the price which these commodities would need to realize in order to purchase as large a quantity of other commodities now available as it actually did during a specified base period.

That was first and by all means the most important part of their representations, that the ceilings to be established ought to be established, not on the basis of the price during a period of 27 days last fall but on the basis of a parity figure to be worked out by the government's statisticians.

The second thing they asked was that in the meantime the wheat board should pay—not a price—but an initial payment of $1 a bushel for No. 1 northern, basis Fort William. I do not propose to get into a lengthy argument as to what the price of wheat has actually been. The hon. member for Wood Mountain goes through some ingenious arithmetic which hon. gentlemen opposite indulge in from time to time to show that we shall sell this year less than 200 million bushels of wheat; that we are getting $60,000,000 in bonuses, which is 30 cents a bushel, and that if you add that 30 cents a bushel to the 70 cents a bushel for wheat, you get $1 a bushel. Of course, if instead of 200 million bushels, you got it down to only 20 million bushels of wheat this year, by his figuring the farmer would be getting $3.50 a bushel; or if we had had an average crop this year of around 300 million bushels of wheat, then, with the bonus added, the farmer would have been getting around 63 cents a bushel. The thing to which I object—and nobody knows this better than the hon. member who was making the specious argument—is this constant attempt to confuse the public between the price paid for wheat and the amount paid in bonuses. It is not doing any service to the west to attempt this confusion. As I have said repeatedly in this house, the amount paid in bonus has no relation to the price paid for the wheat. A man has two patches of land, we will say, and on the one patch he grows wheat. The price he gets for the wheat compensates him for growing the wheat, a distinct national service that he is performing. His other patch of land he summer-fallows or sows to coarse grains, in response to the request of the government that he reduce his wheat acreage. The bonus is paid on this part of his land, and you cannot add that bonus to the price he got for the wheat he grew on the other piece of land. They are two distinct pieces of land.

Mr. GARDINER: But he would have grown wheat on that other patch if he had not been paid the bonus.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Certainly, but they are two distinct pieces of land, and you cannot divide his income by the total number of bushels of wheat he grows and say that that is the price he got for his wheat.

Mr. GARDINER: But the policy said that he could not sell any more wheat even if he grew it. A maximum of 230 million bushels was set.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): You cannot take two separate business transactions of that sort and put them together and say that that was the price he got for his wheat. The bonus is for summer-fallowing or growing coarse grains and to compensate the farmer for going out of wheat production.

Mr. GARDINER: The farmer understands it very well.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Of course he does, but he is being confused in this house, and the people of eastern Canada are getting the impression that the western farmer is already getting $1 a bushel for wheat—a bonus of 30 cents and a price of 70 cents. He is getting nothing of the sort.

The other representation made by the delegation, on page 8 of the brief, was that the government should take the surplus wheat off the market and set it aside as a national emergency measure to meet whatever contingencies may arise after the war; and second, to apply all sales of wheat made in the crop year of 1942-43 against that crop, so that if there is any further return coming, it will go back to the farmer.

The last thing they asked was that the government should remove the price limitation which restricts them in declaring an emergency year, and that is being done by the measure now brought before the house. They also request that the compensation provided under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be increased. I refer hon. members to page 8 of the delegation's memorandum, where they say:

> As has already been indicated, the delegation desires to record its appreciation of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and would urge that certain amendments should be made which would make it even more valuable than at present. In connection with the emergency year section of this act it is recommended that provision be made that an emergency year may be declared, irrespective of the market price of wheat during the three fall months. As at present constituted, the crop failure section of the act provides for certain payments to farmers when 171 townships in the province of Saskatchewan have produced an average yield of five bushels per acre or less. We would strongly urge that the compensation provided at this time is not adequate to meet present day conditions and that provision should be made to increase the present amount of this payment.

I read that because of the statement which was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Wood Mountain. He said that there were two schools of thought, one that said the government ought to assist the farmer by an acreage bonus, and another school that said the assistance ought to be on a bushelage basis. The hon. member said that the delegation who came here were interested only in the bushelage basis, that they wanted a higher price for their wheat, and he said: "That is all right, but it does not help the man who has not any wheat". No one will disagree with that statement. But, on the contrary, the delegation did not advocate raising the price of wheat at the expense of the man who had no wheat. They asked the government not only to retain the benefits of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act but to widen its scope, and said they looked forward to the day when it would be possible to extend its scope so that it would become a self-sustaining crop insurance scheme. It is not fair for members to play one group of farmers off against another and say: "These farmers want a higher price for their wheat, and to take it out of you chaps who have no wheat."

The brief in its recommendations endorses this legislation. I do not think anybody in the west would want to do away with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. They might want to improve and expand it, but certainly not to do away with it. It has decidedly a place in our western economy, but it cannot be used as an excuse for not giving to the wheat producer the price which is necessary in order that he may continue to produce and maintain a decent standard of living.

I want to say just this as I close, that the disappointment which will be felt at the legislation brought down yesterday will be chiefly because it fails in the main to comply in full with any of the recommendations of the delegation that came to Ottawa. It complies with some, in part, as I have indicated, but it does not comply in full with the requests that were made. The main and most serious omission in the legislation is its failure to institute the principle of parity prices. The ceiling prices apparently are to continue, but no statement has been made as to whether or not we are to have a ceiling price for wheat. The hon. member for Moose Jaw

(Mr. Ross) said yesterday that there was no ceiling price on wheat, but that is not as I read the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), as reported at page 1123 of Hansard of March 9, where he says:

> The wartime prices and trade board, in the discharge of its responsibilities under the maximum prices regulations and the wartime prices and trade regulations, will have the duty of determining the price at which wheat will be sold to domestic buyers in accordance with these principles.
> The wartime prices and trade board will discharge this duty from time to time after consultation with the Canadian wheat board.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That does not put a ceiling on wheat.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Well, there is going to be some arrangement. We should know before we go into committee or before the committee on agriculture, is there going to be a ceiling or is it going to be a pegged price? Is the 90 cents a bushel payment to be both the maximum and the minimum, or will the price be allowed to fluctuate above the 90 cents without a ceiling, or will there be a ceiling? We should know the same thing about coarse grains. There is to be a minimum price for coarse grains, but already a ceiling is in existence: for instance, oats, 51 cents; barley, 64⅝ cents. Will those ceilings continue? Will prices not be allowed to go above those ceilings? Because, if those ceilings are to continue, it means that oats is to have a ceiling price 9 cents below parity; barley, 9 cents below; rye 35 cents below; wheat, 51 cents below; flax being the only grain which will be above parity, and that, of course, for a very specific reason, namely that we are now badly in need of vegetable oil.

My quarrel is not so much that the initial payment under this bill is lower than we had reason to expect. The main quarrel with it is that there has been no attempt at all to raise the ceiling prices to parity, or to raise the minimum prices as a floor to prevent the price of these commodities from going too low.

Mr. GARDINER: When the hon. member says that, he is speaking of grain only?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes; I am only speaking of grain.

The second thing in the legislation which, of course, will cause disappointment is the failure of the government to have granted a larger initial payment. The feeling all over western Canada was that surely the time had come for some courageous steps to be taken in this matter. I notice that the hon. member for Wood Mountain said that after all, whether it comes as a bonus or as a price, the treasury is going to pay it. Let us look at that statement for a moment. In the first place, for the wheat consumed in Canada there is no reason for the treasury to pay it. We have cheap wheat in this country. The milling industry and the baking industry can afford to pay a price for wheat which is on a parity basis. They have paid it before. Back in the fall of 1938 the price of wheat went over $1.40, and there was no complaint. They can afford to pay a reasonable price for wheat to be milled in Canada. Second, the only other place where we sell wheat is the United Kingdom. As to the wheat we are giving to the United Kingdom—because it will probably come within the gift of $1,000 million worth of products which we shall be making to Great Britain—I think western Canada is justified when it says that if we are going to make a gift to Great Britain of so many million bushels of wheat, that is a gift which ought to be paid for by all the people rather than by the small section who grow it. That is why it would not have been unreasonable to expect the government to have paid a dollar as this initial price.

Another thing is that no step has been taken yet, and there is no indication that a step will be taken, to remove the surplus from the market and save it as an emergency. There should be an emergency reserve. It has been said over and over again that when this war is over, food will be a weapon to reestablish peace; it will be an implement of reconstruction. All right; then Canada as a whole ought to pay for that weapon. We do not ask the people of Ontario, or the manufacturers, to make tanks for nothing as a weapon to win the war. Then there is no reason why we should ask the farmers to pay for a weapon to win the peace. If we are going to use wheat as a weapon to reconstruct the world, it ought to be paid for by the whole Canadian people rather than by the wheat producers of western Canada. We would welcome from the government some statement that the sales in this next crop year will be applied to that year's wheat, because if we do that, and if the wheat is sold for more than the initial price, instead of the extra money being eaten up in interest and storage charges there will be some chance of it going back to the producer, who certainly has a right to expect whatever remuneration is coming.

The only recommendation which has been complied with is the removal of the clause which makes it impossible to declare an emergency year when the price of wheat is above 80 cents a bushel. No steps have been taken to increase the benefits under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. On the contrary, the initial price of 90 cents will shut out those farmers whose average is eight to twelve bushels. This will exclude more than half of the farmers who benefited in the last two crop years.

From the point of view of western Canada this debate is probably one of the most important which will be held during the session, because the whole price control system, if it is effective at all, will fasten price levels upon the Canadian people not for this year alone but for the duration of the war. Therefore, whatever principle is adopted here within the next few days is the principle which will obtain until the war is over. If the principle which we accept is that of depressed prices for agriculture, we shall impose on western Canada from now to the end of the war a standard of living which will mean poverty and insecurity for our people.

I therefore move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"this bill be not now read a second time but be it resolved that the disregarding by this parliament of the modest representations made by western agriculture for a parity price for all agricultural products and an initial wheat payment of at least $1 per bushel for No. 1 northern basis Fort William is contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada."

I want to say one other word before I sit down. I have listened in the few weeks we have been here to constant talking about national unity. I submit that national unity has not only a political but an economic basis; that you can only have a federation of people banded together provided they feel that they are getting equitable economic treatment; and if any section of our population, any group of producers, any particular occupation, any particular geographical location, has reason to feel that it is being discriminated against, that it is not getting fair treatment compared with other parts of the national economy, there you have national disunity, the type of national disunity which will split this country asunder.

I want to make an appeal to the government that they shall give consideration to establishing now, for the duration of the war, the principle of parity prices for agriculture—not only western agriculture, but eastern agriculture as well. Unless we do that, we shall face the possibility of dividing Canada into sections, one part prospering by virtue of government contracts and war industries, and another part becoming rapidly depopulated, lowering its standard of living, and in danger of becoming a great depressed area, from which the more aggressive members of society will be fleeing, and where we shall have people living who stay there only because they are too poor to move out. If we allow a condition like that to continue, we are asking to have black areas in Canada which will be hard not only upon the people who live in them but which will be to the everlasting disgrace of this country.

[Mr. Douglas (Weyburn).]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With respect to this amendment, I raise the same point of order as I did before. Whereas the amendment is not contrary to citation 755 of Beauchesne, I definitely suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it should be carefully considered whether it is not an infringement of standing orders 60 and 61 and section 54 of the British North America Act, the marginal citations being 551 and 562.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall consider the point of order during the dinner recess and rule upon it at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to say a few words in regard to it, having given some study to the matter during the dinner recess. The objection taken by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) is based upon section 54 of the British North America Act and standing order 60 of this house. It is, of course, elementary to say that it is not within the power of a private member to move a resolution which involves any increased burden upon the treasury or which changes the balance of the budgetary position of the nation; and if the amendment of the hon. member for Weyburn had that effect, it would clearly be out of order. But I submit that such is not the effect of the amendment. The amendment as phrased does not seek to impose any burden upon the public treasury. The adoption of the amendment would not result in the expenditure of one dollar of additional public funds. The whole purpose of the amendment is to suggest that the disregarding of the representations for a parity price and an initial payment of at least $1 a bushel for wheat is contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

The amendment must be judged by the results which would flow from its adoption. If the adoption of the resolution would result in an increased charge on public funds, or would, in other words, result in the adoption of a parity price and a payment of $1 a bushel for wheat, then clearly it would be out of order under section 54 of the British North America Act and standing order 60. But I submit that if the amendment should be adopted, the result would not be the adoption of a parity price or the establishment of an initial payment of $1 a bushel for wheat. Therefore it does not fall within the section or the standing order to which reference has been made. True, the amendment is in effect an expression of no confidence in the government's wheat policy, but it does not seek directly to set up an alternative to that policy, certainly not an alternative which would require the expenditure of public funds. I therefore submit that it is in order.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to support what has been said by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). The point of view which he expressed with regard to the amendment is the one which we ourselves hold, with the additional consideration that under standing order 75, paragraph 755, we note:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

I do not know what will be Your Honour's ruling, and I do not know whether in that ruling you intend to discuss this paragraph; but if so, I would direct attention to "amendments" in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms at page 321, No. 93, which deals with the second reading of a bill. There we see:

The question being proposed "that Bill No. 133, the War-time Elections Act be now read a second time."

Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved in amendment thereto, seconded by Mr. Pugsley: "That this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that the abridgement by this parliament of the electoral franchise now enjoyed in any province of the dominion by any class of his majesty's subjects would be contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada."

As a matter of fact, that amendment dealt very largely with the provisions of the bill, for the abridgements contained in the bill were serious. They included the denial of the right to vote to conscientious objectors, to Mennonites, to Doukhobors, to naturalized aliens of enemy origin, to naturalized aliens whose language was that of an enemy country, excepting those who were serving in the army or the navy. So I contend, Mr. Speaker, that as far as the second part of the consideration goes, the point is quite clear under No. 93, which I have just read.

I would say further, however, that if you will look at the wording of the amendment, the governing noun is the word "disregarding" and all the words which follow it down to the words "Fort William" are words modifying that word. It does not involve the country or the government in the expenditure of any money. All it does is to complain that in the opinion of this house the government has disregarded a plea made by a large number of people. It is the disregarding of the plea that we are seeking to say something about in the amendment. Then in paragraph 558, under standing order 60, at page 165 of Beauchesne we find this:

Motions advocating public expenditure, or the imposition of a charge, if the motion be framed in sufficient abstract or general terms, can be entertained and agreed to by the house. Resolutions of this nature are permissible because, having no operative effect, no grant is made or burthen imposed by their adoption.

This very clearly explains standing order 60 and refers, probably better than anything else in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, to the particular amendment now under discussion. We are not advocating a public expenditure, though if we were, and the motion were sufficiently abstract or general in its terms, it could be entertained and agreed to by the house. But clearly, Mr. Speaker, this amendment is permissible because, it having no operative effect, no grant is made or burthen imposed by its adoption. So I would suggest that in deciding this question you take these citations under consideration, and then I believe you will rule the amendment in order.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, before you give your ruling I should like to submit that the argument just advanced by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) probably would be entirely sound if the resolution proposed were not in the form of an amendment, and had no relationship to anything being discussed by the house at the moment. But I submit that the amendment is being proposed for the purpose of having an expression of opinion by this house upon the question which is before the house, and for the purpose of amending it in such a way as to have an expression of opinion by the house which, if carried, would result in the expenditure of money by the government of Canada. There are two phrases in the amendment which would bring about that result. The first it:

> . . . this bill be not now read a second time, but be it resolved that the disregarding by this parliament of the modest representations made by western agriculture for a parity price for all agricultural products . . .

It is well recognized that there is only one method by which parity prices have been provided, since the war started up to the present time, and that has been by the voting of money by the Dominion of Canada for the purpose of making possible higher payments to farmers throughout the country for their different farm products. There would be no parity prices for farm products in Canada to-day if it were not for the fact that the federal treasury has been drawn upon for payments of certain amounts, in addition to that which is being obtained from the British government for food products. Then the amendment goes on to say:

> . . . and an initial wheat payment of at least one dollar per bushel for No. 1 northern basis Fort William is contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

I submit, if this amendment carried, relating as it does to the policy now before the house, the government would be compelled either to adopt the policy agreed to by the house or to resign. In other words, the statement made a few minutes ago to the effect that this is contrary to the policy of the government, and therefore would be a vote of want of confidence in the government, and its policy, would practically force that position. If that position were forced it would, of course, result in the expenditure of money by the treasury of Canada. That being so, I submit the amendment is not in order.

Mr. HANSELL: With respect to the suggestion that the amendment involves an outlay of money, I submit that that is a matter of interpretation only. One might also interpret the amendment as being one which might reduce expenditures. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his argument is merely supposing that arriving at a parity price will cost money to the government. That does not necessarily follow.

My submission, therefore, is that the amendment cannot be out of order simply because an hon. member wishes to interpret it as one involving an expenditure of money. The amendment does not propose an increased expenditure of money. I therefore submit the amendment is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question before the house is on the second reading of Bill No. 13.

to which an amendment has been moved by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas). The amendment is in these words:

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "this bill be not now read a second time, but be it resolved that the disregarding by this parliament of the modest representations made by western agriculture for a parity price for all agricultural products and an initial wheat payment of at least $1 per bushel for No. 1 northern basis Fort William is contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada."

Citation 755 in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms reads as follows:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

The Minister of Agriculture suggested that the amendment might involve the imposition of expenditures by the government, and that that would be contrary to the rules of the house. In his opinion this amendment did involve such expenditure, and would incur additional expenditures.

I would, however, draw the attention of hon. members to citation 558 in the same volume, which is as follows:

> Motions advocating public expenditure, or the imposition of a charge, if the motion be framed in sufficiently abstract or general terms, can be entertained, and agreed to by the house. Resolutions of this nature are permissible because, having no operative effect, no grant is made or burthen imposed by their adoption.

In giving my decision I have in mind citation 755, which I have already quoted, and the practice as stated in May, 13th edition, page 390, and in Bourinot at page 509.

It seems to me well established that the terms of the amendment conform to citation 755. If one reads the amendment he will find that the resolution within it is declaratory of some principle adverse to or differing from the principle, policy or provisions of the bill. There is a declaratory principle in the amendment, namely that the bill is contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada, (section 91 of the British North America Act).

There is no request or attempt to bring about an increased expenditure, but there is objection to the principle of the bill before us. The amendment is adverse to the principle expressed in the bill, and it differs from provisions of the bill on the basis of representations made known during the course of this debate by the western agricultural delegation.

It seems to me, therefore, it is clear that the amendment falls within the provisions contained in the rules I have quoted, and I therefore rule that the amendment is in order.

Mr. H. R. FLEMING (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, no doubt the ruling which you have just given will open for discussion the amendment which has been moved, along with the other bills we have been discussing, and concerning which I wish to say a few words this evening.

Barely five months ago, when making a radio broadcast to the people of Canada the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said:

> Agricultural prices, with a few conspicuous exceptions, especially wheat, are higher to-day than they have been at any time during the past ten years. In cases where agricultural prices have not kept pace with increased costs of production, measures are being taken to bring about a more satisfactory relationship.

Some of those measures are now being put into effect by some of the legislation which has been brought down by the administration In my opinion, however, they are not nearly comprehensive enough. Western farmers are indeed pleased to know that the wheat board will handle all the wheat, and that in the event of any money being made in these transactions, from future wheat sales, the producer will get some share.

Western farmers will also be pleased to hear that the grain exchange will be virtually closed, something which is long overdue. It is admitted that the operation of the grain exchange, despite some possible value in its tendency toward price stabilization, in the last quarter of a century has cost western Canada many, many millions of dollars. As is well known, in some years the crop has been bought and sold forty or fifty times, and I need not tell the house to whose advantage.

There is encouragement, too, in the fact that these different bills brought down by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the bill in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) with respect to amendments to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and the amendment moved this afternoon by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) are now all being discussed together.

I find from the correspondence which I have had with many people throughout Saskatchewan, and in the more limited area of my constituency, that many are of the opinion that wheat comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture. I find that the Minister of Agriculture day in and day out is being blamed because wheat has not been given a better deal, or because a better deal has not been given to the wheat producer. No one knows better than those of us who come from Saskatchewan how hard he has worked and how difficult his task has been. He has had to face what the hon. member of Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) referred to a few days ago as the boy economists. These so-called economists could not tell a cow from a horse, or a field of wheat from a field of barley. He also must deal with the financial clique, certain elments which represent the eastern interests. These are within and without the government. Many people whom one hears discussing agricultural questions know just about as much. I often think that their knowledge is based upon the ancient history of what happened to the Selkirk settlers one hundred and twenty years ago when the grasshoppers ate the kilts off those men from Scotland.

It is most satisfactory to learn that there will be no ceiling on the price of wheat. That would have been a handicap to our whole western economy; it would have been a catastrophe. When I spoke in this house three years ago about governmental control of the price of wheat, I pointed out that when a price was set, the impression was created at home and abroad that that was the value we placed upon a bushel of wheat, and that would be what people in other parts of the world would consider it worth. It also gives an opportunity to those who are not sympathetic to our prairie farmers to accuse Canada of holding up the price to Great Britain in her hour of need if she should offer more for wheat than the present ceiling or the present set-up of price that we use. That is one of the dangers that beset us.

I am sharply opposed to this proposed price of 90 cents a bushel, Fort William, for western wheat. I have no hesitation in saying from my place in this House of Commons that the price should have been at least $1. Why all this niggardliness toward a great section of this Canadian nation? For the want of a dime, a ten cent piece, we are raising a question in the minds of the people of western Canada. Wheat has been a casualty long enough. Surely the time has come when we should take it out of the casualty list and place it in the front line so that it can go forward fighting for what we are all fighting for to-day—democracy. I appreciate fully the assistance that was given to the western farmers to help them in those days when it was difficult to find a sale for their products, when there were such large stocks of wheat for which markets could not be found. The measures now before the house do not go far enough to meet the situation that now prevails.

The present price of 70 cents a bushel, No. 1 northern, Fort William or Vancouver, gives the farmer a maximum gross return of approximately 50 cents a bushel at his shipping point. The proposed price of 90 cents a bushel will mean that the farmer will get approximately 70 cents a bushel at his shipping point. There can be no debate that with present costs, with general expenses and living expenses being what they are, a return of 50 cents a bushel, or even 70 cents a bushel is not enough, even if we have a bumper crop in Saskatchewan.

The Monetary Times of August, 1930, contained a survey of the cost of producing wheat, and it was shown that it cost 84½ cents to raise a bushel of western wheat. The United Farmers of Manitoba carried out an investigation in 1933, and even with all the paring that they could do they could not get the cost of production below 78 cents a bushel. Professor Hope of the university of Saskatchewan has been quoted in this house on many occasions, and we have had other opinions as to the actual cost of raising a bushel of wheat. All these figures compare favourably with the average United States cost of production.

Dollar wheat would give the prairie farmer 80 cents at his shipping point, and I submit that that is little enough for the sacrifices he has endured over a long period of time and the contribution he has made, not only to the economic structure of Canada but to the whole world. There is no wheat raised anywhere else in the world quite like the wheat that we raise on the western prairies. A loaf of bread produced from Canadian wheat will contain 3,000 cubic centimeters; a loaf produced from the same amount of Australian wheat will contain 2,180 cubic centimeters, and a loaf produced from English wheat, 1,830 cubic centimeters. A loaf of bread produced from Canadian wheat stands far above the bread produced from wheat raised in Germany, France or Italy.

The domestic economy of western Canada is based upon our wheat economy, and in the main this cannot be changed. The agricultural authorities are thoroughly familiar with the factors of soil, water and climate. The Minister of Agriculture, speaking in this house on his bill, proved to the members that we had this wheat triangle. Speaking before the Canadian chamber of commerce in convention in Regina in 1931, John W. Dafoe, editor of the Winnipeg Free Press and co-editor of the Sirois report, a man who for forty years has followed the difficult economy of western Canada and who knows the situation of the prairies perhaps better than any other living man because he has made a special study of all phases and angles, had this to say:

> Check over the situation any way you like and you will come back to this: that we have in western Canada at least 12 million acres that will have to be abandoned if not put to wheat raising, for which, under modern conditions of power farming and rapidly maturing kinds of wheat, they are highly suited.

There are about 290,000 farms in the prairie provinces. If we take an average of four persons to a farm, that means that 1,160,000 western Canadians are dependent upon farm income. In Saskatchewan whence I come, which can grow enough wheat in one year to feed all the people of Canada for five years, or all the people of Saskatchewan for fifty years, about 76 per cent of the farm income is from wheat, and that is one of the reasons why we who represent Saskatchewan constituencies—whether it be town or city makes no difference—are so much interested in the wheat economy of that province. Because of the low prices which have prevailed for the last number of years the farmers of western Canada have suffered. But low prices have been one handicap only. Those farmers have suffered crop failure after crop failure due to circumstances over which they had no control. They have suffered from rust; they have suffered from drought; they have suffered from grasshoppers and from frost, and because of all these things they find themselves in the position they are now in.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I know the situation in a great many of the rural areas of Saskatchewan as well as any other member. In the practice of my profession of medicine I have spent many years in the constituency of Humboldt, in its rural areas. I have met the people in their humble homes, and I know the hardships they have had to endure. They are a proud people. They did not want hand-outs from the government and they did not ask for them. They tried to keep body and soul together before any governmental assistance came to them in the days now past when we had our relief problems on those plains and prairies. The majority of our prairie farmers live in a most meagre way. They have no elaborate homes, no high-class furnishings. The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) the other night gave certain statistics in connection with the modernized homes that we have in the prairie provinces. The children of our farmers receive only a very limited education. Our people have gone through all the handicaps and the hardships I have mentioned and, now, what do they find? They see prosperity coming to the great industrial areas of Ontario, and I cannot understand how any government can afford to be niggardly in dealing with the type of men and women who have given the best years of their life to carving from out that wilderness of western Canada homes for themselves and their children.

We see in our mind's eye to-night that humble father and mother sitting alone in their prairie home, trying to keep the old farm going, with all the difficulties that go with it—all that they owe on farm mortgage, high interest rates, low prices for their products, and all the other things which have befallen them as I mentioned a few moments ago. They may be thinking of their son, and, Mr. Speaker, this touches many in Saskatchewan. That son may be the boy you read about in the western Canadian newspapers, that boy from Saskatchewan who was shot down over Singapore or in the Libyan desert or in one of the commando raids on France or Norway or over the English channel. Should we treat these people in a different way from the people of other parts of Canada? By this wheat legislation we are proposing to jeopardize not only the future of western Canada but the ability of its people to help win this war—and all for what? All for the want of a ten-cent piece as an initial payment.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Then you would be in favour of the amendment.

Mr. FLEMING: That is my business. I did not read it over. I asked the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) for a copy, and I did not get it. I cannot answer that question until I have read the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It just asks for parity prices.

Mr. FLEMING: My hon. friend knows all about it, so after I hear him make his speech I may change my views. After all, I am not tied up as he is to some fantastic theories of money or something like that.

In the Atlantic charter it was pointed out that the great new order would provide freedom from fear and freedom from want in those countries which have been overrun by the enemy. Surely we can do little less than to start this great new order here in Canada by seeing to it that the people on the western plains shall become free from fear and free from want.

Wage and salaried workers in Canada are now given protection to meet the increased costs of living. The farmers who are able to engage in mixed farming practices are protected under governmental policy and receive adequate compensation for the production of live stock and dairy products. The sharply improved price of coarse grains arising from the government's policy of promoting the production of live stock and dairy products materially aids those who can successfully engage in this particular phase of farming activity.

But what about the wheat farmer, the farmer in that triangle which the Minister of Agriculture drew yesterday? In that broadcast which I mentioned in the opening part of my remarks the Prime Minister said:

> Agriculture itself is a national asset which must be preserved.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether wheat farming is not a substantial part of Canada's agriculture. I ask you further, whether or not 90 cent wheat will preserve that part of our agriculture. It can be proved that 90-cent wheat is not adequate—absolutely not adequate.

Let me examine briefly the existing price set-up for our prairie wheat and compare it with prices of other grains.

A few months ago the Canadian wheat board, acting as administrator on behalf of the wartime prices and trade board, issued an order fixing the maximum price at which Ontario wheat might be sold in eastern Canada at $1.26 a bushel, basis delivered at Montreal. This was the highest price at which wheat was sold in the basic period between September 15 and October 11, 1941. Last January the Northwest Line elevators' association which, as is well known to those of us who come from the farming section of western Canada, is vitally interested in the welfare of a vast number of western farmers in that area, approached the wartime prices and trade board for an adjustment of western wheat prices. The association said:

> In view of the action already taken by your board in respect to Ontario wheat, and having regard to the superior milling value of western spring wheat, we feel that the ceiling price of wheat for all Canada should be not less than the price of $1.26 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern delivered Montreal. This would make the ceiling price at Fort William and Vancouver a minimum of approximately $1.15 per bushel.

I do not like that word "ceiling" in the submission of the association, but I like its appraisal of the problem being faced by the west and I like its energy in trying to get something done for our western agriculturists. It asked for wheat at $1.15 a bushel. The organized wheat growers asked only for $1 wheat as an initial payment.

We are not asking that this be based on the price of wheat and other essential farm commodities in 1913-14 or the years just prior to the outbreak of the first world war, although that is widely accepted as a fair basis. The government of the United States has taken the price relationship existing between 1909 and 1914 as a proper base for stabilizing current farm income, and there is little difference between the 1909-1914 and the 1913-1914 bases. The Searle Grain company in its valuable index, which has been quoted many times in this chamber, shows that the 1913 price of No. 1 northern wheat, basis Fort William, was 87½ cents a bushel, and the cost of the essential commodities which the farmer has to buy has increased fifty per cent since that time. Therefore, to place the farmer in the same position comparatively as he enjoyed in 1913-14, the price should be increased fifty per cent. But the organized farmers of western Canada are asking only $1 a bushel as the initial payment for their wheat. I know some will raise objections to this. Some will say that to do so will increase our surpluses and that you should stop growing wheat; others will say that it is too expensive.

Let us explore briefly these two objections. Take the question of surpluses. We find on every hand that what we have is not surpluses, but scarcities. One of our great difficulties in the present war is that, so far from having surpluses, there has been a scarcity of every commodity, excepting wheat, which we have required to help win this war, and the only people who were prepared to face the issues of the world war in which we are engaged to-day were the prairie farmers of western Canada. We can certainly thank our lucky stars that we have these surpluses. It is only three years since, having carried a burdensome surplus of wheat for some years, we had to scrape our wheat bins clean, following the poor crops of 1936 and 1937. Recurrence of such a situation would be most serious. If we were now short of wheat, the government would go to any lengths—there would be no question of cost—to get the farmers of western Canada back into full production of wheat.

Surely it can be readily appreciated that food, and particularly wheat, is as important a war requirement as are munitions. Wheat can be stored for longer periods of time and at less expense than any other foodstuffs. The need for maintaining substantial reserves of wheat as an essential requirement of the war and the subsequent peace negotiations is certainly recognized.

Indeed, the need for food reserves is more than ever apparent, because increasingly large wheat and agricultural areas are being laid waste by war. Accepting wheat as necessary to winning the war, and necessary to win the peace, the government must be prepared to pay the farmer a reasonable price for producing wheat. It pays necessary prices—whatever the price the manufacturer wants—for munitions of war. Is wheat any less important for the winning of this war than those other essentials of which we speak in connection with our war activity? Surely I do not need to reiterate the urgency for the united nations to maintain ample reserves of food as an essential requirement of the war and the peace which will follow. In this connection the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, Prime Minister of Great Britain, speaking on August 20, 1940, said:

> We shall do our best to encourage the building up of reserves of food all over the world so that there will always be held before the eyes of the people of Europe, including the Germans, the certainty that the shattering of nazi power would bring to them all immediate food, freedom and peace.

The Prime Minister of Canada in his radio address which I have mentioned twice before, said:

> Wheat held in reserve constitutes an invaluable war asset.

Need we, then, be fearful that giving the western farmer dollar wheat would build up our stocks too much? Not in the least, even if we had a bumper crop on the prairies this coming season, and nobody believes that we shall have, because moisture conditions all over western Canada were never worse than this year, owing to the light snowfall this past winter. Western Canada may have a crop failure just as complete as that of 1937. But even if we should have 500 million bushels as a steady reserve, we would not be too prudent. With the armies of Germany and Russia steadily moving back and forth in those great areas of Russia which have been destroyed, areas which will not be able to go back into wheat production, the day may come when we shall suddenly be asked to feed our great ally, Russia, that has been of such immense assistance to us in this present struggle.

We do not need to worry about surpluses because the government is protecting itself against surpluses. The farmers will not grow a surplus of wheat because the government says that the restricted deliveries will be only 280 million bushels. It is impossible, of course, to estimate accurately what the crop will be in 1942. But in my opinion, and in the opinion of others who are interested in the grain trade, the figures which the minister gave yesterday were the outside figures. It is our opinion that dollar wheat would not in any way embarrass the wheat board, and the government has amply protected itself by putting in the clause providing for a delivery quota of 280 million bushels.

As to the price, let us suppose that the deliveries will be 280 million bushels. Let us suppose that the farmers do turn over that much wheat to the wheat board, and let us suppose further that all that wheat comes from the prairie provinces. Ten cents a bushel, providing for dollar wheat instead of ninety cent wheat, would cost approximately $28 million. We talk to-day in such large figures that they are absolutely unintelligible to the ordinary man on the street. I think the expression has been coined that they are "astronomical". They have become so large that one is unable to comprehend them. But we shall be spending in this fiscal year nearly $3,000 million. One can go into the argument of percentage, but it is useless, because by comparison the amount which would be taken out of the public treasury would be so small that it would be only the proverbial drop in the proverbial bucket compared with the great sums which we are expending in every direction.

There is one thing that we should keep in mind. While we are talking about what this war is going to cost, we are liable to lose the war if we lose sight of the importance of certain things—for instance, if we quarrel over a little sum of $28 million which would keep up the morale of western Canada. Would we not spend $28 million to keep up the morale of India? This dollar wheat has become almost a byword on the plains and prairies of the province that I represent in this house, and this money would not be frozen. It would immediately go back into circulation in the form of war savings stamps, war savings certificates, payments to merchants and doctors and scores of creditors whom the farmers have to pay. I have found in the farming community which I represent that nothing gives the people greater pleasure than to be able to take a little bit of money and go and pay off some of their old indebtedness. This $28 million that would be handed to the people of the prairie provinces would help them to do this, and the money would not all stay in Saskatchewan; it would find its way, as such money has always done in the past, to eastern Canada.

I am sure that the people in other parts of the dominion will sympathize with the submission that was made to the Prime Minister and his government by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. So often we hear it said, "Oh, the people of Ontario or Quebec or the maritimes would not stand for it, or it could not be put through the House of Commons." I doubt very much that that represents the attitude of the people of those provinces, and I say that from my association with members from Ontario and from other parts of the country. I believe they are quite fair-minded and will look upon this situation in the same light as we do. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture is an organization representing the organized farmers from all parts of the dominion, and I quote the following from their submission:

> All of the member bodies of this federation from western Canada are on record to the effect that the basic price for the coming year should be not less than $1 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern at lakehead or seaboard terminals. We can assure the government that opinion in Manitoba and Alberta is equally strong, and that such a request has also the support of the agricultural interests in other parts of Canada represented by this federation.

The prairie farmers are not asking for anything that is beyond the reach of this government; they are not asking for anything that is going to ruin the federal treasury. They realize as well as anyone else that the government have a tough job and that our farmers and the rural population of the country are straining every effort to ensure victory and peace to the allied nations of the world. They are also committed to action which will help in every way. There is nothing they have not done to try to bring this about, including a change in the method of farming. To the best of their ability they have tried changing from wheat raising to the raising of pork products. Everything within their power they have done to help to win the war and to assist the government.

Let me ask you this, Mr. Speaker: Who can estimate the upsurge of feeling that would go all through the west as a result of news that there would be dollar wheat. Suppose such news went out from this parliament; can you imagine the psychological effect it would have on those poor downtrodden people who have suffered so much? It would act upon the blood of those farmers like a tonic. But 90-cent wheat! Why all this niggardliness?—because that is the only term I can think of. Now is the great opportunity for this government. The cost would be but little more than the new price, and there would be no danger of the accumulation of new surpluses. Moreover, judging from the figures of cost of wheat production, dollar wheat would be no more than is fair.

I hope this government will reconsider the matter. I hope they will give every consideration to the representations made by the great delegation that came here. It was not an ordinary delegation; it was not like so many delegations that come here and present cases to the government of Canada, setting forth the maximum amount that they would like to get, in the expectation of getting perhaps half of that amount, in which event they are well pleased. This was a different delegation. It represented all phases of thought in Saskatchewan, all phases of activity—farmers, business men, professional men and merchants. These were reasonable men, and they took the attitude that since this country was in the throes of the greatest war known to history, they would not ask for anything that was unreasonable. They asked for the minimum amount, and I have every hope that, with that keen sense of appreciation which the Prime Minister has of our agricultural problems, with that persuasive ability that characterizes the Minister of Agriculture, these two men will be able to convince the other members of the federal government, who are opposed to giving a dollar as the initial payment to the farmers of western Canada, of the wisdom of such a step.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I shall be supporting the amendment which was moved this afternoon by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas). Had it not been moved I would have moved a similar amendment in speaking this evening. The idea embodied in that amendment is not new to this house. My colleague the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), speaking on April 8, 1941, said, as reported at page 2280 of Hansard:

I have risen to move an amendment based on the condition of agriculture. I think it will be agreed by all hon. members that in time of war the morale of this nation cannot be as it should be if agriculture is pauperized. Agriculture taken as a whole in Canada is in a lamentable condition, and it is an anomalous condition of affairs that Canada, a great producer of food, should, in a world which sooner or later will require foodstuffs, try to find means to bring about a reduction in the production of wheat. I move therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Peel:

That all the words after "that" in the motion be struck out, and that the following be substituted therefor:

It be resolved that the government should take immediate steps to create a parity of prices as between agricultural and other products in order to improve the condition of Canadian agriculture and in order that it may receive a just and fair return, and thus be enabled to make that contribution to Canada's war effort which is so desirable, and which our agricultural population so greatly desire to make.

An hon. MEMBER: How did they vote?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am not sure how several members to whom we listened yesterday and to-day voted at that time. They probably voted against it.

We have listened to other speakers agitating for a higher price, including the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), who was very much heated in his argument yesterday evening, and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross). They inserted some provisos, however, as to the manner in which they were bound to the great Liberal party and why they must follow it at all costs to the country.

I am sure many people in western Canada will be very much disappointed with this bill, for several reasons. Not only will they be disappointed in regard to the price, but they expected that this policy would be announced earlier in the year. One month ago to-day, on February 10, in this very chamber I expressed the hope that the two ministers, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would soon announce the wheat policy for this year. I pointed out that in previous years a good deal of this policy had been carried out by order in council, and the Minister of Agriculture interrupted to say that this year we must wait until the speech from the throne was disposed of because it would be all covered by legislation. Despite that statement by the minister, however, we were told yesterday that some part of the policy still will be implemented by order in council. I was one of those who, a year ago, greatly criticized this practice of passing orders in council, and I think I was right in so doing. This afternoon, in regard to the wheat acreage reduction scheme, an order in council concerning summer-fallow, which was passed on November 27, 1941, was quoted. I need not read the entire preamble, but the order in council provides:

"Summer-fallow" means the cultivation or management of fallow land in such a way as to conserve soil moisture or to prevent soil drifting, or both.

That was passed on November 27, 1941, with relation to the management of the scheme during the previous summer. Another order in council was passed on November 21, 1941, on the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with respect to the handling of wheat. So I think we should realize how necessary it is that these policies should be introduced by means of legislation.

Yesterday I listened very attentively to the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the wheat situation, and the announcement of the 90-cent price for the 1942 crop. Then we had the statement by the Minister of Agriculture as to wheat acreage reduction, the demand for feed grain, animal products and other agricultural commodities for the war effort. I should like to compliment the minister upon his statement. I do not agree with everything he said, but he had a big job to do and I think he is to be complimented upon the way he did it. Then, following those statements, we listened to the impassioned arguments put forward by the hon. member for Moose Jaw and the hon. member for Rosthern to which I have already referred. They coupled with their arguments, however, the statement that they were bound to the Liberal party and must follow that party at all costs. I have been rather convinced in recent weeks that this delegation of some four hundred pool farmers, dirt farmers from western Canada, probably impressed this government to a greater extent with regard to the difficulties of the western farmer than their representatives in the Liberal party have been able to do for the past six or seven years. I remember that in 1934 the present Minister of Agriculture led the Liberal party of Saskatchewan into power in that province. During the course of that campaign, in the month of June, he had distributed throughout the province a handbill promising dollar wheat. I do not know why dollar wheat is always the great issue in a Saskatchewan election, but in any event this handbill, put out by authority of the Saskatchewan Liberal Association, said:

Trade will bring dollar wheat. Dollar wheat will end your troubles. Dollar wheat will run your farm and pay your taxes. Dollar wheat will pay the hired help and pay your repair bill. Dollar wheat will pay your insurance and buy your wife a new dress. Vote Liberal.

My recollection is that the people of that province voted Liberal; but, as the hon. member for Rosthern pointed out last night, the debts of the people have been accumulating year by year. He did not make 1934 the jump-off date, but he did give the figures for several years since then. On May 15, 1934, May wheat was quoted at 70⅛ cents at Winnipeg and 86 cents at Chicago, and I think everyone will agree that the cost of production and the cost of living were not nearly as high then as they are to-day. I might give a comparison of the prices of some of the necessary farm implements, as between 1934 and 1941:

Two-furrow gang plough.....	$137 50	$155 00
Eight-foot cultivator.....	143 00	162 50
Twenty-row double disc drill	250 50	295 25
Eight-foot binder.....	257 00	327 00

The average increase in these four farm implements, which are most necessary on any farm, was 18½ per cent during that period. Many hon. members know of the demand for power equipment to-day. In the Winnipeg Tribune of February 26 I ran across a short article making a comparison between army tools and agricultural tools, by Mr. Q. H. Martinson, who said:

The army tools of to-day dwarf those of 1918, just as the machinery of present day agriculture has outmoded that of twenty-five years ago. Mechanized equipment to equip a half-section farm to-day in some instances costs as much as fifty per cent more than the horse-drawn equipment needed for the farm during the last war. During the last war farmers used a horse-drawn binder; to-day he uses a combine. He hauled his grain to town with team and wagon; to-day he uses motor trucks. He ploughed with a horse-drawn two-furrowed gang plough; to-day he uses a four-farrowed gang plough drawn by a fast moving tractor. Mechanized equipment for modern agriculture is now a prime and urgent necessity.

I remember that the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) who, I believe, is also a member of the wheat committee of the cabinet, spoke in Souris in 1937. He stated then that if the west could produce a good crop of wheat, all the difficulties of the farmers would be solved. Well, we have produced a couple of good crops in Manitoba since then, but I am afraid our farmers are still facing many serious difficulties, especially in the matter of debt adjustment.

The great disparity between industry, organized labour and the wheat producer has been increasing continuously. The Searle market feature of January 7, 1942, contains an article on the financial reward to wheat producers and to industrial labour, taking the period 1913-14 as the parity basis. They point out that the price of wheat now should be $1 at the average country point for No. 1 northern wheat, which would be equivalent to $1.20 for No. 1 northern at Fort William. Then they go on:

. . . because the cost of the things farmers have to buy, according to the Searle index, has increased 50·8 per cent since 1913-14. But the price of wheat to-day is actually only 53 cents. Therefore the price of wheat to-day is 45 per cent below "parity", or we can say that a bushel of wheat to-day has a purchasing power of 45 per cent less than it had in 1913-14.

For the industrial worker's average hourly rate of wages, however, to have the same purchasing power as it had in 1913-14, when it was at an index number of 100, it should now be at an index number of 145 (because the cost of living for industrial labour has gone up by 45 per cent since 1913-14). But the chart shows that the average hourly rate of wages to industrial labour is actually now at 210. Therefore the average hourly rate of wages to-day is 44 per cent higher than it was in 1913-14, or we can say that an hour of industrial labour now has a purchasing power of 44 per cent more than it had in 1913-14, or is 44 per cent higher than "parity".

The wide difference in the reward paid to wheat growers and to industrial labour respectively, should be borne in mind when proposals are considered to increase the price of wheat to its "parity" price of $1 a bushel to the farmer at his country point, for this chart reveals that even though wheat growers should receive $1 for their wheat, industrial labour would still be receiving a much higher relative return for their labour than wheat growers would be receiving for their wheat.

The period used by the government as a basis for parity with regard to industry and organized labour during this war is that of 1926 to 1929, rather than 1913-14. On that basis of parity wheat would be worth $1.42; oats, 60 cents; barley 71 cents, and rye, approximately $1. As stated yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture, the ceiling price for oats has been placed at 51·5 cents, or approximately 9 cents under parity. The price for barley has been placed at 64·8 cents, or 7 cents under parity. There had been a ceiling of approximately 66 cents on rye, which is 34 cents under parity. There is now a floor under oats placed at 45 cents, and under barley at 60 cents.

I now turn to a press dispatch appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press of March 2. This article is written by Grant Dexter, many of whose articles have not been critical of the government. The article is headed "Increase in sale of goods and services in urban areas", and is as follows·

The rise is more marked in eastern Canada than in the prairie provinces. The increase from December, 1940, to December, 1941, varies from a peak of 21·5 per cent in Quebec to an actual loss of ·2 per cent in southern Saskatchewan, 8·2 in all of Saskatchewan and 14·8 throughout rural Manitoba.

This is marked evidence of the purchasing power created in this country during war time, of which I expect to say more at another time.

May I at this point make some reference to voluntary enlistments by provinces. This matter has a direct bearing on the subject of wheat. I heard one hon. member go much further last night when referring to manufacturing. By way of proving that people in western Canada are doing their share in the war, I should like to give some percentages based on a return showing enlistments at December 31, 1941. These are voluntary enlistments for the active army, air force and navy, and are based on the 1931 population:

Province	Percentage of voluntary enlistments to total population
	Per cent
Alberta	5
Saskatchewan	3·7
Manitoba	5·7
Ontario	4·6
Quebec	2·3
British Columbia	5·7
New Brunswick	5·4
Nova Scotia	6

[Mr. Ross (Souris).]

That is conclusive proof that these people who are labouring under such great handicaps, these western farmers, are doing their share, and that their sons and young people have done their bit by way of voluntary enlistment toward defending the nation.

Aside from food producing activities, the farmer has an important mission to fulfil. We need thriving agriculture for sociological reasons. Nations must never forget that agriculture's most valuable crop is the men and women who live by it. The resourcefulness, the self-reliance and the reserve of character that spring from working with nature and understanding her, from making decisions, from building on each separate farm a whole system of management of the soil out of the peculiar conditions that exist there, are moral assets we cannot lose without becoming incomparably poorer. I think that fact was brought out yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture when he drew the line from Morden to Saskatoon, and across to Lloydminster and down to Calgary, and pointed out that that area was chiefly and, in some cases, only fitted for the production of wheat, and that in that area provision had to be made for at least a million people. That is a factor which we as human beings cannot overlook, or lightly set aside.

Mr. G. Goddard Watts, in an article headed "An agricultural policy for Britain," points out that we need a countryside peopled by fresh rural communities in order to maintain the physical quality of our human stock. It is a tradition that three generations away from the soil will exhaust the vitality of a family, and that for refreshment and revitalization that family must leave its urban surroundings and reestablish itself in rural life. The nation which strangles its agriculture is on the way out. That is the verdict of history. I believe that in that statement there is plenty of food for thought for parliament at this time.

I have been somewhat disappointed that there has not been greater cooperation between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce and producers' organizations with respect to wheat. I should like to quote from the Winnipeg Tribune an article bearing out this thought. This was written by Mr. Q. H. Martinson; it is dated March 6, 1942, and reads as follows:

To-day the farmer and technical agriculturist are cooperating wholeheartedly with one purpose in view—the improvement of Canadian agriculture. To-day the producer and technical agriculturist are stressing the need for a permanent agricultural policy with little apparent response from the dominion government, apart from the work carried on under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. However, the scope of the P.F.R.A. is restricted to only part of western Canada. Producers, producer organizations, technical agriculturists and other groups directly or indirectly associated with agriculture, fully realize the urgent necessity for the establishment of a long-term agricultural programme for Canada.

On July 12 last, a meeting of Manitoba members of C.S.T.A. was held at Brandon. At that meeting, a resolution urged the establishment of an advisory committee of agriculturists, farmer representatives, and others to advise the government on its wheat policy. Those presenting the resolution suggested that the government should make contact with all competent authorities and give careful consideration to suggestions and recommendations in the formation of an advisory committee. Specific recommendations entirely divorced from political considerations could then be offered the government. Despite the requests and advice of these recognized agricultural experts, the dominion government has failed to name an advisory committee and has failed to outline a programme of agricultural policy in Canada.

That is something which is much needed in Canada at this time.

Statistics were given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to surplus wheat in Canada and other exporting countries at this time. Therefore I have taken time to consider the prices of wheat in some of these other countries. To begin with, according to the Searle grain report of March 4, 1942, the price in the United Kingdom, which imports a great deal of wheat, is placed at $1.90¾ for the home producer. The report states:

> The price of homegrown wheat in the United Kingdom will be increased by about 18 cents a bushel for the 1942 crop. The new price will be equal to about $1.90¾ per bushel in Canadian funds.

The price of wheat in the United States, which also has a very considerable surplus, is set out by Mr. R. M. Evans, administrator of agricultural adjustment and conservation in the United States Department of Agriculture. I was privileged to listen to a speech by Mr. Evans in the Chateau Laurier last winter. He has stated that commodity loans are made to producers who have complied with their acreage allotments. These loans are based upon 85 per cent of the parity price for the commodity. For wheat this has meant a loan rate of $1.15 a bushel for No. 2 wheat at Chicago. On March 7, May wheat was quoted at Chicago at $1.29⅞. It was quoted at Winnipeg at 79¼ cents or a difference of 50½ cents a bushel.

We have had the united requests of the western pools, western governments, municipal unions, western boards of trade and other organizations representing every walk of life west of the great lakes asking for an initial payment of at least $1 a bushel. Some of them used the parity of 1913-14 which was $1.20 a bushel, and I have already quoted the parity of 1926-29, which was $1.42 a bushel. Reference has been made to the proposal of the line elevators. They suggested:

(a) An initial payment for farmers delivering their 1942 wheat crop to the Canadian wheat board of $1.22⅛ per bushel basis one northern delivered Fort William or Vancouver.

(b) That the government accept delivery of 350,000,000 bushels of the 1942 wheat crop on this price basis.

(c) That deliveries and sales of the 1942 wheat crop be segregated from the carryover of past years and the carryover be reserved to meet post-war and unforeseen war requirements.

That is in keeping with the previous suggestion of that great British leader, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, and the man who was a great figure in the last war, Mr. Lloyd George, that there should be established a surplus to be held until after the war, which surplus would prove a great talking point when many of the nations of Europe would be so hungry.

I listened this afternoon to the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) attempt to take credit to himself and the other Liberal members for all that was worth while in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. He said that members had gone home and made little of it, telling the people that they would never be paid under that scheme. I have no idea to whom he referred, but I know I have never heard of any member discussing that undertaking in that way. Some time before I became a member of this house I advocated some form of crop insurance, and I think that is a step in the right direction. I will be quite frank and say that in many places, including this house, I have criticized the administration of the act. I think I was right in doing so because I believe it could be greatly improved upon, especially the administration during the first year of its operation. But it was a step in the right direction and, as the pool delegation pointed out while asking for a higher price for wheat, the scheme should be broadened so that it would be of more use to the people in the west.

The hon. member went on to refer to the 70 cents a bushel paid for wheat, and the 30 cents a bushel which was paid on an acreage basis. However, the farmer in my neighbourhood does not get 70 cents a bushel; he gets only 51 or 52 cents. Moreover, I submit that the acreage reduction bonus or the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has no relationship with the price of wheat produced. Perhaps it could not be called charity, but it is a means of providing for those who do not produce the commodity and, therefore, has no proper connection with the higher price we are asking for so urgently, a price higher than that contained in the statement given to us by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I understand that we are to have the privilege of discussing this measure in committee and I shall have a great deal more to say at that time. I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the house on the bill at this particular time, other than to state that I shall support this amendment to provide a parity price for agricultural products, and especially for wheat.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak again until these bills had gone to committee but in view of the fact that the resolution now before the house in the form of an amendment is stated in terms which do not place before the house in a proper manner what actually did take place when the farmers' delegation from western Canada was here, I desire to address a few words to the house before the vote is taken. The amendment reads:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

"this bill be not now read a second time, but be it resolved that the disregarding by this parliament of the modest representations made by western agriculture for a parity price for all agricultural products and an initial wheat payment of at least $1 per bushel for No. 1 northern basis Fort William is contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada."

The first thing to which I should like to call attention is the fact that this does not refer to the government of Canada; it does not refer to the Department of Trade and Commerce, the minister of which department is introducing this bill, and it does not refer to the Department of Agriculture. It is not a condemnation of any one of those three. It says:

. . . this bill be not now read a second time, but be it resolved that the disregarding by this parliament of the modest representations made by western agriculture for a parity price for all agricultural products and an initial wheat payment of at least $1 per bushel for No. 1 northern basis Fort William is contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

I scarcely know, as a member of the government or as a minister of the department responsible for two of the bills before the house, whether I should speak on behalf of the whole parliament in asking that this parliament should not condemn itself, or whether I should speak only on behalf of the legislation itself. Probably it would be best if I were to place before the house exactly the representations that were made by the farmers of western Canada when they were here and also, as nearly as I can, the position taken by those members of the government who met the delegation. I shall try to leave with the house some idea of the understanding with which the farm delegation left Ottawa.

[Mr. Ross (Souris).]

In order to do that, I think I should refer to the last occasion upon which I as a representative of the government, spoke to the delegation in Ottawa. The proceedings before the delegation when government members were present were taken down by Hansard reporters, and there is an exact report of what occurred. When I was addressing the delegates just before they closed their last business meeting with the government, I made the following statement as reported on page 61:

I am pleased that at your first meeting yesterday you had the opportunity of meeting nearly all the members of the government and that in the afternoon you met all the members of the wheat committee of council, and, this afternoon, three of those members. For I consider it my responsibility to go before the wheat committee of council and also to go before the full council and submit your views presented on this occasion as I have understood them. And I may say I intend to do that. But let me repeat what I said yesterday. Do not go away from the meeting understanding because I have promised to submit your views you are going to get all that you have asked for. Your representations will be made to the whole government and will be considered by the whole government. Legislation will be necessary to effect whatever we decide to do. Any legislative bill introduced into council as a result of discussions in the wheat committee relating to the price of wheat must of necessity be introduced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but it will be considered and passed on by the members of the government, and it will be the decision of the whole government which will finally rule in the matter.

I think the delegates when they left understood perfectly what the relationship was from that time on between the government and the delegation itself with reference particularly to the matter of the wheat price which was to be established in connection with this legislation. I could go on to read succeeding pages, but I shall not take the time to do so to-night. In these succeeding pages I have asked them definitely what it is they desire to have, and in these pages they have set this out. One thing they are very definite about is that they would like to have a $1 advance on wheat. Another thing they are very definite about is that they would like to have an increased payment on one or two occasions during the year, to bring the entire amount received for their wheat, during that twelve months of 1942, up to what they term parity price. When I asked them definitely if they meant by parity price $1.41 a bushel, which was the average price for 1926-29, the president of the wheat pool explained to me and the delegation that they were prepared to accept what the statistics branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce would determine to be parity price. In other words, they went away believing that what they had asked for was a $1 advance on wheat, plus payments during the year which would bring the total payments made, following the 1942 crop and within that twelve-months' period, up to what would be agreed upon as parity price.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the minister will allow me, he quoted from a report of the proceedings of the meeting between the government and the visiting agriculturists. That, I believe, is a public document. We have never seen it. Will he lay it on the table?

Mr. GARDINER: I had intended to have it distributed to all the members of the house if I could get it mimeographed. I shall have a copy laid on the table in any event.

The petition which was brought by the delegation outlines their requests perhaps better than anything else, and I should therefore like to deal with the different sections of that petition, seven in number. The petition was signed by upwards of 185,000 people of Saskatchewan. The delegation of four hundred was a delegation from Saskatchewan alone, but they had asked representatives of the farm organizations in Alberta and representatives of the farm organizations in Manitoba to accompany them. The petition was signed in the province of Saskatchewan by some 185,000 people. They were not all farmers. About one-third of the delegation which came to Ottawa came from the urban districts, and from Moose Jaw, Regina and Saskatoon the mayors of these cities came to Ottawa with the delegation. Therefore, while the delegation was not all farmers, I would agree with the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) when he said this afternoon that this was a representative delegation from Saskatchewan, representative not only of the farmers but of most of the people of that province.

The first thing they asked was that the government recognize and accept the principle of parity price for all agricultural products. The first statement in the amendment that has been proposed is:

> . . . this bill be not now read a second time, but be it resolved that the disregarding by this parliament of the modest representations made by western agriculture for a parity price for all agricultural products and an initial wheat payment of at least $1 per bushel for No. 1 northern basis Fort William is contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

I do not expect that this house is going to disregard that request which was made by the farmers of western Canada. But whether this house disregards it or not, the government of Canada has not disregarded it nor has the Department of Agriculture nor the Department of Trade and Commerce. Every possible consideration under the circumstances was given to that representation, and may I say that what has been done up to date with regard to most of the products with which the western farmers are concerned is not so far away from what was asked as some members would like to lead the house to believe.

For example, parity for butter, which is one of the very important products of Saskatchewan is 36·5 cents a pound. This differs from my yesterday's figure because I used the average price for 1926-29 yesterday, while this is the figure adjusted for changes in purchasing power. The price of butter is 35·5 cents a pound. Therefore at the present time there is really only one cent of difference between what was declared to be parity and the price which butter is actually bringing at Montreal at present—and prices in Saskatchewan range back from the price at Montreal.

Cheese is a product with which they are not so much concerned in Saskatchewan, but the delegation made it very plain when they were here that they were concerned not only with themselves but with all the farmers of Canada, and that they wanted parity for all the farmers of Canada. Parity for cheese is 18 cents a pound. These and all succeeding parity prices are calculated on the same basis as butter. The ceiling price actually set for cheese—and cheese has been maintained within a cent or two of it—is 25 cents a pound. That is seven cents above parity. Is anyone in this house going to conclude that the government have paid no attention to the representations of the western delegation that we should have parity for agricultural prices when here are two of the most important dairy products which are marketed in the Dominion of Canada, one selling within one cent of parity and the other up to seven cents over parity? I am sure that the house will agree that the government did pay some attention to the representations of the delegation, and that we paid some attention to the representations which the house has made to the government from time to time.

Coming to the next one on the list, hogs, the parity price in Toronto is 11·09 cents; in Winnipeg, 10 cents. On the market in Toronto the day before yesterday hogs were selling at 11·63 cents— and parity is 11·09 cents. In Winnipeg hogs have been selling consistently above 10 cents ever since the agreement entered into last fall. Again, are we going to say that either the Department of Agriculture or the government of Canada or this house has paid no attention to the representations made to the effect that we should have parity in hog prices?

Let me take the next one on the list, and these are all products in which Saskatchewan is interested and which it markets in great volume. Take cattle. The parity price for steers is $8.63. Steers are selling in Toronto at present at $9.90, which is more than one dollar a hundred above what is acknowledged to be parity.

That brings me to the top of the list of live stock and live stock products which are marketed in considerable volume in Saskatchewan, in western Canada, and all across Canada. But just before leaving cattle and hogs, may I repeat what I said yesterday? There is no ceiling price on cattle and hogs, but there is a ceiling price on beef and pork. What are the facts in relation to these prices? And these, after all, are the prices which control live stock prices in Canada in so far as they are controlled by ceiling prices.

Sirloin steak in 1926-29 averaged 35·3 cents. In the period which set ceiling prices the highest price was 37·2 cents, which is 1·9 cents higher than the price on an average during the period 1926-29. Figures for other commodities on the same basis of comparison are:

	Average 1926-29	Highest price in period which set ceiling prices	Increase above 1926-29
	cents	cents	cents
Round steak	28·2	32·6	4·4
Rib roast.....	27·9	35·3	7·4
Shoulder roast.....	18·9	24·4	5·5
Beef, stewing	16·6	20·9	4·3
Veal shoulder roast	24·4	25·0	0·6
Pork fresh leg roast	29·3	31·0	1·7

I give these in order to indicate that the government has not disregarded the farmers' desire to have parity prices.

There are other products marketed from western Canada—grain products. I admit at once, Mr. Speaker, that grain products are generally speaking below what is termed parity. I also say this to the house, that this question was very freely discussed with the delegation that came here from western Canada, and they understood what the government's position was in relation to the matter.

Coming to the first one, which was dealt with yesterday, namely, flax, there was explained to this house a special order in council which sets the price of flax for the year 1942 at $2.25 a bushel. Yesterday I said that the average of the prices for 1926-29 was $2.05, and that this price is 20 cents above it. I might have gone further yesterday and said that parity was $1.96 and the price set by the government is $2.25. In relation to that product it surely will not be said by any hon. member that this government and this parliament pay no attention to the representations which were made by western farmers who were in the delegation which was here a few days ago. That is the exact price which was mentioned for flax by the chairman of the delegation. But that particular item illustrates, Mr. Speaker, a fact in relation to this whole question which never yet has been placed squarely before this house. Hon. members have said from time to time that the reason why prices of wheat are not higher is that there is not a demand for our wheat. A year ago the reason why the price of flax was not higher was that there was not a demand for flax. The ceiling price was set at $1.64, and no farmer in western Canada would grow flax at present for $1.64. There would not be a production of it excepting on those lands which had been prepared for flax and which farmers were going to put into that crop whether they expected to make any return from it or not. But things have happened since last year. We have a demand for vegetable oil. We have a shortage of vegetable oils which cannot be met from any importations. We must produce whatever vegetable oils we require in addition to those which we have already imported. So that there is a demand for flax, and immediately it arose the government of Canada said, "We are prepared to pay $2.25 a bushel in order to get it grown in Canada"—20 cents more than the average price for 1926-29, and 29 cents higher, I believe, than the parity price as stated in the figures which have been prepared for me in the department.

That brings me to those grain products for which I cannot claim there is at present a parity price in this country; they are oats, barley and rye.

In so far as rye is concerned, it is not a grain which is produced in great quantities in any part of Canada. It is grown in the west by a limited number of farmers and over a limited area, more particularly on the lighter soils. It does not concern the income of any considerable number of farmers in western Canada.

Barley and oats are much more important crops. The suggested parity price for barley is 69·7 cents, and the ceiling is 64⅞ cents; that is, the ceiling is almost five cents below the parity price. But, Mr. Speaker, there is another point in relation to that which I wish to make after giving the figures for oats. For oats, 57·3 cents is parity and 51⅞ cents is the ceiling. There is a difference of under six cents a bushel. Those two grains are produced largely for feeding purposes in Canada, and are directly related to the live stock products with which I have been dealing. I believe I would be safe in saying that at least ninety per cent of the grain which is grown in Canada in those two classifications is fed to live stock in Canada, and nearly all of it is fed on the farms where it is grown. So this price is not one which represents a return to the farmer for the great volume of the coarse grains. The prices which represent the returns are the prices of those live stock products which I have already given to the house, most of which are away above parity. I again submit that the statement made in the amendment is not one with which hon. members in any quarter of this house can agree if they are going to take the facts into consideration.

That brings me to wheat. Everyone in this house, everyone in the country admits that wheat is not at a parity price, and I believe, in spite of what has been said by some hon. members, that every member of the delegation—I would be very much surprised if any of them said otherwise—went home believing that they were not going to get all that they asked for wheat. There is every reason why they should have believed that, and there is every reason at the same time why they should have impressed upon the government the importance of bringing the wheat price to parity at as early a date as possible. But let me repeat, I do not believe that any one of them went home expecting that they were going to get all that they asked for in relation to wheat. What else could the remark which I made to them have meant, when I reviewed to them all of these seven requests which they made, indicated to them those which we had already dealt with to a considerable extent, indicated also some which we would not be able to deal with as they had asked us to deal with them, and then said that the most important thing for which they had asked in their submission was a price for wheat; and we spent most of our time discussing that particular policy. They went away with the idea definitely in their minds, I believe, that everything that could be done for them under the circumstances would be done, though not all that they asked for would be done.

That brings me back to what I said with regard to flax. I said that a year ago there was not on the horizon a market for even the amount of flax which we were growing in Canada. I said yesterday I believed that the crushers which we have in Canada had not a sufficient capacity to crush more than half of the flax which we did grow last year—a fact which in itself would indicate that those who are interested in the industrial use of flax in this country were convinced at that time that there was not a ready market for much more flax than was being grown, or they would have provided the capacity to handle that flax within the dominion. But it was not provided and has not been provided up to the present time, so far as I know.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Perhaps the minister can explain to the house why we handled only 17,000 tons last year whereas, as far back as 1920, we handled 170,000 tons.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course conditions have changed entirely, and I have no doubt there has been a change in the capacity.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The actual fact is that the equipment is here to handle it if we produced it.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not going to dispute what my hon. friend says, although the officials of my department tell me that it is not; but even if the equipment is here, everyone realizes, I think, that a year ago it was not expected that we would be able greatly to increase our production of flax in Canada and be able to get rid of it at a price which would pay the farmers. Since that time, as I said a moment ago, the whole situation has changed in relation to flax. I have said on the floor of the house before, and I repeat it here, that in my belief, if we win this war—and I believe we are going to win it—long before the war is over, all the wheat we have in Canada, or all that we are likely to grow between now and the end of the war, will be required to feed the people that must be fed with Canadian wheat. Being of that conviction, I believe that, before this war is over, wheat will be in exactly the same position as flax has arrived at during these past twelve months. I do not know whether it will be during 1942; I do not know whether it will be during 1943; but I am as convinced as I am that I am standing on the floor of this house to-night, that at some time before the end of the war every bushel of wheat that is grown in Canada between now and the end of the war will be required to feed the people in Europe and in some other parts of the world.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And may we not have to give it to them?

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend asks, may we not have to give it to them? That is what it may mean with regard to flax. That is exactly what it does mean with regard to hogs. When I say that we have more than a parity price for hogs now, more than a parity price for cheese and almost a parity price for butter, let me point out that there is only one of these three products in connection with which the government is not paying a very considerable part of the price, namely, butter. Cheese and hogs are being marketed in Great Britain—or sent to Great Britain, not marketed—in order to feed the people there at this time, and they are being financed by the government of Canada. When the day comes that wheat is demanded—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Financed by the people of Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, through the government of Canada. The government and the people are supposed to be the same thing in a democracy.

An hon. MEMBER: Hardly.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, they are supposed to be, and I may say it is more nearly that at present than usually. I do not know when wheat will arrive at that position, but I do know that when it does, the government will do with wheat what they have done with flax, hogs and cheese and, in another way, with butter. The government will see to it that a parity price is reached in connection with that product just as in connection with other products. I think the farm population of Canada realize that.

I have on my desk a number of letters. Yesterday letters were read and I have here letters to the opposite effect. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, they do not all come from individuals either. Some of them are from councils; one at least is from a municipal association. One or two are from pool locals in the province.

An hon. MEMBER: One or two?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and I could get more, but one or two from this group.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not mean I could send for more, but I could get more that are in my office. Here is one from a local:

> At a shareholders' meeting of the local elevator of the Saskatchewan wheat pool the following resolution was passed unanimously:
> "That this meeting go on record as approving of the efforts of the federal Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. J. G. Gardiner, in the interests of western agriculture, as shown by his procuring certain bonuses for the farmers of the west, thereby materially helping them in their trying condition. You will accept our thanks and appreciation."

That was passed at a meeting at which they were discussing the signing of the petition that was brought to Ottawa by the delegation which was here a short time ago.

An hon. MEMBER: Where was it from?

Mr. GARDINER: From Kelfield, and I am informed that the man who moved it is reeve of the municipality and prominent in the Conservative association. There are a number of these letters, and everyone of them says in effect: "We would like to have $1 a bushel for wheat, but if giving us a $1 a bushel for wheat is going to lessen the amount which has been paid to us under acreage payments during the past two or three years, then we would prefer that you retain the acreage payments." There is a reason why they say that. That reason is to be found in the results of the payments which have gone out in municipalities during the current year. Let us take the first one. I think it is in the constituency of the hon. member for Weyburn, municipality No. 8, right at the United States boundary line, almost straight south of Weyburn. There are in that municipality 267 farmers. The number of farmers receiving wheat acreage reduction was 187; the number whose payments were still pending at that time, 56. That means that out of 267 farmers, 243 had applied for payment under wheat acreage reduction. What did they receive up to that time? They received under wheat acreage reduction, $37,592; they were to receive still, under that payment, about $7,800; and they had received or were to receive under prairie farm assistance for this year, $8,986, and prairie farm income, $23,779. The total amount they were to receive under wheat acreage payments was $78,252.

The total amount of wheat they marketed in that whole municipality was 234,000 bushels. It has been stated in the house that the price this year was something under 50 cents a bushel. My figures indicate that the average price for wheat in western Canada this year, when grade has been considered, was about 53 cents a bushel; but let us take it at the straight 50-cent rate, because it is easier to figure. That would be just half the number of dollars that there were bushels delivered, or $117,000 received for wheat, together with $78,000 received under the acreage payments.

That is a municipality in which the crop was around ten or eleven bushels to the acre. Let us take one where the crop was much lighter than that, where the farmers would have had to go on relief if they had not received these payments, just as some of the farmers in the municipality to which I have just referred would have had to go on relief but for these payments. Here is another municipality which illustrates the point I wish to make; it is No. 135, over in the southwestern part of the province, just south of Swift Current. There the payments under wheat acreage reduction amounted to a little over $91,000; payments under prairie farm assistance will be $160,996, and the income payments made will be $47,000. So the total income there from acreage payments will be just about $300,000. How much wheat did they have? They had an average of 1·2 bushels per acre. They had not enough wheat to seed their land back again in the succeeding year, and, according to my return, no wheat at all was marketed from that area. In other words, every dollar they received in that municipality came from these different acreage payments. There is no way of estimating what was the price per bushel received by these farmers.

Mr. HAZEN: How many farmers were there in that municipality?

Mr. GARDINER: There were 467. I have a group of returns here covering the greater part of Saskatchewan, and another group covering Manitoba and another for Alberta. They demonstrate that under the arrangements which have been made for prairie farm assistance, as passed by this house three years ago —and in municipalities such as this by far the greater part of the income is derived under prairie farm assistance—the result has been a levelling of the amount received up to about what is required in a municipality in order to make it possible for people to remain off relief; and that was the objective in framing of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. It has proven itself in the second poorest crop year we have experienced in recent years.

When the farm delegation came here they first congratulated us upon the fact that we had put the Prairie Farm Assistance Act upon the statute books, and then asked us to increase that assistance. I placed these figures before them, and after I had done so they did not repeat their request. They did say, "We want prairie farm assistance continued," and they also said they would like to have it converted into insurance. I told them there was only one reason why we did not convert it into insurance; that was the fact that we were informed that it was ultra vires of this parliament to pass legislation with regard to insurance of this kind. I believe that whole question was threshed out at the time hail insurance was established in the western provinces. We asked the federal government to establish it. The matter was looked into, it was determined that the federal government could not do it, so the western provinces established hail insurance.

When this legislation was before the house three years ago I appeared before a committee in the other place, and on that occasion the then Conservative leader there, Mr. Meighen, asked me the direct question: "Is this insurance?" I said I did not think so. He asked, "Is it intra vires?" I replied, "I am not a constitutional lawyer, but the legal advisers in my department say that it is intra vires." He said he had some doubts about it but that they had a legal adviser in the other place, at that time Mr. O'Connor; and he turned to Mr. O'Connor and asked what he thought about it. Mr. O'Connor said he had some doubts as to whether it was intra vires, but he added, "It is the kind of legislation that ought to be passed by some body for western Canada. I think it should be passed, and if it is ultra vires that can be proved in the courts." So the bill went through the committee with only one dissenting voice; it was passed in the other place, and became law. I told the story to the farmers who were here and said I did not think we could introduce legislation in the form of insurance, but we did intend to maintain this legislation upon the statute books for this year at least, and that as long as I was Minister of Agriculture I hoped that it would be retained on the statute books. They applauded that remark, and as far as this point was concerned they carried that idea home with them.

I give that recital in order to indicate to this house that the farmers who came here from western Canada were not misled. They were given a complete understanding of the situation, and they returned home knowing pretty well what we intended to do in connection with the various recommendations which were placed before us. Let me read those recommendations. I have dealt in full with some of them already, but I should like to place them all on Hansard. The first is:

1. That the government recognize and accept the principle of parity prices for all agricultural products.

I have already indicated that the government had the average prices of 1926-29 as an objective. The next request was:

2. That no price ceiling should be established on agricultural commodities below parity levels which may be established by the dominion bureau of statistics.

I have dealt with that, indicating the extent to which we have departed from it. In essence the only departure has been in connection with wheat. As to the other products, they are practically at parity, or over parity or in a position where the returns to the farmer do not come from the direct sale of the product. Then:

3. That equitable delivery quotas on wheat should be established and continued as long as required.

In this regard I told the farmers that this was the policy of the government; that it was established two years ago; that it was still maintained, and that, as far as I knew, it would be maintained as long as conditions warranted. Then:

4. That the initial payment on all wheat delivered to the wheat board should be not less than $1 per bushel, basis 1 northern in store Fort William, and that the final settlement should be made on the basis of parity prices above referred to.

I think I have discussed that point fully, but should add that it was agreed this was asked for the 1942 crop. The next request was:

5. That the carryover of wheat as at 31st July, 1941, should be regarded as a national emergency war reserve, and that all sales made by the wheat board after 31st July, 1941, should be credited to the current season's deliveries.

That was a request which had its origin in this house. Whatever hon. gentlemen opposite may say as to who originated the idea, I think it can be truly said that it came some two or three years ago from the Liberal members on this side, and since that time it has been taken up and advocated by the pools. I explained fully to the delegation that when this request was made for the first time by the pool organizations, in August of last year, I had brought their representations back to Ottawa, but that by the time they were presented here it was found that a very considerable part of the wheat which had been marketed prior to that time had been sold outright, and that therefore anything in the way of payment on participation certificates in relation to that wheat would not benefit a very considerable number of the farmers of the west. So it was suggested by the government that instead of making a payment on that basis, in order to give greater income to the farmers of western Canada the payment should be made on the basis of an acreage income payment. That acreage income payment was estimated at $20,000,000, or exactly 10 cents a bushel on 200,000,000 bushels of wheat, which at that time we considered would probably be delivered in western Canada.

In other words, it was agreed by the government that the income from wheat was too low, partly because of the fact that we had asked farmers to reduce their wheat acreage, and partly because of the fact that there was a poor crop last year, and that that income should be increased. While we were not prepared under the circumstances to increase it by declaring all of the carryover to be a reserve, and then paying their participation on the sale price of the wheat in 1941, still we were prepared to deliver upwards of $20,000,000 to the farmers on the basis of 75 cents an acre on half their cultivated acreage. That is being done. It was explained to the farmers, and that explanation will be found in this volume I have before me on my desk at the present time.

Then No. 6:

6. That suitable amendments should be introduced to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act so that an adequate and practical crop insurance scheme may be established irrespective of market prices prevailing or the number of townships suffering crop failure.

There is only one part of that recommendation which I have not explained to the house, as I explained it to the delegates at that time, and that is the last phrase of it. This has reference to the number of townships suffering from crop failure, and the suggestion that that number should be cut out of the legislation altogether. At the present time the legislation says that you must have 171 townships in Saskatchewan with less than five bushels to the acre before you can declare a crop failure area in that province. I believe the figure for Alberta is 90 or 91, and for Manitoba it is 50. The proposal here is that we cut those figures out and make it so that an area could be declared to be a crop failure area, even though it consisted of only one township.

I explained to the delegation that there is only one reason, in addition to the one I have already explained (insurance), why we based this act on the township, and that is that we wished to prevent areas, or single farms consisting of poor soil, or having farmers upon them who could not make good land grow crops, from drawing under this legislation every year. In other words, if a township averages over twelve bushels to the acre, we estimate that the farmers in that area ought to be able to grow enough wheat or enough of other crops to get along. It will be remembered that wheat is only a barometer under this act. The payments are not made on wheat; they are made on cultivated acreage, even if there is no wheat grown on the farm at all. Wheat, may I repeat, is used only as a barometer.

So what we say to them is that if it is possible to grow an average of more than twelve bushels to the acre in a township, then the weather has been such in that township that the government should not be called upon to pay any assistance there. This means that if there were half a dozen farmers in there who, irrespective of weather conditions, are not able to grow twelve bushels to the acre, then there must be something wrong either with the land they are farming or with their methods of farming. In either case it is not something over which the farmer himself has no control.

Then, when it comes to a matter of dealing with large areas we say that if four or five townships were made an area which could be declared a crop failure area, it is possible in any of the provinces of western Canada to find an area of four or five townships of submarginal lands which would come under this legislation every year. So we have said that there must be a comparatively large area declared in, and that there must be within the townships themselves a low average before they will be permitted in. All of these things were explained to the delegation which was here.

After the explanation was made, a representative of the municipal association from south of the city of Regina came to the platform and stated he wished to place before the government three resolutions passed by the municipal association of Saskatchewan. One representation was to the effect that we should not allow anyone to be paid who had grown over twelve bushels to the acre on an average. I said to him that there were thousands of farmers in western Canada who grow wheat only on the best land they have, only on the best prepared summer-fallow they have, and that those men will probably always have more than twelve bushels to the acre, on a very limited acreage. The same men may have no coarse grains at all, because their coarse grains are grown on spring ploughing, and it requires a great deal more rainfall to grow a crop of any kind, as every farmer knows, on spring ploughing than it does on summer-fallow. So he might be entirely without coarse grains. His pasture may be poor because there has been no rain.

I repeat—and I stated this to the farm delegation—that wheat is only the barometer in connection with this act. Those who have said, from the other side of the house, that it is not altogether correct to say that payments made under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act are payments made on wheat, are quite right in their statement. You can draw under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, even if you do not grow an acre of wheat. As was said by someone yesterday—I do not remember who it was—one of the functions of the act is to encourage the farmer to go out of wheat and into coarse grains. That was one of the reasons why we did not tie the payments to the wheat crop, but rather tried to tie them to the total acreage a farmer might be farming.

The next request—and this is the last one—is in these words:

7. That since the future of our agricultural industry depends largely on our ability:

(a) to conserve the fertility of our soil;

(b) to establish production and marketing methods which, while maintaining continuity of supplies, will also prevent avoidable surpluses; and since these objectives may involve an increasing degree of control and regulation, including international agreement, such changes should be made in our agricultural policy as may be necessary to achieve these objectives.

I said, with regard to this, that we had already been doing something with respect to the conservation of the fertility of our soil. We have done that through the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, through the encouragement to summer-fallow, through the encouragement to grow roughage in connection with some of the summer-fallow—and this practice was criticized yesterday from the opposite side of the house—rather than having summer-fallow which would require keeping all of the soil black at all times. All these things are being encouraged to-day. And they agreed—at least no one raised any objection to my explanation—with what was being done under that legislation.

Then, with regard to the establishing of production and marketing methods—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He was replying to an amendment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has he not the right to go on?

Mr. GARDINER: I thought when I came to this point that I would probably get a ruling. I would take it that I was mistaken, and that this is not as I thought it was when I was speaking on the point of order—a vote of want of confidence. Parliament has been asked to condemn itself—not the government. So I presume it is not a vote of want of confidence in the government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, my point is that I believe it was generally accepted by the group of farmers who came here that paragraph 7 in the petition was pretty well covered by what we are doing now in relation to farm production.

I believe that gives a pretty fair summary of the representations made, and what was said about them. I do not believe that it bears out the contention of this amendment which reads:

. . . but be it resolved that the disregarding by this parliament of the modest representations made by western agriculture. . . .

I think I am correct in saying that the representations were not disregarded by the government, by the departments of the government or by this house.

I have only one further statement to make. Suggestions have been made continuously since this war began that we ought to do what they are doing in some other country. Only last night we had all this reviewed again and we were told that we should have an AAA in this country. We were told that we should be doing some of the things that they have been doing in the United States. I would suggest that since 1938 the United States have been trying to get their wheat acreage down. Between 1930 and 1938 they increased their wheat acreage from 66 million acres to 81 million acres, and then they evolved a policy to reduce acreage. That policy at the present time is simply this: When a man cuts down his acreage to the extent that the government say he ought to, they will lend him 98 cents a bushel on his wheat. They have made loans covering considerable amounts which I have in the records here. But if he does not cut down his acreage in accordance with their request, they will lend him only 49 cents on his wheat. In other words, in the United States they lend a man twice as much on his wheat if he obeys the request of the government than if he does not. It is true that this has tended to set a floor under wheat of 98 cents a bushel in the United States provided the farmer does what the government ask him to do.

In this country we have not adopted exactly the same method. We said to the farmer last year that if he did not reduce his wheat acreage, he could draw 70 cents a bushel Fort William, or approximately 50 cents a bushel at the farm on his wheat, just one cent more than he could have drawn in the United States if he had done the same thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On quota.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; it was all the grain he grew on quota.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What percentage of United States farmers cooperated?

Mr. GARDINER: Not a large percentage cooperated by accepting loans. I have that information here, but I cannot give it at the moment without looking through a lot of papers. But we did not stop there. We said to the farmer that if he would take acreage out of wheat we would pay him $4 per acre if it was summer-fallowed, or $2 per acre if it were put in coarse grains and he would get the price of the coarse grains besides. We said we would pay $2 per acre on coarse grains and then, if a crop of grass were sown along with it and it were left in grass until next year, we would pay another $2 per acre which would make $4. We said that if he would sow to rye we would give him $2 per acre, and that if his land was still in rye next summer we would pay another $2 per acre. We proceeded to get our wheat acreage reduced. This resulted in our paying out $30,000,000. Figuring on 200 million bushels of wheat, or whatever is marketed this year, this will approximate 30 cents a bushel. That 30 cents added to the 70 cents makes a dollar Fort William. There is not as great a difference between the two as some would indicate, but we got a proportionate wheat acreage reduction in one year, I believe, speaking from memory, than the United States government got in all the years they have been operating their policy. They started with 81 million acres and we started with 28 million acres.

Mr. COLDWELL: Did the minister not make an arithmetical mistake when he said that dividing 200 million acres into $30,000,000 would give 30 cents?

Mr. GARDINER: I should have taken $60,000,000. I was not covering the whole picture. It will be $30,000,000 in the one and approximately $30,000,000 in the other two. We will pay out under our bonus payments about $60,000,000, and all of them are related to wheat acreage control. That being the case, I should like to suggest to hon. members that I think it would be much better if we all went out and told the people what we are doing in Canada instead of telling them what they are doing in the United States. Despite what they are doing in the United States, the farmers of Canada have really been getting more for their wheat than the farmers in the Argentine and Australia. Of course, there are reasons for that.

An hon. MEMBER: How much more?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the exact figures here, but I shall get them before we are out of committee. We have been asked why wheat is selling in the United States at $1.27 a bushel when it is selling on our side of the line at 70 cents Fort William. I have just stated one of the reasons. We are paying out a considerable amount of money from the treasury, and by the way they are not paying anything out from the United States treasury. A great percentage of the wheat is sold and consumed there on that price basis. Some may be purchased and put in storage under their ever-normal granary policy, and this is true of other products as well. I repeat that we can do Canada a lot of good by telling the facts exactly as they are.

Mr. FAIR: That is what I have been pleading for all the time.

Mr. GARDINER: But when the hon. member rises in his place in this house he pictures them quite differently.

Mr. WRIGHT: What percentage of the total income of the Saskatchewan farmer is derived from products bringing parity prices, and what proportion of his income is derived from products which are bringing below parity prices?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in position to give the figure, but I think the figure quoted this afternoon by the minister for Wood Mountain was some 71 or 72 per cent from wheat—the member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly); he ought to be minister. That being the case, I think it might be a good thing to give all the facts to the people in western Canada.

There has been another matter dealt with and in connection with which we have been compared continuously with the United States. I refer to the marketing of live stock products. Something was said, either this afternoon or yesterday, to the effect that we did not have a surplus of pork and cheese products and that that was one of the reasons why we should not do certain things about wheat. During the first year of this war they had more pork products in the United States than they knew what to do with. Hogs were selling in the United States at 4½, 5 and 6 cents a pound. The government simply told the farmers that they would have to cut production down to consumption, that when they got it down the price would likely go up. The price did not go up until production was brought down to consumption. Because 30,000,000 pounds of United States pork products were shipped into this country, during the first year of the war we had a surplus of pork products. It was only because we had an agreement with Great Britain that we were able to carry through that period with comparatively high prices for pork products.

Every problem that has confronted the government of this country in relation to farm products since the beginning of the war has been grappled with as soon as it has been brought to the attention of the government, and in most cases we have not waited for anyone to bring it to our attention but have grappled with it because we have discussed the problem in advance of its reaching its peak. On every one of these farm products, except wheat, we have been able to satisfy the farmers of Canada. I only need to say that the activities of this house during this session indicate clearly that the situation in relation to agriculture in Canada is very different to-day from what it was when this house met in any other session since the war started. We only had one persistent delegation this year asking for something more, namely, the wheat delegation, and they came asking what they did only because they are the only farmers in Canada whose price problems have not been grappled with successfully down to the present time. But just as soon as conditions under which we are labouring, with a world war on, are such as to make it possible these problems of the wheat farmer will also be dealt with to his satisfaction.

The correspondence which I have on my desk is full of appeals to the government to remember that Canada is at war, and these appeals come from Saskatchewan farmers, not from eastern industrialists, as some people would seem to imply sometimes is the case in relation to agricultural problems. These are from Saskatchewan farmers telling us to stay with the job—get food over to Britain—"and we will struggle along. If you have to assist us," they say, "assist us with acreage payments, and if after that you can give us something more for our wheat we shall be pleased to have it. But," they say, "the most important thing at the present time is to fight this war to a successful conclusion because if we do not we shall not be able to market any farm products to advantage for many years after this war is over." That is the important problem which is in the mind of the western farmer, and I should like to say to my hon. friends over in the far corner, more particularly my hon. friend who plays upon the name of Fair, I would say to him that any member of this house who carries back into western Canada the government's policy in relation to wheat and its policy in relation to other farm products can stand before any audience and successfully explain to the people there that this is the best that can be done under the conditions with which we are confronted in the Dominion of Canada to-day, and the best that has been done in an attempt to settle their problems at any time. We are taking every last dollar out of the treasury of Canada to deal with these problems which we feel it is safe to take at this present time.

We are saying to our farmers that just so soon as the allies have driven the foe from those areas which must be fed with wheat, just so soon as the gallant Russian armies have driven the enemy from their land and made it possible for us to help feed her people, the wheat of Canada will be made available with which to feed them. When that time comes, the government will be prepared to assist in the financing of the wheat to the extent they have assisted in the financing of the other farm products when they are in demand. When I say that we shall be prepared to assist, we are already assisting wheat farmers over a difficult period, and we shall be prepared to assist still more, to the same degree of parity as we are assisting in connection with every product that is required in abundance in the prosecution of the war, and that is all staple farm products, excepting wheat.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not want to break in on the applause that has greeted the minister's effort but I should like him to place that public document on the table. We have a right to have that done because the minister referred to it.

Mr. GARDINER: This is the only copy I have, but I will have a copy made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister lay it on the table to-night because hon. members who are to speak in this debate to-morrow will want to see it. We have a right to it.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think you have a right to any speech that I may deliver anywhere because I quote from it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have a right to it when a public document is quoted from.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not a public document, but I am prepared to lay it on the table when I have had copies made. I repeat, it is not really a public document at all.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to repeat what has been stated so far in this debate and my remarks will be extremely brief. I just want to bring to the notice of the house some of the background of wheat production so that the lessons which have been learned through hard experience will not go into the discard but be of use in the future.

Long ago, in 1813, the hardy highland Scotsmen of the Selkirk clan came into this country by way of Hudson bay and settled in the Red river valley. In order to sustain life they started cultivating the land, and there started a struggle which has gone on to this present day. They came and had many difficulties to face. The winters were long and severe. The seed which they brought with them was unsuitable. The traders, the Indians and the wild animals were their enemies. They suffered from drought, grasshoppers and frost. Hardships indeed were their lot.

But toward the end of the last century conditions considerably improved. They secured hardier varieties of seed. There were improved milling processes, and great railways stretched across this continent running from coast to coast. A new era seemed to have opened. People came into the west from eastern Canada, from Great Britain, from every country of the world, and westward the tide of civilization moved, through the forests, across the swollen streams and over the great prairie region until there was land cultivated right within sight of the Rocky mountains.

In 1886 some 11 million bushels of wheat were produced. In 1900 that had grown to 44 million bushels, and we have heard that a year ago we produced 540 million bushels. All down from those days to the present day the farmers have had to struggle for a living, so that they have not had reserves. They have no landed estate to fall back upon but must live from year to year almost upon the earnings of each year.

Their struggles were first with the railways. The farmers drove long distances to sell their loads of grain and often had to take them back home again. They had difficulty in getting permission to sell across the platform. They had difficulties in getting storage. Then, when the elevator companies came they had trouble with them over grades, weights, overages, prices, the mixing of grain and things of that kind. The Manitoba Grain Act of 1900 solved many of their difficulties, but they were soon up against new problems. Those who were handling the grain united to protect their own profits, and so those who were growing the grain were also forced to unite in order to bring their bargaining power to bear at one point in order to survive. They did unite under such men as Peter Dayman, John Miller, John Sibbald, E. A. Partridge, and W. R. Motherwell. These men were leaders in that movement. They united the farmers into organizations and even went so far as to set up their own grain company, with their own elevators and mills, in the hope of cutting out the profit of the middleman and having the members of their organization survive. This brought them into sharp clash with the grain exchange, which had then been organized, and from that day to this the grain exchange has been very unpopular among the producers.

Then we have what was called the siege of Ottawa. In December, 1910, some eight hundred people came to this national capital. They marched, four abreast, to the parliament buildings on a cold winter morning; they entered the then House of Commons; they crowded the galleries; they filled the floor of the house. The Speaker introduced some twenty of them, and they told their grievances, the grievances of that day, to the members who were crowded in the chamber wherever they could find seats. They made out a good case and they convinced the people of the east of their difficulties.

Another striking event was the bringing to the west, I believe by various newspaper companies, of a man named Aaron Sapiro. Wherever he went he attracted great audiences, because he talked to them of the simple things which they could understand.

He told them of the results of the cooperative movement, how when he first went around on organization work, the children of the producers were in rags and appeared to be undernourished; but the cooperatives were started, and the next time he went around, their conditions had improved. The lesson of such experiences surely is that there must be an organization to protect the interests of the growers, that that organization must be strong, and that cooperation will give the maximum results; it will provide the producer with more nearly the value of his product than will any other form of organized effort. Surely in the future we must be guided by the experiences which were so hardly gained by those pioneers in the movement.

Until recent times it has been very easy to sell wheat. I well remember hearing a minister of trade and commerce say that our high protein content wheat would easily sell itself. But such is no longer the situation. Of the countries to which we sold wheat, some are now our enemies, others are overrun by our enemies, and our only remaining market is Great Britain, of whose purchases we have only a limited share. Therefore this government was placed fairly against the problem, would they protect and preserve the farming industry, or would they let it go into bankruptcy? If the farming industry failed, food products would not be supplied which might be badly needed in times of famine. If the farming industry failed, one and a half million people would be thrown on the relief rolls of this country.

The industry has a strong administrative organization; it is equiped with great terminal facilities at the head of the lakes; it has worked out a great transportation system. These things must be preserved; and this government decided to preserve the farming industry by support from the treasury. They supported the price of grain. As the minister has just explained, they put into operation the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. This is to some extent an insurance act. During the two years of its operation they have collected by their one per cent tax on all grain four million dollars from the farmers of Canada, and they have paid out eleven and a half million dollars. This assistance has helped a great many people, but the act is sadly in need of amending. Every day I get letters from people who are heart-broken because their bonuses fail to come through. Of course the farmers of the west are not chartered accountants, and in some cases the trouble may be due to discrepancies. But there are still farmers who have not received a bonus of any kind for the past year, and they are badly in need of it. Thus, the secretary of the United Farmers of Alberta at Retlaw writes:

We are about at wit's end to know what to do as every official surely knows about it by now.

Many people are in real desperate circumstances and it is soon time to be on the land again. . . .

Farmers still wait at post offices hoping for a payment to come and only to turn away bitter and discouraged, wishing the reduction scheme had have never been thought of.

Harry Malm,
Secretary.

I find that 90-cent price for wheat will automatically cancel the bonus which was formerly paid in cases of crop failure where the yield is from eight to twelve bushels per acre. This, it seems to me, will be a great blow to the people of the west. I want to take this opportunity to urge the minister so to amend the act that this shall not happen, because those small yields will not sustain a decent standard of living on the farm, and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act will not perform its function, will not give the help it should give, if that bracket is cancelled out.

The farmers of the west appreciate, I am sure, even the twenty-cent advance in the price of wheat. They appreciate these bonuses, although they are the cause of much heartache and disappointment because of their slowness in coming through. They appreciate the fact that speculation in grain will come to an end and that if the price of grain should go up, the farmers will be benefited. I am convinced that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) have done their very best for the benefit of the farmers of the west, and that no ministers could have done more. But I do say that even these additions will be only an instalment of what should come. They will not relieve the distress which the wheat producer is having, and they will not equalize sacrifice in this country.

Recently the war loan was floated. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) should be congratulated upon the splendid response to that loan. But what does it show? One city in the east contributed as much as two whole provinces in the west. That shows where the money lies, and it demonstrates that the pleas which we are making for improved conditions are justified.

We must remember that Canada is one of the democratic nations, one of the great nations, made great by the wheat producer and his contribution in making this country the bread-basket of the world. We are one of the united nations that are fighting against the barbarous nazis and the treacherous and ruthless Japanese, and we realize that Canada's contribution has been magnificent. We must make a balanced contribution through a programme which will defend our own shores and help in distant fields of battle, so that victory may come in the least possible time.

We must so act that those who are watching us in the present day, and those future generations which will look back upon what we have done, will be astonished at the greatness of our contribution. We must struggle and sacrifice and expand that contribution, and falter not—

> Lest a thousand ages find us
> Frustrate at our highest chance,
> Lest the hour of trial reveal us
> False to our inheritance.

On motion of Mr. Wright the debate was adjourned.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

AIR OBSERVERS' SCHOOLS—CIVILIAN CAPTAIN PILOTS

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. Is a deposit reserve deduction of $50 per month made from salary of civilian captain pilots at air observers' schools?

2. If so, what is the reason for such deduction?

Mr. POWER: In so far as the Department of National Defence for Air is concerned:

1. Civilian pilots are classed as junior or senior pilots and the expression "Captain Pilot" is not employed.

2. These pilots are employed and paid by the civilian companies which operate the schools. As a guarantee against breach or default of the terms of the contract between pilots and the operating companies, the companies deduct and retain a deposit reserve from salary at the rate of $25 per month during the probationary period of from 3 to 6 months. At the conclusion of the probationary period, if the services of the pilot are satisfactory, his salary is increased and the reserve deduction is raised to $50 per month.

CAMP BORDEN AUDITORIUM

Mr. McGREGOR:

2. The building was constructed by this department by day labour at an approximate cost of $80,000.

3. It is operated by a committee of military officers under the camp commandant. These officers receive no extra pay or allowances for this work.

4. The proceeds are paid into a special fund called the "Camp Borden Special Fund" to be used for the general good of the camp as a whole. The money is used for the benefit of the men of the camp. In the first instance profits were used to pay for moving picture equipment and chairs. Payments have also been made for sports equipment and prizes, and current profits are being used to finance a camp bowling alley building and equipment.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

1. How much money, if any, has the government invested in the Ottawa Car and Aircraft Company?

8. When does the government anticipate work to be provided for these men?
9. When will this company be put back into full production?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Capital assistance was authorized by the Department of Munitions and Supply to the Ottawa Car and Aircraft Company for the procurement of machine tools, equipment and construction, for Canadian account, to the following amounts:

(a) For the manufacture of aircraft component parts—$634,600, of which $388,604 has been paid as of February 28, 1942.

(b) For other munitions—$560,680, of which $141,610 has been paid as of February 28, 1942.

The Ottawa Car and Aircraft Company has never been a prime contractor to the department on aircraft, but is and has been a sub-contractor to prime contractors to the department. The company is, however, a prime contractor to the department on munitions.

2. None.
3. No.
4. Answered by 3.
5. (a) No; (b) No information.
6. Answered by 5.

7, 8 and 9. The company has recently received orders for aircraft components as a sub-contractor, and has been awarded a large munitions contract as a prime contractor, which should relieve any unemployment of skilled mechanics in this plant.

To what extent the capacity of the company will be fully taken will depend upon its ability to fulfil present contracts and such other contracts as may be awarded to them.

ALASKA HIGHWAY COMMISSION

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. What are the names of the Canadians and Americans composing the international joint commission appointed to investigate the various routes through Canada and Alaska that a highway from the United States of America to Alaska might follow?

3. What expense has been incurred by the Canadian branch of said commission?
4. Were the Canadian members of said commission and the government of British Columbia consulted by the war committee of the cabinet and by the permanent joint board on defence before the route that it has been publicly announced said highway will follow, was decided upon by the war committee of the cabinet and by the permanent joint defence board?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

3. $18,287.67.

4. The Canadian section of the permanent joint board on defence discussed the proposal of a highway to Alaska with the then premier and other representatives of the government of British Columbia in November, 1940. They also had access to both the interim report (April, 1940) and the final report (November, 1941) of the British Columbia-Yukon-Alaska Highway Commission (Canada). The subject was subsequently discussed with individual members of the commission and with qualified officers of the public service. The cabinet war committee acted on the recommendation of the Canadian section of the permanent joint board on defence, which recommendation was supported by the three service departments.

Mr. NEILL:

Whereas order in council No. 3359 of November 10, 1939, provides for pensions for persons suffering death or disability while engaged on any ship of Canadian registry or licence, while engaged in war with the German reich, will the government consider enlarging the terms of that order in council to cover all those now engaged in war with the Japanese nation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I will send the hon. member a supplementary order in council which fully answers this question.

WAR APPROPRIATION

UNITED KINGDOM FINANCING—WAR SUPPLIES, FOOD AND LOAN WITHOUT INTEREST

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide:—

1. That sums not exceeding one thousand million dollars ($1,000,000,000) be granted to His Majesty towards defraying the expenditures that may be incurred during the present war for the purpose of enabling the government of the United Kingdom to purchase in Canada aircraft, tanks, mechanical transport vehicles, guns, ammunition and other munitions of war, foodstuffs, raw materials and any other commodities and supplies essential to the conduct of the war and the maintenance of the people of the United Kingdom, and to assist in enabling the government of the United Kingdom to defray other expenditures incurred in Canada for war purposes.

2. That the Minister of Finance may be empowered to accept from the government of the United Kingdom an obligation of the said government in such form and subject to such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine for a sum of seven hundred million dollars ($700,000,000) in exchange for an equivalent amount, at an exchange rate of $4.45 to the pound sterling, of deposits in pounds sterling held in banks in the United Kingdom, the said obligation of the government of the United Kingdom not to bear interest until the termination of the war.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION BY GENERAL MCNAUGHTON OF WEST COAST CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Press dispatches from Washington published to-day quote Lieutenant-General A. G. L. McNaughton, Commander of the Canadian Corps, as saying, in answer to a question as to the possibility of Japanese raids against the Pacific coast, "They undoubtedly will happen," and also as saying that he would not be the least surprised if the Japanese struck at the Panama canal or Alaska. Will the government send General McNaughton to the Pacific coast to investigate the effectiveness of Canada's defence measures there against not only raids but also an invasion attack? I submit that Canadians on the Pacific, whose lives are at stake, are entitled to have such an investigation made.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might say to my hon. friend that I asked General McNaughton some days ago if it might be possible for him to visit the Pacific coast before he returned to Britain, but he felt that his engagements were such that it would not be possible for him to do it at this time. I do not know that I can give my hon. friend any further information.

Mr. GREEN: Might further consideration be given to the matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure that my colleague the Minister of National Defence will be pleased to bring my hon. friend's request to the attention of General McNaughton. I am sure my hon. friend will be the first to realize that in reaching a decision General McNaughton's own views will have to be taken largely into account.

SUGGESTED NATION-WIDE ENLISTMENT CAMPAIGN PRIOR TO PLEBISCITE

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) based upon a report in the Ottawa Evening Journal of March 10, reading as follows:

Recruiting officers from all military districts, pooling experiences and discussing new ways and means of maintaining the flow of men offering their services to the army for duty on any front, opened a two-day conference at defence headquarters Monday.

Defence minister Ralston and senior officers of the defence department addressed the conference.

My questions are: 1. Will the Minister of National Defence consider launching a nation-wide enlistment campaign to be carried on during the week or weeks preceding the taking of the plebiscite? 2. Since every member of parliament has gone on record as favouring maximum voluntary enlistment, would the minister consider obtaining the fullest participation of all members in such a recruiting drive, both in their own and other ridings?

Mr. SPEAKER: This is another question of the kind which should be placed upon the order paper.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member sent me a copy of the question, and I am quite prepared to make a reply, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have been endeavouring to see that the order paper is taken advantage of and used. I think this question is in the same category as the one that was asked yesterday and which I said should be put on the order paper. While the minister is ready to reply to the question asked, I would prefer to see the order paper used as it ought to be. If a question is improperly asked on the orders of the day, it is equally improper to answer it. I would say that the question ought to be put on the order paper.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Rising to a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to understand more fully the reason for your suggesting that my question should be put on the order paper. My understanding was that any question which dealt with future policy of the government was not a proper question to put on the order paper, and that is why I asked my question orally.

Mr. SPEAKER: The reason is that so many questions have been asked this session on the orders of the day which have led to supplementary questions and again supplementary questions, and question and answer assumed the form of a debate. Any question of the kind asked by the hon. member for North Battleford should be placed on the order paper so that the minister would have an opportunity to make answer if he were not prepared to answer it at the moment. I am endeavouring to see that so far as possible the questions asked on the orders of the day are questions of immediate interest which require an immediate answer. Such questions may properly be asked on the orders of the day.

[Mrs. Nielsen.]

PLEBISCITE ACT

METHOD OF APPOINTMENT OF OFFICIALS IN CONNECTION WITH TAKING OF VOTE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps a brief statement at this time about the method of appointing officials who are to act under the Plebiscite Act might be helpful to hon. members of the house. It will be recollected that during the course of the debate on March 3 the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated:

> I can see no reason why some arrangement should not be made between the different parties in the house which would satisfy everyone that we desire to have a perfectly impartial administration of the machinery of the plebiscite.

I should like to outline the provisions that have been made to implement this undertaking of the Prime Minister. Pursuant to this undertaking I addressed a memorandum to the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). Certain amendments were suggested which the government is prepared to agree to. It might be of advantage to members of the house if I read the appropriate parts of the memorandum including such amendments as to the appointment of the necessary officials to carry out the provisions of the Plebiscite Act.

1. Returning officers. This is provided in section 8, subsection 1 of the act, which requires that the returning officers be appointed as at the 1940 election, save and except as replaced under section 8 of the elections act.

2. Deputy returning officers. Section 13, subsection 1 of the regulations provides that the deputy returning officers shall be appointed by the returning officers. It is suggested that their appointment should be made on the following basis: The candidate receiving the highest number of votes at the last general election shall nominate the deputy returning officers in the odd-numbered polling subdivisions, and the candidate of a different and opposed political interest receiving the next highest number of votes shall nominate the deputy returning officers in the even-numbered polling subdivisions.

In the event of the decease of the candidate receiving the highest number of votes, or of the candidate of a different and opposed political interest receiving the next highest number of votes, or his absence on active service, or if for other reasons it is impractical for him to act, or if he refuses to act, the president of the political association whom such candidate represented shall nominate the deputy returning officers in the polling subdivisions.

3. Poll clerks. Under regulation 13, subsection 3, the poll clerks are appointed by the deputy returning officers. Consequently no special provision will be required in the case of these appointments.

4. Enumerators—urban polling divisions. Unlike the elections act, it is proposed to appoint only one enumerator for each subdivision; in the election two were appointed. In rule 2 to schedule A of paragraph 12 of the regulations a similar provision is made to that used in the appointment of deputy returning officers, namely: the candidate who received the highest number of votes will nominate the enumerators for every odd-numbered polling division, and the candidate of a different and opposed political interest receiving the next highest number of votes will nominate for every even-numbered polling division.

5. Enumerators—rural polling divisions. It is suggested that the same procedure be followed in rural polling divisions as in the urban ones.

I am advised by the hon. the leader of the opposition, by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and by the hon. member for Lethbridge that this arrangement completely implements the undertaking given by the Prime Minister that there should be an impartial administration of the machinery to take the plebiscite vote.

Mr. NEILL: May I make a comment on the statement of the Secretary of State? His idea is to appoint the deputy returning officers half and half, in a non-partisan way. I would point out that that will work out very unfairly in some places. There are about 130 polls in my district and my opponent had a majority in only eight polls, yet he will appoint 65 deputy returning officers and the same number of poll clerks.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it the desire of the government and the Secretary of State that in the appointment of enumerators and other officials the Canadian Legion shall be consulted and returned men given the preference?

Mr. McLARTY: I should quite properly have referred to that point, and I thank the hon. member for calling it to my attention. It is the thought and the desire that in the matter of appointments preference be given to the Legion and returned men generally.

Mr. MacNICOL: It always is.

Mr. HANSELL: May I ask what will be the procedure in appointing these election officials? Will the members appoint them, or simply recommend names to the returning officer?

Mr. McLARTY: The appropriate person, if he was the candidate who received either the largest number of votes or the second largest, will make the recommendation to the returning officer.

Mr. NEILL: For each poll?

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN TORONTO "GLOBE AND MAIL"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I would direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply arising out of inquiries and letters I have received with respect to an article appearing in the Toronto Globe and Mail reporting a speech of Doctor Thomas H. Hogg, chairman of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission, who it is reported reiterated charges made in an address last week that professorial and newspaper critics had delayed the implementing of the St. Lawrence waterway treaty. Mr. Hogg is reported to have said:

Statements have been made by professors of the three eastern universities, and quoted in the press—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This is another question which I think should be placed on the order paper.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASED RATE PER BUSHEL ON WHEAT DELIVERED BY PRODUCERS

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West) for the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Douglas (Weyburn).

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), and seconded by myself, I should like first to correct some of the statements that were made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) last night. He took exception to the word "parliament" instead of "government" in the wording of the amendment. We of this group gave very careful consideration to its wording, and the word "parliament" was used for two distinct reasons. We felt that such an important matter as the living, the bread and butter, of two million people in western Canada, should be considered by the parliament of Canada as a whole, and that such a question should not be a political one. We wanted to take it out of the realm of politics and to have a discussion on the merits themselves. That is the main reason for the wording of the amendment. We had a very good precedent for that. During the last war Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved a similar amendment to the War-time Elections Act, to remove the question of conscription from the field of politics.

We of this group felt that these bills, after they had been introduced and given second reading, and the ministers had made their statements, should have gone direct to the committee on agriculture, and we made that suggestion to the whip. We felt that the bills were already late in being introduced because western agriculture wants to know immediately what the government's policy on acreage reduction is, since seeding of the next crop will commence within a very short time. We felt that a discussion of these bills should have taken place in that committee. But the government decided otherwise, stating that certain private members on their side wished to speak on the bills. We have had to abide by that decision. We hope, however, that when these bills go to the committee on agriculture, which is a new procedure in the lifetime of this parliament because the agriculture committee has not been called together during the last two sessions of the house, the government will not regard them as being as immutable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, but will be prepared to accept amendments because these bills vitally affect the living of a great number of people in our section of the country. We hope, therefore, that the government will be prepared to accept suggestions that we may make with regard to these bills because, in our opinion, they do not go far enough.

The main issue in these bills seems to be the establishment of an equality of living between the people of western Canada and the people engaged in industry, finance and other occupations in other parts of Canada, and producing other products than those produced in western Canada.

I am going to give the house a few figures which will prove, I believe, that the western producer is not getting a square deal. In the brief presented to the government by the delegation from western Canada which came to Ottawa about a month ago, it is stated that for the period 1926 to 1929 there was an average yearly income in western Canada of $530,000,000. By the year 1932 this income had decreased to $161,000,000; in 1939 it increased to $276,680,000; in 1940, to $369,750,000; in 1941, to $410,222,000; but it is estimated that this year it will fall to $338,000,000. According to figures given by the Minister of Agriculture in his address the other day, it is probable that these bills will assist in raising the income of western Canada to approximately $410,000,000; that is, $120,000,000 less than the income which was enjoyed by western Canadians during the years 1926 to 1929. We do not consider that this is fair. According to the bureau of statistics, twenty per cent of the Canadian population engaged in agriculture in western Canada received only five per cent of the national income. The purpose of these bills is to increase this income. We do not feel that the bills go far enough, and we hope that they will be so amended in committee as to increase the income of western agriculturists to at least a parity with that of the years 1926 to 1929.

The income enjoyed by people engaged in other lines of endeavour is certainly not in line with ours. The Ottawa Journal of March 10 reports the last annual returns of Montreal Cottons, Limited. It states that Montreal Cottons, Limited, reported net profit in 1941 of $606,071, which was equal to $13.75 per share on the common stock, compared with $4.48 a share in 1940. The gross profit was listed at $2,469,106, compared with $1,340,582 in 1940; the surplus being $276,071 this year compared with $132,567 last year. In addition to that, the company were able to increase the fixed assets by $300,000 owing to replacements of machinery. Mr. C. B. Gordon, the president, reported that the company, which is engaged in filling war orders, had not received a cent of assistance by way of capital expenditure from the government. They would not need much special assistance from the government when they could increase their profits on war orders in the last year three times and at the same time put away a depletion reserve, and also pay off a note which they had at the bank for $243,000.

I have here also some figures with regard to International Nickel company. In 1938 this company, after having paid all their taxes, laid aside their reserves and provided for all other items for which deductions could be made, reported a net profit of $48,684,167. In 1939 they made a net profit of $58,266,488. In 1940 their profits were $68,740,870. I have not the figures for 1941, but if they continue in the same ratio of increase as they have during the past three years their net profits for last year will be over $78 million.

Last year, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), replying I believe to a question of the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), gave a statement which showed that 320 representative companies of this country made in 1940 profits five per cent greater than they made in the previous year. Therefore it would appear that industry is receiving at least a fair return; and it is a fair return which we are asking for agriculture in connection with these bills. We ask that it be given the same treatment as is enjoyed by other groups in this country.

I have here also the returns of the banks for the year 1940. It shows that their average profit, after provision for dominion and provincial taxes, was 13 per cent on their paid-up capital. The bank of Toronto made as high as 24·08 per cent; the lowest return was that of the Provincial bank, with 7·28 per cent.

Industry and finance alike are receiving very fair returns from their investments. We from western Canada contend that in these bills provision should be made for a return to agriculture which will at least equal the cost of production. The delegation which recently came here did not ask even that they should receive the cost of production. All they asked was that they should receive a parity price, and they left it to the government to decide, by reference to the bureau of statistics, what that parity price should be. They said:

> The delegation is also urging that the initial payment on all wheat delivered to the wheat board should be established at not less than one dollar per bushel basis No. 1 northern in store at the head of the lakes, and that a final settlement on wheat delivered to the wheat board should be made by deferred payments on the basis of a parity price above referred to.

When any manufacturing concern engaged in war industry makes anything for the government it receives payment immediately. The delegation which came from western Canada were not asking for that; they were asking for an initial payment, and that during the following twelve months the government should establish a parity price and pay them the remainder during that period. This, it seems to me, is a very fair request. As a matter of fact the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), having listened to the delegation's representations, said that they were very fair and reasonable. Nevertheless in these bills which the government has introduced those requests have not been granted. The Minister of Agriculture last night tried to prove to us that agriculture was receiving a parity price. He enumerated various items and in the final analysis claimed that wheat was the only commodity on which we were not receiving a parity price. We agree with the minister that there is a parity price on animal products; none of us denies that. But the income of western agriculture is derived mainly from grain products; 75 per cent of the income of the people engaged in agriculture in the three prairie provinces is derived from the sale of grain products, and those products are not at a parity price to-day. All that agriculture is asking is that it be placed on an equal footing with other industries.

I was surprised at the statements made by ministers of the crown and by various members on the government side who have spoken; none of the members on that side tried to prove that the government were paying parity prices. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross), speaking the other night, said he thought that the very minimum that should be given to the wheat growers of western Canada was $1.20 a bushel. The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) was also of opinion that the minimum price should be $1.20. The Minister of Agriculture in his statement agreed that a parity price was approximately $1.41 a bushel.

The hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly), speaking the other day, made a statement with regard to the wheat pools which I should like to correct at this time. He said that the wheat pool during the year 1940 made a profit of $3,000,000. Let me point out that the wheat pool is a cooperative organization which does not make a profit. Whatever money is made by the wheat pool is returned to the men who patronize the pool. Let me give the house the figures to show exactly how $3,000,000 was paid out. It was our own money. The $3,000,000 was divided in this way: $1,100,000 was paid to the government in respect of the overpayment made in 1929 by the pools; $900,000 was returned as a patronage dividend to the growers who had delivered grain to the pool elevators; and $1,000,000 was used to build additional storage capacity at the head of the lakes in order to assist the government in connection with the wheat storage problem. I think the hon. gentleman should have been fair and given all the facts in that regard.

We feel that if the members of this government and of the house would give support to the requests that have been made by western agriculture, the western farmers would receive a fair return. The Prime Minister represents a western constituency, that of Prince Albert. In our view, if the Prime Minister really believed what he stated—that the requests were fair and reasonable—he could himself obtain for western agriculture what it asks. I attended a meeting last year in the city of Prince Albert in the Prime Minister's constituency. The largest theatre there was crowded and there were hundreds of people standing outside, listening to the loud speaker.

Mr. Wesson, president of the wheat pool, addressed that meeting and after the meeting questions were asked. Some members of the audience insisted that the question be put to some of the members who were on the platform, why the government did not give western agriculture fair treatment. On the platform were two members of the dominion house, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and myself, and the chairman finally turned to me and asked me that question. In reply I said I was rather surprised that the people in the constituency of Prince Albert should ask me such a question. They had elected the head of the government, and if they found that they had burned themselves they would probably have to sit on the blister until the next general election when they would be able to rectify the error themselves. I can assure you, sir, that is the attitude of western Canada. They are fed up and are desirous of getting a better deal than they have received in the past.

From western Canada we have also four other members of the cabinet—the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), and the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). The Minister of Mines and Resources is to-day the pale shadow that remains of that shining Lochinvar who came out of the west during the last war to fight the battles of western argiculture, and who has now forgotten both the cause and the people for whom he came to fight. He sleeps peacefully to-day in the lap of fortune, and while he slumbers he dreams of that happy haven of rest, the other house.

The hon. member for Rosthern the other day spoke of the ingratitude of western agriculture to the men who came here to represent them. I was surprised that the hon. gentleman should raise that question. There are several members of his party whom agriculture placed on the bottom rung of the ladder of success and when they had climbed that ladder they promptly forgot agriculture. One notable exception is the Hon. Mr. Motherwell. We feel that if those members of the cabinet who represent western agriculture here were determined to get a fair deal for the western farmers, they could get it. In addition, we have thirty-four members supporting the government who belong to western Canada. If those members would stand up for the people they represent rather than for the party, they could obtain what western agriculture wants; and if the three sections together—the Prime Minister, the members of the cabinet, and the members supporting the government, assisted by the members on this side of the house from the west—made a united effort, we could get it without a doubt. But if we are to make a political football of this question, then I feel sorry for western agriculture.

Mr. WOOD: Would the hon. member consider the farmers of Ontario?

Mr. WRIGHT: The farmers of Ontario are getting a fair deal. If our income in the west were derived entirely from animal products we would not be doing any kicking to-day.

If this additional money were paid to the farmers of western Canada what would happen to it? To-day they could not spend it on cars. I believe that the largest portion of it would return, either directly or indirectly, to the government. Those farmers would use the money either to pay their debts or to buy war savings certificates or bonds. Just before I left western Canada, in one of the towns in my constituency I met the organizer for the last war loan and we were trying to organize a committee there. There were two or three farmers in town and we asked them to sit in on that committee. We asked one of them, a man who served in the last war and in the Boer war and who has a son serving in this war, if he could contribute to the loan. He said he had contributed to the last loan, but now his son was away, he had to hire help, and he could not see his way to contribute to this loan. "But," he said, "I will make you a promise. We have a delegation going to Ottawa in a week or two to interview the government in regard to the price of wheat. I promise you that if the government give the farmers of western Canada a dollar a bushel for their wheat next year, I will contribute to the next war loan every cent I make over the price we are getting this year." I think that is the sentiment of western Canada. The people of western Canada are willing to take their full share in the economy of this country provided they are given a chance.

I believe agriculture should receive the cost of production. There is a difference between cost of production and a parity price, but agriculture is satisfied and willing to accept to-day a parity price, and I believe that this is the very least that should be granted.

With regard to Bill No. 12, the wheat acreage reduction bill, I wish to make one or two observations. In the first place it reduces the payment made on the summer-fallow bonus from $4 to $2. What is the effect of that? Of the $30,000,000 paid out last year under the wheat acreage reduction appropriation approximately $22,000,000 was paid under the summer-fallow bonus. If you cut that in half, it means on the basis of last year that there will be $11,000,000 less paid next year. If the government are going to reduce that payment—and I do not object to that particularly; I think probably it is a good idea—it should be paid by way of an additional bonus on coarse grains. They should increase the payment on coarse grains to $3 an acre, and also the payment on land placed under grass. I do not disagree with the principle of these bills; the principle is good, but it is a matter of adjusting them to meet the needs of western agriculture.

The hon. member for Wood Mountain stated the other night that the acreage basis was the fairest basis on which to distribute bonuses. I do not altogether agree with that. There are many people from the constituency of the hon. member for Wood Mountain who have moved to the northern part of Saskatchewan into the constituency which I represent. Many of those people are living on small farms; they took up bush homesteads and have some forty or fifty acres under cultivation. The wheat acreage reduction bonus does not mean a thing to them, neither does the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, because they always grow over twelve bushels to the acre, but their acreage is small. Neither does the other bill, which provides for a payment of 75 cents per acre on the cultivated acreage mean anything to them, because they have so little under cultivation. On the other hand, some of their neighbours who remained in the south of the province and to-day are renting large tracts of land are making a very fair thing out of this bonus. In fact there were two bonus cheques of over $10,000; five cheques for between $5,000 and $10,000, and 562 cheques for between $1,000 and $5,000.

Those people who have moved to the north of the province and are trying to get along now feel that they have a just complaint in that regard. They think that the acreage basis of payment is not in itself the fairest basis. They also believe that when a price is established for wheat and a delivery quota set, they should be allowed to make a minimum delivery of at least 750 to 1,000 bushels of wheat. They have to make a living; they have a small acreage; they often grow quite a few bushels per acre; but if they are allowed to deliver only ten, twelve or fifteen bushels to the acre off twenty acres, it means they have no income at all, whereas their neighbours who remained in the southern part of the province and have rented the land they left are able through this bonus to make a very fair living. Therefore I suggest to the government that some consideration should be given to those people in the northern part of the province who are farming a small acreage, trying to make things go, to stay off relief. It is only fair.

Coming now to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, this, I believe, is one of the best measures which the government has introduced. It seems to have been fairly satisfactory over a great deal of the province. But again we in the north have certain complaints in regard to its operation.

Just last year we in the northeastern corner of the province had a frost which deteriorated the quality of the grain from No. 1 northern to No. 4, No. 5 and feed. Many men on these small acreages with a yield of from fifteen to seventeen bushels per acre received only 37 to 40 cents a bushel for that grain, and they could not qualify for assistance under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act; while other people, who grew eight to twelve bushels per acre, came under the act, and although their wheat graded No. 1 and they received more for it than the farmer who grew from fifteen to seventeen bushels per acre, they also obtained the payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. So we believe that this Prairie Farm Assistance Act needs to be amended. I believe it will only reach its full effect when we get a parity price for agricultural products. If we in western Canada were receiving $1.40 a bushel for wheat, the parity price, there is no doubt in my mind that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act could be made self-sustaining. If on the basis of that price and of an average crop in western Canada the levy were made 2 per cent instead of 1 per cent, we would obtain $8,400,000 in an average year in that fund, and when coarse grain is also taken into consideration it would amount to $10,500,000. The largest total of payments made under the act in any year was, I believe, in the neighbourhood of $11,000,000. Therefore, if we in western Canada were receiving a parity price for our grain, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act could be self-sustaining.

Again we in the northern part of the province who seldom reap any of the benefit of the act believe there should be a variation in the premium paid under that act; that in that part of the province described by the Minister of Agriculture the other day, the triangle reaching from Morden up through Saskatoon to Lloydminster, back to Calgary and the south of the province, in that area where the risk is greater the premium should be greater. True, there are certain sections of that triangle where the risk might be so great that it could not be carried by the individual farmer. To a great extent those areas were placed under cultivation during the period when the Dominion of Canada owned the natural resources. Many of those areas should never have been placed under cultivation, and thus the dominion as a whole is responsible for them. In those areas we feel the dominion should bear a portion of the cost. But in probably 25 per cent of Saskatchewan, 70 per cent of Alberta and 75 per cent of Manitoba, if we were receiving parity prices for our products the Prairie Farm Assistance Act could be made self-sustaining.

In conclusion, I would say we from western Canada feel that these bills can be made the basis for better conditions in western agriculture, and we are hoping that when they go to the committee we shall be allowed to amend them so as to obtain that result.

Mr. C. R. EVANS (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, the measures now under consideration, bills numbers 12, 13 and 14 which are before the house for second reading, and the amendment moved by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), have a direct bearing on the wheat policy of western Canada. In the short time at my disposal this afternoon I wish to offer some observations on the agricultural policy of the government as it affects western Canada generally, and in particular the district from which I come.

When I first went to western Canada, wheat and land were the main sources of value. If a man owned land, he linked that ownership with the wheat which could be produced; and for years we were told that a granary of wheat was as good as a bank account. But down through the years, after passing the base years of 1926-29, we arrived at the point where our wheat was of little value. From that time to the present the marketing of wheat has been one of the chief problems with which the government has been faced. If we turn our minds back to 1930 it will be recalled that in that year we had a general election. I know that in western Canada the election was fought chiefly on the platform of markets, and the prices we were receiving for our agricultural products. I well remember the arguments put forward by the then leader of the official opposition, Right Hon. Mr. Bennett, when he told us that if he were elected to power he would blast his way into the markets of the world, and he would see that we got a reasonable price for our agricultural products. Well, the people of Canada took Mr. Bennett at his word on that occasion, and he was elected to power. What followed? In the thirties wheat went down in price. In 1932 it reached the lowest price in fifty years, and our markets kept dwindling. In 1932 Mr. Bennett's government did agree to pay a bonus on wheat, on a bushelage basis, and that bonus was fixed at five cents a bushel. The difficulty was that he gave to the man who had, but the man who had not got nothing. That is why we who come from western Canada believe that the fairer way to distribute money to the wheat growers of the west is on an acreage rather than a bushelage basis.

If we follow the history of wheat marketing through the thirties we find that in addition to paying a bonus to farmers, Mr. Bennett appointed a gentleman to take over wheat marketing in western Canada, and to attempt to stabilize the market. The gentleman appointed was Mr. John I. McFarland, and from about 1931 to 1935 he was given the position of grain controller, or whatever you wish to call him. He used the money of Canada on the grain exchange in some way to stimulate or to bolster the wheat market.

There was another election in 1935, and because of the policy of Mr. Bennett and his government with respect to the handling of wheat the King government was returned to power. Just prior to the election Mr. Bennett gave western Canada something it had been asking for for a number of years; I refer to the Canadian wheat board. I am not going to review the actions of the wheat board from 1935 to the present time, because that does not come within the subject matter I wish to discuss this afternoon.

During the years 1935, 1936 and 1937, western Canada came through a period of drought when stocks of wheat were considerably reduced. In 1938 we did produce a crop, and at the end of the 1938-39 crop year we had a small surplus. At the end of the 1939-40 crop year we had a carryover of about 283,000,000 bushels. But just prior to the new year, after the war broke out, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) outlined his policy. The minister has been criticized by farm organizations throughout Canada, particularly by farm representatives from western Canada and by some of our farm organizations in the west, for not giving leadership to the farmer, and particularly the western farmer. Well, I recall a speech made by the minister in Winnipeg in November, 1939, when he clearly and distinctly outlined to the farmers of the west the agricultural policy which he suggested might be in the best interests of Canada's war effort, and which would supply the necessary food products Great Britain would need in great quantities in the coming war years. He told the farmers in the west at that time that in his opinion he did not think it wise to increase wheat production. He made it clear to them that from the information he had, from the information obtained by grain handling organizations in western Canada, and from the information in the possession of wheat farmers of the west, in their own interests it was not wise to increase wheat production at that time, because the only visible market was in Great Britain, with only a small amount going to France. At that time he advised the farmers to increase their production of live stock, particularly hogs and cattle, and also of dairy products. He advised them that in order to supply the feed for increased hog, beef and dairy products production they would have to increase their production of coarse grains. In spite of the advice given by the minister at that time the farmers of western Canada increased their wheat production. What did we find? We found that at the end of the crop year 1940-41 we had the largest wheat carryover in the history of Canada.

In view of the storage capacity for wheat in Canada it was necessary that steps should be taken to reduce wheat acreage in western Canada. In the spring of 1941 the wheat acreage reduction plan was brought in by the Minister of Agriculture. Under that plan it was agreed that certain amounts would be paid for wheat acreage reduction. It was agreed that $2 per acre would be paid for coarse grains or grasses and $4 per acre for increased summer-fallow. The result was that last year the wheat acreage in western Canada was reduced by some nine million acres. The amount paid up to the present under this wheat acreage reduction plan amounts to some $26,000,000, and we are advised by the minister that this amount may possibly reach $30,000,000.

There has been a good deal of criticism of this wheat acreage reduction plan and the delayed payments thereunder, but judging from the figures given the other day by the minister of the outstanding accounts to be paid, and considering the large number of applications that have been made, I think it can be said that the administrative branches in Regina, Winnipeg and Edmonton have done remarkably well. I have had considerable trouble with some of these applications. Farmers have written to me wanting to know why the payments have been delayed, or why only partial payment has been made. Upon taking the matter up I found that it was not the fault of the office or the administration branch. When they were passed to the treasury board for payment and a check was made of the acreage statements of 1939-40, discrepancies were found and it was necessary to recheck. That is why payments have been held up.

A delegation came to Ottawa about a month ago from western Canada. It was sponsored by the Saskatchewan wheat pool, of which I happen to be a member and of which I was at one time a delegate. The petition presented to the government by this organization asked for certain specific things, the main one being an increased price for wheat. For a number of years this question has been one of the major topics of discussion in this house, and no doubt there will be more discussion on it this year. I happened to be at the meeting when the president of the wheat pool presented his brief to the Prime Minister and his government. I think that brief was very fair. I had the feeling that he made such a splendid impression upon the government in presenting it that most of the representations he made would receive fair consideration, as I believe they have. After listening to the review of that brief given last night by the Minister of Agriculture I think it will be agreed that most of the things asked for have received fair consideration from the government. I know from experience that when petitions are presented to the government it is not expected that everything asked for will be granted. I do not think this delegation expected that they would get what they asked for one hundred per cent.

I was rather disappointed, however, in the price set for wheat. I had the feeling that when we were satisfied to accept a certain parity level the government would at least meet our request for dollar wheat. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke following the presentation of the brief he told the delegation that he thought their request was fair and reasonable. I think every member of the government who was present that day thought that the request for dollar wheat was fair and reasonable. However, the government in its wisdom has decided that for this year the initial payment for wheat will be 90 cents a bushel f.o.b. Fort William, with participation certificates.

I look upon the amendment moved by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) as a political argument. I think he is taking this stand in order to put the members from Saskatchewan on the spot. I am not going to be put on the spot because I intend to vote against the amendment. I have evey confidence that in the crop year 1942-43 there is a possibility of an increase in the price of wheat in the world markets. We should consider the position of our sister dominion, Australia, whose trade routes to the mother country have been cut off. We should consider the submarine menace in the Atlantic which cuts off the trade routes to the mother country from the Argentine and south America. Canada is in a very favourable position. As the armies of Great Britain start their offensive and redeem some of the conquered countries of Europe, food will be necessary and there will be a demand for Canadian wheat. They should have it even if we have to give it to them.

I would be quite prepared to go back home to my people and advocate that they accept this 90-cent initial payment, tell them that that is all they are going to get because we are going to send our wheat to the people of the European countries once they are released from the iron heel of Hitlerism. But I do not think that will be necessary. I think arrangements will be made to finance the purchases of wheat that Canada will be able to supply. That is why I am going to vote against the amendment and for the bill.

There is another thing upon which I should like to touch for a few moments, namely, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. This act has been praised by some and criticized by others. Personally I look upon the Prairie Farm Assistance Act as one of the best acts ever placed upon our statute books so far as the assistance of agriculture in distress is concerned. Members who have been in the house longer than I have and those who were associated with Saskatchewan during the drought years from 1930 to 1939 will remember the vast sums of money which this government asked parliament to vote to assist the prairie provinces through that calamity of a succession of crop failures. A great deal of credit is due to the Minister of Agriculture for his foresight in bringing into being what is known as the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which is coming before parliament for amendment this year. A certain clause of that act prohibits the governor in council, if wheat is 80 cents or above that price, between July 31 and November 1, from declaring the year an emergency year. In view of the fact that the price of wheat has been increased from 70 to 90 cents, the Minister of Agriculture is amending this clause in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to make it operative regardless of the price of wheat. There is another section of the act which I should like to see amended; it pertains to the 80 cents a bushel clause, where the price is above 70 cents a bushel from July 31 to November 1, then 10 cents an acre is deducted from the payment in the 8 to 12 bushels per acre category. The proposed change in the initial payment automatically wipes out the 8 to 12 bushels category.

In the past three years there have been two complete years in which the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has been operative. For the information of the members I should like to put on Hansard the figures, in the form of a short table, showing the 1939-40 payments by provinces and by different categories:

Prairie Farm Assistance Act
Payments in 1939-40

	Townships	Bushels per acre	Amount paid	Number of farmers receiving payment
Alberta	395	8–12	$1,132,658 00	9,726
	147	4– 8	376,485 17	2,021
	42	0– 4	91,790 23	395
	584		$1,600,934 39	12,142
Manitoba	91	8–12	$ 403,703 08	4,269
	51	4– 8	374,631 03	2,251
	14	0– 4	90,608 00	440
	156		$ 868,942 11	6,960
Saskatchewan	621	8–12	$2,726,220 63	21,984
	302	4– 8	1,860,939 25	9,444
	260	0– 4	2,847,264 39	8,034
	1,183		$7,434,324 27	39,462

Summarizing these figures we find that in the 8 to 12 bushels category, payments were made to 35,979 farmers, or 61 per cent of the total farm population of the three prairie provinces receiving assistance under the act. In the 4 to 8 bushels category, payments were made to 13,516 farmers, and in the 0 to 4 bushels category, payments were made to 8,869 farmers, or 6½ per cent of the total number of farmers receiving assistance. Those two categories together, 4 to 8 bushels and 0 to 4 bushels, comprise 32½ per cent of the total number of farmers receiving assistance.

I have another table covering the same categories for the crop year 1940-41. I will give just the total amounts by provinces and the total number of farmers receiving payments. In the province of Manitoba, 6,368 farmers received $611,393.20. The greater portion of that was in the 8 to 12 bushels category, where we had 5,068 farmers receiving $453,465.44. In Saskatchewan we had 40,848 farmers receiving $5,598,002.93, and again we find that the largest payments were in the 8 to 12 bushels category, where 25,588 farmers received $2,460,479.15.

In the province of Alberta 4,356 farmers received $502,805.27; and again in the 8 to 12 bushels category 3,148 farmers received $290,143.41. We find that in the whole three provinces, in the 8 to 12 bushels category we had 33,804 farmers or 70 per cent of the total. In the 4 to 8 bushels category we have 13,412 farmers, or 22 per cent; while in the high payment bracket or the low yield bracket we find we have only 4,356 farmers, or 8 per cent of the total. I believe, Mr. Speaker, with these thoughts in mind you will readily understand why we should like to see the Minister of Agriculture amend the clause so that the 8 to 12 bushels category will come into operation regardless of the price.

In closing I just want to say that I appreciate what the government has done for us in the way of bonuses. Just before the delegation came from the west I sent out about 250 letters, which covered my entire constituency, at least one letter going to each poll, and in reply I received some 153 communications up to the fourth of March; since then a considerable number have come in. Examining those 153 replies, I found that the acreage bonus policy with a 70-cent payment for wheat was favoured by 87 farmers; the increased price for wheat and the continuation of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was favoured by 53 farmers; and the higher price for wheat only was favoured by no more than 12. For that reason I urge, as I have always done, that in the portion of the province of Saskatchewan from which I come the acreage bonus payment is better for our farmers than an increased price for wheat alone.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Could they not get both?

Mr. EVANS: Yes. I am going on to that. As regards the brief as presented by the wheat pool, many of those from whom I have received letters mentioned that they had signed this petition, but some of them said they signed it to get rid of those who were circulating it, and others said they signed it because they believed it was the best policy, or an improvement on the existing policy for western Canada. But the larger percentage of the letters I received favoured the acreage bonus.

For that reason I intend to support the bill, and I ask the minister to give earnest consideration to an amendment of the clause which would exclude a payment in respect of yields of eight to twelve bushels.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Bills Nos. 12 and 13, which are now under consideration, bring forcibly to our attention the fact that our economy as far as agriculture is concerned has not been just what it might have been, inasmuch as we have probably given too much attention and consideration to the matter of wheat, and not enough to that of coarse grains. The problem is brought before us in striking fashion as we look at the world picture and observe what has happened recently, more especially within the last twelve months. When one thinks of coarse grains one thinks also of live stock, and in thinking of live stock one thinks of the products which come from live stock. We are now confronted with the fact that twenty-five per cent of the oils or fats normally consumed by Canadians has been shut off from us. These products, as the house knows and as the minister has pointed out, originate largely in Pacific countries such as Sumatra, the Dutch East Indies, Java, Macassar, and the Straits Settlements. Not only are we shut off from these extra supplies, but all the democratic countries are in the same position. It is well known that even the United States, with a factory consumption per year of three million tons of these products, have found it necessary to import, on an average during the past few years, 1,200,000 tons annually, although they are supposed to be large producers of these commodities. We have lost our source of supply in the Pacific; we cannot expect to import from the United States; we cannot of course expect to receive any from Great Britain. Therefore, in my opinion, before we are much older we shall be compelled to ration not only butter, lard, and all oils and fats, but perhaps soap as well.

I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) left a false impression in the minds of hon. members when he intimated that this situation will be met to a degree by an increased production of flax. In a moment or two, after a general statement, I shall make some observations with regard to flax. In my opinion it is too bad that during the last twenty years we have not given more attention to flax. We produced it in 1920 to the extent of 203,000 tons, and in 1924 production rose to 242,000 tons, although it was not all milled here; a good deal was exported. The reason for the increase in production from 1921 to 1924 was, as we all know, a spiral of prices which brought flax on one occasion as high as $6 per bushel. But we allowed production to slide down and down, and the highest figure reached in the next fifteen years was in 1930, when 127,000 tons were produced. From that time it slipped until, according to the statistics provided by the world market headquarters in London, England, we raised in 1937 only 17,900 tons, or one-tenth of what was produced in 1920.

This trend was brought forcibly to the attention of the present administration on many occasions, particularly in 1937. At that time those interested in flax presented by an amendment their representations in respect of application No. 99, covering the general oils and fats situation. Attention may have been paid to this; consideration may have been given to it; in fact the tariff board brought down a recommendation, but it was never acted on in any of the categories having to do with the supplies required of oils and fats of all kinds for consumption in Canada. To my mind that was a mistake. Our house should have been put in order at that time. If the representations which were made in 1937, 1938 and 1939 had been put into effect, instead of our importing, as we did in 1936 and 1937, very large quantities of flax from the Argentine and very large quantities of linseed oil from Europe, we would have found ourselves in a much better position to-day with regard to flax production in Canada. That, however, is water under the bridge. In placing these few remarks on Hansard now, I am anxious to help the general economic condition in Canada by putting the position on the record and trying, by suggestion, to improve the situation as a whole.

As regards the $2 an acre bonus for those lands which go into oats and barley, I suppose the pegging of flax at $2.25 a bushel will take care of flax, and with that feature of this legislation I am entirely in accord. I admit that it is perhaps rather not of the kind we were accustomed to twenty or thirty years ago, but times are changing rapidly and we must be up to the minute and take care of ourselves as we go along, even though some of the legislation may sound more or less socialistic. I was never in favour of the $4 an acre blackout, as it has been described, and I should like to see the $4 added to the $2 to help out the general situation in order to get more oats and barley grown and fed, more flax grown, and more linseed oil produced in Canada. Anything along that line will meet with my approval.

I see my hon. friend the member for Essex South (Mr. Clark), who will follow me, and while he is pondering what he will say I will go further and make this suggestion. I should like to see more soya beans grown in the hon. gentleman's delightful county with a view to helping out this situation. I hope he will refer to that question when he speaks.

For generations flax was used only in the industrial trade in connection with paint and linoleum. That was all it was used for, except that the oil cake from it, constituting 66 per cent—that is to say, of 100 pounds of flax pressed, 66 pounds of cake are produced along with 34 pounds of oil cake—was used as foodstuffs for horses and cattle. But the oil itself is the product we are interested in, and that is the reason why the minister has passed the order in council setting the price at $2.25 a bushel. The product itself previously did not find its way into edible channels; but Russia, far in advance of Canada on this hemisphere, in the handling of this product, has been for the last three or four years and now is putting the major portion of its production of linseed oil into edible channels. It can be done, though it is a difficult process. As a matter of fact, you can take almost any oil—including castor oil—and put it into edible channels. In the case of castor oil, the usual effects from the oil can be offset if it is properly refined and hydrogenated, and you would get the food value from it. The danger with linseed oil is the same as with castor oil, but that is just by the way. Linseed oil can be used as an edible base for shortenings, making up the deficiency of animal fat and oil requirements for the Canadian people.

Whether or not it is economic is beside the point. We have an emergency on, and economics disappear a little when you do not have what you must have in order to sustain the Canadian people. But that will readjust itself in due course. Flax at $2.25 a bushel would not be economic if we were discussing the matter of turning it into an edible product and putting it on the market. It would not be economic in the ordinary sense of that term, but during the war the product ought to find its way into these channels. It certainly would not be economic to put it into the soap kettle, because in the first place its saponification value is low—193—whereas the saponification value of coconut oil is 245; in other words, 245 pounds of linseed oil are necessary to make the same amount of soap as would be produced from 193 pounds of the other commodity. The result is that the economics are away out of balance.

Prior to the war coconut oil was half the price of linseed and therefore it was much more out of balance. Nevertheless, we have an emergency on, as I say, and this emergency accounts for at least 25 per cent of the consumption of these products in Canada. Not only is that the condition, but there is not much hope of supplementing the supply which we previously imported. Even last year we were fortunate. During 1941 we brought in, to be exact, 190,578,000 pounds of vegetable oils largely from those countries now controlled by Japan, and I congratulate the administration upon having allowed that great quantity to come in. But from these same areas, during 1942, we shall get scarcely any. Presently I shall recite the places from which these products came.

I am supporting this part of the legislation which has to do with the production of more flax. The other misapprehension under which the minister appeared to be labouring when discussing the matter was that the flax perhaps was coming from Japan or the Pacific. As a matter of fact, the world's flax production to-day is in the hands of the Argentine. In the last year for which we have any record, 1937, 1,857,000 tons were produced by the Argentine for export, and the only other supply of any consequence was from the British Indies, 220,000 tons. Therefore the Argentine and this western hemisphere are self-sufficient as far as flax is concerned.

Coming to the individual countries which make up the western hemisphere, we are very far from being self-sufficient, and we must approach this task immediately to get more flax production. Last year, Canada produced 6,500,000 bushels of flax. Our milling capacity has been allowed to go to seed—or perhaps the proper expression would be to go to rust—since 1920. It may be quite true that to-day the milling capacity for handling flax is at the limit, as the minister said last night in his remarks; but that can be expanded. They are only working six days of the week, and other pressing or auxiliary equipment is lying idle in other parts of Canada. Perhaps I might say to my soya bean friends that expellers and presses are to-day idle. There are no soya beans to work on. To some of my friends from British Columbia, I would say this with regard to the expellers in Vancouver, to take care of the copra pressing activities there. I congratulate not only the people in British Columbia but this government and the men who had enterprise enough to put money into that industry to produce a supply of coconut oil in that province, but their supply of copra, since the war situation has become so serious, is crippled and partly shut off. They have their own steamers running from British Honduras bringing a certain quantity of supplies. They have chartered their own vessels, but whether the shipping board is allowing them to use those vessels I am not sure. The point is that the expellers at present idle in the great copra plant in British Columbia can very readily be turned over to the production of linseed oil from flax.

Time is the essence of these things, but we must take time by the forelock if we are to get results. Therefore I am going to suggest that first we encourage our Canadian farmers to grow every possible acre of flax this year. Do not be satisfied with production of a miserable 6,500,000 bushels; I hope we shall have a production of from fifteen to twenty million bushels this year. I am going to enlarge on why I hope that will be done. This is partly economics. The minister will agree that the mills which are handling the flax are paying $1.64 a bushel as the ceiling price for the product. This is subject to correction, when I have a chance to review what the minister has had the full advantage of, but some of the rest of us have not, namely the report, concerning the Saskatchewan farm delegation which on February 2 and 3 made some requests with regard to flax. Someone else will have to deal with this because I have had a chance only to glance at it—and I say we should have had a chance to see it as soon as it was printed.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not yet had a chance to read it myself.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to let me have the floor without interruption.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member should not make statements of that kind.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): When I proposed to ask a question which I thought would even help the minister I was amazed to find that an experienced parliamentarian such as the Minister of Agriculture would not give way and give me the floor—

Mr. GARDINER: I gave you the floor last night.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): With a certain Napoleonic stare he remained on his feet and I was not given an opportunity to help the general situation which he was discussing. Therefore to-day I ask him to keep his seat until I have finished.

Mr. GARDINER: I just wanted to say that I have not yet read that report myself.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I have not had the advantage of reading it, but I can see a double merit in increasing the production of flax this year. Suppose our mills are able to handle only four or five or six million bushels and we produce twenty million and we pay the farmers $2.25 a bushel, we have an export market open to us in the United States which to-day is riding at $2.46 a bushel, a difference of twenty-one cents. That twenty-one cents on an extra five or ten million bushels which we might produce in Canada would go a long way to make up the differential between the ceiling price of $1.64 which now obtains at the Canadian mills and the $2.25 which the government is setting as the ceiling price. Therefore, as far as that is concerned I will waive all the ideas that I have had in days gone by in regard to socialistic legislation if I am satisfied with this legislation, namely the pegging of the price at $2.25 which is something like twenty-one cents on the average or 10 per cent more than the average price which obtained in 1926 to 1929. In regard to this commodity I waive my objection to paying higher than the average price in order that more of the product will be produced in Canada.

The minister was also good enough to suggest that other ways and means might be found to help out the production of oils and fats in this country. Putting a floor under oats and barley and paying a bonus of $2 ought to bring about an increase in the production of oats and barley. If it does not, I should like to see the administration come along with some other legislation which would further stimulate the production of oats and barley. The reason why I want that is that it will find its way into live stock, and live stock will find its way into the production of oils and fats and butter products, fats of a kind that people in this northern hemisphere should be consuming rather than the other kind.

Before developing that section of the argument let me call attention to the condition which obtained prior to 1941. This has been put on the record many times in different ways, even though last year I was scolded a little by one of the ministers who had charge of this department for putting it on each and every year. Let me give a few figures taken from the review of oil and fat markets, F. H. N. Faure & Company, of London, England, showing the position our democracies find themselves in by reason of the loss of these Pacific countries to the axis powers.

In 1937 the world received from the Philippine islands, Java, Macassar and the other Dutch East Indies 945,000 tons of these commodities. In the same year the democracies mostly and the rest of the world received, largely from the same countries, including some from west Africa, 322,000 tons. In the same year the world received palm oil from Sumatra, which is now out of the trade, to the extent of 196,000 tons; Malaya and the west coast of Africa, 244,000 tons.

Then in the matter of peanuts and ground nuts the production is tremendous. Shipments from India alone were 849,200 tons, apart from that which came from China, amounting to 44,641 tons, and from some other Pacific coast countries.

That gives some conception of the magnitude of this trade. It emphasizes the position that Canada is in when I say that, in my opinion, unless the large quantities now in tanks and stored and in bond in Canada help us over 1942, by 1943 we shall be short at least 200,000,000 pounds. That shortage consists largely of palm oil; secondly, peanut oil and, thirdly, coconut oil. The importation of palm oil in 1941 was 70,000,000 pounds; of peanut oil, 23,000,000 pounds, and of coconut oil, 31,000,000 pounds for soap, 17,000,000 pounds for refining and 22,000,000 pounds for crude. In 1943 we shall be without that product. Therefore it is necessary that everything possible be done in 1942 to get ready to meet that situation.

We now come to cottonseed oil. The United States will need their cottonseed oil to supplement their own supply, and even though we imported last year double what we imported in 1939, namely, 22,431,000 pounds, we shall have to import a good deal more. There is one other source from which we can get cottonseed oil, namely Egypt and the Soudan, and it is to be hoped that that channel will be open to us, but it is a rather precarious guess whether we shall be able to get cottonseed oil from Egypt to help make up our supply.

So, visualizing the difficult position we are in I am going to make one or two suggestions as to what might be done, apart from supporting this legislation.

The natural place for Canada to get its supply is from its own production. In my opinion we must increase in every possible way the production of butter in Canada, otherwise our Canadian population is not going to have enough fat to maintain not to say their high standard of living but their strong physique and the reputation they now enjoy of being strong men of the north. If we do not get butter we shall not be strong; we must get it. If helping with the growing of coarse grains is going to produce butter, then by all means let us have more coarse grains.

What applies with regard to butter applies equally with regard to another natural product I have in mind. We must produce more lard. The shortage of lard is really going to be very severe. How can we meet that shortage? In my opinion the Wiltshire bacon business has had one drawback in Canada's national economy. Perhaps for the benefit of the newer members of the house I might be pardoned if I were to say that the opinion I have expressed is based on some experience. When in 1921, I first had the privilege of coming to the House of Commons, the men on my farm were feeding over 1,000 hogs, and we sent over 4,000 thousand hogs a year to the Buffalo and Toronto markets. That was my chief line of endeavour, and main line of business—and I have often wished that I had not left pigs for politics. However, when I express my opinion it is based on experience which, although a little old-fashioned, will do no harm. Coarse grains fed to hogs after they pass the Wiltshire weights produce more pounds per day per hog than at any other time during the hog's existence.

Mr. WOOD: But it takes more feed.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Yes, it takes more feed. We are paying the bonus to produce more feed, so that when we produce more feed we shall produce more pork; and producing more pork we shall produce more lard; and producing more lard we are producing more pork of a kind and quality which will keep this country in a better position.

Mr. CRERAR: An interesting sequence.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It is easier to put it on the pig which has passed the 150-pound mark than at any other time.

I can quite understand the situation which has developed. It was brought about, in days gone by, through Danish bacon competition. We permitted ourselves to bring the weight of our hog from 240 pounds down to 220 pounds, and then we streamlined them and brought them down below 220 pounds. I believe we have now brought them down to about 190 pounds.

But I can remember the day—yes, even before the first great war—when the most money was made by farmers in Ontario out of feeding hogs up to 280 pounds. Many a car it has been my privilege to take to the Buffalo market, and sell at 280 pounds. I am speaking about the days back in 1910, 1911 and 1912. I agree that perhaps at the present time that is not sound practice, but I state the fact only to show how we have brought the weight of the hog down from 280 pounds to a little more than 180 pounds. Each time we brought in legislation of a kind which streamlined the hog we cut down the production of lard. Each time we exported our Wiltshires to the United Kingdom we cut down the production of lard in Canada.

If the ratio of hog production is going to find its way to the market on a basis of 20 per cent for home consumption and 80 per cent for the export market, then I say that on that product which is offered for home consumption and is marketed by the farmers in Canada we should permit marketing at heavier weights than obtain at present, or than are required for Wiltshire sides. Take off the penalties placed on heavy hogs, so that they may be used to produce more lard.

I would go into conference with those in Canada who are charged with the responsibility of producing Wiltshire sides to see if we could not convince them to raise their restrictions with respect to the streamlining of hogs. I would ask them to be a little more generous with us in the supply for the home market, in order that we in turn may feed more coarse grains and develop the hog industry back from the place it is now reaching, so that it may attain a more sensible basis.

Why do I say this? I say it because the people of Canada are going to be short of fats for their own consumption. If any hon. member is sufficiently interested in the subject I would ask him to refer to page 555 of the evidence given before committee No. 2 on war expenditures on August 13 last, and take special note of the evidence given by Mr. Bedard with respect to exhibit 34. He pointed out that at the present time 20 per cent of the pork products being consumed by the Canadian people was leaving the point of production in a condition which was quite easy to handle. It was leaving in the dressed carcase state. It was brought to the butcher shop or the point of subdivision, and prepared for consumption in a most wasteful and extravagant manner. That is to say, 20 per cent of hog products which are used for home consumption reached the distributors, and in the process of preparation to be placed on the individual's table they were wasted to the *n*th degree.

This evidence is all on record, and any members of committee No. 2 on war expenditures who had the privilege of being in Toronto last civic holiday will recall that it was shown that forty-two pounds out of each one hundred pounds of pork should, in the interests of national economy, never have left the abattoir or packing plant. The forty-two per cent should have been left there and used by the plant for edible purposes. The whole one hundred pounds should not have been shipped, thereby bringing about a condition whereby forty-two per cent could not be used economically.

Again addressing myself to the problem before us, namely that of feeding more coarse grains to produce more pork and, second, the production of more fats and oils to supply our Canadian people, may I point out that it requires 34,000 hogs to feed 100,000 persons a year. If the recommendation of August 13 last with respect to the saving of ten pounds of fat per hog were put into effect, there would be a saving of 340,000 pounds on the basis of feeding 100,000 men. So there is one saving in connection with the feeding of our armed forces, the subject the committee had under review. I must say, however, that I am hesitant about interfering in any way with the rationing of the armed forces. It is difficult enough now to keep them all satisfied. They are chafing at the bit in Britain, as we know; and they are chafing at the bit here. Give them everything that is coming to them, or that is produced in the diet of Canada, and let us have more legislation which will curtail wasteful handling of these products by the consuming civilian public. By doing so we shall meet two or three objectives.

If we recognize that, as I have pointed out, in the feeding of 100,000 men about a third of a million pounds of fat could be saved, it is then only a matter of mathematics to see that we have here the possibility of picking up 40,000,000 or 50,000,000 pounds of that shortage we had previously formed the extravagant habit of supplying from the Pacific area, now dominated by Japan.

What obtains with regard to pork also obtains in even greater degree to beef. The same observations I make concerning the use of pork in the armed forces I make with regard to beef. Give the boys in uniform everything that they want, all the choice cuts they want in order to keep up their morale, but bring the Canadian population in civilian life to a sense of the position that we are in. The minister referred last night to some of the more expensive cuts. We should just see to it that the civilian population are curtailed in their consumption of expensive cuts, and one place to start is right here in the matter of supplying of beef in carcase to the butcher shops or to individuals who have the responsibility of cutting it up for consumption among civilians.

On the basis of 100,000 men in the armed forces, it is figured that at least twenty-five pounds of beef fat per carcase could be saved in edible form. This would amount to 1,250,000 pounds a year. However, not all this quantity would go into the edible channel; we are not sure that all of that portion does go into the edible channel in spite of the fact that our salvage people are trying to do the best possible job.

[Mr. Harris (Danforth).]

In conclusion, I urge that every possible acre be put to flax. We should try to produce 20,000,000 bushels of flax this year. I urge that the pressers of Canada be asked to increase their pressing equipment and the production of linseed oil. I urge that the national research council see to it that as much work as possible is done in connection with the refining of this product and hydrogenation so that more oil may find its place on the market to help ovecome the shortages we are going to experience in 1943. I urge that consideration be given to the recommendations to be found in the exhibit to which I made reference. I urge members of this house to study one of the most vital problems that is going to affect our Canadian economy during the next two or three years and get our house in order.

I have not a great deal to say about soya beans because I imagine the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Desmond) perhaps know more about this product that the rest of us. But in case they say nothing about it, I do hope that something definite is done to increase the production of soya beans in this country. Apart from the economics themselves, the thoughts that run through my mind have to do with the emergency.

Last but not least, perhaps the most important of all, let us produce more butter. Let us get the churn going on the back verandah and see to it that more dairy butter is produced. We should not have a haphazard guess that we are producing a hundred million pounds a year; we should know that we are producing that amount of dairy butter. Let our farms be self-sufficient in the production of their own butter rather than going to the creameries. I am ready to support legislation of any kind which will help us in a sensible and practical way out of the difficult position in which we find ourselves.

Mr. S. M. CLARK (Essex South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) made reference to soya beans. I had not intended to say anything about this product, which happens to be raised in part of the district I have the honour to represent, but perhaps a few remarks would be in order.

The island of Pelee, the most southerly island in Canada, raised about 125,000 bushels of soya beans last year. This particular crop seems to be well adapted to that island and it has been quite satisfactory from the financial point of view. We are having difficulty with the ceilings which have been placed on crops grown in that part of the country. There may be an opportunity to increase tremendously the acreage of this crop in the counties of Essex, Kent and Lambton, but this will depend somewhat upon any ceiling that may be applied to this particular product.

My main purpose in taking part in this debate was to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). He tried to paint a picture of rural conditions in Ontario, but I find I must disagree with him to some extent. At the outset I want to say that neither the rural districts nor the members from Ontario are antagonistic to the welfare or well-being of the people of western Canada. We may disagree with certain policies put forth by the government; we may disagree with the way in which they are applied and the extent to which they go, but we are really interested in their problems and hope that they will appreciate ours.

Last night the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said that the Canadian wheat farmer received more for his wheat than the United States farmer. The hon. member for Rosthern hoped that the western Canadian farmer would be treated as well as the farmer on the other side of the line.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The United States farmer gets $1.16 per bushel.

Mr. CLARK: I should like to give some comparisons. In my district thousands of farmers raise burley tobacco. I should like to quote some of the prices received. We are forced to operate under ceilings, not floors. The average price paid for United States burley tobacco, of which millions and millions of pounds are raised, was $29.50 per hundred pounds. The average price received in Canada was $14.50, just fifty per cent of the United States price. According to the statement of the Minister of Agriculture it would appear that the wheat farmer is not being treated too badly as compared to the Ontario farmer.

In the years 1938, 1939 and 1940 the average base price for this kind of tobacco was 12½ cents per pound. This was increased this year three-quarters of a cent per pound. A ceiling has been placed on the manufactured product and on raw leaf sales by brokers, so that we are now at a standstill so far as increases for burley tobacco are concerned. This increase is just six per cent. The farmers in western Ontario must compete with industrial labour which is receiving from 75 cents to $1.25 per hour, and our labour costs for this coming year will be 100 per cent greater. Under the ceiling limit, we are receiving only six per cent more than we received on the average in 1938, 1939 and 1940. What is happening in this district is that the tobacco growers are leaving their farms to take jobs in industry. Thank goodness there are some industries to which they can go. They are working in industry and their farms will no doubt lie idle.

I should like to make another comparison. We have a sugar beet industry in western Ontario. We have factories which have been operating for some twenty years, and under the present price scale only ten per cent of the contracts have been signed. So that the prospects are that two factories will lie idle during this coming year. Contrast that with the wheat situation. Every table in Canada is affected by the shortage of sugar. We have a large surplus of wheat, and I am glad of that, but we are now going to pay the wheat growers another bonus of $56,000,000. The prospect for increasing the production of sugar is not very good. I will admit that the Minister of Finance made a gesture in that regard, but it is not enough, and as I said before, with a ceiling on sugar and a shortage of sugar in Canada, two sugar factories in Canada will likely lie idle this year. That is one spot, one section of land, that could be used for the production of soya beans, and there may be some acreage of the burley tobacco growers available to put into soya beans if the ceiling does not put them altogether out of business. The ceilings have put the farmer of Ontario in a position where he cannot operate, and therefore it is difficult for me to go back and ask that same farmer to contribute to a bonus to the western wheat grower to the amount of $56,000,000.

I could deal with other crops in Ontario. Take the bean situation. The British government, I believe, have agreed to take so many thousand tons of beans; but in what way has this deal been consummated? It is left to the British government and the dealer to work out the price that will be paid to the farmer. It may be only 50 cents a bushel. These, Mr. Speaker, are the conditions under which the Ontario farmer is working at the present time.

Take potatoes. We all know that a ceiling has been put on potatoes. If I remember rightly, last year the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) spoke at some length of the position of the potato growers in his province. We have no floor for any of the products we produce in Ontario, but we do have ceilings, and they are putting us in a pretty bad position. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) in his address on Monday last said something about ceilings. I shall quote what he said at page 1135 of Hansard of March 9:

> Ceiling prices were set for the purpose of preventing sudden rises throughout the country, and inflation; and I think we all admit that it was a proper thing to do. But when these prices were frozen proper regard was not had for the relation between the price of one commodity and the price of another.

I entirely agree with that statement. Further on he said:

> There has been no ceiling price set on wheat, which I think is a perfectly proper position for the government to take at this time.

Again he said:

> As a western representative I must say this, that I will not accept, nor will the people of western Canada accept, any economy for western Canada based on 90-cent wheat at Fort William, or anything near that figure, for the duration of the war.

I believe at another point in his address he mentioned $2.21 as the price paid for wheat in the last war. I think he has discussed that at different times in different addresses. Compare that with the position of our farmers in Ontario. We are tied up with a ceiling and no increases at all. Our labour costs are going up; there is no ceiling on labour for our farmers of Ontario. The Minister of Agriculture last night hoped, and perhaps intimated, that in another year things might be better for the marketing of wheat; that, at all events prices might be expected to go up after the war. That is the prospect for the wheat grower; but the Ontario farmer is tied up with ceilings which make it impossible for him to make a profit and in some cases impossible to operate at all. The wheat grower has no ceiling. He has a floor, and the price of wheat will no doubt go on up. I may say to the minister that the sugar interests in this country and perhaps the tobacco interests might be able to pay their share of the bonus for western wheat. More of the spread between the retail price and the price that is paid to the farmer for sugar and tobacco should go to the farmer. If the minister feels that that is the situation, I suggest that he immediately start a sweeping investigation so that we shall know whether we are absorbing more of the ceiling than we should.

In our district, tobacco and tomatoes have been two of the war's casualties. We receive no assistance from consolidated revenue fund, and if there is too much tobacco produced, we have to reduce our acreage. The largest tomato processing plant in the British empire is located in my riding, but it has been running at only a fraction of its capacity because its product is not able to get into Great Britain. I believe that this year more of their products will find their way to Great Britain, which will make quite a difference to the growers in that district.

These are the conditions under which the farmers in my district are working. Price ceilings are putting them in a position where they cannot possibly go on. I have raised tobacco for twenty-three years but I could not possibly go to my banker this year and say: My labour costs will be up 100 per cent, and my increase in price has been over six per cent over the last three years; I am tied up with a ceiling. It means just one thing, Mr. Speaker; I have to quit raising tobacco. That is the position we are in, and I hope that the member for Rosthern, in painting his picture of agriculture, will appreciate that we have some problems too in Ontario.

I should like to mention another thing which is thrown up at me quite often by the people of my district. There are dozens of farmers in my district who have five or ten or fifteen acres of land; I suppose the average sized farm in my district is fifty acres. They say: "My goodness, have we got to contribute to a bonus to a man who farms 1,000 acres, or 1,500 or 4,000 acres?" These are some of the problems, Mr. Speaker, which I want to place before the western members. They are problems we have to face when we go back to our constituents.

There should be a change in the ceilings on different commodities in this country. Each change, I know, has to be worked out carefully, but I think it would receive the support of the people of this country. My constituents, who are in the difficulties I have mentioned through price ceilings, and who really need some assistance, would perhaps be prepared to say to the Minister of Agriculture, after reading the statement of the Prime Minister yesterday about Hong Kong: We need some financial help, but use the money instead to buy bombers and fighters and tanks to defeat the enemy. Perhaps those two trainloads of farmers who came from western Canada—I had the privilege of talking to a number of them; they are real Canadians—will be inclined to say, after reading the statement about Hong Kong, "Take that $56,000,000 and buy fighters and bombers and tanks." I hope so.

In conclusion, I would just say that the Minister of Agriculture has a pretty tough job. He has been trying to meet in the best possible way the problems which arise all over this country. I have disagreed with him on a number of occasions, but I still think he is the best man for the job, and he should have our support.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few remarks to make, and perhaps I would not have said anything but for some of the statements made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) last evening.

Before proceeding to deal with his address I want to comment briefly on statements made by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) as reported in Hansard, page 1182. The hon. member, apparently, has farmed the farmers of the west long enough, and is now preparing for that "old man's home." I wish him a lot of happiness there, but I also want to contradict his statement in connection with the wheat pool, which was referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for Melfort. The wheat pools, as was pointed out by the hon. member, are a cooperative organization and as such distribute their earnings among the members of their organization.

With regard to the question of wheat, before going any further let me make my position quite clear. On various occasions, in addressing meetings in my own constituency, I have told my people that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has a tough job; so has the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). I think that they, as well as other hon. members, including myself, realize that they are in a minority in the cabinet and that most of their colleagues are not disposed to support them in an attitude which is favourable to western agriculture. I have on all occasions at my meetings placed the case of the government and of agriculture fairly before the people, and then I have taken my directions from the people who sent me here. I feel that nothing fairer than that can be done; and if I did smile a little last evening when the minister was trying to put over a set of figures in connection with the price of wheat, I believe I was not the only one who did so; although those who are bearing the expense of the policy have no reason to smile, because it is costing them quite a lot of money.

> Being of that conviction, I believe that, before this war is over, wheat will be in exactly the same position as flax has arrived at during these past twelve months. I do not know whether it will be during 1942; I do not know whether it will be during 1943; but I am as convinced as I am that I am standing on the floor of this house to-night, that at some time before the end of the war every bushel of wheat that is grown in Canada between now and the end of the war will be required to feed the people in Europe and in some other parts of the world.

I have no doubt at all about that. I believe the minister is quite correct. The one thing to which I take objection is that people will have to go on growing wheat for far less than the cost of production, just because they are assured that at some time, sooner or later, that wheat will be needed. If we take an overworked horse this past fall and say, "Now, horsie, you live on till next summer and there will be lots of green grass", and give him nothing to eat until that time, that horse won't survive the winter. In the same way, unless farmers get a better deal they cannot go through this period in the condition they should be.

The minister went on, to say a little later, at page 1206:

> There are a number of these letters, and everyone of them says in effect: "We would like to have $1 a bushel for wheat, but if giving us $1 a bushel for wheat is going to lessen the amount which has been paid to us under acreage payments during the past two or three years, then we would prefer that you retain the acreage payments."

The hon. member for Wood Mountain and the hon, member for Maple Creek (Mr. Evans) expressed the same opinion in the house yesterday and to-day. Some other hon. members spoke to the same effect, but the two whom I have mentioned were speaking for their own particular parts of the province of Saskatchewan, where, apparently, very little crop is grown; and a better price for wheat where no grain, or very little grain, is grown, does not matter much compared with the benefits which the farmers derive from the bonuses as they are set out at the present time.

The minister went on to give us particulars in connection with municipality No. 8, south of Weyburn. In that municipality the average yield is ten to eleven bushels per acre. Under wheat acreage reduction they received $37,592; as prairie farm assistance bonus, $8,986; prairie farm income, $23,779, and they are yet to receive some $7,800 under the wheat acreage reduction regulations. In that particular municipality they marketed 234,000 bushels, for which they received about fifty cents a bushel, or $117,000. I figured that out, and it comes to approximately 83 cents per bushel, including the bonuses. That is as near as you can get to the upper edge of a district where they can receive the bonus—ten to eleven bushels per acre.

Mr. GARDINER: That is 83 cents at the farm.

Mr. FAIR: The report does not say that it is at the farm.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, it is at the farm.

Mr. FAIR: The minister then referred to municipality No. 135. There the payments under wheat acreage reduction amounted to $91,000; payments under prairie farm assistance were $160,996, and the prairie farm income payments were $47,000, making a total of $298,996. In this case they averaged 1·2 bushels per acre, which, provided there were no weeds or other trash would be just about sufficient for seed. So that in this case an amount of approximately $300,000 is charged up against payments of wheat where not one single bushel of wheat was delivered.

In my argument on Monday evening, I insisted that the fact that an amount equivalent to 90 cents a bushel has been paid out is no indication whatever that the average farmer growing wheat receives anything like 90 cents. In this case, if you had a surplus of one bushel you could place an amount of approximately $300,000 against that one bushel which is grown in all that territory.

Or let us take the case of another municipality which averaged 14 bushels per acre. In the past fifteen years wheat has averaged 14·3 bushels per acre. In that case they would get approximately fifty cents per bushel. But where they averaged ten to eleven bushels, as I said, in the first case, they would get the prairie farm assistance bonus. If, however, they cut down their wheat acreage they would get a certain amount under that bonus which would increase the price to some extent; then again they would get the prairie farm assistance income. In a municipality such as No. 8, where practically no grain is grown, the price might be set at $300,000 per bushel.

That would prove conclusively that the average farmer does not receive approximately 90 cents to $1 a bushel for his wheat. I was criticized for bringing up some of the points made by Mr. Evans, administrator of the AAA, when he spoke at the Chateau, but I do not feel that I did anything wrong at that time because I think it would be a good thing if the government could get a lead. I do not care where it comes from, whether from the United States or from any other country. Go to Russia, if you like, and take that system if you can get results, because that is what we are concerned about. When in my opinion there were good points in Mr. Evans' address I considered I was jusitfied in bringing them to the attention of the minister, because I thought they would be helpful. The minister, at page 1209 of Hansard, says:

> I have only one further statement to make. Suggestions have been made continuously since this war began that we ought to do what they are doing in some other country. Only last night we had all this reviewed again and we were told that we should have an AAA in this country. We were told that we should be doing some of the things that they have been doing in the United States. I would suggest that since 1938 the United States have been trying to get their wheat acreage down. Between 1930 and 1938 they increased their wheat acreage from 66 million acres to 81 million acres, and then they evolved a policy. That policy at the present time is simply this: When a man cuts down his acreage to the extent that the government say he ought to, they will lend him 98 cents a bushel on his wheat. They have made loans covering considerable amounts which I have in the records here. But if he does not cut down his acreage in accordance with their request, they will lend him only 49 cents on his wheat. In other words, in the United States they lend a man twice as much on his wheat if he obeys the request of the government than if he does not. It is true that this has tended to set a floor under wheat of 98 cents a bushel in the United States provided the farmer does what the government ask him to do.

The minister made the point that between 1930 and 1938 they increased their wheat acreage from 66,000,000 acres to 81,000,000 acres. That is a very good showing, and at the present time they are paying a price which is far higher than we are getting here, although we are trying to cut down our production. After all, the main reason why farmers are growing wheat is to get a living and, if they can, to make a little profit on that which they grow. In the United States they have grown more wheat and at the present time they are receiving a far better price than we are getting. And the minister says that it is not coming from the government, that the wheat is sold there for food purposes, some of it being kept in storage. At present we are receiving approximately fifty cents at the farm.

Mr. GARDINER: Before my hon. friend leaves that point I wonder if he would allow me to make a correction in a statement I made last night. I did not have the figures before me. I made this statement:

> There is not as great a difference between the two as some would indicate, but we got a greater wheat acreage reduction in one year, I believe, speaking from memory, than the United States government got in all the years they have been operating their policy.

I should have said that we got a greater proportionate wheat acreage reduction, and I should like to put the actual figures on the record along with what has just now been said. The United States acreage in 1937 was 81,000,000, and in 1938, 79,000,000. They have reduced their acreage down to 63·5 millions, and that is all actually seeded acreage. Their harvested acreage was 69·9 millions, or practically 70 millions, in 1938, and their harvested acreage last year was 54 millions. So that the word which I should have used last night was "proportionate", in order to conform with what I said in the last sentence, namely:

They started with 81,000,000 acres and we started with 28,000,000 acres.

That will make the statement correct.

Mr. FAIR: Going further, the minister said, at page 1210:

That being the case, I should like to suggest to hon. members that I think it would be much better if we all went out and told the people what we are doing in Canada instead of telling them what they are doing in the United States. Despite what they are doing in the United States, the farmers of Canada have really been getting more for their wheat than the farmers in the Argentine and Australia. Of course, there are reasons for that.

I do not see any reason in the world why we should be compared with the farmers in Australia or in the Argentine. Looking at prices, I find that they are getting a far better deal because they are getting a far better price, and their exchange must be taken into consideration. In the United States, I would point out, $1.17 or whatever they get there will buy much more than the same amount will buy here, because we have tariffs to contend with, which are built up for somebody else's benefit and at our expense. I wonder why he did not compare us with the Chinese who live on rice instead of taking Australia and the Argentine. As regards talking about what they are doing in the United States, I have on different occasions quoted prices that are paid by other countries to the farmers, but I brought the United States policy to the attention of the minister in order to have him take it into consideration. I do not want him or anybody else to get the impression that I am trying to destroy Canada for the benefit of the United States. Canada is my country, our country. We get our living here and it is up to us to do everything possible to build up our agricultural policy and give everyone what is coming to him. The minister says, as reported at page 1211:

We only had one persistent delegation this year asking for something more, namely, the wheat delegation, and they came only because they are the only farmers in Canada whose problems have not been grappled with successfully down to the present time. But just as soon as conditions under which we are labouring, with a world war on, are such as to make it possible the problems of the wheat farmer will also be dealt with to his satisfaction.

On more than one occasion I have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as well as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), say that anything that is physically possible will be made financially possible. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and the Minister of Agriculture will admit that we are not receiving a parity price for wheat. The minister tried to justify that stand last night because the producers of beef and pork, cheese and some other commodities were getting above parity. In order to justify that he brought in a little table in connection with the price of round steak, rib roast and so on. But I would point out to him that the farmer does not benefit from this because there is a great and unjustified spread between the price paid to the farmer and the price charged the consumer at the butcher shop. So that the figures given on page 1204 do not build up the case which the minister is trying to make. Referring to certain letters from the province of Saskatchewan, he says at page 1211:

These are from Saskatchewan farmers telling us to stay with the job—get food over to Britain —"and we will struggle along. If you have to assist us," they say, "assist us with acreage payments, and if after that you can give us something more for our wheat we shall be pleased to have it."

I have pointed out on different occasions that we have here two distinct problems rather than one. A policy that is good and will satisfy the growers in the country where they produce a few bushels on so many thousand acres is no good for those in other parts where they get more than twelve bushels to the acre. In the part where they get around twelve bushels we have to have a higher price per bushel, otherwise we cannot revive.

An hon. MEMBER: Survive.

Mr. FAIR: Yes, but I say "revive" because a great many farmers have come to the point where they have to revive before they can go on and take their proper place again.

In regard to the hon. member who sought to make some play upon my name of "Fair" I will just say that that is the name given to me, and having been given that name I am no more responsible for being a farmer and living under that name than is the hon. gentleman who is named "Gardiner" for being Minister of Agriculture. Perhaps, if the minister's name had been "farmer", he would have a very tough time to get through unless occupying the position of Minister of Agriculture and farming the farmer instead of farming the land. About the best thing he does in this house is to smile.

I have on different occasions, whenever the opportunity presented itself, risen in my place here to state the needs of the farmers and business men who sent me here. I have done it as truthfully as I am able. I have lived in the west almost thirty years, got my living mainly on a farm, except the times when I have had to go out and do other work to keep the sheriff from taking my farm and home away from me. I do not think I should be accused of doing something of which I am not guilty.

Mr. GARDINER: I meant it as a compliment.

Mr. FAIR: Yes, I took it that way; I thank you.

The minister continued, as reported on page 1211:

I would say to him that any member of the house who carries back into western Canada the government's policy in relation to wheat and its policy in relation to other farm products can stand before any audience and explain to the people there that this is the best that can be done under the conditions with which we are confronted in the Dominion of Canada to-day, and the best that has been done in an attempt to settle their problems at any time. We are taking every last dollar out of the treasury of Canada to deal with these problems which we feel it is safe to take at this present time.

I again suggest and recommend to the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce—who is always happy and smiling, I am glad to say; I expect he gets that smile from the bright Alberta sunshine where he has lived so long—the statement of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Finance that whatever is physically possible must be made financially possible. Why should the grain growers of Canada be expected to produce at below cost while manufacturers, labour, banks, industrial institutions of practically every kind, are getting fat on the profits of this war? Is there any justice in it? Can the government claim that they are playing fair with the farmers of western Canada? I say no. I have gone out and told my constituents that they are not getting a square deal; I do not deny that, and I intend to go back and tell them still that we are not getting that to which we are entitled, and to keep on fighting until we do get a square deal. That is my programme; I do not deny it, and I think if other hon. members would do the same thing we might have a little more success than in the past.

We have an institution, the Bank of Canada, for which the Prime Minister got a great many votes in 1935. That institution could perform for the government of Canada services that are now being rendered by the chartered banks, for part of which they averaged twelve per cent in 1941. Therefore I say there is no reason why a parity price or cost of production should not be guaranteed to the farmers of Canada. I am not speaking for the farmers of western Canada alone, because I realize that farmers in other parts are also in difficulties, but I say there is no reason why farmers all over Canada should not have at least parity price or cost of production.

On motion of Mr. McNevin the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 12, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

RIGHT HON. RAOUL DANDURAND

TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF THE LATE LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT IN THE SENATE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members are aware, shortly after sundown last night the life of the Right Honourable Raoul Dandurand, leader of the government in the Senate, came to its earthly close. Less than twenty-four hours before, Senator Dandurand had been present in the Senate conducting its proceedings, as he had been wont to do in all but five of the last twenty years. Of the Senate itself, he had been a member for forty-four years. In years of service, he was, in fact, its oldest member. Indeed, in years of continuous service, he was the oldest living member of the parliament of Canada.

On November the 4th of last year Senator Dandurand celebrated his eightieth birthday anniversary. Some weeks later, when parliament had reassembled, this anniversary was made the occasion of a presentation ceremony in the Senate, at which felicitations on his long and distinguished career were extended to him on the part of leaders and members of both houses of parliament.

Despite his great age, the Senator possessed a remarkable vitality of body and mind. He had suffered no infirmity in the course of his life. In the early morning of yesterday he felt as well as ever. At breakfast he experienced a sudden seizure of pain, which, however, did not last for long, but left him very weak. He rested throughout the day, at times conversing with his accustomed keenness of expression, with those at his side. The end came peacefully. One might truly say it was a fitting, indeed a beautiful close to a long, a great and a good life. Having sat in the Senate since the closing years of the last century, Senator Dandurand was in himself a link with the past —with the earlier political life of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and of those others who have laboured to establish firmly the foundations of our nationhood. Like Sir Wilfrid, he strove, in public and private life alike, to promote understanding and cooperation between the two great races of the dominion, and on this basis to preserve and strengthen the bonds of a common nationality.

Although his own career, and many of the traditions with which it came to be identified, had its origin in an earlier generation, Senator Dandurand did not live in the past. He took a keen and active interest in the questions alike of peace and of war. To the deliberations of the war committee of the cabinet he brought a wide knowledge of international affairs, and a strong sense of practical reality. To the last, his life was characterized by a spirit of helpfulness. As a former Speaker of the Senate, as government leader in that chamber for many years and as a member of the administration, he gave exceptional service to Canada.

Senator Dandurand was first and foremost a citizen of Canada, but he was also, in larger measure, I believe, than any other Canadian of his generation, a citizen of the world. His deep and abiding affection for the people of his native province and of his native land did not preclude a kinship with mankind which so broadened his interests as to embrace other lands and other races. There will be those in many other countries, as well as throughout our own, who will deeply regret the passing of one whom they had come to regard as a personal friend and as a tireless worker on behalf of international goodwill.

For six years in succession, Senator Dandurand represented Canada at the assembly of the League of Nations, and in 1925 was elected president of the league assembly. During practically the whole three years that Canada was a member of the league council, he was a Canadian representative on the council. At the league he won for himself an enviable international reputation as an authority on social questions and as a champion of the rights of minorities. The record of his devoted labours at the league is a part of the history of international affairs.

It has been well said of Senator Dandurand that there was about him an innate distinction of manner, combined with a gentleness of spirit which made him one of the beloved as he was one of the most familiar figures in Canadian public life. He exemplified in his career the finest traditions of public service, and indeed helped, by precept and example, to add to them. His life and work may well serve as an inspiration to those of our own and of succeeding generations who seek to play a useful and honourable role in the administration of the affairs of our country.

Personally I cannot say how grateful I feel for all that the close association and friendship which I shared with Senator Dandurand has meant to me in the course of my public life. We had been friends over forty years. For fifteen of those years he and I shared responsibilities in the cabinet and leadership of the government, in the Senate and House of Commons respectively. During the still longer years I have had the responsibility of the leadership of the Liberal party, in opposition and in office, I doubt if I could possibly have begun to cope with many of the problems of one in that position without the wise counsel, guidance and loyal cooperation he so constantly and unswervingly accorded me. In all his personal and public relationships Senator Dandurand was fidelity itself.

Although his voice will be heard no more in the councils of the nations, in the hearts alike of his fellow-countrymen and of the friends of justice and peace in other lands, the memory will long endure of Senator Dandurand's continuous and untiring efforts to promote the common well-being of mankind.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this parliament and the people of Canada have been greatly shocked by the announcement of the sudden death of the Right Hon. Raoul Dandurand last evening. His death marks the passing from the political scene of one of Canada's best known public men.

Born fourscore years ago in the city of Montreal, where he made his home, received his education and practised his profession, he rose to be a national figure in the fields of finance and statesmanship.

The friend of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, he was, at the comparatively early age of thirty-seven, appointed to the Senate. There his qualifications marked him out for advancement and he soon became a commanding figure. In 1905 he was appointed Speaker, and in 1921, when my right hon. friend became Prime Minister, Senator Dandurand was made a member of the cabinet and the representative of the government in the Senate, which position he occupied until 1930, and again in 1935 until the time of his death.

His achievements in the realm of international politics are well known, particularly in relation to the League of Nations, of which he was a warm supporter. He occupied, respectively, the position of a Canadian delegate to the League of Nations, President of the Assembly and, later on, a delegate to the council of the league, a reputation which no Canadian since Sir Robert Borden has surpassed.

Contemplating in retrospect the life and career of Senator Dandurand, one cannot help but be impressed by the realization of what a full and happy life he had. Even prior to his appointment to the Senate, he had played a leading part in the public life of his native province; and during the forty-four years he was a member of the Senate, no one took a more important and active part in the deliberations of that body.

In July last he received the highest honour at present in the right of Canadians to receive—membership in His Majesty's Imperial Privy Council.

My own relations with him were friendly. I often met him in Ottawa and on the trains. He was an engaging personality and a first-rate raconteur. Many times I have enjoyed my conversations with him.

He was a vigorous champion of his own opinions and of the aspirations of his compatriots.

His passing leaves a very distinct blank in the government of the country. I desire to extend to my right hon. friend and to his followers my sincere expressions of sympathy and regret.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we join in mourning to-day the passing of one whose life was both useful and full. That Senator Dandurand was what we seldom see in our own dominion—and what we hope we may see more of in the years to come—a Canadian statesman with an international outlook, was recognized not only in our own country but in other countries of the world. He received distinguished honours at the hands of the people not only of Canada, but of France, from whose culture he derived so much inspiration. I shall always associate the late Senator Dandurand with the noble efforts that were made following the last great war to secure world peace. He was faithful to the ideals of collective security—sometimes called a noble experiment which failed; but I believe the day will yet come when upon the foundations laid by him and others like him will be erected a structure which will not fall and will not fail.

I did not know Senator Dandurand well, but I often used to see him in the corridors and the picture which I shall carry in my mind as long as I remain in these associations is of a noble and friendly figure standing beside the throne in the Senate chamber, and bringing to my mind the words of Geoffrey Chaucer, "he was a verray parfit gentil knight."

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, naturally when one passes who has filled for so many years so large a place in the public eye as Senator Dandurand, the first reaction is one of shock and regret. But I believe that in the contemplation of this man's life and of his passing most people will feel that he has been blessed in his going hence as he had been in his living here. He has had a long, rich and abundant life, full of activity, full of striving for the ideals which guided him; a life crowned with a large measure of success. I do not know how anyone could ask of life anything finer. Now that he has closed that life without pain, without regret, I think there is cause for satisfaction and comfort.

We join with those who will extend sympathy to the bereaved ones, for no matter how far advanced one may be in years, when he passes there will be an empty place at the fireside and there will be hearts that are lonely because he is no longer here. To these we extend our sympathy and condolences.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Outrement) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to represent the electoral division of Outremont, where the government leader in the Senate resided. He often did me the honour of calling me his member. He was the most illustrious of my constituents.

The death of the Right Honourable Senator Raoul Dandurand, a member of His Majesty's Privy Council, Minister of State, dean of the Senate and government leader in the Upper House, is mourned by all Canada and particularly by the province of Quebec. Over eighty years of age and suffering for some time from an illness which was undermining his robust constitution, Mr. Dandurand could have looked forward to the enjoyment of a well-earned rest.

In the face of the daily worsening situation, following the example of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and of the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, whose valiant comrade in arms he had been, he remained at his post and in the service of his country to the very end.

In the late Senator Dandurand Canada has lost one of her foremost statesmen; Quebec, an illustrious son who was an honour to her in all circumstances and who had the signal privilege of becoming president of the League of Nations; the French Canadians, an able leader and intrepid defender; the Liberal party, a wise and courageous adviser; the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, a distinguished dean, a faithful friend, a great and generous soul.

We who for the past quarter of a century have been associated with him in the public life of Canada will ever miss his noble presence and eloquent voice.

There remains for us to imitate his virtues. His career is a shining example of what can be accomplished by us and for us, French Canadians, when native ability is supplemented by personal effort, study, uprightness and the conscientious performance of the given task.

May our young men learn from him to improve with age, never to let obstacles discourage them, to develop their natural gifts by ceaseless effort, to cherish high ideals and ever strive to attain them. May they learn that, while the lower rungs of the ladder are overcrowded in every sphere, there is always room at the top for men of ability.

May they take from him lessons of wisdom, level-headedness and understanding; may they imitate him in his unshakeable faith in the glorious destinies which Providence holds in store for the Canadian nation.

Inspired by his noble example, let us stand up to our daily tasks; let us strive to break the bonds of mediocrity, and to shake ourselves free of mental sluggishness. We will then find strength to endure all trials, to overcome all obstacles, to persevere until final victory.

Thus will we honour, as he would wish us to, the memory of this great Canadian.

CANADIAN ARMY

AMENDMENT OF SPECIAL REGULATIONS—PROVISIONS RESPECTING LEAVE AND POSTPONEMENT OF TRAINING

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table order in council P.C. 1916, which contains several amendments to the reserve army (special) regulations. There are amendments respecting clothing allowance, notification of change of address, and penalties for failure to report: that has to do with men called up for training under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

Several hon. members have asked with regard to the regulations, which I mentioned in Hansard at page 818, whereby we are endeavouring to secure a more uniform method of administering provisions for leave or postponement by utilizing, even though men have commenced their training, the boards which have been appointed under the Department of National War Services. An amendment to that effect is embodied in this order in council which I am laying on the table.

In order that the house may have a general outline of the provision, it is this. Applications may be made by men who are in training under the National Resources Mobilization Act for leave at any time within three months after enlistment or after the commencement of training, and those applications may be granted under circumstances similar to those under which a man would have been granted postponement of training had he applied before his training commenced; or, as the order in council provides, leave may be granted where the circumstances show extreme hardship to dependents. The procedure is that the man who is already in training applies to his commanding officer, giving the grounds of his application, which should be verified by affidavit or by statutory declaration. The commanding officer forwards this material with his own recommendation to the district officer commanding—that is necessary in order that they may get in touch with the board—and the district officer commanding transmits that material to the board with any recommendation he has to make. The board then review the application just as they would review an application for postponement if made previous to training, and the provision in the order in council is that the district officer commanding shall give effect to the recommendation of the board, with one exception. That is to say, he has no discretion to turn down the recommendation of the board unless at that particular time the military situation is such that the exigencies require that leave be curtailed or refused; in that case he may refer the matter to national defence headquarters. Hon. members will understand, of course, that that is under special circumstances, but the general provision is that the recommendation of the board is to be accepted by the district officer commanding.

While that procedure is, under the order in council, permissive, instructions are being issued by the Department of National Defence that that is the procedure which shall be followed.

There is also a provision in the amendment whereby the boards are given specific authority to hear these cases. Another provision is to the effect that boards are given authority to hear any other cases or classes of cases which are specially referred to them by the adjutant general. That applies not only to men in training, but to the Canadian army home defence or the Canadian active army—either one.

I believe that this outline will give hon. members who have been asking about this matter the necessary information. The order in council is tabled so that hon. members may get full particulars if they desire.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I take it that this applies only to those who are called up under the compulsory training plan and not to men who have voluntarily enlisted. A case came to my attention this morning of a woman in my own constituency who has four sons. One is in the army overseas, another is in the navy, a third is working on home defence, and the fourth son, she tells me, has been called up for the air force. I do not understand that; he must have enlisted voluntarily. But she pleads with me to do something to get her fourth and last son out of the armed forces. I have written her explaining what I understand to be the position. I suppose this amendment will not apply in a case of that kind.

Mr. RALSTON: No. This does not apply to the air force. The general provision to which I have just referred may, however, apply to the Canadian active army or to the home defence army. That is to say, there is power in the order in council for the adjutant general to refer those cases to the board. The order in council does not provide that they must be referred to the board. As the order in council stands the only cases which are specifically provided for, in connection with which the board's decision is to be taken, are cases where men are called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act and are actually in training.

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What was the total amount subscribed in the 1942 victory loan?
2. What were the expenses in connection with floating the loan for, (a) advertising; (b) commissions; (c) other items?
3. How many subscribers were there, and what were the totals subscribed for each of the following groups, (a) less than $1,000; (b) $1,001 to $10,000; (c) $10,001 to $20,000; (d) $20,001 to $50,000; (e) $50,001 to $100,000; (f) over $100,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would ask the hon. member to be good enough to consent to this question being dropped. The information will not be available for several weeks at least and perhaps for a longer period than that. When it is available the breakdown into categories will not correspond with the breakdown contained in clause 3 of the question. If it were made an order for return it would not serve any purpose because the information available up to the time the order for return is passed is the only information that goes into the return. I think therefore the only course left is to drop the question for the time being.

Question dropped.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

STATEMENT OF MR. SPEAKER WITH RESPECT TO QUESTIONS ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct two questions to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), based upon a translation of an article appearing in Le Droit, published in the city of Ottawa on the ninth instant in a column of comments entitled "From day to day". As the minister is away, and as there is no hurry about it, I shall ask that the matter be taken as a notice. The comments in principle are such that with the permission of the house I will read them.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not like to interrupt the leader of the opposition, but I gather from the statement he is about to read that it will take the form of a question which would call for consideration by the minister before it can be answered, and therefore it would fall within the category of such questions as I have already ruled should properly be placed upon the order paper. I suggest to the leader of the opposition that he put the question on the order paper.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I sent notice of this question to the minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I interrupt to say that I did observe on a former occasion that when questions were asked, and the purport of the question had been sent to the minister, the minister came prepared to give an answer, and this in effect simply accentuated a practice which I have ruled is improper. As I said yesterday, if a question is improperly asked on the orders of the day it is just as improper for the minister to answer it. If we are to adhere to the rule, all these questions which are not of immediate interest and which do not require an immediate answer should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I bow to your ruling, of course, Mr. Speaker, but I had not even come to the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I gathered, however, from the form which the question was about to take that it was one that should certainly be put on the order paper.

PLEBISCITE ACT

INQUIRY AS TO SPECIAL GASOLINE CARDS FOR RETURNING OFFICERS AND OTHER OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I wish to ask a question of the Secretary of State. Owing to the fact that most of the returning officers for the plebiscite, and their assistants, will have to travel many hundreds of miles in their automobiles to make arrangements for polling booths, et cetera, will special gasoline cards be secured for these men to carry on this work?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I am afraid I shall have to make inquiries and in the meantime regard the question as a notice. So far as I know, the oil controller has not given special consideration to the matter. However, I will inquire and advise the hon. member.

CANADIAN ARMY

UTILIZATION OF CAMP GROUNDS AT NIAGARA-ON-THE-LAKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, with due deference to your desire to limit questions that may be asked on the orders of the day, may I ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Raltson), in the light of the increasing development and activity in the construction of army quarters in other parts, whether he will be good enough to inquire into the lack of use of the camp grounds at Niagara-on-the-Lake, and see whether it could not be utilized to a greater extent.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is another question of the kind that should be put on the order paper.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASED RATE PER BUSHEL ON WHEAT DELIVERED BY PRODUCERS

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West) for the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Douglas (Weyburn).

Mr. BRUCE McNEVIN (Victoria, Ont.): The subject matter of these three bills, commonly referred to as the wheat bills, similar in character, now constitutes an item that must receive attention yearly in this chamber. They represent something of great magnitude in the civil and commercial life of the country, apart from war, perhaps greater than any other question within that category.

The first bill to which I wish to refer is that introduced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), Bill No. 13, the amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act. The only point in that bill that is of importance is the abolition of the 70-cent price and the substitution therefor of 90 cents. When this question was under discussion a year ago I very strongly urged upon the government an increase in the price of wheat, and with the increase from 70 cents to 90 cents I may say at once that I am in full accord.

I think we all recognize and recognized a year ago that 70 cents is a very low price for wheat. I do not think it is necessary to discuss that question at great length. I realize that there has been a demand for dollar wheat, but we all know that the world situation affecting wheat is at present most difficult, and I assume that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has taken that into consideration in relation to his recommendation of a price of 90 cents.

With regard to the wheat acreage reduction bill, this item a year ago was dealt with through the supplementary estimates. At that time I think I raised the point that it should have been dealt with by a bill; therefore I congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) upon the method of dealing with the matter this year.

Before proceeding to discuss the various items to which this bill relates I wish to make a few general remarks covering some other matters of importance in the work and production of Canada. One item has already been referred to, industrial wages, from the point of view that industrial wages had risen more rapidly and to a higher point than had the farmers' income. I believe that is true to a great extent in the more central and highly industrialized centres. When you go out into the more remote districts I think you will find in the factories producing munitions and war materials and the materials for civilian consumption that the wage rates are fair and good, but not exorbitant. In fact I can go a step further and say that under present conditions, particularly in the province in which I live, they compare perhaps favourably with the returns to agriculture. Of course there is no question that those industrial wages are high enough to attract labour away from the farms, and this creates a situation which I am sure is receiving careful consideration by the government. Later this session I may have something further to say on that point.

The next item to which I wish to refer is lumber. Lumber is an important commodity in the riding I represent. The timber controller's office informs me that since the outbreak of the war in September, 1939, of the lumber that enters into the construction of homes and such buildings, what might be described as rough lumber, white pine has increased in price 15 per cent, spruce 16 per cent and hemlock about 20 per cent So that you have an average increase of approximately 17 per cent in the price of lumber since the beginning of the war. Now, that is not a very heavy increase. We had a very heavy production of lumber in 1940 and again in 1941, but it is possible that without some further increase the production might not be as heavy later on, because labour for lumbering operations is becoming scarcer and higher wages are demanded.

The next item to which I wish to refer was mentioned by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly), that is, the rate of interest paid by the government for the money borrowed to carry on the war. I learn from the Department of Finance that since the outbreak of the war there has been lent to the Dominion of Canada in the form of war savings stamps and certificates and bonds, not including conversions but new money, the sum of $2,300 million at approximately 3 per cent. If you compare the interest rate paid during the last war, which averaged perhaps 5½ per cent, you will find there has been a saving in annual interest, on that huge sum, of about $51,000,000. We recognize, therefore, that those who lent their money to the government, and they represent all classes, are receiving a substantially reduced income from that source.

I wish to refer to index figures covering a number of major agricultural products of all the provinces of Canada, also the general level of manufactured products, in fact all products. Taking the 1926 level as 100, manufactured products for civilian consumption stand now at 93·2. If we take all products, agricultural and manufactured and all others, it stands at 92·2. Poultry and dairy products stand at 101·3; live stock products at 115·2. It is true—and this point has a direct bearing upon the whole discussion in which we are now engaged—that cereal products are indeed low in price, and perhaps on the same basis would come somewhere between 55 and 60. I should explain further that since these percentages were compiled we have had some increase in the price of cattle, in the price of lambs, a 3-cent bonus on eggs, and some additional payment to the whole milk and condensed milk producer; so that if the figures were brought up to date some of these indexes would register a reasonable increase.

The Minister of Agriculture has had something to do with the bonus for eggs and the bonus for milk, cheese, et cetera, and in that regard I think he deserves a word of commendation. There has also been an increase in the price of cheese. I believe the situation of the Ontario farmer is now reasonably satisfactory. I have not always agreed with everything brought before the house by the Minister of Agriculture, and I might add that perhaps this bonus system is not the best and soundest system. Nevertheless under present conditions it apparently represents the only instrument by means of which these matters can be successfully dealt with. I believe from the standpoint of an Ontario farmer I can state truthfully to the Minister of Agriculture that they have been fairly dealt with.

Perhaps the 20-cent increase in the price of wheat is not sufficient, but it is a substantial increase in price. I wish to make a comparison between the situation of agriculture in Ontario and in the western provinces. I find in the "Canada Year Book" for 1941 a statement showing investments in agriculture in the various provinces of Canada. These investments are listed under three headings, namely lands and buildings, live stock, and implements and machinery. The figures are found at page 154, and they relate to the year 1939. I do not believe that any major or radical change has taken place from that time up to the present. I find in this list that Alberta has invested under those three headings the sum of $599,000,000, Saskatchewan $841,000,000, Manitoba $329,000,000 and Ontario $1,408,000,000.

If we have the gross income of agriculture in all the provinces we can arrive at what should be a fair estimate of the gross return per $100 unit throughout the various provinces, to indicate whether or not the farmers in one part of Canada are enjoying greater prosperity than are those in some other part. It is difficult to secure accurate figures respecting income, but we have estimates. I assume that as between the various provinces those estimates are fairly representative of the established and true situation.

I find that from the gross sales of agricultural products Alberta received, in round figures, $150,000,000 in 1941. A few days ago the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) gave for Saskatchewan the figure of $180,000,000. The figure for Manitoba in the estimate prepared by the bureau of statistics stands at $80,000,000, and we have in Ontario an estimated income of $285,000,000. We received in Ontario cheese bonuses during the last year amounting to $4,500,000. We have provincial hog bonuses in Ontario and Quebec, but they do not run into very much money. I will add to the $285,000,000 gross income of Ontario farmers the sum of $5,000,000 for the cheese bonus, and I believe in allowing that amount there will be some to spare.

The minister told us the other day that in the western provinces about $60,000,000 was to be divided among the farmers as payments under the wheat acreage reduction plan, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the Prairie Farm Income order in council. I understand that that sum will probably be divided as follows: Saskatchewan, $35,000,000; Alberta, $15,000,000 and Manitoba, $10,000,000. So that if we take the $150,000,000 gross income for Alberta and add this $15,000,000 we have a figure of $165,000,000. If we divide that $165,000,000 into the $599,000,000 of gross total investment we have $27.75 per unit of $100 invested. In each case of course that represents the sum out of which the farmer must pay his interest charges, his taxes, his threshing expenses, his living expenses and other costs incidental to the operation of his farm. If there were anything left I suppose it would come under the heading of profit. It would seem that there should be a column for profit and loss, because I assume in all provinces we do occasionally run into grievous losses.

I now come to Saskatchewan, with its estimated income of $180,000,000. If we add the $35,000,000 for the payments to which I have referred we have the figure of $215,000,000. As I said a moment ago, in that province invested capital stands at $841,000,000. Computing that on the basis I have indicated we find that the income per unit runs to about $25.30. We come to Manitoba with a capital investment in agriculture of $329,000,000 and an income of $80,000,000. Then there is the $10,000,000 for bonus payments which must be added, making a total of $90,000,000. If we work that out we find that it comes to approximately $27.50.

Coming to Ontario, with its gross income of $290,000,000, and a capital investment of $1,408,000,000, a computation on the same basis indicates a return of $20.50. There is another point I suggest should receive some consideration, because I realize that interest charges in western Canada are substantially higher than they are in the east. But we have in Ontario certain set expenses which are higher than they are in the west. In order to produce crops in western Canada in 1941, 10,000 tons of fertilizer were used. That fertilizer cost approximately $55 a ton, making a total expenditure of $550,000. The cost of fertilizer in the west is high because of the excessive freight charges. The fertilizer used has a higher content of potash, nitrogen, et cetera, and less filler. This is done to save freight. The farmers of Ontario consumed 126,000 tons of fertilizer which cost approximately $32 a ton. Therefore they spent a little over $4,000,000 to purchase fertilizer to produce the crops that they have for sale.

Another important item is taxation. Again I shall give round figures, but I have the totals in every instance. In Alberta there are quite a few local districts where they collect school taxes, but I got my figures from the bureau of statistics and I am including all taxes, school and otherwise. In some of the western provinces there are provincial improvement plans, but I have also included those. I shall give the taxation of the rural municipalities in the west and the organized townships in the east in order to give a fairly clear picture of the situation. In Alberta approximately $7,500,000 is paid in rural taxation. In Saskatchewan the total is approximately $11,500,000, and in Manitoba, approximately $5,000,000. But the total of rural taxation in Ontario is approximately $26,500,000.

I am not presenting these figures with any desire of minimizing the responsibilities or the difficulties or the problems of the farmers of western Canada. I have every sympathy with them in their troubles, but I give these figures to show that we have pressing problems in Ontario. If you will take the total receipts and divide them by the number of farmers engaged in agriculture, you will find that the gross income does not differ to any extent as between provinces. I have the figures here, but I do not want to tire the house with too many. Figuring on that basis there is probably a difference of not more than $100 in the average income of the farmer as between provinces. Of course, there are large units in the west where no doubt the carrying charges are high, but in Ontario we are faced with high municipal taxation and a high fertilizer cost. In addition, in order to produce these crops, we brought in—perhaps the Minister of Agriculture could give this information better than I—during the year 1941 from western Canada many millions of dollars' worth of western grain. That had to be paid for out of our income in order to make this production possible. I think we must have a broad viewpoint of the whole agricultural situation throughout the country.

Referring to the wheat acreage reduction bill, a year ago I took strong objection to the payment of a bonus for coarse grains, and I cannot say that my objection to that principle has lessened. I believe that it created an inequality in the production of live stock. It is said that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump, and up to a certain point the freight assistance provided in the year 1941 was of major assistance to the Ontario farmer. But I do not believe he will reap as much benefit from this in 1942 as he did in 1941 because the price of western grain will be higher. We brought in considerable wheat last year and because of a very insistent demand for Ontario wheat, we could exchange our wheat at the elevator for western wheat and make twenty cents on the exchange. Of course that is something that I do not think anything can control, because western wheat does not suit that particular market and that is why the situation prevailed. This condition will not prevail with western wheat at 90 cents should Ontario harvest a reasonably good crop. I hope that that situation prevails in all the provinces. The Minister of Agriculture has been criticized, sometimes severely, throughout western Canada—

Mr. HOMUTH: How about the east?

Mr. McNEVIN: Probably in the east too; more last year than this year. I think the bulk of this criticism has arisen from the fact that the minister has had to deal with these problems at a time when they were more difficult than ever before. When I look at the wheat acreage reduction bill, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the prairie farm income order in council I cannot help but think that the Minister of Agriculture has devised means and developed ideas to give assistance to the farmers of the western provinces, and in some instances as well to the farmers in the east, to a degree never equalled by any of his predecessors. I doubt if it has been equalled by anyone in a similar position in any of the food exporting countries of the world.

The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) referred to the number of telephones, electrical and running water installations in the homes of western Canada, and I think he referred also to the number of automobiles owned. It is true that there are a greater number of farms in Ontario with these conveniences, but it should be remembered that this part of the country has been settled longer. The district from which I come was settled in the late twenties and the thirties of the nineteenth century. I see by the reports that at the outbreak of the great war about 10,000,000 acres were under cultivation in western Canada, or put into wheat. If we go back to the beginning of the twentieth century, the development would be much smaller. Therefore, this point must not be forgotten, that there was a civilization approximately seventy years old when settlement started in the west. Naturally these services will develop and grow. I would like to see every farm in every province in Canada with the conveniences of electricity, telephones and running water, as well as automobiles. There is no class of people under the sun who are more entitled to or have greater need for these conveniences than those who live and work on the land.

There may be a reason for the attitude taken by the western farmer that his problems are greater than those of the farmers in any other part of Canada. I do not believe there is an agricultural section of Canada in which the land was more easily acquired than it was in the western provinces. There were homesteads, preemptions, cheap lands. Remember, I am not minimizing the problems in any part of the country. The farmers had many problems in the province of Ontario, and the same thing applies to the west. I believe also that the land in the west was recovered from nature and turned into production with less effort than the land in any of the older provinces of Canada. That may not apply to some of the northern and eastern districts of the west, but it does apply particularly to that triangle to which the Minister of Agriculture referred, bounded by a line running from Morden to Lloydminster, from there down to Calgary and on to the United States boundary. That land was brought into cultivation with a minimum of effort as compared with the effort required in many of the other provinces. The farms out there are large, and in common with all the agricultural districts of this dominion, the farmers of the west have enjoyed periods of prosperity and good times. Each agricultural area in Canada has had its heyday. I think it will be agreed that western Canada had its heyday. And during that heyday land in the western provinces blossomed forth in the production of bountiful wealth to a greater extent than in any other part of Canada. I threshed in western Canada for several years; I have seen the golden grain piled on the prairies, and the farmers were getting a good price for it at that time. I regret the difficulties that came later when farmers in some parts of the west suffered from drought and when the farmer's equity diminished and in some cases disappeared.

The reason I cite these facts is that I believe that the conditions I describe have left an imprint and had an effect upon the mentality of the people of western Canada. And now when their farm income is just about on a par, sometimes a little better, with that obtained in the other provinces, they are not used to being cramped to the same extent as farmers in many other parts of the country.

I think it was the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) who said that the wheat grower had made a noble and most important contribution to the war effort. I agree absolutely. I would be the last to detract in the slightest degree from their accomplishments because they are doing a great work and making a splendid contribution. In one of the galleries of this House of Commons since the session opened on January 21, a western farmer and his wife have sat during many sittings. I have talked to this man. He is a splendid fellow. I have heard western people say that they grow the finest wheat in the world. I would say that this fellow is as fine a fellow as you could grow anywhere in the world. He comes from that wheat area where, as the Minister of Agriculture said, it is difficult to grow anything but wheat and what is his situation? He said to me: "I left my farm on the first day of December." It is not a power farm; his power is horses, and he said: "I locked the stable door." The important point to remember is that his horses were on the outside of the stable, not on the inside, when he locked the door, and they went out on the prairies to hunt their living for the winter. "I am worried about them," he said. "There is not much snow, and I am anxious lest they be short of water. I am going to be back there on the first of April, and I hope they will be all right."

In the case of the dairy farmer—not in Ontario alone but in all the provinces of Canada—who produces cheese, milk, butter, hogs and cattle, what is called the mixed farmer, the door, mark you, is not shut and latched with his stock outside. The stock are all inside, where they must be watered and fed and tended, and not just on one day in the week or in one month out of five, but seven days a week and every week throughout the entire winter. I ask that this be borne in mind. The wheat farmer has made a great contribution to the war effort, but I believe that the mixed farmer is making perhaps a greater contribution to the war effort. I recall those famous words of Churchill about blood and toil and tears; certainly the mixed farmer knows what sweat and toil is, and if you are going to use that as the yardstick to measure their war effort, you will have to give a place alongside the wheat farmer to the mixed farmers throughout the length and breadth of this dominion.

There has been a request—I will put it that way—from the other side of the house and from here and down there to my left for a better understanding of the problems of the western farmers, and Ontario was mentioned particularly when hon. gentlemen from the west were speaking. I think we must have a better understanding, if it is possible to get it, but I hope it will be a mutual understanding, that we shall understand the problems of the west better, and that likewise the farmers of the west will understand our problems better. I do not think we have many differences of importance. I think our differences are minute and imaginary. Our objectives are similar. Our interests may differ in some respects but we have much in common. I would say first that as farmers we should perhaps be a little better satisfied with our lot. I say to the farmers from the east and to the farmers from the west, let us go forward together jointly and unitedly, in our common task of feeding our armed forces and our civilian population, and assisting to feed the armed forces and civilian populations of other parts of the empire and, whenever and wherever the opportunity offers, of our gallant allies, to the end that we may attain ultimate triumph and victory for our cause and bring about a just and honourable peace to this distracted and distorted and war-ravaged world.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): The motion for the second reading of Bills 12, 13 and 14, and the amendment moved by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), deal with the most important domestic matters to come before parliament this session. Thus far the speeches made by those who have taken part in the debate have revealed a wide knowledge of world conditions, and of the situation of Canadian agriculture—which, with other natural resources, forms the principal basis of our wealth.

The country affected by this legislation was opened up largely after the northwest rebellion of 1885, which occurred not so far from the constituency which you, Mr. Speaker, represented for many years so ably and faithfully. It was at this time that the attention of the civilized world was called to the great prairie country, the potential granary of the empire. It appealed to the fancy and imagination of the whole civilized world. This wonderful new land of promise and opportunity showed it would be one of the glories of the Victorian era. Militia units from Toronto, including the Queen's Own, the Royal Grenadiers and the Governor General's Bodyguard, the battalion commanded by our late admired magistrate Colonel George T. Denison, the York Rangers and soldiers from Halifax and Winnipeg, constituted this force. Many of them marched across lake Superior in the depth of winter, twenty to thirty degrees below zero, and endured the terrible hardships of winter in order to save that great country from secession and prevent Canada from being dislocated. After the war, numbers of these men received a small grant of land which they never saw, and many went west with their families into the territory which is now the three prairie provinces, aided only by the small grants which they then obtained. There was afterwards a heavy migration to the prairies from Ontario and Toronto.

I believe in a principle for confederation of "each for all and all for each." What is for the benefit of the prairie provinces is for the benefit of Ontario, the maritimes, and the great Pacific province. But let me remind hon. gentlemen that the winning of the war is the first and most important business of Canada. While we have many great domestic problems, including this one of agriculture, nothing will matter if we do not win the war, because if the enemy wins there will be no such thing as a price; everybody will be working as a slave for an alien government, and life will not be worth living.

The discussion on this subject lasted last year about three weeks, and it is instructive to notice where the demand for a policy of parity prices in war time comes from. You will find that those who, in this house and out of it, for many years past have argued that the interests of the great grain growing industry lay north and south instead of east and west and required free trade with all the world, have now veered around and, instead of preaching free trade from the housetops on the prairies, are adopting methods of triple protection and supporting the principle of protection for this, Canada's greatest industry.

In the government's present policy, embodied in the wheat measures now before the house—it is not a long-term policy—it is not yet clear what they propose to do for wheat growers in the present year and what they propose to do in the years to come are two different things. The prairies alone are in on it. The other provinces will benefit by it but little. I have long contended that it is the desire of every good citizen to see agriculture put on the road to recovery, but this means a long range policy in the interests of all the provinces, to be put into effect before it is too late. After all is said and done, when the war is over there will be such a general wreckage in Canada and the world that it will be difficult to salvage anything. I believe that long before that time comes we shall require all the increased production which has been spoken of. But the ships are not available; we have lost the command of the sea in the Pacific; and it is difficult to see where we shall get the supply of labour or the ships or transportation necessary to take care of the crops and of our export trade.

I notice that the government, in connection with these bills, is not proposing to take a plebiscite on this particular question. Most of the plebiscite supporters are not in the chamber to-day. May I remark that the committee of agriculture is going to have a big proposition on its hands. However, I have never yet known any committee appointed by the government which did not do exactly what the government wanted them to do. They are a majority and write the report. They may function to delay, hinder and prevent the solution of this question. But it is the government that is responsible for the state of agriculture to-day and for a solution of any ills in it in all Canada.

In my opinion the government in the past has worn a coat of many colours in relation to the grain growing industry. The bill is said to deal with an emergency, and the legislation is under the War Measures Act in pursuance of the provision for "peace, order and good government". But if it is a war-time measure, why in the name of sense are those men who are getting $1.30 a day, about the price of a bushel of wheat, not to be considered, as man-power is an industry. If any of us served at the front and faced death twenty-four hours a day, we would be less inclined to give first place to material things like the price of grain and forget ourselves and dependents. Are soldiers who go away to fight for us not entitled to some economic protection, as well as grain growers? The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck), part of whose riding I used to represent, objected the other day when I was about to speak on this matter on Bill No. 5, saying it was not within the four corners of the rule to discuss the question then at issue and the necessity of some protection and security for those who are employers of labour in industry which surely needs it. He was objecting to any proposals of mine for such security for industry as I read it in Hansard. Now I may say that in connection with this matter an emergency is declared for some and not for others; there is one economy for agriculture and another economy for the industrial worker and industrialist. Why should an emergency be declared for agriculture, and yet not for industrial workers, who are forty-five per cent of the population, or for soldiers, who are fighting a great fight at $1.30 a day in what are also war emergency conditions dangerous even unto death?

The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, passed by the late government, was another protective measure for the benefit of the grain growers and everybody on the prairies. That also was extended as an emergency act to fishermen. I contended at that time that, whether it was a war or peace economy, we should have included also the industrial worker under that protective statute.

In the past fifteen years I have repeatedly taken part in debates on wheat policies. It will be found by reference to Hansard that in 1924, 1925 and 1926 I called attention to the policy of our friends in Ontario, at a time when the council of agriculture from that province came to Ottawa, and Hon. Mr. Drury declared that the grain growing industry on the prairies was a free trade industry, that protection was an unmitigated evil that should be abolished and had ruined the grain growing industry on the prairies, and that they wanted free trade and the removal of the last vestige of the tariff and a north and south policy. Speaking on May 8, 1924, as reported in Hansard, I predicted that if their policy were carried out, and if, instead of sticking to our best customers and marketing our wheat in Britain and the allied countries, they adopted the free trade policy of hon. gentlemen opposite and of the prairie premiers, the price of wheat would go down to thirty-six cents a bushel, which it did in one critical year during the depression.

Mr. HOMUTH: They change their policy when it comes to wheat.

Mr. CHURCH: They were everything by fits and starts and nothing long. The policy I have proposed in this house has been a consistent policy. But here we have three measures of protection—the very thing which formerly hon. gentlemen opposite, members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and other groups which formerly sat on our left, so strongly opposed. I may say that I have been a consistent supporter of a protective policy all along the line for farmers. Agriculture, after all, has been traditionally associated with the Conservative party.

The policy of the Conservative party has always been to aid the farmers and our own work for our own workmen and our own markets for our own products; but hon. gentlemen opposite have made the great mistake of supposing that they could eliminate by a north and south policy the mother country, which is in reality our steadiest and best customer, and that wheat was an east and west policy to the markets of the world. The minister in 1938 and 1939 was going to propose a policy by which Canada would withdraw from the grain growing business altogether and get out of it—at least from the half-baked schemes he had then, and palliatives and other attempted cures. He came to adopt protection by means of bonuses, subventions, subsidies, stabilization funds and so on to aid the prairies.

The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) yesterday told us that on one occasion he was present at a meeting in Prince Albert in the Prime Minister's riding when the question was asked him why the government did not give western agriculture fair treatment. I admit that the Minister of Agriculture is a pleasing, hard-working, and, I am told, a very likable person. But what about the visit of the 400 grain-growers to Ottawa two or three weeks ago? Their motto was veni, vidi, vici. They came, they saw, and they conquered. Their slogan was, "On to Ottawa," to get the support of the Minister of Agriculture for an increase in wheat. Well, they did not come in vain, nor did they have to send home that laconic reply, "We regret to report" and so on. Oh, no; the trip was not in vain. Advance was the word. I read in some of the newspapers that the Prime Minister was member for his riding in Saskatchewan only by grace of that province and of the Minister of Agriculture. I do not say that it is true or not, but the soldiers who are only getting the price of a bushel of wheat pleaded in vain for something and did not get any relief for aid to their dependents. The 400 delegates a month ago were outside the hall; someone came out and said that the boys were getting impatient and that the ministers should not keep them waiting, and so the Prime Minister and all the rest went into the hall. I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, that the members of the government did not walk into the convention hall on stilts, because they practically announced that the application for more money and a shell-out was not going to be granted, although eight members from Saskatchewan, it was reported in the Globe and Mail, threatened to resign unless the request of the delegation was granted.

[Mr. Church.]

I contrast that with the form of protection that prevails in connection with another war emergency—man-power as revealed in soldiers at war. Different treatment is given in that case. The regiment of 400 who came here looking for more money for their wheat got it. The price was raised from 70 cents to 90 cents. But the only trouble about this proposal is this, what is the ability of a country at war to pay it? What is the use of all the money that is being spent, the high-priced methods, the big-stick, tighten-your-belts methods that are being put into force in connection with ceilings so far as civilians are concerned, by the wartime prices and trade board and the talk of chairman Gordon? If these three bills go through they will sound the death-knell of all ceilings, because the history of economics and world conditions shows quite clearly that ceilings, to be successful, must apply to every individual and every industry throughout the country fairly, equitably, and on a standard plan. Consider what was said about daily belt-tightening by the great Pooh-Bah of the administration, the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board in the press and over the radio, that board which has its offices spread all over the country, so that no small independent business man can conduct his affairs without being hampered by all sorts of artificial restraints of trade, burdens and barriers. What did that gentleman say? He said, when these three bills were announced, that the consumer would not be interfered with. Because he says so, does not make it so. He acted the part of "me too" to the Minister of Agriculture in trying to persuade the people that the consumer was not affected, that the manufactured products of wheat in bread and flour would not be touched or raised. But these products are affected, the consumer is affected; there is no use denying that. The consumer is affected directly, and pays more because it is the taxpayer, that is to say the consumer, who in the end must pay the taxes of all these increases and boards. That is true under all governments and under all economic laws. In my opinion Mr. Gordon has sounded the death-knell of ceilings in Canada by supporting these three bills, but he has also played the part of life-saver for the government of the day in an endeavour to make that policy more acceptable to the rest of the country, and all these handouts from the consolidated revenue fund.

But there is something else to be taken into consideration. You will have an increase in freight rates. There is an application before the transport commission for an increase. They were to sit in Toronto tomorrow but the meeting has been cancelled.

Consider, moreover, the effect it will have on economic values and on ceilings in Canada —because the railways are a law to themselves. According to a return I received last year, the Canadian Pacific Railway had made at the close of 1940 $2,750,000 and the Canadian National Railways $2,500,000 out of this war by way of increase in their receipts from this war more than they got in the last war from transport of soldiers, food, grain and munitions and supplies of various war industries across Canada. Why should we have ceilings now for some and not for others? Why should there be an increase in freight rates now? I do not know what the farmers will think about it. I know they will strongly oppose it with a handout to the railways.

I do not see the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) in his place to-day. He is an old friend of mine and the day before yesterday he made a splendid speech in which he set out three essential reasons for this particular pegging. In the first place, he said it was essential that the man who has wheat to sell should receive such a price as would assure him a respectable living. He said that the man with a wheat crop should get a price from the government that would make it possible for him to live decently. That is no doubt true. The second point he made was that the man who cultivates land and who, through an act of providence, receives no return for his labours should be given protection. I presume he means any act of God, such as drought, hail, climatic conditions and so on. His third point was this. He asked, what is the government going to do with the wheat when it is delivered, and where will they sell it or store it? How much will they pay for storage? These are matters that will be brought out, presumably.

I am opposed to the policy of restricting acreage, because in my opinion it is a great mistake in the present condition of the world to pay for idleness. In a short time you may not be able to find man-power to work the farms of Canada, because the average city man is little or no use on the farm. Any man brought up in the city is only in the way in farm work as a general rule. I suggest that the government should look into the question. In 1938 I urged that this government should establish food reservoirs in England, because I saw the war coming. In January, 1938, the British medical association met in London and it was pointed out then that this wonderful hard wheat and grain grown in the prairie provinces could be stored underground and above ground in reservoirs for ten years and, by reason of sanitary equipment and modern engineering, it would be almost as good at the end of that time as when it was put there. We should have got rid in 1938 of our yearly carryover to Britain.

That surplus should have been moved over there; if it had been it would have done untold good to the old land. A great deal of useful work has been done by the wartime prices and trade board in some ceilings, as I am free to admit, some of which has been most commendable, in protecting the workingman on the necessaries of life. But ceilings can be made effective only if they are of universal application to all callings including farm products. The trouble with the Department of Agriculture as I see it, and the wartime prices and trade board, is that they first get one or two key men from the civil service, not heads of the service. They pick them out all the way down to Nos. 4 and 5, and bring them into the department. Then they put a whole retinue behind them and they start issuing orders. Then they engage two or three professors. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) was quoting a professor, Professor Hope I think. Well, they may have professors "Faith, Hope and Charity, these three," in the agriculture department, but I have never yet known one professor who knew much about modern competitive business; they have had no actual business training in any competitive business. The Department of Finance and other departments are filled with them. During the last century, physics, chemistry and medicine have made great strides and are respected the world over because these sciences deal with facts proven. But these professors of economics who predict what will happen to the grain crop do not argue from facts; they have had no practical experience as dirt farmers. When they report their dicta and opinions to the government, it is always in the realm of doubt opinion, and not worth the paper it is written on as a practical demonstration of what should be done even in the Department of Agriculture.

The price ceiling no doubt in many lines has done a certain amount of good, but unless it is operated along the lines I have indicated as above it will be a failure in time. It cannot be done successfully under rules and regulations that exempt certain callings, as do these bills now under consideration, and railways and agriculture. A real movement against inflation must come from within as well as from without. The evidence taken in Washington the other day before a committee indicated that the best way to combat inflation and rising prices is by producing more, keeping down costs, and by a fiscal policy that will absorb the excess purchasing power flowing from the treasury. Direct results obtainable from price control are thus limited and precarious, and after the war may lead to economic disaster and ruination to thrift and all business and trade.

Canada must beware of the bureaucrats; we have too many of them; they interfere with business and agriculture and everything, and at the end of the war they will want to continue on forever. Wait till you see. They usurp the functions of parliament and do it over our heads and we have no control.

On the same day as the announcement of the minister the other day of the order in council increasing the minimum price from 70 to 90 cents, Mr. Gordon of the wartime prices and trade board announced in the press and over the radio that the consumer would be protected. But he is not and cannot be by talk and more advice to tighten belts. These ceilings are only equitable if you have a fair cost. It is the taxpayers, the consumers, who will pay for this bonus; it will come out of the consolidated revenue fund. There should be equality of treatment of agriculture in other provinces, but in Ontario and other provinces they do not get the help the prairies receive, although suffering as much.

The Prime Minister said in 1935 regarding industry that if the manufacturers took the position that with the aid they were getting from the government they could not afford to continue in business under the tariff, the government should step in and operate the plants themselves. Whether or not the government at that time had the right to take over and operate an industrial plant is not the question; to-day under the National Resources Mobilization Act it has the power. I contend that that should be applied to farmers as well. That war act gives the cabinet authority to require persons to place themselves, their services and their property at the disposal of his majesty's government to maintain supplies or services essential to the life of the community. In my opinion there is no difference between the government taking over and operating manufacturing plants and taking over and operating farms. In fact there is much greater reason for taking over farms to maintain the food supply of the nation, a matter of life and death to the civilian population. But so far there has been no proposal by the government to treat farm production in the same manner as the Prime Minister suggested for industrial production in 1935. Instead, there has been a bonus here, a subsidy there, a mark-up there and all kinds of subventions, yet the farmers are still leaving the land. If the government took over and operated the farms they would have a concrete demonstration and not the opinion of professors as to how far that policy proposed in 1935 can go. That was the opinion of a great newspaper. If they operated some of the farms that the farmers have said they cannot afford to continue to work it might be possible to make a scientific diagnosis of the whole situation; it might be found that some elements of collective farming could be applied to reduce costs and increase returns.

I wish to refer to the parity question, because that is a great issue in the United States to-day. The government would be well advised to look into it. Mr. Henderson has been appointed administrator at Washington. I refer now to the Monthly Review of the National City bank for February last, a bank which has very large real estate holdings in the farming areas and cities and towns of all Canada. The hon. member for Melfort said he believed that agriculture should receive the cost of production. He said there is a difference between cost of production and parity price, but agriculture is willing to accept cost of production to-day. An amendment was proposed last year by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn), seconded by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), reading as follows, as reported at page 1889 of Hansard of March 26, 1941:

> . . . that the government should take immediate steps to create a parity of prices as between agricultural and other products in order to improve the condition of Canadian agriculture and in order that it may receive a just and fair return, and thus be enabled to make that contribution to Canada's war effort which is so desirable, and which our agricultural population so greatly desire to make.

That question of parity was investigated at Washington and the National City bank review refers to the proceedings, pointing out that for many months the upward movement in prices had been led by farm products, and as far as Mr. Henderson's powers are concerned this rise can continue, for he is stopped from placing ceilings on farm products below the highest of certain points, namely, 110 per cent above par for parities on certain commodities of agriculture, that is, a ten per cent increase, parity being the term used to signify the same relation between farm prices and prices of things that farmers buy as existed in 1909-14; the Ocotber 1, 1941, price; the December 15, 1941, price; and the 1919-29 price average.

According to this formula there would be room for advances in a majority of farm commodities, ranging from about ten per cent in cotton to about forty per cent in corn, before ceilings could even be considered. Moreover, no ceilings can be established without Secretary of Agriculture Wickard's approval, and it should be understood that parity is not static, but moves up as prices of goods farmers buy move up. If these rise, permissible price ceilings also will rise. In the last paragraph reference is made to the veto power given to Secretary of Agriculture Wickard. Hon. members will understand that the secretary has that power. He urges them to be satisfied with parity, ten per cent above par. At the end we find this:

If the rise in farm prices is to be checked short of the permissible ceilings, the soundest way to do it is through increasing production and selling government stocks. Meanwhile the restrictions on farm ceilings constitute one of the two grave weaknesses of the act. The fact that "parity" prices rise with other prices makes the parity formula a perfect device for contributing to the inflationary spiral, and the rise to date in the cost of living, which has been more in food than in other items, is prompting labour to make fresh wage demands. The executive board of the congress of industrial organizations, meeting in New York on the 26th, called on all its affiliated unions to demand substantial wage increases whenever new agreements are negotiated with employers. The danger is that if these increases are granted they will raise prices, farm prices parities and permissible ceilings will also rise, the cost of living will advance, and the cycle will be repeated.

According to past experience direct price controls, to the extent permitted by the act, will not be able to deal effectively with an inflationary spiral. The act leaves the real burden upon the treasury and congress, which determine fiscal policy, and upon individuals. There is need for cooperation, restraint, economy, saving and production.

It will be seen at once that the United States secretary of agriculture there is in control. May I point out that in Canada, with the formation of all these bureaucratic boards which have been set up to regulate industry, trade and commerce, we are facing a staggering debt. No one can tell what they are costing, and if ceilings are applied to only fifty per cent of our war-time economy and war industries, and excluding agriculture and other callings, then I feel that a great mistake has been made, and I fear in the future for the economic safety of the state and its solvency. The ceilings are interfering not only with production and industry but with the proper solution of other industrial and economic problems, and I believe that after the war they will cause untold trouble.

The bill is now before the house for second reading, and I believe I can say truthfully that every citizen in Canada wishes to see agriculture established on a sound basis. There is a very warm feeling in Ontario toward the people of the prairie provinces who have suffered. But let me point out that I believe the farmer in Ontario has suffered nearly as much. Some of the industrial workers have found themselves in very hard circumstances, and I can say that in many cities of Canada some poor people have not had enough to keep body and soul together. The lot of those who suffer from priorities unemployment is a hard one, and they are out of work.

May I repeat what was said yesterday by the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark), that the ceiling prices which have been proposed for tobacco, sugar and other commodities and other crops in Ontario have not been a success. I plead for the old province of Ontario, because it seems to be the forgotten province in the dominion in direct aid to farmers and industry and industrial workers. The two industrial central provinces have suffered most heavily, and they are paying more in taxes and nearly 80 per cent of the cash taxes. I say there should be an agricultural policy in these three bills and not a political policy. The people of Ontario, however, are not going to object to the ceiling prices, if they will win the war. They are prepared to make any sacrifice whatever, no matter what the cost is or how drastic, so long as they know they are contributing to the war effort. They will stand for anything to win the war. I do say, however, that some of the orders in council have been drawn up by amateurs and theoretical or academic men, or men who have had no practical experience in any ordinary competitive business practice, and are forced over parliament's head on our employers and employees, and some of these orders in council will not amount to anything to help win the war.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) will pardon me if I do not attempt to follow him in his remarks this afternoon. We are now considering the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act. This amendment affects only two words, namely that the price shall be changed from seventy cents to ninety cents a bushel, and there is a reference to mills. After the bill receives second reading it will go to the committee on agriculture and, I have no doubt, at that time will receive further review. I am wondering how much time need be taken in consideration of the measure now, when other opportunities are provided for discussion.

In a few remarks I made some time ago in the house I concluded by saying that the people of Canada are prepared to undertake any task the government may set for them. All they ask in return is that the responsibilities and rewards for those tasks may be as equitable as possible. I believe that applies to the people of Canada generally, but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, it applies just as strongly among the farming population in Canada as it does among any other group. The farmers are prepared to do their part, and they ask only that they be assured of a reasonable degree of equity.

To my mind the government's programme recognizes the essentials of that degree of equity, and so far as possible there have been honest endeavours to meet it. After listening to the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a few days ago with reference to the unfortunate happenings at Hong Kong, and after seeing to-day's press dispatch from the minister of food supplies in Great Britain announcing that there will be no more white bread served in the old country after April 1, I am wondering whether our difficulties are, after all, so very serious.

Just at this point may I ask one other question—and of course I do not expect an answer. I do not know what the new policy in Great Britain will involve. I hope it does not mean there will be any less foodstuffs for the people over there. I believe, however, that it will mean a higher extraction from wheat, and as a result they may require less wheat from this country or elsewhere to feed their population. In the end it may mean that we have aimed too high in the amount of wheat we may be able to sell outside the country.

In any event, our job as farmers and as Canadians generally is to put our shoulders to the wheel to do our part in every way possible toward prosecuting the war to a successful conclusion. Admittedly there are difficulties in the way, as far as agriculture is concerned. There is no part of Canada's economy as widely diversified as agriculture. This fact comes right back to the doorstep of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and he is obliged to pay attention to every angle of it. He must consider the problems of the fruit growers, the tobacco growers, the sugar beet growers. He must consider the problems of the dairy farmers, the beef cattle producers, the hog raisers, the grain growers and the corn growers. All these different branches of agriculture require attention, and each must be dealt with in some manner. The minister must deal with all of them. I believe he recognizes his responsibility in that direction and has made an honest effort to meet the conditions obtaining in each branch of the industry.

Even in the western provinces there is a wide difference with respect to the general situation. A policy that would suit one western province might not be entirely satisfactory to the others. For example, Saskatchewan obtains about 70 to 75 per cent of its income from the production of wheat; that is its major source of income, and naturally the wheat policy of the country is all-important. In Manitoba the income from wheat is in the neighbourhood of 35 to 40 per cent of the total, so that the part that the price of wheat plays in any agricultural programme is not as important as it would be in Saskatchewan. I point this out merely to illustrate the problem which must be met.

Another feature is that western agriculture is tooled up to the production of cereals. Since the war began we have seen the difficulty that this country has experienced in revamping its economy from peace-time to war-time production. One of the greatest difficulties has been in retooling. That difficulty also affects agriculture. It is not easy to swing over to some other type of production. Even if it were possible or desirable to do so, that is one difficulty which must be faced.

I think that in the long run the policy which the Minister of Agriculture has developed during the past number of years will be found to have been generally a sound policy. It may not have been all we would have liked it to be, but I believe that in the years to come as we look back we shall realize that it was a step in the right direction. I think the Minister of Agriculture deserves more credit for his efforts than a good many people have been willing to give him.

There is another angle to the farm situation which should be considered. After all, a farm is not very much different from an ordinary business except that it also provides a home for the man who runs it.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is no different from a small business.

Mr. WEIR: If my hon. friend will be patient, I was going to show that. A farm requires capital; it requires power, whether from tractors or from horses; it requires labour and it requires markets. But above all, it requires efficient management. Sometimes we do not recognize the importance of these things and the part they play in the general farming set-up throughout Canada. These separate farm units should be considered as little business concerns scattered over western Canada. When we consider that there are some 300,000 of them we realize immediately the importance of the industry to the general economy of this country.

It is regrettable that we should at all times in this house picture the least fortunate of our farmers. There are some farmers in western Canada who came through the depression fairly successfully. Why should we not pick out these men and show what they have done? I think this should be done to a greater extent than it has been done in the past. The example and experience of these men should be mentioned so that others may profit from their experiences.

So far as western Canada is concerned, the main difficulty has been low yields, coupled, of course, with low prices. No matter in what direction you go you will find that the areas that have suffered from no crops for one reason or another are those that are in difficulties. It could not be otherwise. As long as recurring crop failures occur in any area, that area will be in difficulties, and attempts have to be made to relieve it as much as possible.

I should like to say a word in regard to the measures to be adopted next year for the handling of wheat. The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) placed upon the record the estimated carryover of the United States, Canada, Australia and the Argentine at the end of July next; he gave us a figure of 1,370 million bushels. Canada's part of that carryover is estimated to be about 400 million bushels. I would point out that in this regard Canada's position will be better by about 80 million bushels compared with last year. My view is that we should not deplete our wheat stocks. In other activities in connection with the war we are using up our production just as fast as it can be brought forward. Apparently wheat is the only thing that we can stock as a reserve. It may prove to be one of the best assets we could possibly have, probably the only tangible asset, when this war is over. I think we should attempt to keep a reasonable carryover of grain in this country.

So far as the farmers in my particular locality are concerned, I think I express their views when I say that they would prefer more emphasis placed upon payments on a bushelage rather than on an acreage basis. I do not consider the latter is the most equitable way in which to give assistance. Several areas in southwestern Manitoba have had difficult times for a number of years, although conditions this year are expected to be more favourable. This year, however, the northwestern part of the province has suffered very heavy crop depletions.

Everyone whom I have met lately has considered the acreage bonus scheme a reasonable means of assistance, but they all would like to see it carried out on a more individual basis. They believe that this would be more equitable, that it would give assistance to those who need it most rather than, in a few instances, to those who probably do not need it. Ever since I have been in the house it has been recognized that the responsibility for taking care of the individual rests with the municipality. It is only when that responsibility reaches a magnitude where it cannot be handled that there is justification for other branches of government stepping in. If there were nothing in the nature of assistance as provided by the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the responsibility of taking care of those who need it would rest with the municipality or with the provincial government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the constitutional position.

Mr. WEIR: I would point out that in this measure that position has not been departed from. The farmers in the municipality contribute to the scheme on a bushelage basis, as they would have to do if the municipality had to bear the cost. Likewise, all the farmers in the province contribute to the scheme through the one per cent deduction on the grain they market. Then, if it requires further assistance, the federal government comes into the picture, the difference being that the federal government is behind the guarantee, whereas ordinarily, if the responsibility were left entirely to the municipalities, it would likely not pass beyond them or the provincial government.

If our policy were to place the emphasis on price per bushel rather than upon acreage basis, and recognize it as a contribution from the state, the thirty cents increase in the price per bushel of wheat to the man who has twenty bushels to the acre is equivalent to an acreage bonus of $6 an acre, and if the assistance were simply on a price per bushel basis the farmer who was unfortunate enough to have no crop would be carrying on with little or no assistance. The assistance would be given to the man who was fortunate enough to have a crop. I point this out to establish if I can that the scheme of price per bushel, plus acreage bonus, is a much more equitable basis for giving assistance than a straight bushelage basis alone.

Mr. HOMUTH: How about the man who has no crop?

Mr. WEIR: Under the bushelage assistance alone, even if the price were $2 a bushel, he would get nothing.

Mr. HOMUTH: Quite so, but what is he going to get now?

Mr. WEIR: He will get the assistance provided under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the Wheat Acreage Reduction Act.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Provided there is a crop failure in that area.

Mr. WEIR: Yes, naturally, I join with those who expressed disappointment that the government was unable to go further toward meeting the requests of the very representative delegation from Saskatchewan which met the government in January. I attended some of the meetings while that delegation was here, and I think their presentation was well made and their requests were reasonable. The farmers of Manitoba were not officially a part of that delegation, but I can assure you, sir, they were none the less interested. They did make representations to the government, but they did it through their regularly constituted national organization, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and as between the representations made by the two organizations, the delegation from Saskatchewan and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, there is not sufficient difference to make any distinction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why not make representations through their members of parliament?

Mr. WEIR: Very true, and I can assure my hon. friend that they did make representations through their members of parliament.

Mr. HOMUTH: Which was the most successful?

Mr. WEIR: That is a matter of opinion. I would go so far as to say that probably all had a little something to do with it. I am not claiming anything else at this time.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): A good answer.

Mr. WEIR: I should like to take a moment to point out what the government has done in recognizing the situation that prevails in western Canada. In the first place we have an increased price per bushel of twenty cents. We have the delivery quota increased by fifty million bushels, and I only hope that the volume which the government plans on shipping abroad can be maintained. We have, in addition, a guaranteed price for flax of $2.25 a bushel. I listened with a great deal of interest to the address made yesterday afternoon by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris). I think everyone recognizes that when the difficulties developed in the Pacific they threw upon us immediately the problem of producing oils to replace those formerly imported. I commend the government strongly for fixing a guaranteed price for flax, but I submit that they have not been any too generous in that regard. I know that in Manitoba flax is a very hazardous crop to grow and last year very few farmers received a yield or return that was worth while. Probably more should be done, because of the extreme importance of oils to guarantee a substantial supply of flax.

[Mr. Douglas (Weyburn).]

In addition, the government has put a floor price of 60 cents a bushel on barley and a floor of 45 cents a bushel on oats. The government also took steps a few weeks ago to assist the sugar beet producers. Then we have the wheat reduction policy continued on a basis of $2 per acre, coupled with a continuation of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Therefore on the whole the government has recognized the representations made to it and to a large degree, if not entirely, has met them.

There has been a good deal of discussion as to how much the farmer actually received for his wheat in the past year. The Searle Grain Index has been quoted on many occasions, and I should like to quote this paragraph from its last issue:

> It is interesting to note that for this present crop that is now being marketed the farmers, on the average, have received or will receive the equivalent of approximately $1 a bushel for No. 1 northern Fort William. This is made up of 74 cents, the open market value of wheat, and an additional 26 cents given by the government in the form of various acreage bonuses, making $1 in all.

That is the viewpoint of an outsider with respect to what has been done, and the price this year is raised to 90 cents.

I now come to another point. Those who recall the discussion last year will remember that an attempt was made to have an assured income for the three western provinces of $325,000,000 or thereabouts. Actually their income has turned out to be much higher, nearer to $400,000,000. The Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day intimated that on the basis of the policy for next year the return to the three western provinces would be in the neighbourhood of $475,000,000, plus about $30,000,000 in bonuses. That certainly indicates some improvement, and it is to be hoped that the results will be as he forecast, but again I point out that much depends upon the crop which will be produced, something over which nobody has any control.

A good deal has been said about parity prices. I do not propose to discuss that subject beyond pointing out two or three things. I do not think we can take the position of attempting to establish a parity price for one particular product alone applicable to a large area. In other words, if we are going to emphasize parity prices for the three western provinces, we should take in the general income of the provinces combined. Admittedly that income or estimated income is not up to so-called parity of 1926-29; nevertheless there has been a definite improvement. I have a table here showing the cash income from the sale of farm products dating back to 1926-27. That income in 1926-27 was $525,000,000; in 1927-28, $571,000,000; in 1928-29, $562,000,000. The estimated income for 1940-41 is $410,000,000, and if what is contemplated under the present programme is carried out and the results are as anticipated, I would think that our income for this year would be substantially improved. Undoubtedly certain areas would suffer, but here again I would point out, on the basis of these same figures, that the income back in 1931-32 was down to $167,000,000. That, Mr. Speaker, is one of the chief difficulties from which the west is suffering—the accumulation of indebtedness, the depletion of live stock, the wearing out of machinery, the lack of paint on buildings, everything connected with a depressed farm income. The correcting of that condition is one of the big problems of western Canada to-day.

If we carry through this idea of parity prices, I think we shall have to recognize at least two and possibly three circumstances connected with it. The first is that it is going to require control. We could not hope to have high wheat prices without some control, when the state is buying the wheat. At the same time, under existing conditions, and probably even under normal conditions, we would have to recognize priorities and the control effected by their use. Does not any attempt to equalize these things largely resolve itself into a question of taxation? I just point that out; I do not at the moment propose to follow it further.

An important feature of the farm situation in the coming year is the prospect of increased costs. Already labour is much scarcer and more expensive than it has been in the past two years. Added to that, the state has intervened in the matter of fuel oils; and those who are in the unfortunate position of having to buy feed grains, even for horse-power, are going to find it much more difficult to secure these essentials. Therefore, while it may appear at the moment that we are getting assistance of some value, there will be other and important offsetting features. Here may I read a letter which was recently addressed to me. If some one wants the name of the writer, I shall give it, but for the moment I would prefer not to:

I saw in Friday's Free Press a report that the freezing of farm labour and a bonus was being considered. If there is any truth in this report, and you have any influence for heaven's sake get on with the freezing part of it and bonus or no, talk about that after. You know of course my own boys are all in the air force and I think I told you I had a good tractor man (medically unfit). Now he tells me that he is going out to Vancouver to take a welding course and make 200 or more dollars per month. You may of course say that this is my worry, but this is what will happen if I can not locate another good tractor man or a good stock man. I can of course take either end myself but men in either category are just about non-existent. At present the intention is to turn off 100 to 125 hogs per year, 15 or 20 beef cattle, approx. 350 dozen eggs per month and grow 50 acres or more of sugar beets, and grow just whatever wheat the government decides is enough under present conditions. These are not visionary plans. I actually did this in 1941 and have the stock, buildings and equipment to repeat it or better in 1942. But if I lose my tractor man I will have to cut out sugar beets entirely, hogs down to one litter, cattle down to a pair of cows to supply the house and do the best I can with the grain end of it. To say we can use women or school boys is evading the question. There is no doubt we can use this kind of labour at rush times and no doubt will have to but the average woman or school boy could not take a tractor and hook on to a power drill or most other power machinery. This is a resume of my own situation but there is no doubt that it could be multiplied by many thousands throughout the country. It goes without saying that I shall do my best to carry on as I have been, both because the country needs the bacon, beef, eggs and sugar more than grain, and because I think it is the right kind of farming and something I was building up to long before the wheat situation became acute. However the chances of me being able to continue this way are anything but bright.

I point that out as indicating a situation which I fear is going to arise in connection with farm labour not only in the west but all over Canada.

Let me now refer to another matter. There are some brighter spots of which we should, I think, be reminded. We have just had a very successful campaign to raise a war loan; every part of Canada, including the west, has responded well to that appeal. I notice that the municipalities of our province find themselves in a much better position than they have been for some time. I am not saying this to indicate that there are not hardships and misfortunes in many areas in Manitoba, but I point out that there has been and still is an improvement. I hold in my hand a statement which was made by the municipal commissioner of Manitoba, and I should like to read two or three paragraphs. He says:

There has been a reduction in the unmatured capital liabilities of municipalities between 1935 and 1940 of over a million dollars.

At the end of 1935 the municipalities owed for municipal commissioners' levy, including trunk highways, $499,452 while in 1940 it was down to $365,907 and at the present time the arrears, not including the 1941 levy, are less than $200,000.

At the end of 1935 the municipalities owed the government in defaulted debentures, seed grain, fodder, and drainage liability $1,641,419, while in 1940 it had been reduced to $623,957....

There has been a further improvement in the financial position of rural municipalities in Manitoba at the end of 1940, notwithstanding that assessments continue to decline, being approximately one million dollars less than in 1939 and some fourteen and a half million dollars less than in 1935.

The taxes levied have increased slightly in 1940 being one hundred thousand dollars more than in 1939, and seven hundred thousand more than in 1935.

Municipal tax arrears are lower in 1940, being forty-two thousand dollars less than in 1939, and two million, one hundred and forty-five thousand dollars less than in 1935.

During 1940 the percentage of collection of taxes, current and arrears, was 96·76 per cent of the current levy, while in 1939 it was 102·15 per cent and in 1935 it was 85·97.

During 1940, of the 169 municipalities under review, 115 operated on a cash basis, as against 109 out of 170 in 1939, and 44 out of 170 in 1935.

I think it is only fair to point out some of these things, as indicating that some improvement is being made, and that, coupled with the programme which the government has announced its intention of carrying through, and provided we get a crop, it should continue in succeeding years.

I reemphasize that the real problem of western Canada to-day turns on the matter of debt. Manitoba is not privileged by having debt adjustment legislation whereby it can adjust many of the cases which should be dealt with. That legislation has been done away with, but I hope it will be renewed, because I believe it is still necessary in many instances. If we consider most of the causes of distress and hardship we shall find that they hinge largely round two things—crop failure and accumulated indebtedness—and these problems have to be faced up to in any programme that may be undertaken.

There is only one other thought which I wish to pass on to the house at the moment. It would appear that we are going to be confronted with restricted markets, particularly for wheat and other cereal grains. Western Canada in the main is geared up to produce cereals, and wheat has proved to be the most satisfactory crop that can be produced there. Experience has been that it will stand more damage, more drought, more hardships than any other crop. If we are not going to be able to produce wheat to the extent that we have, then the situation will have to be faced. I think we should be making plans now to develop some other type of production suitable to that vast area. I do not know what it will be. It may be that we can utilize that area for growing other types of products. At any rate, I submit that there is opportunity there for a very far-reaching and fundamental type of research.

Surely that area is capable of producing something. The sooner, therefore, we try to find out what its possibilities are, the more satisfactory will the situation become out there. Investigations have been going on in other parts of the world for the purpose of finding new uses for many agricultural products. Surely we can lend our hand in this regard, in some way or another, to see if new uses for products or new types of products cannot be developed for that vast area if it is to be taken out of wheat.

Mr. CARDIFF: How much has hog production been stepped up in that part of the country?

Mr. WEIR: I have not the percentage before me, but I can assure my hon. friend that hog production in Saskatchewan, particularly in the last two years has gone ahead by leaps and bounds. It has doubled itself in the last two years and, while Manitoba was always substantially in live stock production, Saskatchewan went out of it for a time because of drought conditions. It is only now getting reestablished, and no doubt it will make further progress along that line.

While many of us would like to have seen the price fixed at $1 a bushel, nevertheless we must be grateful for what we are to receive. We have a 90-cent price together with bonuses, and in the end we may secure out of this something in the neighbourhood of $1 a bushel. After listening to the masterly speech by the Minister of Agriculture the other evening and his general review of the entire agricultural situation, and what has been done with respect to it by the government, I do not think anyone can say that the representations by those who came to Ottawa to urge certain things on the government were not given every possible consideration. I do not think anything was left out in the consideration of the different requests that were made on behalf of those who appealed to the government. The government has taken the requests into consideration, and from its general review has undoubtedly come to the decision that the programme which it has placed before parliament is the best that it can offer under the circumstances which exist at the present time. The amendment put forward by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) is, I take it, a want of confidence motion.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Minister of Agriculture said it was not.

Mr. WEIR: Well, if the amendment were carried, where would we be? We would be back with the act as it was last year, without any provision having been made to increase the price. I am prepared to say that the programme of the government as outlined and placed before us is a programme which most of us can support and for which we are grateful. I doubt if any other government or any other political party at this stage in Canada's development, and at this stage of the war, could have done more.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): I have followed very closely the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Weir), and I agree with him that often when we have discussed particular cases that exist in western Canada the conclusion is drawn that we are attempting to suggest that those conditions represent the conditions which prevail in every home. That has never been the intention of any who have spoken in this section of the house. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) some time ago visited the farm of the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). He made a flattering reference in the house to the hon. member for Melfort as one of the most prosperous farmers in the west. The house might be interested to know that when the hon. member for Melfort came back from the last war, where he had an enviable record as an officer with the armed forces, he looked over Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and the Peace River country carefully and decided that the most promising part of Canada was the Carrot River valley. While this is not in my constituency, I agree that it is one of the finest areas anywhere in the dominion. The hon. member for Melfort has had the good fortune to have an average yield of over thirty bushels an acre for his wheat for twenty years in succession.

Mr. GRAYDON: He knows how to farm.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, and he has good land and good judgment. If every farmer had been able to get thirty bushels an acre by working hard on good land, we would have different problems to face to-day, but we would not have solved them. The hon. member for Macdonald indicated that the drought areas had been largely responsible for our predicament, but if we had had bumper crops during those years, the problem now confronting us with surpluses would have arrived some time ago. While there are many people in parts of Saskatchewan who have had good crops and have been able to pay their taxes, it is fair to consider the average farm income in a province and compare the return with the income of other groups and to decide whether those who are producing agricultural products are getting a fair share of the national income.

I have been disturbed by references made by some members, in private conversation, to the problem that we are now discussing. It has been suggested that those of us who speak on this subject are whiners, that we could not be satisfied under any circumstances. One hon. member said last night that he had been here a great many years and had heard the same old story over and over again and would listen no longer. I submit that my duty as a member is to sit in as one of a group of 245 charged with the responsibility of looking after a rather large family of over eleven million people. Whether we like it or not, we are living in a society and not in a jungle, and we must have controls and plans for the activities of our people, so that we can give direction along certain lines. I would remind the house that we have a problem in western Canada, and I think it is fair to say that the agricultural problems all across the country have never received the consideration that they deserve from the parliaments of the dominion. Particularly at the present time the wheat problem so far has not received in this house the consideration it should receive.

The recent victory loan campaign gives material for careful consideration. The Department of Finance, which is charged with the business of getting money to run the war and carry on the business of the country, has to get the money where the money is. I think we all agree that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is doing a very good job according to the rules laid down by the government. In planning to float this loan he asked the people in my province to raise $8,000,000 and the people in the city of Toronto to raise $180,000,000. The population of Saskatchewan, according to the last census, is 888,747. The population of Toronto, according to the preliminary report, is 657,612. The Minister of Finance asked the people of Saskatchewan to raise $10 per person to help win the war, while the people in Toronto were asked to raise over $273 per capita. Hon. members will say that a great deal of the money in Toronto represents the accumulations of corporations carrying on business all over the country, and some of this money is trust money. But the fact remains that this money is spent under the direction of people residing in Toronto, and it is clear that these large sums available there for investment in victory bonds were not available in the prairie provinces during recent years. There is something wrong with our economy when such a large group of people are recognized as being able to contribute so little. No one has ever suggested that the people living in Saskatchewan are less patriotic, less willing to contribute in any way possible than those elsewhere.

Nothing would please me better than to be able to return to my constituency during the Easter recess and assure the people there that the burdens of this war are being carried as fairly as possible by all groups in the country, but how can I do so when over 800,000 people are found to be in a position to contribute only $10 each, whereas the position of people in Toronto is so very different? The government at this time should see to it that all groups in the country are called upon to make real sacrifices. In checking over our income tax legislation I learn that the Minister of Finance feels that he has gone about as far as he can in boosting the rates on people in the higher income brackets. Do hon. members realize that after having imposed the heaviest income taxes ever known in Canada, by legislation based on the assumption that provincial governments would withdraw from the field, those in the higher income brackets still have a very substantial sum left after paying the taxes, as shown by the following figures based on 1941 rates:

Income	Tax	Remainder	Per day
$ 20,000.....	$ 9,105	$10,895	$ 36
50,000.....	28,392	21,608	72
75,000.....	45,887	24,113	80
100,000.....	64,347	35,653	105
200,000.....	143,795	56,205	187
500,000.....	411,720	88,280	294

The amounts per day are calculated for our convenience on the basis of six days a week and fifty weeks in the year, or three hundred days. These figures are for a single person without dependents.

The people in these groups are those who have something at stake in this war in which our democratic institutions are being challenged and I submit they have not commenced to make sacrifices while they are left with the daily incomes indicated.

It has been suggested that we in the west are like poor relations, always coming to the treasury and saying, gimme, gimme, gimme. Let me remind the house that it is not a new condition in Canada for poor people to come asking the government for help. Many years ago the poor manufacturers in Canada found themselves competing in a ruthless world with more powerful groups in the United States prepared to flood their markets and force down prices. So these poor manufacturers came to the rulers of that day and said, "we want help." And they got it. They got lots of it, and as one hon. member reminds me they have had it ever since. Let me refer the house to the information that the late Norman Rogers placed before the people of Canada, showing what tariff costs in 1931 amounted to. He showed that every province with the exception of Ontario and Quebec suffered a substantial loss by reason of the tariff. The figures he gave were as follows:

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Province	Per capita loss
Prince Edward Island.....	$17 88
Nova Scotia.....	12 28
New Brunswick.....	11 67
Manitoba	13 25
Saskatchewan	28 16
Alberta	26 93
British Columbia.....	22 33

Whereas in Ontario the per capita gain was $15.15 and in Quebec, $11.03.

He also showed that the people of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta in the year 1931 paid $86,323,421 more for what they bought than they would have paid but for the tariff. Is it not then clear that the government of that day, in imposing such a burden on a group of people to give to another group, were following a policy of helping poor people?

I wish all hon. members had been in the Chateau Laurier the other day to hear the presentation made to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and members of the cabinet by the delegation from western Canada. I think all hon. members have received a copy of the brief presented, and I hope they have digested carefully the representations made. As far as I know, the reports given by a dozen representative members of that delegation have not been made public. I was particularly interested in the presentation made by the mayor of Moose Jaw. He showed that this is not a problem affecting only a few farmers in an isolated part of Canada, but one that affects the lives of hundreds of thousands of people. He referred to book II of the Sirois commission report, page 100, containing the following statement:

> The people of Saskatchewan have suffered a reduction in income during the last decade which has probably been unparalleled in peace time in any other civilized country.

His worship quite rightly said that this statement covers a great deal of territory and a long period of time. He said it was significant that the mayors of the three largest cities in Saskatchewan were here supporting that delegation. They were here because they realized that if this problem was not solved, we were not going to have any cities. One hon. member with whom I discussed this question last night said it would be a good thing for all the people in Saskatchewan to leave and go somewhere else. He said he would not take $10,000 a year to live there. I asked where they should go. Starting with Toronto, I said, "How many will you take in Toronto?" He replied, "Oh, we cannot take any in Toronto; we have all we can look after; we do not want any." We have over eight hundred thousand people in Saskatchewan, so let us start with one group of one thousand people. In the House of Commons there are 245 members. Is there one member of parliament who will say, "'All right, I will welcome a thousand people from Saskatchewan to my constituency, and they will be able to find work on the farms, in the factories or in the stores. They will find places to live, and they will become self-supporting citizens"? Where is that member? I say you cannot move a group of eight hundred thousand people simply by snapping a finger, and you cannot dismiss this problem in such an easy way.

Coming back to the delegation, let me refer to the presentation made by the reeve of a rural municipality. This man went to that community thirty years ago. He was young, and looked forward to spending the best years of his lifetime in producing necessary commodities—food for the nation. I know that this man has an enviable record in this community, and that he is one of the best citizens to be found anywhere in Canada. He said, "We owe our municipal doctor $6,000"—and I am speaking from memory when I mention that figure. They would not have had a doctor in that community, I suppose, had it not been for the fact that the people collectively had guaranteed that the doctor would have a proper return. But can we expect a young doctor to have his salary $6,000 in arrears over an extended period, when there is a scarcity of doctors all across Canada? Then, he said, "We owe $6,000 to the sanatoria in our province." As hon. members understand, our provincial sanatoria are supported chiefly from municipal revenues. This particular municipality had not been able to collect its taxes, and therefore had not been able to discharge its responsibility to the sanitaria. They cannot run indefinitely on good will; they must have money to pay their staff and buy their goods. This municipality was in a position similar to that of a great many others, namely, that it was unable to meet its commitments. He said, "We owe our teachers a large sum of money, and teachers cannot live without having some financial return, no matter how much they are concerned about the educational needs of the community. And so the teachers are going to Ontario."

The next speaker was a Roman Catholic priest, who came with the delegation. He said he had been the parish priest for twelve years in the parish in which he was born. He was in a position to deal with the direct relationship between the economic security of the people, and the providing of spiritual needs in his community. He said, "Think of my position: blessing twelve marriages in the last twelve years—only one per year. Young people growing up cannot take the responsibility of establishing homes under prevailing economic conditions. We are now in the position where we have more funerals than christenings."

Another member of the delegation was a United Church minister from Saskatchewan. He told us that he is now serving a community which was formerly served by five United Church ministers. It is unnecessary to deal with the social problems which arise, when the chief organizations in western Canada are unable to maintain their services, and have to withdraw.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They have a bad enough time right in Ontario.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have no doubt they have; but I do not believe there is any part of Canada where the condition is as bad as it is in the west.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has suggested that all the money that can be found in Canada for agriculture is being spent. I would remind the house that early in the war the Prime Minister said that whatever is physically possible will be made financially possible, or words to that effect. Those sentiments were endorsed by the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) who was then Minister of Finance, and by the present Minister of Finance. That is the only policy that any government should carry out—that whatever is physically possible will be made financially possible.

Mr. GARDINER: I think I made use of the words "all that can be safely taken."

Mr. NICHOLSON: All right—"all that can be safely taken." Well, I hope the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is not proceeding on that basis. I hope he is proceeding on the basis that every factory which can work will work, and that every material that is needed will be made.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And that everybody will pay for it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I would hope that the Minister of National Defence is proceeding in the same way, and that he does not stop to see what the railway fare from Edmonton to Ottawa is. I would hope that he would not waste time to see whether we can spend the money to bring men in the army from Edmonton to Vancouver, or from Saskatoon to Halifax. I hope that we have reached the stage where we are not considering dollars and cents in that manner.

I should like to remind the house that the Minister of Munitions and Supply is spending money very freely—and I am not complaining about that. The evidence he placed before the house last year showed us that his department spent over $10,000,000 in providing capital establishment for the Alberta Nitrogen company; $11,000,000 for the Canadian Car and Foundry company; $14,000,000 for the Chemical Construction company of Niagara Falls; $10,000,000 for D.I.L. at Nobel; over $15,000,000 for D.I.L. at Ste. Therese, province of Quebec; $17,500,000 for the John Inglis company at Toronto; nearly $2,000,000 for the Ford Motor company; about $11,000,000 for the Otis-Fensom company, and over $14,000,000 for Sorel Industries Limited, along with a great many other items, bringing a total of $268,499,894.

Those figures were given nearly a year ago. Let me make it clear that I am not complaining about the sums of money the Minister of Munitions and Supply has spent, and I hope that every factory will be working to capacity.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, before six o'clock I was discussing the activities of the Department of Munitions and Supply and the various departments of national defence. I was commending those departments for carrying out the stated desire of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to use whatever money was necessary to see that Canada should make her greatest contribution.

I want to stress the fact that I am anxious that the government should avoid any policy which would lead to inflation, but I do not see how anyone can suggest that the introducing of parity prices for agricultural products could, by any stretch of the imagination, lead to inflation. Something should be said about this question of parity prices. In the United States in 1936 the soil conservation and domestic allotment act laid down these general objectives:

> . . . reestablishment, at as rapid a rate as the secretary of agriculture determines to be practicable and in the general public interest, of the ratio between the purchasing power of the net income per person on farms and that of the income per person not on farms that prevailed during the five-year period August, 1909-July, 1914, inclusive.

The present secretary of agriculture of the United States spoke over the air on May 19, 1941, in connection with the regular farm and hour broadcast from Kansas city. He was appealing to the people to give their go-ahead signal to the United States department of agriculture to carry out their plans for the coming year. I may say that on May 19 the secretary of agriculture was outlining the wheat policy for the 1942 year, while we find ourselves on March 12 debating our policy. It might be stated that the policy outlined in the United States included the fall seeding of wheat. Mr. Wickard went on to say in this broadcast:

> As you all know, parity is one of the most important objectives of the national farm programmes and will continue to be a goal, just as soil conservation, for example, will continue to be a goal. We've been trying to reach that parity goal since 1933 and we've made a lot of progress.
> This administration developed the parity concept and the president has worked for it all along. Had it not been for such setbacks as the supreme court decision which killed the original Triple-A, farmers probably would have had parity long ago. The president is still working for parity and in this connection, I have some grand news. I talked to the president only a few hours before I left Washington. He told me he wants the basic crops to reach parity this year. He told me also that he thinks wheat farmers, taking loans and payments into account, will get parity on this year's crop.
> This news is further proof—although none is needed—that Franklin D. Roosevelt is the best friend that farmers have ever had in the White House.
> The president told me that he knew farmers want fair treatment and want to be fair in return. He said he was sure they did not want loans or money paid out of the treasury to bring their prices higher than parity levels. He told me—and I use his exact words—"In this critical time, you can depend on it that farmers won't rock the boat."

It is unfortunate that Canada has no policy similar to the one in force in the United States, and I shall have more to say about this later.

To explain it simply, a parity price for farm products is a price that will enable the farmer to buy in the market an amount of goods similar to what he was able to buy during a basic period. There is always difficulty in deciding what the basic period shall be. In the United States they have taken the period 1909-14 as the base period. There would be objection to taking a similar period in Canada in view of the fact that at that time we were passing through a period of unusual expansion. Great numbers of people were coming to Canada from Europe; great numbers of United States citizens were coming north to take advantage of our cheap land. No doubt there would be objections in certain sections of the community to taking 1917-1919 as the base period. During that short time agricultural prices were at the highest levels in Canadian history. So our bureau of statistics has taken 1926 as the base period.

I am not prepared to admit that there ever has been a period when the farmer has had a fair share of the national income, keeping in mind his investment in land and equipment and providing a rate of wages for the farmer and his family in connection with the production of foodstuffs. For example, if you assume that the price the farmer paid in 1926 for a pair of shoes was $5, and the price he received for a bushel of wheat was $1, he was able to get a pair of shoes for five bushels of wheat. If you agree that that is a fair price for wheat and a fair price for shoes, you can start from that base. But when the farmer has to give ten bushels of wheat to buy the same pair of shoes, you must assume that there is something wrong with the price of your wheat or with the price of your shoes.

The most recent information available in Canada in connection with spreads was that placed before the Stevens' investigation, and I should like to draw attention to some of this interesting information. Those hon. members who use tobacco will be interested in knowing where their money goes when it goes up in smoke. My Scottish environment and tradition would not permit me to pay so much for so little. So I have never smoked. Those who paid twenty-five cents for a package of cigarettes in 1934 gave 11·1 cents to the government in the form of taxes; seven cents to the manufacturer; 3·3 cents to the retailer and 2·2 cents to the wholesaler. The farmer received 1·4 cents. When you bought a tin of peas you gave the farmer 1·2 cents; you gave the worker in the canning factory 0·75 cents and you paid 2·4 cents for the tin can which was later thrown out on the garbage heap. When you bought a tin of tomatoes you gave the farmer slightly more, 1·5 cents; you gave the worker 1·2 cents, and for the larger can you paid 3 cents.

Mr. TUSTIN: From where is the hon. member getting his figures?

Mr. NICHOLSON: From the report of the mass buying and price spreads investigation. When you paid 10 cents for a quart of milk you paid the farmer 4·24 cents, but you paid the dairy company enough to replace broken bottles, pay for delivery services, income tax and operating expenses and leave a net profit of one-half cent per quart. These figures show the relationship between the return received by the farmer for these commodities, and the amount which went to the other interested parties.

We find a similar story in connection with farm implements. I have in my hand a report submitted to the legislature of Saskatchewan by a special committee, upon which the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) played an important part. When the farmer paid $281 in 1936 for a binder in Regina he gave to the factory worker $22.62; he paid for raw materials $71.06; for overhead or burden, $33.93; for experimental work, $2.55, or a total cost of $130.16. The freight charges were $26.08, and the net sales realization amounted to $209.42. If you agree that the price paid by a farmer for a binder in 1913 was fair, you must conclude that the price he paid in 1940 was too high. In 1913 the farmer secured a binder for 261 bushels of wheat; in 1940 it took 637 bushels to buy the same or a similar binder. The objective of parity prices is to bring about such a price for wheat that the farmer can buy a binder in 1942 or 1941 or 1940 for the same number of bushels that it took to buy the same or a similar binder in 1926. I would ask the house, is there anything unfair about that? The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has gone on record repeatedly that it is unreasonable to ask any manufacturer to manufacture at a loss, and I have yet to hear anyone tell of a manufacturer of machine guns or tanks or munitions or any other war equipment who is losing money. The farmers are engaged in the production of food to feed our own people and allied peoples of the world. Is it fair that those who are engaged in this necessary activity should have a return for their services that is not on a parity with the return that is going to these other groups of society?

Coming now to more controversial issues, I was disappointed with some of the statements made the other night by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). There are some things about the minister which I admire. When the government is in an awkward position there is no one on the other side who can rally the troops and make as good a case as the Minister of Agriculture. Referring the other night to the treatment we are giving our farmers he reprimanded the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) for suggesting that we should take pride in which is being done across the line and suggested that we take more pride in what is being done in Canada. He is reported at page 1210 of Hansard of March 10 as saying:

> When a man cuts down his acreage to the extent that the government says he ought to, they will lend him 98 cents a bushel on his wheat. They have made loans covering considerable amounts which I have in the records here. But if he does not cut down his acreage in accordance with their request, they will lend him only 49 cents on his wheat. In other words, in the United States they lend a man twice as much on his wheat if he obeys the request of the government than if he does not. It is true that this has tended to set a floor under wheat of 98 cents a bushel in the United States provided the farmer does what the government asked him to do.

On the next page he says:

I should like to suggest to hon. members that I think it would be much better if we all went out and told the people what we are doing in Canada instead of telling them what they are doing in the United States. Despite what they are doing in the United States, the farmers of Canada have really been getting more for their wheat than the farmers in the Argentine and Australia. Of course, there are reasons for that.

What is the situation? I have here the report of the administrator of the agricultural adjustment administration, the AAA, in the United States for 1941. I wish the minister would use statistics instead of making general statements as he did the other night when he said that Canadian farmers are getting more for their wheat than the farmers of the Argentine and Australia. I inquired, how much more, but the minister carefully refrained from giving figures. I quote from page 20 of the report of the administrator of the AAA:

Canada alone had enough wheat to fill all available world import markets. Altogether, the world had 4 bushels of wheat for sale for every bushel the market would take. The price offered the export producers was correspondingly depressed and not far from the record-breaking low quoted on the Liverpool market just before it closed at the outbreak of war in 1939.

He is discussing the general situation. He goes on:

In Argentina, all buying and selling of wheat was taken over by the government, and producers were offered the equivalent of from 42 to 45 cents a bushel.

That is not so much less than Canadians are getting.

Australia instituted a licence system which required wheat farmers to obtain a permit to grow wheat and the government offered the producers about 51 cents a bushel on a limited production.

The United States programme, however, stands out in at least two respects. First, farmers were called upon through referendums and elections of committeemen who administer the programme, to share in the responsibility for choosing their course of action. Second, farmers cooperating in the programme received a return per bushel twice that received by producers in the other countries.

The report goes on:

This progress of the United States wheat grower was possible only because of the experience of years, experience that formed the background for the comprehensive ever-normal granary programme which has been in operation since 1939.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Then, under the heading of "Guaranteed Return" the report says:

The 1941 loan rate of 98 cents a bushel plus the conservation and parity payments of 18 cents a bushel on a farm's normal yield of wheat is providing the programme cooperator a guaranteed average return of about $1.16 per bushel.

Since its inception, the loan programme has encouraged farmers to make use of farm storage where feasible.

The other night when the minister was speaking I interrupted and asked him, as reported at page 1210 of Hansard:

What percentage of United States farmers cooperated?

As I heard him he replied: "Not a very large percentage," but on thinking this over apparently he considered that that would be an unfair picture of what had been done in the United States and I find that although the Hansard reporter heard the minister as I did, the daily Hansard has been changed so that it reads:

Not a large percentage cooperated by accepting loans.

I should like the house to understand the situation. In the United States it was not possible for the government to accept all the wheat that might be grown. The Minister of Agriculture, speaking of what was done in Canada, said, as reported at page 1210 of Hansard:

We said to the farmer last year that if he did not reduce his wheat acreage, he could draw 70 cents a bushel, Fort William, or approximately 50 cents a bushel at the farm on his wheat, just one cent more than he could have drawn in the United States if he had done the same thing.

We did not say any such thing to the farmer. We said: we are not going to take more than 230 million bushels, and you will have to reduce your acreage to conform to that. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) last year said something to the effect that he was "not going to pay any attention to what the government suggests because over a period of years" he had "come to the conclusion that if you do what you think is best you will be better off." I suppose he will be able to market all he produced last year. But I submit that it is not fair; those who cooperated with the government in this country expected that the government would accept 230 million bushels, and for the minister to state that the farmers were given to understand that they could sell all the wheat they produced at 70 cents a bushel is misleading. The United States is in the same predicament. They cannot accept unlimited supplies of wheat, and so they said to their farmers:

If you will cooperate, we will make certain proposals. It was unfair of the minister to give the impression in the house that only a very small percentage of farmers in the United States cooperated with their government. I understand that 80 per cent of the farmers there cooperated in carrying out the request of the AAA to reduce their acreage and carry out the desires of the department. They had a loan in the United States which made it possible for the farmer to realize 98 cents a bushel, and as the minister correctly said, there was a heavy penalty for those who insisted on delivering above their quota. That penalty was 49 cents a bushel, but the report makes it clear that that penalty was not with a view to collecting revenue but for the purpose of seeing that the quota was lived up to and respected.

The United States farmers have been able to get a loan of 98 cents a bushel on the farm, and naturally when they can get that, the market price has to keep in that range. A great many farmers sold their wheat at the regular price, which was around this figure. I have some of the latest available figures here in reports from Washington, which I found in the library in the minister's own department. The latest report I have deals with the price of wheat in Canada, the United States, the Argentine and Australia. The average price on the 24th of October in the United States, at Buffalo, was $1.23⅞; at Montreal, 78·8 cents; at Buenos Aires, 54·2 cents; in Australia, 69·4 cents. It is explained that to get the average farm price you subtract from the United States price 30 cents, from the Canadian price 28 cents, from the Argentine price 13 cents, and from the Australian price 10 cents, which makes the average farm prices as follow: United States, 93 cents; Canada, 50·8 cents; Argentina, 41·2 cents; Australia, 59·4 cents.

Another Washington publication, "Crops and Markets", gives the average farm prices in 1941 in all the states. The figures given for the west north central area will be of interest; they are: Minnesota, 87 cents; Iowa, 98 cents; Missouri, $1; North Dakota, 81 cents; South Dakota, 85 cents; Nebraska, 97 cents; Kansas, 96 cents; or an average price to the farmer of 89·7 cents.

Mr. GARDINER: If my hon. friend would permit me I should like to make this correction of those figures, that I believe it will be found that as regards both the Argentine and at least half the amount the government assisted in Australia, payment was made on a bushelage basis, but any extra payments which were made here were made on an acreage basis, and they do not appear in that figure for Canada at all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am glad the minister mentioned that, because it gives me an opportunity of saying that in the United States they had an additional payment of 18 cents a bushel, bringing the price up to $1.16. What the minister says is true.

Mr. WOOD: Would the hon. member permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sorry, but I have only a few moments.

Mr. WOOD: I think we should get this clear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should be glad to answer the hon. member's question if I can have the extra time.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that his time has expired, and that unless he has the unanimous consent of the house he cannot continue. He has gone over his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I intend to make my remarks at this time more or less of a general nature. I believe that the time for going into details on these various bills will be when they come back from the agriculture committee. Before I begin my remarks I would express the hope that, before the debate on agriculture with particular regard to our western farmers is concluded, we shall have the opinions of one western member, in particular, expressed in this debate. My reference is to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I may sit on the opposite side of the house from him, but back in Saskatchewan we are next-door neighbours. I know parts of the Prime Minister's riding almost as well as I know my own; I know the feeling of the farmers there, and I believe I am correct in stating that the farmers in his constituency are anxiously waiting for a declaration of their own member's views upon this agricultural policy.

The things I should like to mention specifically to-night seem to me important, and I do not think any hon. member has expressed them so far in this debate. I suppose that all hon. members who represent agricultural ridings, indeed every member of the house, will agree upon the importance of food production as a weapon of war. I was pleased at the reference in the speech from the throne to the matter of food as a war essential, and later, at a statement made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). On February 10, as reported in Hansard at page 448, he said:

So that, put in briefest form, our pattern of total war is a pattern consisting of food—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Do I understand that the hon. member is quoting from a speech made during the present session?

Mrs. NIELSEN: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: She is not in order.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; I had forgotten that rule. In brief, the Minister of National Defence was saying that there are three essential things in our war effort—food, armaments and supplies, and men. He added that it was impossible for him to say which of the three is the most important. It has been necessary—at least, I have found it so—to disagree with some government policies, but I have already assured the government this session that any specific measure they bring in which in my belief will really aid in the efficient and speedy prosecution of the war will receive my wholehearted support, both here and among the people of my constituency. I have already expressed that opinion with reference to the plebiscite.

But when we come to consider the agricultural policy as set out in these bills, I find it impossible to see that it will serve for the speedy prosecution of the war. I hope hon. members will realize that at a time like this there is no question, with me, of criticizing for the sake of criticism or for party advantage. In a time of national emergency no such consideration should motivate what any hon. member has to say with regard to government legislation.

The thing I particularly wish to mention is the question of wheat production by the bonusing of summer-fallow, which means, of course, the letting of land lie idle. I am forced to the conclusion that the policy of the government in bonusing summer-fallow is incorrect, because it is based upon an incorrect premise. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) has said already this session, in substance, that as far as markets go we can only look this coming year to Great Britain and, to a limited extent, a few other countries. I recall also that at the beginning of the July war loan the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), when speaking about it to groups in this city—I believe, at one of the largest theatres in Ottawa—is reported as having said that we have to regard this war as lasting possibly five or more than five years longer. That, I assume, is the premise upon which the agricultural policy of this government is based, that we have yet before us a war of many, many years. In my view that premise is incorrect. It seems to me that it is one which is bound to result in complacency among the Canadian people, creating in them the feeling, "Oh, well, we have years and years ahead of us; we can more or less muddle along from year to year with policies which will tide us over from time to time", instead of realizing that at the present time we have come to the crucial stage of the war where we need to mobilize for speedy victory; for "if it were done when 'tis done, then t'were well it were done quickly."

There is at the present time a growing body of opinion in England, the United States and this country that if we are intent upon a very thorough prosecution of the war and a very thorough mobilization of our resources, we can create an offensive and go forward to speedy victory. I notice in our own newspapers in this city, to be exact, in the Ottawa Citizen of March 10, a report from London, England, as follows:

Soviet pressure for a second front in northern Europe which might swiftly link British, United States and Russian troops on a solid line was increasing in London to-night with considerable Anglo-American support. The Soviet argument heard now wherever Russians, British and Americans meet, is that Hitler can be beaten by autumn provided there is bold use of his own divide and conquer strategy against him, and that once he is disposed of Japan will be considerably less formidable to the United Nations.

There was also in to-day's Journal, March 12, another report saying that in Free Europe, an international review which is published in London, the statement appears:

An allied spring offensive in the west should have a good chance for success since the forces now concentrated in the British isles presumably are stronger than those the Germans have arrayed from Norway to the Spanish frontier.

Our own Prime Minister, when speaking over the air the other night, and thanking the Canadian people for their contributions to the war loan, said:

The present is the crucial year. Germany and Japan are staking everything on 1942.

I myself am apt to believe that it is necessary for us to encourage the people of Canada to act upon that premise, that were we to concentrate to a far greater degree than we are, and to which I believe we could concentrate, victory might come far more speedily than we have been anticipating. The longer we delay; the longer we fail to take the initiative, the longer it seems to me we are going to be and the worse our position is likely to become. Our forces are becoming divided and dissipated because we are in the position of having to defend ourselves wherever the enemy creates a new offensive. It is a wrong idea for the people of this country to believe that time is necessarily on our side. At the present time every preparation should be made for greater expediency, with a view to strengthening every nerve and every particle of our resources to bring victory this year.

One of our own men, a man in whom I believe everyone in Canada has the greatest confidence, General McNaughton, was also quoted in the Citizen of yesterday as saying that the united nations will let no opportunity slip by to take the offensive against the axis. He said:

> We must resist the temptation to whitewash our forces all over the map. . . . We have never lost our intention of training our forces for attack in Europe.

Of course, we know that the Pacific situation is a ghastly one. No one is attempting to hide that fact. But I want to stress at this time that that is a part of the deliberate plan of our enemies, to distract our attention throughout the whole of the globe, if it is possible to do so. But we must never allow them for one moment to cloud or to blot out in our minds the certain knowledge that Germany is to-day the key centre of the whole world war, that in Germany the master minds and master brains who are concentrating on the world war are situated. Not only that, but in the Europe which Hitler is now dominating lies the bread-basket, the food supplies, of the whole enemy armies. Germany to-day is staking everything on 1942. Whether they and the Japanese between them will stage new offensives in the spring is, of course, a matter of conjecture, but it is, I believe, something with which every citizen is vitally concerned and believes is likely to happen. If it is possible, we of the allies have to make 1942 the crucial year and strike before the enemy strikes, to create diversions for the enemy and scatter his troops throughout the length and breadth of the continent of Europe.

We must do what we can to encroach upon the bread-basket of the axis. In that way we shall take the offensive of 1942, and 1942 will bring victory nearer for us. If we could do that; if we could by invasion of the continent destroy some of the seeded acreage which Hitler this year is counting upon for the feeding of his armies and those vast numbers of civilians whom he has under his control, then it seems to me we would bring the conclusion of the war so much closer.

The other day I was inquiring from the dominion bureau of statistics to see if I could find out the amount of wheat which was consumed in Europe just before the war started, and I was given figures for the year 1938-39. I do not know whether other members are like myself, but when I have a number of figures read to me quickly I find it difficult to absorb them and to see their relationship. I do not want to read over the figures of production and consumption of wheat in every country in Europe, but I should like to have these figures placed on Hansard because they are interesting and I believe they help to prove my argument. They are as follows:

In the fiscal year 1938-9, wheat figures for the following countries are, in bushels:

If you take the total production of wheat all over Europe, including Russia, in the year 1939 it comes to around three billion bushels in rough figures. Their consumption was only 2,800,000,000 bushels roughly, but that was because Russia was producing far in excess of what she consumed. If you take Russia out of the picture and merely count up the countries of Europe under Hitler's domination, for the year 1939 you will find that their production was roughly 1,700,000,000 bushels and their consumption 1,900,000,000 bushels. In other words, the countries of Europe under Hitler did not produce sufficient wheat; they lacked roughly about 200,000,000 bushels. Besides that, there is the question of India and China. We did not send them very much wheat; they got most of it from Australia and some from the United States. But in 1939 they imported roughly 24,000,000 bushels.

If this spring the armies of the allies which are concentrated in England are ready for a concentrated attack upon Europe, even if they are short of some of the materials and equipment which they would like to have, it seems that the crucial hour has come when they must make even sporadic attacks. If it is possible for the allies to do this, particularly in the northern part of Europe and the Scandinavian countries, thus relieving some of the Russian armies to continue their drive down the Danubian basin, we can see where such an offensive might be the turning point of the war. Not only would it help to destroy the armies of Hitler, which in the last analysis are the armies that have to be destroyed anyway before we can hope for peace; an offensive in Europe would bring the war to the soil of Germany and the occupied countries and destroy Hitler's wheat fields. Supposing Hitler seeds this coming year as much as he did in 1939, which is not probable because of the question of man-power, if by a concerted offensive of the allies from both the British side and the Russian side we could destroy half the wheat reserves of Germany I think the figures which I shall place on Hansard will show that Germany or the countries under German control would lack over a billion bushels of wheat.

Australia is not likely to be able to supply India and China this year as she has done in the past, for lack of man-power for one thing, and the difficulty of shipping across the Pacific. Therefore we shall have to look after the needs of India and China as much as possible. Adding up these figures roughly, it is quite apparent that the surplus that we have in the four main wheat exporting countries will be needed. If we are able to take the offensive and destroy Hitler's European bread-basket, or even only half of it, we could by the coming fall and early winter bring in on our side in this war one of the greatest allies, the ally of hunger. If we brought in that ally before this winter is over, it may be the ally which will bring about the decisive break on the side of the allies. If that did happen, the surplus of wheat which we now have here in Canada would melt away like the snow before the spring sunshine.

[Mrs. Nielsen.]

I have to base my opinions on such information as ordinary people can gain from newspapers and current reports; I am not in the position of the Minister of Agriculture in that regard. Yet based upon this premise I believe that it is not a right thing for us to bonus land to lie idle in summer-fallow.

Mr. GARDINER: That will produce more wheat.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I believe in building up a reserve, the need for which may come upon us far more quickly than some of us are apt to think. Within the wheat belt in which the land can be used only for the growing of wheat I do not think we should bonus this year for summer-fallow, but the wheat farmers there should grow wheat on their land, except the amount of summer-fallow which they would normally have in the ordinary course of good farming. With regard to the marginal lands to the north of the real wheat belt, there the farmers should be encouraged to go in for raising coarse grains to provide other types of food which will also be so greatly needed. I am in complete agreement with the government in regard to bonusing for coarse grains, provided, of course, there is a parity price. But the money which will, if these bills pass, go towards bonusing land for summer-fallow could be used more effectively in helping the smaller farmers to produce coarse grains by subsidizing or helping them to procure machinery for the more efficient working of those small farms. The Minister of Agriculture knows, as we all know, that during the years of drought and depression machinery on the smaller farms has run down; we have all been in the fields and seen the old binders mended with a bent nail or tied up with string and that sort of thing. The smaller farmers have not efficient machinery. Some form of government bonus by way of supplying or helping to increase the machinery at the disposal of the small farmers so that they could produce coarse grains on a more economic basis would be money well spent. I am not saying that machinery should be supplied on an individual basis. It might be better that in those northern areas groups of these small farmers should try to work on a cooperative basis, if the government would help to supply cooperative units with power machinery for the more efficient production of coarse grains.

I had hoped also that the government would have considered and given to us in greater detail some plan for increasing industry in the prairie provinces. Speaking on an earlier occasion, I mentioned the problem of wool. None of the ministers have given us much information on that, but it does appear that in it we have an industry which, if given some encouragement by the government, might become a permanent one on the prairies and help to solve not only the problems of some of our farmers but also the problem of the unemployed in our cities.

The question of utilizing more fully this year the garden produce may seem rather a small thing, but were the government to help small cooperative canning centres for the fruits and vegetables produced on the prairies it would be a very great help, giving our prairie people an opportunity to do something more than they are at present doing. It seems an appalling thing, when you consider that to-day we are supposed to be waging a total war, to know that we still have so many unemployed. I know men can go and earn fifteen dollars a month working on the farms in northern Saskatchewan, but still there are unemployed in the cities. In the Regina Leader-Post of February 17, Mayor C. C. Williams, who, I believe, is one of those who came here on the farm delegation, is reported as stating that Regina still has one of the largest unemployment problems in the west. He said that there are on relief in Regina approximately 2,400 persons, 565 heads of families, and in addition many others who could be classed as unemployed, such as persons making a meagre living at part-time work. Others are getting by through exhausting the last of their small savings, and still others are able to stay off relief only by living with friends and relatives.

No government is waging total war unless it is making an honest attempt to find ways and means of putting to work every man and woman who is capable of working at some form of productive enterprise which will aid the efforts of this country.

With regard to prices, I feel that more must be said in detail in committee; but I am in agreement that this question of parity prices must be looked at as a war measure, if not as a permanent one. Personally I believe that it should be a permanent policy; but even as a war measure it is something that should be considered necessary, because without parity prices the farmers of this country cannot equip themselves for the production of food on an economic basis, or for the greater production of food which may be necessary as time goes on. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has spoken about morale. This session he said that there should be a place for the old, the young, the humble and the poor. One of the greatest factors in arousing a nation to a war effort is the morale of its people; that statement has been made a dozen times in this house. In the winning of a war morale is a psychological factor, the value of which cannot be estimated in dollars and cents. It is true that the young and the old, the humble and the poor, must have a place in the war effort of this nation, those who look into the future with their young eyes and the old who look over the past years of their endeavour. We have these people out there on the prairies, and at the present time they do not feel that they are being given a chance to do anything toward this effort. I would say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot afford to neglect these people, for it is out of such as they that the spirit of a nation is born and progresses.

It is the duty of a government to keep alight in the hearts of the people of Canada a flame of resolve to win this war. You cannot stop to count the cost of preserving a thing like the spirit of a nation. The policy of the government to-day in denying a parity price for wheat and other farm products I would say is a penny-wise and pound-foolish policy. On the smaller farms in Saskatchewan to-day, unfortunately, you have a defeatist attitude. You may hear the people, speaking among themselves, saying to each other, "How much worse could it be under Hitler?" You may hear them say to each other, "We are undernourished; we are ill-clad; we lack medical care and schooling; we cannot support our churches." If you turn round and say to them, "Well, you have democracy; you can still speak; you can still send delegations to Ottawa," they will turn to you in great bitterness and say, "Yes, we have democracy. We sent our delegation to Ottawa. We asked for a loaf of bread, and the government has given us a dry crust."

This is a very difficult problem. The farmers of the prairies will go on, because they are of the breed who will not admit defeat. They will endure. They will go out into the spring rains; they will plough the fields; they will go out in the heat and the dust of summer. They will produce; but they lack the machinery; they lack the barn space; they lack the power they require on these small farms. They will do their best; but they will do it with a feeling of despair in their hearts; and when there is bitterness, despair and unhappiness, and lack of morale, these are the things which can sabotage a war effort, no matter what the government may say.

Because of these things I shall support the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas). It is the job of the government to provide the sinews of war. Parity prices, such as were outlined in the brief brought here by the farmers of Saskatchewan, are necessary to provide the sinews of war and to make it possible for our farm people to give of their best in this war effort. Food is a sinew of war. I should like to remind this government that if they fail any section of our Canadian people to-day, they fail the whole nation in its hour of peril, and they fail the allies to whom they have pledged a total war effort.

[Mrs. Nielsen.]

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, the government have a tremendous problem. They are carrying an enormous load, and in my judgment they are making a very good job of it. I was impressed yesterday when I listened to the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark) deal with the problems which face the farmers of his district. As he delivered his address I could not help but think what a task the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) must have. The hon. member said, as reported at page 1233 of Hansard:

> At the outset I want to say that neither the rural districts nor the members from Ontario are antagonistic to the welfare or well-being of the people of western Canada. We may disagree with certain policies put forth by the government; we may disagree with the way in which they are applied and the extent to which they go, but we are really interested in their problems and hope that they will appreciate ours.

I want to say to the hon. member for Essex South that this appreciation is fully reciprocated. Two or three years ago I had the privilege of visiting the home of the hon. member, just at the time he was planting his tobacco. It was a surprise to me to learn the amount of work connected with the growing of tobacco. He had a plumber repairing the pipelines and heating plant; he had men putting new glass in his hothouses, he detailed to me the enormous amount of expensive work that was entailed in the production of tobacco. Ever since then I have felt that perhaps there were other agricultural problems in Canada in addition to the growing of wheat. Then yesterday the hon. member, speaking of the sugar beet industry, went on to say, as reported at page 1233:

> We have factories which have been operating for some twenty years, and under the present price scale only ten per cent of the contracts have been signed.

I should think that was a pretty serious situation for the growers of sugar beets. Then he went on:

> Contrast that with the wheat situation. Every table in Canada is affected by the shortage of sugar. We have a large surplus of wheat, and I am glad of that, but we are now going to pay the wheat growers another bonus of $56,000,000.

A little further on he said:

. . . it is difficult for me to go back and ask that same farmer to contribute to a bonus to the western wheat grower to the amount of $56,000,000.

Surely that should suggest to all of us what a job it must be to be Minister of Agriculture in Canada. I have often stated my belief that Canada is the most difficult country in the world to govern. When we consider the wide diversifications that exist, climatic and otherwise, we cannot help but be impressed with the responsibility that rests upon a minister of agriculture in times like these.

Until the day before yesterday I had no intention whatever of taking part in this debate; indeed I did not decide to do so until I heard the remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), that Lochinvar from the west. I should like to quote from the remarks he made the other day in order that the house may appreciate fully just what a wonderful member we have representing the constituency of Qu'Appelle and just why I am replying. Here is what he said, as reported on page 1171 of Hansard:

On many occasions I have gone on record in this house, and I think it is well understood just where I stand. I think I can say that my position is such that I have been the greatest champion—

Listen to this. He is some man!

—of the producers of western Canada in this house. For fourteen consecutive sessions I have been a greater champion than any other member from western Canada.

The Wizard of Oz was as nothing compared with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. I think I have heard every speech the hon. member has delivered in this house in the last six years.

Mr. HOMUTH: That would be enlightening.

Mr. WARD: Yes, quite so. My mind went back to when I used to read Hansard, so I called a page and sent him to the library for all the Hansards from 1931 to 1935 inclusive in which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle had made any statement whatsoever in support of agriculture. I have them all here. I want to say at the outset that I am going to be absolutely fair with the hon. member. I am not going to omit a single speech or item of his in support of western agriculture. Speaking during the debate on the address on April 13, 1931, the hon. member said, as reported at page 574 of Hansard:

My next suggestion may be considered a little drastic, but I offer it by way of immediate relief. I think a suggestion that the 1930 crop be subsidized has been made by one hon. member on this side of the house. I do not intend to go that far, but I think the 1930 crop should be subsidized to the extent of the government paying the freight on all grain sold since the price dropped below 70 cents per bushel. That subsidization would involve only about 50 per cent of the crop, as considerable of the crop was shipped during last September, October and November before the price got below 70 cents per bushel. This would not involve the expenditure entailed in pegging the price at 70 cents per bushel.

I hope the house will keep in mind the fact that he was opposing a price of 70 cents a bushel at that time.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): The freight on top of that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has the floor and interruptions are not in order.

Mr. HOMUTH: Just a minute.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. When the Speaker stands hon. members should sit down. Furthermore, the hon. member for Dauphin has the floor and under the rules there should be no interruption.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, please. Under the rules of the house no interruption is permissible except by leave of the hon. member who has the floor. The Speaker is the servant of the house and must apply the rules because he is the depository of the honour, authority and good behaviour of the house. I should like hon. gentlemen to observe the rules because the Speaker, as the servant of the house, must see to it that the rules which are the command of the house are observed.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, please. The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, please.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, please. I hope I shall not have—

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, please. I hope I shall not have to name the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, please.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, please. Is there any point of order?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You will not let us state it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, please. The hon. member for Dauphin has the floor. No one, except by leave of the hon. gentleman, has the right to interrupt him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the point of order.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, please.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Generally speaking, Your Honour is quite correct, but the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) rose to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes, he did.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There is no point of order before the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Your Honour would not let him state it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, please.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You would not let him state it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There is no point of order before the Chair.

Mr. HOMUTH: Go ahead and run the government; it is quite all right; we are satisfied; go ahead.

Mr. WARD: I was about to point out that at the time the hon. member for Qu'Appelle was speaking, the price of wheat was 36½ cents a bushel to the farmer in his own province.

Mr. HOMUTH: He wanted 70 cents.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the freight.

Mr. WARD: I shall read his statement again for the benefit of the hon. member for Waterloo South.

Mr. HOMUTH: Keep it right.

Mr. WARD: He said:

> This would not involve the expenditure entailed in pegging the price at 70 cents per bushel, which has been requested generally by the farmers of western Canada.

He said that that proposal would not involve that expenditure, and that year the price of wheat was 36½ cents a bushel. We shall now see what he said in 1932. On February 17, 1932, the then member for Assiniboia, Mr. Robert McKenzie—

Mr. HOMUTH: St. Patrick's day.

[Mr. Ward.]

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order please. I shall have to name the hon. gentleman. I hope the hon. gentleman understands parliamentary good manners.

Mr. HOMUTH: The Speaker and I are getting along very well.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Please!

Mr. WARD: The then member for Assiniboia moved a resolution. It will be recalled that this was the year following the introduction of the five cent bonus on wheat. The resolution read:

> Whereas the policy of extending federal assistance to western farmers on a bushel basis rather than on an acreage basis has worked out most unfairly and unjustly to the residents of those districts suffering from failure or near failure of crop,
> And whereas a largely signed petition and memorandum has been presented to the government by the secretary of Saskatchewan association of rural municipalities, praying for additional legislation to partially remedy the situation that exists,
> Therefore be it resolved: that, in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate consideration to a more equitable and less discriminatory solution of this problem.

In that year a man in the district which I have the honour to represent had a crop running fifty-two bushels to the acre, and he received a bonus of $2.60 per acre. Others of my neighbours had crops running forty and forty-five bushels to the acre. At that time I happened to be president of United Farmers of Manitoba, and my work took me through the southwestern part of Manitoba, where owing to drought wheat yields were as low as 8 bushels per acre.

The then hon. member for Kindersley, Mr. Carmichael, speaking in that debate said, as reported at page 292 of Hansard, of February 17, 1932:

> Mr. Speaker, the resolution now before the house says that the act passed last year has worked out most unfairly and unjustly. I rather agree with that statement. In fact I heard the opinion expressed in different parts of my constituency that the act was a very good fulfilment of the Scripture: "Whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he seemeth to have."

He went on to say that he had received a number of resolutions from farmers' organizations and quoted this one as typical of many:

> Whereas the farmers in the dried-out areas are not receiving any of the five cent bonus, and
> Whereas the seed wheat provided by the government will cost the said farmers five cents above market price,
> Be it resolved that we petition the government to grant one dollar per acre on all acreage seeded in 1931, less the bonus already paid.

May I pause to remind those who did not know the then hon. member for Kindersley that if he did not follow along traditional party lines, his feelings were in sympathy more with the Conservative party. But he was an Independent, pretty much in the same position as my hon. friends in the southeast corner.

Mr. HOMUTH: You cannot call them Conservatives, can you?

Mr. WARD: The hon. member must judge for himself.

I come again to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). Speaking in that same debate, he said at the very outset, as reported at page 298 of Hansard of February 17, 1932:

I suppose it is hard for some hon. gentlemen opposite to give this government credit for anything, no matter what it has done.

How reminiscent of my hon. friend and his colleague the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. PERLEY: You ought to have heard what they were saying on this side of the house then.

Mr. WARD: The hon. member was the government's expert on wheat economy, and further on in his remarks he said:

Think what it would mean to the whole of Canada if for the next two years or so there was a normal crop in western Canada. It is quite possible if we have normal climatic conditions next year in the three prairie provinces there should be a production for export of about 500,000,000 bushels of wheat.

He had big ideas. Do you know how much was exported that year, Mr. Speaker? The amount exported was 186,000,000 bushels.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Who was the expert that prophesied 500,000,000?

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. WARD: It was the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. Further on he said:

A crop yield of 500,000,000 bushels for export might easily mean an earning of between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000 for our railways.

How solicitous he was for the railways just then. He went on:

Undoubtedly the morale of the western farmers has been put to a very severe test during the last two or three years, but our flag is not at half mast and the people out there are prepared to carry on and do their best. They are facing the coming season with a spirit of confidence, optimism, courage and fortitude.

Wheat was selling at 30 cents a bushel to the farmer in Saskatchewan the day he was speaking.

Mr. PERLEY: Who was responsible for that?

Mr. WARD: The hon. gentleman's party had been in office for two years.

Mr. PERLEY: Read Mr. Dunning's May budget.

Mr. WARD: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle went on to say:

. . . after the experience of the last three years I am sure they are prepared to go forward and do better.

They did, in 1935. They had profited by their experience. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle went on:

There is no way in which a government could invest a few million dollars to better advantage than by assisting the farmers in some way either through a bonus or by whatever means may be adopted.

At least 90 per cent of the people intend to repay their debt.

Of course they did, if they had anything to pay it with. He concluded his remarks with these words:

I am willing to leave the matter with the government in the belief that they will do what they think best.

I hope hon. members have closely followed these remarks because they do not sound very much like the young Lochinvar who started out to address the house in this debate the other day. Here is what he said in 1932, on February 17, as reported at page 300 of Hansard:

I am willing to leave the matter with the government in the belief that they will do what they think best. . . .

I believe the Prime Minister knows just as much as or more than any other hon. member in this house about western conditions.

Mr. PERLEY: So he did.

Mr. WARD: He went on:

He realizes, as I fully realize, the important position the western provinces hold and the outstanding part they will play in bringing back to normal the state of Canadian economic conditions. We all realize the part the western provinces will play in balancing our trade and furnishing exports. With these thoughts in mind I am sure the Prime Minister wants and intends to do the right thing, and I am prepared to leave the matter with the government and to support whatever measures they may consider right and proper.

He was ready then to support any measure. He went on:

I trust the great majority of the people of Canada, and in the west particularly, are prepared to leave the matter there.

That is the only suggestion he had to make—this man who did more for western agriculture than any other man who came out of the west! When this young Lochinvar was speaking in the house the other day my mind went back to men like Hon. Mr. Motherwell, Hon. Charles Dunning, Hon.

Robert Weir and some private members of the house like Robert Gardiner, George Coote, Alfred Speakman, Ted Garland, J. L. Brown and others who have spent their lives in building up western agriculture and have supported the principle of cooperation throughout and all legislation for the betterment of the western farmer.

Then, speaking in the budget debate on March 31, 1933, as reported at page 3584 of Hansard, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle said:

In the budget brought down by the Prime Minister, then acting as Minister of Finance, in the session of 1931, the bonus of five cents a bushel for wheat—

That is the very maximum—he could not go beyond five cents a bushel.

—was granted to the western farmer. I am particularly interested in that bonus as I was the first member of this house to move on the floor of this chamber for such a bonus to agriculture.

What an accomplishment! I am sure there must be thousands of monuments built on the farms of western Canada to commemorate the action of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle in proposing this great and wonderful assistance to western agriculture. He went on:

I did so on April 13, previous to the bringing-down of that budget. When that proposal was brought down in the budget hon. members of the opposition, particularly those from the west, opposed it strenuously. But under that bonus, Mr. Speaker, the government has paid out some $12,000,000 to the people of the western provinces.

Further on in the same speech he said, as reported at page 3585 of Hansard:

The exports of bacon—

He was talking of bacon now, instead of wheat.

The exports of bacon for the first two months of 1931 amounted to only 120,000 pounds; for the first two months of 1933, they had increased to 4,264,624 pounds.

That was the third year in which his government had been in office.

Mr. PERLEY: The present minister is following along the same lines.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would draw attention to the fact that when an hon. member is speaking he should not be interrupted.

Mr. PERLEY: For the balance of his speech he might give some of his own material.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): You can't take your own.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has the floor. He can make his own speech.

Mr. PERLEY: He is not making his own speech.

Mr. WARD: I will give one further reference to the hon. member's speech. He said, as reported at page 3584:

In the first short session in 1930 two measures were introduced, the first granting $20,000,000 for unemployment relief, and the other dealing with some two hundred odd items in the tariff, being those items which the Prime Minister and his government believed would do most to correct the adverse trade balance at that time. I may say that that increase in the tariff had the desired result.

You bet it had, because I looked up the record to-day from the statistics branch and found that our external trade dropped over half a billion dollars in the twenty-four months that the then government had been in office. So assuredly it had its effect.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The trade of the whole world had dropped.

An hon. MEMBER: Bennett was the cause of it.

Mr. WARD: We come now to 1934. It is getting better all the time! On February 8, 1934, the hon. member, speaking on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, said, as reported at page 373 of Hansard of that year:

Let us now take the exports of wheat. During the period in which the opposition held office there was an abnormal increase in production, and exports did not keep pace with that increase. We find that in 1922 our exports of wheat from Canada amounted to 185,000,000 bushels and in 1930 the total was 186,000,000 bushels.

I do not know how he expected to make a handle out of that, but he does refer to it. The next place in Hansard where he refers to wheat is at page 375:

The question of the wheat agreement is vital to western Canada at the present time and I feel that this matter should be thoroughly discussed. The other day the Prime Minister outlined the whole situation with respect to the circumstances leading up to the wheat agreement, and it would be presumption on my part to go into it in fuller detail than he did.

A little further on he says:

The exporting countries undertook that there should be a fifteen per cent reduction in acreage or production.

He does not say so, but I imagine he is referring to the international gathering which took place in 1934.

Mr. HOMUTH: Not such a bad one, either.

Mr. WARD: However, it will be seen that at that time the government were considering some measure of reducing wheat acreage, but no reduction took place. The present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) undertook just about a year ago to reduce wheat acreage in this country in a practical way, with the result that it was cut by seven million acres in one year.

Mr. PERLEY: Mr. Speaker, would you allow me one question? In that same speech —if you will read it—I think I suggested how to control production and delivery to the market, on the basis of so many bushels per acre on the seeded acreage, the possible exports, and everything; then, issue the quota. That is the first time that a quota basis of delivery was ever suggested in this house.

Mr. WARD: I was coming to that. I was going to give the hon. member credit for having suggested something in the nature of a quota. But the point I wish to make is that apparently all his efforts had no effect on his own government. His party was then in power. It is easy to talk when you are in opposition. I think we can excuse the hon. member for not having too much influence with the government in office to-day, but he had five years in which to work, and the price of wheat in those years, from 1931 to 1935, was, on the average, 40¼ cents a bushel net to the farmer. During all that time nothing was effected but the five cents a bushel, and that lasted for just one year. A little later in the same speech the hon. member said:

> But the farmers are very much concerned as to how they are to proceed to bring about the fifteen per cent reduction. I am farming on a considerable scale myself and I am concerned about it.

He then goes on to suggest something in the nature of a bonus, but nothing more came of it. It is merely an empty suggestion that gets nowhere.

We come now to 1935. One would have thought that at that time, obviously the last year his government was likely to be in office, something would have been done. In his first reference to wheat he complained bitterly of Hon. W. R. Motherwell. He said he thought that Mr. Motherwell had gone out and won an election in Saskatchewan on dollar wheat, "Vote for Motherwell and dollar wheat". He complained a second time that the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) won an election by telling the people that dollar wheat would provide a surplus for a rainy day.

Mr. HOMUTH: Did they get it?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: When?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): In 1936-37.

Mr. PERLEY: That makes the minister laugh.

Mr. WARD: I mention these matters, Mr. Speaker, not particularly for the benefit of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, but to refresh our memories as to what consideration was given to wheat during those five years when the present opposition was in office and when the average price to the farmer was 40¼ cents a bushel. At one time wheat was selling in my own constituency for twenty-one cents a bushel. These are matters in which I think we should be interested, in the light of the attitude taken by hon. members like the hon. member for Qu'Appelle in relation to the measure which is now before the house, and which I intend to support. I support it not because I think ninety cents is enough—it is not sufficient, I know, on my own farm—but in the light of conditions generally. I support heartily the continuation of the bonus principle. It is the only way to deal with that great semi-arid area of western Canada. I am grateful for what we have got; it means ninety cents plus the bonus.

I should now like to turn my attention to another quarter of the house. We have heard a good deal during the present session—and it is time someone said something in rebuttal—regarding the organized industrial workers of this country. Not long ago I visited one of our largest industrial plants, in which several thousand people work. As I walked through the plant, the first thing which impressed me was the small number of persons doing technical work. I saw very few jobs which I myself, were I twenty years younger, could not have done after two hours' training. As I walked through this steel plant, I inquired as to the class of material they were turning out, and the last question I would ask these young men I talked to was, "What do they pay you for this job?" From the first group I received the answer, "seven dollars for a day of eight hours, seven days a week;" and when I got to the other end of the line I found that the men there were getting eleven dollars a day. I began to scratch my head and wonder why in the world I was wasting my time as a member of parliament.

Within two weeks of the time I was there, the same crowd went on strike for higher pay. I was not very happy about it because I thought there was surely something wrong. So I sent to the bureau of statistics for some figures in order that I might draw a comparison between the earnings of these men and the earnings of farmers, the work being very similar. This is what I got. The average farm in Canada has a value of $7,202, equipped with live stock to the value of $746, and the average value of implements and other equipment is $893, making a total of $8,841. Then I inquired how many men were employed on the average farm in Canada and I was told, 1·2 on the average, with the operator, or a little more than two men on each farm in Canada. With all the bonuses added last year, the average gross earnings of our farms in Canada was $1,139. Take these same plants that I was in where men were working, without responsibility and without any investment; and they were earning just under $2,000—$1,960 a year. The question I ask myself is this: Is there growing up in this country a new racket? In days gone by, we spoke of the banking racket and there was the manufacturers' racket.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not manufacturing.

Mr. WARD: Under the shadow of protection we referred to them as racketeers.

Mr. MacNICOL: You were entirely wrong.

Mr. WARD: Then there was the steel racket, in connection with which great bonuses of many millions were paid out to the steel interests. Of late years, however, since this government of ours has been in power, what with taxation, the conscription of wealth idea, and so on, we do not hear more about these racketeers. The government has them pretty well cornered. I was in company with a group of industrialists a short time ago, and one smilingly said, "The day of the rich man has gone; the government has caught up with us." "Thank God," I said. But I am wondering whether there is not a new racket in Canada. We have heard a great deal from the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) with regard to Kirkland Lake. The other day I sent to the bureau of statistics for a statement of average wages—not salaries—paid to Kirkland Lake miners, and I would pause here to remind the house that the men engaged in those mines are not men who in the main have invested money in education. That may be their misfortune, but they have not.

Mr. HOMUTH: Are you saying they are stupid?

Mr. WARD: Not at all. I am not saying that. Those men are quite intelligent. But the point I am making is that they have not invested a lot of money in education, and they have no investment in any other form. Yet they get $1,745 a year, whereas the average farmer in Canada, with an investment of $8,841, with the help of a hired man, to whom he pays $477 a year—and taking the ·2 extra, it brings the total farm wages up to $572—receives for himself $567, and out of that he has to pay municipal taxes amounting to $80.40, fire insurance $18, life insurance, if he has any, $30, and has to provide general support for his family and pay doctors' bills, dentists, education and provide food and clothing and care generally for his family and take care of his buildings and machinery. All that he has to accomplish with $567, while we pay these racketeers, the workers in the large industries of the country, from $1,500 to $2,000 though they have neither investment nor responsibility.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is an unfair statement.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do you call the workers racketeers?

Mr. WARD: I sent to the bureau of statistics the other day to get figures for some specific plants in Canada and they telephoned saying they could not give them to me, but they did give me the average wage in all the primary steel industries of the country. There were sixty-five, and the average wage is $1,580, from the boy who sweeps the floor right up. The wage scale is $1,580. In other words, they get nearly $400 a year more than the farmer receives for an investment of nearly $9,000, and he has the help of a hired man and his family. That is what the farmer gets for the whole year. I mention these matters in order to point out that we have devoted entirely too much consideration to the people who have a guarantee in the form of a good job. What better guarantee could any man have than a job paying $2,000 or even $1,500 when he has no responsibility and no investment.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is that the enunciation of the Liberal policy?

Mr. WARD: I am speaking only for myself.

Mr. HOMUTH: Thank God for that.

Mr. WARD: I was at Niagara Falls less than a year ago and I found there they were building the great international bridge. I inquired what wages the men were getting and I was told they were getting $1.50 an hour and working ten hours a day. That meant they were getting $15 a day. Two weeks after I was there they went on strike for $1.65 an hour and they got it. It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, we are developing a new form of autocracy in this country.

Mr. HOMUTH: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WARD: Yes.

Mr. HOMUTH: Has the hon. gentleman any idea how many bridges per annum these men work on?

Mr. WARD: No, I have not, and perhaps there may be something in what the hon.

member has interjected. But the point is that there is plenty of steel work all over Canada.

Mr. HOMUTH: You fellows have been bridging things so many years you do not understand any more.

Mr. WARD: I contend, however, there is a serious disparity between the earnings of our farmers and the wages paid to organized industrial workers of the country.

I wish to thank the house for its patience with me and particularly the member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), but I am sure he will not again tell us that he was the only champion, or at least the greatest champion, of agricultural interests from the west during those years to which he referred, because had he been the magician he would have us believe he was, surely he could have impressed his great leader; the then Minister of Agriculture from that province, the late Hon. Robert Weir, and some of the other members of the government, to do something for agriculture during those four or five terrible years.

There was a great deal in what the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) said this afternoon, that the problem of the west is the problem of the backlog of debt piled up during those years. I operate a three-quarter section farm, some of the richest perhaps in all Canada. For two years, 1931 and 1932, I had to go to other sources to obtain $1,000 to meet the bare running expenses of my farm. Why? Because I was selling wheat and other products at prices too far below the cost of production. I am not blaming the then government entirely for that; I know there was a depression, but I do criticize the complete failure of that government to do anything practical until just before their dying day to assist western agriculture. We all like the hon. member for Qu'Appelle; we like to hear him talk, but it is not very consistent for him now to accuse this government of failing western agriculture because it is not fixing the price at a dollar a bushel when he himself and his colleagues of that day left the farmers of the west for nearly five years selling their wheat at forty cents a bushel.

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): The subject of wheat, its production, and the price obtained for it, deserves the serious and closest attention of this house; for there is in fact hardly a constituency represented here which is not either directly or indirectly affected thereby. I am particularly concerned and the constituency from which I come is particularly concerned with this problem. Although that constituency is largely urban, nevertheless it comes within that great triangle described by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) the other day, and mentioned by so many speakers since, in which it is difficult to grow anything in volume except wheat. I am not a farmer and do not purport to be an expert in such matters, nevertheless there are one or two suggestions which I should like to place before this house because I believe them to be pertinent at this time.

First, with respect to the Minister of Agriculture I do not propose to lavish fulsome praise upon him, nor am I going to search for language with which to call him names and at the same time keep within parliamentary limits, because to my mind neither is useful or necessary, particularly at a time as serious as this through which we are now going.

Someone suggested the other day the possibility of fighting a Saskatchewan provincial election on the floor of this house. We recently had the spectacle of some by-elections being fought on the floor of this house, when certain hon. members expressed opinions obviously deliberately intended for consumption in other parts of the country. In my opinion the course of conduct adopted at that time was not calculated to raise either this house or this government in the esteem of the people of the country.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Or the opposition.

Mr. BENCE: I would ask the hon. member for Fraser Valley to stop chattering when I am endeavouring to make a speech.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: "Endeavouring" is right.

Mr. BENCE: The hon. member is continually interrupting speakers in this house. He interrupted me the last time I spoke. I had good reason to interrupt him when he spent twenty minutes in indulging in a diatribe. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to stop his interruptions. I do not mind intelligent interruptions, but I object to the chattering from that corner of the house.

The problems confronting us are, I suggest, far too serious to allow time for the luxury of political jockeying within the confines of this chamber. With all due respect I warn my friends and colleagues from Saskatchewan that the people of that province do not want wheat to be made a political football. The livelihood and the well-being of the people of that province and other provinces transcend political considerations. We from the province of Saskatchewan must be very careful to see that political considerations and political harangues do not prevent us from getting that equality and justice which we believe are, in the words of the Prime Minister, the rightful heritage of all. I regard with the gravest suspicion any attempt by any political party to use as a vehicle for attempted political success the great agricultural organizations of this country. I hope that such attempts will be resisted by these agricultural organizations, because if they are not the usefulness of those organizations will be drastically reduced.

I listened with some dismay the other day to the attack made by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) upon the wheat pool, because it seemed to me that by that attack he was opening up an issue and focusing political attention upon a great and useful agricultural organization which is composed of men of all shades of political thought, and which should be so composed if it is to be of use to Saskatchewan and to Canada.

With respect to the Minister of Agriculture I have this to say: the minister in my opinion always knows what he is talking about. When we ask him a question he knows the answer, with very few exceptions, even if sometimes he does not give us the whole of it. He knows about wheat and wheat problems. I am going to repeat a suggestion which I made here last year and which has been made on many occasions, that is that he should be given the whole problem to handle, including the setting of the price and determining the advance and questions relating to it which are now dealt with by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). I have the greatest respect for the Minister of Trade and Commerce both inside and outside this house. He has demonstrated his ability as a negotiator, but in my opinion he does not know a great deal about the wheat problem. That is only natural, because he has not had the background of experience which is necessary to know the problem thoroughly.

A few years ago I understand consideration was given to the question of transferring that phase of the work of the Department of Trade and Commerce, when Mr. Euler was the minister in charge, to the Department of Agriculture. At that time, according to the information I obtained in the press—because I was not a member of this house and did not have access to the exact information—the suggestion was opposed by the then Minister of Trade and Commerce. But I do believe that at this time the present minister would be very glad to be relieved of the embarrassment of looking after this particular phase of the problem. At the same time the people of Saskatchewan, who are particularly and vitally interested, would prefer to have one figure on which to focus their attention, because, after all, as I imagine the Minister of Agriculture remembers only too well, occasions do arise when particular problems come up in connection with the matter of wheat and the minister has sometimes said, "Well, I am the minister from Saskatchewan, it is quite true, but this matter is handled by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce." It seems to me that every one would be far better satisfied if one man had charge of it, one man who would be in a position to answer all our questions in connection with this particular subject.

I am not satisfied with 90-cent wheat, Mr Speaker, and I fail to see how any hon. member coming from an agricultural constituency of western Canada could be satisfied with it. Nevertheless it is a decided improvement. It is an improvement of 20 cents per bushel for the amount of wheat that is going to be taken, which amount, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated, is limited. Consequently there will be a decided improvement in the ability of the western wheat farmer to carry on. It is somewhat fallacious to be continually referring to 90-cent wheat. I know that most members of this house recognize the fact that actually it is not 90-cent wheat, but it seems to me that that fact should be impressed upon hon. members continually in dealing with this question, in order that they may deal with it intelligently. We know that 90-cent wheat means approximately 65 to 70 cents on the prairies. Last year when the price was 70 cents, No. 1, Fort William, it actually brought only 45 to 50 cents for No. 1 and No. 2 northern. I believe we should impress that upon our minds, for unless we do we shall not be in a position to determine exactly what it means to the western farmer and exactly what he is obtaining for his product.

To my mind a great deal of the credit for the improved situation as far as the wheat farmer is concerned must go to that great delegation of western farmers and business men who came to this city a short time ago and presented a most capable and most reasonably framed brief to the government, in which they requested an initial payment of $1 a bushel as an absolute minimum. They set the initial payment at $1, not because it was a parity price either on the basis of the 1913-14 parity or the 1926-29 parity; they did so because they recognized the fact that this country is passing through very trying times; because they realized that we were in a life and death struggle, and because they knew the exigencies of the situation. But that initial price or advance of $1 was, I submit, the absolute minimum which, after very careful study and research, they felt was required to permit them to carry on under existing conditions. It was not—and I want to emphasize this point—a basis for bargaining; it was a minimum. I was surprised to hear the Minister of Agriculture offer the suggestion on Tuesday evening that the delegation did not expect to get the $1 initial advance. That is contrary to the statement issued by the head of the pool and the head of the delegation, Mr. J. H. Wesson, after the 90-cent policy was announced. According to the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of March 7, he said:

If a situation has developed under which western members have thought it necessary to compromise there will be genuine regret amongst the members of the delegation and the 185,000 people who signed the farm petition.

Then he referred to the fact that three years ago the initial price was set at sixty cents and subsequently raised to seventy cents, and expressed the hope that after this matter had received the consideration of the house and the agriculture committee, in view of the reasonableness of their presentation and the logic of their arguments, the House of Commons and the government would see fit to raise the price to that minimum initial payment of $1.

There is one point about this whole matter which I should like to emphasize because to my mind it goes to the whole root of the problem. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has stated that the wheat board will buy only that amount of wheat which it expects to be able to dispose of during the coming crop year.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Oh, no.

Mr. BENCE: The minister says that statement is not true. My statement was that the minister said the amount of 280,000,000 bushels was the amount which they expected to be able to dispose of during the coming crop year. Now that the minister has contradicted me, I would refer to his own words.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): If I may interrupt the hon. member, he said we were only taking what we expected to be able to sell.

Mr. BENCE: That was my statement.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The statement was that we are taking 280,000,000 bushels of wheat definitely, whether or not we sell that amount. We arrived at that figure by estimating what we might be able to sell.

Mr. BENCE: I quite agree. I do not think there is any difference between the minister and myself in that regard. The minister and the department estimated that the wheat board would be able to dispose of 280,000,000 bushels.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes; we took a very generous guess at it.

Mr. BENCE: I am only taking the minister's own words for it, as they appear at page 1124 of Hansard:

This figure is based upon estimated domestic and export demand but it is extremely difficult to accurately forecast exports a year and a half in advance.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That is right. I think I must have misunderstood the hon. member.

Mr. BENCE: The point I am making is that this is the amount which the government or the wheat board expect to be able to sell, either domestically or abroad, during the coming crop year; it is this amount, and this amount only, that they are prepared to purchase from the farmer, and they have told this to the farmer. In other words, they are not paying the farmer money for something which they anticipate will not be required. They are paying the farmer for 280,000,000 bushels of wheat because they believe 280,000,000 bushels will be utilized, either in domestic consumption or for export trade.

Attention is drawn to the fact that there is at the present time a reserve of approximately 480,000,000 bushels on hand, and that at the end of the present crop year that will be reduced to approximately 400,000,000 bushels. But I would point out that, as I understand it, this has been declared a necessary war reserve; at least outstanding men of the world have declared that it is necessary to have a reserve like this set aside. The Right Hon. Winston Churchill has said it; the President of the United States has referred to the necessity for it, and members of this administration have spoken of the necessity of setting up a reserve such as this. They consider that that is a sufficient amount to set aside as a reserve for the purpose of feeding Europe when the blockade is lifted and the war is over and for the psychological purpose of dangling it before the eyes of the nazi countries. Consequently, that reserve is put aside and should have no influence whatsoever upon the price. The only thing that should be taken into consideration is the fact that 280,000,000 bushels are required.

As the Minister of Agriculture has pointed out, we require to ship to Great Britain, pork, beef, cheese, butter, eggs, wheat and many other products for the prosecution of the war. He has indicated also that in the majority of cases the producers of these products are dependent upon the treasury of Canada for a return for their production. With one exception, as mentioned by the minister the other night, the case of butter, a large proportion of the amount being paid to these producers is taken out of the treasury of Canada. Consequently I say to him and to the house: Is there any reason for a distinction between the amount paid to the wheat grower and the amounts paid to the producers of these other commodities? They are all required for the same purpose, namely, to be sent to Great Britain to help in the prosecution of the war. It is right and proper that a large part of the cost of these products should be borne by the treasury of Canada. It is part of our contribution toward the war effort, but there is no reason why the wheat farmer should be placed in a different category from the producers of eggs, cheese, pork, beef and so on.

The Minister of Agriculture demonstrated that in most instances the prices of these other products are at parity or in excess of parity. Consequently I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and this house: Is there any reason why there should not be a parity price for the amount of wheat that will be used? Tell the farmer that you cannot take any more than 280,000,000 bushels of his wheat because that is the amount you estimate you will be able to use. But you should deal with him as fairly as you deal with the other agriculturists with respect to the price for what you will take.

The Minister of Agriculture asserted the other evening that the amount of money being spent to look after this problem was all that could safely be taken out of the treasury of Canada at this time. I wonder how the minister or the government arrived at that conclusion. I wonder how they arrived at the decision that it would be dangerous to take any more money for this purpose out of the treasury of Canada. How did they know that the government should stop at that particular figure? How did they arrive at the conclusion that it would be unsafe to go any farther? Would it be unsafe to add ten cents a bushel to the initial payment and make it a dollar, or an additional $28,000,000? Would it be unsafe to pay the whole $28,000,000? Would it be unsafe to pay half of it? Would it be unsafe to pay $1,000,000? Have we exceeded the point and are we now on unsafe ground? I think we should have more information in connection with that particular point.

Mr. GARDINER: Would my hon. friend like to have the information now? I can give it in just a word.

Mr. BENCE: Other members have been prevented from finishing their speeches because of lack of time. I should like to have the information, but I ask the minister to give it on his own time so that I can finish my remarks. I am glad the Minister of Agriculture has anticipated my question and I shall look forward with interest to his explanation.

What would happen to the war effort of Canada and the treasury of Canada if the government went a little further and made it dollar wheat? This question should be coupled with the assertion made by the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark) who referred to Hong Kong and said that in view of the exigencies of the situation he thought the wheat growers ought to ask the government to take this money to buy more bombers, more munitions of war and so on. I believe he was applauded by hon. members on the other side of the house. I cannot follow the logic of either the Minister of Agriculture or the hon. member for Essex South.

As far as I can see from an examination of the statements made in this house by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and other ministers, the war effort of this country, the manufacture of tanks, bombers, corvettes, planes and the rest of it, will not be affected one iota by a price of one dollar for wheat. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has asserted in this house time and time again that our war effort is not circumscribed by a lack of finance, that it is circumscribed only by lack of materials, by lack of factories, by a lack of labour and that kind of thing.

Recently we had in this house a debate lasting some five weeks in connection with the taking of a plebiscite during which the Minister of Finance made a most eloquent speech. He made reference to the criticism there had been with respect to the cost of the plebiscite, and he poured scorn upon those people who interpreted the cost of the plebiscite in terms of corvettes, planes, tanks and bombers. If my memory serves me aright, he said that the country's war effort in connection with production was not limited by finance, but that, as everyone knows, it was limited only by those things to which I have referred, namely, material and labour and factories. Consequently the suggestion that has been made that it is a question of finance and that the farmers, by getting more money for their wheat, might slow up the war effort is, to my mind, a most fallacious argument. I am convinced that if the farmers of western Canada thought for one minute that the raising of the price of wheat to one dollar would be detrimental to the war effort, they would be the first to say no. But there has been no proof that that would be so.

There has been an attempt made in this house by some hon. members to effect a cleavage between the sections of the prairies concerned with wheat by insisting that there are two schools of thought, one wanting higher prices for wheat and the other wanting increased payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. In my opinion those who put forth this argument are merely attempting to draw a red herring across the trail. There are not two schools of thought among the farmers. We want a continuation of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act because we believe it is absolutely necessary in crop failure or near crop failure districts. For instance, in my own constituency last fall the price of wheat was not so important because we had had a partial crop failure. The assistance given under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was most beneficial. The two go hand in hand; they cannot be separated. Payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act are made in cases where there is a crop failure or a partial crop failure, and these payments are entirely justified. In districts in which there is a crop failure or a partial crop failure the farmers are entitled to assistance because, when there were good crops generally, they did not get a reasonable price for it. In 1940 there were bumper crops in some districts, but they did not get enough from their wheat to put anything aside for the days of crop failure, and there, I submit, is the real justification for the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

In conclusion, by way of brief recapitulation, I just want to emphasize this: Ample proof has been given in this house by hon. members from all sides that the wheat farmer is not getting parity prices and that, generally speaking, in comparison with other agricultural producers at this time, he is suffering more than they. I do not propose to clutter up the pages of Hansard with any more statistics because I think enough figures have been given in the last three days to demonstrate the proposition that the wheat producer in comparison with other producers is not receiving as much as they and is not receiving parity prices. It is conceded that a wheat reserve is required. It has been stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the wheat board is going to take only that amount of wheat which the wheat board and the government estimate they will be able to dispose of, and it is admitted that that amount is approximately 280,000,000 bushels. Therefore I say that we should receive for this 280,000,000 bushels a price which is something akin to parity. The price of $1, as has been demonstrated by the figures given by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross), is considerably below parity price, and there seems to be no real reason why the price cannot be raised to at least that much.

As far as the amendment is concerned, I have no hesitation whatsoever in supporting it. It favours parity prices, and I fail to see how any hon. member of this house, particularly those interested in agriculture, can disagree with the principle of a programme of parity prices, because parity prices mean nothing more or less than equality among all sections of our people.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at great length on this subject because it has been fairly well covered by other hon. members who have preceded me. I believe that one of the greatest problems facing us to-day from the point of view of agriculture is production, and that one of the greatest problems facing us from the point of view of the entire war is production. I have said on other occasions that my great concern in this war is the proper control of production. I am not so much concerned with what the government does with that production after it gets it, provided it is made good use of, as I am concerned about proper methods of production.

I think we are all greatly concerned at this time, as the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) has so eloquently expressed it, with preserving unity in Canada, to prosecute to the full the war in which we are engaged. But I do not see how it is possible to have unity in Canada unless we have unity among all classes of our people. You certainly cannot divide eastern Canada from western Canada and then expect to proceed along normal lines. It just cannot be done, and it will not be done. You cannot divide the forces of our industrial areas and expect production to go along harmoniously. It just cannot be done. I do not believe that there is a class of people in Canada who have done more not only in the production of things they were asked to produce but also in enlistments in all the fighting forces of Canada than the western farmer. I think I am safe in saying that western Canada has contributed more per capita to the fighting forces than any other part of Canada.

Mr. KIRK: Take and include the merchant marine and check up on Nova Scotia.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They do not comprise a great number.

Mr. KIRK: I mean on a percentage basis.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They form a part of Canada, I agree, but they do not form a major part.

Mr. KIRK: I am speaking of the merchant marine.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There again, Mr. Speaker, you see we cannot have unity in Canada until we have a degree of understanding. I am afraid that my hon. friend on the other side shows a decided lack of understanding of agricultural problems.

Mr. KIRK: You are the one who spoke disparagingly.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And you are the one who interrupted. If the hon. member would rise in his place and present his point in orderly fashion, I am sure that the rest of us would be delighted to hear him.

Mr. KIRK: I just wanted to assist my hon. friend in getting his facts straight.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I just want to use the words of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) himself, Mr. Speaker, to show that a class distinction is drawn between eastern Canada and western Canada. If that part of the country represented by my hon. friend opposite is not being properly treated, I think it ill behooves him to sit idly by and say, as the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) said the other day, that he is bound to follow the government. I do not think that is the proper attitude. I think my hon. friend should rise in his place and express the desires that he has and get recognition for what he believes to be right.

Mr. TUCKER: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member said that I had said I was bound to follow the government whatever it did. I challenge the hon. member to point to a single statement of mine where I intimated anything of the kind.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Is this on a point of order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. TUCKER: Yes. I make the point of order that my hon. friend is misrepresenting what I am supposed to have stated in this house, and I ask him to withdraw that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Rosthern is objecting to the statement that he had said he was prepared to follow the government at all times, and I understood he was not quite sure whether those were the words used by the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am sorry I did not quite hear what you said, Mr. Speaker, but if the hon. member objects, he is quite in order.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Mr. TUCKER: Does the hon. gentleman withdraw his statement?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Rosthern wishes to know if the hon. member for Bow River will withdraw the statement he made?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not know, Mr. Speaker, what statement I made that was incorrect.

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. gentleman said that the member for Rosthern took the attitude that he had to support anything the government brought in. I never made any such statement, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am sorry if the hon. member is offended by that remark. I merely said that is what I understood. That was my understanding of the statement the other day.

Mr. TUCKER: It is wrong. I am not responsible for the lack of understanding on the part of the hon. member. I ask him to withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has stated that he did not make the remark which was quoted by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) who now has the floor. Will he kindly tender a withdrawal?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, that was exactly the thing I was trying to convey to Your Honour. If the hon. member now denies that, I am perfectly willing to withdraw. If he is not bound to follow the government, that is his affair. I am glad to hear it, though.

As I was pointing out, there is one section of Canada which is being discriminated against. The Minister of Agriculture, I believe, acknowledged that the other day, when he said, as recorded in Hansard, page 1211:

> The correspondence which I have on my desk is full of appeals to the government to remember that Canada is at war, and these appeals come from Saskatchewan farmers, not from eastern industrialists, as some people would seem to imply sometimes is the case in relation to agricultural problems. These are from Saskatchewan farmers telling us to stay with the job—get food over to Britain—"and we will struggle along. If you have to assist us," they say, "assist us with acreage payments, and if after that you can give us something more for our wheat we shall be pleased to have it. But," they say, "the most important thing at the present time is to fight this war to a successful conclusion because if we do not we shall not be able to market any farm products to advantage for many years after this war is over." That is the important problem which is in the mind of the western farmer, . . .

I think that without question of doubt the Minister of Agriculture will agree with me that these people are sincere. On no occasion, as far as I know, has he suggested otherwise. But I want to point out two references in his speech. First he refers to the eastern industrialists. The farmers who have written to him have demonstrated their loyalty beyond question, even to the extent of saying, "and we will struggle along." I regard that as one of the highest forms of patriotism, and it should appeal to the Minister of Agriculture in the matter of giving the western farmers a square deal, for I am sure he is personally convinced that they are not receiving a sufficient price. But I want to compare the attitude of the western agriculturist—and I think the expression of opinion which I have just read is common to Alberta and Manitoba as well as Saskatchewan, indeed to all agriculturists throughout Canada—the sense of loyalty and patriotism which was expressed to the minister in the correspondence of these people, with, should I say, the patriotism of the eastern industrialists, as recorded in Hansard, September 12, 1939, at page 179. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), speaking at that time, said:

> The provision of 5 per cent was put in the last act after a good deal of consideration as a minimum return for the service rendered, but it was one which men of considerable experience believed to be unworkable. I can say to my hon. friend that from that day to this the defence purchasing board has done its best to place contracts on that basis and has used every pressure that could be brought to bear in the form of patriotism and so on, but to date it has not succeeded in placing a single contract on that basis.

There you have a situation where the industrialists were working on a cost-plus contract. They were getting a clear five per cent profit after all their expenses, including depreciation of their machinery, rent of plant, and their own wages, yet they absolutely refused the proposition and went on a sit-down strike. The minister could not place a single contract. And you call that patriotism! I do not think the eastern industrialist should even question the proposition that the agriculturist should get at least a dollar a bushel. When the Minister of Agriculture appeals to the farmers to produce wheat, not, mark you, at cost of production, but at a loss, they without hesitation have produced more than he knows what to do with. Not so with the industrialists. They simply refused. And who won out? As the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) said the other day, the squeaking wheel gets the grease, and those squawkers got the grease to the extent of considerably more than five per cent. I do not think you can expect unity under those circumstances.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Rosthern interrupted me. I want to put his words on Hansard, so that he will be able to read them and will not have any reason to complain.

Mr. TUCKER: All right; put my right words on Hansard and I won't complain.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I shall read from Hansard. I hope the hon. member is listening. This is page 1145:

> I ask the government, which I am proud and pleased to follow, in this time of world crisis, to do the thing that is necessary to mobilize this country's industrial capacity one hundred per cent.

These are the words which he used. That is in effect what I said.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has repeated the statement.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, is this a point of order?

Mr. TUCKER: It is a point of order.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What is the point of order?

Mr. TUCKER: The point of order is that the hon. member read my statement and said that that in effect was what he said, and it was not in effect what he said. I said that I was proud and pleased to follow this government in this time of world crisis. That is an entirely different thing from saying that I am bound to support anything that they do. Again I ask the hon. member to withdraw his last statement.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not see the hon. member's point of order. I told him that I was going to read the words he said. Now he takes offence at that. Does he want to agree with the first words I said?

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. member went on to say "those were the words I said in the first place".

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I said no such thing—if the hon. member will listen.

Mr. TUCKER: I listened very carefully.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I cannot help what he understood. I took the words from Hansard that he said, and still the hon. member is not satisfied.

Mr. TUCKER: I am quite satisfied with my own words, but I do not like them edited by the hon. member.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Now, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be permitted to go on. I said that the Minister of Agriculture himself, in my opinion, was not satisfied, and that certainly the people of western Canada had good grounds for being discontented. In fact they were so discontented that 430 of them had to come here to Ottawa; they held their meeting over in the Chateau Laurier, at which meeting the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce were present, and I was there listening to the remarks. When they had concluded their presentation to the government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce rose on the platform and said that the demands of that convention were just and fair. I commend him for that; I think he was sincere and honest. That is all these people are asking. I think they have every right to insist upon a square deal, and it was a square deal; the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) admitted that it was fair. I say, therefore, that they have just as much right to ask that their demands be granted as the industrialists of eastern Canada have to ask that they be allowed to make a profit above all their expenses, and a profit above five per cent.

I suggest to the minister that he will run into a lot of difficulty, and I think he could well afford to take a leaf out of the book of American history and to consider the suggestions made in regard to the AAA programme. Let him consider what was said by the representative of that organization when speaking in the Chateau Laurier. He gave us an outline of the way in which the agricultural organization was set up in the United States. He pointed out that after considerable years of experience they had found it advisable to organize their department from among the agriculturists. That is to say, the farmers had their small community organizations throughout all the counties in the United States, and these small organizations, or small committees, elected what were termed committee men. These committees represented something like 130,000 people. I am speaking from memory. From among them the government chose their advisers and that formed the basis of their department. It was on the advice of these men, actual farmers, that they drew up their agricultural policy.

I believe that if the Minister of Agriculture gave the farmers a share of responsibility in forming their own policy, there would be a great deal more satisfaction. He would do well, I suggest, to call into his department some of these people. In the department there are some fellows who do not know the first thing about agriculture. The minister should allow practical agriculturists to take part in drawing up the policy, because they have ability, as was demonstrated at the convention at the Chateau Laurier. There are some clever men among them and they could get together under the leadership of the Minister of Agriculture. I do not think they could pick a better man from that party, though they might get an improvement upon him outside. In their party, however, they have the best they can get, and with him as leader guiding them I am sure that better results would be obtained if he sat round a table with these men representing agriculture and in that way fixed upon the acreage reduction and the price, on a fair basis, allowing them to state how much acreage reduction there should be, the amount of increased stock production, and so on. I believe he would get a far greater degree of cooperation in that way than he has so far obtained. In other words, I suggest that you have to give these men democracy in action. You have to show them that democracy is working for instead of against them. I could not do better than read what Mr. Evans said at that meeting at the Chateau Laurier on January 29, 1942:

> I tell you this, in closing, only because that experience so forcibly brought home to me the strength of a fertile land tilled by free men, men willing to work for democracy because democracy is working for them.

I think the Minister of Agriculture will admit that the United States programme is better than ours.

A good deal has been said about the cost of production. I do not intend to weary the house by giving a great many figures, because, after all, it is difficult to follow these figures. I will speak more or less in the words of the Minister of Agriculture in reference to cost of production. Every member will recall, I believe, that about a year ago the Minister of Agriculture agreed that the cost of production was ninety cents on the farm, and I think he made a conservative estimate. He just about hit it. I do not like to flatter him at all, but his judgment is good. The Minister of Agriculture agreed that ninety cents was the cost of production, and he who was in charge of agriculture must take responsibility along with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, for setting the price at seventy cents.

Mr. GARDINER: The advance was set at 70 cents, not the price.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not think there is much danger of the farmers getting more, do you?

Mr. GARDINER: It has been up to seventy-eight cents even with that advance.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The farmers have not received any of it.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They were supposed to receive twelve cents at one time, but that is bringing us back into election times, and they were promised a dollar.

Mr. GARDINER: The average price of the first three months of this past season was seventy-four cents, and the price did go as high as within a fraction of a cent of seventy-eight.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But my point is that so far the farmers have not received anything on participation certificates.

Mr. GARDINER: Some of the farmers sold at that price.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That was what it sold at on the open market, but those who sold to the board did not get that, and what was sold on the open market and what was sold to the board are two different things.

Mr. GARDINER: Delivery was taken at an advance of seventy cents, but the final settlement will not be made until all the wheat is sold.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): While the minister may be correct in saying that, it is nevertheless true that he said on that occasion as well that the farmers would lose around $100,000,000. That would be the loss to the farmers.

Mr. GARDINER: That was by reducing acreage.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That was their cash loss. I do not care what you call it; it comes out of their pockets. It is all right for the minister to say now that the farmers will get a dollar a bushel. You can sit here and do all the figuring you like, but when you ask the farmer what he got for his wheat and he tells you he got forty-eight cents, it is mighty hard to convince him that he got a dollar. It is as the hon. member for Battle River said the other night. What the farmer actually received was forty-eight cents, and you cannot convince him that that is a dollar unless you are a magician.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but if I may be permitted again would point out that the other night I could have read the letters to which I referred, and there were letters from farmers stating that they did get at the farm as high as $1.40.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That might have been an individual case, but that is certainly not the average. In some particular instances, with other farm produce they marketed, the total return may have come up to that. I am not disputing that, but I say that that was not the average. I am saying that the farmers in most instances did not get anywhere near it. If I recall rightly, the minister said the other day that the farmers this year would not make any money. I cannot understand why it is that every other industry in Canada is not asked to carry on at a loss. Other industries are not expected to. There is only one industry, and that an industry we could not do without for one year without total failure in this war, and that industry is agriculture. Only that one industry is asked to produce at less than cost. Surely my hon. friends from eastern Canada must understand that that is not a fair proposition. You are not going to have unity when here in eastern Canada they get $1.26 for their wheat and out in the west under this new programme they are going to get ninety cents at Fort William.

Mr. McNEVIN: That $1.26 is delivered at Montreal.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wish hon. members would speak on their own time. The price set in eastern Canada is $1.26 a bushel.

Mr. McNEVIN: At Montreal.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes, and the 90 cents is at Fort William, not on the farm. Of course it may be said that this is for soft wheat. I do not care what it is for; the fact is there is discrimination there, and very unjust discrimination. Let me read what was reported in the Lethbridge Herald of March 9:

> J. H. Wesson, Saskatchewan wheat pool president and chief spokesman for four hundred farm delegates which presented the petition to the federal government last month, said the farmers would insist ninety cents a bushel was not sufficient.
> "We will continue to urge that the initial payment in the crop year 1942-43 be $1 a bushel, and that further payments to bring up the wheat price to a 'parity' level be made during the crop year," Mr. Wesson said.
> Mr. Wesson said the farmers would be content to have the "parity" price established by the dominion bureau of statistics.

You cannot expect anything fairer than that. Why the government persist in agitating such a great number of people in that way, when they know the proposition they make is unfair, I just cannot understand, unless, of course, the Minister of Agriculture had in mind what he said the other day as reported at page 1211 of Hansard:

> I would say to him that any member of this house who carries back into western Canada the government's policy in relation to wheat and its policy in relation to other farm products can stand before any audience and explain to the people there that this is the best that can be done under the conditions with which we are confronted in the Dominion of Canada to-day, and the best that has been done in an attempt to settle their problems at any time. We are taking every last dollar out of the treasury of Canada to deal with these problems which we feel it is safe to take at this present time.

That is an absolute contradiction of what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) have stated on different occasions. The Minister of Agriculture says we are doing everything we possibly can for the farmer in view of the fact that money is limited; that we are taking everything out of the treasury that we think we can safely take. The Minister of Finance said on more than one occasion when speaking to the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), "We are going to make financially possible anything that is physically possible. There is going to be no money restriction." The Prime Minister said—the words have been repeated so often in this house that I hardly need remind hon. members of them—"We shall issue currency and credit in times of public need." Which is right? The Minister of Agriculture says to the farmers: "I cannot do anything more for you fellows, much as I would like to, because my hands are tied, because of the financial strings that hold me back." But the Minister of Finance says: "That is not right because we are going to make financially possible anything that is physically possible." I think the western farmers have good reason to complain. I should not be surprised to see them on the train coming here again and demanding a square deal, and I believe the Minister of Agriculture would be the last man to say to them, "You are asking something unreasonable."

Let us now look at the income the farmers have. I am not going to quote figures at length, but I want to put on the record some statements from the Searle Grain company's letter. We all admit that they keep very careful watch on this critical situation. This is from No. 22 of November 19, 1941:

	Last year 1940-41	Present year 1941-42
	(omitting 000)
Wheat, including bonuses..	$234,000	$152,000
Coarse grains, including 8 million dollars bonus..	17,980	29,873
Live stock.....	87,150	104,537
Dairy products.....	23,720	31,167
Miscellaneous products....	10,190	10,190
Eggs and wool.....	6,290	6,340
Vegetables and other crops	2,560	2,560
Total revenue.....	$381,890	$336,667

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

The figures for 1941-42 are, of course, estimated. Remember that the total revenue for 1928 was $611,780,000. That brings, generally speaking, about $45,000,000 less for 1941-42 than they received the year before. It is an estimate, but based on good sound calculation. They go on to say:

There are, in the three prairie provinces, approximately 300,000 farming families. It will be seen, therefore, that the annual average income for wheat alone for each family will be $506 from wheat, and from all other sources other than wheat $616, making the total income for the average farming family $1,122 for this year. Out of this total sum of $1,122 each farming family has to pay its living expenses for the year, and the costs of growing, harvesting and hauling to market its farm products . . .

The index includes 16 items of groceries; 36 of clothing; 28 of household equipment; 53 of farm equipment; 12 of farm machinery and two items of school and municipal taxes. These items, we find, cost farmers to-day $1,004 a year. It will be observed therefore that each prairie farming family has on the average only $118 left ($1,122 minus $1,004) with which to pay for all those things which farming families require, and which are not included in the 147 items in the Searle index.

Out of that total profit—if we call it a profit—of $118 from their entire return including the bonus, they have to pay the interest on mortgages and loans and for such small extra comforts as any family requires. It is amazing that the government, knowing that the farmers were producing at a loss and are compelled by quota to sell only a certain amount, did not cut down the interest on farm mortgages. Why should they not have made it possible to lower the cost of production by lowering the cost of machinery by lowering the tariff?

Before this bill passes the minister should—and I do not believe he would be condemned for it by anyone, even members of the cabinet—form an advisory council of agriculturists, the same as industry has. Industry would not think of letting a bunch of farmers come in and run their industry and set the profit they would get. They would not even allow members of parliament to set the profit. Then why should anyone object if the agriculturists come in and assist the minister to deal with problems and policies regarding their own industry? I believe the minister would be well advised to clip that sheet out of United States history. He should raise the price to $1 a bushel. Mind you, we have always advocated $1 a bushel at the local elevator. Then probably it would be advantageous to pool the freight rates, so that everyone would be treated alike. There should be no reason for the eastern farmer to complain and say, "Well, we are not getting as much as the west," or for the west to say, "We are not getting as much as the east." There must be some pooling arrangement as to freight rates, so that every farmer will be treated alike.

Then you must give the farmers the parity price; they have a right to ask for it. If the government does not give it to them, I hope the farmers come here again and sit right on the doorstep until they get it. Apparently that is the only way they will get anything, and I believe the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce are asking for just that sort of thing. You cannot expect people to go on fighting for democracy in this war when the very thing for which they are fighting abroad is denied them at home. I think the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce should get together and talk to these other fellows in the cabinet a little bit. Surely they will come to reason and let democracy live in Canada.

On motion of Mr. Tucker the debate was adjourned.

WHEAT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE ACREAGE REDUCTION AND CERTAIN PAYMENTS TO FARMERS

The house resumed from Monday, March 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gardiner for the second reading of Bill No. 12, respecting wheat acreage reduction.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, after discussion with the representatives of the three opposing groups it has been agreed, according to my understanding of it, that the two bills, Bill No. 12 and Bill No. 14, should be given second reading now and sent to the agriculture committee. The general discussion will then proceed under the understanding we have had, on Bill No. 13, that understanding being that we shall go on with this discussion, deal with the amendment now before the house and finally with the second reading of the bill itself. That is, we shall carry on the discussion as it has been carried on up to the present time. In the meantime the other two bills will go on to the committee early next week.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Is it agreed that the agriculture committee will meet in the mornings, so that hon. members may be free when Bill No. 13 is being discussed in the house?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. I should have said that the agriculture committee will not sit while the house is sitting, until we have completed the discussion of Bill No. 13. The agriculture committee will meet early in the week, as soon as it can be arranged.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And there will be an open discussion on the remaining bill, as it has been carried on up to the moment?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, on Bill No. 13.

Mr. STIRLING: Supposing either of these bills is considerably amended in committee and returned to the house reprinted as amended. Would there be an opportunity to discuss those changes on third reading?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I think that is understood; we shall go into committee of the whole then.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVISION RESPECTING DECLARATION OF EMERGENCY YEAR

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gardiner for the second reading of Bill No. 14, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

On motion of Mr. Gardiner the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

Friday, March 13, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL TRANSPORT

USE OF CANADIAN HIGHWAYS BY UNITED STATES TRUCKS CARRYING WAR MATERIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. Has he seen an article in to-day's issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail blaming him for impeding the flow of war materials by United States trucks to eastern points across Canadian highways? If so, will he inform the house regarding the matters complained of in the article?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I think I saw in the Ottawa Journal the article to which my hon. friend refers. The subject matter has been outstanding for a long time. A project was undertaken, I think in 1937, to provide for the movement of United States traffic from Buffalo to Detroit via Canadian highways. The project at that time was and, so far as I know is, at present that a fleet of Canadian trucks would be built and would operate with Canadian gasoline between points across two international boundaries. A bill was introduced in the Senate during the session of 1938 by the sponsors of the project, and the project has been revived from time to time since then. I cannot say why I was selected as the bottleneck, for the matter is not one related to the Ministry of Munitions and Supply, which is my present portfolio, or to the Ministry of Transport, which was my former portfolio. I suppose I figure in the matter only as one member of the government. I may say, however, that the representations have always come from parties interested either in building the trucks or in selling the gasoline or operating a toll bridge or toll tunnel. I have never seen representations from potential users of the service.

We have petitions, signed, I think by every village along the route protesting against this type of traffic on the highways, and I think the reason is obvious: the highways are too narrow for that sort of traffic if the residents alongside are to be permitted to live. The government has not looked upon the proposal with favour. I recall that the gentleman who sponsored the article in question—I have forgotten his name—

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Campbell.

Mr. HOWE: —called me by telephone from Detroit some three months ago and said that if I did not agree to the proposal there would be a blast in the newspapers which I would not like. I said, "Thanks very much" and hung up.

[Mr. Thorson.]

PLEBISCITE ACT

REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN TORONTO "GLOBE AND MAIL"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. My question is made necessary by statements in an editorial in the Globe and Mail of March 10 dealing with the Plebiscite Act, statements which are erroneous and which, if not corrected, may do great harm in the taking of the plebiscite vote. I quote from the Globe's editorial headed "Voting Qualifications"—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not think this question is one that should be put on the orders of the day. I suggest that the hon. member place it on the order paper.

Mr. GOLDING: The leader of the opposition must take the responsibility for not having this matter brought to the attention of the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Put it on the order paper.

[Later:]

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish in any way to transgress your ruling, but the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding) notified me of his intention to ask the question. Unfortunately, it is one which I do not think he could put on the order paper; it was merely to correct a misapprehension which has arisen in connection with the Plebiscite Act. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, and because I believe it should be corrected, I would like to make an extremely brief statement.

The suggestion is that in a certain editorial article a statement was carried to the effect that evey person who has applied for postponement of military training, unless it has been refused, is disqualified from voting. I believe that is the question which the hon. member had in mind. I would like to correct this impression. It is not an impression which has been created in any sense wilfully; probably it arose through too brief a reference to the provisions of the act itself.

The only persons disqualified who have applied for postponement are those who have applied under sections 18 and 19 of the regulations made under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

I desired to take the opportunity, sir, to correct any wrong impression which may have otherwise been created.

Mr. GOLDING: There is another section of that editorial to which I would like to draw attention. It says:

Besides these things, it is provided that any person voting at the plebiscite "shall thereafter be ineligible or incompetent to apply for or to be granted on the application of another, the postponement or exemption from military training" provided for in the national war services regulations or any amendment thereto.

This is very important.

Mr. McLARTY: In connection with that question, the answer which I gave previously applies equally. It is only if they apply under the two particular sections of the regulations under the National Resources Mobilization Act—it has been suggested that I amplify this—dealing specifically with conscientious objectors, and with Mennonites and Doukhobors.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

READING OF SPEECHES—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (Wellington North): Mr. Speaker, according to the Ottawa Journal practically every speech delivered in the House of Commons nowadays is read from a manuscript, and the Journal says this is not debating.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Put it on the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

INTERNMENTS

REPRESENTATIONS OF DELEGATION FROM CIVIL LIBERTIES ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In reply to a question put by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) reported at page 779 of Hansard of Monday, February 23, the Prime Minister told the house that he was in sympathy with representations made to him recently by the Civil Liberties Association and indicated that the Department of Justice was considering the extent to which the representations would be acted upon and that an announcement regarding the matter would be made in due course.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Put it on the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid that this question is in the category of those that should not be asked on the orders of the day.

AIR RAID PRECAUTIONS

INQUIRY AS TO CONDITIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Will the Minister of Pensions and National Health give an undertaking to make a statement in the house before we adjourn for the Easter recess, on the development and progress of air raid precautions on the Pacific coast?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I shall be pleased to do so at the appropriate time, probably next week.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the minister call an item of the estimates so that hon. members may have the opportunity of questioning him?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Probably the most convenient place will be in discussion on the appropriation bill when it is in committee.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASED RATE PER BUSHEL ON WHEAT DELIVERED BY PRODUCERS

The house resumed from Thursday, March 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West) for the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Douglas (Weyburn).

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the house very long with my remarks this afternoon. I feel, however, that I should say a few words in view of the fact that some of my friends on the left have seen fit, since I spoke on the motion itself, to mention my name from time to time.

First of all I should like to express appreciation to hon. members from other parts of Canada who have spoken on this question. Although all of them have not entirely agreed with the requests which have come from western Canada, they have shown a desire to examine those requests fairly and to do what they regard as a measure of justice to fellow Canadians who live in the west. I am sure that that attitude is very much appreciated by western members.

I realize, of course, that there is a feeling that when you put the assistance granted by parliament on a bushel basis entirely, you lay yourself open to the charge which is made from time to time by hon. members from other parts of the country, that the larger the scale upon which a man farms, or the bigger his crop, the more you give him, and the smaller the farm he has, or the poorer his crop, the less you give him. I have heard many hon. members from the east say that they would not mind giving all necessary assistance to a man to live and bring up his family, but they do object to giving large sums of money to people who mine wheat and produce thousands and thousands of bushels.

That brings up something which should always be borne in mind by those of us who come from western Canada. Last fall there was quite a movement to make a further payment on participation certificates which had been given to farmers who had delivered wheat last fall to the wheat board. The suggestion was made that at least another 10 cents be paid, which would have cost the government $20 million. I was one who urged very strongly that, if the government were ready to pay $20 million to assist western agriculture, it would be much fairer to pay that out on an acreage basis than by means of a further 10 cents a bushel on wheat delivered to the wheat board.

In my own constituency, I believe the average yield would not be more than around six bushels to the acre. There was an almost entire failure of coarse grains in some parts of it, which meant that the people in that constituency, after they took out two bushels an acre for seed, provided for their own flour requirements, and kept back wheat for feeding purposes to take the place of the oats and barley which they did not have, would have very little wheat to sell. Furthermore, about half the people in western Canada who did have wheat to sell had sold it on the open market. So, if you had granted 10 cents a bushel, very little money would have gone into constituencies like mine; all the money would have gone to those districts which had good crops.

So far as I was concerned I said, if the treasury of this country is going to devote $20 million to assist the farmers of western Canada, if it puts it out on an acreage basis it is going to make sure that everybody gets something, and that the person with no crop or a poor crop gets at least as much as the person with a good crop. Surely that is not unfair.

But, Mr. Speaker, because I took that stand, and had to oppose the suggestion that that ten cents should be paid out on wheat, I was attacked by those people from the heavy crop districts who wanted the price paid on wheat, and who demanded it, and were ready to try to destroy anybody who would not fall in line with that view.

[Mr. Tucker.]

So far as I am concerned, I have no apologies for the stand I took. I believe that if the money which this parliament is ready to vote for the assistance of western Canada were placed at least in part upon an acreage basis, rather than used in an attempt to run up the price without regard to helping the man with no crop or a low crop, there would be far more support for that proposal in this house than there is for a high price for wheat alone.

As I stated in my speech on the main motion, agriculture is as much entitled to parity prices as is any other branch of industry or activity in this country. There are two ways in which you can grant parity prices. I took 1913-14 as the base and indicated that to give the farmer the same purchasing power as he had in that year he would have to receive the equivalent of $1.20 a bushel, basis No. 1 northern. In 1913-14 there were no bonus payments. There was nothing of that sort. But if you give an initial price and then supplement it with bonus payments which raise the average amount received by the farmer to the equivalent of $1.20 a bushel basis No. 1 northern, Fort William, you are really giving parity prices although it does not appear so on the surface. As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) pointed out in his very able speech—in fact there were two of them, and I enjoyed them very much; I hope they will be sent all over western Canada; I intend to do my part to see that they are—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): They will be.

Mr. TUCKER: Thank you very much. He pointed out that on the basis of 70 cents initial payment, Fort William, and another $60 million spread over 200 million bushels, the price was brought up to $1 a bushel, basis No. 1 northern, Fort William; that is the average amount received by the farmer. If this motion carries and the initial price is raised to 90 cents a bushel; if the government could see its way clear to make the same bonus payments this year as it made last year, and if, further, the crop were the same size, 200 million bushels, then it would raise to the parity or basic price, the average price, namely, $1.20 a bushel basis No. 1 northern, Fort William. But by doing it in that way you would be making sure that the person with a low crop or a short crop got something. In that regard of course I will admit that if we grow enough wheat to market the 280 million bushels of which the government considers receiving delivery, the amount of these bonuses spread over 280 million bushels would represent only 22 cents a bushel—not quite that—and so raise the average price received by the farmer to $1.12 instead of $1.20. That would be only if you continued the prairie farm assistance payments, the wheat acreage reduction payments and the prairie farm income payments.

Mr. WRIGHT: Under the other two bills as they are at present, the payments are cut in half. There would be no prairie farm assistance payment.

Mr. TUCKER: If my hon. friend had waited, I was going to deal with that. I was going to point out that so far as I am concerned I should like to see the government provide for prairie farm assistance payments as large as were given last year, if not larger. I should like to see the bonus payments, that is prairie farm income payments, made as large as they were last year, if not larger. I think we in western Canada would be doing more good to the people who need it out west if we based our request to the government on that consideration instead of putting emphasis entirely upon price per bushel. My hon. friend says there is no provision for prairie farm income. There was no provision for prairie farm income when parliament adjourned last year; that was provided for by order in council. I sincerely hope that when the government by this bill is providing more money for those who have wheat to sell, it will not give less to the person with little or no wheat. Personally I am prepared to accept the provision in this bill for raising the price to only 90 cents a bushel, if supplemented by at least the same amount in bonus payments as made last year—1941. I wish to impress upoan the government, with all the emphasis I am capable of, that they do consider making the same bonus payments they made last year. If we have only 200 million bushels of wheat, it will bring the price up to $1.20; but even if they make the same bonus payments as they did last year and we deliver 280 millions bushels, then the price that will be received by the farmer will be around $1.12 basis No. 1 northern, Fort William.

One of the reasons why I am prepared to vote for this motion and have the matter referred to a committee is that all these considerations should, I think, be taken into account. On that committee there are Canadians from other parts of the dominion, who, I believe, want to see a measure of justice given the western farmers, and I trust that there will come out of the committee recommendations on the basis of which the government will see fit to make, and will be justified in making, bonus payments that will at least provide for the same amount paid by way of bonus as was paid last year.

This would mean an amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I hope that these things will be given consideration. If the members of this house would take that attitude as a united group from western Canada, they would be doing more good for the farmers than by simply laying the entire emphasis on price. I have here a little table which I made up comparing receipts as between $1 a bushel and 90 cents a bushel with 1941 bonus payments. If we get 90 cents a bushel plus the bonus payments of last year, leaving out of consideration wheat acreage reduction—I am assuming in all cases the farmer will retain two bushels per acre for seed and that the price he receives on the farm is 20 cents under the amount received at Fort William—then in the nothing to four bushels per acre category, if the price were set at $1 the amount received by the farmer without bonuses, in that category, would be on the average nothing, because the average yield would be two bushels, which he would have to keep for seed. He would have nothing to sell, and no matter what this government granted as a price, such a man would get nothing at all from them—nothing on acreage and nothing per bushel. On the other hand, if the same bonus payments were made as last year, the average amount paid to the farmer in that category would be $2.75 an acre or $3.25 an acre if he were in a crop failure area. The amount per bushel cannot be calculated. It would be 275 times or 325 times what he had to sell, but he has nothing to sell, and so you cannot calculate the amount per bushel.

In the four to eight bushels per acre category, if you gave $1 a bushel without bonus, the amount he would get would be $3.20 an acre on the average, or 80 cents a bushel. But under the policy of 90 cents a bushel plus bonus he would get $5.05 an acre, which is almost $2 more, or an average of $1.26¼ a bushel instead of 80 cents. That is the position of the man in the four to eight bushels per acre category. Surely he is entitled to more help than the man with a large crop, and under this system he would receive $1.26¼ instead of 80 cents, as I have pointed out.

Take next the man with a yield of from eight to twelve bushels per acre. Under the dollar system and no bonus he would get $6.40 an acre, or 80 cents a bushel. But under the system of paying 90 cents plus bonus he would get $8.35 an acre as against $6.40, or $1.04 instead of 80 cents. So that even the man having from eight to twelve bushels to the acre is better off; in fact anybody getting less than twelve bushels to the acre would be better off to get 90 cents plus the same bonus as last year.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has anyone in this debate, or the representative of any group, recommended that the bonus should not be paid?

Mr. TUCKER: No. Apparently I have not made my point clear. It is that the amendment was made on the question of price. I think hon. members would have done better for western Canada and got more support in the rest of Canada if they had put the emphasis on asking for the same bonus or increasing the bonus. That, as I say, would have done more good to the people out west who need it and would have gained more support in the rest of Canada. Instead of that, the opposition moved an amendment based entirely on the question of price. I leave it to the judgment of this house and of western Canada as to why they placed the emphasis on price instead of on what would be in the best interests of our country.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member could have moved an amendment to that effect.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes, but I am not in the opposition. I will deal with that in a moment. The function of an opposition I think is not to play to the gallery but to do the best thing for their people out west.

Mr. COLDWELL: I object to that imputation of motives that in doing a perfectly legitimate and proper thing we were playing to the gallery. I ask that that aspersion be withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member should withdraw that statement.

Mr. TUCKER: I withdraw it. As a matter of fact I would not have said it if I had not been goaded on.

Now take those in the category from twelve to twenty bushels. It is when one gets into that category that he is better off if given a dollar a bushel without bonus. Then he gets an average of $11.20 an acre, or 80 cents a bushel, whereas under the system of bonus and 90 cents a bushel, it would yield only $10.55 an acre.

That is the comparative effect of the two systems. In my judgment my hon. friends would have done better to put a little more emphasis upon bonuses for the benefit of the farmer with the poor crop or no crop at all.

A question was raised about amendments and so on. I spoke Monday last about the effect of the raising of the price to 90 cents on the person in the eight to twelve bushels per acre category. I urged the minister to consider an amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to make sure the person in that category would get $1 an acre on half of his acreage. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how many hon. members of the opposition supported me in that view?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I did.

Mr. TUCKER: I believe the hon. member for Weyburn did, and I give him credit, but how many others did?

Mr. COLDWELL: He spoke for the group.

Mr. TUCKER: Well, we will give the group credit, but another member of the group did not mention it when he spoke.

Mr. COLDWELL: We do not repeat things.

Mr. TUCKER: Oh, I think if there is any group in the house that does repeat, it is the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group. If they had felt very strongly about this, they would not have minded repeating it—every one of them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): We have not finished yet. There is still the committee stage.

Mr. TUCKER: Well, you might have done it in the house too. I shall be glad, however, if you accept the suggestion and support it in committee for all you are worth.

The question before the house is a simple one of approving the principle that we raise the initial price from 70 cents to 90 cents. To that the hon. member for Weyburn has moved an amendment, the effective part of which reads as follows:

> That this bill be not now read a second time—
> That is the bill raising the price from 70 to 90 cents.
> —but be it resolved that the disregarding by this parliament of the modest representations made by western agriculture for a parity price for all agricultural products and an initial wheat payment of at least $1 per bushel for No. 1 northern basis Fort William is contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

That amendment is sufficiently comprehensive that if my hon. friends had been much interested in the bonus, they could have introduced a suggestion that they were favourable to its partly being achieved at least by a bonus plan.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The legislation provides that.

Mr. TUCKER: The foundation is well laid in western Canada for my hon. friends to get a great deal of credit by coming out for dollar wheat. I will not say that was the reason for moving this amendment, but it will be for the people of western Canada to judge when the time comes.

What would be the effect of voting for this amendment? It would be that the attempt to raise the price from 70 cents to 90 cents would be defeated.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. TUCKER: Of course it would be. The motion for second reading would be defeated. The bill would be killed. It would not go to committee. Who would revive that bill? Unless the government were ready to bring in another bill, it would be killed and the price would remain at 70 cents.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. TUCKER: My hon. friend says, "That is right". I will deal with that in a minute; I will deal with all the possibilities. My hon. friends seemingly are quite excited about it. We hear a great deal about hon. members, once a party policy is decided upon, supporting that policy. I think the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have had something to say about that. I do not know any group in this house that stick more closely together as a party than the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The time is coming when they should stop talking like that, because they must look forward to the time—I hope they are not without hope among themselves—when they might form a government, and they never could run this country unless they stick to the policy of party solidarity. So they should stop decrying the only way in which a government can be run in this dominion.

There is a lot of talk about voting for a party policy once it is agreed upon. Supposing this government were to tell hon. members, "Vote as you please on this bill; we do not care whether you defeat it or not". I ask every hon. member to answer honestly to himself this question: If that were done, would there be any assurance that the price of wheat would be raised one 5-cent piece over 70 cents?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is an awful reflection.

Mr. TUCKER: There are enough hon. members in this house who do not believe in raising the price over 70 cents that if my hon. friends joined them in voting that way and against the bill, it would be defeated and we would not get another cent over 70 cents. Yet they decry the very policy that makes it possible for us in the west to get a little measure of justice. Again, Mr. Speaker, I leave it to the judgment of the country whether or not they believe those things they have been saying. I am not saying they do not, because of course if I did so I would be made to withdraw it.

Suppose we take another possibility. Supposing the government were to say, This is a question of confidence, of government policy, and we expect our members, the government as a whole having agreed upon it, to back us us up in doing what we think is best for the country as a whole, and to vote for it. And supposing all of us from western Canada, regardless of party, including the Liberal members were to join in attempting to defeat the government and were to carry the amendment killing a bill brought in by a minister; it would bring on an election in this country at this time. Does anyone suppose that if we forced an election on an issue which has to do only with making us in western Canada better off, we would get from such an election as sympathetic a parliament as we have to-day? After all, we must face realities. I know my hon. friends will say, "We can take the stand that you are not doing enough, because the government, having made it a question of government policy, has enough supporters to put it through. The increase from 70 cents to 90 cents will not be stopped. So we can fight it and oppose it; the Liberals will have to take the onus of putting it through. We can move an amendment like this, then we can go out into the country and say that the Liberals have done so and so, and we can read their names." They will read the names of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner), perhaps; the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven), and, if you will, the member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). I have read in the papers over and over again how my hon. friends have suggested that that dirty dog from Rosthern has voted against the best interests of the farmers of the west.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is imputing language to members of this house which they have never used.

Mr. TUCKER: No, no.

Mr. COLDWELL: "Dirty dog"? No one has ever heard me, or any other member of this group, refer to anyone in that language. May I say also, on a further point of order, that the hon. gentleman is imputing to this group motives which he has no right to impute.

Mr. TUCKER: I was speaking metaphorically. I do not think for a single minute that any of my hon. friends really would refer to me literally as a dirty dog, no matter what they might think.

Mr. COLDWELL: I object to that, Mr. Speaker; I object to the hon. member saying that we even think he is a dirty dog.

Mr. TUCKER: Well, I am very glad to hear from the acting leader of the opposition that they do not even think it, because sometimes when I hear the way I have been spoken of in the country, I have had my suspicions, and I am glad to be reassured. In any event, I have heard it said often that among others the hon. member for Rosthern voted in favour of the government "because he was under the party whip, because he was hide-bound, while we, the great defenders of the west, voted against it." That has happened in the past. Can I be blamed for thinking that it may happen in the future, perhaps in regard to this very amendment? Of course it may be that the members of the opposition will not act in future as they have in the past; if they do not, I shall be wrong in what I am saying and thinking about this amendment.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I do not think anyone can have any doubt that I believe I shall be doing what is right for western Canada in voting against this amendment and in favour of the main motion.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not for me to enter into the controversy that has been going on, between the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group; but in my opinion, after listening to his explanation of why government supporters from the west sometimes vote against those things that are necessary for the west, his explanation will not be very favourably received. What it amounts to is this: "On occasion we cannot vote in favour of those things that we believe are necessary because to do so would amount to voting want of confidence in the government, and we would not do that." But as far as the amendment is concerned I believe the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said the other night that this was not a motion of want of confidence in the government. Therefore this time members from the west need have no fear that they will be voting no confidence in the government if they support a policy that represents the viewpoint of the 185,000 farmers of Saskatchewan who signed the petition, and which has the support of great numbers of farmers in Alberta and Manitoba. The statement made by the hon. member for Rosthern to-day, that those who would support this amendment would do so in order to play to the gallery, is very poor tribute to the great number of western farmers who believe that the only salvation for western agriculture lies in the adoption of the principle set out therein.

This is not a matter of charity. After listening to the hon. member for Rosthern one would almost think that hon. members from other parts of Canada feel that when western agriculture is assisted the government is doing an act of charity. I do not think that is their attitude; I have not found it to be that way. The western farmer to-day is not asking for charity but for parity, for equality with all other industries in Canada producing the needs of war, to the end that western agriculture, as well as agriculture generally throughout the dominion, may enjoy the same consideration that is given other industries in Canada to-day.

I am not one of those who contend that increasing the advance to 90 cents a bushel will not be advantageous to western Canada. It will. It is a step in the right direction. But I would point out that the problem, so far as the wheat grower is concerned, consists of two parts. First there is the problem of getting a fair and reasonable price to the farmer who has a crop; and then, there is the problem of giving a fair allowance or compensation to those who by reason of drought or otherwise, have not a sufficient crop. So far as this legislation is concerned, while it increases the initial payment by 20 cents a bushel, it takes away a very considerable amount from those who this year will not have a crop at all. It makes no provision for the payment of a prairie farm income, and it reduces the payment under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, in that those who have a crop of from eight to twelve bushels to the acre will be denied any bonus this year. But what is more serious is that the Minister of Agriculture has stated that when this legislation is passed it will put a ceiling on any further action on the part of this government as far as agriculture is concerned.

An hon. MEMBER: For this year.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Not for this year; for any year. Here are the words of the minister, at page 1127 of Hansard:

> The action we are now taking is the final step in a policy which was laid down at the beginning of the war and which has been consistently adhered to up to the present time.

Mr. GARDINER: That was to lay floors, not ceilings.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is not the final mile; it was the final step.

Mr. GARDINER: In laying floors for farm products, not ceilings.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is no reference to that in the hon. gentleman's remarks.

Mr. GARDINER: Read the speech through, and you will find that is what it is all about.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: When the Minister of Agriculture is speaking he very seldom gives anyone an opportunity to ask a question. Perhaps he will take the same attitude toward me as I pursue my argument. I shall be only too glad to answer any questions he may ask; but his explanations as to why he made the statement, and what interpretation should be put upon it, he can reserve until after I have concluded what I have to say.

Mr. GARDINER: I will put it in at the right place.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In order that there may be no mistake about it, we find that at page 1211 of Hansard the minister is reported to have said:

> We are taking every last dollar out of the treasury of Canada to deal with these problems which we feel it is safe to take at this present time.

Mr. GARDINER: "At this present time".

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: When we bring those two statements together, what it amounts to is this: Nothing further is going to be done—that this is the final action the government is going to take in so far as relieving agriculture and the wheat farmer of western Canada is concerned. I find it difficult to understand the change in his point of view which has taken place; for it was only a few short months ago the Minister of Agriculture took the stand that the government had decided—and I shall give him an opportunity now to deny this—that it would not raise the initial payment of 70 cents a bushel, and that it was not a proper thing to do.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not said that since this year's policy was under consideration.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I say that last fall the statement was made by the Minister of Agriculture, and his statement appears in the Family Herald and Weekly Star of November 12, where he was endeavouring to explain how it was that in a radio speech in Saskatchewan he had been able to show the farmers, by an unusual mathematical formula, that 70 cents a bushel at Fort William, plus nothing, amounted to $1 a bushel.

Mr. GARDINER: And the farmers agree that it was right.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister said this:

> Representations have been made to the government to the effect that the farmer must have more. The government has decided that more should be paid, but does not believe the best results can be obtained in distributing further funds through increasing the advance provided for under the wheat board act, and has suggested to the Department of Agriculture that we work out plans under which at least $60,000,000 can be distributed to farmers on an acreage basis.

Mr. GARDINER: For 1941.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That statement was made in November of 1941.

Mr. GARDINER: And the $60,000,000 is paid on the 1941 account.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That statement represented the viewpoint of the government at that time. The situation is that the government has changed its mind since last fall. What is the reason for that change?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is not unusual.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should not interrupt.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the reason for it? Has there been any change in conditions which warrant a change in the point of view of the government? I am asking this: Has there been any change? What has taken place since last fall? Is there anyone who can answer that?

Mr. GARDINER: We are going to have another crop in 1942.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: May it be that we are going to have an election in Saskatchewan in 1942? Only a few weeks ago the minister announced that the principle of giving an increase in the initial payment on account of wheat was one the government could not accept. Now what could not be accepted becomes the keystone upon which the whole policy is built. Has there been any change in the last six months in the price the government of Great Britain is paying Canada for wheat? That is one question the minister has not answered. Will the minister say whether there has been any change?

Mr. GARDINER: I was not listening to the hon. member; what was he saying?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Whenever a question is asked which the minister realizes might be destructive of some of his arguments, he says that he has not been listening. I say there has not been any change, and that the price is almost the same as it was six months ago.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Higher.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: According to what I have been able to deduce from the information issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce, there has been no increase in the price paid for Canadian wheat by Great Britain.

Mr. GARDINER: We are drawing nearer to the time it is going to be needed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the reason, I ask, for the change in point of view? It seems clear that it is not a question of any increased price being paid by the British government. Throughout the year 1941 the explanation was that the government could not set the price above 70 cents because Great Britain was not paying more. No one asks Great Britain to pay more, even should the principle of the amendment be accepted. Why has there been a change in policy? Was it Donald Gordon of the wartime prices and trade board who asked the government to make the change? The increase will interfere with the price ceiling—a price ceiling which we condemned last fall in this house, because it set the prices of agricultural products at one level and the prices of things the farmer had to buy at a higher level.

Last November, at the very time the Minister of Agriculture was making his statement to the press that the government did not believe in any increase in the initial payment, meetings were being held throughout western Canada asking for an initial price of $1, for a parity price, and for payment over a period of years of the difference between the amount of the initial advance and the amount of the parity price.

The hon. member for Rosthern pointed out—and with considerable force—the reason why hon. members supporting the government could not support some of the amendments moved by opposition members. May I point out, so far as the parity price is concerned, that on March 26 last an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) and seconded by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). The motion having been dropped, it was again placed on Hansard by myself, and seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). In that resolution the following words appeared:

> That the government should take immediate steps to create a parity of prices as between agricultural and other products in order to improve the condition of Canadian agriculture and in order that it may receive a just and fair return, and thus be enabled to make that contribution to Canada's war effort which is so desirable, and which our agricultural population so greatly desire to make.

A subamendment was moved by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson). It provided for a minimum price of 85 cents a bushel, a processing tax and certain other terms to which I shall not now refer. A resolution, upon which the subamendment was based, had been adopted by the Saskatchewan legislature unanimously.

When the matter came up for vote in the house why was it that every hon. member on the government side, except the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) found it necessary to vote against those two amendments? They voted against the principle of the parity price, and voted against an increase to 85 cents in the initial payment to western farmers.

Hansard reports that the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) went out of his way last night to refer to me. I cannot say he voted against either of the amendments, because apparently he was not in the house at the time that one of the most important resolutions affecting western agriculture was being voted upon.

The initial payment of 90 cents a bushel apparently represents a compromise between those who believe that western Canada and the western farmer are receiving enough to-day and those who want the government to go the whole length; but I cannot understand why it is necessary for the government in making this compromise to do away in part with some of the bonuses which western Canada has been enjoying during the past year. The Minister of Agriculture has on more than one occasion referred with pride to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, as he is entitled to do, because it represented a very material advance in improving the economic position of the farmer. It has meant much to western Canada and I think it only fair to say that if it had not been for that legislation many of those in my constituency who are able at least to carry on during 1942 would have been quite unable to do so.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): They probably got more out of it than out of wheat.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As a matter of fact, the yield, as my hon. friend is aware was very low, and so far as certain portions of my constituency are concerned his statement, I believe, is a fact.

I am entering into no political controversy on this question, but when one hears some of the speeches that have been delivered in this house that there was some untoward purpose in the recent historic visit of the western farmers to Ottawa, I want to say that that group of men came down here without regard to party and with but one aim in view, to place before the government, fairly, squarely and honestly the viewpoint of the western farmer. They did not come in any threatening manner; they came in an attitude of compromise because they had been unable to obtain what they have been asking for since 1935. The hon. member for Rosthern said to-day that it was impossible for government members to insist because if they were to stand for certain principles in the way of bringing together east and west it might defeat the government. We on this side of the house have consistently stood for the things which this delegation of farmers stood for and the essence of what they stood for was a parity price, with an initial payment of $1 per bushel. They are now to receive 90 cents under the legislation, and they should know at the same time that while the government is raising the payment to 90 cents it is taking away from them certain of the bonuses which they are enjoying to-day.

I am not going into any figures to-day in reference to the increase in the cost of living or a comparison of the index of 1913-14 with 1941, because that has already been done. The war has been on for two and a half years. We have pressed for these things in season and out of season, and it is only now on the eve of a provincial election in the province of Saskatchewan that the government has seen fit to introduce legislation to improve the position of the western farmer. I do not hear any denial of my statement that it is anticipated that there will be a provincial election this summer in Saskatchewan. I am going to say this, and I know it will not appeal to all hon. members in this house, that with the war situation what it is to-day, and with the warning ringing in our ears which the Prime Minister gave the night before last as to the peril in which we find ourselves, no government in any province should find it necessary, particularly when it has still one year and a half to run, to go to the people and divide and separate them and have all the recriminations that necessarily accompany an election at the very time when Canada and the empire will be fighting our greatest battle for survival.

The government of the province of Saskatchewan has still one year and a half to go and if it calls an election this summer it will be calling it in a world situation described by the Prime Minister the day before yesterday in these words:

> Never in the world's history has the danger to civilization itself been comparable to what it is at this very hour. Even in the short period since the launching of the loan, the enemy, on all fronts but one, has gained an almost continuous series of military successes. He is continuing to make further and far-reaching gains.
> From every continent and from every ocean the call continues to come for more planes, more tanks, more munitions, more ships, more food, more fighting men.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): If the hon. member will permit a question, may I ask whether he is still the leader of the Conservative party in Saskatchewan and speaking as such?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, I am no longer leader nor have been since October last. I am speaking as a member of this house, believing that the very existence of this empire is at stake, and I say that in Saskatchewan and in any other province of Canada we can afford to postpone the luxury of partisanship and provincial elections at least until the termination of the period allowed by statute. What is the position going to be in Saskatchewan? I fear it. At a time such as this, when we should be mobilizing this country against the enemy at our gates, are we to divide ourselves, to separate with the desire to secure political power?

Mr. GARDINER: No election has been announced in Saskatchewan.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad to have the assurance of the Minister of Agriculture that there is not going to be an election this year.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say that. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister says he did not say that?

Mr. GARDINER: I said that no election has been announced.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I thought he had gone so far as to say that there was not going to be one. Well, he would know. I am making a serious appeal, Mr. Speaker, with respect to holding this provincial election in Saskatchewan, and what I say applies to every province, for this is a time as never before, as members of the house are fully aware, when we are in a position of great peril, with the enemy at our gates.

I shall not take up very much more time. I have a few recommendations and suggestions to make to the minister and I shall give them as shortly as I can. My first suggestion is that he carry out the request of the farm delegation. The recommendations that were made by these western farmers to a solution of their problems represented a minimum, and I would point out that even if $1 a bushel were fixed as the initial payment the farmer would still find himself receiving in purchasing power only about 78 cents a bushel as at the beginning of the war. Reading over the evidence that was given when this delegation was before the government I find that without exception the minister's attitude was that the government was going to do its very best. Then, Mr. Speaker, my suggestion even at this late hour is that the hope expressed by Mr. Wesson, that tribune of the western farmers, be carried into effect and that in committee the 90 cents a bushel initial payment be increased to $1.

Secondly, I respectfully suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act be amended so that farmers this year raising from eight to twelve bushels an acre will be enabled to receive a bonus.

Thirdly, a very striking address was made the other day in this house by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) in which he set out in detail the levy which is being made to-day by the great storage corporations upon agriculture in general, and the wheat farmers of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba in particular. I am not going to repeat what he said on that occasion, excepting to quote one statement he made, which appears at page 1183 of Hansard:

> There is no doubt therefore the elevators will be receiving in the neighbourhood of at least $50,000,000 for the handling of grain this year. On the other hand what does the farmer get? He gets less than 50 cents a bushel for 200,000,000 bushels. He will not receive $100,000,000, yet here is a man who does not do anything except handling the wheat and he is getting half as much as the farmer.

I suggest that, having regard to the tremendous amounts of wheat which are stored, the time has come to reduce storage rates below one forty-fifth of a cent by at least 33 per cent.

To me it is difficult to understand why, when the government has control of practically all the wheat in the dominion, it has seen fit to rent its terminal elevators to private corporations to store Canada's wheat, paying them one forty-fifth of a cent per bushel per day. On the 21st of May, 1941, I asked how many terminal or interior grain elevators in Canada and the United States were owned, leased or otherwise controlled by the government; where were such elevators located and what was their capacity. The answer of the Department of Trade and Commerce was that there are in Canada under the control of that department eight terminal elevators, located at Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Lethbridge, Edmonton, Calgary, Prince Rupert and Port Arthur, with a total capacity of about 23,000,000 bushels one of which was rented to a private corporation and that the government received the year before as rentals $72,230.98. If one-forty-fifth of a cent a bushel was paid on the full capacity of the elevator—and they must have been full because there was such a shortage of storage—these companies received less of course the cost of administration, $260,000. I might point out too that ten elevators with a tremendous capacity, under the control of the Department of Transport, also are rented to private corporations, enabling those corporations to receive the tolls paid to them by the government for the storage of their own wheat. I think the time has come when the government of Canada should once more take over these elevators for the storage of the Canadian farmers wheat, instead of renting them to the private storage corporations, which are securing in consequence tremendous returns.

I suggest, next, that the time has come when we should again press for utilization of the Hudson Bay railway facilities. They have not been used to any extent since 1935. They have been used less, of course, since the war began—but very little less. My suggestion is that the whole problem of the Hudson Bay railway and the use of this particular route at this time should also be placed before the committee, to the end that the facilities which we have shall be utilized to the benefit of the people.

My next suggestion is this. Some weeks ago a speech was delivered in this chamber by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Turner) in which he suggested that the government should give consideration to the equalization of freight rates so that the farmer living in far-off Alberta or northern Saskatchewan would be in an identical position with a farmer living in the province of Manitoba. The arguments that he advanced in that connection appealed to me, and I suggest that they should be placed before this committee when it meets.

Next: Britain closed her wheat exchange directly the war broke out. We on this side of the house without exception since the beginning of the war have advocated the closing of the exchange. There was a suggestion the other day that it was going to be closed, but that has not yet been imported into the terms of any order in council, as I have been able to read those orders in council which were issued on March 9. Let me say in that connection that I cannot understand the attitude of the government in bringing before parliament only part of this problem, and, with parliament in session, passing three orders in council dealing with flax, wheat and so on and empowering the government, in so far as one order in council is concerned, to do that for which they condemned Mr. McFarland and the Bennett government, namely, to purchase wheat from others than the actual owners and producers. For the last several years the government has condemned the action of the government of Mr. Bennett, yet now by order in council they ask power to do that which they have condemned.

What of the grain exchange? Is it to be closed? Is it to continue? I was interested the other day in listening to the address of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) when he pointed out that trading in flax was to be forbidden. I asked him why, and the answer he gave was that the handling of flax is being made a monopoly of the Canadian wheat board in order to avoid speculative profits by people in possession of flax acquired at very much lower prices.

I ask, is the wheat situation any different in principle? The price of wheat is to be raised to 90 cents. Are there to be any provisions which will prevent those who acquired wheat at lower prices from selling it to-day at a profit. I would be glad to hear what they are.

The minister went on to say that a corresponding procedure has been adopted to prevent speculation in wheat for the same reason, and the house is entitled to details. Mr. Speaker, one thing which can be said for this government is that, if it has not been too favourable to the needs and the requirements of the producer, it has never failed to take cognizance of the needs of the storage and trading corporations. That is one of the major complaints made all over western Canada against this government.

I offer this as a further suggestion. When we are paying out, as the hon. member for Wood Mountain said, about $50,000,000 a year for storage, or half of what the farmer receives who produces the wheat, it is time to utilize the powers under the National Resources Mobilization Act, take over these elevators at a fair rental, or in any event those elevators which belong to the government, and operate them for the benefit of the farmers and taxpayers of Canada, instead of paying toll as at present to those who are the owners or lessees.

My next suggestion is this, that in addition to taking over grain storage facilities the government should, if necessary, also take over the processing and distribution concerns, unless the prices charged are kept to a minimum. They are doing it in other countries. Only recently an investigation took place in the United States, instituted by the American government, to ascertain how much of the dollar that was ultimately paid by the consumer for farm products in that country went to the farmer, and it was found that in 1940, which was one of the best years so far as farmers were concerned, in a list of 58 foodstuffs produced by the farm and bought by the average labouring man's family, for which the consumer paid $314, $182 went to the middle man while the farmer received $132. In other words the farmer received 42 per cent of the price which the product, produced by himself, ultimately realized. That was stated by Mr. R. O. Been, one of the authorities in the United States government, who said:

> Any reduction in marketing charges should benefit the consumer through reducing retail prices, and improve the position of the farmer by increasing the prices which he receives. Reduction of marketing costs could result from breaking up congestion and increasing efficiency at certain points in the marketing process. Improvement of terminal market facilities is a step in this direction.

I come now to one of the most serious situations in agriculture to-day, the assuring to the farmer of a supply of necessary labour in operating his farm. The attractions of industry and of munitions factories in eastern Canada, and in western Canada the armed services themselves, have placed the farmer in the position where he will not be able to carry on unless something is done by the government. A step was taken in the right direction yesterday by the order in council placed before the house by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) whereby any man in the service may be granted leave so that he may assist with spring work and whereby national boards in the various provinces may grant the necessary postponements of men on farms who are called up for service.

The farmer is not asking that discrimination be made in his favour, but he feels that after two and a half years of war it is time that men were allocated to the positions and industries wherein they can do the most good. Allocations should be made of men from industries to farms, where they can better serve in that capacity, under a selective basis whereby all men should be placed where they can devote themselves to the best of their ability to the welfare of the state. In Britain it has been found necessary not only to comb munitions industries, but also to mobilize the young men and women in that nation to assist in agriculture. My suggestion is that the government at this time should consider the question of bringing in under the selective service provision the mobilization of the land army in Canada in order to ensure that the necessary production of food will continue.

It cannot be too often repeated that food is as necessary as munitions. Without food there can be no munitions, without food there can be no soldiers in the field. One of the major duties of the government at this time is to make sure this spring that farm labour shall be made available to farmers all over the dominion to the end that they shall be able to produce as they desire to do and whereby the empire's needs will be satisfied. Food is important. Only the other day I came across a quotation from the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, Claude R. Wickard, which struck me as being so appropriate at this time that I will quote it, and with this quotation I will close:

> Food is a whole arsenal of weapons in this struggle for human freedom. It is the driving force behind high production by munitions workers and top notch performance and strong morale among soldiers and sailors. Our national self-interest and our humanitarian instincts challenge us to do this job of producing food and do it on a scale that will write history. In the day of victory when the nations sit down at the peace table our food stocks will give great force to our views for they will show once and for all that democracy builds for the needs of common men. By winning our American battle of farm production we will help to make it possible once again for men in all parts of the earth to live in comfort, in tolerance and in freedom.

Mr. H. A. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, in my view this is a problem that affects agriculture not only in western Canada but in other parts of the dominion as well, and for that reason I should like to make a few casual comments upon the subject. Representing as I do, feebly perhaps but to the best of my ability, a riding in southwestern Ontario, a farming district, I regard this as a question of vital importance. Let me say at the outset that I am not in any way antagonistic to the people of western Canada or to western farm problems. I remember after speaking last year in the house I received from western Canada certain communications commenting on what I had said and virtually accusing me of being an opponent of western agricultural problems. That is not true, because I am quite familiar with our own agricultural problems. In fact I have a good deal in common with and a great deal of sympathy for the people who derive their livelihood from farming, and I do not know of any time, apart from the last war, when they received very much for the commodities they produce.

I am not an authority on western problems. I am not an authority on the wheat situation as it affects the west. I was greatly interested last Monday when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) made his statement with regard to wheat and wheat surpluses and markets. He gave a comprehensive picture and put a good deal of information before the house. Those of us who have been around parliament hill for some time were prepared for a statement of that kind. He said that the initial price of wheat would be raised from 70 cents to 90 cents, and it had been generally believed that that was what would happen. When he made his statement in regard to the surpluses of wheat which the four great exporting countries of the world had on hand—or the estimate of what they would have on hand on July 31—it was a revelation to me, because the figure he gave was 1,300,000,000 bushels. That is a very considerable surplus.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) last night referred to Ontario wheat and said, "We should have a price equal to that paid for Ontario wheat," or something of that kind. Let me point out that Ontario wheat rose last fall owing to domestic markets, the demand that existed, and the shortage there was in wheat for the making of pastry flour. The domestic market forced up the price of wheat, and when it had reached a certain level the wartime prices and trade board put a ceiling on it. There is no ceiling on western wheat. Western wheat is guaranteed merely a minimum price, and I hope that when the time comes and the price rises, as it is anticipated it will owing to markets for wheat, the board will not put the ceiling on too early.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) also gave a comprehensive statement regarding conditions generally in western Canada. He gave a good report on the plans they have this year for assisting western agriculture. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act has been in operation for some time, and also the acreage bonus policy. The statement he made, together with the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce looked very complete. I do not believe anyone had any serious objection to the statements made or the programme they mapped out for this year. Personally I considered it was quite far-reaching but that probably it was coming to western Canada. I did not anticipate speaking on the matter until one or two speeches were made that were rather provocative. So I felt I should say something in defence of Ontario agriculture.

As to what the future holds for wheat I would not even hazard a guess. Russia will probably be in the market for wheat in the near future. The great Ukraine area of 25 million acres will not be producing its normal crop this year, and it is quite probable that when the war is over, there will be a market in Russia for Canadian wheat. In the meantime Canada will have a big wheat surplus and be ready to meet any demand that may arise.

Wheat, I am sure, has been a major headache for the government. I think it was 1932 or 1933 when wheat in western Canada first became much of a problem. To help the situation the government started with a bonus of five cents a bushel. So wheat can scarcely be regarded as a war casualty. In 1938 western Canada harvested some 400 million bushels, and at 80 cents a bushel, which was a very low price then, it cost the treasury around $60 million to market that wheat. That was before the war, when all the markets of the world were open to Canadian wheat and wheat products.

I think it was the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) the other night who was comparing conditions on the farms in Ontario and in western Canada, and he made some references which to me were rather amusing. He spoke of the percentage of cars, radios, telephones and houses with running water installed. Comparisons are always odious, and to me that was a rather useless comparison, for it must be remembered that farming has been carried on in Ontario for at least one hundred years. Surely, after a century of farming, no one would begrudge 10 per cent of the farm homes having running water inside. As to telephones, if we had the same conditions as they have in western Canada, telephone subscribers a mile or two apart, I doubt if we would have telephones at all.

Ontario agriculture is not at all prosperous. I do not know what the 1941 census will show, but the last census showed over $200 million of debt on the farms of this province. This means that around 50 per cent of the farms were mortgaged for approximately 50 per cent of their value. If anyone doubts that, let him get in touch with the farm loan board and he will find that is a fact. Some Ontario farms have been cultivated for two, three and four generations. The occupants have paid their debts and kept off relief, and I do not believe that western Canada begrudges them a little higher percentage of telephones or running water in the houses.

The farmer in western Canada has, we all admit, had difficulties. This is due largely to two reasons—one the loss of markets, and the other, partial, or in some places complete, crop failures. The government has been very generous in looking after the sufferers from those conditions and trying to alleviate the troubles of western Canada. Material assistance has been given through the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Apparently all parties are agreed that this has actually brought relief to those who were in need.

However, agriculture all over Canada has gone through difficult times. When this conflict is over and we come back to normal conditions again, if we are ever going to have parity prices in any degree—I do not like to talk about parity prices, for seldom can we recall when farm prices were on a parity basis —I believe we shall have to have a new agricultural policy for Canada if agriculture is to survive.

There are many agricultural problems in western Ontario. That is the reason why I am presenting a few thoughts this afternoon.

In southwestern Ontario there is a bean problem. It is only a minor problem compared with problems of the whole dominion, but beans have been grown in western Ontario for a number of years. Until recently they found a market readily in the British empire, but this year, due to war conditions, we have a surplus of beans to sell. The only market is the British empire, but I believe Britain is getting a great deal of her supply of beans from the United States under the lease-lend act and is not so anxious to take ours. They have, however, made a commitment to take ten thousand tons some time during the year. They are not dealing through our Canadian marketing service, but want to deal through the trade; that is, the British Ministry of Food apparently insists on dealing through the trade. That means we have a ceiling for beans in western Ontario for domestic sales; we have no ceiling for export. Therefore the exporters, of whom there are only two or three, are in a position for bargaining for the beans to supply the British market at practically their own price. I know the Department of Agriculture is working on a plan to help the bean producers, in the hope of dealing directly through the marketing service of Canada. But if the bean producers of western Ontario were getting the same treatment to-day as the wheat producers, they would be pretty well satisfied. How then can I go back, as representative of a riding like that, and ask the bean producers to be taxed to pay a bonus or subsidy to western wheat, when they cannot sell their own product?

We have also in western Ontario a sugar beet industry, as mentioned by the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark). A sugar beet refinery has been in operation in our riding for forty years. The price of sugar was set at the beginning of the war, and the growers' contracts were based definitely on the sugar price. On the one hand the growers are faced with a rising labour cost while on the other the price of the product is pegged. The result is that one factory will probably close altogether, whereas in view of the fact that there is a shortage of sugar this year and a prospect of an even more acute shortage next year, we should be producing all we can. So I say, how can I, as representative of a riding which has a sugar beet industry, go back and tell them that we want to tax them in order to pay a subsidy to the western wheat growers?

I am not very familiar with the wheat situation, but I should like to read a quotation from the hon. member for Wood Mountain

(Mr. Donnelly) as reported at page 2422 of Hansard for April 29, 1941:

The farmer is getting the 85 cents a bushel; that is what this $35,000,000 is for.

That was the vote put through last year.

It will be seen that 230,000,000 bushels at 15 cents a bushel comes to $35,000,000. That is the 85 cents a bushel which the government is giving the farmer of western Canada. That is why the price is what it is, and where the 85 cents comes in.

In addition to that, which according to the hon. member's contention last year would raise the price of wheat to around 85 cents a bushel, after the session had been adjourned the government voted another $30,000,000 for prairie farm income. This, together with the $8,500,000 paid in prairie farm assistance I think would bring the price of western wheat close to $1 a bushel. Whether or not it worked out in that way I am not in a position to say, but that is my information for that statement. A little further on he said something else which was rather startling:

I say that wheat can be raised for 50 cents a bushel, and make no mistake about that. Profit can be made out of it at that price. It is being done and has been done during the past two years. It can be done; but it must be done on a mechanized farm. It must be done scientifically, and it cannot be done in an old-fashioned war. One can farm to-day 1,600 acres of wheat and not pay any more for his labour than he did a few years ago to farm 320 acres. I can grow 800 acres of wheat to-day with as little labour as I grew 100 acres a few years ago.

I am not in a position to say whether or not that is correct, but that was the statement made last year by the hon. member for Wood Mountain. I suppose there are over 250,000 farmers in western Canada, and some of them must have very large farms, for the other day the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) said he knew of some farm bonuses this year as large as $10,000. If that is not correct, the hon. member will tell me so, but that was what I understood him to say. What is the situation this year? The initial price is increased to 90 cents a bushel, No. 1 Fort William. This means an increased cost, in connection with the number of bushels they expect to buy, of around $56,000,000. Then the acreage bonus plan, if it is in the same category as last year, will cost another $30,000,000, and on top of that there will be perhaps another $10,000,000 in prairie farm assistance. Surely this will mean that the western farmer will get over $1 a bushel for his wheat this year.

I am not complaining that the farmers are getting too much for their wheat. I should like to see them get a great deal more, but market conditions would not warrant it. The point that worries me, however, is whether they are satisfied with the assistance they are being given; and after having listened to what has been said in this house, I would say the answer was no. The other day the hon. member for Melfort made a statement which seemed very peculiar to me. As reported at page 1222 of Hansard he said:

I can assure you, sir, that is the attitude of western Canada. They are fed up and are desirous of getting a better deal than they have received in the past.

From western Canada we have also four other members of the cabinet—the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), and the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar).

I need not read what followed immediately after that, because I think it better not to put it on record again, but a little further on the hon. gentleman continued:

We feel that if those members of the cabinet who represent western agriculture here were determined to get a fair deal for the western farmers, they could get it. In addition, we have thirty-four members supporting the government who belong to western Canada. If those members would stand up for the people they represent rather than for the party, they could obtain what western agriculture wants; and if the three sections together—the Prime Minister, the members of the cabinet, and the members supporting the government, assisted by the members on this side of the house from the west—made a united effort, we could get it without a doubt.

I wonder whether it has ever dawned on the hon. member for Melfort that members of the cabinet represent Canada as a whole. Surely they must have a national outlook, and surely they could not present something to the house that would not be carried. If some of us would endeavour to get a more national outlook, and see beyond our own little domestic problems, we would get along with something really worth while. A little later the hon. gentleman said something that rather startled me. He spoke of some people who had moved from another part of Saskatchewan into his district, and said:

There are many people . . . who have moved to the northern part of Saskatchewan into the constituency which I represent. Many of those people are living on small farms; they took up bush homesteads and have some forty or fifty acres under cultivation. The wheat acreage reduction bonus does not mean a thing to them, neither does the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, because they always grow over twelve bushels to the acre, but their acreage is small. Neither does the other bill, which provides for a payment of 75 cents per acre on the cultivated acreage mean anything to them, because they have so little under cultivation.

It appears that these people have reached the point where, if they cannot come under some scheme of bonus or assistance from the government, they cannot possibly help themselves. Here we have people who cannot come under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act because their crops are too good. They cannot come under the bonus scheme because they do not require that sort of assistance, and they have such a small acreage under cultivation that they must have some bonus or subsidy from the government or they cannot make a living. I should like to compare those farmers with some farmers in Ontario. Our people in Ontario have been farming under those conditions for many years, and paying much higher taxes. When this bill goes to committee I think we surely should insert a clause to take care of that little group of people in the hon. member's riding, who have such good crops that they do not need one form of assistance, in order that they may be given some subsidy or support of some kind. Such nonsense!

Let me say further that when the income of western Canada was low the Minister of Agriculture—and I give him credit for it—sponsored a move to grant a subsidy or cost of living bonus to increase the income of prairie farms. Under that measure something like 75 cents an acre was paid on cultivated land up to a limit of 200 acres, which meant approximately $150 per farm.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask a question? Is he aware that every farmer in Canada who is producing live stock as well as grain is receiving a bonus from the treasury?

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I am aware of that fact. I am also aware that western Canada produces a great many cattle, and that every year Ontario buys many western cattle. But under that scheme another $30,000,000 was voted. No one is making any complaint about that; I give the minister credit for coming to their assistance. But I want to ask this: Has any member from western Canada risen in his place in this house and said how much they appreciate what has been done for them by the government?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Well, I have not heard of it. I think they should at least give the government credit for having come to the assistance of the farmers of western Canada. I wonder whether they took part of the amount voted for prairie farm income to finance that delegation of two trainloads of farmers who came here to meet the Minister of Agriculture. Let me say that the minister was in error the other day when he said that there had been no other delegations of farmers or farm organizations to see him. There have been small delegations.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say that. There was one delegation here to see me yesterday morning, so I would not say that.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): That was what I understood the minister to say. The fact remains, however, that small delegations have come here to see him, but certainly our farmers could not finance a delegation amounting to two trainloads.

In conclusion, I say to my western friends that I have every sympathy for western Canada. I believe agriculture as a whole should be looked after, and looked after well, because for a long time it has not received its share from the point of view of revenue. I believe the western members who have been complaining so much should thank their lucky stars that the Minister of Agriculture is from western Canada, and has given them a great deal of assistance. They must appreciate, too, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is a western man. I believe those men are as fair as they can be, but a minister may be a little biased in favour of the constituency he represents.

I believe the whole economy is wrong. In my opinion the Minister of Trade and Commerce should come from one part of the country, and the Minister of Agriculture from another.

Mr. REID: It was not much different when it was that way, before.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Well, it should be different. I believe the ministry must represent the whole dominion. We 245 members of the House of Commons come here with our problems, and those problems may look large to us. We lay them at the ministers' feet, or at the seat of government. We put them all together, and ask the government of the day to draw from that concoction a policy, not in the interests of western Canada, not in the interests of eastern Canada, but in the interests of all of Canada, and we ask them to be as fair and as equitable as possible. Sometimes we seem to take the position that because a minister lives in one particular spot he must fight for that spot, must get all the good things in life for it, or withdraw from the government.

I am not sure whether it was the hon. member for Battle "Axe"—or some such place—in western Canada, who placed a real gem in Hansard the other night. He pointed out that it was the squeaky wheel that got the grease and the crying baby who got the attention. I would change that a little and say that if the wheel which is getting the grease is still squeaking, we had better take the grease away from it, and give it something to squeak for.

Probably I have taken too much time, but may I repeat that I do not wish to be antagonistic. I do not believe I am, because I try to see the picture as a whole. We shall have plenty of time to fight over our domestic problems when this war is over. I have not taken up much of the time of the house, but I believe we are spending far too much time in fighting about our wheat problem and the economics of our country, at a time when the empire is confronted with the greatest crisis in its history and is probably crumbling at this time.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) has asked me if I would allow him to take up ten minutes of time before I proceed to speak. I told him I would consent, if it were understood that Mr. Speaker would afterwards allow me my place. With your permission, sir, I shall be pleased to make way for the hon. member, for about ten minutes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That cannot be done; it is impossible. If that were to happen, the hon. member would lose his place.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has permitted me to speak immediately—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: That is the decision of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, not the decision of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie).

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Portage la Prairie is now on his feet, and therefore he has the floor. If the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains wishes to speak, and is not on the list, he should see the Clerk of the House.

Mr. LEADER: With the consent of the house I am willing to withdraw; otherwise I would lose my position.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Portage la Prairie does not speak now, he will lose his place.

Mr. LEADER: Then I shall proceed.

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order. The standing orders of the House of Commons mention nothing about the whips of the Liberal and Conservative parties. What authority have they in the house, concerning the list of speakers?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: I want to have a decision on this question, because the standing orders do not mention the whips of any party.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not a point of order. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie will continue.

Mr. LEADER: Mr. Speaker, I believe my years of experience on the farm, and my years of operating an elevator and as a grain buyer give me licence to speak on legislation of this kind. I feel inwardly gratified that my decision many years ago when I entered public life was that I would be more or less independent. After listening to some of the discussions I have heard in recent days I am thankful I made that decision. Therefore if, when speaking this afternoon, I say some things which may seem painful, I believe such statements necessary, and from my point of view I shall have to make them, no matter what party they may hurt.

May I say that I believe the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) would be well advised if he were to withdraw his amendment. In my opinion it is a futile gesture, if I may use that expression, and I suspect there is a little politics in it. Mr. Speaker, I absolutely refuse to play politics. If the hon. member will withdraw his amendment and allow the bill to go to the committee to which the other wheat bills have gone, I will promise him that in that committee I will fight along with him for what he is asking. For three or four years we have been criticizing the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for not submitting legislation of this kind to the inspection of the committee on agriculture. Now that we have got the minister to the point where he is willing to have the bills submitted to our scrutiny, let us jump at the chance to do so. Then, if we do not like what is done in committee we shall have our chance later in the house to express our opinions. My suggestion therefore would be that the hon. member withdraw his amendment, and I believe when the bill is given third reading we shall reach the same conclusion.

I should like to deal first with a matter which to my mind is serious. I refer to the statement of the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) that the Saskatchewan wheat pools had made dividends amounting to $3,000,000. He called it high finance, and added, "Remember, this is a cooperative company, and they do not pay any income tax." In my opinion that is a serious statement. The hon. member is not the first Liberal member I have heard express similar sentiments, and I wish to say now that if that is ever the policy of the Liberal party, do not expect to find me with that party.

I am a cooperator, and I belong to the Manitoba cooperative. In the dividends we are now earning we are just getting back the money we put into the stock of an institution which it was thought would help us in our farming, and lower our cost of production. Every dollar that was collected was deducted from some man's load of wheat. When he sold a carload of wheat, perhaps fifty dollars was deducted—which he otherwise would have had in his pocket—in order to build up a reserve to build an elevator. Now, when these men have reached the point where they are making dividends and there is a chance for them to get some of their original capital back, the suggestion is made that we tax these dividends. I do not think that would be right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not the suggestion.

Mr. LEADER: Absolutely.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The suggestion was—

Mr. LEADER: Please, I would like not to have any interjections unless absolutely necessary. When the hon. member for Wood Mountain takes the stand that he is in favour of a reduction in elevator charges, I am with him. He is on solid ground there. The elevator charges are absolutely too high, and both he and I have been fighting those high charges for years. I have stood in this house, Mr. Speaker, session after session and pointed out—it might have seemed small but the principle was there just the same—that when we sell a carload of wheat containing 1,500 bushels we pay a service charge of $15, or 1 cent a bushel. When we sell a carload of barley, containing the same number of pounds, we pay the commission man $18.75. Is that fair? Anyone to whom I have spoken admits that it is not fair, but I never have heard any member of this house representing a farming district or any other district back me up when I made that plea. The barley industry is becoming more important every year, especially at this time. We may produce 200 million bushels of barley next year, and I believe the government would be well advised to have that commission charge—service charge is the technical name for it—reduced to half a cent a bushel. It is not the first time that I have offered this suggestion and I am offering it again now.

The grain exchange sets the tariff for the commission charges. I have taken this matter up with the grain exchange. They say that the service charge on barley is a reasonable charge, and they absolutely refuse to change it. I have taken the matter up with the government. I can remember that a few years ago legislation went through this house to appoint a supervisor for the grain exchange with power to compel the brokers to produce their books for inspection. The bill went over to the other house and was there so amended that it took away the right of the supervisor to scrutinize the brokers' figures. That emasculated the bill entirely, and I do not think a supervisor of the grain exchange has ever been appointed. Even if he were, he would have absolutely no power under that legislation. Why should an institution like the grain exchange be able to set their own tariffs and be able to charge $3.75 more for one car than they charge for another containing the same number of pounds? I say it is time the government stepped in and showed them the rules.

The hon. member for Wood Mountain referred to an article which he saw in a financial paper. I have it here, and I think I should read it and put it on the records of this house. It is an editorial in the Financial Post of February 14, 1942, and says:

> Saskatchewan wheat pool profits last year amounted to almost $3 millions after the usual depreciation. Had the pool been an ordinary private grain company the public treasury would have been enriched to the extent of over $1·5 million in income and excess profit taxes. But being classed as a "cooperative", the pool paid exactly nothing.
> The prairie wheat pools are competing directly with private grain companies which must and do pay full national taxes. They are performing a service not one whit different from that of their competitors. Long before this the dominion Department of Finance should have stepped in, ended this absurd and unfair discrimination, and stopped a very substantial leakage in taxes.

That really is the serious part of the statement made by the hon. member for Wood Mountain. I am just a little nervous that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) might endeavour to seek a new avenue whereby he would get some taxation. I do not think it would be fair to go to this source.

Mr. DONNELLY: They have to pay income tax.

Mr. LEADER: I am very glad to see my hon. friend back in the house. I missed him from his usual front seat. No; we should not have to pay taxes because we are only getting our own money back. The hon. member for Wood Mountain also said that he belonged to the pool.

Mr. DONNELLY: Sure.

Mr. LEADER: Oh, what loyalty!

Mr. DONNELLY: I shall have to tell you something about it.

Mr. LEADER: I have heard of people damning an institution with faint praise, but a man who belongs to an institution and then gives to the house the information the hon. member for Wood Mountain gave the other day—I say that is not loyalty.

I am in favour of $1 a bushel being paid for our wheat. That is nothing new for me; I advocated it here in a speech I made in the house last fall, on November 19, 1941. At that time I believed we could pay $1 a bushel and limit the deliveries to any quantity which the government thought it could sell—if not 230 million bushels, limit it to 200 million bushels. That factor could be absolutely controlled. The bonus I did not like then; I do not like it now and perhaps never will. I must qualify that because I think the Prairie Farm Assistance Act does act as a crop insurance policy, and the other act, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, has the effect of conserving the fertility of the soil. I think there is some merit in both those acts. But the wheat acreage reduction bonus, and the from income bonus, which was the best of them all, would have been unnecessary if the farmers had received a high enough price for their wheat. Then we could have done without them.

The farmers want legislation that they can understand, and I think the Minister of Agriculture will agree with me when I say that they do not understand this legislation. The minister understands it, but I must confess that I do not.

In my part of the country the farmers do not want this bonus plan. I make that statement positively, believing that I am stating the absolute truth. But they took advantage of it—I am talking of the wheat acreage reduction bonus—in order to get some income which was denied them because the price of wheat was too low. But it upset their whole routine, and they turned all sorts of corners in order to get a little summer-fallowing in here, put barley in there, and so on.

I have a letter here which expresses the mind, I think, of most of the people in my district. This gentleman is of Liberal stock, a very open-minded man. In fact he was a candidate in the last provincial election. He is a man of good intelligence, and since the intelligence of my constituency is fairly high, I think it well worthwhile for me to read part of his letter. First he expresses his opinion that the initial price should be $1 a bushel. Then he goes on to say:

> Of course I won't be greatly surprised at a guaranteed price of less than $1. What I really expect is some complicated plan that no one can thoroughly understand until it is too late to do anything about it.

That is typical of the opinion of the farmers in my district. I have stated that I do not like the bonus. I think that one of the worst features of the bonus is its inequality. Fifty per cent of the farmers of Manitoba sow less than fifty acres of wheat. The figures I quote are based on the 1935 census. I tried to get them up to date, but the bureau does not have them. I believe that in Alberta the percentage is forty-two per cent. Even in Saskatchewan, twenty-five per cent of the farmers sow less than fifty acres of wheat. There were 187,000 farmers in the western provinces, including, I assume, the Peace River district, who made application for the wheat reduction bonus. I asked the minister a question on this point during his speech, when he said he would rather not be interrupted; in any event he did not answer. I just wished to know how many farmers there are in the three prairie provinces. I have since ascertained from one of his officials, although this is only an estimate, that there are 290,000. And 187,000 made application! This means that 103,000 farmers in that western country did not get any of this wheat reduction bonus.

Mr. GARDINER: Many of that number are market gardeners.

Mr. LEADER: Many of them are very small farmers. Then the man who did not produce wheat in 1939 and 1940 was out of the picture altogether. We have in Manitoba lots of men who have not been growing wheat for five or six years.

Mr. GARDINER: There are also the ranchers.

Mr. LEADER: There was no chance for these men to share in the wheat bonus. So you get back to the principle that if you pay the higher price for a limited number of bushels you are going to benefit them all—the big farmer as well as the smaller farmer.

We heard rumours that the Liberals from Saskatchewan, headed by our Minister of Agriculture, put up a tremendous fight to have the government recognize this increase in prices and the continuance of the minister's programme. I think they did pretty well. I believe that every Liberal member from Saskatchewan would put up the best fight he knew how; and, knowing the Minister of Agriculture as I do, I am confident that he also would put forth his very best efforts. But I wonder where were the Liberals from Alberta?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. LEADER: I wonder where the Liberal members from my own province of Manitoba were?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Page them.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I can tell the hon. member where the Liberals of Alberta were.

Mr. LEADER: These are rumours. I am asking the question, if the Liberal members from Alberta were there.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Not at that meeting.

Mr. LEADER: Not at this meeting that I am talking about? Well, then, were the Liberal members from Manitoba there? I was not there. I would have been delighted to be there upholding their hands and battling at their side. Perhaps, if the Liberal members from Manitoba and from Alberta had been there, we would have got $1 wheat. We should have been there.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is right.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): You should all have been there.

Mr. LEADER: It was understood that our Liberal members from Manitoba were going to get together with the Liberal members from the other two provinces and see what could be done.

Mr. PERLEY: All hon. members should have been there.

Mr. LEADER: I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson); all the western members should have been there, and all hon. members who were interested. But did the leader of the opposition practise what he preaches? I don't think he ever did. I as an independent member can make these statements, believing that we should get what we are entitled to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) who made that observation. I agree with him.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Was the grain exchange represented there?

Mr. LEADER: The government policy is reasonably good. But I do not think they should take all the credit. There is a war on, and that has something to do, it seems to me, with the increased prices which agriculturists are getting. I say that without wishing to detract one iota from the effort of the government; in some respects I think it has been very good. Now they are granting us 90 cents a bushel for wheat, and, according to the Minister of Agriculture's own figures, that is 57 cents a bushel less than parity price based on the period 1926-29. The barley price on the same basis was 73 cents, and the government is setting a floor price at 60 cents, which means that it is 13 cents less than the parity price of 1926-29. For oats the parity price was 59 cents, and the government is putting a floor price of 45 cents, leaving 14 cents of a spread between the parity price and the government price. The floor prices for the coarse grains, are, of course, a consideration; they really do mean something.

Here is where I am going to say something which may be painful but is, I believe, necessary. The difficulty with regard to Manitoba is that our leader is apparently more interested in the grain trade than in the welfare of our farmers. I am very sorry that the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) is not in his seat. I know him better, perhaps, than any other man in this house.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): He is ill this afternoon.

Mr. LEADER: I am sorry that that is so, but it is not my fault; whether he is here or whether he is not, I intend to make this statement. I am not actuated by any political motives; I am actuated by the desire to serve my people; and when I look over the years during which the minister has sat in this house and review the attitude he has taken on the grain question, I believe that what I have to say to-day should have been said before. When you make a charge you should be able to substantiate it; that is why I used the word "apparently". I am now going to define my meaning.

When the grain act was being revised, in 1925, the present Minister of Mines and Resources was definitely behind the practice of mixing our wheat. I have not time to go into that, but to me the picture is so familiar that I can almost see the old house as it stood, and hear the discussion which took place at that time. He was absolutely behind the mixing of wheat. He turned round to the other Progressive members and said, "I am sorry I must appear at variance with my colleagues from western Canada, but they do not represent the opinion of western Canada".

There we had the spectacle of our farm leader voting by himself, while all the other Progressive members supported the proposal for the non-mixing of wheat.

Again, he was mainly responsible for the taking away of the right of the farmer to name the terminal of his choice. I do not want to go at length into that, but he was the one man who took away that right from the farmer. He declared at that time, that technically it was not a right, but it was the system which we were working under, an actual right we enjoyed, whether we had the legal right or not. He made it absolutely sure that we could not designate our own terminal elevator unless we released the country elevator from the loss which might be sustained if they shipped the carload of wheat to any other terminal. He had his eye at that very time on the pool elevators, especially the one at the head of the lakes. In recent legislation he has invariably spoken in defence of the grain trade.

I have on this note of mine the pages where this information will be found in Hansard. It will be found on page 2537 of Hansard of 1940. We all remember—those of us who were here in 1939—when Mr. Motherwell named him as the opponent of the wheat board. Then he went to Great Britain and returned with the advice that Britain wanted the grain exchange to function. He was interested in the grain exchange, notwithstanding the fact that the market was closed in Britain and they had sent an agent, and all that they purchased was purchased through that agency. Yet he came back saying that the old country wished the grain exchange to be kept open in Winnipeg to set the price of wheat. He opposed the government in the policy of making an advance on farmer-held grain. We know that he said in this house, when asked by some hon. members whether he was in favour, "If you ask me, it is only moonshine." The Minister of Agriculture knows whether I am right in saying that he went with him to Winnipeg to represent the government, to confer with him on the wheat board, to see whether an advance would be made to farmer-stored wheat, and the decision was made that no government advance would be given.

Mr. GARDINER: No; he was not sent with me.

Mr. LEADER: He was there at your meeting.

Mr. GARDINER: He was in Winnipeg and I came from Regina.

Mr. LEADER: It was quite a coincidence. Why split hairs?

[Mr. Leader.]

Mr. GARDINER: We were both there on the invitation of the premier of Manitoba. There was no arrangement at all other than that.

Mr. LEADER: Will the Minister of Agriculture say he is jointly responsible?

Mr. GARDINER: I will say, Mr. Speaker, that I was largely responsible for the decision which was made at that meeting as far as the government is concerned.

Mr. LEADER: Then I will include the Minister of Agriculture in this latter charge.

Mr. GARDINER: I still think I was right.

Mr. LEADER: What a different policy from what is taking place now in the United States! I have here a letter—I shall not have time to read it—from a man in charge there who tells me that the policy of granting advances to farmers in the United States is this, that they store their grain in a granary after meeting the specifications of the government inspector, and that it has had the effect of building many thousands of granaries throughout that country. That is where we want our wheat held—on the farms and not in the elevator, costing us $50,000,000 a year.

Mr. GARDINER: By far the greater part of that wheat in the United States is in elevators and not on farms.

Mr. LEADER: I hope, Mr. Speaker, you are keeping track of the time I am losing. Further, the Minister of Mines and Resources declared that the present tariffs were fair to the elevator companies in the face of the demand for lower storage charges. What does the hon. member for Wood Mountain think of that? You will find it at page 2379 of Hansard of 1940. The minister was never friendly to the wheat pool! If you want that information look at page 2268 of Hansard of 1940 and page 2272 of the same year.

Let me now say something about the delegation which presented the brief here in Ottawa. In the first place, I wish to congratulate the people of Saskatchewan upon sending that delegation to Ottawa. They got subscriptions from 185,000 signers and the expenses were paid out of the joint collection of 24 cents from each individual signer. That is how it was paid. Their journey to Ottawa, however, was ridiculed by the Minister of Agriculture, who asked, where will they get the money? It was condemned by many of our papers also. But after they came here and presented their brief they were commended by the minister and by the press in general. They made what they thought and what we all thought was a very favourable impression. The minister himself has told us that it was not a delegation of farmers, that they were reeves of municipalities and mayors of cities. I say it was a delegation representative of the whole of Saskatchewan. After their brief was presented the government promised them consideration. This is what they asked for: The delegation's proposal was that they be paid $1 a bushel initial price for what quantity of wheat the government thought they could take, and that was 41 cents, or, to be exact, 41·7 cents, below the parity price of 1926 and 1929.

Was that not a reasonable request? Do you not think it was a generous compromise? I do. Then they favoured restricted deliveries and said that those surpluses which could not be purchased should be taken care of by the farmers back on their farms. The policy of this government should be to encourage that, because there is nothing that will convince the farmer more than, when he sees his bin full of wheat which he cannot sell, to be told that he should grow something else besides wheat; and you would relieve the taxpayers of the country by not paying storage charges. I am not advocating storage for the farmer. Let him build his own granary to store his wheat, and when it is wanted he can take out the wheat and sell it. If he cannot sell it he will not grow wheat, and that is very good logic.

This higher price of $1 a bushel will not increase the production of wheat. That is a fallacy. You have all the machinery in your hands to control that. Do you think the farmer is crazy enough to grow something he cannot sell? He is not going to grow it.

I come now to the presentation of the farm organization, which represented the whole of the dominion, and in that connection I wish to read this paragraph of their brief:

> The general nature of our organization is, of course, known to you. We have made substantial progress during the last year in the consolidation of our provincial units and we now have an affiliated membership of more than 350,000 farmers.

It is growing. We are growing. We shall get to the point where we shall have double 350,000 presenting briefs, and they will be listened to. They listened in this case—I am giving credit for that. They said that their first consideration, their paramount duty, was to use all their efforts in the prosecution of the war, and then, speaking for the whole of the dominion, they said that they would like to have a voice in formulating the farm policies of Canada. That should be appreciated by the government, and I believe it is. May I quote the following:

> All of the member bodies of this federation from western Canada are on record to the effect that the basic price for the coming year should be not less than $1 per bushel basis No. 1 northern at lakehead or seaboard terminals. This represents widespread opinion in western Canada and further evidence will be given in the presentation by the delegation from the province of Saskatchewan which is to meet the government this afternoon. We can assure the government that opinion in Manitoba and in Alberta is equally strong and that such a request has also the support of the agricultural interests in other parts of Canada represented by this association.

I believe the government of Saskatchewan endorsed their representations in toto. There, Mr. Speaker, you have the representations as made by the organized farmers of this dominion.

One of the mistakes made last year in the submission to the Minister of Agriculture by the organized farmers of Canada was that they did not propose a definite price. It was generally agreed that the price should be 85 cents, but they did not state that in their presentation. The Minister of Agriculture, taking advantage of that, made a statement which is found on page 1923 of Hansard for March 27, 1941. He said:

> The fact that neither the Saskatchewan pool in its recommendations, nor the advisory committee in its recommendations, nor the Canadian agricultural federation in its recommendations, was able to insert a price, I think clearly indicates that, while there may have been some sentiment in these organizations in favour of changing the advance provided for in the wheat board act, there was considerable sentiment against it.

I submit to the minister that they certainly have asked a definite price this year. They profited by the mistake they made last year. They have asked for a dollar a bushel initial price at the lake head, backed by the organized farmers of Canada, and I think they are entitled to it.

With the exception of the two acts which I mentioned previously, they are willing to forgo the wheat acreage reduction bonus and the farm income bonus if the government will raise the price to $1 a bushel. This would cost the taxpayers less than it would to pay these bonuses and 90 cents.

Mr. GARDINER: Plus what is required to bring it to parity.

Mr. LEADER: Why does the government not adopt the policy which would satisfy 90 per cent of the farmers of western Canada? Perhaps I am putting that too strongly—at any rate 90 per cent of the farmers of Manitoba.

Mr. GARDINER: The suggestion the hon. member is making is that the farmers asked for only $1 a bushel. But in fact they asked for $1 a bushel plus enough to bring it up to parity. The comparison should be made between those two things.

Mr. LEADER: They are asking for $1 a bushel initial price. Why hedge it around with these other things? They do not like your bonuses.

Mr. GARDINER: Seven hundred in your municipality applied for them.

Mr. LEADER: They applied because they needed the money. It upset their whole farming routine. We should not do that.

Mr. RICKARD: Would they have got the money in any other way, except through the bonus?

Mr. LEADER: Yes. They were asking for 85-cent wheat last year; that would have provided about as much money as the bonuses. They do not like the bonus. They like the higher initial payment.

It has been said in western Canada that it is because of opposition from Ontario and other parts of eastern Canada that it was not granted. I do not believe it. If the government would come out boldly for a policy of $1 a bushel, those hon. members would be found supporting us. I asked an hon. member from Ontario who was here a moment ago what he got for his wheat in Ontario this year. He said $1.05 at the barn. We have to haul our wheat to the elevator as well as pay the charges. I know that Canadians are willing to grant justice to other parts of Canada. I do not believe that Ontario is opposed to a higher initial price.

Let me quote from a dispatch from Regina of April 9, 1941. It is headed:

Taggart says Eastern Opinion Influenced Government Wheat Policy.

The dispatch reads:

Widespread belief in eastern Canada that the west was determined to "get all we can from the government and pay nothing back" had a definite effect in determining the 1941 wheat policy of the federal government, declared Hon. J. G. Taggart, Saskatchewan Minister of Agriculture, yesterday.

I do not believe that is true. You can hardly speak to a man on the streets of Ottawa who has not a son or a nephew or an uncle or a daughter in western Canada. They are our own people.

Mr. FURNISS: Does the hon. member know what he could get for wheat in Manitoba by feeding it to hogs, as we do in Ontario?

Mr. LEADER: The experience of one of the best feeders we have in Manitoba is that he can get $1 a bushel for wheat by feeding it to hogs.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. FURNISS: Yes, at his farm. That is right.

Mr. LEADER: But you cannot feed to hogs all the wheat that is grown in western Canada.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How many hogs would you have if you fed all the western wheat crop to hogs?

Mr. LEADER: I believe my time has expired—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. LEADER: No, thank you; I do not think I should continue. I have said enough to indicate my position and what I shall do in regard to this legislation when it comes before the house for third reading. I am not particular as to whether I vote for the amendment or against it. I still believe it would be wise to withdraw it. I believe it is a futile gesture, and that it smacks of politics, if that is a proper word.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is not fair.

Mr. LEADER: Perhaps it is not, but I have that suspicion, and feeling as I do I cannot vote for the amendment. It really does not make any difference. But I shall be here with both feet if we do not get that $1 a bushel which was asked by these farm organizations and will vote against the government on third reading. I am not going to fail these organizations. That is where they get their bread and butter. The loyalty I owe is not to any political party; it is to the people on the farms, both east and west, whom I represent in this house. I represent not only the constituency of Portage la Prairie in Manitoba, but in this particular case I represent the agriculturists of western Canada.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MARSHALL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Camrose.

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order. Standing order 35 provides:

When two or more members rise to speak, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who first rose in his place; but a motion may be made that any member who has risen "be now heard", or "do now speak", which motion shall be forthwith put without debate.

I submit respectfully that I rose from my seat three times this afternoon and according to the rules of the house I must have the floor.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is true that the hon. member did rise, but he knows that I have a list of the members who it has been arranged should speak to-day, and who are all present. I saw the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Marshall) when he rose in his place to take the floor, and he now has the floor. If the hon. member is dissatisfied he has the right under the rule he has just cited—or someone may do it for him—to move that he be now heard. If any hon. member rises in his place and requests that the hon. member be now heard, I shall put it to the house and the house will then decide who shall speak. The hon. member for Camrose has the floor.

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to another point of order. Nothing in the standing orders of the house mentions the lists of the whips of any party. It is absolutely against the rules of the house to follow those lists. I stand upon these regulations and ask that I be allowed to speak.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On the point of order raised by the hon. member, the rule has been established for many years that the Speaker sees a certain hon. member in debate; and frequently in the British House of Commons some members wait for weeks before they get the privilege of taking part in the debate. It is not at all a matter of the whips' lists, but in order to expedite the work of the house some arrangement must be made between those responsible for the conduct of the house. The Speaker has the right to see any hon. member he chooses to see; that has been part of our system for centuries.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What has been said by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) is in accordance with the practice of this house, and I do not see how we could very well depart from it as a general principle, for the reasons which have been stated. On the other hand, however, there should be a sense of fairness in regard to this matter. If the whips choose to make up lists—which of course are not official in any way—and hand them to the Speaker, who follows the lists and sees only those whose names are contained therein, I could conceive of a situation where an hon. member might never be heard, and of course that would be a denial of justice.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That has never happened in this house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, we had the inception of it right here this afternoon. I hold no brief for the hon. member who is endeavouring to catch the eye of the Speaker, but I have an innate sense of justice which tells me that this is not exactly right. It is near the end of the afternoon, of course, and in a few moments we are going to adjourn. I do suggest that some arrangement be made by the whips—and this may be a means of expediting it—whereby the hon. member may be able to express his views on the floor of this house in regard to the question now before us.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I point out to my hon. friend that the hon. member already has been told that he can speak in this debate on Monday.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had not been told that. I do not know why he did not agree to that arrangement.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) knows the rules of the house, I am sure. With what has been said by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) I am entirely in agreement. I want to see that every hon. member has the opportunity to speak, as he is entitled to do; but I do think the Chair should not be placed in the position of having to discriminate between hon. members on both sides of the house. With the present composition of the house I should be bound to make mistakes and to discriminate unfairly. The rules provide, however, that if the hon. member is dissatisfied he may, through some other hon. member, ask that he be heard. If that is done I will put it to the house, which will judge as to who should be heard. In this instance no one has asked that the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains be heard; therefore the hon. member for Camrose has the floor.

Mr. LACOMBE: Then, following the remarks of the leader of the opposition, I ask the Chair to give me the floor.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must understand that I have already given my ruling. The standing order is there; it can be taken advantage of by the hon. member. As soon as that is done it will be brought before the house, and the house will decide as to who is to speak. In this case no such request has been made to the Chair; therefore I have seen the hon. member for Camrose, who now has the floor.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I appeal from your decision.

Mr. MARSHALL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I have said that I appeal from your decision.

Mr. SPEAKER: No one has stood up. Five members must rise, and no one has risen except the hon. member himself. The hon. member for Camrose will now proceed.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): First I should like to pay my humble respects to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) for the fine courage he displayed this afternoon in championing the cause of the farmer. His splendid exposition was commendable. One thing he does not lack is courage.

I have a little problem, Mr. Speaker, which I should like to share with you. If an Irishman speaks on Bill No. 13 on Friday, March 13, at 5.45 o'clock, does it bode ill for the bill or for the Irishman? I think in checking the time, and considering the difficulty I have experienced in getting the floor, that the Irishman has lost the first round.

When I last spoke in this house, on Bill No. 5, I emphasized the importance of having an objective or goal toward which we must strive with persistence and courage. The solution of the difficulties of agriculture is as vital to Canada as the placing of returned men in industrial positions at the conclusion of this war or an increase in the pensions given to old age pensioners. We must assess correctly the problems of agriculture; for until we do their solution is impossible. Over four hundred people, representing all shades of public opinion and all classes of society, travelled from Saskatchewan to Ottawa a short time ago to present a petition at the seat of government. This petition, signed by over 180,000 people, proposed a new deal for agriculture. It is not my intention to discuss the petition, but similar proposals were advanced by the legislatures of the three western provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, as well as by all sorts of farm organizations such as the National Council of Agriculture, the United Farmers of Alberta, the United Farmers of Canada, various grain companies, many boards of trade and chambers of commerce. Still the wishes of these various bodies and of such a vast number of people engaged in all kinds of agriculture in western Canada have been thwarted. Let me hasten to state that I do not altogether blame the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for the mess agriculture is in to-day, nor do I absolve him entirely from all responsibility; for after all, he must assume some of that responsibility. Cabinet ministers as a general rule do not frame policies; they are too busy. Policies are framed by the real rulers of this country, the bureaucrats. These bureaucrats are the people who formulate the plans, who draw up the policies, and who submit these plans and policies together with recommendations to the minister. We never get to know very much about these same bureaucrats, because they assume no responsibility; they are never dismissed from office. If their plans turn out to be worthless they are not even admonished.

[Mr. Speaker.]

As I have said before in the house, and as I shall say on many future occasions, these individuals have power but they have no responsibility. They have one eye firmly fixed on the Department of Finance and the other eye on the job they have in hand. They are constantly hedged in by financial restriction. And I say this, Mr. Speaker, that if you are looking for the real saboteurs of agriculture to-day you will find them not in the Department of Agriculture but rather in the Department of Finance. These bureaucrats have not yet given heed to the Minister of Finance who has uttered the words, "What is physically possible shall be made financially possible". This expression, by the way, which we have heard so often, and which has been adopted by the Minister of Finance, was pirated from Major Douglas, the founder of the social credit philosophy.

I believe we are going about this whole problem in the wrong way. We farmers have not yet decided what our objective or our goal should be, and we are suggesting to the government methods whereby some goal might be attained concerning which we as individuals have not yet reached a decision. I say therefore that we must first decide what we want, and then leave the government free to perfect the plan which will make our suggestions capable of accomplishment. Farmers not only in western Canada but in eastern Canada are, in my opinion, faced with two problems; first, debt and its twin evil, taxation, and, second, the exhaustion of the fertility of the soil.

With respect to number one I am not going to say very much. Through a series of crop failures, combined with persistent low prices, in the last ten years farmers have gone further and further into debt. Taxes have steadily mounted, and this has been brought about because municipalities—and I know whereof I speak—have been compelled to accept responsibility for many new things, such as indigent relief, mothers' allowances, old age pensions, hospitalization and the payment of doctors' bills.

With regard to the second problem, namely, the exhaustion of the fertility of the soil, I would say that under present conditions, by ignorant or unscrupulous exploitation and exhaustion of fertility vast profits have been made by financial interests—not by the farmers—in the name of cheap food. The chief characteristic of real farming is that it is a way of life rather than a business. I would therefore say that the goal toward which all organizations connected with agriculture should steadfastly strive are these: (1) a complete solution of the debt problem and its twin evil, taxation, and (2) the restoration of agriculture to its proper function, namely, a way of life rather than a profitable or unprofitable industry.

On motion of Mr. Marshall the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at six p.m.

Monday, March 16, 1942

3. Total subsidy payments in respect to grapefruit juice to March 6, 1942 inclusive amount to $11,842.65. It is not in the public interest to indicate the amounts paid to individual importers.

BUILDING OF CARGO VESSELS

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. What is Canada's programme for the building of cargo vessels?
2. What department of the Canadian government is responsible for the direction of this programme?

1. Canada's cargo shipbuilding programme utilizes the complete facilities of thirteen shipbuilding yards now operating or preparing to operate.

The types of ships being built are those chosen by the British Admiralty and the British Ministry of War Transport, as being the most suitable for building and operating under war conditions, consistent with the chief objective of procuring the largest number of ships in the shortest possible time.

2. The direction and the policy of the programme is under the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. ILSLEY: This matter is primarily one that comes under the jurisdiction of the various provincial governments. However, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, which is in operation in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, provides means whereby farmers in certain circumstances may make adjustments with their creditors.

WHEAT ACREAGE, 1941—FARM UNITS OF 320 ACRES OR LESS

Mr. PURDY:

What percentage of wheat acreage under crop in 1941 in the three western provinces was represented by the self-contained farm units of 320 acres or less?

[Mr. Douglas G. Ross]

Mr. McLARTY: Many of the plants engaged in war work in which women are employed in suitable occupations, are operated during the night and this practice will be continued while the emergent need for the rapid production of munitions of war continues.

Legislation controlling employment of women at night is within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments and in those provinces where legislation exists restricting employment of women at night, it is the understanding of the Department of Labour that permits have been issued by the provinces, subject to prescribed conditions to meet special circumstances.

On being advised that the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and New Zealand are observing the provisions of that convention so far as concerns Japan, the Japanese government replied that while not bound by the convention they will apply its provisions to civil as well as to military prisoners from the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and India.

ENLISTMENT OF INDIANS

Mr. CRERAR: This information is not available through the Indian department; whether or not it is available in the Department of National Defence I am unable to say.

Mr. POWER: So far as air is concerned, it is certainly not available to us; they are not listed as Indians in the records.

Mr. RALSTON: That applies to the army as well.

Mr. PERLEY: I will frame the question in a different way and I shall probably be able to get the information I want.

Question dropped.

*ENLISTMENT CAMPAIGN

Mrs. NIELSEN:

What has the government done towards launching a nation-wide enlistment campaign in the weeks preceding the plebiscite and obtaining the fullest participation of all members of parliament in such a recruiting drive?

Mr. RALSTON: May I answer this question orally? It is not the intention, as I am at present advised, to launch what might be called a special campaign in the weeks preceding the plebiscite. I can say, however, that we have been and shall be carrying on a nation-wide enlistment campaign, to use the words of the question, continuously, day in and day out. The house will probably be interested to know, if I may put it on the record now, the response we have had to date this year. In January the recruiting figures for the army were, as I believe I told the house, about 11,700; in February, a short month, 8,152; and in March up to and including the 14th, 4,019 for a little less than half a month. Regarding the participation of members of parliament, I may say first that citizens' committees all over the country have been exceedingly helpful and are increasing their activities. As I have said to the house before, the work of getting men for the armed forces justifies the very best efforts of all of us and I wish to emphasize again what I consider to be the need for the fullest and most active participation of all members of parliament in that effort. I venture to think that it is one of the many duties that rest upon members of this house in connection with their responsibilities of leadership.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Department of External Affairs Act to provide for the application of the Civil Service Superannuation Act to certain diplomatic or consular representatives.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

WAR APPROPRIATION

SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to be called the Supplementary 1941 War Appropriation Act to provide inter alia,

1. That sums not exceeding $135,000,000 be granted to his majesty in addition to the sums granted by the War Appropriation Act, 1941, towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1942, for:—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

He said: His Excellency the Govenor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN ARMY

ENLISTMENT CAMPAIGN—RECRUITING FIGURES FOR JANUARY, FEBRUARY AND MARCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence in connection with the statement he made a few minutes ago. How many draftees were called up in the same period? Did the figures he gave include volunteers from those who had been drafted, and if so, to what extent?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I am sorry I have not the figures here. I cannot tell how many draftees were called up. These figures do include those enlisted from training centres who had been called up for training. I can give my hon. friend to-morrow or at any convenient time the figures for both.

WOOL

PRODUCTION, COMMANDEERING AND FIXING OF PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): In view of the news broadcast over the radio to-day to the effect that drastic provisions have been made in connection with the commandeering and price setting of wool in Canada, and Canadian wool production, could the minister, perhaps to-morrow, give the house a synopsis of what is in view or whatever order in council has been passed in this connection?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I am not sure what department is concerned in this matter; it depends on what the transactions were. I will make inquiry and either my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply or I will make a statement in regard to it to-morrow.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASED RATE PER BUSHEL ON WHEAT DELIVERED BY PRODUCERS

The house resumed from Friday, March 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West) for the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Douglas (Weyburn).

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): When the house adjourned at six o'clock on Friday last I was endeavouring to show that all the proposals which might be formulated by the government concerning this subject must be directed toward the solution of two important problems of agriculture: one, debt and taxation; the other, the exploitation or exhaustion of the soil.

This policy, having been formulated, I believe that the farmer's responsibility ends there, and the responsibility of his elected members, his government, begins. It is then the duty or responsibility of his government to formulate plans which might be designed to achieve the results sought. Because of this we must have a policy, and if this policy is to be effective it must be based entirely upon the financing of consumption.

Farmers do not need to be told how to raise products. There are far too many government departments telling him how he must or must not do certain things. Farmers as a body have learned agriculture in the school of bitter experience. What they really want to know is how to sell the output of their farms and obtain an adequate return for their labour, so that in the course of a normal year they can make a decent income from working and managing their farms. In other words the farmers want to know how to pay their debts and give their families a decent standard of living. That, to me, is the farm problem, stripped of all verbiage and trimmings. When the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was speaking just a week ago to-day he said, as reported at page 1241 of Hansard:

> As I said last year when we were asking them to do it, it took at least a hundred million dollars out of their pockets, and we did not by any means manage to put all of it back in.

Do hon. members realize what this implies? It means that the farmers of western Canada had $100 million less, which they could have used, which they could have applied upon their mortgages or bank loans and taxes. I did not see in any newspaper, nor did I hear of any statement having been made by the Minister of Agriculture, that the minister would ask these financial institutions to ease their pressure on the farmer in the event of his not being able to meet his obligations. It would have been a humane gesture on the part of the Minister of Agriculture had he gone to the mortgage companies and other financial institutions and asked them to write off fifty per cent of this $100 million—or $50 million; split fifty-fifty, so to speak, on this amount of money. All the farmers received were left-handed compliments. No legislation was brought down to protect them against unfair or unscrupulous treatment on the part of the institutions or the municipalities.

A vital fact which is not recognized, so far as I am aware, in any policy of any government, is that the aptitude to produce requires a balancing facility for consuming. We can measure the wealth, the progress and the prosperity of agriculture only by what it sells. The whole aim of agriculture is to satisfy the needs of the people. These two ideas are constantly being lost sight of. You cannot have a state of over-production if potential output is governed by total effective consumption. Agriculture would face no serious difficulties if it were governed by this economic law rather than by government departments. Agriculture has been too long restricted because the purchasing power of the people has been restricted. Neither the restriction of production nor the restriction of consumers' purchasing power is pardonable as long as there is one home in the whole of the British empire, or in any of the allied countries, lacking agricultural commodities.

In 1939, when the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture were being discussed, I brought to his attention the plan devised by Milo Perkins of the United States department of agriculture. It is known as the "food stamp plan", and is intended solely for the purpose of dealing with surplus food commodities in that country. It is based upon the maxim that "charity begins at home". It is a scheme under which certain people may buy additional food at low prices, instead of that food being exported at cut rates. A subsidy is paid to the food merchant. The subsidy is paid out of taxes, and the scheme will increase taxation in direct proportion to its success. Apart from this feature, the plan employs the mechanism of Major Douglas's "just price". Not very long ago there appeared in the columns of the Western Producer a small news item, as follows:

> Blue food stamps added $9,637,000 worth of farm products to the diets of nearly 3,600,000 persons in the United States during the month of September.

In other words during the month of September, 1941, through the food stamp plan, the department of agriculture was able to distribute to the people of the United States $9,637,000 worth of farm products over and above normal consumption. In 1940 the consumption of meat increased by four pounds per capita over the year 1939. The consumption of pork in 1940 increased by 4·4 pounds per capita over the preceding year, which was the highest on record since 1929. The consumption of lard also increased, as was the case with many other agricultural products; and these increases were due to an increase in the purchasing power of the consuming public. On March 1, 1935, the editorial columns of the London Times contained this statement:

> The principal obstacle to trade revival lies in the inability of many potential customers to obtain the wherewithal to purchase commodities that they could use with advantage.

Again in 1940 the same newspaper carried this item:

> Attempts in the past to get the economic machine back into gear have gone awry because we thought it enough to organize and stimulate production, bringing upon ourselves the anomalies of "under-consumption" and "poverty in the midst of plenty." The consumer has too long been the stepchild both of economists and politicians. What will be needed most of all when peace is restored is planned consumption.

I recommend to the Minister of Agriculture close study of these two statements. I am sure no one, even in his weakest moments, would accuse the editor of the London Times of having a leaning toward such unorthodox views as those held by the Social Credit party; yet I want to repeat that the editor of this newspaper says that we must have planned consumption. We in this corner of the house have been advocating that for a considerable number of years. The financing of consumption must be studied, and we must come to it eventually. We must formulate a policy which, while acceptable to the agricultural community as a whole, also must be acceptable to the general public. Therefore I should like to suggest the following policy for agriculture: That Canadians as a whole should be provided with a flow of purchasing power adequate to ensure the distribution of as much as we can produce, and for which potential demand evists; that in the use of this purchasing power individuals shall be free to exercise their choice, and that farmers will be free from restriction and control in order to fulfil the demand; and that the measures taken to put this policy into effect shall not be such as to cause an increase in taxation or debt, or an undue rise in price.

[Mr. Marshall.]

Here is where I should like to offer a suggestion to some of the farm organizations. I believe all these resolutions they have passed are very fine, but they should contain a clause which would safeguard their proposals. I maintain that the Minister of Agriculture could give $1 a bushel for wheat, or even $1.25, with one hand and a week from to-day turn around and increase the levy on every bushel of grain marketed from one per cent to five or even ten per cent. I have a feeling that he is even considering such a thing at the present time. Thus far I have not seen any safeguard such as I suggest should be in these resolutions.

No doubt many of my Liberal friends are extremely anxious to know what I would do about this matter. It is this. If I were made a dictator for the purpose of doing only one thing as a contribution to the "good life", I know what I would do. I would put the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the members of the agriculture committee into a room together and keep them there until they had settled the problems of food production and food distribution in this country. The only person for whom I would allow them to send to help in their deliberations would be the governor of the Bank of Canada. The penalty for not getting the job done would not be that they should be called honest men, but that they should be fired.

In case some hon. members may be inclined to attribute this very sensible idea to me, thereby consigning it to the grave as soon as it has been given birth, I hasten to advise those hon. members that it is not original by any means. In the Sunday Times of London England, two or three years ago there appeared an article written by Lord Horder. I lifted bodily from that article the portion I have just read to the house, and paraphrased it to suit the present occasion. Lord Horder is one of the few individuals in Great Britain who received his title for sheer merit. He holds a most imposing number of public offices, and is in fact physician to the king. Because of his standing and international reputation this idea of his should be worthy of a trial.

In conclusion I desire to submit to the Minister of Agriculture the following recommendations:

1. As the policies recommended by the bureaucrats of the Department of Agriculture in the past years have not solved our agricultural problem, the services of these individuals should be dispensed with forthwith. A thorough housecleaning in that department is in the public interest.

2. That all existing agricultural legislation, including the bill now under discussion, be wiped off the statute books, because they are mere palliatives, are costly to administer, and have lamentably failed in their purpose.

3. That the committee on agriculture should sit continuously during the present session, and during all recesses, until a permanent solution has been found.

4. That this committee on agriculture should decide, first of all, what the actual problems of agriculture are, bearing in mind those I have mentioned, namely debt and its twin evil taxation, and the exhaustion or exploitation of the soil.

5. That this committee formulate a policy which, if put into effect, will bring about quickly a permanent solution of these problems.

I would suggest that a study be made of two things: (a) financing consumption, and (b) the food stamp plan.

6. That experts be appointed to administer the policy; that these experts be divorced entirely from political influence; and that in the event of the policies being successful these experts be appointed to the positions in the department made vacant by the removal from office of those who have had charge of our agricultural policy over the years.

The outline of procedure I have given would make a real approach to this whole problem, and in my judgment would return agriculture to its rightful position in the economy of our country.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, at the last sitting of the house, I was prevented from voicing the honest and free views of the electors, both men and women, of my constituency of Laval-Two Mountains. Like our gallant soldiers at Hong Kong, I was a target, not for Japanese shells or other enemy missiles, but for the satirical shafts of the honourable the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) who is no longer, thank God, at the head of the Department of National Defence. However it may be, the affray has left me unscathed and in better fighting trim than ever.

Before proceeding with my remarks on the amendment and the measure now before the house, I wish to add my humble tribute to those paid by the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and the hon. members for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and for Outremont (Mr. Vien) to the memory of the Right Hon. Senator Raoul Dandurand. That outstanding statesman has passed away at a ripe old age, after a life marked by great achievements. May I recall one event in his long and brilliant career? Fifteen years have elapsed since the day when, at the Luxembourg Palace, speaking after Mr. Raymond Poincaré, he thrilled the heart of a great nation. The experienced diplomat whom Canada mourns to-day had, like us, a passionate love of France. He ardently hoped for the liberation and resurrection of that great nation made immortal through centuries of sacrifice, genius and heroism.

His splendid, noble and great life will ever survive in our memory. May he rest in peace and may this Canadian soil which he loved so dearly shelter his eternal sleep.

Another outstanding citizen, Mr. Ernest Ayers, manufacturer and commander of the Order of Saint Gregory the Great, has recently died. A man noted for his boundless generosity, he had, together with his brother Harry, recently made to the town he loved so much, Lachute, the gift of a splendid temple dedicated to our Roman Catholic faith.

To the families of those two great Canadians I tender my heartfelt sympathy.

I also wish to offer my sincere condolence to the bereaved family of the Hon. Senator Edgar N. Rhodes, a former speaker of this house and minister of the crown.

Mr. Speaker, I would not have spoken in this debate had not some facts of national importance just been misrepresented in the Quebec assembly, in connection with the mobilization act and the repeated requests which, with a few of my fellow members, I have voiced in this parliament regarding exemption for farmers' sons.

For an obvious purpose of political propaganda, one of the ministers of the Quebec provincial government has dared to claim that Premier Godbout verbally requested the federal authorities, as early as 1939, to exempt farmers' sons from military service. What kind of people does this minister think the electors of our province are? He knows or ought to know that compulsory military service was only enacted in June, 1940. He cannot be unaware of the fact that the mobilization act was not passed by the dominion parliament until June 19, 1940. In this connection, I may refer Premier Godbout and his minister, Mr. Casgrain, to the official report of the House of Commons for June 19, 1940.

No, Mr. Speaker, Hon. Mr. Godbout did not ask that farmers' sons be exempted. On the contrary, he, along with his ministers and the members who support him, bitterly opposed the motion which Mr. René Chalout moved in the Quebec assembly on June 18, 1940. That motion opposed the mobilization act. And while I and the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) were opposing with the utmost energy the mobilization act in the dominion parliament, Hon. Mr. Godbout lost no time in sending, on June 18, 1940, to our dominion ministers, a telegram wherein he rejoiced at the defeat of Mr. Chalout's motion. By such action he betrayed once more the farmers as well as the farmers' sons, who were later taken from the farms and sent to training camps under the mobilization act which had the hearty support of Mr. Godbout. No, a thousand times no! The premier of the province of Quebec has, with his supporters, championed the mobilization act by his vote. By his attitude and his actions, he supported in the Quebec assembly that act which now threatens to undermine agriculture, our first line of defence.

Let us now examine the correspondence that passed between the dominion government and Hon. Mr. Godbout. The letters written by Hon. Mr. Godbout, were belated and worthless, and they have had absolutely no effect upon the dominion government. Will that teach the Quebec premier that although retribution for servility and flattery may be late in coming it must inevitably sooner or later, bring shame upon dispensers of election bribes, upon people who break their promises one after the other and who have not the slightest regard for their pledged word. I say servility and flattery. Yet even these words are not biting enough to fully qualify the ambiguous and shameful attitude of the Quebec premier on the vital question of exemptions from military service for our farmers.

This man who sets himself up as the protector of agriculture waits a whole long year before broaching the matter to the federal authorities. You will easily note by the replies he received from Ottawa to what extent the premier of Quebec has become the ridiculous puppet of the dominion government. The Hon. Mr. Godbout wrote letters of the palest pink to both the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). All this is evident from the letter he addressed to the right hon. Prime Minister on February 3 last. He, the self-styled defender of the agricultural class, dared to congratulate the prime minister of this country for a speech in which the latter repudiated those very pledges that were the only safeguard of our farm youth, the only factor safeguarding agricultural production so vital to our defence.

The people will understand now why the government of Quebec, placed as is the federal administration under the thumb of high finance, has mobilized its millionaire friends, its election parasites, its vote "telegraphers" from Montreal and Quebec to steal the recent Quebec East and Montreal-St. Mary contests. All this rabble will henceforth work under the orders of J. A. A. Leclair, chief organizer for the Quebec provincial government.

What a shame! You claim to be honest, yet you dare to appoint as head of your organization a big contractor and war profiteer. This blunder will cause no surprise among those who are aware of all the facts, for they know that a high official of your provincial police in Montreal has just robbed the Canadien party—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Order. I would ask the hon. member to limit his remarks to the matter under discussion.

Mr. BRADETTE: Hear, hear. It is a shame what he is saying now; it is shameful, attacking his province here.

Mr. LACOMBE: It is the truth.

Mr. BRADETTE: Nothing of the sort. You should be ashamed of saying such things, you a French Canadian.

Mr. LACOMBE: I request that the hon. member withdraw his remark immediately.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: The hon. member has just said that I should be ashamed of myself. According to Standing Order 41 of the house, this expression is unparliamentary.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Fournier, Hull): If the hon. member did make such a remark, he must withdraw it.

Mr. BRADETTE: In my opinion, I merely said what I honestly and sincerely think.

Mr. LACOMBE: I demand that the hon. member withdraw that remark.

Mr. BRADETTE: All I said, Mr. Speaker, was that a French Canadian should be ashamed to speak in that fashion about the province of Quebec, and about our compatriots.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Fournier, Hull): If these words concern the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains, I request that they be withdrawn.

Mr. BRADETTE: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and withdraw them.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, a point of order has been raised and I do not have to discuss it. My entire speech is concerned with our farm problems, with agriculture in general, and we are discussing the wheat problem at the moment.

I shall not read the letters which the premier, Mr. Godbout, forwarded to the federal authorities. In the first place, Mr. Godbout did not know, a whole year after the adoption of the mobilization act, where to apply to request exemptions for farmers' sons. It is not I who say so, and I would like my hon. friend to make a note of it. This statement is contained in the correspondence exchanged with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston)—

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order—

Mr. LACOMBE: —and published in the daily Le Canada on March 12, 1942.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Fournier, Hull): I would ask the hon. members to maintain even in the heat of debate an attitude in keeping with the dignity of this house. When an hon. member rises to a point of order, the other should resume his seat and wait until it has been stated.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Speaker, I submit that the remarks of the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains are absolutely out of order. He is endeavouring to introduce in this debate on the western wheat problem matters which concern solely the province of Quebec. Moreover, he is reading his speech and, in this connection, I submit also, as a second point of order, that according to the orders of the house no hon. member has the right to do so in parliamentary debate.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Fournier, Hull): If the hon. member is reading his speech, I request that he refrain from doing so in future. I would also ask that he comply with that order which states that an hon. member must limit his remarks to the subject matter under discussion. I therefore request that he restrict his observations to the bill under consideration at the moment.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, speaking on the point of order raised by my hon. friend, I wish to say first of all that I am not reading my speech but merely referring to my notes upon occasion. The next time the hon. member reads his speech, I shall be only too pleased to raise similar points of order myself. I have in fact often seen him read his speeches.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. LACOMBE: I am still speaking on the point of order, and I would request the hon. member not to interrupt without first asking my permission, as the orders of the house provide. I am still referring to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. The question I have raised is one of national import closely connected with agriculture, to wit, that of military exemptions for farmers' sons. I submit respectfully that I am perfectly entitled to introduce the matter into this debate.

(Text) Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I am under the impression that the house is dealing with No. 10 of the orders of the day:

> Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the second reading of Bill No. 13, an act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Douglas (Weyburn).

The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), from the time he began his speech until the present time, has not touched whatsoever on this matter before the house to-day, that is, the bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act. His whole speech is dealing with the question of conscription of the farmers.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am positively not out of order and the whole question which I am discussing is directly concerned with federal agriculture to such a point that the hon. members who have just interrupted me will be the first, within a few weeks, to be forced to tackle these problems in their own constituencies.

Mr. HOMUTH: May we have a ruling on the point of order, Mr. Speaker?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Here is the motion now under discussion:

> That this bill be not now read a second time.

It refers to Bill No. 13 concerning the price which the government is going to pay for wheat and to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) purporting to have this price raised. I realize that much liberty is allowed the hon. member in speaking on the principle of the bill. However, when he introduces into his speech matters far removed from the question of wheat, I would ask him to wait for a better opportunity of making his remarks. I believe he is out of order. I make this decision impartially and without prejudice and I would request the hon. member to abide by the standing orders of the house.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I submit to your ruling, and I shall now speak of the stand taken by the premier of the province of Quebec on the question of wheat.

What has been the attitude of Mr. Godbout when wheat was brought east to the advantage of eastern farmers? Always influenced by the millers', the bakers' and the fertilizers' trusts, he has, for a number of years, refused to contribute to the transportation of western wheat into our province. The decision he took was only half-hearted. Being taken too late, it never attained its object. The hideous influence of the trust was exercised on the farmers of Quebec—those of Pontiac with the others—who have now to pay $38 a ton for fattening feed, while the consumer has to buy wheat flour at nearly $4 a hundred-weight. Such is the so-called protector of agriculture as our population should know him.

Will this man tell our people the name of the member of a trust, the financial grandee, who has just fled to the Bahama Islands with his assets in order to avoid the inconveniences of Canada's war effort and defence? Will he say how much in succession duties he caused the province of Quebec to lose?

Mr. Speaker, once again, and this is not the last time, I demand exemption from military service for farmers' sons. At this late hour, the premier of the province of Quebec claims that they should be exempted during the summer only. This is another deplorable mistake. Who would then attend, in the spring, to the dairy stocks, to the growing of vegetable seedlings in hotbeds, to the tapping of maple trees?

Having been called to order, I shall be satisfied with these few remarks for the present. However, I wish to point out to hon. members who have been so kind as to call me to order that I shall be as confident when I meet my constituents of Laval-Two Mountains, as they will be when, shortly, they have to face the people of their own constituencies.

Mr. BRADETTE: Very well.

Mr. LACOMBE: I shall point out to the hon. member who interrupted me last (Mr. Bradette), that my statements in this house were not those of a French Canadian, but rather those of a simple Canadian, and they were made in the name of the Canadian party, for my vision and my patriotism are not restricted to one province only. If anyone in this house ever raised the racial cry, he is the hon. member who has just interrupted. Why did he do it? Just to shamelessly promote his own political ends. That is his sole and only object.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains claims that I have promoted racial prejudice. The house where I have had the honour of holding a seat for the last sixteen years, as well as the people of my constituency, and of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, know perfectly well that his statement is entirely devoid of truth.

Mr. LACOMBE: The hon. member should not make a speech when he rises to a point of order.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Fournier, Hull): I believe the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains should withdraw the statement accusing another hon. representative of promoting racial prejudice. I think that under standing order 41, his utterance is unparliamentary and imputes motives to an hon. member. I consequently request that he withdraw his statement.

Mr. LACOMBE: Once more, Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling. Everything is satisfactory since both the hon. member and myself have withdrawn our respective statements. That is all.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate. The policy which the government finally submitted to the house, as embodied in the three measures which have been under consideration—two of which have had their second reading, and the third of which concerns the present debate—was so fully placed before the house by my colleagues the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that there was little required to be said in explanation of the measures; and I would not have risen from my seat to-day had it not been for some remarks made by a fellow-member from Manitoba, the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader), with which I shall deal presently.

Generally speaking, the policies which the government submitted in the measures which have been before the house were reached only after very long and careful consideration. Quite naturally they were conditioned by the state of war in which the country has been, is now and probably will be for some considerable time. War makes new demands and creates new situations from day to day, almost from hour to hour. There is no doubt that the success that Japan has achieved since she went to war on December 7 has greatly influenced the whole question of food supplies for Great Britain and her armies and for our other allies, or such of them as can be supplied. It is only necessary in that respect to reinforce what was said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that a very large quantity of fats and oils, upon which our modern civilization so much depends, was derived from areas that are now under the control of Japan. But that was not the only disadvantage that came from Japan's success.

As is well known, Britain draws large supplies of foodstuffs, much of it concentrated like dairy products and canned goods, from Australia and New Zealand. We have to face the definite possibility that shipments from these two countries now will be very seriously interfered with, if not entirely shut off. The success that Japan has had in taking Singapore and overrunning Java has given her the bases from which she can range the south Pacific and the Indian ocean, and difficulties of convoying ships containing materials and foodstuffs from distant lands like Australia to the theatre of war in Europe have been tremendously increased. That means that Britain more and more must draw largely from north America for her supplies for her civilian population and her armies, and for some of the other allies as well, like the Free French. Consequently our policies have been shaped in the light of that inescapable fact.

In this country we must as far as possible increase the production of concentrated foods. What do I mean by concentrated foods? Bacon products, meat products, dairy products and, as far as possible, canned fish, fruits and vegetables. It is in the light of that fact that our policies were finally reached.

The question of wheat is not a new one in this house. Hon. members are well aware of that fact. I think I may modestly claim that for at least thirty-five years, indeed almost forty years, I have been directly or indirectly associated closely with the marketing of wheat from the plains of western Canada. I remember the time—it is so many years ago now that I do not like to recall it—when I managed a farmers' elevator in a little Manitoba country town and received there my first introduction to the problems of marketing wheat, and I recall also the agitation that took place in the early years of this century, which led to the creation of the first farmers' marketing company. All down through the years, from that time on, I have had a close association with the marketing problems in connection with wheat. I hesitate to make this statement, because one is reluctant to obtrude one's own personal views too much in a debate of this kind, but looking back over that period, while my judgment at times may have been wrong, I can quite conscientiously say that in all aspects relating to this problem I have endeavoured to do the thing which I thought was in the best interests of the farmers of western Canada. If I may say so, I resent implications or insinuations that other motives have guided my conduct at any time during that long period of years.

The problem of marketing wheat is a difficult one because wheat is grown over an immense area by many scores of thousands of farmers, and naturally when a farmer is marketing his product under conditions where it passes for a time from his own hands before he gets settlement finally for it, there is room in his mind for doubt as to what may happen to it. I think it is unfortunate that this problem of marketing wheat in the past has not been free at times from political considerations or factors that operated in connection with it, and which often arose from people who were perfectly sincere. But I want to come back for a moment to the general line of policy that we have laid down.

As the bill indicates, we are limiting deliveries of wheat this year to 280 million bushels. It is quite unlikely, from the present outlook, that that quantity will be reached for marketing by the farmers of western Canada, and I say that for two or three reasons. In the first place, the subsoil moisture conditions in Saskatchewan and Alberta are worse than they have been for a good many years, and Saskatchewan and Alberta are provinces from which very largely, in fact almost entirely, wheat production comes. For a good many years now experience has shown that when subsoil moisture conditions in the autumn are seriously deficient it is very unlikely that a bumper crop will be harvested. While therefore we will accept 280 million bushels, it appears to me doubtful to say the least whether that quantity will be reached.

But there was pressing need for the production of feeding grains. Last year there was a deficiency in feeding grains, that is in grains such as oats, barley and corn. The vast hog production campaign to meet the requirements of Britain, in which this country has been engaged for two years and which will require an increase of 140 million pounds of bacon products in 1942 over 1941, if we are to meet the requests that have been made to us by the British government, means that a very large increase must take place in the production of feeding grains. Not only that, but we shall probably be able to market in the United States, as has already been indicated by ministers who have preceded me, any surplus in these feeding grains that we can produce.

The United States, to make up a deficiency in vegetable oils and fats, is planning a quite considerable campaign for the planting of soya beans so that they may get from that source the vegetable oils necessary for their ordinary economy. For the same reason, as outlined by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, we are giving encouragement to the increase of flax production in Canada. We hope to increase it at least fourfold in the present year. That is the explanation of the much higher price that is offered for flax than that at which it had been selling during the last few years.

Our policy then is to stimulate and increase the production of feeding grains. A year ago, when we were considering this problem, the prices for oats and barley, two of our main feeding grains, were at least 20 cents a bushel less than to-day. By the higher price now obtained for these grains, by establishing minimum prices for them, by the bonus which is paid per acre for their production on the basis of the 1940 wheat acreage, we hope that in the area capable of growing these feed grains we can very greatly increase their production. For this reason the bonus has been given. I think it is sound policy, notwithstanding some criticism of it in the house.

There is another aspect of our wheat production that requires consideration. There are many farmers in western Canada who would prefer to see any assistance they may receive from the government given on a bushel basis. Naturally those are the farmers living in what might be described as fairly sure crop areas. Their wishes have been met, though not to the extent that many of us would like to see, by the increase in the initial price from 70 to 90 cents a bushel. But on top of that we have retained the principle embodied in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which in my judgment was one of the best pieces of legislation ever passed by this house in relation to this whole wheat problem. It is no secret that the credit for it goes very largely indeed to the present Minister of Agriculture. A farmer may suffer from total or partial crop failure through no fault of his own. It may be due to lack of rain—a crop lost through no fault of the farmer, indeed is usually or almost entirely due to lack of rain; it may be due to infestation with rust. In any case the farmer who thus finds his work lost and is left largely without any crop gets a measure of assistance under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. When we weigh all the factors involved I think the government, in the legislation submitted to the house, has in very large measure met the needs of the situation. I know that statement does not fit in with the views held by some hon. members opposite from western Canada. But as was said the other day in this debate, Canada is a large country and a difficult country to govern. No one section of Canada can always get everything it wants; otherwise government in the country would be impossible. I have long held the view, and I have been criticized for it and my position has been misrepresented in certain places, that any policies adopted for the protection of the wheat farmer in western Canada must carry the reasonable judgment not only of hon. members of this house but of the whole of Canada. I think that is a fair statement.

I should like now for a few moments to deal with some of the criticisms directed against me the other day by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader). Let me say at once that the hon. member for Portage la Prairie is one of the sincerest members in this house. I have always said that, and I have always believed it; I do not think there is any hon. member who tries more sincerely to do what he thinks is right. But at the same time, and I do not say it unkindly, there are very few hon. members in this house whose judgment is more influenced by their prejudices than my hon. friend. May I say to him and to the house that long experience in life has taught me this lesson, that prejudice is never other than a very poor substitute for reason.

Mr. LEADER: I rise to a point of order. Is not the hon. member imputing motives? If he is, it is against the rules of the house, and I ask him to withdraw. What I said the other day was said in all seriousness, believing it to be true. I had to substantiate every charge I made by citation from Hansard.

Mr. CRERAR: I was imputing no motive to my hon. friend. If he thinks I should withdraw the remark, I will do so. But I shall proceed to show him that he really did not know what he was talking about the other afternoon when he made his criticism.

Mr. LEADER: I rise again to a point of order. I do not think it is permissible for any hon. member to say that another hon. member does not know what he is talking about, unless he is sure of it.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, if that offends my hon. friend I withdraw it absolutely. His first criticism was in regard to my attitude on the mixing of wheat. He criticized me as being animated wholly by a desire to do chores for the grain trade in Winnipeg.

Mr. REID: That was imputing motives.

Mr. CRERAR: He illustrated that statement, as I said a moment ago, by my attitude on the mixing of wheat. My hon. friend is quite right—although he is not correct as to the occasion he refers to; it was in a different debate in the house—in saying that I was not opposed to mixing. I have not changed my position on that. I think there has been more nonsense talked about the mixing of wheat than about any other aspect of the business of marketing wheat. Let me for a moment seek to justify that statement. It has only a remote relation to the subject of this debate, and I hope that if I transgress the rules I may not be too severely called to order. The fact of the matter is that mixing is denied to-day only in the four top grades of wheat, No. 1 hard, No. 1 northern, and Nos. 2 and 3 northern. Wheat grading No. 4 northern and below can be mixed under the act, and in fact are mixed very frequently. So that the criticism of my hon. friend applies only to that part of our wheat grading above No. 4 northern.

My contention always has been that in any event wheat is mixed before it is ground into flour. The miller in Britain mixes it; the miller in Canada mixes it, and the argument I have always made is that the nearer to the producer you have that service performed the more the producer is going to get out of it.

Mr. PERLEY: Where does the farmer profit by it?

Mr. CRERAR: The farmer does profit by it. If my friend will be patient I can explain it, but I did not wish to go into that. Thirty years ago there was a very considerable agitation among the farmers of western Canada for a sample market in Winnipeg. If my hon. friends will go back and read the reports of the conventions of the grain growers associations in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba of thirty years ago—and I attended them all—they will see that this was often one of the principal topics of discussion. Why? Because on the Minneapolis market a few hundred miles south of Winnipeg they had what was called a sample market. They had a grading system, but they also had a sample market where any miller, buyer or dealer could go and examine samples of grain, and to my own knowledge premiums of as much as five or six cents a bushel were paid to certain farmers on certain grades. What gave rise to the agitation against mixing? That did not come up until the time mentioned by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie though I think it was in 1922 instead of 1925.

Mr. LEADER: If I may correct the minister, it was in 1925, when the grain act was revised.

Mr. CRERAR: It was revised following the general inquiry which I think was in 1922.

Mr. LEADER: I have it right here.

Mr. CRERAR: It may be as the hon. member says, but in any case it is immaterial whether it was 1922 or 1925. The point I wish to make is that prior to this limitation being placed in the grain act there had been mixing of grain all down through the years, and exception had not been taken to it. The difficulty arose in this way, and from a wholly different cause. The view developed in western Canada that on the average the grain shipped from the plains of the west was not equal in quality to the grain of twenty years before, and that was true. It was claimed that the mixing of grain had deteriorated the quality and lowered the general average of the grain reaching the markets abroad. That did not apply in the early years. Why did the difficulty arise at that time? I submit, Mr. Speaker, and I think I am well within the facts when I say, that it was due altogether to a great increase in the varieties of wheat produced in the west.

Let me give an illustration. About ten years ago I was motoring through Manitoba during harvest time, in the Neepawa district. There I saw a lovely field of wheat that looked to me to be good for thirty bushels to the acre. There had been some rust that year, and my instinct as an old grain man prompted me to stop the car and go into the field to see what damage had resulted from rust. The farmer was stooking a little distance away, and when my friend and I went into the field he came over. The gentleman with me was an experienced seedman. Before the farmer came over we picked up some heads and looked at them, and my friend said, "I have spotted seven different varieties of wheat in this one shock of grain." There was marquis, there was preston, there was red bobs, and I have forgotten the others. That practice was very widespread throughout the west. Many in this house will remember, and I am sure no one better than the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, the discussions that took place with regard to garnet wheat.

Mr. PERLEY: I suggest that the farmer in question got his seed from an elevator where it had been thoroughly mixed.

Mr. CRERAR: No, no. Mr. Motherwell, who rendered distinguished service to agriculture in Canada, and from whose services I do not wish to detract, was the great protagonist of garnet wheat, as everyone knows. Why? Because garnet wheat was an earlier maturing variety, and could be grown in regions further north. But the introduction of garnet wheat in western Canada was one of the greatest misfortunes ever to happen to the whole wheat business of the west. Consequently you had this mixture of varieties, and it is only within recent years that the seed branches, not only of the federal department but of the provincial departments of agriculture, have been emphasizing the need of pure seed. It was this mixing of varieties, many of which had altogether different milling qualities, that lowered the general standard of our wheat abroad, and it will not come back until we return to and maintain true varieties. This question came up largely because of that situation.

Then the hon. member for Portage la Prairie went on to make statements about the right of farmers to ship their grain to certain terminals. In his remarks he claimed that this privilege had been taken away from the farmers. Speaking of your humble servant, the hon. member said, at page 1308 of Hansard:

> Again, he was mainly responsible for the taking away of the right of the farmer to name the terminal of his choice. I do not want to go at length into that, but he was the one man who took away that right from the farmer.

The astonishing thing is that the farmer has that right to-day and has had it for nearly twenty years.

Mr. LEADER: Through the Campbell amendments.

Mr. CRERAR: It does not matter; he has it, and my hon. friend will find it in paragraph (2) of section 114 of the grain act. There is no question about it. But what has happened in practice? Have the farmers taken advantage of that right? Ask the pools; ask the United Grain Growers; ask any grain elevator concern in Winnipeg.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under present conditions has the farmer any choice?

Mr. CRERAR: Certainly he has.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Theoretically, but not practically.

Mr. CRERAR: Certainly he has. If the hon. member for Qu'Appelle puts a carload of grain into an elevator at Qu'Appelle, the elevator company is first obliged to take it in if it has space; and when my hon. friend orders a car he can go to the elevator agent at that point and say, "I want my grain loaded into this car." Then when the grain is loaded into the car he can say, "Here are your elevator charges," and he can take that car of grain and send it to any terminal he wishes.

Mr. PERLEY: Perhaps the minister recalls the statement made last June, I think, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that it would be almost impossible to do that now, that the man would have to go down to Fort William with the car to pay the freight and get the warehouse receipts, and the Minister of Mines and Resources backed his colleague up in that.

Mr. CRERAR: What I am complaining about is the statement of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, which I am quite convinced was made in good faith. But the farmer has that right, and if he does not take advantage of it, why does he not? Because there are not only the elevator charges to meet. He may not have the money to pay the elevator charges, but he wants the freight paid when the grain gets to the other end. As a matter of fact, while that provision has been in the law for almost twenty years, there is scarcely a farmer in the west to-day who takes advantage of it. I object to being criticized in this house as the individual who took a right away from the farmers. I did not. He has it and has had it for the last twenty years.

Mr. PERLEY: Is not the difficulty principally that the elevators at Fort William will not take it in, that they are all full, and the farmer has to take the grain to some elevator to be unloaded? Then the elevator says, "We don't want it."

Mr. CRERAR: No; during the last ten years there were many times when the terminal elevators at Fort William were hungry for grain.

Mr. PERLEY: They are not at the present time.

Mr. CRERAR: They are not just now, though there is space for over 120,000,000 bushels in Canada at the present time.

I come now to another point. My hon. friend stated I was responsible—and I suggest that is the only inference which can be taken from his remarks—for keeping the grain exchange open, and that I went over to Great Britain after the outbreak of war and came back with the story that the cereals import committee in Great Britain wanted the grain exchange kept open. They did not make that representation to me; it was made to the wheat board, and my hon. friend was in error again. I say that, because he went on to say, about myself:

> Then he went to Great Britain and returned with the advice that Britain wanted the grain exchange to function. He was interested in the grain exchange, notwithstanding the fact that the market was closed in Britain and they had sent an agent, and all that they purchased was purchased through that agency.

My hon. friend was wrong. The cereals import committee have never had an agent in Canada purchasing wheat, and they have not to this day.

Mr. LEADER: May I ask a question?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. LEADER: The minister is placing the wrong interpretation on what I said. He will admit that the grain purchased for the old country, and for France while it lasted, was being purchased through the one agency, whether it was here or in Great Britain.

Mr. CRERAR: But that is not what my hon. friend said.

Mr. LEADER: Splitting hairs.

Mr. CRERAR: No. My hon. friend said they had sent an agent to Canada, and that all they purchased had been purchased through that agent. They did not send an agent to Canada at all, and they never have had an agent in Canada. All sales which have been made by the wheat board have been made direct by cable communication with the cereals import committee in Great Britain.

Mr. LEADER: The only agency?

Mr. CRERAR: They have never had an agency in this country buying wheat—and when I say that I am not giving away any information which should not be divulged.

Mr. PERLEY: They have not one at the present time?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have had a representative here.

Mr. CRERAR: They had engaged a firm in Montreal, I believe it was—I am not sure whether it was Montreal or Halifax—to look after the forwarding of their grain.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then they had a representative?

Mr. CRERAR: They had a representative in that sense. But that representative did not buy one bushel of grain.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Did not Mr. Rank represent the cereals import committee?

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Rank is chairman of the cereals import committee in London, and he is operating in London, altogether.

Mr. PERLEY: Does not the Canadian wheat board represent the cereals import committee in Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: No, it does not represent the cereals import committee.

Mr. PERLEY: We will find that out in committee.

Mr. CRERAR: The wheat board in Canada represents the Canadian people and the Canadian government. It is a Canadian government body. They make arrangements for purchase and sale between two principals, and there is no agent in Canada who is purchasing any grain for the British government.

Then my hon. friend brings another indictment against me. It is not a very severe one, but he imagines, in some mysterious fashion, that I was the individual who prevented the farmers from getting advances on their grain stored on their farms after the 1940 crop. I need add little to that; the Minister of Agriculture dealt with the point the other evening, when the hon. member was speaking. As a matter of fact this question was considered very fully by the wheat board, and I believe it is obvious to any hon. member that there were problems associated with this matter. I believe I am correct when I say that the banks were reluctant to make the advances. Instead of making the advances, a system of farm storage was worked out to encourage the holding of grain on the farms. But while there was a big crop in 1939, and also a large one in 1940, the storage difficulty did not turn out to be nearly as great as had been expected, because the grain companies, the pools, United Grain Growers and private companies, built temporary storage at probably hundreds—I dare say thousands—of shipping points in western Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You made it very attractive for them to do so.

Mr. CRERAR: No, they got their ordinary carrying charges.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, they got more than that.

Mr. CRERAR: No, my hon. friend is quite wrong.

Mr. HOMUTH: And the right of write-off.

Mr. CRERAR: No.

An hon. MEMBER: Plus exemptions.

Mr. CRERAR: No, my hon. friend had better wait until he is sure of what he is talking about. There was no arrangement concerning write-off made in respect to storage built at country points in western Canada. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is a distinction.

Mr. CRERAR: Not an arrangement at all. There was an arrangement made—well, my statement there might not be altogether correct, because there was an arrangement made concerning special storage at the head of the lakes, to accommodate about 50,000,000 bushels.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And some in the country.

Mr. CRERAR: But the point I am getting at is this: the criticism made against me was one concerning my failure to support the giving of advances on grain on the farm. If that had been left to the wheat board it would have created a tremendous problem of administration. Naturally the government and the wheat board did not want to undertake that task unless it was absolutely necessary. Why? The farmer makes an application for an advance on his grain on his farm. After the application you have to go out to the farm and, first, see that the grain is there; second, see that it is housed in a place where it will keep and, third, be sure that it will be available at some time to repay the advance.

An hon. MEMBER: It is done in the United States.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know what they did in the United States, but I believe it was on only a very small percentage of their wheat. The lack of this provision has worked out in Canada without any very great hardship. I know of farmers who had grain on their farms and who wanted to take advantage of farm storage. They went to their local banks and borrowed money to pay for twine, threshing and current needs, and it worked out all right.

I should like now to make a few observations respecting the amendment of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas).

Mr. LEADER: May I interrupt? I suggest that the minister deal with the last charge I made.

Mr. CRERAR: What is that?

Mr. LEADER: I would refer the minister to page 2379 of Hansard for 1940 where he declared that the present tariffs were fair to the elevator companies in the face of the demand for lower storage charges. Would the minister deal with that?

Mr. CRERAR: I will. The pools, the United Grain Growers and the other elevator companies claimed the tariffs were fair. Considering all the risks involved, I think they were fair. I have seen a statement recently, one which I have no reason to doubt—an audited statement—showing what ten representative grain firms in Winnipeg made in the last ten years. This statement shows that there were several years when they had losses.

I am a shareholder, for instance, in United Grain Growers. I believe that that organization is as well managed as any elevator concern in western Canada. I have no doubt there are several hon. members in the house who were shareholders in United Grain Growers, and if there are such they will recall that they received no dividends whatsoever on their capital for several years out of the last ten. That was the experience not only of that company but of others.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are not alone in that. There were other companies in the same position.

Mr. CRERAR: Quite; I do not dispute that. It was a bad time for business of all kinds.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): But they have done all right in the last couple of years.

Mr. CRERAR: Perhaps not as well as the hon. member imagines. I have examined the statements of United Grain Growers, for instance, and if my hon. friend will look at them he will see they have handled a large volume of grain and have not made a very great amount of money.

Mr. DONNELLY: Have not the elevator companies paid 6 per cent on their capital?

Mr. CRERAR: Some of them I believe have not. They may have paid it, but if they did it was paid out of reserves. Some of them have actually had losses. On this point I am speaking of the last ten-year period.

Mr. DONNELLY: I mean in the last two years. I think I am right.

Mr. CRERAR: I had in mind a longer period than the last two years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It all depends upon how you keep your books.

Mr. CRERAR: That is an interesting observation, but it is rather difficult to get away with any juggling in bookkeeping when a firm of chartered accountants with a reputation to protect, and elected by the shareholders to protect their interests, is auditing the business statements.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I admit that that is the theory, but I am not so sure of the practice.

Mr. CRERAR: I am being diverted from my thought. I should like to say a word or two about the amendment moved by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas). Obviously if that amendment carries the legislation goes by the board.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No, not at all; that does not follow.

Mr. CRERAR: No other interpretation could be put upon it. This matter could properly be examined into when the bill is before the committee. There you can have discussion as to the why and wherefore of and the justification for the legislation. In this regard I agree wholly with the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. I regret that the hon. member for Weyburn has moved this amendment, because I do not think it adds anything to solving this most perplexing problem. Perhaps the people in my hon. friend's constituency will think that he is their champion in the House of Commons, and that may not be a bad thing for the hon. member for Weyburn, but I submit that that is not the highest ground upon which a matter of this kind could be considered.

This question presents many difficulties. Let me repeat that it is a policy for this year and this year only. You cannot chart a long-time policy for wheat with the world at war and with the changes that may come next month, or six months or a year hence. I maintain that it represents the considered and best judgment of a lengthy discussion. I have no hesitation whatever in suggesting to the house that the programme of the government should be accepted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is not the only unknown factor the probable size of the crop? The war is there, the transportation difficulties are there, and consumption is there; the size of the crop is the only unknown factor.

Mr. CRERAR: We do not know what may happen to shipping during the coming year. There is also the question of the number of people who will consume this product, and there are other factors to be considered in reaching a conclusion on the matter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Those things are pretty well fixed.

Mr. FAIR: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister has exceeded his time, because there have been a considerable number of interruptions.

Mr. FAIR: Why should the farmer support this programme when he is being asked to take far less for his wheat than the cost of production? That is a direct question and I should like a direct answer.

Mr. CRERAR: That is something that can be considered in the agriculture committee after the bill is given second reading. Let me repeat that it is impossible to chart a long-time policy for wheat. We do not know what sort of world we may be living in when this war is over. If, happily, we can get the world reorganized in such a way that we can again have peaceful trade throughout the world, then I think western Canada will come back to its old place in the supplying of wheat. If this condition is not to obtain, then we shall have to consider a future programme for that large part of western Canada which has been accustomed to making its living in the past by the growing of wheat. Let me repeat that this policy has been formulated in the light of all the circumstances as they appear now. I am satisfied that it is a policy that will commend itself to an overwhelming number of the farmers of western Canada.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who spoke twice, to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), and to a number of other hon. members on the government side, one cannot help but wonder whether we realize that agriculture is playing an important role in this war. The present government has met all other industries at least half way, but it has always chosen to turn a deaf ear to agriculture.

I should like to have the government tell us from whom it takes direction when it formulates its agricultural policies. I should like an answer to that question. In connection with other industries the government has acted upon representations made to it, but it has refused to do likewise in the case of the farmers. Just the other day the Minister of Agriculture suggested to the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) that he should go through his constituency and tell the people to accept the present wheat policy. Referring to the hon. member for Battle River, this is what the minister said, as reported on page 1211 of Hansard:

> I would say to him that any member of this house who carries back into western Canada the government's policy in relation to wheat and its policy in relation to other farm products can stand before any audience and explain to the people there that this is the best that can be done under the conditions with which we are confronted in the Dominion of Canada to-day, and the best that has been done in an attempt to settle their problems at any time.

After reading that statement and after listening to the Minister of Agriculture, I begin to wonder whether the principle of democracy is being followed. He is asking hon. members to go out into their constituencies and tell the people what is good for them. I believe that any democratic government should take direction from the people; the people should tell the government what results they want, and then it is up to the government to get those results for the people. The government should not shove down their throats something they do not like, something against which they protest.

Agriculture is as important to our war effort as is the supply of man-power and the industries which are turning out the tools of war. As a matter of fact, agriculture is an inseparable part of our war effort. Our farmers are asked to feed those who are actually doing the fighting. They must also feed the men and women who turn the wheels of industry. According to a pamphlet issued by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, over two million Canadians are directly dependent upon agriculture for their livelihood. An additional three millions are indirectly dependent upon agriculture. That makes a total of over five million people, or approximately half our total population. The income of our farmers in the last few years has been around 10 per cent of the total national income; it should be 33 per cent, as it was between 1926 and 1929. This leaves the farmers an insufficient amount of purchasing power to carry on and be able to contribute their maximum to the war effort; they must also provide for the education of their children, and build security for themselves so that when they reach the failing years of their lives they will not be dependent upon charity.

The government's policy as announced by the two ministers is not good enough, despite the fact that three members of the cabinet have spoken in glowing terms about it. Farmers cannot pay debts with the answers which ministers have given this house; their creditors ask for cold cash.

My humble contribution in this debate will be to place before the government the views of the constituents whom I have the honour to represent. Some hon. members may wonder why I speak of placing the views of my constituents before this house, and not merely personal views—which has been the practice of most hon. members. The explanation is this. Before leaving for Ottawa in January, and knowing that this session would be an important one, I decided to try out a bit of democracy, of which we hear so much though it is seldom practised. I called two one-day conventions at central points in my constituency for the purpose of discussing agricultural problems only. I asked both conventions to give me their instructions and promised to place their requests, or if you like, demands, before this house. That is precisely what I intend to do to-day. I wonder how many other hon. members, especially those on the government side, asked their constituents for instructions, and how many would dare put them before this house. Probably few, or maybe none, except the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader). The reason is that hon. members on the government side who represent agricultural constituencies are putting their party before the interests of the farmers whom they represent. I am sure the farmers will pass their own judgment upon this attitude.

Coming back to the two conventions to which I referred, I would say that both were non-party affairs. All had equal privileges of voting, regardless of political affiliations. Over five hundred delegates attended the convention held in the town of Mundare and over four hundred and twenty were present in the town of Smoky Lake. They embodied their requests in the three resolutions which I shall read to the house. Let me read, first, the one regarding wheat. It states the points of importance probably as well as they have been put in this house:

> Whereas wheat production is the foundation of Canadian agriculture and, in turn, agriculture is the basis of the national economy;
> Whereas the havoc of war will create grave after-war problems, and the accumulation of adequate wheat reserves to meet the famine and pestilence which are likely to develop should be an essential feature of Canadian policy;
>
> And whereas the stabilization of wheat production at an adequate level, and the efficiency of our entire national economy and the health of national morale are dependent upon farmers receiving a price which will cover production costs and provide a margin of profit for their services to the nation;
> Therefore be it resolved by this non-party convention of farmers that the federal government forthwith provide for wheat prices to be stabilized at $1 per bushel at the nearest point of delivery on the basis of the average 1940 general price level and that it be varied to bear the same ratio to any rise in the general price level.

I do not think I need add anything to that resolution; it is self-explanatory.

I mentioned a moment ago something about democracy and parliament. I should like to say just an additional word or two. Parliament, in my opinion, is a body of men who are elected by the people and whose duty it is to place before the government the views of their constituents and press for results which the people demand. When hon. members place before parliament the demands of the people, it is up to the government to find ways and means of obtaining the required result. The people do not care how this result is achieved; but if the government cannot do it, they will be replaced by another government which will. When a government gives the people something against which they are protesting, surely it cannot claim to be a democratic government. While I am on this point of democracy, listen to what Aristotle had to say about it:

> The best material of democracy is an agricultural population; there is no difficulty in forming a democracy where the mass of the people live by agriculture . . . not having the necessities of life they are always at work, and do not covet the property of others. . . . Next best to agricultural and in many respects similar are pastoral people. . . . The people of whom other democracies consist are far inferior to them.

It will be seen that Aristotle speaks highly of agriculturists. If we had more farmers in this house, perhaps the results would be different.

With regard to the primary producer, is it not phenomenal that the only people in the dominion whose markets are not protected are the primary producers? The farmer is always told how much he will get for the things he produces and he is also told how much he must pay for the things he buys. How can anyone explain this strange situation? The farmer or primary producer is again the only one who pays freight both ways; he pays freight on everything he sells and he pays freight on everything he buys. I could find in my desk a pre-election campaign leaflet to show that the government's candidate promised the people of the constituency that the present government would adjust freight rates and overhaul the whole freight rate structure. But here we are in the third session and nothing has been done in that regard. Let me stress this point. It is not a matter of advancing arguments against the government or of the minister trying to tie up somebody on the opposition side. The problems that face us are serious. Surely we must realize that half of our total population is affected by agriculture and by the income derived therefrom. The farmers have no other income, and we cannot expect them to take it on the chin year after year just because the government chooses to force down their throats some orthodox policy to which it wishes to cling.

I do not wish to blame the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I could not blame the Minister of Agriculture or even the Minister of Finance, for they are only the Charlie McCarthys of the present financial system which dictates its policies to them and, of course, they have to carry them out to the letter. I will not say much about the income of the farmer because so many have already done so. The government seems to take a good deal of credit for the increased prices on bacon, butter, eggs and other commodities that have gone up. If the government could figure out some way which would give them an excuse to take that increase away from the farmers it certainly would. That has been the experience of the past.

In the Ottawa Citizen of January 31, 1942, in the column "Diary of our own Pepys", this is what the writer has to say:

> All morning busy at many matters, and all afternoon, and so past six to the meeting of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to see what I could hear about the farming situation and one of the things I heard was that in the last war the farmers got one-third of the national income and the rest of us two-thirds, whereas in this war they get only one-tenth and the rest of us nine-tenths.

And so on. That is only one little article which explains the situation. Again, in the Citizen of January 31, 1942, the following appears in an editorial:

> In the last twenty years the farmers of Canada have laboured under heavy handicaps. Under deflation and negative politics agriculture has suffered more than any other single industry. For one thing farm income has dwindled to such an extent that the average in 1940 was less than $600 a year compared with over $1,000 in 1929. The problem which that fact represents is not the farmer's alone; it is a national problem.

I come now to a resolution which deals with parity of prices. May I read the following resolution passed at the two conventions to which I have already referred:

> Whereas under present conditions primary producers are forced to accept open market prices for their produce and to buy goods which enjoy protected markets;
> Whereas this results in the prices of primary products being depressed to minimum levels with the result that the full burden of protection for other industries has to be borne by farmers and other primary producers;
> Whereas in addition farmers are obliged to meet the freight costs of both the goods they sell and the goods they buy;
> And whereas this has led to the grave injustice of the prices of agricultural and other primary products falling in relation to the general price level, thereby divesting such producers of their incomes and causing acute depression in the primary industries, which in turn threatens the stability of the entire national structure.
> Therefore be it resolved that the prices of all primary products, and of farm produce in particular, be adjusted so as to bear a just relationship to the general price level at all times on the generally accepted basis;

And be it further resolved that in order to meet the injustices created by the present inequitable freight rate structure that freight rates for Canadian goods be equalized on a generally accepted national basis.

I have several other resolutions, minor ones, but I will omit them so that I may have a little more time to devote to other matters. Perhaps the government does not quite get what the farmers mean by parity of prices. There are many explanations of that point. This is what we mean; this is what I mean when I discuss that particular subject. I have in my hand a few clippings from various newspapers from which I will read the headings. Here are several:

Canadian business hits high level; Massey-Harris earns more in 1940; Consolidated Mining earns large profits; Increased profits shown in report of Dominion bank; Hudson's Bay mines profit $5,948,855; C.P.R. earnings up $1,274,000; Canadian Breweries reports $255,931 profit.

That is one side of the story. The other side is this:

Wheat buying unmoved by exports; hog production held losing game.

It is a game to them.

Western farmer faces oversupply period; farmers urged to stress quality.

Some people are not satisfied with the quality though they are getting it for nothing.

Wheat futures touch minimum.

You have the comparison right there, and that is what we mean. The farmer must get a sufficient income to be able to buy the things he needs if he is to get along; to balance consumption with production, we must have parity prices.

The next point I wish to discuss is the debt situation. The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) dealt with this point and I think he made a good case. The federal government has failed miserably in the protection of our farmers against old private debts. There are literally thousands of farmers throughout western Canada who have been thrust under the heels of financial dictators for the past ten years. These farmers were left at the mercy of soulless financial institutions that were going to get everything out of the farmers regardless of what may happen to them. This government believes in the sanctity of contracts; oh, yes. In fact, it believes in the sanctity of contracts above the sanctity of homes, and as a result many of our western agriculturists after having toiled for years have been dispossessed of their homes. While travelling throughout the country I have examined hundreds of cases which have been reviewed by the boards of review, and I found that in many instances the financial institutions have been charging farmers anywhere from 6 to 14 per cent interest. This government permitted them to bleed the farmers to death, and to-day it is wondering why hon. members representing western agriculture are opposing this particular measure, which will not give the farmer sufficient income to meet his obligations.

At some future date I shall deal with the debt problem at greater length. On this occasion I wish to place before the house only one resolution dealing with the debt problem:

Whereas the debts under which the farmers and other people of Canada have been struggling constitute an ever-present threat to their security and a drain on their inadequate resources;

Whereas market conditions, over which they have no control, have forced farmers to produce at prices lower than production costs, thereby leaving them no income with which to meet their obligations;

Whereas provincial debt legislation gave protection to debtors against unjust dispossession of their homes without prejudicing the position of creditors to obtain payment within their debtors' ability to pay;

And whereas the lending institutions have entered upon a course of action which has led to the said acts being declared inoperative by the courts, thereby jeopardizing the property rights of citizens and creating internal disruption at a time when this is most undesirable;

Therefore be it resolved that the federal government be urged to forthwith confer upon provinces any necessary statutory authority which will make the said debt legislation fully operative and beyond the reach of attack by the financial institutions.

And be it further resolved that the federal government be requested to adopt a general revision of debts on the basis of a reduction in the principal amount of outstanding debts by a sum equivalent to any interest payments made prior to December 31, 1936, in excess of 3 per cent simple interest.

That is the third resolution. I have here one further resolution, dealing with interest rates. That has not much to do with the Minister of Agriculture, but while discussing agriculture I believe I should put the resolution on record:

Whereas the farmers are asked to take part in Canada's war effort, and further in view of the fact that farmers' produce is being sold below cost of production;

Therefore be it resolved that this convention go on record demanding that interest on all debts be eliminated for the duration of the war.

These comprise all the resolutions passed at this convention.

I should like to deal with the debt situation more fully but my time will not permit me to do so now. I just want to say that the present government has at all times given some excuse for not dealing with debt legislation adequately, for instance, that it would require an amendment to the British North America Act or that it is ultra vires or something of the kind. But this government found no difficulty in bringing in an amendment to the British North America Act when it wanted to put unemployment insurance into effect. The government found no difficulty in invading provincial fields in the matter of income tax and succession duties. But the government finds difficulty when it comes to helping the farmer. The government finds the British North America Act in the way when it comes to old age pensions. Those are the things that I believe the people will eventually have to realize, they will have to learn who their friends are and who are not.

The Minister of Agriculture painted the picture that conditions are going to improve after the war. Let us hope so. But here are three outstanding men who take a different view of agriculture after the war. Here is a clipping from the Calgary Albertan printing a statement by Leonard D. Nesbitt, publicity superintendent of the Alberta wheat pool. He said:

> If history repeats itself (and it usually does) a prolonged period of agricultural distress will follow the end of the war. Such a condition has developed after virtually every major war, and particularly during the past century and a half.
> One does not need to look back more than two decades to see what happened to agriculture following the first great war. Peace was declared in 1918 and two years of inflation followed. Out of the succeeding nineteen years not less than thirteen have been unfavourable to farmers, in that prices of farm products have been below the prices of other products. In five of these years the difference indicated by comparative indexes amounted to twenty points or more. In all but three of the years, the discrepancy was more than ten points. In only five of the nineteen years did farmers enjoy an advantage, and in none of these did the advantage amount to more than ten points.

Then Professor MacKenzie, president of New Brunswick university, speaking at Montreal on April 11, 1941, is reported as follows:

> Speaking of the post-war world, Professor MacKenzie said there would be "disorganization and debts and poverty and suffering . . ."
> "Taxation will continue," he added, "at high levels, but that in itself need not alarm us, for taxation is merely a method of transferring wealth and of making accumulations of it available for large-scale use."

The last statement is a bit more encouraging, that taxation will be an advantage.

Here is a third quotation, and perhaps the writer, Sir Edward Beatty, is just as important as any of the other gentlemen. In an article published in the Winnipeg Tribune, of December 31, 1940, he said:

> We hear much talk of the social changes that are to follow upon the end of the war. I venture to suggest that the economic changes then experienced will prove more imperative and more immediately effective than any other. It is altogether probable that we shall move into a world that is much poorer than it has been over many generations, and this will apply not only to the fighting nations. For some time to come the countries to which Canada sells products of farm, mine, forest and factory may not be able to pay high prices for their purchases, even though they be in urgent need of the commodities supplied, and it may easily be that our methods of production will have to be raised to new standards of economic efficiency.

These three statements, uttered by men occupying important positions, should perhaps warn the farmers that they had better get matters adjusted for themselves now, otherwise they may find themselves out on the road.

I should now like to say just a word or two about the farmer delegation which visited Ottawa. It is a pity that in time of war there should be even the need for any such delegation. The $35,000 or thereabouts, spent to bring the delegation to Ottawa to plead with the government could have been used to better advantage; but the policies followed by the government during the past ten years—not only by this government but by the one that held office previously, because, after all, there is no difference between the two—placed the farmers in such a position that they were forced to come all this long way in order to make their representation. Personally I would think the best thing would have been for these delegates to see their own members of parliament; to present their demands to them and say, "We want you to bring these matters before the government, and we want results." Believe me, they would have had a number of them climbing up a tree.

In the estimates for 1942-43, tabled a short time ago, I found some startling things. Substantial increases were shown under several headings. Interest on the public debt, and other debt charges, call for instance, for an additional $17,414,000. But there are large decreases in several departments, notably the Department of Agriculture, where the 1942-43 appropriation of $18,508,016 is $30,059,352 less than for 1941-42. Provision for maintenance of prairie farm assistance and rehabilitation measures also was contained in the estimates. Prairie farm rehabilitation and water storage expenses are cut $500,000, but the allocation under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act remains the same at it was last year. The largest reduction was in the amount for wheat acreage reduction payment, $5,225,000 this year as against $35,000,000 last year. Other decreases are seen in the estimates of the Department of Pensions and National Health, from $56,799,492 in 1941-42 to $54,839,093 in 1942-43. Then there is a decrease of $573,500 in the cost of old age pensions and pensions for the blind, with $31,372,500 being allocated as the dominion's share of such pensions.

I have the honour to represent the constituency of Vegreville, where we have some of the best young farmers of the west. On several occasions they have won prizes at the International Live Stock Exposition, and following the exposition this year the Associated Press sent out this dispatch:

> William Skladan, Andrew, Alberta, kept the oats king title in Canada, with Alex Stewart, Ailsa Craig, Ontario, a former king himself, as runner-up. Dominion exhibitors have won the oats award fourteen times in the last twenty-one years.
> Paul F. Pawlowski, Vilna, Alberta, who was the oats king last year, lost out in that division but won himself another crown, that of barley king, with Tom Mynzak, Desjarlais, Alberta, as runner-up.

Then it goes on to say:

> Highest award to Canada was that of wheat king, won by William Miller of Edmonton, with R. P. Robbins, Shaunavon, Saskatchewan, as runner-up. Canadians have won this title every year since 1928.

The oats king of last year, and the present oats king, both live in the constituency which I represent; yet the strange thing is that though these young farmers win trophies for their wonderful work, they can hardly make a living on the land.

I am sorry that my time is slipping away so quickly, and I shall not have time to deal with other matters of which I should like to speak. In closing, I should like to say that I am glad the government has given consideration to the postponement of military training for farmers' sons. I have had a great number of letters from older folk in my constituency, where perhaps the only son in the family is called up for military service, leaving behind the parents who are over sixty years of age and unable to work the land. Surely in such cases consideration should be given, and these young men should be released for spring seeding and other work.

I believe the hon. member for Rosthern dealt very well with the question of the Atlantic charter, so I need not touch upon that matter on this occasion. I should like to add, however—though I do not know whether the word "oomph" is parliamentary—that if the government had put enough "oomph" into its policies and efforts, I think it could have done a great deal more than it has done. It surely has a great deal of

"oomph" when it comes to political contests. I have never personally met Mr. Arthur Meighen, but he surely must be a terrible man judging by the way he was described in this house. Why, we spent weeks and weeks fighting an election right here in this house, at public expense, getting free publicity. Surely, if there is nothing to be afraid of, the government need not have been so scared.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, if the continuation of this debate were to interrupt for one moment the conduct of the war, despite the fact that I do know something about the morale and the condition of affairs on the prairies I assure you I would not occupy the time of the house. I do believe that a people's morale, and their feeling toward their government is important at a time like this.

I was interested this afternoon to hear the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) tell us about his long association with the grain trade, the grain growers and the grain business. Before he had finished I was tempted to ask him whether in recent years because of their terrific suffering they had been able to get members of the grain exchange off relief in Winnipeg.

It is unfortunate that the bureau of statistics does not publish facts and figures concerning prices paid to farmers for their grain, and prices finally received by those who sell the grain in the markets of the world. I, too, have been associated with the growing of grain in western Canada since the beginning of the century, and I know something about grain growers' problems, because I have lived among grain growers. Apparently the minister has lived more in company with those who operate on the grain exchange.

I was sorry to hear the minister point out or even imply this afternoon that there seemed to be some discrimination by one part of Canada against the other parts. In my observations to-day I do not speak only of western agriculture. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) has dealt with parity prices for all agriculture—agriculture across the whole dominion. I believe I can speak of agriculture across Canada, because I have been on farms in all but one of the nine provinces, and I know I am stating the truth when I say that agriculture to-day is not receiving parity prices.

Judgment will no doubt be finally passed by those western agriculturists and grain growers in western Canada whose rights the minister was supposed at one time to champion. They will compare the condition of agriculture with the present dismal plight of the grain exchange and of the minister himself.

The amendment before the house states, in effect, that the disregarding by this parliament of the representations made by western agriculture for a parity price for all agricultural products, and of the payment of at least $1 a bushel as an initial price, is contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada. The resolution deals with the presentation made by western agriculture for a parity price.

I would draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that the parity price is not a cost-plus price; rather it is merely a cost price. The demands for bonuses and other types of assistance would not come at this time if the cost price had existed in the past. The core of the request from western agriculture is the idea of parity, but it should not be taken for granted that the delegation was against bonuses.

The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) tried to leave the impression in the house that the people were divided, that one group was asking for a bonus on a bushelage basis while the other was asking for one on an acreage basis. That is an unfair suggestion, because I do not believe that at any time the delegation made any such submission.

Mr. GARDINER: One of the spokesmen did.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In the memorandum submitted it will be found that they were asking for a continuation and expansion of the principle of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I believe the government has done that. There are new bonuses by order in council —though heaven knows how long they will last. Payments made under the wheat acreage reduction bonus are a form of income insurance. The request for a parity price is a request for a fair wage, and that is about all. I suppose we could call the bonus a form of unemployment insurance, the only difference being that whether or not the farmer gets a crop he must still do the work. The income insurance is protection against receiving nothing for the work he does.

The delegation was one of which I say Canadians might well be proud. It was one consisting not only of agriculturists, but including people from almost all walks of life, people representing almost every phase of economic life in the western provinces. There were mayors of cities, reeves of municipalities, clergymen, teachers, storekeepers, businessmen, and the legislature of Saskatchewan was represented. Anyone hearing them was at once convinced that they were speaking with the calm assurance of people asking for justice. Their cause was a just and righteous one, and one which gave them strength. In my opinion the only reason why we did not have a similar delegation from all the provinces, was that agriculture is not organized across the dominion. If it were organized effectively across Canada there would have been deputations from all the provinces. I would like every hon. member to realize that those people would not have come to the capital city at this time, a time when our nation, our empire and democracy is in danger, unless they were filled with the righteousness of their cause, and knew that conditions were desperate. That is positive proof that there is something deeply wrong with agricultural economy in Canada.

From the evidence submitted by the delegation it is clear that a continuance of conditions in western agriculture will undermine the whole economy. I am sorry the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has not seen fit to make a statement to the house respecting this matter, because he was very much in evidence during the time the delegation was here. Ministers of the crown who met with and spoke to the delegation admitted that the case presented was fair and reasonable.

Unless agriculture can obtain the cost of production, it must be condemned to tenant peasantry. If one cannot get the cost of production from his work, then the industry with which he is connected is headed for bankruptcy. Agriculture has been headed for bankruptcy for so many years that the fault is deep-rooted. Anyone who knows about the debt situation of agriculture in western Canada will know that it carries a debt load of about $800,000,000. The destruction of our ownership of our homes will be the natural consequence of a continuation of this policy. The home is the foundation of any country. No people ever rose in the scale of nations if they let their agricultural economy sink to a level where the people could no longer live decently in homes of their own. Sixty years ago from seventy to eighty per cent of the people of Canada used to live under the healthy conditions of their farm homes, but now probably not more than forty per cent live on the land. This is a sign of inward decay of the nation. Migration of people from the farms to the city is a dangerous sign of decay. It should not be permitted in any nation; it should not be permitted by those who claim to be the governors of that nation.

It is not that people do not want to live on the farms, because they enjoy living there. If you will give some form of security, the people will live there. Something drastic will have to be done sooner or later to change our economy and make it possible for these people to live decently. The decision of the cabinet and the wheat committee, whoever they are, not to grant a parity price is merely a sacrificing of these people. We are destroying their last vestige of hope. Apparently the grain exchange is to continue. Apparently the packing plants and the packing houses are to continue to fatten upon the live stock brought in by the producers.

The farmer finds that he is losing whatever equity he had in his farm. He is finally forced to give up the lifelong struggle to keep his head above water. Every two or three days I receive communications from people in the west telling me of foreclosure actions against their farms. In some cases the sons who had kept things going as the parents got older have enlisted. I ask hon. members to consider how these boys in the forces must feel when they receive word from their parents at home that they no longer own the land. They are fortunate if they are allowed to stay on as tenants of the mortgage companies. It is much worse when the older people are turned out and have to depend upon charity.

I cannot understand why we should have to plead on the floor of this house for a parity price. It is only common justice that this should be given; it is the very essence of justice and fairness. It should fall like the rain and the sunshine upon everyone; it should be a recognized right. A continued lack of parity prices has left the farmer in a position of debt. I think I am quite safe in saying that for the last twelve years agriculture has not received its cost of production. As has been said by almost every speaker, the debt situation in the country is intolerable. There is something fundamentally wrong with a system which permits debt to rise.

A farmer requires a certain amount of capital to carry on his work of production, and he must give also the labour of himself and his family. Both of these should be rewarded if there is any production. The farmer uses the labour of his family and himself to produce, and the capital is used to buy the machinery which is needed for production. But if, because of circumstances beyond his control, the farmer loses his crop by frost, drought, hail, grasshoppers, rust or some other calamity, he receives no return for his labour that year. The farmer gets absolutely nothing for his labour, but with the institutions as they are organized in this country, capital receives a reward that year. If the farmer cannot pay his interest, then it is piled on to the debt, and the next year he is penalized for not having produced the year before when it was not his fault that he could not. That same year the machinery produced no wheat, but the next year or the year after, the farmer must pay double toll. The reward of capital is too great while the reward of labour is negligible. This accumulation of debt is crushing this industry.

The debt legislation that we have in the provinces does not meet the problem at all. Even though parity prices were granted, I do not believe the farmers of western Canada in the next ten years could work their way out from under the burden of debt that is placed upon them. But when the administration says that they will not recognize the claims to parity, then there can be no hope because the cost of production is not there. The burden of debt will continue and it will pyramid. This problem will have to be met. I think in war time the government should at least recognize that the solving of this problem is an essential step in the peace, order and good government of this country.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Immediately before the dinner recess we were discussing the failure of the government to regard the presentations of the delegation from the west. I want to draw attention to the fairness of that delegation and the good faith which they showed in agreeing that the definition of a parity price of wheat in the west should be decided by the dominion bureau of statistics. In speaking on this matter, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) attempted to prove that the government had not disregarded the presentations of the delegation, and I am going to turn to some of the statements he made to give an idea of the method of proof which he used.

To give the devil his due, I must say in all sincerity that we have had already some concessions from the government. For one thing, they are going to submit the subject of agricultural legislation to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization. It will be quite a new experience for this committee, because it has not met since 1939, and therefore has not considered agricultural policy during the life of the present parliament. Also, price floors have been placed under certain commodities.

The type of argument to which I object may be illustrated by the minister's statement as recorded in Hansard of March 10, page 1204. Such an argument, I contend, is fallacious. Here is what he does: he places a table on the record giving the average prices of certain cuts of meat in 1926-29, the highest price in the period which set ceiling prices, and the increase above the 1926-29 level; he quotes the prices for round steak, rib roast, shoulder roast, stewing beef, veal shoulder roast and pork fresh leg roast. I do not know why the minister has seen fit to take retail prices of meat as an indication of what the farmer is getting for his products. In every one of the items he mentioned there is an increase above the 1926-29 level. I maintain that what he should have put on the record are figures showing the average farm prices of hogs, cattle and calves during the 1926-29 period, and the average farm prices for the same commodities from 1939 to 1941. Had he done so, this is what would have been found. I got these figures from the bureau of statistics; they were used by the bureau in determining Canadian farm income over a period of years:

Saskatchewan

	Average price 1926-1929 cents	Average price 1939-1941 cents	Decrease per cent
Hogs	10·2	7·7	25
Cattle	5·6	5·29	5
Calves	7·1	6·5	8

If you take the Manitoba prices for the same commodities, you find practically the same rate of, not increase, but decrease.

These figures prove a few rather interesting things. They show that the farmer got less in 1939-41 than in 1926-29, whereas the consumer paid more, and that the increase in consumer prices means one thing, namely that the packing companies are cleaning up on the "in-between". Here, in his own words, is what the minister used his figures to prove:

I give these in order to indicate that the government has not disregarded the farmers' desire to have parity prices.

If that is the method of proof he uses, all I can say is that figures do not lie, but lawyers do a lot of figuring.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Why lawyers?

Mr. MacINNIS: Because the other word would not be parliamentary.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: To show that the government has disregarded the parity price, I quote what the minister said as reported at page 1211 of Hansard:

On every one of these farm products, except wheat, we have been able to satisfy the farmers of Canada. I only need to say that the activities of this house during this session indicate clearly that the situation in relation to agriculture in Canada is very different to-day from what it was when this house met in any other session since the war started. We only had one persistent delegation this year asking for something more, namely, the wheat delegation, and they came only because they are the only farmers in Canada whose problems have not been grappled with successfully down to the present time. But just as soon as conditions under which we are labouring, with a world war on, are such as to make it possible the problems of the wheat farmer will also be dealt with to his satisfaction.

Well, he had power before there was a war on, and we know the result. This kind of promise of what is going to happen in the future is the sort of thing that agriculture has been starving on for far too long.

With regard to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and the advisers of the government's wheat committee—the grain board—I believe a decision has been made that they will not recognize parity prices for wheat.

A number of abuses have crept into the administration of this department which, I think, should be wiped out. I have in mind, for one thing, the operations of the car allotment committee, which set out deliberately to discriminate against the cooperative wheat pool and force its business to the grain trade.

There is also the matter of storage of grain in privately leased elevators. The Dominion of Canada built these terminals at a tremendous cost to the country, and then, instead of operating them and controlling them, leased them to grain companies, members of the grain exchange, at rentals as low as $72,000 or $73,000 a year, that figure being accepted for the use of an elevator holding three to three and a quarter million bushels of grain. When we ask how much this particular grain company received in storage fees—paid, I suppose, by the grain board—we are told that the figures are not available. Why are they not available? Whose money is it? Whose elevator is it? All you have to do is figure out the storage on three and a quarter million bushels at eight cents a bushel per annum; it amounts to about $260,000. This kind of thing is not good enough. We permit the grain companies, some of them with offices outside the dominion, to make hundreds of thousands of dollars by storing Canadian wheat in elevators belonging to the Canadian people. Yet the department refuses, or has refused, to allow the farmer a storage allowance for storing his own grain on his own farm in a bin which he built for himself.

This is the sort of thing that destroys the confidence of the people in those who are administering their affairs. Effective steps should have been taken in all of these fields to prevent the exploitation of western agriculture, and then the western farmers would have felt that the government was sincere in trying to carry out something in the way of reform for them. I think the decision not to give the farmer parity price for his wheat reflects the real loyalty of those responsible for this legislation. It is not loyalty to western agriculture, nor is it recognition of the justice of their cause, or recognition of the rights of those who toil; rather it favours the exploiters of those who toil; it favours those people who can take advantage of the unorganized condition of producers and consumers. They exploit labour wherever it is found, from east to west, from coast to coast.

The result of the whole thing is that the people who will clean up on this situation will be the mortgage companies and those who to-day are obtaining legal title to land and to the homes of the people in the west. Their plans are plain. What they intend to do is to take hold of the legal right to property and farms in the west. When you find 80 per cent of the farms mortgaged or owned by mortgage companies, the farmer unable to pay off that load of debt, and the companies foreclosing and getting control, you can see what the situation is like. When the war is over, I presume another army of people will be imported into this country from war-torn Europe to settle on this land owned by some financial concerns with their head offices in Montreal or Toronto, and the immigrant will be loaded down with a burden of debt—tenant-peasant, slum schools, people not owning their own property, people without freedom and without security.

If the time ever comes when western agriculture can again be placed on a basis where it pays, I do not believe that many of those now on the land will have anything to say with regard to the ownership of that property. These people, in trying to solve their problems, have worked in a cooperative way and have been successful to a large extent in wiping out some of the abuses in the handling of elevators at country points. I was rather sorry to hear the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly), who the Minister of Agriculture said should be minister, make the statements he did. I quote from the hon. gentleman's remarks, as reported at page 1183 of Hansard:

> The other day I picked up a financial paper and looked it over, and I found that a pool elevator with a capital of $18,000,000—$12,000,000 received from the farmers for elevator deduction and $6,000,000 for reserve—had declared a profit of $3,000,000—16 per cent. I want some of our financiers over there to tell me what they think of that. If that is not high finance, what is it? . . .
> I belong to the wheat pool and I have not received much of it yet. They do not pay any income tax or excess profit tax. How much did they take away from it in order to start an insurance company? They have some of my money. Can I get my capital back? You know we cannot. When I die my estate will get fifty cents on the dollar.

It would be a splendid contribution to a good cause, and I am sure he will be rewarded in heaven when his estate is settled, though daily I have been expecting to hear of his being called to "another place."

Mr. HOMUTH: They do not use money there.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I refer to another place near here. I would point out to the hon. member for Wood Mountain that the $3,000,000 he speaks of is made up in three ways: $900,000 of it represents patronage dividends paid to those people who send their grain to their own elevators. Some years ago they overpaid the farmers several million dollars; the provincial government came to the assistance of the wheat pool, and they are paying back every year $1,100,000 of that money. That is a portion of the $3,000,000 profit. The other $1,000,000 was used to build temporary storage to assist these congested elevators. The true loyalty of those responsible for the policy of the government at the present time is shown, I believe, completely in the legislation.

There is not very much doubt that the money which will be used to pay for the wheat that we are expected to export this year will come out of the financial arrangement in connection with the billion dollars representing a gift to Great Britain. We are all in favour of that; but if this gift is to be made by Canada, then all Canada should share in it, and all the people should take part in the payment so that the producer should not be called upon to pay an unfair share. He is engaged in the lowest paid industry in Canada.

This bill fails to recognize the principle of parity prices, the principle laid down by the western delegation. That delegation—and I wish hon. members to bear this in mind—in their final statement to the government said in effect: "We did not come down here to compromise. Our representations are fair, just and reasonable. This is the minimum. We are not asking for cost-plus; we merely want cost". If the policy laid down by the government is adhered to, then I say it is a bad policy, bad for agriculture, bad for the morale of the people at this time, and bad for our cause. I maintain, therefore, that it is contrary to the peace, order and good government of the country, and I urge every member—and surely half of the members of this house represent, at least in part, agricultural communities right across the dominion—to vote for the amendment and ask the government to bring in an amended bill which will recognize the principle of parity prices for agriculture.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): In view of the fact that in the last twenty years the section of the country which I represent has witnessed greater agricultural development than any other part of Canada, I do not think I need offer any apology for speaking on these two bills which are up for second and first readings respectively. Before going any further, however, and without indulging in any heroics, I would refer to the statement that has been made by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), that he was debarred from speaking last Friday. Even a few newspapers in the province of Quebec and one French-speaking paper in Ontario have tried to create the impression that the hon. gentleman was martyred, that he was fleeced, or robbed, of his right to speak.

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order. Under standing order 41 I would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw his statement.

Mr. BRADETTE: I see no point of order whatsoever. I made no insinuation about the hon. member. I just stated what some newspapers tried to make out, that he was deprived of his turn, or robbed of his right to speak.

Mr. LACOMBE: It is not an insinuation; it is more than that. It is an affirmation from the hon. gentleman. He has no right to discuss your ruling given last Friday, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BRADETTE: For the peace of mind of the hon. member I must make this statement. On Tuesday of last week I was supposed to speak on this bill; then the whip asked me to wait, and I have been waiting all these many days. I hope that these newspapers state that I have been put out of my rights and privileges as a member of parliament or that I have been treated unfairly. There are certain ethics that must be observed by members of parliament—

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is absolutely out of order. We are discussing a bill concerning wheat, not the privileges of the hon. member.

Mr. BRADETTE: There are in this House of Commons 245 members, and the hon. member knows well that it is impossible for them all to speak on the same day or even in the same week.

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is absolutely out of order, he has no right to discuss your ruling.

Mr. BRADETTE: I have the honour of having been born in the province of Quebec, although the largest part of my life has been spent in Ontario. I shall always cherish my connection with my native province. I believe it is my duty to mention here and now that I fully understand and realize what my native province has done in furthering our war effort and the magnificent efforts she has made. Yet I resent very strongly seeing some of my compatriots in Quebec province choosing this time to urge their grievances on the floor of this house, and trying to wash their linen here. The position of the minority is never very pleasant; we always feel a certain natural uneasiness. But speaking as a member of a minority in the province of Ontario I say very sincerely that never on any occasion has any reflection been cast upon me for my racial affiliations. I say that with deliberation, conviction and in all sincerity. However, it is true that, as a majority has some obligations, the same rule must also be applied to a minority. As one of French descent I shall never try to besmirch the reputation of any man in public life in my native province. Never at any time have I said a word of disrespect against the authorities of my province of Ontario where I now live. In any other province members of a minority group owe it to themselves to give no cause for unfair criticism of the people of the good old province of Quebec, and they should, of necessity, at least try to respect their own public men.

Regarding this bill, and speaking particularly of western agriculture, I always find the western members most refreshing in presenting their viewpoint. For the last sixteen or seventeen sessions that I have had the privilege of sitting in this house we have had a repetition of that discussion, which to my mind is national in its scope and very constructive. It is true that sometimes overstatements have been made, but that is only natural when one recognizes the ruggedness and vigour of western politics. To me it is always a revelation and an education. It also gives a chance to members from the east and south and the agriculture of eastern Canada to enjoy on the floor of this house that fine, cool and invigorating, vital breeze from the western plains.

I believe it was stated last Friday by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that the measure brought forward by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) smelt very much of politics, or something to that effect. I have always been a great admirer of the present Minister of Agriculture. The farmers of my section of the country believe he is one of the best we have ever had. They have confidence in him to help solve not only some of the problems of western farmers but the problems of agriculturists all over Canada. If he had wanted to play politics with that bill, it would have been just as easy for him to ask for $1.10 as for 90 cents. But he shows himself to be a practical man, a real Canadian and a real statesman who fully realizes and appreciates his responsibilities.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) has an amendment before the house asking for $1 a bushel for wheat at Fort William. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) was speaking on Friday afternoon when he said he thought that that amendment smelt of politics, and the answer from the hon. member for Weyburn was, "That is not fair." I believe the hon. member was absolutely sincere, but surely that amendment and the legislation brought in by the Minister of Agriculture must counterbalance one another, and shows that there is no politics as far as this problem is concerned. If I thought for one moment that they were playing politics with western agriculture, I should be quick to criticize the government. But I believe in the sincerity of mankind, and surely when we are discussing the problem of the farmers of western Canada we should be ready to go at least halfway with one another here.

I have always admired the sincerity of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. Last Friday he said he was going to fight for one thing and one only, namely $1 a bushel for wheat. The farmers in my section of the country are fighting at the present time for higher prices for potatoes and hay. Remember that for years we lost tens of thousands of tons of hay, could not even give it away on account of distance and lack of markets. We felt very strongly that the federal government was not treating us properly. Farming is the greatest industry in the world. I sincerely believe that with the price for wheat proposed by this legislation they are entirely satisfied; they are loyal enough Canadians to accept it at least loyally if not joyously.

Do not think for a moment that our eastern or northern Ontario agriculturists have all their problems solved. Some mention was made of the conveniences Ontario farmers enjoy. I agree 100 per cent that they should have such facilities as running water and electricity and more modern commodities, but in my section of the country—and mind you this is in Ontario where the hydro is owned by the province itself—the great majority of our farmers, after forty-five or fifty years of farming, have no electric power for their homes. We bear with this, hoping that, after this conflict is over, the time will not be far distant when at least some of these conveniences will be supplied to our fine agricultural population. I know that in saying this I am speaking to converted members of parliament, including the representatives of the west who will say they should get that and more. A year and a half ago I read an article in the Winnipeg Free Press saying that an hon. member in the southeast corner of this house was asking the government to give the farmers at least $2 a bushel for wheat. That hon. member no doubt was sincerely and honestly convinced that that should be the price. But the Winnipeg newspaper said that people must be practical with your own people and also with the rest of Canada. No doubt at 90 cents a bushel basis No. 1 northern at Fort William there is no large amount of money in growing wheat, but under the circumstances with bonuses, to me that price seems to be very acceptable. The same also applies to barley at 60 cents, oats at 45 cents and flax at $2.25.

Every citizen of Canada must be thankful to western agriculture because of the fact that we have a surplus of wheat and coarse grains. If at the present time we are frequently accused of not knowing there is a war on, to a large extent this is due to the fact that we have all the wheat, flour and bread any person or family can use; we have all sorts of grain for the feeding of hogs and cattle, which results not in a false atmosphere but in a situation which finds the country certainly very generous and comfortable to every citizen. We also hear it said that the government has not been sufficiently courageous. I do not believe there has been a government in any part of the civilized world that has tackled a great problem with the courage and logic that the present administration has exhibited in dealing with the wheat problem. I say this as an easterner, not as a politician, because last year a great many newspapers in sections of Canada other than the western provinces argued that wheat should not be pegged by the government, that there practically was no solution of that problem. This year again we saw many newspaper editorials almost making a farce of the situation, and saying the government, without a thorough study of the situation, was going to accept the requests presented by the delegation which came here from western Canada.

All these things make one realize what the government has had to face. I believe the federal government has been very courageous indeed in curtailing to a large extent the acreage of wheat grown. This is something that has been done in a sincere and fearless way. It was also refreshing to hear, during the present discussion, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) make the statement that other things would be done in connection with wheat and coarse grains in the west from time to time as conditions changed and new policies were warranted.

Every member of this house has some connection with the rural population of Canada. We all realize that during the last twenty-five years our agriculturists have been going through the same evolution that the rest of the world has experienced, and that the problems of agriculture have become more and more acute. We in the newer sections of the country, in the younger districts, went through seven years of the deepest depression. During that period 90 per cent of the farmers in the township in which I now live were on direct relief, and in many other parts of northern and southern Ontario the situation was not quite as easy and comfortable as some hon. members from the west seemed to think. But we believed implicitly, not particularly in the idea of compromising but in the principle of every member of this parliament coming here and studying the great problems of the western agriculturist, thoroughly, impartially and with a national outlook. I well remember that in my youth a good many people from the old province of Quebec moved to the west, which at that time was the promised land not only of this continent but of the world, the bread-basket not only of Canada, not only of the Americas, not only of the British empire but of the whole of the civilized world. Some of the dreams we had then came partly true; but there was also at that time some over-optimism, which really is at the root of some of the discussions and problems that the west is having to-day. No doubt we shall continue for many years to pay the price of that over-optimism, because in those days we could visualize this country with at least fifty million people by 1950; it was Canada's century, as Sir Wilfrid Laurier said at the time. Those who went west built up provincial government services and wonderful public utilities; and this is neither the time nor the place to criticize that optimism, which was absolutely warranted at the time, but of which there is bound to be a "morning after," and a price aftermath to face.

We had a somewhat similar situation in northern Ontario. I remember that in 1909 I bought some property in a subdivision two miles from the centre of my home town. I have been paying municipal taxes on that property ever since, but instead of growing the population has been dwindling. I should not be criticized for that. I was also sharing the optimism of my time. In my own part of Ontario we wanted a railway connecting with tidewater at James bay; the farmers of the west wanted the same thing. I am not here to criticize the Churchill railway, because no party, no government and no parliament could have opposed the construction of a railway from the western provinces to Hudson bay. Yet those costly developments never came up to expectations. Those were days of optimism, but we must be realists in these realistic times, and one has only to read the Sirois report to see the problems that are faced at the present time by the fine population of the three western provinces.

Sometimes, naturally, those of us who belong to the older parties in this house have been inclined to be more or less—more rather than less—impatient with certain political eruptions that have occurred periodically in the west. If a person takes the trouble to study the main causes of these eruptions, it will be found that in most instances it has been the agricultural situation, no doubt aggravated by that overoptimism to which I referred a few moments ago. But that does not mean that the rest of Canada should ignore these movements. Apart from the social credit movement, which was purely an economic or monetary reform movement, all the other movements have been due to the uneasiness brought about by a lack of prosperity on the part of western farmers. We have seen the Progressives, the United Farmers of Alberta—

Mr. FLEMING: What about the political uprising in Ontario?

Mr. BRADETTE: It was due to agricultural conditions, also. As the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming) has said, a few years ago we had an agrarian movement in Ontario which was called the United Farmers of Ontario. Again, the reason for that political movement was the fact that Ontario agriculturists were not prosperous and felt that they were not getting a fair deal. That is why I say we must be indulgent with these movements and try to comprehend them. It is no use trying to put them aside with a wave of the hand; that will not be sufficient. They will not disappear that way. We must get together with these people, try to study their political theories and philosophy to see their viewpoint; and in most instances, if we go to that trouble, it will be possible to find a common solution to our problems, or at least more tolerance to their approach. The difficulties facing this country will never be solved by a simple equation or by simple mathematics. A solution can be found only through a thorough study, from the proper angles, by all sections of our population, industrialists, financiers, political leaders, farmers, labourers and all others. During the present debate a little heat is sometimes generated when one speaker says something against some other group in this house; but all through the discussion I believe we have only one end in view, namely, a solution of the problems with which we are faced at the present time, and more illumination of that all-important problem.

The hon. gentleman who preceded me, speaking of the agricultural problems of the west, said that perhaps after this war we might have a large number of people trying to enter this country. One of the great problems at present facing Ontario and Quebec, as well as the western provinces, is the fact that we have not sufficient machinery to look after our own natural increase. At the present time, in the Abitibi region of Quebec, which is adjacent to the part of Ontario in which I live, one of the greatest experiments in land settlement the world has ever witnessed, with the exception of the migration from Egypt, is being carried on. I believe it has been relatively successful up to the present, though perhaps not to the extent that might be wished; but I believe that experiment should be closely studied, because it may be of great help in solving the problems with which the province of Quebec is faced at present and the world itself may find itself confronted with after this conflict. But in that province we also have this situation, that within the next thirty or forty years not more than half a million more people can be fruitfully placed on the land because even in Quebec they know the limited acreage of farming land that they have left.

When I read the Sirois report I was astonished to learn from it, through the evidence of Professor W. J. Waines of the university of Manitoba, that so far as the population of the three western provinces is concerned we have practically reached the saturation point. I should think that with the development which has gone on in twenty or thirty years there would be practically no more space to fill up in the three western provinces. If my information is correct, only about eighteen million acres of land in those western provinces are fit for cultivation, and a lot of that is sub-marginal. Therefore on that score alone one can easily see the turmoil and the travail of the western deputations who are discussing the problem of agriculture, and the time may not be far distant when the west will have to go into subsistence farming.

At this point I should like to say a few words about the delegation which was in Ottawa a few weeks ago. My personal belief is that it was one of the finest movements of farmers this country has ever seen. Everyone will admire them, and particularly when we remember that these large and small rural municipalities which suffered so much during the depression, which have suffered from drought during many years, and from debts, found it possible to raise a sum of money large enough to send to Ottawa a delegation so representative and in such large numbers. I believe, however, that if they had seen their own good, clean-cut and active members of parliament discussing their problems, with the vim and fervour that they always display, they would have realized that the question of agriculture was being well handled and brought before national attention on the floor of the house.

When I say that the western members are vocal I do not make the statement disparagingly. It is their duty as impartially but as strongly as possible to bring before the house the great problems they face. But I make this one appeal; I want you to give us a chance to appreciate and understand the problems of others also. I must say, however, that I will vote against the amendment of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) for the very good reason that I cannot see the necessity for it. He might just as easily have asked for $1.10 or $1.20 as have asked for $1. That 10 cents would mean an awful lot to the farmers in the three western provinces, or to farmers in Ontario. At the same time, however, the hon. member for Weyburn is a logical and practical individual, because he has been dealing with spiritual matters, and also with matters of the body, and he knows that all our wishes cannot come through.

I say we cannot always get what we want in this world. I know I have always applied that principle to myself. We have to be reasonable and fair. The western agriculturist is as great a realist as you will find; he is just as practical as any other man in Canada. The delegation was well received—in fact I believe it was received by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by several cabinet ministers and members of parliament. I had the pleasure of meeting quite a number of those who came, and I was agreeably astonished to see the number of French-Canadians in the group. Among the French-Canadians —I believe there were twenty or twenty-four of them—there were three or four Belgians. How proud I was to see their intense Canadianism and their great pride in affiliation with us!

When we are dealing with this subject we ought not to bring any politics into it. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) said the other day that he believed there was politics in this kind of legislation and the reception of that delegation. If I wished to enlarge upon that angle, I would remind the hon. member of the discussion which took place in 1931 with respect to the imperial trade agreement with Great Britain. I was in Ottawa at that time, when a large delegation of agriculturists from Ontario and Quebec came to Ottawa to wait upon the then Prime Minister. Without attempting to criticize his action—because I know he was very busy—I must point out that no government official met the delegation which came in those days. If the western agriculturists have their problems now, certainly the Ontario farmers had problems to face at that time, just as they have many grievous ones at the moment.

In what I am about to say I am reminded of the plans of mice and men. Last year some of our eastern agriculturists were very much concerned with the feeling that growers of coarse grains in Ontario would be met with a flood of cheap coarse grains from the west. Well, the farmer always works with providence, and in most instances providence is kind—but not always provident. In Ontario last year on account of drought conditions we had a very short crop of coarse grains, and we were very glad indeed to get the coarse grains from the west so as to carry on in Ontario. That makes us realize that in dealing with agriculture we are not dealing with something that is stationary but rather with something absolutely dynamic and always movable and changeable.

For instance, we are sometimes confronted with the suggestion—one concerning which I wish to be enlightened—that grain is one of the commodities which can be stored with the greatest facility and the least possible loss. I do not believe that is true. I have done considerable grain dealing in my part of the country, and on many occasions I have found that because of a change in the temperature, a wet season, or for some other reason, grain will deteriorate fairly intensively and rapidly. I believe that in the west at this time, no matter what some hon. members may say, there is bound to be some wear and tear, some loss on wheat that is stored and, in many instances, heavy losses and deterioration.

The other day I read in a newspaper about the multiplicity of insects which are now taking hold of much of the wheat in storage in the western provinces. That fact alone makes me realize that in all the plans we make, using our old standards, we find great difficulty in applying them to new situations, and unforeseen difficulties will have to be surmounted. I always pride myself in my open-mindedness in dealing with matters pertaining to the west. It is true that in our section of the country we are in a position to know something of the different municipalities in Ontario, and it is equally true that we know an equal amount about the capitals and the large centres of population in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. We are served by a daily and weekly press not only from the east but from the west, and I believe that on that score alone we are in a position to know as much about western as we do about eastern problems, which is of great help to our population and makes us very impartial.

At this point I should like to say something which may at first appear to be local or regional. On two or three occasions during the last year or so some hon. members in opposition—I believe they were hon. members of the Scoial Credit group, and I make this observation as one Canadian to another, as man to man—went so far as to say that due to the war we should find it possible to stop the gold mining industry of this country. I hold no brief for the gold mining industry, although I do happen to represent one of the finest, greatest and richest gold mining sections in Canada, and, I might also say, well managed. I am not going to discuss at this time the gold standard, the yardstick for our monetary system, or the system we should have. Other opportunities will present themselves for such a discussion.

But if hon. members from the west could see what gold mining has done in my section of the country and to the whole of Canada, how it has benefited not only those connected with the mines but also the agricultural section of the community, I believe they would change their views. Tens of thousands of our settlers have gone into dairying, cattle raising, the production of poultry and eggs and other farm commodities. The only market they have is found in the gold mining sections of Porcupine, Kirkland Lake and the other mining communities. Surely hon. members do not wish to take those markets away from us.

If to-morrow the government found it possible to transfer every machine we have in gold production and also the labour so engaged to the fruitful and efficient manufacture of munitions and supplies for Great Britain, I would say it should go ahead and do so. If in a reasonable time it would be possible to use those machines now engaged in gold mining for the development of a synthetic rubber industry in that section of the country, then I would say by all means do it if such an industry should be developed. But surely the government should not be asked to come to that section of the country to-morrow and throw out of employment about 65,000 people. Surely you could not ask that; I would not ask it of your people unless they could be usefully employed in war industry.

The settlers and the farmers are reasoning it out in this way: How is it that western farmers, who should understand our problems, will say that the gold mining industry should be destroyed, and especially when the farmers in northern Ontario are ready, satisfied and willing to cooperate one hundred per cent with the government so that the farmers of the west will have their place in the sun and their right to reasonable prices for their production? Surely you can visualize my argument. If it is contended that agriculturists should be kept on the farms when there is a surplus of wheat in Canada, then surely the miners of the Porcupine, Kirkland Lake and Elk Lake districts and other mining districts in Manitoba and British Columbia should not be thrown out of work. I think there is logic in this argument. Hon. members are entitled to their opinions and I would be the last to moralize, but surely I have the implicit right to make that plea.

There is a population of 300,000 people directly interested in gold mining. This industry was one of the main reasons why our people were able to get by economically during the depression. We certainly are thankful for that. It was a great stabilizing factor during that hard period. The people in these mining sections were at least comfortable during the depression. Many of them are also agriculturists. This gold mining section is right in the middle of what is known as the clay belt of Ontario, one of the newer and finest farming sections in Canada. I ask hon. members to consider these things before they are ready to throw out into misery, into the cold, into squalor over 300,000 people. I want them to be a little more careful in their statements.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could these men not be more valuably employed in munitions production?

Mr. BRADETTE: I will answer that in this way: are there not a lot of farmers in the west who will be growing wheat next summer who could be better employed in manufacturing munitions?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They are doing it already.

Mr. BRADETTE: We are realists in our own section of the country, and hon. members must be realists. The machinery used in gold mining cannot be put to making munitions, tanks or guns in a day or overnight. Hon. members may be surprised to learn that mines like the McIntyre and the Hollinger are doing some war work now, producing articles of war. I have been told by managers of these mines that if it were found necessary to close them for a period of months or years, many of them would never come back again into production. It would be absolutely impossible to exploit them again.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What useful purpose is being served by gold? How is it terrorizing Hitler?

Mr. BRADETTE: I said at the outset that I did not intend to enter into a discussion of the gold standard.

Mr. HOMUTH: Wheat is not terrorizing Hitler very much, is it?

Mr. BRADETTE: Not at the moment. I know that that question was put in all sincerity. The gold mining that is carried on in our section of the country is of benefit to the workers of Toronto and Montreal and the industrial population of the rest of Canada. We are very fortunate at the present time in that the United States still buys Canadian gold. This permits us to purchase materials used for the manufacture of munitions, guns and tanks to be sent to our armed forces and to our allies. It certainly greatly helps to stabilize our Canadian dollar. I want to make my argument quite clear and I do not want to be misquoted. The gold miners and farmers in my section of the country want all the good possible to be done for the western wheat growers, to do all they possibly can for a total war effort.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Do the United States want our gold?

Mr. BRADETTE: A few years ago a member of parliament attended the commencement exercises of the high school in Timmins, and he commented upon the fact that gold was taken out of the ground with hard work and sweat and then sent south and buried in another place. The chairman of that meeting, speaking later, told him that that argument could be carried a little further. He said, "I understand that in your section of Ontario you grow tobacco; that tobacco is made into cigarettes, smoking tobacco and cigars, and we up here turn it into ashes." That shows how far this sort of argument can go. When we talk of a total war effort we must visualize all these things. We must maintain our armed forces, and goodness knows we want to do that 200 per cent if possible. We must provide all necessary equipment, clothing and food to our armed forces and also our allies. We want a civilian population that is fruitfully employed. That is the only way you can maintain your armed forces. It could be argued that all breweries should be closed up. I do not believe that is necessary, but I will admit that if it were done we could still carry on the war just the same. It might be argued that we should stop the manufacture of alcoholic beverages, and we certainly could stop the manufacture of these soft drinks that are spoiling the stomachs of so many of our younger people. I could name fifty other industries that could be shut down. This simply shows what could happen if you carry an argument to an illogical conclusion, arguments that could not stand before the light of logic.

The agriculturists have problems, but so have the miners. The minute you take the livelihood away from these gold miners, 50,000 farmers in my section of the country will be without a market. The farmers of southern Ontario send their eggs, meat, vegetables and fruits up to our section. At times our farmers have tried to keep them out, but I have always argued that we are not only citizens of Ontario, we are citizens of Canada. That section provides a market for southern Ontario farmers and farmers in the province of Quebec. I have a brother in that section who has two sons enlisted. He has fifty dairy cows, and he tells me that if the town of Timmins were closed up, there would be no reason for his farming.

Mr. NICHOLSON: But what use is gold?

Mr. HOMUTH: Ask him what use it is not?

Mr. BRADETTE: Does the hon. member realize that France, Norway, Spain, Great Britain and Portugal have sent billions of dollars in gold bullion to the United States? Perhaps hon. members would be surprised to know that Hitler was highly displeased; he was quite choleric and abusive when he found that millions in gold had been taken away from France before the invasion. Do hon. members think for one moment that Hitler would not be quite happy if he could get at the gold centres of this country? This argument applies just as forcibly to Italy. However, this is not the time or place to discuss the gold standard or our monetary system.

My argument is that there is a ready market to-day for the gold we can produce, and this is a good thing for Canada. I have no fear that the United States will close this market because at the present time that country is spending millions in gold in south America; but if this market should be cut off, then there would be only one thing for this country to do, build up a gold reserve of five or six billion dollars in order to keep this industry going. That is as far as I am going with this question. I know that western members, while sometimes quite rugged in their discussions, are generally speaking, fair to the rest of the country.

We have large centres of population in Timmins, Schumacher, South Porcupine, Elk Lake, Kirkland Lake and other places in that section. All these are in the province of Ontario. There are also some fine gold developments in Manitoba and in British Columbia. There are conditions in the Pacific coast province which may make for serious worries. I mean the Japanese situation. Let no one think that the government has no difficulty in looking after the thirty thousand Japanese in British Columbia. Remember that when you come to stop the gold mining industry it will involve three hundred thousand people who will be thrown out of work and will constitute one of the greatest problems with which this country has had to deal. I speak somewhat heatedly because I know something about this matter and of its full implications. I am sure that there is no hon. member who doubts my sincerity.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous permission of the house.

Mr. BRADETTE: I thank the house very much for that favour. I have only a few words to add. I do not want to abuse the patience of hon. members because they have always been very kind to me.

In my view a discussion of this kind is all to the good so long as it does not become biased and so long as those who are asking for consideration are reasonable in their demands. It is always possible to discuss national problems in a national way, trying to get at the root of the difficulty and solve it in a fashion which will be fair and acceptable to all concerned. Agriculturists do appreciate the problems of other sections of the population, and they expect to receive in turn similar attention and sympathy. We speak profusely and no doubt properly of new deals and of a new order of things, although I believe that in some instances these expressions are used merely as catchwords and tend to blur the vision of the real issues, so promoting a state of aloofness and inability to reach the crux of our problems. No class can grow and prosper at the expense of another class. If by our study and our effort in the legislative field we can restore confidence and comfort to the primary producer, the discussions on this bill will have been time well spent.

Mr. GILLIS: Before the hon. member concludes his speech, I wish he would clear my mind on one point. He spoke to a considerable extent, in the discussion on this wheat bill, on the question of gold mining. I should like to ask him, first, if it is not now the policy of the government to curtail as far as possible gold mining as a non-essential war industry; second, are there not now a thousand miners in Kirkland Lake who are unemployed and cannot get either work or relief as far as the government are concerned?

Mr. BRADETTE: Of course, Mr. Speaker, it is for the government rather than myself to answer that question. I may say that the mine management of my own section—the only district of which I can speak with personal knowledge—have to face at the present time priority demands as far as steel construction and machinery are concerned, and they willingly submit to these restrictions. In some mines it is quite a problem to get the necessary labour. As far as Kirkland Lake is concerned I am not familiar with the situation, but I express sincerely the hope that the fine workers in that section of the country will find fruitful employment as soon as possible.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) has just completed a rather interesting speech, although I believe he wandered somewhat from the subject, for he covered a wide field. I do not suppose that I am expected to follow suit; in fact there is not enough time for me to deal with the matters which he has given us for consideration.

One hesitates to inject himself into a debate when it reaches its final stages. However, failure on the part of one who represents one of the finest mixed farming areas in western Canada to give expression to his views at this time might lead some persons to construe that silence as indicating wholehearted approval of the policy announced for 1942. Such a conclusion would certainly be far removed from the fact.

I believe we are all ready to recognize the difficulty with which any government is confronted that endeavours to solve a problem of such magnitude as this agricultural problem. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) were explaining the proposed policy to us, I could not refrain from watching each minister as he was speaking and trying to determine from his actions whether or not he felt elated over the policy which he was—I was going to say—compelled to give us. I do not profess to be a professional psychologist, nor am I a recognized crystal-gazer, but I felt that it was with some reluctance that the Minister of Trade and Commerce delivered his message. I may be wrong, but my impression was that he, as a western member, thought something better should have been offered. As for the Minister of Agriculture, I felt that he was quite jubilant as a result of having that message to deliver. In dealing with the matter of parity he made a masterly job of juggling, to the extent, in my opinion, of showing that two things which do not equal the same thing equal each other. That was my impression when the Minister of Agriculture finished. As the minister was selling us that policy, I was rather relieved that he was a Minister of Agriculture and not some type of door-to-door salesman who might camp upon my doorstep to sell Witch ointment, let us say, or Devil lotion to reduce the hefty housewife or give curly hair to the baldheaded. I fear that in either instance he would have done anything to sell his lotion or his mixture.

An hon. MEMBER: Would they work, though?

Mr. SHAW: Page the salesman.

I have the honour to represent, as I said earlier, one of the finest agricultural constituencies in western Canada. Fortunately we are not afflicted there by drought; we have not been tormented by insect pests; and at the same time we have not broad expanses of cultivated land devoted entirely to the production of wheat. Nevertheless we have a problem, and a very serious one, and I propose using conditions there as a basis for delivering my message at this time.

As you are well aware, Mr. Speaker, in a mixed farming area, we are engaged in the production of certain agricultural commodities for which there is a very great demand at this time. I have in mind the production of cheese, lard, eggs, and milk; and when I mention milk I might also refer to our great condensory at Red Deer, the product of which has, I understand, already reached the British market. I could enumerate other products which are derived from mixed farming.

It is true that prices of those commodities have definitely improved during recent days—that is, according to announcements which emanate from certain departments of government showing the established prices of those articles. But it always seems strange to me that when it comes to the final analysis, to the man who actuually produces the commodity and puts it on the market, his price is always so much lower than the quoted price. I have felt for a long time that the day has at last arrived when the government should take some definite action to see that the producers of these commodities are guaranteed a fair return in the light of prices which are presumed to prevail. I feel that some bodies or some organizations are taking advantage of these producers.

The situation in a constituency such as mine has been something like this. A number of years ago settlers moved into that area and purchased land. They were optimistic, no doubt, as the hon. member for Cochrane has said. But God forbid that we should ever lose that quality of optimism. They agreed to pay, in most instances, prices which were not regarded as unreasonable in view of the fact that wheat was worth from $1.50 to $2 or thereabouts a bushel. They paid as initial payments on that property possibly their life savings, and in many instances they borrowed money at 6, 8 and 10 per cent interest. It is also true that these farmers paid high prices for the machines which were required, high prices for the stock which they needed, and then they undertook farming.

We all know the whole desperate situation with which these farmers were confronted from 1931 until 1934. The bottom fell out of the price of grain. We well recollect the 30 cents a bushel which farmers were called upon to accept for wheat. Prices of all other farm commodities fell in proportion, but the interest charge against the farmer's borrowings, the value placed upon his land, did not come down—not in proportion, if at all. We know, too, that taxes increased owing to the extent of the relief which it was necessary for the various governments of Canada to pay. While the farmer's income dropped in many instances as much as 80 per cent, he was still called upon to pay the contractual price which he had agreed to pay for his land, at the rates of interest set forth in the contract. During those years we found many evicted from their properties. We found mortgage companies foreclosing. They did not foreclose all at once, it is true, but they gradually foreclosed as they could procure tenants for the land which they repossessed. Those, generally speaking, were the conditions confronting the farmers during that period, and those conditions did not improve materially even up until the time the war broke out.

The farmers did definitely protest against the conditions under which they were being forced to carry on. They protested, but on the other hand they continued producing. We found many of them branded as dishonest because of not meeting their obligations, and some of them to this day are having a difficult time living down the imputation of dishonesty which was put upon them. I think it is fair to say that during those years we did not realize that a necessary condition of the restoration of prosperity was the recognition of a more adequate income for agriculture. We have always stated that agriculture is our basic industry, but we utterly failed to see that, with such a large part of our Canadian population depending upon agriculture, if we had given a square deal to farmers during those years we would undoubtedly have stabilized our economic life in this country and would have been much better able to face the situation with which we were confronted in 1939.

One more observation in that connection. It is quite true that during those difficult years some of the governments did take steps towards introducing legislation which had a tendency to scale down certain debts. But I would make this observation. I do not believe there is any member of this house who would say that as a consequence of the writing down of debts the plight of the farmer in Canada was appreciably improved. Many of us had occasion to examine into many of the soldier settlement contracts, and we realize from the experience we gained there that hardly 2 per cent of those whose debts were written down found themselves in a more favourable position after the passing of a few years. In my estimation it is futile to undertake to solve the problems of the farmers by merely scaling down their debts. All they want is an honest opportunity to pay their debts, and that can be done only through the establishment of a fair and just price for the things they produce.

I believe it is a fact that there is no class of people in the world who will rally to the defence of democracy, when democracy is threatened, sooner than farmers. When the war broke out in 1939, Canadian farmers were among the first to rally to the support of the country; and when I think of the extent to which they did rally to its support, offering their sons and their produce, offering to change their methods of farming, offering to do anything that would help the country in her hour of peril, I am reminded of the words of the President of the United States when dealing with this same matter. He said:

> When democracy is in danger our farmers always have rallied to its defence and they always will. All they ask in return for their increased production is fair prices and assurances of protection after the emergency has passed.

We could modify that. We are not so much concerned about paying them for huge increases in production, speaking particularly of wheat, but we are concerned about giving them a decent price for that wheat which can be accepted under a quota system of delivery.

Through the first year of the war our government relied to a very great extent upon European markets. We believed, for example, that France would continue to be a large purchaser of Canadian wheat and that various other European countries would do the same. I do not think it ever entered our heads that we would not be shipping more grain to the United Kingdom than we have shipped during the past two years. Therefore, during the first few months, in fact, during the first year of the war our wheat surplus did not bother us much. But in June, 1940, came the crash; with the fall of France we found our European market cut off. Then we began to give consideration to the vast surpluses of grain which would surely accumulate.

During the following year, that is the crop year 1940-41, we instituted a scheme of acreage reduction, paid the farmers a bonus for reducing wheat acreage and turning the land into summer-fallow. I personally cannot subscribe to the idea that we should pay farmers to allow land to remain uncropped. I believe that every part of agricultural Canada can be put to use. I am not advocating that we should plough all our land and sow it to wheat. But I am stating what has already been stated here that a great deal of that land in western Canada can be used for the production of sugar beets. That is only one illustration. We might give consideration to the production of fodder crops and of further root crops, and to the expansion of the dairy industry—although that may not please certain parts of the country—but I am definitely opposed to curtailing the production of foodstuffs in time of war. I may be wrong, but I would rather be wrong in that regard than sorry if we ever are confronted with a great demand and an inability to meet it.

Last year the government also undertook to pay to farmers in areas where farming is more hazardous certain forms of assistance. I approve that; anyone who is familiar with those great expanses of prairie that were dried out year after year could not but subscribe to that form of assistance. Then a more recent innovation was the prairie farm income scheme. The farmers of western Canada were assured that these bonuses would be paid at certain times. I understand all the farmers in my constituency were led to believe that the wheat acreage reduction bonus would be paid in December. They made their plans accordingly; they wrote to machine companies to whom they owed money; they spoke to the tax collecting agencies explaining that they anticipated the receipt of this money. Then weeks went by, in certain instances even months; they failed to receive the money and no explanations were forthcoming. Did the machine companies, the tax collecting authorities and the mortgage companies accept the statements given to them by the farmers who were expecting the bonuses? No. I understand also that 50 per cent of the Prairie Farm Assistance bonus was to be paid in December. But I have had ever so many complaints from farmers that they did not receive the 50 per cent payment and that they had not yet received the payment which was due in March. The same thing applies to the income payments. I think there is one thing to be learned from that. The ministers responsible have seen the regional offices administered during one crop year, and if there is something wrong in the administration it is high time to set it right and remove the difficulty. I do not want to be harsh, but I sometimes think that the man and his association with the party are considered before his qualifications for the position. There was something wrong; we might as well admit it, and I think it is time right now to do a bit of housecleaning.

With regard to the policy for 1942, I must first say that we do appreciate the fact that the farmers are being offered another 20 cents a bushel. There is no denying that 90 cents is better than 70 cents. But 90 cents is not parity, and I am satisfied that the minister did not satisfy the members from western Canada that it was parity and, in some instances, perhaps more than parity. It is only fair and right that when it comes to determining parity level we should be given more information than was provided by the Minister of Agriculture if we are to be satisfied with his calculations. I believe, and I think the farmers of my riding believe, that $1 a bushel at the local elevator now is not a cent too much. I know that the farmers of my constituency cannot carry on and meet their obligations at less than $1 a bushel at the local elevator.

We do not go in for acreage reduction to any extent in that riding because we have not large areas devoted to the production of wheat. There is some reduction, but our income from that source is not very much. As far as wheat is concerned, we have to depend upon the price established for 1942, and I have not met a farmer yet who thinks that 90 cents will enable him to carry through and meet his obligations. I agree with what was stated by one or two members of this group, that there should be an amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act with a view to making it a sound crop insurance scheme. I believe that is absolutely essential, and I am not impressed by the statement of the Minister of Agriculture that for this reason or that it cannot be done. We notice that when he is desirous of going in any direction he usually succeeds in removing the obstacles in his way.

I believe the farmers of western Canada require further guidance. We must through some means undertake a more complete organization of this country's agricultural industry; we must do further planning of production. I have already indicated that I believe certain areas might be devoted to the production of sugar beets. That is only a suggestion. We should plan production in this country province by province, and do it now.

Furthermore we should organize the agricultural resources of this dominion. It has been intimated in the press that farmers may encounter difficulty in securing farm machinery. If farm machinery is not going to be given priority, and I think it should be, then we must organize in order to use the equipment which is available this year or next under a system of restricted machine production. Also we ought to give further direction to our farmers to enable them to market their secondary products, on a cooperative basis if necessary.

There is one other matter. Those whom I represent are definitely opposed to the action of the government in draining man-power from our farms indiscriminately and without consideration for farm requirements. If they are going to continue this, then I expect them to tell us how the farmer can carry on under a system whereby we take our men from the farms into industry and to join the various branches of the armed forces without regard to agricultural requirements. This has become a very serious question. Under the present set-up they take a man in for training and indicate that he will be released later on to work on the farm. Then, when we apply for his release they say, "We have invested a certain amount of money in this man now. We are very sorry, but we cannot release him." We are confronted with that difficulty frequently. The allotment of man-power for farm work should be carried out on a carefully planned basis; and any scheme for allotting labour to the farm should have a direct relationship to the requirements of industry and those of the armed forces.

Final and complete victory will depend upon the consideration we give agriculture at the present time. If we fail to meet the requests of agriculture, then we are making a mockery of all those things for which we say we are fighting. We must understand that under the new order which we have promised to all, including the farmers, agriculture must be guaranteed its rightful place in the national economy. Before the outbreak of war we regarded the farmer as the outstanding peacetime casualty. We all looked upon him in that way; we thought of every reason in the world for making him a casualty. Governments kept farmers disorganized and brought about that result. Then the war came upon us, and once again we are making the farmer the casualty. So I say in conclusion that, if final and complete victory is to be won, the farmer must be guaranteed his share of the national income, and further guaranteed that when the war is over he will not be forced back into the position in which he found himself during those extremely hard years from 1931 to 1934 and those difficult years from 1934 up to the present time.

Mr. J. A. GREGORY (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult in the waning hours of a long debate to say anything new and original. One does not care simply to repeat those things which have been said already by a multitude of speakers; but at the same time, representing a Saskatchewan constituency, I feel that I should place myself on record with respect to the wheat policy for 1942-43 which is now before the house for consideration.

One year ago, in speaking of the wheat policy of that time, I said that policy bore all the evidences of a compromise. I find myself again in that position this year; the policy now before the house bears all the appearances of a compromise. In viewing this policy it is necessary to do so from three aspects: from the point of view of the initial price to be paid for wheat, the wheat acreage reduction scheme, and the continuation of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I have said that this policy bears all the evidences of a compromise. In a country such as Canada, as I said last year and as has been said time and again during this debate, there are many conflicting interests. There are conflicting provincial interests, notwithstanding the fact that the provincial boundaries are in many instances, purely artificial. There are conflicting interests which arise from our geographical situation in various parts of Canada. All these matters must have their place and effect in decisions made by the cabinet. In addition to conflicting interests, I find another influence that has operated in the creation of a compromise wheat policy. Since coming to Ottawa I have discovered that there is a minority opinion within this house, as well as a minority opinion outside this house, that Saskatchewan cannot survive; that it is a hopeless task to try to maintain Saskatchewan, and that the sooner the people move out of that province, the better it will be for the whole of Canada.

These are some of the things that have brought about the compromise wheat policy of this government. It is very true that we have in Saskatchewan a population of nearly a million people of the white race who, during the last thirteen years, have endured tribulations such as have never been endured in the recorded history of that or any other part of Canada. In addition to the drought, which has visited every part of that province intermittently during that period of time, the world depression took a toll of the price of farm commodities, to the extent that during the last thirteen years there has not been a farm commodity which has returned to the farmer the cost of production.

Let me again remind the house that during the last forty-five years, during which floods of immigration poured over that western country, reaching the extent of half a million people in 1912-13, and as enormous developments took place there following that great flood of immigration, prodigious volumes of wealth were created each year in the west, which wealth found its way down to the central provinces to enrich their banks, mortgage companies and other financial institutions; yes, and to build its small industries into large industries, its small cities into large cities. Thus, during the last forty-five years that western country has made a marvellous contribution to the building up of Canada as a whole.

I ask you, sir, are those years to be forgotten? Is this great contribution made by the west to Canada as a whole to be set to one side? Is this white population of nearly a million people to be abandoned? If I may be permitted to answer that question, let me say that years of great production again will come to that western country. Once again the wealth will roll from the farms of Saskatchewan and the west as a whole down to the central provinces of Canada, thus enriching the life of the whole country.

It may not be known to all hon. members, that in the great prairie belt in the west we are not dependent upon the currents of air from either the Atlantic or Pacific oceans to create our rainfall. We are dependent only upon the meeting of the warm current of air from the gulf of Mexico with the cold currents from the Arctic ocean. It is this meeting which creates condensation in the form of rain, hail, sleet or snow, according to the period of the year. During the last few years the currents from the gulf of Mexico have moved very much farther east, and thus the currents from the Arctic and the gulf of Mexico have failed to meet over that prairie region, with the result that we have had thirteen years of intermittent drought.

Judging from the records of early settlers, from the traditions of the Indians, and the records of some meteorological stations in the United States to which we have had access, we have learned that what we used to call the great American desert—and I remember having learned this in my geography class, when a boy—has intermittently enjoyed years of heavy rainfall and good crops, and on the other hand years in which the currents of air had failed to meet, with the resulting lack of precipitation. I have confidence that history will repeat itself, and that when the right meteorological conditions develop, that great western country will again become the breadbasket of Canada, as it was once described.

I now turn my attention to the splendid delegation of about 400 farmers from Saskatchewan, who journeyed to Ottawa to lay their case before the government, and to stress their views respecting a wheat policy for the west for 1942-43 crop year. In my opinion that was one of the finest delegations which ever came to Ottawa; we are proud of it. It was an accurate cross-section of the whole of Saskatchewan, including farmers from that province, merchants, clergymen, professional men, reeves of rural municipalities, mayors of cities and others, each of whom conducted himself with decency and dignity. The presentation of their case to the government was characterized by moderation and intelligence.

What was the essence of that presentation? For the purpose of debate may I summarize it under four headings: (1) That there should be no price ceiling on wheat; (2) the initial payment on wheat should be $1 a bushel; (3) there should be a parity price paid for wheat, by further payments over and above the $1 initial payment during the course of the year from time to time, to bring the price of wheat up to a parity with other commodities, and (4) the continuation of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

For the moment I shall deal only with that portion of the brief which I have summarized under these headings. Disregarding the rest of the brief, may I say I find myself wholly in accord with the requests made by the delegation. I believe those requests were reasonable and fair, in view of the war economy of Canada.

Let us see how these requests were viewed in certain parts of Canada. We have heard objections voiced by hon. members from other provinces, and this evening I would particularly draw the attention of the house to an editorial which appeared in the Truro

Daily News shortly after the delegation had gone home. The following is the text of the editorial:

Should be nothing doing

The 400 beggars from the western wheat fields of Canada have visited Ottawa and returned. They called themselves "Prairie wheat growers and their supporters". In fact it would seem that they are a gang of leeches stirred up and led by a few shameless agitators. They were probably dominated by those who make money out of buying and selling wheat and the big wealthy wheat producers.

Presaging this trek of a couple of train loads of supplicants to the government for pap we urged that our elected representatives stiffen their back bones and use fair common sense in this case.

The government is in control of prices in Canada. So far, in spite of mistakes that are bound to occur, an excellent job has been done. Wage and salary earners should be highly satisfied.

With the last sentence I wholly agree.

It is probable that the holding down of the cost of living by the wartime prices and trade board will make unnecessary a bonus to employees for the present quarter. This is all to the good.

Now these western beggars have tried to overawe the government by taking a veritable army to Ottawa demanding special privileges. All other citizens of the country have been paying extra taxes so that the government may give these westerners a present of millions of dollars in the past to help them meet world market conditions. The last was a government guarantee of 70 cents a bushel to the grower for his wheat. In the face of the government's ceiling on prices this pap fed class from the west asks the government to collect from the rest of us another 30 cents a bushel as an additional gift to them to further fatten their pocket-books.

Nothing doing! This is definitely what should be told them. Let them get out and "root hog or die" as most all industries of the country have to do.

With the latter part of that sentence I find myself definitely not in accord.

The government told them that their request would receive consideration. The answer right on the spot, should have been, definitely "No!"

In the three years ended July 31, 1941, we contributed approximately 80 million dollars to these brassy western beggars. The new $1 a bushel gun this army of 400 put up to the government would mean under similar circumstances about 115 millions. It is certainly time to call a halt. If the government needs an opposing army to wait on them to help them to say "No," we feel sure thousands of already necessarily tax burdened citizens of Canada would join it.

In the last two years, since coming here, I have heard a great deal of talk about the necessity for unity in the awful struggle in which we and the rest of the world are engaged. I wonder just what contribution the editor of the Truro Daily News has made to unity in Canada. The article is unfair; it is untruthful, and it is an insult not only to the delegation but to every resident in Saskatchewan. I am not aware of any reason for using that kind of language with respect to the people of that province. I know of no person in Saskatchewan who would have any reason to feel an inferiority complex when meeting Canadians from any other province. We came from the other provinces of Canada; we came from Great Britain, we migrated from the western United States, and some of us came from the eastern United States. Enormous contributions have been made by nearly every country in Europe. The opportunities thus presented to a man in Saskatchewan were never available to those in other provinces. The effect of intercourse among these various people has been broadening; it has enriched the life of every person who has gone to Saskatchewan. There is no necessity to direct insulting remarks such as these to the residents of that province.

I sometimes wonder how Saskatchewan maintains its position in confederation. I shall not at this moment make reference to the various secession movements that have sprung up in Saskatchewan, but I may have something to say about this at some future date if necessary. These movements have sprung up because of the unfair treatment handed out to that part of Canada. It is bled white with freight rates on those commodities that flow easterly and it is bled white with freight rates on the things it consumes that flow westerly. It is bled white by a high tariff structure which is of no benefit to western Canada, which is nothing but a detriment.

There are no banks with head offices in that province. We are away out on the end of the limb of the financial structure. We have always been charged the most exorbitant interest rates. In the forty-five years I have lived in western Canada I have found that 12 per cent was the common rate of interest at one time. Then it was reduced to 10 per cent, and then 8 per cent was the recognized rate charged by everybody, banks and individuals. It is only recently that there has been a softening of these excessive rates to 6 and 7 per cent. One realizes from personal knowledge that in that part of the country the wages of money have been vastly greater than the wages of men, at least in the last fifteen years.

It is a widely held belief that before the end of the 1942-43 crop year wheat will be worth considerably more money. Both President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill have said that a great offensive will be commenced in the spring of 1943. If that does occur, it means that Canada and the United States will have to feed armed forces in all parts of the world. We shall have to feed Russia and the Russian army and, if the offensive is successful, we shall have to feed the liberated peoples as we drive Hitler out of Europe back toward Germany. When that time comes, there will be such a demand for wheat that we shall not have to talk about it in a whisper and with humility as we do when we apologize for this great granary of 500 million bushels of unwanted surplus. When that time comes, wheat will once more hold up its head. It will again be that No. 1 western hard which will be demanded by suffering and starving people. When that time comes, wheat will be worth probably twice what it is worth at the present time. May I suggest that out of that increased price it is quite likely that more than the parity price asked by this delegation will be handed back to the farmers in the form of participation certificates.

I should like to say a word or two with respect to these bonuses. I am pleased indeed that the wheat acreage reduction bonus has been continued. This will have the effect of inducing people to leave wheat production to some extent and to go into the production of coarse grains in order that we may fill our contracts with Great Britain for those classes of foods for which we have contracted. I am pleased indeed that a floor has been placed under flax. This will be conducive to encouraging people to produce the oils which we need so badly.

The Prairie Farm Assistance Act assures a living to the farmer in case of crop failure, and possibly the return of some of the operating cost of his farm. At least it keeps the farmer on the land. It is much better than that obnoxious word "relief". He is being maintained by bonuses which are legal in nature and for which he does not need to apologize. Unfortunately no amendment is proposed at this session to this act to prevent the 8- to 12-bushel class being wiped out. I trust the agriculture committee will do something with respect to bringing in an amendment to cover those in the 8- to 12-bushel class. I think an amendment to pay that class $1 per bushel would be satisfactory. I know that this would meet with general approval in western Canada. Every letter and telegram that I have received from the time this question was first mooted to the present date makes reference to the advisability of continuing these bonuses. Beyond question they are of great value to western Canada, and the people of that part of the country fully appreciate them.

This wheat policy goes part way in fair play for wheat farmers.

[Mr. Gregory.]

What gains have we made in this present legislation over the previous wheat policy? I think these gains can be summarized under four headings: First, there is no price ceiling in connection with this wheat policy. Second, the 280 million bushels to be purchased next year will be purchased, not by private interests for the purpose of making a gain out of the increased price to which I have referred, but by the Canadian wheat board and whatever profits are made will go back to the farmers of western Canada. Third, there is a substantial increase in the initial payment. Twenty cents a bushel is not to be sneezed at. May I say again that the letters I have received from western Canada all show a sense of appreciation for what has been done. These people realize the benefit which will be derived from the fact that the initial payment on wheat has been raised to 90 cents a bushel. Fourth, we have retained the two bonuses to which I have referred.

In summarizing the beneficial effects of this wheat policy over previous policies, I do not want it to be understood that I am satisfied with this policy; I want it to be definitely understood that I am not satisfied with it. I believe the farmer is entitled to $1 a bushel for his wheat as a part of the war economy of Canada.

In conclusion, may I say that I am only pleading for fair play for the people of my province. Industry and labour have been amply rewarded and provided for in this country. Many other producers in other provinces have been treated generously, and I plead for fair play for the producers of wheat. Why should the wheat farmer always be the forgotten man? Why should he be the beggar at the feast, if you will, the poor relation in the economy of Canada? I suggest that in the discussions of the agriculture committee the demands of this delegation be kept in mind with a view to bringing in a report implementing in every detail the requests of this delegation.

Mr. R. W. GLADSTONE (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to congratulate the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Gregory) upon his logical and enthusiastic support of the legislation before the house, having to do with the interests of the agricultural population of the great province of Saskatchewan as well as of the other two wheat producing provinces, Manitoba and Alberta. He has, however, interjected into his speech this evening one word, "secession", which should never be used by the representative of any province in this dominion. Even though we farmers of Ontario believe that in the past we have paid toll to manufacturers for the upbuilding of industry, and although western farmers have done the same, I am sure we shall be conscious to-day that we are reaping the benefits of what we then gave to industry, as we see Canadian mechanical transport going to Egypt and Libya, and our guns and shells being shipped to all parts of the world for the protection of that freedom which all of us love. Therefore I counsel all hon. members to think seriously, regardless of whence they come or what their interests may be, before using the word "secession" in this parliament.

We have entered the second week of a debate on three bills relating to the wheat situation. So far, I believe, thirty-seven hon. members have spoken, thirty of them from western Canada and seven from eastern Canada. Quite naturally the arguments of those from the west have been either in support of the bills now under consideration or in advocacy of something better than they contain. We expect, of course, that hon. members from the west will do everthing possible for the improvement of conditions in their chief industry. It may be said here that the attitude of hon. members from the east who have spoken has been one of sincere willingness to do anything they can for the improvement of agricultural conditions in the western provinces. They realize that there cannot be prosperity in their towns and cities unless there is prosperity on the farms.

It is my feeling that we eastern members would do well to make a keener study of agricultural conditions of both the east and the west. The notice of motion in the name of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) may be regarded as a beginning in that direction. Undoubtedly we eastern members should have a better understanding of what is going on in the west as well as a fuller appreciation of the situation of the small farmer in eastern Canada. The hon. member asks for a return showing:

1. The amounts paid from the consolidated revenue fund to farmers of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, since the year 1930, by years, on account of (a) direct per bushel bonus, (b) wheat acreage bonus, (c) wheat acreage reduction bonus, (d) prairie farm income bonus, (e) Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

2. The deficits sustained by the Canadian Wheat Board in each year since its establishment.

3. The total amounts paid since 1930 to farmers in Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, by way of, (a) wheat bonus, (b) hog production bonus, (c) cheese production bonus.

In the course of the present discussion the whole western agricultural situation, particularly with respect to wheat, and extending over many years, has been reviewed, and also the proposals affecting the 1942 and 1943 crop years. I do not wish to continue the discussion of the past or even the proposed legislation, but would rather direct my remarks toward the future of all agriculture throughout Canada in the new order that is to be.

Canada is an extremely difficult country to govern. In the long expanse stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific and far to the north we have great variations of climate, of physical contours, of resources, of conditions and circumstances, and correspondingly varying interests. It is a major problem of government to endeavour to harmonize all this diversity of interest.

The prosperity of any country, and most certainly of Canada, hinges on the creation of new wealth, which in turn depends upon the development of our resources of the farm, the forest, the sea and the mine. Here, as we all realize, is to be found the support for the upbuilding of our cities and towns and their industrial life.

We may recall the development of our eastern provinces. The pioneers came to these provinces, the French to Quebec and the English, Irish, Scotch and other nationalities to the maritimes and Ontario. They came with their families in those days when the only transportation was by means of sailing vessels. They came to the primeval forest and were supported for a time by the beneficence of settlers who had preceded them to the new land. But gradually they hewed out a place in the forest for their little cabin and clearing whereon they might produce some vegetables and grain. They expanded their clearing year by year; it became their home, and farming became their way of life. That has been the history of the development of these eastern provinces—the province of Quebec notably and likewise the province of Ontario.

The farm unit in Ontario has been largely 100 acres, and over a period of years there was until recent times a gradual betterment with the erection of fine buildings—houses and barns—and the making of a way of life wherein the 100-acre farm supported a family. As the years went along, more land was cleared and there came the need for implements to increase production. So, through invention and science, we had the perfection of some tools with which to carry on agriculture. This brought about the development of little manufacturing communities, and stage by stage, with greater development of the country, and then with the development of the western country, these industrial areas have grown larger and larger. The tendency has been for the manufacturing interests to congregate in certain cities, and the further tendency in these modern times has been for these industries to grow larger and larger until we have now reached the stage of enormous manufacturing and mass production —production where regrettably the machine is almost replacing the man, where a piece of iron goes into the machine and travels through the various processes of bending, shaping and riveting, without the human hand touching it and only some skilled supervision being necessary. It is, of course, a debatable question whether the introduction of these modern machines has resulted in the aggregate in lessened or increased employment of labour.

There has been a corresponding development in merchandising, where the small store, the corner grocery, has been replaced by the chain store. This no doubt has brought an improvement in certain phases of merchandising, but it has had its disadvantages, the disadvantage of ownership going to other cities and most certainly passing away from the man who had a personal interest in the development of his community. We have lost much of that good old-time civic spirit and responsibility that made for the development of our fine towns and cities in Ontario and in other parts of Canada. I would hope that this development of mass production in the factory and in merchandising may not spread into the realm of agriculture. It seems to me that our God-given heritage—these fertile fields—was intended primarily for the support of families of this great Canadian nation, and it is to be regretted if there is a tendency in legislation or otherwise to have the farm unit increased far in excess of any necessity for supporting a family.

The means of continuing the small farm unit are, of course, contingent on mixed agriculture. That is the backbone of the eastern provinces, and it is gratifying to know that in some of the western provinces, particularly in Manitoba and Alberta, there is a tendency toward mixed farming. Possibly in the great province of Saskatchewan it is necessary to farm on a large scale because certain sections are no doubt unsuitable for mixed farming. It is a question as to what direction government policy should take in the future in relation to these large-scale farm operations that extend to 2,000, 5,000 and 10,000 acre farms. As I have said, our unit in Ontario is 100 acres. I do not know what the corresponding unit of the mixed farm would be in the west, whether 320 acres or 640 acres; but most certainly I, as a member representing a rural constituency in the east, regret the tendency to the establishment of farms on a scale where very few people are supported on the land and where operations approximate more nearly the form of mass production carried on through the operation of wide-swathe machines, perhaps operated by absentee owners.

In the past it has been remarked that Canada is the granary of the world. Perhaps in days gone by we could look to such a prospect, but in recent years there have been changes. We have come into competition in world markets; we have come into competition with the United States, Australia, the Argentine, Russia and other nations, great growers of wheat. We have seen our market diminishing; and who can say that when this war is over, the days will return when we can feel that we have any assurance of a market for all the wheat we can produce? This being true, does it not behoove us to endeavour to organize our agriculture so that we may not be building up an enormous excess year after year but may be working out a system in the direction of smaller units and more diversification, spreading this as far as possible to the western provinces as well as Ontario and Quebec, to the end that the farm unit, whether 100 acres in Ontario or 640 acres, say in the west, may be the home and dwelling-place of a family. It would be regrettable if the tendency in our agriculture should be toward depopulating the rural areas and making them merely the site of operation of great power machines.

The difficulty relative to marketing is, as I have said, this competition with other nations. Our surplus wheat must be sold in the markets of the world. We have to compete with the Argentine where the wheat growing lands are close to the seaboard and therefore their transportation costs are much lower than ours, with our great distances from the prairies to the ocean. Therefore I venture to suggest this—it may not be within the realm of possibility at all—that when the victory is won and the day comes to settle the peace, those great wheat producing nations give some consideration to an endeavour to work out plans by which the land in all countries may become more and more a place of homes for the people. After all, surely the intention of the Almighty was that this land should be a place of prosperous and happy homes. I do not know whether it is possible, but it seems to me that this tendency to high-power machines cutting wide swathes across the land should be stopped. Perhaps this could be done by an agreement among all these great wheat producing countries. Far better to have a narrower machine cutting, say eight feet, which is only profitable to operate on a 640-acre farm, than the enormous high-powered machines that complete the whole operation in one day, suitable only for farms which operate on a large scale. If there is any tendency in Saskatchewan to establish 2,000-, 5,000-, and 10,000-acre farms, I think it is greatly to be regretted. I hope that when the peace is being formulated, the other nations will come to their senses and seek some means whereby land will be used for the purpose for which it was intended.

I wish to reiterate my desire to support any possible effort to improve western conditions during this time of emergency. The west has come through difficult times and must be supported. I agree that in a great measure at least wheat is a war casualty, and since we are spending money for so many things we must spend to assist that western country. But I again express the hope that some means may be found to stem the tide running in the direction of large-scale operations and that we may somehow get back to the utilization of the land as a place for homes, for families of good Canadian citizens.

Mr. R. T. GRAHAM (Swift Current): I rise solely for the purpose of adding a constructive and, I hope, a soothing note to the discussion concerning wheat and the wheat farming areas of Saskatchewan. I have listened with great interest to the contributions to this somewhat long debate, particularly perhaps those by hon. members from eastern Canada. Of their remarks I have no criticism whatever to offer; I think I fully appreciate their point of view. I have, however, had conversations with some of my friends on this side of the house who live in eastern Canada and have noted with some concern an attitude of mind that might be described, if it were a matter of war, almost as defeatism, or a sense of futility in approching the problems of the west, as we members from the west think it our duty to do. For instance, they suggest—and I have every sympathy with them—that the western wheat problem occupies too much of the time and attention of this house, in this and other sessions. Some suggest even that it might be better to abandon Saskatchewan, the great plains region—I speak of Saskatchewan simply because I am more familiar with it—as a self-supporting economy, to stop the drain on the dominion treasury and call the whole experiment a day. I use the word "experiment" advisedly, because that is the very point I wish to make to-night, that Canada has been watching and probably for some time will continue to watch the greatest of all national experiments in the attempt to build an agricultural economy which will maintain a reasonable Canadian standard of life in that great plains region. I wish for a few moments to review not only the history of that part of Canada, but to outline some constructive things that have been done to bring that experiment to a successful conclusion.

Hon. members have pointed out that in the Palliser triangle there are roughly a million Canadians, a million human beings who have all the desires and ambitions of Canadians in any other part of Canada. The hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Gregory) properly pointed out that it is a very cosmopolitan type that has settled on those prairies; and, as one of my eastern friends agreed with me to-night, I am sure those who happened to note the type of men who made up the delegation which came to Ottawa recently would readily agree that nowhere in Canada could a more stable or finer looking crowd of citizens be gathered together than those 400 men who came from the wind-swept province of Saskatchewan bent on making representations to the government. Is the policy we should pursue now one of defeatism, one that suggests the abandonment of that great experiment which we commenced not so long ago, almost within the lifetime of most of us in this house, when that Palliser triangle was opened up for settlement by hundreds of thousands of people who poured in there to reconstruct their lives and build new homes and new futures?

I must confess that as I listened the other day to the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. McNevin), I had to agree that there was a great deal of truth in his statement that the early days, or what he called the pioneer days, of western settlement were comparatively simple compared with the early days of the settlement of Ontario. There were no great stretches of forest to clear; there was no great preparation of the soil necessary. Nowhere, as the Sirois report points out, had any agricultural area of like size ever been developed and brought into such immense production in such a short time. But I would have hon. members recollect that the Sirois report points out one other truth; that until the time the great west was opened up for settlement, both Liberal and Conservative governments, despite the high hopes which were in the hearts of Canadians at the time of confederation, had been unable to get that confederation of the provinces started on the path to prosperity. In spite of every policy that was adopted, the machine seemingly refused to work. But when the west was opened up, it not only marked the opening of a great area, but also marked the commencement of an industrial period in eastern Canada. So, as you would expect, the two meshed together, one development resulting from the other development out on those open plains of the three prairie provinces, perhaps particularly the province of Saskatchewan. As another hon. member said to-night, immense wealth in the form of wheat and other grains poured out of those provinces. It has been said often that billions of dollars of wealth have been produced and made available to all Canada as a result of the farming operations of those provinces.

Those were the early days; but strangely enough, almost paradoxically, they were not the pioneer days of Saskatchewan's history. The pioneer days unfortunately came after some of the rosy hopes had faded, the hopes that this was a land of milk and honey, that money could be made easily and without any great effort, and that the prosperity which accompanied the opening up of that territory would continue as a matter of course. In fact it was not until 1929 or 1930 that the truth began to come home to the people of Saskatchewan, that they, too, like the pioneer people of Ontario, had real problems to solve before an economy could be found which would satisfy the needs of the country.

I do not propose to-night to touch on great national problems such as tariffs, freight rates, the financial concentrations in eastern Canada, and the impact of these policies upon the west. I wish for a few moments merely to deal with some of the practical problems which were found to exist in connection with that great experiment that we have been carrying on in the west. Drought, of course, has been the great factor in producing many of the problems that confront us, probably the greatest contributing factor to the results we have seen. Following the perhaps overenthusiastic expansion that took place, based as we know now on the too rosy hopes that were held, a great structure of debt grew up. Then the resultant adjustment had to be made, with loss to the eastern investor and terrific loss to owners of farm lands in the west.

But even in the matter of drought, by the use of science, by the study of atmospheric, climatic and soil conditions, we have made very considerable progress. Our experimental farm system has contributed greatly in this regard, in the development of types of wheat suited to particular climatic conditions. I need not relate these developments in detail. The discovery of marquis wheat was of itself a tremendous contribution to the solution of one of the problems of western Canada. But even apart from the development of proper cereals, methods of cultivation have been constantly studied and made the subject of experiment. Through the work of a fellow citizen of mine in Swift Current, Doctor Barnes, who unfortunately was called to his heavenly home before his work was completed, we learned a great deal of the truth that nature has locked up in the laws that apply to moisture conservation. So the system of summer-fallowing, of conserving moisture in the fallow, has been proceeded with, developed and encouraged in western agriculture.

In addition, the programme under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has been of tremendous help in conserving the water supply, both under the small dug-out schemes and under some of the comparatively large irrigation schemes which have been promoted under that legislation. Just before the house resumed this evening I spoke to one farmer who is visiting in Ottawa, and he was relating to me his own experience. Because of the scarcity of water in his particular area during certain seasons of the year he had to drive some fifteen miles to obtain water. It was brought to his attention under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act that there were possibilities in regard to a small reservoir, and that has solved the difficulty of water supply for him. In addition to the reservoir, in which he collects water by natural drainage, he was able to sink a well and obtain very fine drinking water, filtered by the processes of nature.

We have discussed many times in this house the great advantages that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has brought to an economy which periodically has been faced with drought periods that have had the result of leaving some people in dire circumstances. In addition, there has been carried on a thorough study of land utilization. In the early days undoubtedly a lack of knowledge of soil types in the west and a failure to appreciate climatic conditions resulted in certain areas being opened up which we know now never should have been developed for agricultural purposes. Soil surveys of the entire province of Saskatchewan have been completed, and there are now on record with the provincial government at Regina, and I suppose here at Ottawa as well, complete results of those surveys showing all the various types of soil which go to make up the huge area of that province. This is of tremendous value in determining the use that should be made of certain types of land. For some years now, under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, through the cooperation of the municipalities, the province and the dominion, land not suited to the growing of grain has been taken out of actual agricultural production and used for pasture purposes.

The development of such grasses as crested wheat-grass proved of immense benefit in developing the stability of fodder and feed crops in that area. I should like to point out that crested wheat-grass, like a great many other things introduced to western Canada, is the product of a country the climatic conditions of which are very much like those of our own. I refer to certain portions of eastern Russia, where experiments have been carried on in connection with agricultural problems—carried on not for the lifetime of a person, but for many centuries. So I say to the house that with the agencies of science, set in motion by the government, we are making real progress in at least minimizing the result of recurrent droughts which occur in Saskatchewan.

Rust was probably the next greatest factor in loss in connection with the crops of that province. All hon. members know that science again came to the rescue and evolved rust-resistant wheat. In fact, there are more than one of these types—Thatcher, Apex and Reward are fairly well resistant to rust. I do not believe anyone could compute the value of the discovery of those varieties of rust-resistant wheats in western Canada.

We all know, too, that we are faced with periodic visitations of grasshoppers. There again, entomologists, of the United States and Canada, acting in cooperation, feel certain that with full cooperation of the people in the adjoining states and provinces the grasshopper menace can be not only minimized but almost wholly met. That, too, is a great step toward solving the real problems confronting the farmers of western Canada.

Then, in connection with sawflies, in my own constituency, the dominion experimental farm has for several years been experimenting in the development of a wheat plant with a fairly solid stem which will resist the inroads of the sawfly. It has not yet, of course, reached a state of perfection, but I feel certain and those in charge of experiments assure me that, by the application of Mendel's law, by a continuation of the process of selection and development such a wheat plant can be developed, so that the sawfly menace will be greatly minimized. There has been no difficulty so far in obtaining a firm stemmed wheat; the difficulty has been to have that particular hybrid produce a wheat of a quality demanded of western Canada.

Problems connected with cutworms and wireworms, two very great causes of damage in Saskatchewan, have been under study for many years by experts of the husbandry branch of the dominion experimental stations. It is true that they have not yet found an easy or cheap solution to that problem, and yet I believe science will never give up the task of studying the cycle of life, or the moments of exposure when they can be attacked. I feel that in time those two costly infestations will have been greatly lessened.

The same observation would apply to soil drifting. The soil drifted, of course, after the years of drought during which time it was worked up so finely that the blowing process started, thereby causing great damage to many areas in Saskatchewan. Again, by methods of cultivation, particularly by that of strip-farming and by other means of working the soil in lumps rather than in fine particles, soil drift is gradually being overcome. Again the dominion authorities are playing a great part in seeing to it that any portion of a farm developing the danger of soil drift is immediately looked after, and that rye or crested grass wheat is sown on small portions. Drifting is like an epidemic; it spreads. By sowing these grasses, fibre is put back into the land, and damage to greater areas of farm property is prevented.

It will be noted that the difficulties with which western agriculture is being confronted are being tackled in a constructive manner, and that we are making real progress. We as Canadians, not only as persons from one particular province, should recognize that the million people in that Palliser tract are carrying on one of the greatest experiments in the history of Canada; because, after all, it is on the thousands of individual farms thoughout the province that the real experimental work is being carried on. The wisest of those in charge of our experimental stations readily agree that, despite all their knowledge, all their education and the thousands of experiments they conduct, the true solutions will most likely be found in the experiments carried on by the farmers themselves on the actual farms they are operating. Therefore I believe we would lose a sense of perspective if we were not patient and wise in our day. We must remember that this is a new country, and that it is unlikely we would solve all our difficulties in such a short space of time as the life of one generation. We can, however, hurry the process with the aid of science and that of government agencies. But I do not think we would be unwise enough for a moment to suggest that there is anything surprising in the fact that that great and vast territory has found itself confronted with difficulties, or to suggest that we should for one moment accept a policy of abandonment or of defeatism with regard to that great experiment.

The hon. member for The Battlefords has said that we should be appreciative of the difficulties that those Canadians are facing out west in that great experiment. I have no doubt at all that perhaps not in my lifetime, but in the lifetime at least of our children, or our children's children who come after us, that that portion of Canada will pay great dividends to the whole of this dominion.

On motion of Mr. Fraser (Peterborough West) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Michaud the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—MR. LACOMBE—REFERENCE TO LETTER IN "LE JOUR" OF MARCH 7

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Before the orders of the day are called I desire to rise to a question of privilege, and as the matter referred to is in a French paper I shall have to read it in French. It appears in Le Jour of Montreal, Saturday March 7, page 8:

(Translation)

A correspondent writes us as follows:

Are We Playing the Enemy's Game?

La Sarre, Que.,
Feb. 23, 1942.

Dear Mr. Harvey,

After reading in last week's newspapers the subamendments moved in the House of Commons by Mr. Liguori Lacombe and Mr. Jean François Pouliot respectively, it is my opinion that the manifest hypocrisy underlying these amendments is a most disquieting thing for our French-Canadian nation.

And this is the ending of the letter:

This propaganda is certainly of German inspiration and its only object is to create disunity in all allied countries by fostering either racial or religious strife. It seems to perpetuate itself under various forms and I think it is high time our fellow citizens should become aware of the grave danger it presents.

Léonidas Boisvert

I have only one word to say in this connection and that is that Mr. Jean Charles Harvey's patron saint, Voltaire, had adopted for a motto: "Lie and keep on lying, it is bound to bear some fruit." I might also apply to Messrs. Boisvert and Harvey the following quotation also taken from Voltaire: "Is there enough hellebore for so strange a malady?"

I protest energetically against insinuations of this nature and the only thing left for me to do is to mail a seidlitz powder to Mr. Léonidas Boisvert and the remainder of the box, to wit eleven powders, to Mr. Jean Charles Harvey who is eleven times sillier than Mr. Boisvert.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, one word on this question of privilege. Every newspaper with the exception of Le Jour refused to publish this bit of turpitude from the pen of Léonidas Boisvert of La Sarre. I vigorously protest against this accusation of disloyalty to my country, and I wish to say here and now that without giving undue publicity to Le Jour, this person shall be called upon to substantiate his charges before the courts.

WOOL

PRODUCTION, COMMANDEERING AND FIXING OF PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Yesterday I asked a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) or the minister responsible. It was thought possible that an answer might be given to-day either by the Minister of Finance or by the Minister of Munitions and Supply. The question had reference to the wool situation. I wonder if there is anything further on it.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): So far as I can determine, the action taken was taken by the wartime prices and trade board, certainly in respect of prices. I understand that my colleague has a statement on the matter, but as my hon. friend knows he is unavoidably absent at the moment. Perhaps the information can be given to-morrow.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASED RATE PER BUSHEL ON WHEAT DELIVERED BY PRODUCERS

The house resumed from Monday, March 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West) for the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Douglas (Weyburn).

Mr. HOMUTH: Might I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker? I understood very definitely last night from the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud), when the house adjourned, that it had been arranged to have certain other matters brought up first to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Bill No. 5 is in charge of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), who is at the moment on the Pacific coast, and by arrangement with all parties this morning it was decided to go on with this debate.

Mr. W. F. RICKARD (Durham): It is not my intention to delay the house on this bill; I shall take but a very few minutes. In fact, I had not intended speaking at all on this wheat legislation. As an Ontario member I was willing to accept the government's proposal as drafted in these bills and let it go at that. Having listened, however, to so much discussion during the last couple of weeks from members on all sides of the house, and more particularly to criticisms that have been made of this legislation by members of the opposition, and having taken part in previous debates on the subject, I feel that as an Ontario farmer I should say a few words.

Since coming to this house about seven years ago I have heard wheat, wheat, wheat for two or three weeks every session. We have talked so much about wheat that we are getting more confused than ever about it. It seems to me that hon. members from the west cannot themselves agree on what they want. The hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) said the other day that there are two schools of thought in the west so far as wheat policy is concerned. If I am any judge there are more like twenty-two schools of thought. But the difference between the two schools is found in the question whether we should pay so much an acre or so much a bushel. I can understand that for the big farmer who is growing thousands of bushels, so much a bushel may be preferable, but for the man who produces very little, perhaps through crop failure or some such cause, the other proposal is better; and I intend to support the bonus as proposed by the government.

We hear a good deal about this delegation of four hundred farmers that came to Ottawa, the implication being that they have to come here in delegations in order to get any consideration from the government; that they have to come and demand certain things to get anything done. Some of our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation friends express it by saying that the squeaking wheel gets the grease, the crying baby the milk, and all that sort of thing. I do not believe that is the position at all. I believe the government to-day are doing the very best they can to legislate for the benefit not only of the wheat growers but of all the farmers of Canada. And believe me, it is a big job. The Montreal Financial Times had a good editorial on March 13 in which the comment was made that "Ottawa boosts wheat price and east must grin and bear it." The editorial goes on to say that the west has been disappointed that the war has not solved the wheat problem. The bonus on coarse grains to encourage mixed farming is a situation full of paradoxes. The paradox is that we are asking the farmers to grow more wheat, and are taking more wheat from the farmers at a higher price, but we cannot sell it. So far as I am concerned I do not think this is anything to grin about, nor would I if I had my own way accept some of the things that have been suggested. But I have agreed to accept the increase in the price of wheat from 70 to 90 cents and the increase from 230 million to 280 millon bushels, for a commodity which at the present time we cannot sell.

The estimated surplus in Canada for this crop year will be 400 million bushels. The United States and the Argentine will have practically another billion bushels, so that there will be a surplus of available wheat of over one and a quarter billion bushels, enough to do us for two or three years if no more were grown. Someone will say of course that if the war should end soon we would have plenty of markets for our wheat. I agree; but it is not very likely that the war will end soon, and the chances are the government is going to have to pay out huge sums of money to carry this wheat until it is needed. I do not say it will not be needed; eventually I believe it will. But I believe the government has gone as far as it should in raising the price, especially in the face of the need for money for armaments, tanks, planes, guns, ships and implements of war. I think the west should be satisfied.

As an eastern farmer when I go home to my constituency or anywhere else in Ontario I hear the old story, "You can't satisfy the west, it makes no difference what you give them. Why don't the farmers of Ontario stand up and oppose this legislation for the west and do something for Ontario?" Well, we are willing to do what we can for the west. We have always taken that attitude. I think hon. members will agree that when I have spoken in this house, on almost every occasion I have upheld the policies submitted to help the west. I have not agreed with everything, but I think I have been at least reasonable. But our farmers say, "If you give the western farmers 90 cents for wheat, they want a dollar; if they are given a dollar, they want $1.25." That is the attitude the farmers of Ontario take to-day. All the farmers are bonused—we quite agree with that—not only in the west but in the whole of Canada. The government is spending from the end of July, 1941, to August 1, 1942, over $84 million on bonuses to farmers, of which over $62 million goes to the west. We have bonused coarse grains at $2 an acre, grass at $2 an acre, summer-fallow at $2 an acre—all these things. It makes the Ontario resident, not only the farmer but all Ontario citizens, wonder what we are doing or where we are going with this legislation. A new price is set for wheat, and there is some justification for it; but people compare that with the deficit of the Canadian National Railways, $50 million a year in recent years, and it is suggested that this wheat policy may cost the government $130 million. I am not going to argue whether that is right or wrong. I do not think anyone knows what it is going to cost, but I believe it will cost an enormous sum, considerably over the $50 million deficit of the Canadian National Railways in recent years.

The other day the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) said he thought the Ontario farmers were willing to accept dollar wheat; that they would accept anything that was reasonable if the west proposed it. I say right here that we are not accepting dollar wheat, and we are not accepting whatever the west proposes. We have problems of our own in Ontario; the west is not the only place that has a farm problem. We have the tobacco growers, the bean growers and others whose problems have been discussed by other hon. members—

An hon. MEMBER: The apple growers.

Mr. RICKARD: Yes, they have had no assistance of any account in Ontario. It has cost the government of this country very little for Ontario. Most of it has gone to the west and the east.

I have every sympathy for the west. I have visited the west; I have been all through the burnt-out areas in southern Saskatchewan, and I know the condition the people were in when I was there. I have every sympathy for them, and I am willing, as I said before, to support any legislation within reason to help them. But as Ontario members we cannot hand out everything to the west. Someone has said that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is from the west and therefore is naturally sympathetic with the western farmer. But I believe that the Minister of Agriculture to-day is doing the very best he can for all the farmers and all the people of Canada, regardless of east or west. More than that, I believe that in this measure he is trying to legislate for the small farmer more than for the man who has 10,000 or 20,000 or 50,000 or 100,000 bushels of wheat. This legislation will help the small farmer, and we are willing to accept it.

Someone has said, what about coarse grains? Well, it has cost the government about $6,000,000 for freight to bring coarse grains down to Ontario. Ontario farmers were glad to get them, yet many hon. members speaking here were opposed to the coarse grain provision. As it happened, this year we were short of feed in Ontario, and many farmers were glad to get coarse grain to feed hogs and cattle and to produce milk, butter and eggs. But those are things that are in demand; those are things we can sell. That is not the case with wheat. The farmers have played a very important part in this war effort, and I know they will continue to do so. The farmers are willing to contribute everything they have toward winning the war. If perhaps they do not get parity prices, they are willing to go on anyway; and I believe the west should adopt the same attitude. We do hope, however, to hear some expression of satisfaction from some section of the west. I predict that if this sort of thing goes on very much longer Ontario may become the depressed province, instead of Saskatchewan, because certainly the west is getting all the legislation for its benefit.

I am not going to take up any more time, Mr. Speaker. As I said at the outset, I had not intended to speak on this question; I had made up my mind to accept the proposals of the government. These bills are to be referred to a committee, where I think all bills concerning agricultural policy should be sent. There we will have ample opportunity to discuss every phase of these bills and, I hope, arrive at some decision that will be beneficial to the farmers of Canada as a whole. May I add that I intend to oppose the amendment and to vote for the main motion.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, since I am a member of the agriculture committee, to which these various bills are being referred, and since any changes to be made will in all probability be made during that stage of the proceedings, my remarks will be brief.

In passing I should like to make reference to some of the statements of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Rickard). I have no intention of entering into any controversy as between east and west; I deplore it when hon. members feel it necessary to raise that issue in this house. I must say to the hon. member, however, that if this agricultural policy for western Canada is costing eastern Canada money, let eastern Canada remember that from 1932 down to the present time we in the west have been penalized to the extent of around $90,000,000 a year in order to uphold the tariff and fiscal policies of the east. This year we are getting back just a little of what we have given eastern Canada.

So far as the amendment is concerned, I should think all hon. members of this house who have at heart the welfare of agriculture should support it. I am sorry that the majority of western Liberal members apparently feel obliged to vote against it because, as most of them have stated, of political reasons. I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) for having the courage of his convictions. This is not the first time he has found it necessary to vote against government measures in this house, and I am sure the people of his constituency must appreciate the fact that they are represented by a member who has sufficient courage to vote against the government when he feels they are not promoting the general welfare of the country.

Western people will very much regret the fact that this government has not seen fit to adopt the recommendations of the various farm organizations of this country who have asked for parity prices. The lowest price that has been submitted by any of these organizations I think is $1 per bushel. I remember that last year the Minister of Agriculture stated no farm organization had said what it considered to be a fair price. That is not the case this year. The lowest price mentioned was $1 per bushel, while some of the organizations asked for more. The price being paid the farmers of the United States is considerably higher than that, about $1.27, and the price that was paid the farmers of Australia back in 1940 also was considerably higher than the price we received then or will receive under this proposal. In 1940 the farmers of Australia received 3 shillings 6 pence a bushel at point of delivery. I know the Minister of Agriculture has said that this amounts to only 63 cents in Canadian funds, but the Australian farmers are not paid in Canadian funds. They are paid in Australian funds, and in Australia three and six is worth 84 cents. That will buy 84 cents' worth of Australian goods; it will pay 84 cents' worth of Australian taxes, and 84 cents' worth of Australian debt. The farmers of that country are not interested in whether or not that will buy only 63 cents' worth of Canadian goods. The price being paid in Australia to-day is three shillings per bushel, which is 73 cents in Australian funds; and again I use Australian rather than Canadian funds. It is true that in Canadian funds that is only 53 cents, but they are receiving not Canadian but Australian currency, in which it is equivalent to 73 cents a bushel.

It is up to the government to decide to what extent it is necessary to restrict the purchases of wheat. But in that regard we must keep in mind the fact that it is very necessary and essential to the welfare of the country that ample reserves of all kinds of foodstuffs shall be maintained wherever possible, so that when the enemy is driven out of the occupied countries those vast supplies may be made available to the people of those countries. That can be held out to them now to show what can be done. The last hon. member who spoke deplored the fact that we were building up these reserves. We should glory in the fact that we are able to do so, because that will be the greatest incentive to these occupied areas to hold out. While it is up to the government to decide to what extent purchases shall be restricted, I should say it is not up to the government to decide whether or not the farmers shall receive a parity price. I say that because it is a very direct obligation on this government to see that the farmers shall receive a parity price. Otherwise they will brand themselves as a bunch of hypocrites. All this talk about a new social order will become just so much blather. Of what use is it to subscribe to the declaration of principles known as the Atlantic charter unless we are prepared to put those same principles into operation within our own country? How can we hope to solve the problems of the world if we cannot even solve our own problems? Surely the first thing to do is to put our own house in order.

Several hon. members have referred to the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture at page 1211 of Hansard, as follows:

> We are taking every last dollar out of the treasury of Canada to deal with these problems which we feel it is safe to take at this present time.

That does not mean, of course, that the amount of money being made available for agriculture is all the money the government can get. The government can get all the money it needs for anything. That is not the point, and I do not think that was what the minister meant. I believe the minister meant that this was all the money the government could safely put into circulation without the danger of inflation. In other words, if they paid the farmers more than 90 cents a bushel at this time it would create such an effective demand against our production that it would divert a certain amount of goods from the war effort into channels of consumption. The government should be in the best position to know whether that argument is sound. Nevertheless, even if that statement be correct, the farmers still are entitled to a parity price. You could either reduce the prices of all commodities down to the level of wheat, or on the other hand you could increase the price of wheat so that it would be in line with the prices of other commodities. If there is a danger that by increasing the price of wheat we might bring about inflation in this country, then I would suggest to the government that the most logical way to take care of that question, in order that the farmer shall receive a parity price, would be to make up the difference between 90 cents a bushel and the parity price by an issue to the farmer of war savings certificates maturing after the war, so that such war savings certificates could not be used for present day consumption. This would provide a sinking fund to take care of any increase in a farmer's debts.

Mr. HOMUTH: What would the parity price be?

Mr. QUELCH: I would say the parity price would be a price to the farmer commensurate with the price he pays for other commodities.

Mr. HOMUTH: What would it be?

Mr. QUELCH: According to the Searle index, I believe it would be $1.20 a bushel.

Mr. LEADER: I understand it is $1.47.

Mr. HOMUTH: How do you figure it out?

Mr. QUELCH: It all depends upon what parity is based on. If parity is based on the 1913-14 level it will be different from the 1926 level. I do not believe the farmer would quarrel if we were to take the price of $1.20 a bushel, a price which has been stated by many organizations as a necessary one. The establishment of a parity price could easily be found out by reference to records in the bureau of statistics.

The minister has repeatedly stressed the point that a higher price for wheat does not help the man who does not raise wheat owing to a crop failure. Unfortunately the minister insists, I will not say deliberately—I do not know—upon confusing two entirely different problems, namely, the problem of a distressed industry and that of a distressed area. These are separate problems, and if the minister tries to deal with them as one he will bring greater confusion that we have had in the past.

The first of these, namely, a distressed industry—in this instance wheat growing—can be met only by paying the wheat growers a price based on the average cost of production. Some hon. members say, "What is the cost of raising wheat when you get only two bushels to an acre?" Well, any hon. member may try to offer an absurd argument, but when he uses an argument of that kind I suggest he is making himself absurd, not the argument. In such circumstances the cost of production would be based upon the average yield. If any land consistently produced wheat at a very low yield, it would naturally have to be taken out of production. Such a price would be based upon the average. As I said to the hon. member who interrupted me a moment ago, the price to the farmer should be commensurate with the price he pays for other commodities.

It is not necessary for me to quote statistics to prove these facts. So many statistics have already been put on record that if one were to attempt to read them it would make him dizzy. What will be the result if we fail to pay the farmer a price based upon the cost of production? We know that in the past fifteen years or so farmers have certainly had to accept prices much below that, with the result that a very large percentage of agriculture is to-day in a state of bankruptcy. We have built up tremendous debts. If we are going to continue to pay the farmer a price which is still below the cost of production, not only will he not be able to pay the debts he incurred in the past, but he will still further increase his current debts.

A few months ago I listened to a broadcast by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in which he urged farmers to put their farms on a sound basis and to pay off the debts they had incurred in the past. The wheat growers of Canada will not be in a position to do that unless they receive a price at least equivalent to the cost of production. And, mind you, that will meet only current costs; even that price will not make it possible for them to pay their past debts.

The minister has suggested that the bonus increases the price of wheat by 30 cents a bushel. That sounds all right if you can make people believe it; but we know it is a nonsensical argument, because only one of the three bonuses can in any shape or form be regarded as an increase in the price of wheat. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act merely takes care of low yield. After the amendment now on the order paper is passed a farmer will be able to get a bonus only if he raises less than eight bushels to the acre. In Alberta the average yield is eighteen bushels per acre. So that the majority of farmers will not benefit under that bonus and therefore will not receive any increase in price.

Next we have the wheat acreage reduction plan, which merely compensates the farmer for lost acreage. In the district in which I reside the land is of gumbo quality, and many of the farmers crop their land every year. Someone may say that that is wheat mining, that the land can only stand that for a limited number of years. Nevertheless that is the practice on that gumbo land, and they get good crops nearly every year. If they take a certain amount of land out of production to get the bonus, that bonus does not begin to compensate them for the loss in production of wheat, and it cannot possibly be considered as an increase in the price of all the wheat they raise.

The only bonus which in any shape or form may be considered as an increase in price for wheat, is the bonus of 75 cents, and that amounts to only a few cents a bushel. I insist therefore that the only way to take care of a distressed industry is by giving it a parity price. No bonus as paid to-day will take care of that situation.

I should like now to deal with distressed areas. The most logical way to deal with distressed areas would be by some form of crop insurance. It is true that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is a step in that direction. Hon. members in this group have consistently supported that measure, although we tried to amend it in certain respects. The fact remains however that the principle of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has always had our support. It is a very long way, however, from being satisfactory, and will still be unsatisfactory even if the amendment now before the agriculture committee is adopted.

For example, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act does not guarantee to the farmer, who may pay into that fund for twenty years, that if he has a crop failure he will get a single cent of compensation. That condition arises because the settlement is not on the individual basis, but rather on a township basis. The minister objects to the individual basis on the ground that it would in effect be subsidizing inefficiency. I believe that could easily be taken care of if we had a sound form of administration. Thoughout the west committee men should be elected by the farmers in each district to take care of the regulations under this measure. Unfortunately the men who are sent around as inspectors to-day apparently are appointed chiefly on the grounds of their political faith. I believe that is a fair statement; I know it is certainly true in my part of the country. About the only qualification a man has to have in order to be an inspector is to be a good Liberal, and to my mind that has been one of the chief weaknesses of the policies of the Minister of Agriculture in the past. Everything has been regarded by him from a political angle. Every opportunity has been taken to build up a political organization instead of developing a policy which would be of great value to the nation. I am not surprised that the prairie farm assistance organization has bogged down in Alberta—and it certainly has bogged down. Every hon. member from that province is receiving numbers of letters from farmers who say that in their localities there are still many who have not received their payments. The result of having this type of inspector has been the building up of a great deal of antagonism between the farmers and the inspectors, where a healthy spirit of cooperation should exist.

I know the minister is not pleased when we make comparisons between what is being done in Canada and in other countries. He upbraided the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) when he referred to the policy of the AAA. I should like however to quote from an address made by Mr. Evans, the administrator, before the national AAA conference at Washington in 1941. I suggest to the minister that instead of objecting to statements of this kind he should seek to find in them anything that is good in the administrations of other countries and see if it could not be helpful in solving the problems of this country. By way of drawing a comparison between the administration in the United States and the administration in this country, I quote from page 2 of this report as follows:

> Now, what are our assets? First, we have an administrative organization that deals directly and personally with more than six million farm families. It is an effective organization whose steadily increasing efficiency demonstrates on a grand scale that you can have democracy and efficiency too.

He puts that as the first asset under the AAA, this democratic organization.

> Second, we have the goodwill and respect of the bulk of farmers and of a considerable portion of the leaders of the people. True, we have made some enemies but we have made more friends. Strong friends and strong enemies are a mark of strength. Third, with the assistance of AAA and cooperating agencies, farmers are the best informed large group in America on national and international affairs. Fourth, we have the first large-scale example of a working economic democracy in the world. By economic democracy, I mean the right and the means whereby the individual has an opportunity to share in decisions which affect his economic welfare.

I am not suggesting that we have this condition in the west as the result of the policy of the Minister of Agriculture; all we have is a large political organization. On page 6 of the pamphlet in which the speech of Mr. Evans, the administrator of the AAA, is printed under date of January 29, 1942, appears the following:

In every county and community, our programme is run by farmer committee men elected by their neighbours. From the ranks of these 130,000 committee men, our state committees are appointed by the secretary of agriculture. Many of the men in administrative, policy forming positions in our department of agriculture are farmers who have come up through the ranks of our farm programme in these past eight or nine years.

For the nation, this investment in farm democracy is already paying dividends. Our whole farm production is now being geared to meet the increased needs of war—food for freedom, we call it—for ourselves and our allies.

Since last spring we have been operating on a basis of selective production.

Last April the secretary of agriculture called for an immediate expansion in hogs, dairy products, poultry, eggs and certain vegetables to meet our rising needs at home and for shipment to Great Britain. Later other commodities, such as soybeans and peanuts for oil, were added. Certain provisions of our programme were modified to encourage these increases. 130,000 AAA farmer committee men went to work to secure the needed production.

Another weakness of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is the fact that the returns to the farmer are altogether too low. Suppose we were to pay the farmer $1 for his wheat and then institute a system of crop insurance; if it were upon a blanket basis the farmer would not object in the least to paying as much as 5 per cent instead of the 1 per cent he pays at present in order to have a real crop insurance scheme. The Minister of Agriculture summarily dismisses the idea of crop insurance by saying that it would be ultra vires of the dominion. He knows that if the government of this country were really in favour of instituting a form of crop insurance they could overcome any constitutional difficulty. This is what happened in the case of unemployment insurance. They could cooperate with the provinces in order to get the necessary amendments put through.

I think it would be well to place on Hansard a brief summary of the crop insurance plan in operation to-day in the United States. This appeared in the Calgary Herald in February—I have forgotten the exact date. It reads as follows:

1. Farmers may insure either 50 or 75 per cent of their average yield against unavoidable hazards (not against neglect).

2. Insurance is written in terms of bushels. If a grower suffers loss he is entitled to receive from the reserve an indemnity which in terms of bushels is sufficient to bring his yield up to the insured amount.

[Mr. Quelch.]

3. Average yield is determined separately for each farm on the basis of its actual or approved yield history during the nine year base period covering 1930-38.

4. Premium rate is calculated separately for each farm.

5. County AAA committees calculated insurable yields and premium rates for all wheat farms.

6. Premium may be paid in warehouse receipts, cash or by executing an advance against future payments to be earned under AAA programmes.

7. To obtain insurance the grower fills out an application containing the information as to his intended plantings and pays the amount of wheat specified for premiums.

Of course if such a programme were adopted in Canada wheat could be turned over to the farmer to indemnify him for his loss, and that wheat would be turned in under his quota as set by the wheat board. I do hope the government will carefully consider this matter of crop insurance. The antagonism that exists in eastern Canada would be largely overcome if we could introduce some form of contributory crop insurance. I am not suggesting for one minute that you could obtain from the farmers enough to finance the plan, but you would at least have a plan under which every farmer who suffers loss would get some form of compensation, without any increase in cost to the federal treasury.

In closing I should like to make a few remarks about our general agricultural policy. For a number of years we have urged in this house that a long-term programme should be adopted, based upon international cooperation instead of international competition. We know that international competition can lead to one thing and one thing only, that is, international friction which leads to war. Furthermore, we must realize that it is useless for Canada to act alone. Last year Canada was able to bring about a substantial reduction in wheat production, but what happened? The other three major exporting nations increased their surpluses, so that in so far as the world surplus was concerned we were no beter off. This should be done on an international basis.

I remember the Minister of Agriculture telling the United Farmers of Alberta in January of last year that they should not increase their production of hogs, and yet within six months of that time we were told that we might have to ration our bacon and pork products.

Mr. GARDINER: France fell in the meantime.

Mr. QUELCH: There is always an excuse; the minister is always able to give an excuse for his policy.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not an excuse; it is a fact.

Mr. QUELCH: I suggest to the minister that if it had not been for her financial policy, France would not have fallen. That might not not have happened if they had completed the Maginot line.

Mr. GARDINER: I had nothing to do with that.

Mr. QUELCH: It is right in line with the policy maintained in this country, and the minister is a member of the government. If those in charge of the policies put into force from 1935 to 1939 had been the paid servants of Germany they could not have implemented a policy that would have been of greater benefit to that country.

To get back to my argument, a few years ago the farmers were urged to increase the weight of their turkeys, and about a year later they were actually penalized so much per pound for having their turkeys over weight. In the United States they have gone to even greater extremes. Perhaps the minister will like my criticizing the United States, since I have been praising them just now. He said that the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) should go out and praise this policy. I would say that our great mistake has been that instead of trying to increase the purchasing power of our people up to a point where it would create an effective demand for the production of the country, we have always tried to reduce our production to meet an inadequate buying power.

To summarize the whole policy of this government in respect to agriculture I am going to place on Hansard a little ode. I am not guilty of this sort of thing as a rule; in fact, I have never done it before, but I want to read it because it summarizes so well the policy both of this government and that of the United States. It is from the Saturday Evening Post, and is by Ogden Nash.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And dedicated to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, dedicated to the Minister of Agriculture. Here it is:

Higgledy piggledy, my black hen,
She lays eggs for gentlemen,
Gentlemen come every day
To count what my black hen doth lay,
If perchance she lays too many,
They fine my hen a pretty penny;
If perchance she fails to lay,
The gentlemen a bonus pay.

Mumbledy pumbledy, my red cow,
She's co-operating now,
At first she didn't understand
That milk production must be planned;
She didn't understand at first,
She either had to plan or burst,
But now the government reports
She's giving pints instead of quarts.

Fiddle-de-dee, my next-door neighbours,
They are giggling at their labours.
First they plant the tiny seed,
Then they water, then they weed,
Then they hoe and prune and lop,
Then they raise a record crop,
Then they laugh their sides asunder,
And plow the whole kaboodle under.

Abracadabra, thus we learn
The more you create, the less you earn,
The less you earn, the more you're given,
The less you lead, the more you're driven,
The more destroyed, the more they feed,
The more you pay, the more they need,
The more you earn, the less you keep,
And now I lay me down to sleep.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this debate on wheat is a hardy annual. Ever since I can remember, it has been one of the most important topics that has been before the house and dealt with by parliament. I must say that the legislation brought down in this bill, No. 13, is the most attenuated form of legislation dealing with wheat that I have ever seen. I shall have something to say about that a little later, when I come to refer to the orders in council which were passed about the time the minister moved the second reading of this bill.

It is a matter of some satisfaction to me to know that the policy of establishing a wheat board laid down and put into effect in 1935 by the government of which I was a member is, in its broad aspects, the basis of the policy under which the present government has been operating since this war began. And this notwithstanding the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite in 1935, when, afraid to make a frontal attack, they under the leadership and direction of the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), then the financial critic of the opposition, made every kind of flank attack it was possible to make. What followed is a matter of history. I referred in the speech which I made on the first day of August, 1940, on the second reading of the bill then before the house to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, to the disasters which followed the ineptitude of government policy, especially in relation to the handling of the 1938-39 wheat crop, when the treasury and the farmers of Canada suffered severe loss, and to the fire sale of good Canadian wheat held at the instance of the government, when we sustained a loss of millions of dollars which might and should have been avoided.

Time is a great healer, and in the position we occupy to-day it has brought about some vindication of the position taken in 1935. I desire only at this time to refer to the advice I then gave the government, that "not one kernel of this wheat should be destroyed. It may be needed by suffering humanity before this war is over."

In his speech on the second reading of this bill the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) emphasized the difficulties encountered over a period of ten years by the dominion government in dealing with this problem. This proves that the problem is not primarily a war problem but one of long standing. He laid down the principle that it was possible to decide upon each year's programme only after weighing all factors capable of measurement or accurate appraisal. This means that the government believes it is not possible to lay down a wheat policy for the duration of the war. From that view I respectfully dissent.

It seems to me that if we are to know where we are going, if our wheat producers are to plan intelligently, instead of awaiting anxiously each year an announcement of government policy, the government should if possible lay down a policy visualizing the war period, with no very material changes as regards marketing abroad in sight. This in order that the wheat producers, the persons most affected materially, may be in a position to know what they can count on, what they can do, and then can plan accordingly—that is, if they are to continue producing wheat, even with production reduced. We now know all the factors except the volume of the new crop each year, and the duration of the war.

Just at this point and in this connection, there would appear to me to be one fundamental consideration. During the period of the war the purchase of 280 million bushels annually would appear to be an economic necessity if the farmers of the west are not to be compelled to go on relief. If in any year the surplus on hand at the end of the crop year falls below the amount of 400 million bushels, additional wheat could be bought to bring the surplus up to that figure. But any quantity over and above the amount of 280 million bushels should be produced only at the risk of the producer and without obligation on the part of the board to purchase.

Frankly I think the minister will find that the farmer is not satisfied with the price of 90 cents f.o.b. Fort William. It is a compromise. The price structure thus established is not to be confused with grants under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which are in an entirely different category and made on a different principle. The established price does not bear any relation to the grants under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act except in one respect, that is, the gross income of the prairie farmer.

Before entering upon a general discussion of the bill I should like to make some reference to the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) on the tenth instant, arising out of the amendment to the bill proposed by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) and now before the house.

The minister, with his usual adroitness, attempted to show that in every line of major agricultural production except wheat there exists to-day parity of prices. That may be true in part, but if so, it is only of very recent occurrence and was not true either in whole or even in part a year ago. It was not true in April, 1941, when the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) moved his resolution for parity of prices on a motion of the Minister of Finance to go into supply. On that occasion every member of this house supporting the Liberal party voted against the principle of parity prices, a principle which the minister now seeks to convince the house is the policy of this government. But with respect to wheat, the minister had no case, and admitted it. In fact, he said there was no parity but that the price would be brought up to parity as soon as financial conditions warranted. Having regard to the way in which the government has wasted money on certain activities—one and a quarter million dollars for the plebiscite, and others I could mention—it occurs to me that the minister's plea for delay was entirely beside the mark.

The minister is a past master at special pleading. His defence against the amendment was in effect what we old common law lawyers call a plea of confession and avoidance. He admits the allegation in the declaration and then seeks to avoid the consequences by suggesting that we wait and see what will happen another session. It was clever, but to me it was not convincing. The minister made much of the assistance rendered to the western farmer under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and sought to convey the impression that the grants under that act were in effect an additional price for wheat to the producer. I do not so interpret the principle of that act. It is in my view in essence a relief measure. We have not opposed that principle, but we have endeavoured to show that the cost of administration is abnormally high, that the staff constitutes a huge political machine, and in its incidence it is inequitable.

I suggest to the minister that the true principle upon which it should operate is that individual necessity resulting from loss of crop, compensated for by the act, should be cared for on the basis of each individual need rather than by blanket legislation administered by a political machine. The result has been that considerable payments have been made to individuals who should be carrying themselves instead of drawing upon public funds needed for war purposes. I am informed that this legislation gives public money to some individual farmers who are in a position to carry on out of their own resources. The same applies in some instances to the provisions of last year's grants for summer-fallow, under which some large farm operators have been paid for following farming practices which good husbandry requires that they should do anyway and which they are well able to do.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) predicated his remarks on five major factors which he said had to be considered. He itemized these on March 9 on page 1120 of Hansard. Some of them are of major importance and some are not. He dealt with the carryover, the well-being of the economy of the prairie provinces as well as of Canada as a whole, the extent to which the dominion government could act in respect of the wheat problem, without detracting from our immediate objectives in respect of the war —this is always a cloak of government policy— and then export markets, and so on. There is a further major consideration to which the minister did not refer, and it is this: that in arriving at a decision to raise the initial price from 70 to 90 cents, regard had to be given to the policy of the government with respect to the maintenance of the price ceiling structure.

That you cannot have your cake and eat it too is a trite saying, but the principle is involved in this matter. I can imagine the controversy in the cabinet between those who wanted to maintain the price ceiling structure on, say, bread, and those who, for various reasons, both economic and political, advocated a higher price for wheat. In this connection may I refer to an article sent out by the Star syndicate early this month to certain newspapers across Canada, in which the following appears:

On the one hand Hon. J. G. Gardiner and the block of 15 Liberal Saskatchewan members have been exerting pressure on the government which savors of an ultimatum. It is known that the Saskatchewan members have discussed crossing the floor of the Commons to the opposition benches and that word of this probability has been communicated to the cabinet.

On the other hand, determined to maintain the price ceiling, Donald Gordon, chairman of the wartime prices board, is standing firmly against any boost in price of wheat just now. There has been talk of Mr. Gardiner resigning unless something is done, and of Mr. Gordon relinquishing his post if the prairie demand is met.

I shall not comment further.

It should be distinctly understood that a policy of a parity price for wheat should be for the duration of the war only and for a reasonable time thereafter. When that time comes, the whole policy should be thoroughly reviewed and overhauled. This country, an agricultural country, cannot go on indefinitely with a bonus policy. It is uneconomic and unsound, and, in the minds of many thoughtful agriculturists, would be doing a distinct disservice to agriculture itself.

To-day there are many forms of agriculture which are receiving no assistance whatever. I instance the potato industry in my own province, which has not received any assistance and which has passed through a very trying time in recent years.

The picture painted by the minister of our carryover is not too bright. As at February 1, according to information which I have from the Monthly Wheat Review, the visible supply available for export was 535 million bushels. What is the estimate of export from now till the end of the crop year? Twenty million bushels per month? This is very doubtful in view of the submarine menace. The Canadian carryover may reach 450 million bushels. Certainly it will not be less than 400 million bushels. The United States carryover is estimated at not less than 600 million bushels, and it may be more. The United States and Canada together will have at least 1,050 million bushels between them, and perhaps much more. The Argentine and Australia have a carryover of from 300 million to 400 million bushels, or a grand total of say 1,400 million bushels as a minimum.

I suggest to the house and to the country that that is not an attractive outlook for the immediate future having regard to the severe restrictions on export and lack of available markets. Notwithstanding all this I think it is the part of wisdom that Canada should continue to produce wheat in such quantities as will ensure a reservoir of food for domestic purposes, for use by the people of Britain and against the time which will surely come when it will be required for the starving peoples of Europe, provided of course—and I put in this proviso—that the surplus in this country should not exceed that now on hand.

In this connection may I ask the Minister of Agriculture and his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce if they and the government have been exploring the possibility of contributing to a general international reservoir of food supplies? This question was raised recently by the Vice-President of the United States, Mr. Henry A. Wallace, himself an authority, and it is well he did so; for a general reservoir of foodstuffs is going to be required in this war-ridden world, and in such a reservoir there is no one commodity of more general or better use than wheat.

In considering this question of carryover it must be borne in mind that both the United States and Canada will, by August next, have new harvests on their hands; and that is an important factor. The western farmer is prepared to reduce his wheat acreage provided he is paid an economic price for his products. But with reduced production he must have an economic return for what he does produce.

I suggest further that it is sound economic policy that the western farmer should not produce more than can be marketed for export and domestic consumption. But if he is to be kept on the land he must be paid a price that will permit him to maintain himself, and 90 cents, with reduced production and with quota restrictions, would appear to me to be too low. And mark this: the farmer's costs have been going up and will go up all the time, price ceiling or no price ceiling, and the labour shortage at the next harvest will again increase his costs.

We in this house should also realize that the real wheat area in western Canada is not suitable for mixed farming—at least I have come to that conclusion after having seen it—and that there are large areas in the west which must depend on wheat and wheat alone. I am prepared to accept that position; I think Canada should accept it. To me it appears almost wicked to reduce production of first class foodstuffs when it is known that so many millions are starving and will starve before this long war is over.

These are two points of view. But we must be realistic. We know that our production cannot be delivered to these starving millions. We must also be realistic, knowing that the war has not been the cause of these carryovers. We had them long before the war; they are attributable in part to pre-war economic policies of continental Europe and in part to the ineptitude of this government in handling the problem in the years immediately preceding the war. Even if peace had prevailed we should have had an enormous surplus of wheat in Canada. The war did not cause the wheat problem of 1938 or 1939; we had it then because of the policy of this country at that time, or rather the lack of any realistic policy. Therefore I think we should decide to carry the surplus now in sight, but should not permit it to increase beyond its present or anticipated level; and we should have some control of production and a higher price for what is needed for home use and export.

When the wheat board was set up in 1935 the initial price was fixed by the Bennett government at 87½ cents a bushel f.o.b. Fort William. We are only now approaching that price; and that was at a time when the cost of production was much less than it is to-day. The 1942 crop may be below normal, and we may be able to afford to take some chances on a decrease rather than have an increase above our present load of carryover. The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) referred to that possibility yesterday, judging from moisture conditions in the west last fall. That may be. We may be able to gamble something on that. But this country should decide to produce only sufficient for domestic use plus a reasonable amount for export, which the minister and the government have placed at 280 million bushels, if I understand it correctly. In any event this year's crop should not exceed 300 million bushels; that would appear to be ample and more than ample.

Here I pause to ask the minister, in connection with the export trade, whether he is aware that the United Kingdom are taking steps to increase production on their own soil this year, and whether he is aware, as of course he must be, that the government of the United Kingdom is taking steps to decrease the consumption of wheat flour? These are matters which cannot be ignored.

I pass now to another subject. We should not visualize a policy of production of wheat in order that it may be fed to hogs, because barley and oats are a cheaper crop and a more satisfactory feed. In passing I should like to raise another question which I believe is giving some concern in certain quarters. I ask the ministers, what has been done by the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce about conserving seed barley and seed oats? It has been reported to me that a dominion government representative visited the prairie provinces at least three months ago to inquire into the position of seed barley and oats; it is understood that these seeds are scarce, and nothing appears to have been done about it. Perhaps the ministers will enlighten us on that point.

I offer this suggestion. The acreage of these feed grains should be increased to offset the reduction in wheat acreage. The policy enunciated by the Minister of Agriculture would appear to encompass that policy. The only solution from the standpoint of the western farmer therefore seems to be to reduce the wheat acreage materially and increase the acreage of oats and barley. This involves the payment to the wheat farmer of a sufficiently high price to give him a fair return, and it is represented to me that at least $1 at the country elevators would not be any more than ample.

Encourage increased acreage of barley and oats, and build up farm stocks of these feeds in order to increase, within reasonable limits, hog and dairy production. These, as well as wheat, are the foods that the millions suffering and dying from malnutrition will want as soon as possible after the sea lanes are opened. People in starving Europe cannot live on starch alone. They have to have other foods as well.

The weakness of the present policy is that it is not based on any long term plan. It is a piecemeal policy. That seeems to have been the position ever since the war began. If you visualize the 1940 policy, the 1941 policy and now this 1942 policy you will see it is and has been merely a piecemeal policy, not based on any general principle but designed to meet only a temporary situation and to yield, grudgingly though it may be, to the demands of the western wheat farmer. My understanding is that the government's firm policy was to fix the price at 70 cents plus a bonus, and that, as I understand it, would have been in conformity with the price ceiling policy.

The wheat farmer, I am told, does not like the bonus. He looks upon it as a handout or charity, and as he is a self-respecting man no one can blame him. He wants, and rightly so, something like a parity price for his product. He wants to be treated as nearly as may be on the same principle as labour and industry are being treated by the government during this war. But, I ask you, is he? I think the answer is obvious. There is ample evidence in the proceedings of this parliament alone that the government's policy was a low initial price plus a bonus.

How can the government pay the farmer $1 or even 90 cents for wheat and maintain the price ceiling? I put that question to the minister. The answer would appear to be that it cannot be done without either raising the price of bread or handing out a bonus to someone on the way down, either the miller or the baker. Apparently the government, being on the horns of a dilemma, has chosen the latter course. When the Prime Minister announced the price ceiling policy last autumn with such a flourish of trumpets it was stated definitely that it would be maintained at all costs. The price ceiling was announced at a time when the price level was uneven, especially so with respect to wheat and certain other farm products.

I know it was so with respect to the farm products of New Brunswick, potatoes and hay. A ceiling was put on hay based on the price between a certain date in September and a certain date in October, just after the new crop had come in, when every year so far as I can remember hay is at its lowest peak. Was that fair to the hay farmers of the Saint John valley? No attempt was made to arrive at a fair and uniform price structure before the plan was put into effect. This left so many inequalities that every month since the Prime Minister made his announcement there have been alterations in the ceiling, generally upward.

What does this mean? It means that the whole scheme has been a system of trial and error, not based on any principle. It was announced as a means of preventing inflation. Well and good; but its effect has been to freeze wages, with the cost of living bonus a sop to labour. The people who had to suffer most were the primary producers, and in particular the producers of foodstuffs, of whom the chief was the wheat farmer. He has been the chief sufferer.

I raise this question at this point: Was any consideration given to the price of wheat when the ceiling price policy was put into effect last autumn; and if not, why not?

Mr. GARDINER: The Prime Minister said so, in his statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, then, what consideration was given to it? They did not fix a fair even price. In the struggle to prevent inflation, in the attempt to freeze wages, why was not consideration given in setting up this national price plan to fixing a parity price for wheat, or something approaching a parity price? It could have been done much more easily then than now. Had it been done at that time I am convinced that the western farmer would have had $1 wheat, and there would have been no great storm over it in eastern Canada, either. It would have been relatively easy to do it then, and the consequent adjustments could have been made without any great disturbance. But the mechanics of the situation have been reversed, in an effort to get what the western farmer thinks is only justice, having regard to the position of the wage-earners and industrialists of Canada. That was one reason why the Saskatchewan farmers came to Ottawa early this session and presented their case. I have never understood, Mr. Speaker, the criticism that has been directed from some quarters against those gentlemen coming down to Ottawa on that pilgrimage. As I view it, their whole future is at stake, and surely it is their right to carry their grievances to the foot of the throne, like any other subject.

It must be borne in mind that while the price of 90 cents for wheat announced by the minister represents a floor, it is in effect a ceiling too. The farmers of western Canada should not be led to expect very much spread between this floor and a ceiling; in my view there is no spread at all. You cannot operate a national price structure such as we are attempting to operate in Canada, and leave certain important commodities, such as wheat, to run wild. If there is much likelihood of an upward trend in the open market, what will happen? The grain exchange will have to be closed, as it was in the last war. This statement, of course, is predicated upon the assumption that a rigid price structure is to prevail.

Now, presumptuous as it may seem, I have a word to say to all the farmers of Canada, and it is this: that in this war period they should avail themselves of the opportunity to inform themselves fully with respect to a national price plan and what its effect is and will be upon them. I assert that they are now pinned under such a plan. The basis and objective of that plan at the moment is to help beat Hitler. But if we are to have a planned economy after the war; if we are to have a national plan fixing prices, such as our friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation are urging should be put into effect after the war, is it not likely that among the problems, all much less urgent than the war, the most pressing and urgent would be those of employment in large centres and problems arising out of the pressure of organized labour, concentrated industries and other like situations; and would not the farmers of Canada generally find themselves out on a limb, as the wheat farmers of the west find themselves to-day? There is some food for thought in these questions for those who are considering a planned economy after this war, and I offer them on the theory and in the hope that they will provoke thought and discussion in this house and elsewhere.

If we are to maintain the economic unity of Canada we must not only be sympathetic to the position of the western wheat farmer; we must be practical and realistic, and help him. He has made a wonderful contribution to the upbuilding of Canada in the good days of other years; I have always recognized that since I have known anything about the situation. And he will, I feel sure, if given the opportunity, continue to build up and strengthen the economy of this nation. I believe he has the will to do, and I have spoken with many farmers; but in these trying times he must be assisted. The question is one of ways and means. Eastern Canada, industrial Canada, has much to gain by supporting him, and conversely much to lose if he fails. I believe eastern Canada will take the long view and will support him.

In this connection it is very interesting to observe the reaction of eastern Canada to the increased initial price announced by the government. I am going to give only one citation, though I could give many. There are people in this house, some of my hon. friends to the left, and I have heard it from hon. gentlemen opposite as well, who in speaking of the Montreal Gazette commonly credit that journal with being the mouthpiece of the so-called big interests of Canada. In a leading editorial in its issue of March 11, under the caption "More Help for the West" the Gazette had this to say, and I am going to ask hon. gentlemen to listen:

> The new measures adopted by the government for the benefit of western agriculture must not be judged from any narrow point of view. If production in the prairie provinces—better balanced due to this and earlier legislation—means a greater national war contribution, that fact alone will go far in justifying steps which under normal conditions might be open to serious criticism. There can be no doubt now that agriculture, not in the Canadian west only but in every part of North America, has an important part to play in feeding allied nations overseas which are no longer in a position to meet their own requirements. This was stressed Monday night by President Roosevelt, Vice-President Wallace and Secretary of Agriculture Claude Wickard, speaking on the anniversary of the national farm programme. Mr. Wickard said then that from accumulated stocks under this programme the United States had been able to send as much as 1,200,000 long tons of food under lend-lease in the period between last spring and February 1, this year, foods without which "it is unlikely that Britain could have withstood the battering which she has received at the hands of the enemy."

And a little further on:

> It was axiomatic in peace time that good times in the west meant good times everywhere in Canada. The eastern industrial areas benefited directly from any enlarged western purchasing power and the benefit reached into all business and professional fields.

That does not look like antagonism. It is an evidence of enlightened opinion in the east, and I commend it to those who are always harping on the alleged attitude of eastern Canada toward western agricultural problems, and who for some ulterior motive endeavour to set east against west and west against east. Let us have an end of that.

It has been emphasized all through western Canada, as well as in the east, that when the Saskatchewan delegation came east there was no compromise which would be acceptable and that what they urged was the minimum with which they would be satisfied and could carry on. It is now quite plain that what is offered is a compromise between two conflicting views. The government was confronted on the one hand with these demands for increased price, and on the other with the necessity of maintaining its own policy of price ceilings, and after much travail and change of policy this compromise emerged. Like most compromises, it is not likely to please anyone—or, at least, very few. It is better than a fixed low price plus a bonus, but it falls short of what is required.

Unquestionably the government had decided on a policy of a fixed price of 70 cents, or thereabouts, plus a bonus. This was indicated by the resolution as first placed on the order paper. But this met with such opposition that it was changed, after what must have been an ultimatum to the government. The change of policy resulted in a compromise.

The principle of maintaining the price ceiling is almost sacred to the Prime Minister and his government. To try to find a formula which would give the wheat growers more money and at the same time not violate that sacred principle has no doubt been difficult, and the result is exactly what was expected by intelligent onlookers. We have a compromise which will not please anybody.

I should like to emphasize the idea that whatever loss is incurred in connection with the raising of the initial price of wheat should be considered a contribution of the Canadian people. The additional difference between 70-cent wheat and a parity price for wheat is a loss which heretofore has been imposed on the wheat producer. That should not be.

If we are to concede the principle of a parity price for wheat, as may be inferred from the speech of the Minister of Agriculture—when the time comes—then it should be contributed by all the people of Canada and not by the producers themselves, or by any limited class of our population, unless, of course, it can be demonstrated—and this is an overriding proviso—that the spread between the cost of the ingredient and labour on the one hand and the price of bread on the other is so great that it may be absorbed in that quarter. The committee on agriculture, to which the bill is to be referred, should examine those costs and let the people know just what the spread is; and if there is a disparity, it should recommend measures to correct the position.

We shall support the amendment because it is in conformity with the principles we espoused a year ago and which the government rejected. We support it on the theory of war necessity.

This bill and its companion bills 12 and 14 had their first reading on the 6th of March and following days.

On March 5 the governor in council, while parliament was in session and while the bills were in the resolution stage, passed P.C. 1636, under the authority of the War Measures Act, prohibiting the removal of flax from any elevator or mill in Canada without the authority of the wheat board. This was an emergency measure. I do not criticize it, because I deem it a proper use of the power vested in the executive. It had to be done promptly. But listen to this: On the 9th of March, the very day the minister moved the second reading of Bill No. 13, there were passed on his recommendation four orders in council, P.C. 1800, 1801, 1802 and 1803. These orders were laid on the table only yesterday. They give the widest possible powers to the wheat board, over and above those contained in the Canadian Wheat Board Act itself—powers never contemplated by the act; powers which in most instances should be the subject of legislation, if required, and which should have been incorporated in the bill at present before the house. These measures are not merely administrative. I have read them carefully; they are in part legislative enactments. I protest against this procedure. Once more parliament and this House of Commons is treated with contempt.

How different was the position in 1935 when the legislation was set up. The present Minister of National Defence, then the mouthpiece for the grain exchange and the other big interests from Winnipeg—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh yes, we saw them here; I know what went on—being unwilling to strike at the principle of the measure, or being fearful of the results of opposition to the principle, demanded that the bill go to a select committee, and then insisted that certain substantive portions of the measure should be inserted in the measure itself. That was quite proper and was quite properly agreed to, and that was done. What is the position to-day? Here we have a bill of two short sections effecting a change of two words in the act—that is all; read it for yourself—while by order in council the minister is enacting additional measures and giving to the board vastly increased powers behind the back of parliament while in actual session. That is not straining the position; it is the truth. What a travesty on parliamentary government! There can be no excuse for this; it is a flouting of parliament.

I shall not enter into a detailed discussion of these orders in council; it would take too long. But I ask hon. members to read them. They are numbers 1800, 1801, 1802 and 1803 passed on March 9, and laid on the table only yesterday. Anyone may see them. I ask the members of the standing committee on agriculture to examine them with care. I know it will be said that the powers are limited to a year, and a year only from the first day of August next. Well, whoever thought that we could not limit the operative period of legislation in a bill introduced in parliament? The answer that they are temporary measures is a stupid answer; it is not an answer at all. It does not alter the principle for which I am contending. We can enact for a year, if we wish; and there was no need of haste, because they do not come into effect until August 1 next.

The powers of the wheat board are now to be almost unlimited; and what do we know of the operations of this board? We do know they are a government agency operating a huge business, but the light of day is not let in on their operations. We do know they are piling up a huge liability for this country without any control or say by the people's representatives.

If the house will bear with me I propose for a few moments to analyse in detail some of the operations of the board. The Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, was in the most explicit terms restricted to the buying of wheat from producers only; to pay producers in cash, and to hold the producer's warehouse receipt until an outright sale of the wheat was made. That was fairly simple and very logical. The whole intention of the act was to get the wheat into consumption channels, to the exporters and millers, and it was to do so through established open market trading facilities. It was to sell to real merchandisers, and the wheat was to be sold outright. When a sale was made it was not to be made to a warehouseman. If the board were to hold the producer's wheat beyond fifteen days, the board would pay storage until such time as a sale was made, but once the sale was made the board was to be clear of all further commitments and all storage and other like charges were to be received from the merchant who had bought and owned the grain. I refer hon. members in particular to subsection (b) of section 7 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Let me give the house and the country an example of a buying and selling transaction by the board, as I think all of us understood the function of the board at the time the act was passed. I am told that to operate a country elevator costs about $1,200 a year. This includes operating costs, repairs, upkeep, et cetera. In normal times elevators at country points do not earn storage, and terminal elevators east of lake Superior had, in the past, hardly counted on storage in any substantial way. The terminal elevator earnings were predicated on the handling of grain in large volume. In point of fact, to obtain volume they frequently waived storage charges or fixed them at small rates of one-eighth to one-fourth of a cent per bushel. The country elevator man who receives the grain direct from the farmer, having quite limited possibilities of turnover, is paid a substantial handling charge, I believe of 2¾ cents per bushel.

As the act was intended to operate, the board's transaction would take this form. It would appoint a local elevator to receive the farmer's wheat on its behalf, pay the farmer the fixed price and hold the warehouse receipt as the agent of the board. If a sale were not made within fifteen days, the board would then become responsible for storage until such time as a sale was made. Once a sale was made, however, the board had nothing further to do with that particular quantity of wheat. The merchant or the miller who bought it was to be responsible for all subsequent charges and had to provide his own price insurance as well. I am sure that the term "price insurance" is well understood by the western members. This merchant provided his price insurance by making a sale of the wheat deliverable at the next futures closing date and at a price sufficiently increased to cover his commission and expenses to that advanced date.

At this point I should like to emphasize that it was just such transactions as these which demonstrated the usefulness of the grain exchange. If anyone wants to elaborate on that, let him read the Stamp report. Skill and resourcefulness on the part of the man on the trading floor was what these merchandisers had to count on in order to make a profit; instead of being in the red, at the time when the grain exchange was on its own, so to speak, and before it became a mere shadow of the Canadian wheat board, as I shall describe it later to be. I am one who believes that the Winnipeg grain exchange served a useful function in normal times, and I still believe that it can serve a useful function if it is left in a position to operate in such a way that resourcefulness and alertness count, where the living of the man on the floor depends upon his skill rather than upon his relationship to the board or to the government that directs the board's policy.

Let me give you now an example of how this board operated under the chairmanship of Mr. Murray, and how it still operates. I ask hon. gentlemen to be good enough to follow me through this intricate transaction. In the first transaction, that is, the buying of the producer's wheat, there is no substantial difference, but it is in the taking of the next step that the act has been violated and the board permitted to operate illegally. I have no doubt about the justification for that statement.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Illegal?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sure that what the board is now doing is illegal. It is against the whole spirit of the act and I believe that if it were submitted to the courts of justice it would be found to be against the letter of the act. When the board now makes a sale of the producer's wheat, instead of making it to a merchandiser who will be responsible for the wheat which he buys, the board buys back the wheat for delivery to the board at the next futures closing date. In reality it is not a sale at all. I would not even call it a wash sale. Generally it is made to an elevator company and since the spreads between one futures closing date and another are fixed and well understood, it is a mere matter of bookkeeping so far as these operations are concerned. There is no change in the position of the wheat, no risk is involved, no money passes and no skill is required for the transaction.

An hon. MEMBER: Commissions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am coming to the question of commissions quite soon. Let me emphasize this feature of the present board's modus operandi. Let us assume that the farmer has sold a quantity of wheat to the board's agent, the country elevator, in September, 1939. On the same day as the board sold that wheat, it bought it back from the supposed merchandiser—bought it back for delivery to the board in December, the next futures closing date. At this point three commissions have been paid, the first to the elevator man by the farmer, a second when the board makes the sale and a third when it buys it back. We are all aware that there are four dates for closing outstanding contracts on the Winnipeg grain exchange. These are April, July, October and December and during every year the board carries these future contracts it pays eight commissions. Get that, please. If it carries the contracts for three years it pays twenty-four commissions. Believe that, if you will. It is this load of interest, insurance, storage charges and commissions that is driving the price of wheat down to unconscionable low levels in Canada, and these commissions are paid for transactions which are mere bookkeeping transactions between the board and the elevator companies.

I know that an opinion has been filed to the effect that such a procedure is permissible under the section of the act that enjoins the board to use the facilities of the trade. If you want to see the justification, just read subsections (i) and (j) of section 8 of the act. That does not bear out the theory under which they are operating, it simply lays down the principle that they are to use the facilities of the trade. It is nothing more than that and it does not enable them to do what they are doing. I say with the greatest possible respect that I disagree with the gentleman who gave that opinion. I say, further, that the action of the board in buying back these contracts is a violation of the letter and the spirit of the act on the part of the board and on the part of the government that acquiesces in such a practice.

I have in front of me the report of the Canadian wheat board for the crop year 1939-40. Exhibit "D" to the report covers grain operations on the 1938 crop account from August 1, 1938, to July 31, 1940, a period of two years. I quote the following item:

> Delivered through the clearing association against long futures contracts held by the board, at prevailing market prices.
> 4,842,000 bushels, then valued at $2,359,135.48

—wheat, I take it, that was delivered to the board, not by producers but by others from whom the board bought for future delivery. Clearly this does not represent a purchase from producers and is thus an illegal transaction, contrary to the terms of the act.

I believe, further, that this practice is the root of all the evil that has recently crept into the board's operations. Most of the statistics I shall use are taken from the 1939-40 report and are in respect of the 1938 crop account. Corresponding statistics for the 1939 and 1940 crop accounts can be found in the report for 1940-41, but I shall not use them because I do not wish to give too many statistics.

Furthermore, at page 32 of the report first referred to I see in exhibit "C" a statement of grain operations, western division, for the crop year ended July 31, 1940, as follows:

> Futures contracts—exchanged against cash wheat sales.

243,347,000 bushels, valued at $191,687,487.50. We are dealing with the 1938 crop account. It will be remembered that by reason of the refusal of the governor in council to approve unconditionally the price of 87½ cents fixed by the board in the second year of its operations under this government, the board was practically out of business for two years, and it came back into operation in the fall of 1938, having then fixed a price of 80 cents a bushel, which was approved in the ordinary way by the governor in council. You will recall that was the year of a big crop.

I notice that exhibit "D" to the 1939-40 report covers grain operations of the 1938 crop account over a period from August 1, 1938, to July 31, 1940, two years. This exhibit first sets out wheat acquired in the amount of 297,416,748 bushels to the value of $221,840,906.25. I want the Minister of Agriculture to follow me. Of this, nearly five million bushels was acquired against the board's long futures contracts in the way I have mentioned and the balance taken direct from producers.

The next paragraph is headed, "Wheat Sold". It gives the sales value of "the above cash wheat, at realized prices"—I suppose that mean prices realized in other sales—"basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver" at $166,756,130.60—the difference of some 55 million dollars roughly corresponding to the difference between the fixed and open market prices over this period. It then goes on—and this is an astounding thing—to add to this another item of more than 15 million dollars, which is described in this way, and I ask the house to follow this: in the amount of 277,576,000 bushels. These are wash sales backwards and forwards, when there is no real transfer of money or physical possession of the wheat.

Profit on sales of futures contracts acquired in exchange against cash wheat sales.

Mr. CRERAR: What year was that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am dealing with exhibit "D" to the 1939-40 report. If the minister will read my remarks afterwards he will follow me easily. This is intricate and I do not want to be interrupted more than is necessary. I will give that again.

Profit on sales of futures contracts acquired in exchange against cash wheat sales.

in the amount of 277,576,000 bushels. Now I put this question to the government, to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to the Minister of Agriculture, and to his colleague who sits in front of him (Mr. Crerar): Does that mean that the board bought back for future delivery this amount, 277,576,000 bushels of the 297½ million cash wheat that it sold, and that the 15 million dollars represents margins arbitrarily fixed by the board between cash and futures prices? If that is what it means, it is an arbitrary $15,000,000 set up. That makes a deficit of $39,814,161.45. Then there follows this remarkable paragraph of details:

Add: Carrying costs, interest, administrative and general expenses, etc.
Carrying charges:
Carrying charges on wheat stored in country elevators..	$6,386,756 14
Storage on wheat stored in terminal elevators.....	2,271,506 85
Then note this gem:
Transfer of futures to deferred months.....	7,035,707 50	$15,693,970 49

The items so far given make a total of $15,693,970.49. Remember, there was a deficit above referred to of $39,814,161.45. I continue with this table of details:

Interest and bank charges.....		$ 2,950,762 63
Additional freight on wheat shipped to Fort William/Port Arthur from points tributary to Vancouver.....	$1,530,323 55
Less: Freight recovered on shipments to Churchill.....	59,824 64	1,470,498 91
Handling, stop-off and diversion charges on wheat at interior terminals		229,262 39
Drying, reconditioning charges and losses in transit.....		6,964 41
Adjustment of grades with agents.....		19,807 42
Brokerage and clearing association charges.....		389,236 78
Administrative and general expenses.....		526,038 60
		$21,246,926 79

These items add up to the tidy sum of $21,246,926.79, and that added to the $39,814,161.45 brings the deficit up to $61,061,088.24.

There was another item of expense, I think, in connection with advertising overseas, totalling $221,241.31, which brought the total deficit to $61,282,329.55.

The plain fact is that the board was doing this bookkeeping and it was doing nothing else. There was no trading. The board bought the wheat at a fixed price, it exchanged its cash wheat for futures contracts and then continued to exchange its futures contracts at every closing date falling four times a year, and since every such switch of contracts represents a sale and a purchase it calls for two commissions, or eight commissions a year. By this practice the board maintains the elevator companies in such unexampled luxury that their incentive is to hold, not to sell the wheat. What incentive is there for these elevator companies to sell this wheat? In point of fact no one has an interest in selling, and Canadian wheat as a selling proposition is left waiting for Bungay, Drefus & Company to buy. Why should they not wait? What provident farmer would want to sell his chickens if the revenue covered overhead and made a substantial profit as well?

I have in my hand a report of the earnings of some of these elevator companies in the years 1939-40, and 1940-41, taken from the Financial Times of February 14, 1941. I am not going over all these figures or all the companies. I have selected four, including the one that the Minister of Mines and Resources is connected with, or at least is a shareholder in, the United Grain Growers. Listen to these figures—they will bear out what I said about who is making a profit out of wheat.

Take the case of the Federal Grain Company, Limited. In 1940-41 its financial report showed gross earnings of $825,953, and the year before $355,893. The net earnings for 1940-41 were $123,281, and for 1939-40 there was a deficit of $4,628.

Toronto Elevators Limited. Their gross earnings in 1940-41 amounted to $522,111 and in 1939-40, $310,702. Their net earnings in 1940-41 were $242,131 and in 1939-40, $138,912.

Take our friend the United Grain Growers. In 1940-41 their gross earnings amounted to $1,249,161—they were no slouchers—and in 1939-40 they amounted to $646,602—they had nearly doubled. Their net earnings in 1940-41 amounted to $374,241 as against only $5,662 the year before.

Let us take next the Western Grain Company, Limited. Their gross earnings in 1940-41 amounted to $625,463 and in 1939-40, $38,625. In 1940-41 their net earnings amounted to $149,123 as against a deficit of $243,336 the year before.

That tells a story.

An hon. MEMBER: A hold-up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not called it a hold-up. It was done, so far as I know, in a perfectly legal manner by agreement. The storage charge is fixed at one-forty-fifth of a cent a bushel per day, by this government, or by the board through the acquiesence of this government.

Mr. GARDINER: It is as low as it has ever been under any government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is less than it used to be, but the argument is that it ought to be much less.

Mr. GARDINER: Your government had it the same once.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I daresay we did; I do not remember. But I will say that these are the only people who are making any money, and I am sure the minister will agree. The farmer is not making money, the wheat board is not making money, and certainly the Canadian people are not making money out of it. We are paying for it.

I suggest that it is the demoralizing effect of these practices which is particularly bad—the concealed method of paying storage charges in instalments under such headings as "switching of futures" and "switching of hedges." The rates and amounts should be definitely shown as storage charges instead of being concealed by a perpetual marking down of prices. If the purpose of the act were followed, the board, once it made a sale of wheat, would have nothing further to do with it. That is what it ought to be doing, that and nothing else. But the present board, under the guise of using the existing facilities of open market trading, has succeeded in nullifying its operations as well as rendering useless a great open market organization. It has made the large elevator companies subjects of public relief on a colossal scale. It appears to me that Mr. Murray, the chairman of the board—

Mr. GARDINER: He is not the chairman of the board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Listen to me. I know he is not chairman. Why does the minister interrupt me? Why does he not listen until the sentence is finished?

Mr. GARDINER: Why don't you get the facts straight?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am still straight. My back is as straight as yours and so is my head. It appears to me that Mr. Murray, the chairman of the board, succeeding Mr. McFarland, deliberately set out to kill the board by making it operate in this way, but the long-range effect is not proving to be what he expected. He did succeed in suspending its operations for a couple of years, but his successors under Mr. McIvor are now succeeding in transforming it into a great octopus that has almost completely swallowed up the open market facilities of the Winnipeg grain exchange, without providing any actual marketing agency in its place.

I take exhibit "B" of the report—

Mr. GARDINER: May I say one thing? I do not think my hon. friend wants to misrepresent the position of Mr. Murray. His name was the only one used at the beginning and at the end of all these recitals of transactions, but the transactions were not carried out under Mr. Murray at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I made that clear.

Mr. GARDINER: It was not made clear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He was in at the inception after the change of government.

Mr. GARDINER: He had nothing to do with these transactions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He went out, but he was in on the fire sale. However, he was just the agent of the government. They made the policy. I see by exhibit "B" of this report that the total deficit on the operations for the 1938 crop account was $61,282,329.55. This was the year that the board operated under an 80-cent price and this was the year that the loss was occasioned by statements made simultaneously by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the then Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Euler, at the time of the announcement of the 80-cent price. I do not ask hon. members to take my word for it. I shall read what I believe will be accepted as an authoritative commentary—the Economic Journal published in London by the Royal Economic Society and read by economists everywhere. In the June 1939 supplement, Memorandum 79, at page 14 under the caption "The World Wheat Situation", there appears the following:

> The disparity between exportable surpluses and importers' requirements which became apparent at the beginning of this season was bound to cause severe pressure on prices. But other causes have been at work to produce the precipitate decline which has taken place. Early in August, 1938, the Canadian government fixed a minimum price to farmers of 80 cents per bushel, and undertook to pay a subsidy to producers in the western provinces equal to the difference between the minimum price and the market price. At the same time, Mr. Mackenzie King declared that, "Notwithstanding the internal price of 80 cents per bushel, the Canadian wheat board will continue its work of encouraging the use of Canadian wheat, which will at all times be competitive on the world's markets."

He was declaring government policy.

> Winnipeg prices were then running at about 85 cents for spot wheat and about 75 cents for October futures. With the announcement of the government's policy the market broke, and futures in spot wheat began to tumble down. By the first week of September Winnipeg spot and futures prices were below 60 cents, the drop in spot thus being greater than in futures. Now the general level of commodity prices declined only very moderately during this period. There was special weakness in wheat, and among the various wheats special weakness in Canadian wheat, American prices fell by less than half the proportion shown by Canadian. Indeed Canadian No. 1 northern, which is normally at a premium owing to its superior quality, actually fell to a discount under some of the other leading wheats. Winnipeg prices fell below Chicago prices for the first time since in 1937 the United States became once more a net exporter of wheat.
> The rapid decline in Canadian prices had clearly been precipitated by the government's announcement. The Canadian government had announced its intention to sell wheat at a loss and without limit. With an exportable surplus of perhaps 250 million bushels in its hands, nearly one-half of world import requirements was to be put on the market under weak selling conditions. Further, the plan was such that producers would be induced to rush delivery and so put a large part of this wheat on the market in the very early months of the season. It was therefore a natural reaction for holders of stocks elsewhere to reduce them and for purchasers to reduce forward commitments to a minimum.
> The Canadian plan was not slow to cause reactions in other countries. The United States government quickly decided that it was necessary to ensure the export of 100 million bushels per annum, even, if necessary, by dumping. That this decision was solely a reaction to the Canadian plan is shown by the fact that in 1937-38 the United States had succeeded in exporting more than 100 million bushels and was at the time exporting at a considerably greater rate. Before the end of August the premiers' conference in Australia recommended commonwealth and state action to fix an internal price at 4/8 per bushel; and in Argentina the president was empowered to fix such domestic and export prices for the new crop as he considered to be in the interests of the country. Meanwhile some of the minor exporters of the world, notably Roumania, raised their export bounties; while the principal European importers, with the exception of the United Kingdom, imposed further taxes on wheat, or raised its price directly, or, in some cases prohibited imports without special licence. The Canadian government had thus rapidly induced government action on behalf of producers in both exporting and importing countries, and the combined effect of the actions of all the governments involved was to reduce prices by more than a quarter within the first few weeks of the season.

The decline in prices has hardly induced a comparable change in quantities moving into consumption. It is true that during the first two months shipments were about 20 per cent greater than those of the corresponding period in the previous year, to some extent owing to war fears, though they were still about 15 per cent less than the 1933-37 average. But in the six months October to March shipments were only about 15 per cent greater than in the previous year and 5 per cent less than the 1933-37 average; and this in spite of the fact that there has been some stocking of wheat by European governments, probably on a considerable scale, in order to meet a war situation.

Mr. CRERAR: Who is the author of the article?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will send it over to the minister and he can read it. I do not know the author. I have read from Memorandum No. 79, London and Cambridge Economic Service's Report on Current Economic Conditions, June, 1939, published by the Royal Economic Society.

The Prime Minister, as hon. members who were here in a previous decade will recall, once made a notable speech that went down in history as the five-cent speech. The statement he made on the occasion of fixing the 80-cent wheat price proved to be no five-cent speech. It was probably the most expensive statement made by any statesman of the British empire in recent years. Hon. members may ask what is going to happen to the price if the board does not buy back these futures contracts. It has always been realized that the treasury of Canada could not be put behind unlimited production of wheat, and when the last Conservative government got behind Mr. McFarland's stabilization operations they always realized that acreage reduction had to be faced. This government has faced it indirectly by enforcing quotas. I suggest that the first thing for the government to do is to call upon the present board to operate according to the terms of the act, and as the act intended, and to buy no more of these futures contracts. If this farce is continued, it will practically put this country out of the wheat exporting business and impose upon the taxpayers a load that they will be in no mood to carry.

I want now to deal with another matter, which is a by-product of this illegal method of operation. In exhibit "D" to which I referred in the 1939-40 report there is an item called "brokerage and clearing association charges", amounting to $389,236.78. In exhibit "E" of the 1940-41 report covering the 1939 crop to July 31, 1941, the corresponding amount is $546,013.54. I should like to know what these items mean. I have reason to believe that the Canadian wheat board, with the knowledge and consent of the government, is dispensing very large amounts of compensation to those who, partly because of the war, and partly because of the wheat board's operations, are deprived of opportunities to earn brokerage charges in normal open market trading, and that large annual amounts are paid to individuals who do nothing, or next to nothing, to earn them. I am not satisfied to let this bill go through without there being an opportunity of examining the officials of the wheat board. As a matter of fact I should like to see an independent audit made of their books, but in any event there should be an opportunity to examine the members and officials of the board and to put to them some such questions as these:

1. How many bushels of wheat has the board purchased directly from producers from July 31, 1938, to date?

2. How much wheat so purchased was actually sold by the board?

3. How much of the wheat sold by the board did the board contract to buy back for future delivery from the grain trade?

4. What amount of such futures contracts is it now carrying?

If you get that figure you will, I think, be astonished. I have no means of ascertaining exactly what it is, but I shall be astonished if it is not a very large sum.

I want the government and the wheat board to give the committee on agriculture and colonization the complete break-down of storage, insurance, interest, brokerage and commissions, and I wish to know on what principle the board operates in paying out brokerage and clearing association charges.

I apologize for taking so much time, but the subject matter is important. As members of parliament we cannot face national problems from any sectional point of view. The marketing of our surplus wheat by availing ourselves of every opportunity to find markets at a price that is remunerative to the farmer is a national problem. I think we must admit that the government's record as a marketer of wheat leaves much to be desired.

The time has come when we should attempt to find a fresh viewpoint. We should examine fearlessly the defects of the present methods, and if a new course—even if a drastic change—is suggested to us by our experience, we should take that course firmly and fearlessly, having regard to the interests of Canada as a whole.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to follow my hon. friend the leader of the opposition in his discussion with regard to the wheat board. I am satisfied that when all the facts for which he asks are obtained he will find that the board has carried on the wheat business of Canada in a proper and economical manner.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the hon. member announcing that we shall get the facts? Is he speaking for the wheat board and the government?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I have nothing to do with the wheat board, but I believe my hon. friend can get any information that is necessary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So we should.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): In my hon. friend's remarks with regard to wheat and the policy of the government he mentioned certain orders in council. Of course I have not been able to see those orders in council as yet; but if they had not been passed at that time, I think my hon. friend would have been the first man in this house to rise in his place and condemn the government for not having passed them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They do not go into effect until August 1.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): They must have had to do with speculation in wheat; they must have had to do with the floor prices which were set at that time on barley, oats and flax. Those must have been the orders in council, though I have not seen them; and of course they were put through in order that these grains could be handled properly, without speculation by anybody in Canada. Such speculation must be stopped immediately when the government announces a new policy.

Then the hon. gentleman referred to the ceiling on wheat. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made the very first announcement in regard to price ceilings in Canada he excepted wheat from those ceilings. From a reading of that speech, which I believe was made on October 18 last, though I am not certain of the date, it will be seen that the Prime Minister stated that wheat was in a different position from that of other commodities, and that the great amount of wheat which was held in Canada should be looked upon as a national asset. The leader of the opposition also mentioned a speech made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) some time ago, which he said indicated that the minister was not in favour of parity at that time. I think if the speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture is read, it will be seen that he stated he was endeavouring to get parity for all farm products. Then my hon. friend went on to state that apparently there had been trouble between the Minister of Agriculture and the government and between the chairman of the price board and the government, and that as a result one or other of these gentlemen was going to quit. Well, he does not seem to have very good information on that point, because they are both still in their jobs and carrying on very efficiently.

Then my hon. friend went on to predict what would be the carryover in wheat. I always feel sorry for anyone who tries to do that. It has been attempted many times by many people, but I have yet to see anyone in the world, or certainly in Canada, who could accurately judge the carryover of wheat throughout the world twelve months ahead of time. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) endeavoured to do that last year, but when he rose to speak this year he admitted that he had been wrong in his estimate. That was bound to happen, because no one can ever make a proper estimate of carryovers for years ahead. The leader of the opposition went on to state that the world carryover to-day was about fourteen or fifteen hundred million bushels over and above world requirements. I can remember that in 1935 this was the exact amount of wheat the world was supposed to have as a carryover, beyond its requirements for the coming year. Yet less than a year from that time all the wheat was gone. Wheat rose until it reached the price of $1.31 a bushel, in spite of the fact that just one year before there was supposed to be in the world a carryover of 1,400,000,000 bushels of wheat more than was required.

The hon. gentleman also stated that we were in trouble in regard to wheat for some years before the war, and that there were large carryovers. Apparently the hon. gentleman did not check his figures very well. There was a tremendous carryover when this government came into office in 1935, but that carryover disappeared within the next year. By August 1, 1938, there was less wheat carried over in Canada than there had been for many years. On August 1, 1938, our carryover amounted to only some 23,000,000 bushels.

Mr. PERLEY: With a large profit made on the previous carryover.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Yes, after what hon. gentlemen opposite called a fire sale. In 1938 we had a big crop, but by the time that crop was harvested war was expected throughout the world. The carryover in Canada to-day is due entirely to the war, and nothing else. Most of that carryover was piled up in 1939 and 1940. Then my hon. friend mentioned that this government should be negotiating with Washington over this matter; he said that someone had made some statement in regard to reserves of wheat during and after the war, and that this government should be taking some action in this regard. Perhaps my hon. friend has not been following the wheat business very carefully. Negotiations have been going on for quite a long time between Canada, the United Kingdom, the United States, Australia and the Argentine in regard to that very question. The matter has been receiving serious consideration by this government for some time past, and it will be given proper consideration.

The other day the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) made the statement that when I was speaking I turned a somersault in my ideas with regard to wheat. I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman while he was speaking, but he endeavoured to leave the impression that I had stated in this house that 70 cents was a proper price for wheat. I have never made that statement; but my hon. friend has. Speaking on April 25, 1934, and referring to a speech which had been made by Mr. Vallance, at that time a member of this house, my hon. friend said as reported at page 2544 of Hansard:

> Which would be the better position—to be able to sell for a reasonable price, say 60 to 70 cents per bushel . . .

My statement was that I thought a proper price for wheat, in comparison with other commodities in this country, would be $1.20 a bushel; and when we speak of parity prices I believe that if our bureau of statistics were asked to set a parity price for wheat compared to other products, it would be found that it would be right around that figure of $1.20.

A few moments ago, in speaking of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the leader of the opposition made the statement that the men employed for checking under that act formed a large political organization, and cost this country a great deal of money. Well, if they were a political organization they must have been a good one, because in the three years of operation of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act all work in connection with it was carried out, and a sum amounting to $33,000,000 was paid to farmers throughout western Canada. The total cost of administration of the act was $1,500,000. That is a pretty low percentage for the work done.

I have seen these men in action. I have seen the way the work has been carried on in the offices of the prairie farm assistance branch, and I wish to tell the house that those men have worked, and worked hard—night and day—through that busy season. They have worked to midnight and after, time after time, and have done a remarkably good job. Their task was a difficult one, and the figures show that they did it at a most economical cost to the government.

Speaking in the house the other day the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) was interrupted on more than one occasion by hon. members in the righthand corner of the house. They were intimating to him that he could not get more done for farmers in western Canada because he had to stay within the party, had to have party loyalty and was more or less under the government whip. These are the insinuations made not only here but in the country. I tell my hon. friends that the reason why many things have been done for the farmers of the west in the last five or six years is that on this side of the house are members from western Canada who get the sympathetic ear of hon. members from all parts of Canada. We are able to explain to those members what our problems are and they, like the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rickard) who spoke this afternoon, and other hon. members from Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces, have listened to what we have to say and have agreed to go further to help the people in western Canada than they would have done had it not been for the efforts of members of the Liberal party from the west.

Let me say this to my hon. friends. No number of amendments they may move, no number of speeches criticizing the government and government policy are going to help western Canada a great deal, if the sympathetic ear of hon. members from other parts of Canada is not gained by Liberal members from the west in the house.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is not saying much for them, then.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friends were not so much in favour of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, when it was introduced to this house. Go back to the speeches you made at that time; go back to the criticism you made then. Go back to the 80-cent wheat you wanted, and then the 70 cents under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Mr. COLDWELL: We wanted both.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Oh, you wanted both?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, why not?

Mr. PERLEY: You all voted for it.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Hon. members on this side of the house backed the bill, all the way through—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): For 60-cent wheat.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): —and had that act put through, one which has proved to be the best that has ever been put through the House of Commons for the benefit of the wheat growers of western Canada. My hon. friends won't deny that?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is not what the farmers were promised in 1940.

Mr. PERLEY: The member for Qu'Appelle supported it; I help you sometimes.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Since 1940 the farmers have learned that so far as they are concerned this is the best piece of legislation that has ever been put through the house. I interrupted the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he was speaking the other day about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the price of wheat in his own constituency. I pointed out to him that the farmers in his constituency had probably got more money in the last year from the Prairie Farm Assistance Act than they had got from the sale of their wheat. I believe if the records for that constituency were checked up, it would be found that not only was I right, but that I was right by a long way.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is a guess.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No, it is not.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Well, give us the figures.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I have not checked them over.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Give us the figures.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I have not the figures here. Nevertheless, you can get them if you wish, and take your own time to figure it out.

An hon. MEMBER: So it is a guess?

Mr. GARDINER: I have the information here. It is right.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I thought I was right; I do not usually make statements in the house that are not right. The changes in policy this year, as brought down by the government, have been accepted by hon. members in the government and followers of the government in the house, and for that reason they will finally pass the house as they are. No number of speeches made by hon. members can change that position. They did not even know what was going to happen until it came down in the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then what is the use of going through the farce of referring this bill to the committee, if not a line or a word is going to be altered?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): If my hon. friends can get the committee on agriculture to change its policy, and can get hon. members on this side of the house to agree to the change—hon. members not from one part of the country but from all parts of Canada—then of course it will be changed.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is good.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): But they know they won't.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And so do you.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): And they know that the policy brought down is a good policy. They know that there are many representatives from different parts of the country who would not agree to go any further, and that it was hard work on the part of many hon. members in the house which succeeded in getting for western Canada what we got this year—and with no help from my hon. friends in the corner.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That still is not saying that it is justice.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Once in a while I do interrupt my hon. friends, I know, but I do not keep it up all the time.

We are now considering an amendment moved by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), and apparently agreed to by all his party in the house. Let me say that there is a very real party loyalty in that party. That is so even out in the country. I can remember an occasion in Saskatchewan—I think I am right in this—where one member of the party came to a convention, and because that party who came to that convention could not agree with the policy, the lady was turned out, espoused another party and is now sitting in the house. This is what we find at page 1190 of Hansard, when the hon. member for Weyburn was speaking:

> I therefore move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright):
> "That all the words after 'that' be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> 'This bill be not now read a second time but be it resolved that the disregarding by this parliament of the modest representations made by western agriculture—'"

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Weren't they modest?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw):

"'—for a parity price for all agricultural products and an initial wheat payment of at least $1 per bushel for No. 1 northern basis Fort William is contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada'."

No, it is not. It is a very clever way to try to get in an amendment. If you will follow my hon. friend's remarks down further, you will see that he speaks of national unity, of the economic conditions in western Canada and of the treatment given to producers in that part of the country. He finishes this particular paragraph by saying:

. . . there you have national disunity, the type of national disunity which will split this country asunder.

We are asked to vote on an amendment which says that if we disregard the representations in regard to a parity price on wheat and $1 a bushel instead of 90 cents, made by certain agriculturists of Canada, some one will make a move against peace, order and good government in this country.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is not what it says.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That is exactly what it says. I want to tell my hon. friend that there are no more loyal people in Canada than those in the province of Saskatchewan. I want to tell him that that delegation which came down here from Saskatchewan 400 strong did not come here with mutiny in their hearts. They did not come here resolved to revolt if they did not get what they asked for. I will admit that what they asked for was fair and reasonable, and I will admit also that they were probably disappointed in not getting $1 a bushel for wheat, in not getting parity prices at this time. But no one can rise in his place in this house and say that in time of war because what they asked for was not given to them they are ready to make a move against the government of this country.

Mr. COLDWELL: No one says that they will.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That is the substance of the amendment moved by my hon. friend.

Mr. COLDWELL: Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved an amendment in exactly the same terms in 1917.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That was moved in connection with the taking of the franchise away from people in this country, the taking away from them of constitutional government that had been fought for time and time again. Blood had been shed before and blood will be shed again if this is taken away from the people of this country. Let me tell you that you cannot buy the loyalty of the farmer in western Canada, nor will he sell it for 10 cents a bushel or any other figure. The farmer in western Canada may be disappointed that he is not getting parity prices—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Let us quit playing politics.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That is exactly what you are doing with this amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must request hon. members not to interrupt.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The farmer of western Canada will do his job throughout this war whether or not he is treated fairly by the rest of the people of this country. He will do it anyway. The farmer of western Canada has been asked this year to produce other things besides wheat. He has been asked to produce barley and oats in abundance for feed in order that we may be able to produce what is needed by the allies. Let me tell my hon. friend that the western farmer will do it. We have asked him to produce flax in abundance this year. The western farmer will do this not because the price will bring him in any great amount of money but because we and our allies need it. Anything that he is asked to do to help the war effort will be done by the western farmer.

An hon. MEMBER: And any other farmer.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Yes, and any other farmer. As I have said before in this house, the farmer wants to pull his full weight in this war. I have heard hon. members of the opposition state that they intend to vote for this amendment. I have no hesitation in saying that I do not intend to vote for it. This amendment is not a vote of want of confidence in the government.

An hon. MEMBER: You will never get to be Minister of Agriculture that way.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Let me say that we have the best Minister of Agriculture sitting right here that we have ever had in this House of Commons.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Better than some of the aspirants anyway.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): This amendment, if carried, would not be a vote of want of confidence in the government, nor would it be a vote of want of confidence in parliament. I want everyone in this house to understand exactly what they are voting for. Every man who votes for this amendment is voting want of confidence in the farmers of Saskatchewan, my own people. I certainly will never vote for that, and I do not want to see any member of the Liberal party or any other party who has confidence in the farmers of western Canada vote for this amendment.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that we have listened with a great deal of interest to all the speeches which have been made this afternoon on these agricultural bills in general, and perhaps the amendment in particular. I think we all recognize that the government are wrestling with many problems, and next to the war agriculture is one of the greatest problems with which they have to wrestle. I think the reason why this wrestling goes on in such a strenuous way is due partly to the fault of the government. It seems to me that the reason for this wrestling is the fact that the government sees this agricultural problem as essentially a money problem. I realize that the moment anyone in this corner suggests that any problem is a money problem, there arises in the minds of many the thought that it is natural for us to say that because we hold to a certain monetary philosophy. I am quite certain that if the government would readjust, or shall I say, reform their money policy, they could then solve their problems, particularly the agricultural problems. I think we have one piece of evidence of this in the minister's own statement on March 10, as reported on page 1211 of Hansard, where he says:

> We are taking every last dollar out of the treasury of Canada to deal with these problems which we feel it is safe to take at this present time.

In other words, we can deal with the problem only in so far as the treasury will permit. It never seems to dawn upon the minister or the government that the treasury should be made to solve the problem instead of the problem awaiting and being entirely dependent upon the treasury. We realize that since the government are pursuing certain policies within the realm of a certain restricted monetary philosophy, they have to go on in their stumbling way from year to year. We realize, therefore that they must be always facing problems instead of solving them.

We realize that the agricultural problem is a problem, and it does seem to me that the problem arises by reason of the fact that agriculture is a primary industry. Somehow or another primary industries never seem to be able to work out an actuarially or scientifically sound price structure for the industry, whatever it may be, while secondary industries, on the other hand, seem to be able to collaborate one with another to work out a scientific price structure which will guarantee to them a certain profit. Might I illustrate by taking, for example, the automobile industry?

The automotive industry, manufacturing automobiles, tractors, machinery and so forth, calls in its experts, and whether it be a new car model or some feature that has to be put into a certain machine which they are producing, the cost of everything is figured out and goes into the price structure of the article in question. It makes no difference what it is; it may be paint on the automobile or tractor; it may be every little last nut and bolt which are required in the production of a machine; it may be the various taxes which the industry has to pay; it may be depreciation charges, interest on loans, or a hundred and one other things. All these are written into the price structure of that article. The price is arrived at, including dividends and profits, and then a price tag is attached to that particular article. When the consumer comes along, he does not ask, "What will you take for that car?" He always asks, "How much are you asking for it?" There is a price tag on that article and the automotive industry simply says to the consumer, "Take it or leave it. If you do not take it at our price, leave it." I have never yet heard of a car or tractor or anything of that kind being sold at a bargain price because there was overproduction in the industry.

But what happens when it comes to the primary industry of agriculture? Agriculture has no scientific way of writing into the price of its production all that should go into it. When we talk of cost of production, we must take into account everything that is involved in farming. But that is never done. The farmers have never got together and done it, and it never seems to have dawned on any government or on any official body that they have any need to help agriculture in that matter. The farmer does not say, "I shall have to charge so much for my wheat this year because I find that my buildings need to be painted." But that is exactly what the automobile industry does. The automobile industry writes into the price of its products depreciation on the factory and on all capital equipment. The farmer never does that. Somehow or another he cannot. The very existence of things as they are does not seem to permit him to do it. The agricultural industry does not come to the markets and say, "Here is the price tag on our wheat; here is the price tag on our butter; here is the price tag on our hogs—and the price is so much." The farmer never comes to market and says, "This is my price; take it or leave it." No; world buyers say to the farmer,

"We will give you this price, take it or leave it." Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when the farmer comes to buy, he has to take it or leave it; and when he comes to sell, he has to take it or leave it. That is the position, and I have never yet been able to discover where any government with the responsibilities and problems of agriculture upon its shoulders has ever tried to solve that problem.

Mr. GARDINER: They cannot control the rain and sunshine.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Speaker, I should like to mark down that remark of the Minister of Agriculture, and if you will call it six o'clock, I will deal with it when we resume at eight.

PRIVILEGE—MR. RALSTON

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION IN DEBATE THIS DAY

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. My attention has just been called to a reference made to me by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) at page 1372 of Hansard, this afternoon. The report of his remarks reads as follows:

> Mr. Hanson: . . . How different was the position in 1935 when the legislation was set up. The present Minister of National Defence, then the mouthpiece for the grain exchange and the other big interests from Winnipeg—
> Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre): Order.
> Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): Oh yes, we saw them here; I know what went on—being unwilling to strike at the principle of the measure, or being fearful of the results of opposition to the principle, demanded that the bill go to a select committee, and then insisted that certain substantive portions of the measure should be inserted in the measure itself. That was quite proper and was quite properly agreed to, and that was done.

I want to say that the reference to me as the mouthpiece for the grain exchange and other big interests has not the slightest vestige of foundation in fact. It is unequivocally false. I also want to state that I have called the leader of the opposition and told him I was going to refer to this before six o'clock, and he has not seen fit to be here. I want to say further that I was not in any way, directly or indirectly, connected with the Winnipeg grain exchange, or any member thereof, or with any other big interests in Winnipeg, and I give the most direct contradiction to the implication and insinuation and the reference made to me in the passage I have just read.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASED RATE PER BUSHEL ON WHEAT DELIVERED BY PRODUCERS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West) for the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Douglas (Weyburn).

Mr. HANSELL: Before the dinner recess I was dealing with a matter which I think is far too often overlooked, namely the scientific price structure as it has applied to secondary production or secondary industries, that is, the manufacturing industries, and the entire lack of anything like a scientific price structure with regard to the primary industries, mainly agriculture. Just before I concluded my remarks and while I was on that subject, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) interjected what I thought was an extremely unfortunate observation. He said that the government had no control over the rain and sunshine. I say that was an unfortunate remark because it revealed the very thing that we in this corner of the house have been telling the government and the country for a good many years. The minister made a terrible admission. I would suggest that by that remark he is placing a premium upon Divine Providence. Even though Providence has smiled upon us and has given unto us an abundance of all that the good earth can produce, it seems the government's attitude is that Providence has created for us mortal beings a tremendous problem. It seems to me the minister's remark would almost suggest that the Almighty should step down here occasionally and consult with the Minister of Agriculture and the government as to just when He should turn on the tap and open the windows to let the sunshine in. Of course that is not going to happen.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It might be a good thing if it did, though.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member for Bow River says it might be a good thing if it did happen. I will tell him what would happen if the Almighty stepped down. We would find the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In a bad spot.

Mr. HANSELL:—attempting to go into—

An hon. MEMBER: A plebiscite.

Mr. HANSELL:—an argument with the Almighty as to whether it was right or not, and then suggesting that it be put to the country by way of a plebiscite.

Mr. MacINNIS: They might make Him a dollar-a-year-man.

Mr. HANSELL: Does it not appear to members of this house and to the people of this country that we have come to a pretty pass when the blessings of Divine Providence have presented us with a problem. I can understand the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) having a problem on his hands when there is a shortage of rubber. I can understand the government having a problem because there might be a shortage of something or another. If our people were starving because there was a shortage of foodstuffs, then I would say indeed that that was a problem. But when we are presented with a problem by reason of the outpouring of blessings from the bountiful hand of the Creator, then I say things have come to a pretty pass.

I would say that the whole fiscal attitude of the government is one of attempting to control within the framework of the present financial system all that we have to do, whether relating to agriculture or to anything else, and I would add, to the war. Of course, we are human beings, not worms; but would the worm starve because the apple was too big? I read somewhere once—I do not know where; it does not matter—that the people of the United States were a nation of playboys. When I hear ministers of governments talking in such a strain as I have mentioned, I must say I believe that as Canadians we are a nation of screwballs.

Mr. MacINNIS: What is a screwball?

Mr. HANSELL: I say to this house, through you, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the situation. Not so long ago, maybe in the fall of 1940, I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) had a problem on his hands. Our foreign markets were gone. That was the excuse. It was the excuse the Minister of Agriculture made this afternoon in reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch): France has fallen and our market there is gone. The Minister of Trade and Commerce knew that a year or so ago, and knew that the 1940 crop coming on would give a tremendous surplus. He called in, and I think rightly, representatives of the various grain companies and farm organizations of western Canada. They trooped here, and he laid his cards on the table and said to these men: "Now, gentlemen, what have you to suggest?" I think that was the proper thing to do. What did they suggest? They were unanimous in saying that at least the 1940 wheat crop should be financed. What was the next step? The minister called in the financial representatives—I may be speaking a bit figuratively now—and he said to them, "Gentlemen, how about it?" The gentlemen said "no", doffed their hats and walked out. The Minister of Trade and Commerce turned to the agriculturists and the grain men and said, "There you are, gentlemen. You see. I am sorry, but I cannot do anything. Those who are in charge of our financial system have spoken."

What should he have done? What should the Prime Minister of this country have done? He should have called in those bankers, those men who are in charge of the money economy of the country, and, putting his cards on the table, he should have said to them: "Gentlemen, this parliament has delegated to you the right to issue and control the currency and credit of this nation. You will control it to reflect the physical facts and physical desires of our people or we will go into the banking business." But he did not do that. Oh, no. The men of finance had the last word to say. May I add, is there anything wrong with our having plenty of everything? If the government are pursuing a policy of being restricted and circumscribed by the present financial system, what they are doing in the several bills which they bring down year after year is about the best that we can expect. But I again ask, is there anything wrong about having an abundance of everything—vast stores of grain, of wool—of which commodity we are now becoming very short—of sugar, canned goods, oil or any other commodities? The natural answer is that there cannot be anything wrong with that. Yet, although this is physically possible, merely because the government will not change their financial policy they are met with a problem, and we have to pay people not to produce. This is an alarming condition, and it has come to a pretty pass that we have a government in power which continually harps upon this supposed difficulty, a government which remains within the confines of this restricted system, and which brushes aside as of no account suggested solutions that are offered by other groups.

This afternoon the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) dealt in similar vein with the problem. He spent some time in discussing world carryovers, assuming that because the world has a carryover of grain the Minister of Agriculture is presented with a problem. To me it is the strangest thing that we have to be troubled because we have so much.

The hon. member mentioned, I think unfortunately, that while these bills were to go to the committee on agriculture they would not be changed. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) challenged the statement. It is unfortunate that it was made. Is this parliament to be placed in the position of knowing before bills go to committees that they are to be railroaded through by the pressure of a Liberal majority? What are they sent to committees for? I would have supposed that when these bills go to the committee on agriculture it will have scope enough to go into the problem of agriculture. I personally deplore, as I believe all hon. members should, that there is no Hansard report of the sittings of that committee.

An hon. MEMBER: They will not let us have one.

Mr. HANSELL: They will not let us. Why? The Liberal majority on that committee says in effect, "No, we must not have on the record what you men want to say. It is going to cost a little; it is going to take a little paper and ink."

Mr. QUELCH: Somebody is going to be placed on the spot.

Mr. HANSELL: That is the trouble. As the hon. member for Acadia has just said, somebody is going to be placed on the spot. I say that it is deplorable; when we send bills to a committee, that committee should have the right to deal adequately with every phase of the measure.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): With a record kept.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes, with a record kept.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw played a good deal on the loyalty and patriotism of the western farmer. Who is questioning it? The hon. member himself the other day made a startling remark in this connection; he seems to have completely changed his attitude. On page 1136 of Hansard I read these words:

> As a western representative I must say this, that I will not accept nor will the people of western Canada accept any economy for western Canada based on 90-cent wheat at Fort William, or anything near that figure, for the duration of the war

This afternoon he turned around and deplored the amendment because it called upon the government to grant the wishes of the delegation of four hundred.

Mr. MacINNIS: Talk is cheap.

Mr. HANSELL: As my hon. friend says, he had to say something, so he said that the western farmer is a very patriotic individual.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Therefore he can starve to death!

Mr. HANSELL: The farmers are very patriotic, therefore they must accept as inevitable what the government decides to do, even though it is not enough. Let me ask, will the manufacturing industry do that? As we have pointed out time and again, the manufacturers would not accept a contract unless they could get their 10 per cent profit, even though their wages bill and salaries and directors' fees were written into the cost. Not so with the farmer. We do not contract with the farmer; he has to take it or leave it.

I wish to compliment the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) upon the speech he made this afternoon. In my opinion he has no need to be ashamed of the way in which he has led the official opposition this session. I do not know that I agree with everything he said. Perhaps I am not familiar enough with the details of the business administration of the wheat board. He should be; he was Minister of Trade and Commerce once upon a time. But I agree with him when he deplores the fact that we have a government with no long-range view. Every year they are late in announcing the policy for that year relative to agriculture. What is worse, when the government do come down, in the dying hours of the session, or when the farmer is anxious to get along with his spring work and put in his seed, they make an announcement of policy but they do not bring down their regulations. The result is that farmers do as they think the government want them to do, only to discover afterwards that the regulations have had to be changed, with the consequence that the condition of some of the farmers is not as well at the last as it was at the first.

I wish that we could be certain, when the Minister of Agriculture brings down a bill, that he has the entire picture in his mind. However, if the government is going to muddle through under a system of restriction —and this sort of thing is the best we can expect of them—I suppose we shall have to be satisfied.

I say to the minister that while the details and ramifications of his department may be many, the administration of agriculture in this country during the past year has been a shameful record for any government. I live in a diversified constituency, part of which is a rich grain growing area, and I know something of the problems of those farmers. Regulations are passed and then changed. I have a little pamphlet here which I think all hon. members will recognize when I exhibit it. This pamphlet is called, "A Plan to Reduce Wheat Acreage and Make More Money Available for Necessary War Supplies." It is the same old story of restriction; grow less wheat and help win the war. This pamphlet was printed under the authority of Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, and was intended to outline the regulations governing the wheat acreage reduction plan. Many farmers obtained copies of this booklet, and read them over. Sometimes these things are not simplified enough. I often wonder whether the government employs lawyers to draw up these bills because lawyers know how to confuse the mind by the use of technical and legal terms. However, the farmers got hold of this pamphlet and, after reading it through, thought they understood what the government had decided. The farmers, too, want to win the war, so they decided to grow less wheat. But after this pamphlet was issued, other regulations came out, changing these; then after a while other changes were made, so that the farmer was simply bamboozled and did not know what he was supposed to do.

The same situation exists in regard to administration. This afternoon the hon. member for Acadia referred to the vast number of appointments that had been made, most of which appear to be political appointments. Certainly they were not appointments of men who knew the problems of the farmers. These inspectors have been instructed to go round and tell the farmers certain things. The farmers accept those explanations in good faith, only to find later on that the inspectors had no right to make those statements, or that their statements were wrong, or that in the meantime the regulations were changed. Time after time we have seen that happen, so that when the fall comes round the farmer does not get his cheque, or he does not get as much as he should, or, if he is fortunate, he receives a letter saying this or that was wrong, and he is absolutely confused.

I have an illustration in point; and I think the minister knows all about it. In certain parts of my constituency, as in others, we have what is known as a soil drifting area. The custom among farmers there is not to summer-fallow quite as much as in other districts, because of that soil drifting; they let their land stand idle. When the inspectors came round; the farmers said, "What are we going to do? We usually let this land lie idle, and if we turn it over and summer-fallow it, perhaps it will drift." The inspectors are told to instruct the farmers that if it is their custom to let the soil lie idle and rest for a year, they will receive the bonus just the same. So those farmers carried on as usual and let the land rest. The fall of the year came round, and what happened? The minister popped up and said, "Oh, yes; maybe we will pay them, but we will not pay them until the summer-fallow is done." That will be next spring, when the farmer puts in his grain. So the farmer who allowed his land to stand idle is left with his store bill running up, his doctor's bill to pay, and everything else. There he is, as the saying is, left holding the bag.

That is breaking faith with the farmer. I was through a certain part of my constituency before coming to Ottawa; and as late as January, if you please, those farmers had not received their cheques, though they had taken the word of the inspectors or those administering the act. Only to-day I received a letter from the department, in reply to a letter I wrote complaining that a certain man had not received his bonus although six months had elapsed. The reply of the department was, "Well, there is a certain discrepancy in the figures, and therefore we are instructing our supervisor to visit this man." It took them six months before they instructed their supervisor to visit this man, who had to carry on as best he could during the winter. There is something wrong with the administration of the act when this sort of thing happens. I do not like to focus all the blame on certain officials, even though those officials may be political appointees, but one can hardly avoid doing so. Something is wrong somewhere. So I say to the minister: When he brings down a bill or outlines the policy of the government, can we not get a complete picture of it? Cannot regulations be such that the farmers will understand them and, when the time comes, receive payment for the work done? It is not keeping faith with agriculture when the government says to the farmer, "We have a problem, and if you will cooperate we will do so and so." The farmer cooperates; then the government dickers and fiddles over this or that thing and the farmer is left down at the heels, worn at the cuffs, with store bills, doctors' bills and all sorts of other bills mounting up. I had men come to me with tears in their eyes because they were still waiting for their bonuses, as late as the middle of January. That is not right; it is not fair, and there is something wrong in the minister's department if that sort of thing cannot be remedied.

I see that my time is gone, Mr. Speaker. All I can add is this, that if the government will not act in such a way as to dispose of the problem instead of simply tinkering with it, then I suppose the farmers of this country will have to accept the inevitable and go stumbling on.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Following the statements of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) on second reading of these bills, I covered the situation in a general way, as I thought, and made one or two suggestions. I now desire to state my position with respect to the amendment, and at the outset I should like to say that I do not think it should be considered as a vote of want of confidence. I do not think that should be stressed the way it has been by many of the speakers on the government side. The Minister of Agriculture said it was not a vote of want of confidence in the government, but he stressed that it might be considered a want of confidence in parliament. I cannot go that far. I think this matter should not be considered politically, either, because I believe members of parliament should be free to express ourselves in this house. A speech from this side of the house or from the group in the far corner should not be considered a political speech. I believe a great many hon. members realize their responsibility and are anxious to make some contribution and to offer some help. So far as I am concerned, that is the position I desire to take. I believe, if we all feel we can do something to help solve this problem so as to bring about a state wherein the farmer will receive a better deal or, if you like, receive parity, we ought to do what we can in that direction.

Some pretty warm speeches have been delivered in this debate, even from the government side. We have heard criticism of the government from its supporters, and we have heard replies. I think it may be said, however, that we are all working for a parity. That is a word which has been used often, but I believe it is not well understood even yet. What we want is a situation wherein prices for farm products will compare favourably with the prices the producer has to pay for his implements of production and for the commodities used in production. I might say at this point that if prices could be placed on a parity, and if there is a continuation of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which is a form of insurance—and when the measure comes back in final form from the committee I believe it will be worth while—there can be no doubt that we shall get along pretty well.

Since Bill No. 13 has reached its present stage, four orders in council have been passed. This afternoon my leader made reference to these orders in council—and might I add that I believe he ought to be commended for his admirable speech to-day. In his speech he covered the whole situation, going back three or four years, dealing with the operations of the wheat board and setting out the facts in satisfactory fashion. I believe he has made the position clear, and it is not necessary for me to-night to refer to the operations of the board to any extent. What he has said need not be repeated.

I contend, as did the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) this afternoon, that these orders in council should be embodied in the bill. They should be part of the bill, and should be offered as legislation. If they are not, then we ought to have a statement from the minister as to how many more orders in council of this kind we may expect. As I have said, four have been passed already, and there is no limit to what we may have. But these four are of such importance that they should be in the bill. I suggest to the minister that he ought to allow the committee to embody some of these orders in council in the bill, so that we may know exactly where we stand.

This afternoon the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) made one or two confessions. He confessed that he now stands for a parity price; that is what he wants. He suggested, too, that Liberal members from the west were capable of reading the riot act, so to speak, to the government, and getting almost what they want. Some of their speeches, however, would indicate that they are not getting what they want. They have all supported the principle of a parity price, an increased price; but I venture to say that within the next hour or so they will not vote for that parity or that increased price. That is my complaint. We are accused of acting politically; we are told that the amendment is a vote of want of confidence; and yet when hon. members opposite come to vote, they will not vote as they have indicated in the speeches they have made.

I believe it is unnecessary for me to make detailed reference to those speeches. The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) endeavoured to answer the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader), but I thought his endeavour fell far short of an adequate answer. There are many questions the minister left unsolved, and many charges made by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie are still unanswered.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw and the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) have honoured me to the extent of referring to some speeches I have made in the house. Before I take my seat to-night I shall make one or two further suggestions, and possibly three or four years from now they may quote me again. There was another hon. member who referred to me. I will not say who it was. When I came to look through the pages of Hansard I could not find his name, and so I did not think it was necessary to take even thirty-five seconds to answer his thirty-five minutes' speech in which he attacked me.

The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) has made two splendid speeches, and I hope he will follow some of the principles he has enunciated. He of course supports the bill, and does not support the amendment. He has placed on record certain tables to show that the bonus system is the best. My reply to him would be this, that there are 290,000 farmers in the west, and one could prepare a table which would make it appear that 100,000 of them might be better off with the bonus. I might say I had prepared three tables, one of which dealt with half-section farmers, and another with farmers on a section and a half. I could work out those figures to show that so far as the small farms are concerned the bonus might not work out quite as well as it does for the large farms. As I have said, however, that does not prove anything. One could cite dozens of cases, draw tables to show that the bonus would work out better for this man or that man, but that would be no criterion. It does not prove that the bonus does not interfere with the general farming principles or policy of operation in western Canada.

I would ask the government and the board what they will do this fall if the farmers follow out the suggested system of increasing the production of coarse grains. What will they do this fall if we should happen to have 150,000,000 bushels more of oats and 30,000,000 or 40,000,000 more bushels of barley?

Mr. GARDINER: We have an agreement with the United States that we shall send it there.

Mr. PERLEY: Not all?

Mr. GARDINER: They are growing soya beans.

Mr. PERLEY: I have the coarse grains report for last year, and it shows that out of a production of 220,000,000 bushels of oats only 30,000,000 bushels came to the market.

Mr. GARDINER: I shall not speak again, but I suggest that the United States have asked us to produce as much coarse grains as we can as part of a general policy to have more oils produced on this continent. They have undertaken to transfer some of their grain acreage to soya beans, and have asked us to undertake to send any surplus we have to the United States.

[Mr. Perley.]

Mr. PERLEY: That is fine. Will the minister guarantee that if we produce 150,000,000 more bushels of oats next fall—which might quite easily happen—that the United States market will absorb them all?

Mr. GARDINER: They may or may not next year.

Mr. PERLEY: I think I know the farmer pretty well. He is only human, and if he can get 45 cents a bushel for his oats and has a yield of 50 to 100 bushels to the acre—in the northern sections they will have 75 to 80 bushels—he will not feel disposed to feed his oats to hogs; he will market them. Whether they are exported to the United States or not, there will be a great flow of oats and barley to the market. I doubt if the United States will take as much as the minister indicates they will. You are going to have your elevator space plugged with coarse grains and wheat.

How about the storage of oats and barley? They command the same rate per bushel and they take practically the same space. I think it will be readily agreed that the farmers will be encouraged to bring their oats to the market rather than to try to store them on the farm under present conditions, unless the government provides for storage or assists in storing on the farm. The small farmer who grows 1,500 or 2,000 bushels additional will have to provide storage unless he is able to take them to market. If the grain exchange continues to function as it is now doing, will it not encourage the marketing of oats and barley and thus encourage the filling up of space that might be required for wheat if we have a large and normal crop?

You can figure it out on a capital investment basis of dollars and cents. Ninety-cent wheat commands 8 cents a year storage. Two bushels of oats would be worth about the same and they would command 16 cents a year storage. Taking the capital investment as far as the elevator is concerned you will see why they will encourage the bringing in of oats and barley. The investment would be much smaller, only about half for wheat, and they would be paid double the storage. This point has not been stressed as yet. I think it is an important one; it is something that will have to be considered.

I suggest that the wheat board should take over everything; it should control storage and other matters to a greater degree than is set out in the orders in council. With government control many of the abuses and injustices to which I have referred before in this house would be eliminated. There are abuses that might have been referred to and enlarged upon the other day by the Minister of Mines and Resources when he referred to mixing. He said he had had forty years of experience in the grain business and evidently he knows all about mixing. That is one of the first things you find out about when you go into a country elevator. If we had full control, we could do away with some of these injustices.

The first one to which I would refer is undergrading. With this great crop of coarse grains that we expect will be coming to market this fall the government should pay special attention to undergrading. Many oats will grade No. 1 feed instead of 2 C.W. We also have unfair grading of wheat and mixing. The annexes that are being built alongside interior elevators permit of a great deal of mixing. I know what is going to happen. A farmer will bring in No. 1 northern or No. 2 northern wheat. There will be no space for it, and they will take it as No. 3 or No. 4. The same thing will apply to oats. There should be an investigation into this racket that has been perpetrated on the farmers of western Canada in the last three or four seasons in particular. There should be an adjustment of the unjust service charges that are made. Storage charges should not be permitted for storage in boxcars.

At the present time there is only one buyer and only one seller. According to the report for the crop year 1940-41, to which the leader of the opposition referred at great length this afternoon, it will cost this country $60,000,000 to carry this crop next year, taking into account the influx of coarse grains that we expect. As I say, there is only one buyer. I am going to offer a suggestion. I know the hon. member for Rosthern will support me in this, and the hon. member for Dauphin may quote me three or four years from now. I suggest that with the situation as we have it, with this surplus and carryover, with this cost of carrying, parliament should amend the Finance Act so that on the security of the grain in the possession of the board currency could be issued in an adequate volume to finance the board's operations properly, and no interest charges would accrue at any time. We should have the head of the Bank of Canada before the committee in order that we might get some information with respect to the possibilities of doing this. This wheat is practically as good as gold. The government will be in this business for a number of years, and some way should be found to carry it more cheaply, especially when, on the minister's own statement, it is costing us $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 a year.

As was said this afternoon by the leader of the opposition, this bill does not conform to the wheat board act of 1935. Paragraph (b) of section 3 of that act empowers the board to buy only from the producers of wheat, from no other organization. In the order in council is a clause empowering them to buy wheat from anybody other than producers. We are to start with this new price on August 1. What situation are we going to have? I contend that that price of 90 cents on August 1 is a minimum price and a maximum price. If that is so, then there is no need for the exchange. I do not think there is much need for it at the present time. I have before me the following report which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune of March 14:

> Winnipeg wheat futures opened at unchanged price levels in exceedingly dull trading.

They state that there was practically no trading from the first gong until the close. Things appear to be very quiet there now. The exporter cannot raise this 90-cent price, or at least the government has not told us how they can do it. The British cereals import committee buy large quantities, three, four and six months at a time. They set the prices for these amounts at least. Therefore there can be no increase in the price. There will be no demand which would raise the price because under the present set-up nothing but speculation can raise the price. Where are you going to have outside speculation when you have a situation as we have it now, the government taking on 400 million bushels of a surplus and so on?

I ask again: what will the board do with all the oats and barley that will probably come on the market this fall? The Minister of Agriculture has endeavoured to answer this. Apart from the United States market, it would appear that there will be no export to Great Britain. I have before me the parliamentary debates of the British House of Commons of Wednesday, February 4, 1942, and I should like to quote the remarks of Major Lloyd George, as follows:

> I am aware of the difficulty which is being experienced in certain areas in Scotland in disposing of feeding oats, and steps have already been taken to relieve the position. A considerable quantity of Scottish feeding oats purchased by the ministry is being moved to localities where they are required for consumption or where storage accommodation is available. I would remind my hon. friend that increased prices have been provided for growers who are able and willing to hold their oats in stack until March or later.

That is the situation over there. Apparently they have more oats than they require.

I have another quotation to the effect that there is going to be an increase in the price of wheat to encourage production in Britain, but I shall not take the time to read it.

I wish now to refer for a moment to one or two speeches which have been made from the other side of the house in an endeavour to show that the government of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was responsible for the very low price of wheat in 1932. I recall the low price of that period, but I say that the government of that day cannot be blamed for it. I have here the budget speech delivered by the Hon. Charles Dunning on May 1, 1930. Some hon. members may have seen this little summary of the Dunning budget, containing his picture. In that May day budget speech he reported that our sales of export wheat were down $243,000,000 and that our sales of export flour were down $20,000,000 from the previous year. He also stated that the price of No. 1 northern at Fort William had dropped in 1929-30 from $1.55 to 82 cents. Who was responsible for that drop? If the Liberal government will take the responsibility for the drop in 1929-30, when wheat went down 73 cents a bushel, I would be willing for the Bennett government to take the responsibility for the drop from 80 to 40 cents in the first two years it was in office.

I shall not deal further with the question of parity prices. That is nothing new because the principle was adopted in the Conservative party platform prior to the last election. It was adopted in January, 1940. I have a copy of the speech made by the Hon. Robert Manion in western Canada in which he said that he was in favour of a fair parity price for the farmer and that if his party were returned to power he would provide for storage on the farm and set a fair price comparable with the price the British farmer received. So a parity price is nothing new. It was part of the policy of the Conservative party at that time.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in his address the other night made several splendid suggestions which I trust the minister will be prepared to have considered and adopted when this measure goes before the committee.

I have already made reference to various orders in council, and I wish to refer briefly now to one in particular, P.C. 1803, which was passed since this bill was placed on the order paper for second reading. This order in council gives the wheat board very wide powers. Section 2, dealing with the regulations—and here is where the order in council does not conform to the act as it was prior to this proposed amendment—provides that the board may buy wheat from persons other than producers "at such prices as the board deems fair and just." So the board is there given power to go outside the producers and buy at any price that seems fair and just. We may therefore expect another order in council with respect to price.

Another section of the order in council gives the wheat board power to enter into ordinary commercial banking arrangements on its own credit. I do not know that I object to that, but it does confer very wide powers upon the board.

Another section provides that any losses arising from the board's operations:

> . . . shall be paid from and out of unappropriated moneys of the consolidated revenue fund and any profits shall accrue to that fund.

So no profits from the board's operations can go to the farmer. That is definitely stated in section 3 (c) of the order in council.

There is another section of the order in council which I shall read. Section 7 provides:

> 7. These regulations shall be deemed to have become operative on March 5, 1942, and shall expire on August 1, 1943, subject to the provisions of section 19 of the Interpretation Act which are made applicable hereto as if these regulations were revoked on said latter date.

So there is no question that the 90-cent price is to prevail throughout the whole year, and that is something that should be considered.

In conclusion, I want to make this suggestion to the minister. I shall not review the report of the wheat board which was so ably covered by my leader this afternoon, but I do think it is important that the committee to which this bill goes should be given very wide powers. We require a good deal of information. We have had no inquiry into the grain trade since the committee of 1936 sat to inquire into Mr. Murray's operations. The reports of the board, while they go into detail, do not cover the situation in such a way that the ordinary man can understand it. I think it was a mistake to have this bill go to the agriculture committee. With all due respect to members of the house, they do not know as much about wheat as I should like them to know. I am not saying that disparagingly at all, because I, for instance, know nothing about fish.

Mr. HOMUTH: There are lots in the house.

Mr. PERLEY: There are lots of fish-eaters here. But I do not believe there are twenty members of the house who can intelligently follow through the various transactions in wheat from the time it is sold on the grain exchange until its delivery in Liverpool, simply because they are not familiar with the different transactions. I do not think the agriculture committee is the proper committee to which to send this bill. I think we should have a committee set up of eleven or thirteen members with power to call witnesses and take evidence so that we may have a thorough investigation into the whole operations of the board and of the grain trade, and that we may get the information that we require. A verbatim report of the evidence and proceedings of the committee should be taken and the report printed.

We have not received any information from the minister. I asked him last year if he had any further report to make, and he said no. I asked him if he would give us interim reports. The act itself provides for weekly reports, but we have never had one in two years, and the consequence is that hon. members have not received the information they require. Again I say, with all respect to the members of the committee, that the agriculture committee is not the proper committee to which to send this bill. That is borne out, I think, by what happened this morning at the committee, where one man started to talk about eggs. If we are not careful we may be talking about eggs on this bill before it gets through the agriculture committee.

Before this bill is referred, I should like the minister to say that whatever committee is chosen it will be given the fullest power to call and examine witnesses and take a verbatim report of the evidence and have its report printed. I would ask the minister, further, if he will be prepared to accept by way of amendments any reasonable suggestions to improve the bill which may be made in the committee and which do not involve any extra charge upon consolidated revenue. I think the minister should be fair enough to do that.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, this debate has already been rather prolonged and I do not intend to take much time. In fact I had not intended to speak at all; but since from the government side of the house the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has spoken twice, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) twice, and the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) twice, and others have made long speeches, I feel that we are relieved from any prior understanding we had that this bill should go to the committee as rapidly as possible, and therefore I propose to say a few words to-night.

From the government side of the house we have been criticized for having moved an amendment to the second reading of the bill. We did so in order to get a free vote of this house. It was moved in such a manner as not to imply a want of confidence in the government, and it was moved in the language, modified to meet our occasion, of one of the greatest parliamentary leaders this country has ever seen. I refer to Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COLDWELL: Always from the other side of the house, when the name of that great Canadian is mentioned, there is some applause. I suggest that Sir Wilfrid Laurier ought to be no longer regarded as the special possession of the Liberal party, but that he ought to be regarded as common to all the people of Canada. This is not a vote of want of confidence, and my Liberal friends from Saskatchewan, including the Minister of Agriculture, should welcome the opportunity to place themselves on record, in a vote in this house, on the policy which they promulgated in that province as long ago as 1934. I am not going to refer at length to the leaflets which were scattered by hundreds of thousands over that province in 1934 when the Minister of Agriculture was seeking election as premier of the province: Dollar wheat will pay your taxes; dollar wheat will educate your family; dollar wheat will buy new clothes; dollar wheat will maintain the church, and so on and so forth. Now in a free vote of this house, the gentlemen who advocated that policy, and won the election on that policy in 1934, have the first opportunity which has been accorded them in all these years to vote for that policy without endangering the government in any particular whatsoever. I say, therefore, that they should support this amendment and we should have a record of those who are in favour of giving to the western producers that dollar wheat which was promised so long ago.

If I may go on without friendly as well as unfriendly interruptions, I say that there was no way of referring this bill back to the committee on the third reading and incorporating in such a reference the demands of the farmers of the province from which I come, made to this parliament and to this government both by resolution and by delegation. On the third reading of this bill we could not do what we have done in this amendment—refer to the dollar price or to the parity price—because it would have been ruled out of order. The second reading of a bill decides the principle of the bill. This was the place to record our disapproval of the government's policy and our desire in relation to a policy which we should like to have seen adopted. We are not playing politics in this regard.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, no. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other day put us squarely on the spot in this house.

He turned to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and complained that the hon. gentleman had not shown his opposition to the plebiscite bill on the second reading. The Prime Minister said that the principle of the plebiscite bill had been adopted unanimously by this house because no one had moved an amendment or voted against it on the second reading.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member may not refer to a previous debate in this session.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not quoting from any previous debate, Mr. Speaker. I believe I may refer to the debate without quoting.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is using the arguments advanced in that debate.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not quoting, but I will endeavour to abide by your ruling, Mr. Speaker. It was stated, no matter by whom, that, because the second reading of the bill was not challenged, the house unanimously adopted the principle of that bill. I do not propose, we do not propose, that we should be placed in that position in connection with this particular matter which so vitally concerns the constituents whom we represent in this house.

This is not a matter of political strategy. It is an attempt to solidify those in this house who believe that $1 a bushel for wheat is the absolute minimum, and we wish to do so in a free vote that may be taken in this house on a problem of vital concern to western agriculture. We have been hearing a great deal about parity prices, although a few years ago when we of this group used to speak of parity prices we were often asked what we meant. The term has now become well known. Parity prices are essential to the welfare of agriculture, and western agriculture particularly. The wheat farmers of western Canada to-day are in large measure carrying the nation's load of food, which it has quite properly been stated from time to time in this house, may be one of the most effective weapons of victory, and we contend that this nation ought to carry that load if it is regarded as a great national asset and something that will assist us in winning a future victory.

I agree with all those who have said to-day and on other occasions that the grain exchange should be closed and that speculation in all food products should be entirely eliminated. The revelations made this afternoon by the leader of the opposition, of the transfers of cash wheat to futures and futures to cash wheat, and so on and so forth, are matters which ought to be investigated anew by a committee, and I support those who have asked the government to grant such a committee to inquire into the whole system of wheat marketing in this country. But I would say this to the leader of the opposition. He warned us this afternoon of some dangers in connection with what he called planned economy after the war. I make this prediction, that all the civilized nations, when this war is over, will be called upon to do more and more of economic planning. This will mean that the various types of producers in those countries and communities will have to receive for their products prices which are commensurate with the toil involved in raising those products. The only intelligent alternative to planned economy is complete freedom of trade. If the manufacturing interests and everybody else concerned will completely wipe out all the tariff walls which they have built round this country, I am sure that the agricultural producer will be quite prepared to take his chance with everybody else.

Mr. HOMUTH: What about the industrial workers?

Mr. COLDWELL: But so long as tariffs and quotas remain, so long as "trades" are negotiated between nations, so long will there have to be some forms of economic planning, and those forms may ultimately lead to relief from trade restrictions, indeed, in reality, to a greater freedom of trade than the world has ever known.

Mr. MAYHEW: Does the hon. member want to put Canadian labour on the same basis as Japanese labour?

Mr. COLDWELL: No. I have not said that under present conditions I am in favour of complete and absolute free trade.

Mr. HOMUTH: You voted for a free trade policy, though.

Mr. COLDWELL: I look to the day—

Mr. MAYHEW: Don't limit your remarks to the manufacturers.

Mr. COLDWELL: —and I believe it is not so far off, when the Japanese, the Chinese, the Hindu, the Burmese, the natives of Africa, will be raised to the economic and social level of the white races, and when they, too, may join with the rest of us in enjoying a higher form of economic and social life than any of us have yet known.

An hon. MEMBER: That will be in heaven.

Mr. MAYHEW: That might be after the fifth world war.

Mr. COLDWELL: Perhaps it will not be in my lifetime or yours. In the meantime we shall have to resort to other methods to maintain our standards of life; I readily grant that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GILLIS: And we are doing it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was just referring to the suggestion of the leader of the opposition that a planned economy should be looked upon with some suspicion by the farmer.

We also heard it said that there were those interested in these problems who were setting east against west and west against east. This is not a western problem alone; it is a problem which concerns every part of Canada. As far as we from western Canada are concerned, we have no desire to set east against west or west against east. Our problems are, in different forms, common to all the nation, and we shall have to solve them as a nation and in cooperation with one another.

I said that the grain exchange should be eliminated. I was in England last autumn, and I confess that I tried to find out why the grain exchange was still operating and that I did not succeed. But I did find out that the present British Minister of Agriculture is as anxious as are the Canadian farmers that there should be as speedily as possible a conference, attended by representatives from both the producing and the consuming countries, and particularly Great Britain and the overseas dominions, at which an agricultural policy could be worked out which would prevent, both now and after the war, the primary producer from being penalized and ruined by continuous low prices. I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and the government to-night that I hope every effort will be made to organize such a conference, in cooperation with the British Minister of Agriculture, and others interested, in Great Britain.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask the hon. member if he found out what price they in Britain are in favour of for wheat in that period?

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not find out what that price was.

Mr. GARDINER: I did.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, that, to me, is a rather unfortunate remark, because it carries the connotation that that price was very low.

Mr. GARDINER: Not "very low".

Mr. COLDWELL: And I am going to say this, that if this commonwealth of nations is going to exist in the future, it can exist only on fair dealing and justice between all parts of it.

Mr. HOMUTH: You are predicating that on what the minister said—which we don't know anything about.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wonder whether this hon. member will be just a little quiet. We will ask the minister to tell us the price at another time.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the house to the fact that the hon. member is entitled to proceed with his speech without interruption, and I ask that the hon. member who has just interrupted him will observe the rule.

Mr. COLDWELL: As I said, I do not know what the price was. I should like the minister to tell the house. All I can say is that if there are in Great Britain certain people—and I know there are, because I got, not the price, but a disappointing reaction on one occasion—who think they can maintain good relations between Britain and the great overseas dominions by driving the overseas producers down to the level of peasantry, this great commonwealth will not continue to exist. Make no mistake about that. But, fortunately, I know that there are very many more in powerful places in Great Britain who think exactly the opposite, who believe that the producer overseas should not be driven down to the level of peasantry, and those people, I may add, are likely to be in the ascendancy when this war is over.

I should like to say a word about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. We were twitted by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) because we were not debating it. It had gone to a committee. But let me say that right from the outset we not only supported the principle of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act but advocated a broadening of its provisions. We have always hoped that this measure would develop into a real form of crop insurance, and that that crop insurance would be, like other forms of insurance, on an individual basis. We should like to have seen the Prairie Farm Assistance Act further extended, not restricted, this year.

Some attempt has been made in this house to confuse the entire issue by talking about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and wheat prices at the same time. The two things are entirely different. The price of wheat is the problem of a depressed industry; the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is the problem of a distressed area, two different problems altogether, which should be considered distinctly and apart. The wheat price should be a reasonable price, as a matter of justice to a depressed industry, depressed because of uncontrollable conditions as far as the farmer is concerned—by war now, and in past days by government policy, such as the imposition of tariffs, which made him sell his produce in the open free market of the world and buy his supplies in a completely protected and closed market. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act deals with a depressed area, due to crop failure, drought, grasshoppers and the other plagues with which the western producer has been cursed.

Again, may I say, to some extent this was caused by faulty national policies; land settlement policies, organized by railways and governments, opening up land which never should have been opened to the plough, and of course aggravated by low prices in the few good crop years that we experienced. I am not going into that to-night. I am just going to say that so long as we fail to face the problem of the marginal and sub-marginal lands—of which there is not as great an area as many people think—and deal with it, perhaps in some instances by larger irrigation policies than were instituted under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act with some success, or by resettlement so that the people now occupying those lands may be humanely moved to places where they can make a living, so long must we continue to use and expand the present crop failure bonus system. As I have said, I should like to see it so expanded that payments would be on the basis of the individual farm.

Thus the two problems, the problem of the distressed industry and the problem of the depressed area, are distinct. The first, the distressed industry, can be dealt with under a decent parity price. This is realized by a very large number of people in western Canada.

In Saskatchewan alone, approximately 185,000 people signed the petition in favour of an initial payment of $1, looking to parity prices in the future. These 185,000 contributed their mites to send more than 400 representative farmers to meet this government and members of this house. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that when I saw those people here I was proud of them. A finer group of men, the railways told us, had never been transported across Canada; and their presentation here was something that did both them and the people who sent them the greatest credit.

They want $1 as an initial payment. That does not approach the parity price. It does not give them, according to the records of our own experimental farms and our universities, even the cost of production. Then they hope that during the year improved conditions may enable payments to be made to bring the final payment up to parity. But let me say this to the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Gregory), who spoke last night, and to others who have said the same thing, that there seems to be a misunderstanding on the part of some hon. members as to the present wheat situation and the possibility of a parity payment. Under our wheat board act as it now stands, if the government takes 280,000,000 bushels of wheat this year at 90 cents, no matter how high the price may rise beyond that, there will be no further payment on those 280,000,000 bushels this year, because, according to the wheat board act, the new wheat cannot be sold unless and until the other wheat, called the carryover, has first been sold and complete settlement made with the farmers.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not in accordance with the act; it is in accordance with the practice under administration.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then I will put it in that way, according to the practice under the administration.

Mr. HOMUTH: Which is it, the act or the administration?

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister says the administration. Let me add this. Hon. members may have noticed that the western grain growers have been asking for some time that the carryover as of August 1 next, we will say, should be regarded as a reserve, and that the new crop up to 280,000,000 bushels should be sold and paid for within the crop year. So let us not be under any illusions; under the present policy what was suggested the other evening by the hon. member for The Battlefords is impossible of attainment unless the government policy be altered.

Industry is guaranteed the cost of its production. Agriculture must be guaranteed at least the cost of production for its products. We know that ruin faces the wheat area of western Canada under present conditions and under the present set-up. We need only look at the population figures as revealed by the recent census to see that, taking into account the natural increase Saskatchewan should have had, our population is from 150,000 to 175,000 less than it should have been. That, I believe, is the best indication there could be of the depressed and distressed condition of the western prairies. Those figures speak more eloquently than I possibly could speak in that connection.

We have said that we are fighting for a better world. I know from my experience in Britain last autumn that the British people do believe they are fighting for a better world. That is the reason why Sir Stafford Cripps occupies the position which he holds to-day. That is the reason why Doctor William Temple, longtime member of the Labour party, until recently Archbishop of York, has been elevated to the see of Canterbury. Those happenings are significant of things to come in Great Britain, and that is what maintains much of the morale there. We, too, have to consider the morale of our own people. One way of maintaining it is to guarantee to our aged a decent livelihood; to our workers, decent conditions, and to our farmers, prices that will enable them to lift up their heads in the community.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, that on every count members of parliament who have agriculture at heart, particularly members of parliament representing western constituencies, on this free vote—which is not a want of confidence vote—have an opportunity in deciding the principle of this bill to place themselves on record as being in favour of the modest request of the western farmers for an initial price of $1 a bushel and payments thereafter, we hope, that will approximate a parity level for this important commodity.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take five or six minutes to speak on the amendment of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas). The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) has said that we are fighting for a better world. Well, those who are fighting for a better world are getting $1.30 a day, while we sit in this house and talk about what should be done for parity, when there is parity for some and not for others. Hon. gentlemen to my left and opposite have referred to the grain trade; they have said that it is a north and south industry, not an east and west industry going to the markets of the world. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Weyburn reads:

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "This bill be not now read a second time but be it resolved that the disregarding by this parliament . . ."

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has already spoken on the amendment. His speech appears in Hansard for March 12, beginning at page 1248. It was a forty-minute speech.

Mr. CHURCH: I am speaking on the amendment of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas).

Mr. SPEAKER: May I ask the hon. member this question: Has he already spoken on the amendment?

Mr. CHURCH: I spoke on the motion, not on the amendment. I never spoke on the amendment, and I just wish to say three or four words about the amendment—not on the motion.

Mr. GARDINER: The amendment was moved on Tuesday, March 10, a week ago to-day. The hon. member spoke on Thursday and, as has been pointed out, his speech is reported at page 1248, beginning with the words:

> The motion for the second reading of Bills 12, 13 and 14, and the amendment moved by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) . . .

And so on.

Mr. CHURCH: I referred to the amendment; that is all. I did not speak on it.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word before the vote is taken, and in doing so I would add my request to the government that an opportunity be permitted whereby witnesses may come before the committee to which this bill will be sent. We never tire of describing the importance of the wheat industry to the economy of Canada. It is very evident that both within and without the house there is a body of opinion most sincerely held that the policies and practices followed by those who market the wheat are not all that they should be. It appears to me most desirable, therefore, that the government should grant this request.

I would draw this simile to what happened when the wheat board bill was before the house in 1935. On that occasion there was a most insistent demand from supporters of the then opposition, who now sit on the government benches, that witnesses should be heard before the committee which examined that measure. The government of the day gave way. The bill became an act, and that act is the one under which we now operate. When it is contended that the business of marketing, which is carried out under that act, is open to question, it is surely desirable for the government to give way to that request. I would draw its attention to the fact that since that opinion held so widely in Canada is one which should be examined into, with witnesses before the committee, it appears to me it will go out through the country as a matter of deep regret that the government refuses to grant this request.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the request made by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling)—

Mr. STIRLING: Made first by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson).

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): —and by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to the effect that wide latitude be given the committee on agriculture with respect to the calling of witnesses, and hearing a large number of people, I would point out that I am not a member of the committee on agriculture, and I understand that the power to call witnesses is in the hands of that committee. The committee will regulate as to the procedure to be followed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is no undertaking.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think that consistent with time and proper economy the widest possible latitude should be given the committee to get out all the information it desires. I shall be very glad to have on hand members of the wheat board and members of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada and, so far as other witnesses are concerned, where there is no heavy expense involved I think it would be quite in order to have them on hand. I shall be glad to do that, and shall be glad so to suggest to the committee.

But, Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the remarks made a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when he spoke about revelations made this afternoon by the leader of the opposition. In 1936 I was a member of the special committee on agriculture, and heard what I understand to be exactly the same line of suggestion or charges, if I may use that word, as were made in the house this afternoon. At that time I was particularly interested in the two men who led the battle in getting out as much information as possible. I refer to the then member for West Calgary, Mr. Bennett—now Viscount Bennett—and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I was particularly interested in what I considered to be the splendid manner in which they sought to get from the witnesses all possible information. The evidence of that committee is printed in full and is available, and I believe it deals with exactly the same subjects as were introduced this afternoon by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But that committee sat under another chairman.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I shall, however, ask the committee on agriculture to which this bill is referred that, consistent with time and reasonable economy, the widest possible opportunity be given members of the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister go further? I have no doubt what he has said would be quite satisfactory to members of the committee; but will he have the evidence printed? It seems to me that is very important, too.

Mr. GARDINER: The committee decides that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But the committee refused to do it on the other bills.

Mr. GARDINER: No; they did not refuse. It was finally agreed that it would not be done with respect to the two, but this was left for decision.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the question is still open, all right.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with the vote on the main motion for the second reading of this bill, I sincerely believe, because of the differences of opinion expressed in this house by hon. members representing the eastern and western parts of Canada, that the Canadian people should be consulted by way of a referendum on the question of national importance raised by this measure. I admit that the wheat producers of the prairie provinces are living through difficult times, but the eastern farmers are also experiencing hardships just as serious, and I have often exposed their plight to this house. On the one hand, the wheat grown by the western farmers is selling at a very low price; on the other, the farmers and consumers in the east are paying very high prices for wheat flour and bread. Farmers can obtain the by-products of western wheat, such as bran, only upon conditions which resemble robbery. In Canada the trusts are exploiting both the consumer and the farmer. What is the government doing to stop these abuses?

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is reading his speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Objection has been taken that the hon. member is reading his speech.

Mr. LACOMBE: I am not reading my speech, Mr. Speaker; I am only referring to my notes. When I read a speech I am obliged to use glasses.

Mr. SPEAKER: I accept the statement of the hon. member.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. On March 3 the hon. member spoke to the main motion before the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) had been moved. Therefore, since he has already spoken on the main motion I submit that he is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have just received the record, which shows that the hon. member spoke on the main motion, at page 1183 of Hansard, before the amendment was moved. Therefore, he is out of order.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I submit that I never spoke on the main motion or on the amendment. I am now moving an amendment which reads as follows—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. At page 1183 of Hansard the hon. member is reported as having spoken on the main motion prior to the moving of the amendment by the hon. member for Weyburn, and the hon. member is therefore not entitled to speak again on the main motion.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I move the following amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The amendment was moved at page 1190 of Hansard, subsequently to the speech made by the hon. member on the main motion. The hon. member is therefore not in order in speaking now on the main motion.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, if I have spoken on the main motion, that does not prevent me from moving an amendment now?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has already spoken on the main motion and is not entitled to speak on it again.

Mr. LACOMBE: I shall not speak but move an amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not entitled to speak now.

Mr. LACOMBE: I appeal from your decision, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Five members must rise for an appeal to the house. The question is on the main motion.

Main motion (Mr. MacKinnon, Edmonton West) agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

WAR APPROPRIATION

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, inter alia,

1. That sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 be granted to his majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1943, for—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever; and

(d) the carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the existence of a state of war.

2. That the governor in council be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of $2,000,000,000 as may be required for the purpose of defraying such expenses or making such advances or loans, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

3. That the governor in council be empowered to reexpend, advance or loan moneys that may be received by way of refund or repayment of advances, loans or expenditure under the war appropriation acts of 1939 (second session), 1940, 1941 and 1942.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon (Mr. Vien) in the chair.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. ILSLEY: This is an important resolution, and at this stage I should like to make a brief statement with respect to the subject matter. There are so many other matters that must be advanced before the Easter recess that it is not my expectation that we shall be able to debate this resolution at all, or at least to any extent, before the Easter adjournment, but it is important for the purposes of interim supply that it be placed before the committee of the whole as is being done to-night. If the committee thinks fit, I suggest that I make a statement on the resolution and that then the committee report progress and we go on to some other measure which it is important should be introduced and dealt with before the Easter recess. The debate on this resolution in committee of the whole will, I assume, take days and perhaps weeks, because this is the occasion when the members of the House of Commons have their opportunity of asking the government what disposition was made of the money that was voted last year, why we require so much money this year, and what is to be done with the money that is to be voted. It is not a matter which I would expect to be dealt with quickly. My suggestion is, if I may repeat, that I make a statement on the subject to-night. Then someone might move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, and we could go on with other financial matters.

This resolution seeks permission to introduce a measure which will provide the major appropriation for our war expenditures during the new fiscal year which begins on April 1. If the resolution passes, it will be followed by a bill which, when enacted, will become the War Appropriation Act, 1942. The bill will be in substantially the same form as the appropriation acts of 1939, 1940 and 1941, except that the amount requested will be vastly greater, reflecting the ever-growing scale of Canada's war effort. But even the $2,000,000,000 requested by this resolution will fall far short of representing the total sum which will be required during the next fiscal year to finance Canada's war expenditures.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) explained to the house some weeks ago, our total war expenditures for next year are estimated at approximately $3,000,000,000, roughly about six times the total expenditures of this government in the pre-war years. Hon. members may ask how the remaining $1,000,000,000 will be provided. As the speech from the throne indicated, it is our intention to ask parliament to approve the making of a free and unconditional gift of $1,000,000,000 worth of foodstuffs, raw materials, munitions and other war supplies, to the United Kingdom. In other words, instead of the indirect assistance to Britain, which we have been giving in the past, in order to enable her to finance her enormous purchases in Canada, we propose in future to provide these war supplies to Britain as a direct part of Canada's war effort, up to the amount of $1,000,000,000. It is therefore my intention to move later—I hope to-morrow—a companion resolution now on the order paper, which will seek authority to introduce another appropriation bill, which will be called the War Appropriation (United Kingdom financing) bill. This latter bill will provide, among other things, for an appropriation of $1,000,000,000 for this purpose.

It is true that the appropriations to be authorized by this second measure will not relate exclusively to the fiscal year 1942-43. It will provide continuing statutory authority not related to any one fiscal year. It is my hope that it will be passed promptly and that the appropriation it will provide will become operative during the present fiscal year and will cover expenditures incurred during, say the present month as well as during the remaining months of 1942 and for some time in 1943.

When the War Appropriation (United Kingdom financing) bill is before the house I shall attempt to explain more fully how the $1,000,000,000 appropriation is to be divided between this year and next year. I thought, however, it was necessary for me at this time to make this brief reference in order that the house might understand why we are asking at this time, in the present resolution, for only $2,000,000,000, although we have estimated that our war expenditures will run to about $3,000,000,000 during the coming fiscal year.

If I may now return to the resolution which I have moved, I would point out that the main war appropriation bill which the resolution precedes will, as last year, contain three essential features. First, it will ask for a vote of credit for war purposes, but this time, as I have said, for $2,000,000,000. Second, it will ask for a grant of borrowing authority; in other words, the bill, if passed, will enable the government to borrow funds to pay for any of the expenditures covered by the vote of credit if such borrowings are proved to be necessary. Third, as was the case with last year's bill, the new bill will confer power on the government to act as the agent of any British or allied government and, in this capacity, to incur temporarily obligations or costs which are recoverable from the government concerned. One of the few changes in this year's bill is to extend this power to cover obligations or costs temporarily incurred by a crown corporation such as War Supplies Limited, while acting as agent of the British or an allied government.

The first of these three features, namely the grant or vote of credit, is, of course, the most important aspect of the bill. To enable the house to discuss the magnitude of the vote requested, I shall first give some data and estimates as to our direct war expenditures during the current fiscal year. Hon. members will recall that when I spoke on the corresponding resolution of last year I said that the government had decided to ask parliament for an initial war appropriation of $1,300,000,000, although the war programme, as then outlined, would involve, according to the estimates of the departments, a total estimated expenditure in excess of that sum by perhaps $150,000,000. I explained some of the difficulties involved in making any advance precise estimates or rather forecasts of the probable cost of a full year's war effort, and I stated that if the departmental estimates were in fact realized, it would be necessary to come back to parliament for a supplementary appropriation toward the end of the fiscal year.

As every one knows, the monthly expenditures on war have been rising rapidly, and I expect that within a few days I shall have to introduce a supplementary appropriation for the current fiscal year for an amount of probably $135,000,000 to carry us through to the end of this month and to take care of outlays during April relating to expenditures made during the present fiscal year ending this month.

The latest estimate, which was made some days ago, and is still subject to revision, is that total direct war expenditures for the current year will reach about $1,431,000,000. This total may be broken down approximately as follows:

Army	$ 515,000,000
Navy	139,000,000
Air force, Air training plan (Canada's share)	258,000,000
Air force, home war defence and overseas	156,000,000
Munitions and supply	252,000,000
Other departments	111,000,000
Total	$1,431,000,000

This amount, it will be noted, is very close to the total of the estimates made by the departments last spring. As the house may recall, it contrasts with total direct war expenditures of $778,000,000 (including $26,000,000 of advances and loans charged to active assets) for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1941, and with total war expenditures of $118,000,000 in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1940.

The estimate I have just given of our war expenditures for the current fiscal year does not, of course, include the indirect assistance which we have given to the United Kingdom, and concerning which I expect to give the figures when I am dealing with the companion resolution now on the order paper.

But even excluding this substantial indirect assistance, the total represents an amount to be spent on a single year's war effort which to all of us in 1939 would have seemed incredible. For the new fiscal year, the corresponding figure for what has in the past been called our direct war effort will be nearly 50 per cent larger. As last year, we have aimed at a war programme which will represent the country's utmost capacity, the maximum which we can carry out with the physical and economic resources at our disposal. That capacity, it must be remembered, increases each year the war goes on, as existing plants are expanded and new plants are constructed to produce war equipment and supplies, as labour is trained and administrative skills are developed, as civilian expenditures are more and more restricted, and as our economy generally is more and more converted into a war economy.

I am free to say that the estimates submitted by the service departments, the Department of Munitions and Supply, and the various other departments engaged in war work, total up to a higher figure than the $2,000,000,000 which we have decided to ask parliament to authorize at this time. I need not, however, labour again the great difficulties of making precise forecasts so far in advance of actual expenditures, and particularly in a time as uncertain as the present; and of course it is always possible to come back to parliament for a supplementary appropriation if before the end of the new fiscal year it should prove that the actual expenditures are likely to exceed the vote for which we are now asking.

When the bill is before the house, detailed estimates can be given of the proposed expenditures by the various departments, but perhaps at this time I should give the house a break-down by the main categories of expenditures. Using the same classifications as I used a few minutes ago, for the probable expenditures for the current year, the estimates of the departments may be summarized in round figures as follows:

National defence:
Army services	$997,000,000
Naval services	259,000,000
Air services	585,000,000
Sundry	21,000,000
		$1,862,000,000
Munitions and Supply		355,000,000
		$2,217,000,000
Less duplication and recoverable items, say		150,000,000
Leaving for total defence and supply departments		$2,067,000,000
Other departments		146,000,000
Total		$2,213,000,000

The house will note that I have deducted from the combined total of the defence and supply departments' expenditures $150,000,000 as a very rough estimate of the probable amount of duplications and recoverable items in the estimates of these combined departments. It will be recalled that when the war appropriation bill of last year was under discussion in committee of the whole, my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and I myself explained that there were certain inevitable duplications in the estimates of these departments. I need not say that it is practically impossible to estimate what the amount of these duplications may prove to be and what recoverable items we may have in the year; the guess I have made is my own and should not be attributed to the departments concerned.

On another occasion in this house I expressed the view that the war programme which we have planned for the coming year, the programme which will be financed by the appropriation we are now requesting plus the proposed gift of $1,000,000,000 worth of foodstuffs, raw materials, munitions and other war supplies to Britain would "strain the human and material resources of this country to the limit." I believe that statement to be true. That objective is what we were aiming at when we planned the programme. To carry out the programme, to achieve our objective will involve an ever-increasing restriction of the human and material resources that we devote to the production of goods and services for civilian satisfactions—in other words, an ever-increasing reduction in our standard of living for the time being and until the struggle for survival in which we are now engaged has been won. I am confident that no Canadian will hesitate to approve this appropriation because of this fact.

Before I take my seat perhaps I should tell the committee a little of what I shall suggest should be done in the way of voting interim supply and supplementary appropriations. It will be necessary before the Easter recess to secure a vote from this house of one-sixth of the main estimates, that is the non-war estimates, by way of interim supply. That will be provided for in one bill, and will, I anticipate, go through by consent and without any debate, the usual vote of interim supply being one-sixth. That is one bill. Then it will be necessary also, since we are so near the end of the fiscal year, to secure a vote from the house of a proportion of this $2,000,000,000 to which I have referred, so that the necessary war expenditures in the next two or three months can be met. If we have this year the experience which we had this last year—and I am not criticizing it at all—it will take weeks and perhaps months before this resolution is enacted into legislation, because this is the main war vote that we are initiating here to-night; this is the time when hon. members ask us to give an account of our stewardship and go into our whole war programme.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I make a suggestion to the minister? Discussion could be greatly expedited if this appropriation were gone into, broken down, departmentalized, and the ministers would deal with one particular phase of things at one time. Last year we wandered all over.

Mr. ILSLEY: We tried to systematize it last year. We shall try it again this year—try very hard—because the hon. gentleman's suggestion is certainly in accord with the wishes of the government. We are most anxious to keep the discussion in a particular period limited strictly to one particular department.

But let me finish what I was going to say about what it will be necessary for us to do before the Easter recess. I mentioned one-sixth of the main estimates, the non-war estimates, the interim supply.

The second measure I am going to suggest will be one-quarter of the $2,000,000,000 by way of interim supply. That will be $500,000,000, which I am told by my officers will be necessary if there is going to be any substantial delay in the voting of the $2,000,000,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That will require a bill, also.

Mr. ILSLEY: It will require a bill also. That will be the second. Third, I shall have to ask the house to vote a small supplementary appropriation for the non-war estimates of last year. I have not spoken to my hon. friend about that; I did not think about it at the time, but it is a very small supplementary appropriation.

Mr. COLDWELL: What does the minister call "small"?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be for a few million dollars only. That is the third bill. The fourth bill I shall have to try to get through parliament before the recess is the supplementary war appropriation bill, which I did mention, and which will be a bill for $135,000,000. Those four measures I hope will not take any time. I hope they will go through quickly, because so far as I know there is nothing that could be said on those that cannot be said on the measure which is now before the house, and I am willing to give any undertaking that hon. members will not be prejudiced by letting those bills go through quickly.

In addition to those four bills—the two interim supply bills and the two supplementary appropriation bills—as I have said there will also be the important bill dealing with the $1,000,000,000 worth of foodstuffs and so forth that we are contributing to the war effort. I should like to-morrow to introduce the resolution relating to that, if I can, and I would expect it to be fully debated. I am not inviting a long debate on it, but I am not asking that it be put right through without debate, because that would not be fair to the house. I am giving the house now what I expect to happen in reference to those financial measures. We may not again get at the measure now under consideration before Easter, because the other measures may take up the time. If there is an opportunity to get at it again, we shall go on in committee and discuss it as we did last year, only trying to make the discussion more systematic, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has suggested.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to say just a word in relation to these matters. Yesterday the minister spoke to me with regard to six different orders of business to be considered before the Easter adjournment, and to-night he has mentioned most of them, together with an additional one. I think I should give some explanation to my colleagues with respect to the position we are in to-night. If hon. gentlemen will look at Hansard for last evening, they will see that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud), in moving the adjournment of the house, specified that to-day we would take either Bill No. 5 or the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Pensions and National Health

(Mr. Mackenzie) with respect to the settlement of land by veterans of the present war; that then the debate on wheat would be resumed, and that if we got through with that, we should go on and take up Bill No. 2. The minister went on to say:

It will not be possible to-morrow to take up any of the resolutions standing in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley).

It now turns out that the Minister of Finance, who I understood was to leave the city did not leave, and he wants this motion to go into committee to be put through for a technical reason, as it was explained to me. That reason is that after going into committee on this $2,000,000,000 war appropriation resolution he proposes, before the Easter adjournment, to ask for an interim appropriation bill covering 25 per cent of this amount, and it would not be possible to have that interim appropriation bill put through unless the resolution reached the committee stage. I do not understand the reason for that, but I am assuming it is a correct statement of the position, and it was on that understanding that I consented to what has been done to-night. Otherwise there would have been discussion, or perhaps otherwise the minister would not have moved this resolution to-night. But I would not want the minister to go on with any further money bills or resolutions or appropriations to-night, because we have had absolutely no notice of any intention to do so.

The minister has made it quite clear that any hon. member who wishes to make a speech during the resolution stage may do so on the interim supply bill appropriate to the $2,000,000,000 war measure, and that I think will take care of the position of certain hon. members who desire to speak during the resolution stage of this $2,000,000,000 bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I did not intend to suggest that speeches should be made on the interim supply bill. I suggested that speeches be made on this resolution in committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; that is not good enough, and I will tell the minister why. Hon. gentlemen who have speeches to make in connection with this $2,000,000,000 appropriation are not entitled to speak in accordance with arrangements made by the whips when the Speaker is not in the chair. When the house is in committee of the whole, with the deputy speaker in the chair, it is a case of whoever can catch the chairman's eye. Hon. members know it is catch-as-catch-can then, and it is a discommoding procedure. Therefore I think we must reserve the right to hon. members who want to make a speech on this war appropriation measure to do so before the 25 per cent is finally voted, and they must have the right to do that with the Speaker in the chair. There is an important distinction, and I think on reflection hon. members will realize what it is. That is what we would desire to do, and what I thought could be done as a result of what the minister stated. We understood there would be an interim appropriation bill, on which occasion any hon. member who desired to do so could make a speech, before the Easter recess. I suggest that this would help clear the air, and that hon. gentlemen who thought they were going to speak on the resolution but who have not been permitted to do so because of a desire to expedite the minister's position should be given an opportunity to do as they wish, and I hope the minister will reciprocate to that extent.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not mind one bit, so long as I get through. I do not, however, for important reasons, want that $1,000,000,000 bill hanging over the Easter recess.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is on another footing altogether.

Mr. ILSLEY: If there is time to get that bill through the house, get my other legislation in and get this interim supply through, I do not care how many speeches are made on it. But I do dread the possibility of arriving at Friday of next week with the bill relating to the $1,000,000,000 not through and the interim supply bill being fully debated.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I cannot control the procedure on the $1,000,000,000 bill. Any number of members may wish to speak on that, and the debate may go on for a month. I am, however, going to try to help expedite it; I said I would and I shall.

Mr. COLDWELL: Would it be possible by agreement to expedite the committee stage, and if a full dress debate is to be held, then have it on the second reading of the bill? We could have an understanding to that effect; the Speaker would be in the chair, and at that time we could take up anything we might have wanted to take up on the resolution.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; then you are confined to the principle of the bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: I can appreciate the position of the minister. We are only ten days away from the Easter recess, and I take it that the $1,000,000,000 resolution and bill are somewhat pressing.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, they are.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister wishes to get that through first. If we begin to debate this I imagine we shall be debating it when we rise at Easter.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, there is an easy way to settle this matter. We could proceed with the resolution in committee; and when the time of the Easter adjournment comes, the house could agree to one-sixth of the amount, subject to the continuation of the discussion as soon as the house meets again. Every hon. member will admit that the discussion of this resolution is much more important than any debate or discussion on the plebiscite and, in my humble view, it should have come before the house much earlier, so that hon. members would have had an opportunity to discuss the whole matter.

This is not a time to make speeches and homilies; it is a question of knowing how money will be spent, and that is all. Here we are facing again the question of ministerial responsibility. At times we hear ministers say, "We have assumed a tremendous responsibility." I understand that in a time of war it is no fun, and the ministers have to make decisions. But those decisions are not the ministerial responsibility. Ministerial responsibility is the rendering of public accounts to the representatives of the people assembled in the House of Commons of Canada, whether they sit in the house or in committee.

Last year I remember well that I mentioned the way in which public accounts were rendered, and pointed out that I was scandalized by the condition of affairs. I could not conceive why it should be that the larger the expenditure, the tinier would be the public account, and I made representations to that effect. I remember well that at that sitting a Conservative member of high standing, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) came to me and told me I was absolutely right.

Mr. MacNICOL: So you were.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. And a day or two later the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) made exactly the same argument, in which he complained about the way in which the accounts were rendered. Then the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in front of the whole house promised me that this year there would be an improvement in the rendering of public accounts. Unfortunately no one has seen any improvement.

Mr. MacNICOL: Worse.

Mr. POULIOT: No improvement in the way in which public accounts have been rendered this year; they are not any better than they were last year. Hon. members know very well that there are departments which give positively no information regarding the details of expenditures of public moneys. There is not any account for one cent spent by many departments, except as they appear in the accounts of the auditor general. Further, sir, the Department of Finance is the one department in the government which does not render any account. The accounts are rendered by the auditor general, and we do not find in them any items of a less amount than $5,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it is $35,000 now.

Mr. POULIOT: Perhaps; that is much worse.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is why I said it was worse.

Mr. POULIOT: It is much worse. There is not a single elector in Canada who is not entitled to full information concerning the rendering of public accounts.

Mr. MacNICOL: Absolutely.

Mr. POULIOT: Sometimes we hear complaints about the number of questions asked in the house by hon. members about the salaries paid to Mr. So-and-so, or the travelling expenses of Mr. So-and-so, or the living allowance of Mr. So-and-so, et cetera, et cetera, et cetera. In former years it was easy to look into the public accounts, which were certified by an officer of the crown receiving $15,000 a year, who could be discharged only by joint vote of the Senate and the House of Commons. Those accounts were complete. Then, if an elector, no matter how humble, came to his member to obtain some information about this man, that man or the other man, after having a glance over the public accounts the member was in a position to inform his constituent without having to ask the government a question during a session.

I have had a glance at the Orders of the Day and Votes and Proceedings, and I have seen the numerous questions asked by my colleagues for information which was available in former years without making any request. Is it because we are at war that we have completely lost responsible government—the responsible government for which our ancestors in this country fought? Have we lost the responsible government for which William Lyon Mackenzie, the grandfather of my chief, the Prime Minister, suffered so much? We have statues all round this building, and I would draw the attention of hon. members particularly to the monument commemorating Lafontaine and Baldwin, the men who succeeded in obtaining responsible government for Canada.

Not only have we lost responsible government, but we have lost even the notion of responsible government. We are now asked to swallow a piece of legislation referring to the expenditure of the astronomical sum of $2,000,000,000. We are asked to spend it like a drop of water—not a glass of water, just a drop. It is pretty hard for us to do that, because the constituents of each hon. member, whether on this side of the house or on that side, will have their right not only to inquire of their members about public accounts, but to ask those members in their own offices, or where they may receive the people of their constituency, "Sir, I am coming to you for information. Will you please tell me how much has been spent for—" some work, or possibly a salary, or some other kind of expenditure. Will those constituents be satisfied if the member answers: "Wait until the next session, and if we have an opportunity before adjournment we shall try to get the information for you."

No; it is not a matter of making speeches; it is a matter of getting accurate and complete information. The discussion will be longer just because of the fact that the public accounts are shapeless. There is not a province in Canada, not a city, not a township, not a village, no matter how small, where public accounts like these would be accepted, where they would satisfy those who have the responsibility of government. I am not talking in a grouchy or harping way; I am saying this because I feel it is my public duty. I am ready to support the government to the limit, but I do not want this house to lose rights for which our ancestors paid so dearly.

When I refer to the house, I do not mean only when Mr. Speaker is in the chair; I am referring also to when we sit in committee of the whole. We should follow the great example and traditions at Westminster. They are at war in England just as we are. They do not feel that being at war makes it impossible to check expenditures. The committee of national economy sits daily under the roof of Westminster and every expenditure is checked. There is public control through the members of parliament—they have the House of Lords and we have the Senate—over every expenditure, no matter how small. Last year I was promised solemnly—the house was promised that there would be an improvement in the public accounts. But nothing has been done; they are worse than before. I do not speak as a bad Liberal; I speak as one who is a Liberal at heart.

Mr. MacNICOL: You are speaking a lot of good sense to-night.

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friend would listen to me all the time, he would say that quite often. We must follow what has been done at Westminster during the long centuries since magna charta. There has been ministerial responsibility for the rendering of complete accounts for each expenditure. That is the British tradition. It is not sufficient for anyone to wrap himself in the British flag and say that he is a good British citizen. The flag represents a great past and great ideals, but there is something important that should never be forgotten. I refer to the traditions which have been followed closely during the centuries, the traditions of true democracy. We must follow these real British traditions in this house if we are to remain a British House of Commons.

I do not intend to say much more to-night because I have said enough. I have expressed my very deep disappointment and I, for one, will not tolerate such legislation passing in a hurry. We shall have to take our time. I am ready to sacrifice the Easter adjournment and stay here in Ottawa in order to scrutinize these expenditures to the last cent. I have made other sacrifices and I am ready to make this one. I might take a Sunday in order to see my electors, but I am ready to sit here every day in the week except Sunday and work conscientiously as a member of parliament in order to keep the confidence of my people.

If the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) wishes to go to Vancouver, he can stay with us all week, take an aeroplane at night, spend the afternoon in Vancouver and be back with us the day after. But I am sure that he is ready to make the same sacrifice as I am, and I am sure that all other hon. members are ready to do the same. Let us not be afraid to talk British common sense in times of war as well as in times of peace. The promise to which I have referred was made to the whole house because it was given at three o'clock on the orders of the day by no less a person than the right hon. the Prime Minister, my leader. That promise should not be forgotten. Moreover, that promise will be kept. I suggest that the public accounts which are unsatisfactory should be republished in as complete a form as they were during the last war. They are simply shapeless now. The smallest municipal council, the smallest school commission, would not accept accounts like that. How is it that we as members of parliament, representing 245 constituencies—244 now—should be expected to accept such shapeless accounts?

Let us not be afraid to use plain language to express our thoughts. My language to-night has not been private; it has not even been feeble. I believe I have spoken clearly enough to be understood by everyone. This is no joke. We are ready to go the limit to support the government, but this passes the limit.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is beyond the limit.

Mr. POULIOT: It is beyond the limit; the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) is absolutely right. This matter is serious. The victory loan campaign is over and the loan has been oversubscribed, so it cannot be said that we would be handicapping its success by discussing these questions. Every one did his share to make the loan a success. As I told my constituents—I want Hansard to translate that as "electeurs"—on previous occasions, it was the right thing to subscribe to the victory loan, but I was coming to Ottawa to try to check expenditures so that there would be no waste.

What I said to my people in my constituency—and I want Hansard to translate the word "constituency" by "comté"—I repeat now because I have no two ways of expressing myself, one way in the House of Commons and a different way in Témiscouata. I use the same language in both places and it pays in the long run. I hope that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) will have an opportunity to think over this matter and, as night sometimes brings good counsel, that he may change his opinion. There might be an amicable, friendly discussion in the best possible spirit. But the most important thing is not the expression of views, however respectable they may be, by any member of parliament in this house. The most important thing is to know what is going on and how the money is spent.

Mr. MacNICOL: You cannot find that out in the public accounts to-day.

Mr. POULIOT: We shall have to get it from the committee in due course.

Mr. GREEN: If the proposal made by the Minister of Finance is carried out, the effect will be that there will be no discussion of the war effort across the floor of this house until this house meets again on April 20. To me it is almost inconceivable that the house would agree to a step of that kind being taken. The resolution which is before us to-night, and which has come up although we were told it would not come up, gives us the one chance of the whole session to discuss Canada's war effort thoroughly. There is no chance to do that on the bill which follows the resolution. The chance is on the resolution itself, and I for one do not propose to agree, if unanimous agreement is required, to any course that will result in deferring all the discussion of Canada's war effort until after April 20. We have been here already for nearly two months, and in that time there has been no real opportunity at all to discuss Canada's war effort. With the enemy threatening us on our east coast and on our west coast this house has seen fit to talk for four weeks on the speech from the throne, then for several weeks on the plebiscite, then for many more days on wheat, as if there were no war raging in the world at all. That is setting a terrible example to the people of Canada. How can we ever expect to have our people put their backs into this war when this house carries on in that way? Then to have the government make this proposal to-night I think is an insult to the Canadian people. I suggest, I demand, that every minute from now until this house adjourns on the 27th of March be spent in discussing the war effort of this nation.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I wish to protest against this way of doing business. His majesty's forces are represented in this house by three ministers, one for the army, one for the navy, and one for the air force, and not one of these ministers is here to-night. I protest against voting $2,000,000,000 at 10 o'clock to-night. We spent in 1896 $36,000,000 for the total maintenance charges of Canada. Where are we in this war? Nobody knows where we are. We have nothing in the Pacific at all.

I say to the government, you have let Australia down. Before the war started you were dependent on pacifists. This resolution speaks for itself; but before the war, you not only threw away defence, but threw away your friends. The Minister of Finance now brings down a resolution——that sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 be granted to his majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1943.

All that $2,000,000,000 will not amount to 50 cents in beating Hitler. You let Australia down. You threw Australia to the wolves at the imperial conference in 1937 when Australia asked this dominion to give a large grant to the Singapore base, which would have resulted in safeguarding British Columbia and the Pacific. But this government at that conference refused to have anything to do with the Singapore base, and refused to adopt the Jellicoe report which would have given us adequate protection in the Pacific. You had a navy of three or four cruisers and a destroyer, boats which, added up, amounted to 9,240 tons, about the size of a good 10,000-ton tramp steamer to protect us in the Pacific. When we saw the war coming; when Hitler had invaded Czechoslovakia, when his armies had crossed the Rhine, which Mr. Baldwin said was our first line of defence, this government and hon. gentlemen opposite refused at that colonial conference of 1937 to go into an empire shipping scheme. They were told at that conference by New Zealand and Australia what the disasters might be to this dominion from the Pacific, and they refused to do a thing. They said: "We have no commitments, parliament must decide."

When you look at the text of this resolution for $2,000,000,000, you see that it is for "the security, defence ... of Canada." What security or defence have we had in the past from a similar vote since the war broke out?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. It is 11 o'clock.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am going to move in a minute that the committee rise—

Mr. CHURCH: I move that the committee rise.

Mr. ILSLEY: —report progress and ask leave to sit again. But first let me say just one thing. Any statement that we are trying to preclude, or delay, or defer discussion of the war effort is entirely unwarranted, and I never was more surprised than I was when I heard the hon. member for Vancouver South make the statement he did to-night. All I am asking now—and I am putting all my cards on the table—is this: I am saying that for tremendously important reasons I want interim supply, the supplementary appropriations and the $1,000,000,000 bill passed. If the house will do that, they can take the rest of the time, so far as I am concerned, on this matter before the house. The house has some responsibility at a time like this—

Mr. GREEN: So has the government.

Mr. ILSLEY: Discussion is important, but there are certain definite things that must be done, matters of great moment. I am simply asking the house to help me get those things done when they have to be done. Then they can take the rest of the time to discuss the war effort. No one is trying to shut off discusssion or prevent any one from talking.

Mr. CHURCH: I rise to a point of order. A speaker cannot be interrupted, and the minister interrupted me when I was speaking. The rules of the house are the same in committee as in the house. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN: It is eleven o'clock. It has been moved by Mr. Ilsley that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 18, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

First report of standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Weir.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LACOMBE—ARTICLE PUBLISHED IN "L'ACTION CATHOLIQUE" ON MARCH 17

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I wish to state that on March 17, 1942, L'Action Catholique published the following remarks about me:

> While behaving like a choir-boy, Mr. Lacombe uses coarse language. . . .
> Yesterday he said, without turning a hair, that the Quebec East electors had allowed themselves to be bribed wholesale because they did not vote for the Canadian party.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that this item is a pure fabrication. The hired scribe of L'Action Catholique would deserve to be summoned to the bar of the House of Commons to answer for his wanton attack against me and the Canadian party.

Mr. Lorenzo Paré would like to shelter under a racial cloak the alleged hero whose defence he takes. What he writes about me is a tissue of lies. The ineptitudes of that scribe are beneath my contempt.

Since it has allowed such foul statements to be published in its columns, I ask the readers of L'Action Catholique to return that paper to its editor, after having struck out the word "Catholique", which those people should no longer be permitted to besmirch. The fact that they are drawing money from the provincial treasury is their own concern. They are at liberty to wallow in the black ink of Mr. Godbout's printing contracts. Let them change the name of their paper or cease to publish it, because that is imperative in the best interests of religion and country. How shameful for a paper bearing such a great name to ridicule the choir-boys who are both the adornment and the pride of our places of worship!

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: How can a paper which bears such a great name attack a member who has for years stood up in this parliament in defence of our religion and our creed against the attacks of the Reverend Shields and the breakers of the Sabbath. What a servile attitude! What a disgrace!

MR. RALSTON—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION IN DEBATE ON MARCH 17

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday afternoon when I was out of the house the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) made this statement, as reported at page 1372 of Hansard:

How different was the position in 1935 when the legislation was set up.

He was speaking of the wheat bill. He went on to say:

The present Minister of National Defence, then the mouthpiece for the grain exchange and the other big interests from Winnipeg—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was this not all gone into last night? Can it be done a second time? Two questions of privilege on the same matter?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is extremely agitated;—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not a bit.

Mr. RALSTON: —he was not so agitated when I called him at his room last night and advised him that I was going to speak of this in the house. I call on my hon. friend to withdraw unequivocally that statement. I unequivocally denied it and my hon. friend knows perfectly well it is untrue. I ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will certainly deny that I knew it was untrue. If the statement is unparliamentary I will withdraw it. If he was not the mouthpiece of the big interests then he was the ally of the big interests.

Mr. RALSTON: I am asking that my hon. friend unequivocally withdraw that statement. I deny equally that I was the ally of the big interests. I want to say to my hon. friend that if there was anything wrong in connection with the legislation which was introduced and supported at that time by my associates and myself, his government, which commanded a very large majority in this house, could very readily have voted it down. Instead of that, the then prime minister, his leader, accepted those suggestions, put them in a bill and passed the bill, and further my hon. friend stated yesterday that what was proposed was "quite proper and was quite properly agreed to, and that was done."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why make a speech about it?

Mr. RALSTON: I am not making a speech; I am stating to my hon. friend that the statement that I was the ally of the big interests or that I was the mouthpiece of the big interests are both equally and unequivocally false.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the statement is unparliamentary I withdraw it.

Mr. RALSTON: I ask my hon. friend to withdraw the statement unequivocally.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does your Honour rule that I have to withdraw that statement?

Mr. SPEAKER: A specific denial has been made of the statement, and I think it should be withdrawn.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I bow to your ruling and withdraw it.

MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. RALSTON ON MARCH 5

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, and I shall proceed by referring to some exhibits. Exhibit P-1 is the French text of a letter which I read in the house on March 2, and which is transcribed at page 953 of Hansard. I hold in my hand the very copy that was sent to Hansard, in which there is reference to "F. Lieutenant, Mr. Wisseman," though I learned afterwards that the real name was Wiseman. Exhibit P-2 is a copy of Hansard for March 2, in which I note something wrong in the translation of that letter. The translation does not mention that "F. Lieutenant Wisseman" was "F. Lieutenant." He is only called "Lieutenant Wisseman." Exhibit P-3 is a copy of Hansard of March 5 at which time, on the orders of the day, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) referred to my statement, which I have already mentioned, in these words, at page 1049:

During the course of that same speech the hon. member read a letter from some young man at a training camp at Brantford, complaining that he had been subjected to some persecution on account of speaking French, and that in the course of an altercation which occurred he was arrested and put into the guard room. I have had a report from the training camp at Brantford, and the information I get is that a check of the guard reports reveals that only two men were confined in the guard room over the week-end of February 1, 1942, which was the date referred to, these being two drunks. Neither of these men was a French-Canadian. Inquiries made of all concerned reveal no knowledge of any such fracas as that described. There is no officer at this training centre by name of Lieutenant Wisseman, which is the name of the officer referred to by the hon. member in his speech.

There are many other exhibits which I cannot produce just now. They are copies of the five o'clock editions of the local newspapers on March 5, and the morning editions of March 6, in which the statement made by the minister in the house was quoted under big headlines. But on March 4, before the minister made his reference in the house, Mr. Malcolm MacLean, one of the assistants to the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), telephoned and asked for a copy of the letter, which I sent him. Then I received from the air department a report which was altogether different from that received from the Department of National Defence. All the facts I mentioned in the house were substantiated in the report that was sent to me by Mr. MacLean.

I congratulate the Minister of National Defence for Air on having transferred the man who lodged the complaint to another camp in the province of Quebec. But my first point is this. We have such difficulty in getting information at times, especially from the Department of National Defence, that when hon. members ask for definite information they should be given accurate information. My second point is that during this war all five war ministers are jointly responsible for all war departments, and no minister can give information of the kind given by the Minister of National Defence unless he obtains complete information beforehand. There are two camps in Brantford, one under the Department of National Defence and the other under the Department of National Defence for Air. My submission is that it was not right for the Minister of National Defence to answer the question as he did without first looking at the text of the letter I read, which was correctly quoted during the course of my speech as reported in Hansard, and second without knowing whether the complaint was about any camp in Brantford. Therefore, sir, I protest very strongly about it, and I hope such a thing will not occur again in future.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend will look at his statement at page 1046 of Hansard he will see that he was referring to the handicap which he said sometimes existed with regard to French-Canadians in the army. He says, "French-Canadians are often handicapped in the army," and then he goes on, "Here is a letter that I will read." He speaks of the letter being in French, and then reads it. I saw a translation of the letter; I knew it was with regard to the army, and I made this statement. I made no inquiries whatever with regard to whether or not there was a training camp at Brantford under the Department of National Defence for Air; and I had no knowledge of there being any officer by the name of Wiseman there. I made the statement with regard to the army; and I think my hon. friend will realize that I and my colleagues are associated as members of the government, just the same as I am associated with my hon. friend the Minister of Munitions and Supply, and every other minister. Each minister must answer with regard to matters which may arise concerning his own jurisdiction, and I must say that I dissent from the suggestion that before answering a question with regard to the army I have to consult my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence for Air or the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services to find out if some particular incident occurred in connection with those services.

Mr. POULIOT: Once more I was right.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

TABLING OF EXCHANGE OF NOTES BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on March 6 I announced the conclusion of an agreement with the United States under the terms of which the United States government had offered to construct and provide for the wartime maintenance of a road from Fort St. John in northern British Columbia to Alaska. I added that this offer had been accepted and that its terms would shortly be set forth in an exchange of notes to be made public. The exchange of notes was made this morning between the United States minister and myself, and I now table copies in English and French of those notes. I would ask the consent of the house to have the notes printed in the Votes and Proceedings of to-day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there any correspondence other than that to which the Prime Minister has now referred?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the only correspondence I am at liberty to table at the present time. However I shall see if there is anything else that might be laid on the table.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

MEASURES TO ESTABLISH UNITY OF COMMAND IN RESPECT OF COASTAL DEFENCE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an announcement with respect to unity of command between the different services on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

The war committee of the cabinet have approved a unanimous recommendation from the chiefs of staff that the following measures be implemented at once with a view to establishing unity of command as between the three Canadian services in respect of the defence of the west coast of Canada, the east coast of Canada and Newfoundland:

(a) The senior member of the joint service committee on the west and east coasts to be designated as commander-in-chief, west coast defences and east coast defences respectively.

(b) The primary function of the commander-in-chief will be to coordinate the preparation and execution of the defence plans of the three services in respect of such forces as may be allotted to his command by the chiefs of the respective services. He will in consultation with the senior commanders of the other services, allocate tasks to the three services and coordinate the combined effort.

(c) The commander-in-chief will exercise strategic direction of all three services and tactical command of his own service. He will not exercise tactical command in respect of any service other than his own. To ensure closer tactical coordination, the operations rooms of the three services on both coasts are being combined.

(d) The senior member of the joint service committee in Newfoundland will be designated, in respect of the three Canadian services, as commanding Newfoundland, defences. His functions in respect to Newfoundland will be the same as those laid down above for commanders-in-chief, west or east coast defences.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Now that the Prime Minister has made that announcement may I say that it is quite in conformity with what the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has advocated—and I do not intend to forestall him. However I should like to commend the Prime Minister for making the announcement in parliament rather than having members of parliament read it in the public press.

Mr. GREEN: Could the Prime Minister tell the house what particular officers will be in command as a result of this change?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On the Pacific coast I believe it will be Major-General Alexander, who is at the present time the senior officer. On the Atlantic coast it will be Major-General Elkins, and in Newfoundland Major-General Page.

Mr. CHURCH: Would the Prime Minister be good enough to tell the house what military value this road will have?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was speaking about the military command. Is my hon. friend speaking about the Alaska highway? Perhaps he would refer his question to the hon. member who sits immediately behind him.

WOOL

ORDER IN COUNCIL SETTING UP CANADIAN WOOL BOARD LIMITED

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in compliance with the request of the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) I lay on the table copy of an order in council setting up the Canadian Wool Board Limited, and the copy of a press release of the wartime prices and trade board in reference to the Canadian wool board.

3. Is the plant government owned?
4. Will it be operated by government direction as a government project?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The total estimated cost to the government of erecting and equipping the magnesium plant, known as Wartime Metals Corporation, located near Haley's Corners, Ontario, is $2,675,000 for a plant to produce 10 tons of magnesium per day, and if this is increased to 20 tons output per day a preliminary estimate indicates a total cost of approximately $6,000,000.

2. The applications for patents were made in the name of the inventor, Dr. L. M. Pidgeon, according to the rules of the national research council, and in due course will be assigned to Dominion Magnesium Limited.

3. The plant will be government owned.

4. The government is entering into an agreement with Dominion Magnesium Limited, whereby the plant of Wartime Metals Corpora-

2. What is the value of the property of all kinds of which title or possession has been taken by the custodian from nationals of each of the enemy or enemy-occupied countries?

6. What salary, allowance, fee or other emolument, including travelling expenses, is paid to each member of the advisory committee; and what is the total amount paid to each member since his appointment?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have had some communication with the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) with regard to this question, and I would suggest that questions 1 and 2 be deleted, with the privilege of returning to them at a later date, if it should seem desirable to do so. Perhaps questions 3, 4, 5 and 6, which are rather innocuous, might be answered.

Mr. McLARTY: That is agreeable.

Mr. SPEAKER: Nos. 1 and 2 are dropped; Nos. 3, 4, 5 and 6 stand.

Mr. POWER: Pass the others as being innocuous.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are; I know the answers now to all but No. 3.

PLEBISCITE—RAYMOND RANGER

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Does Mr. Raymond Ranger, registrar for division No. 4, Montreal, hold the position of returning officer for the county of Jacques Cartier in connection with the taking of the coming plebiscite?

2. If so, why does he hold both positions?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. Mr. Raymond Ranger is holding the position of returning officer for the electoral district of Jacques Cartier under section eight of the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, but has been granted leave of absence as returning officer and will not act as such at the pending plebiscite.

2. Answered in No. 1.

*YUKON AIRPORTS

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. What amount of public funds has been expended to date by Canada in building and improving each airport at Edmonton, Grande Prairie, Dawson Creek, Fort St. John, Fort Nelson, Watson Lake, Whitehorse?

2. Are any of said airports completed, if so, which of them?

Mr. POWER: With reference to question No. 27, I suggest it would not be in the public interest to give this information. These aerodromes form part of the air defence of Canada, and, indeed, of the American continent, and to give this information would permit the enemy to make an intelligent guess, to say the least, as to the size of the airports, the extent of accommodation for aircraft and their tactical use in connection with defence. I would be willing to send my hon. friend any information privately.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): With all due respect to the minister, I do not think the reason he has given for not answering the question is well founded, but if it will embarrass him I withdraw the question.

Mr. POWER: It would not embarrass the minister, but it might embarrass the defence of Canada. I will give all the information that is desired if the house insists on it, but I doubt if it will.

JAPANESE MINISTER AND CONSULAR OFFICIALS IN CANADA

Mr. REID:

What steps have been taken by the government regarding the return to Japan of the Japanese minister in Canada, and likewise the return of all Japanese consuls and officials resident in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

The question of return to Japan of the Japanese diplomatic and consular officials resident in Canada is a counterpart of the question of return to Canada of the Canadian diplomatic and other officials resident in Japan and Japanese occupied territory in the far east. Their repatriation is also bound up with a general plan of exchange of United Kingdom and United States officials and officials of other allied countries. The consideration and discussion of conditions of exchange, under this general plan, by the allied governments concerned has been the subject matter of much correspondence between themselves and, through the representatives of their respective protecting powers, with Japan. Much progress has been made with a view to reaching a satisfactory agreement and to completing the necessary arrangements. The Canadian government has kept closely in touch with the situation, through consultation with the United Kingdom and the United States governments and through the government of Argentina, our protecting power in Japan and in conversations with the consul general of Spain in charge of Japanese interests in Canada. It may be added that, concurrently, consideration is also being given to the exchange of nationals who have no official status.

Mr. POWER: There are three types of aerodromes, every one of which has been constructed by or has received assistance from the government. The first type, which I have mentioned and which forms part of the defensive system of Canada, is such that I do not believe it would be in the public interest to give information in connection therewith. Second, there are aerodromes for the use of the Royal Air Force transferred schools. I have had specific requests from the British government not to give information with respect to these. Third, there is the type of aerodrome constructed under the joint air training plan. I have been warned also not to give information about these, but since I have given so much about them I am quite willing to meet my hon. friend's request with regard to the general air training aerodromes only.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That will be satisfactory. I do not wish the minister to disclose information not in the public interest.

Mr. POWER: Order for return.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

VALCARTIER CAMP

Mr. McGREGOR:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports, memoranda or other documents in the possession of the government relating to various charges of theft, conspiracy to defraud and similar offences in respect of supplies for Valcartier camp, from 9th day of September, 1939, to date.

Mr. RALSTON: I spoke of this the other day, and since then I wrote to my hon. friend telling him that I had from the judge advocate general a statement to the effect that he considered it would not be in the public interest to bring down these papers at this time. The production of these papers would disclose information which should not be disclosed in view of the fact that an investigation is being conducted by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Therefore I ask my hon. friend to drop the resolution.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it might be withdrawn.

Motion dropped.

WAR RISK INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF MEASURE RESPECTING PROPERTY DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. When may we expect some information in connection with property damage war risk insurance?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I expect to introduce a bill before the Easter recess.

WAR EXPENDITURES COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask the Prime Minister when it is proposed to set up the war expenditures committee.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might say to my hon. friend that a day or two ago I was conferring with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) with respect to this matter. There has been some delay in receiving from the opposite side the names of those who are to be members of this committee, and we were to have a conference concerning the matter before I made a final announcement. I am prepared to have the conference any time that will suit the convenience of my hon. friend. The committee will be set up very shortly.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT AT KIRKLAND LAKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I should like to address a question to the acting Minister of Labour, if there is one in the house. I endeavoured to secure this information from the Department of Labour before deciding to ask the question here, but I was not successful. My question arises out of a telegram received from union officials in Kirkland Lake, copies of which were sent to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour.

Mr. SPEAKER: While I do not know the question the hon. member intends to ask, the form he has used in presenting it suggests to me that it should be placed upon the order paper.

Mr. GILLIS: My question is—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury)-: The hon. member might be allowed to state his question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would be glad to hear the question before deciding.

Mr. GILLIS: The telegram sets out that a thousand men are idle as the result of the dispute in Kirkland Lake. Up until last Friday, the 13th, the unions were carrying them on relief, but they had to terminate this relief last week, not being able to carry on.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the form of the question is such that it should be placed upon the order paper.

Mr. GILLIS: In my opinion this matter is urgent. I endeavoured to get the information in another way, but could not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: Have the government any plans?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have ruled already that the question should be placed upon the order paper. From what the hon. member has just said it is apparent that this question has been under discussion for several days at least; therefore the question of urgency cannot apply. The hon. member should place it upon the order paper.

Mr. GILLIS: These people will starve in the meantime.

UNEMPLOYED EX-SERVICEMEN AT KIRKLAND LAKE

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health. Is he aware of the fact that there are roughly thirty-nine ex-service men, some of them with two boys in the army at the present time, who have worked in the mines for as long as from one to eighteen years and who are now being denied employment at Kirkland Lake? If so, does he intend to do anything to help them?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the matter referred to by my hon. friend. I received no notice of the question she intended to ask this afternoon.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

PROCEDURE WITH RESPECT TO QUESTIONS ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, I wish to bring before the house a matter referring not particularly to the government but to the house at large. I have in my hand a resolution received from—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would say that it would hardly be proper to place a resolution before the house on the orders of the day.

Mr. WARD: This is something which could not be placed on the order paper; the question is not in that form.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it cannot be placed on the order paper, I cannot see how the question can be asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand that the hon. member is raising a question affecting the privileges of this house; is that correct?

Mr. WARD: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member will say on his responsibility that this is a matter affecting the privileges of the house, then of course he may proceed.

Mr. WARD: I cannot say that it is, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The argument of the Minister of Pensions was wasted on the desert air.

VEGETABLE PRODUCTS

EXTENSION TO MONTREAL OF PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEHYDRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand two orders in council, P.C.9228, of December 6, and P.C. 1/1656, of March 3, by virtue of which an expenditure of over $380,000 is provided for in respect of dehydrated vegetable products.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is this a question of privilege the hon. member is raising?

Mr. POULIOT: No, sir, it is just a question. I talked to Your Honour about it. Since it is provided by these orders in council that one plant in British Columbia, two in Ontario and two in the maritime provinces will benefit by their provisions, I would ask the Minister of Agriculture if it is not the intention of the government to extend the same advantages to the city of Montreal, where is located the largest refrigeration plant in Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This question should be placed on the order paper.

WAR APPROPRIATION

UNITED KINGDOM FINANCING—WAR SUPPLIES, FOOD AND LOAN WITHOUT INTEREST

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide:—

1. That sums not exceeding one thousand million dollars ($1,000,000,000) be granted to his majesty towards defraying the expenditures that may be incurred during the present war for the purpose of enabling the government of the United Kingdom to purchase in Canada aircraft, tanks, mechanical transport vehicles, guns, ammunition and other munitions of war, foodstuffs, raw materials and any other commodities and supplies essential to the conduct of the war and the maintenance of the people of the United Kingdom, and to assist in enabling the government of the United Kingdom to defray other expenditures incurred in Canada for war purposes.

2. That the Minister of Finance may be empowered to accept from the government of the United Kingdom an obligation of the said government in such form and subject to such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine for a sum of seven hundred million dollars ($700,000,000) in exchange for an equivalent amount, at an exchange rate of $4.45 to the pound sterling, of deposits in pounds sterling held in banks in the United Kingdom, the said obligation of the government of the United Kingdom not to bear interest until the termination of the war.

3. That the governor in council be empowered to make provision for the purchase of any or all unmatured securities or obligations of or guaranteed, either as to principal or interest or both or as to dividends, by the Dominion of Canada or of or guaranteed either as to principal or interest or both by the Canadian National Railways, which are now or may hereafter be held by the government of the United Kingdom.

4. That the governor in council be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money not exceeding in the whole the sum of one thousand million dollars ($1,000,000,000) as may be required for the purpose of defraying the expenditures and making the purchases referred to herein, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I propose to make a statement to the house on this resolution while Your Honour is in the chair. It was my intention to read the resolution, but it will shorten the time I have in which to make my remarks if I simply refer members of the house to it.

The purpose of the resolution is to secure authority to introduce a bill to implement the proposal for a revision of our financial relations with Britain which was outlined by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his address on the speech from the throne on January 26.

Before explaining the major provisions of the resolution and of the bill which will follow, I think it would be desirable for me to give a brief historical review of our financial relationships with the United Kingdom and the rest of the sterling area since the outbreak of war. By doing so, it will be possible for me not only to explain the methods which have been followed from time to time but also to give to the house the necessary statistical information to show the magnitude of the problem which has had to be met and the extent to which different forms of assistance have been relied upon.

As the house is aware, the British requirements of Canadian dollars to make payment for their large purchases of munitions and war implements, foodstuffs, minerals and other products have greatly exceeded the amount of Canadian dollars they have realized through their exports to Canada, through their receipts of interest and dividends and through other ordinary commercial transactions between the two countries. Even before the war, the British balance of payments with Canada resulted in a deficit of Canadian dollars. In 1939, for example—and the figures for that year were not materially different from those for 1938—our exports to the United Kingdom amounted to $331 million, while our imports were only $113 million, leaving a British merchandise deficit with Canada of $218 million. The rest of the empire, too, exported to us less than they purchased from us; in 1939 our exports were $104 million and our imports $75 million. The empire as a whole, therefore, had a net merchandise deficit of $247 million with Canada in 1939.

The extent to which our industry and our agriculture have contributed toward furnishing our British allies with the sinews of war, in the form of foodstuffs and primary products as well as war implements of all types, is strikingly illustrated in the remarkable rise in our exports in 1940 and 1941. To the United Kingdom alone our shipments increased from $331 million in 1939 to $532 million in 1940 and $702 million in 1941. To the rest of the British empire, including Egypt, our shipments rose from $104 million in 1939 to $157 million in 1940 and $300 million in 1941. I mention Egypt especially because it is now no secret that the mechanized equipment used in the Libya campaigns was to a very considerable extent produced by Canadian workmen in Canadian factories.

Our imports from the empire have been well sustained and the policy of the government has been to encourage them. But notwithstanding some increase in our imports, the empire as a whole had an aggregate merchandise deficit with Canada of $445 million in 1940 and $723 million in 1941.

Nor does this empire deficit of nearly $1,200 million on trade account in the past two years tell the whole story. In addition, large sums have been required for expenditures not reflected in the trade statistics. The most important of these have been the British capital investments in war plants in Canada, amounting at the end of 1941 to $238 million, and British expenditures in connection with air training activities in Canada. In addition, of course, there have been other expenses, such as for freight and storage, connected with the movement of goods within Canada.

Without going into exhaustive details, I may inform the house that after making allowance for all the sterling area's receipts of Canadian dollars of a current or ordinary nature—such as the proceeds of exports, interest and dividend receipts, shipping receipts and Canadian governmental expenditures in sterling incurred in connection with the maintenance of our troops in the United Kingdom—the sterling area's net deficit of Canadian dollars from the outbreak of war until the end of February, 1942, amounted to approximately $1,770 million.

This deficit has been financed in three ways. In increasing order of importance they are: gold payments from the United Kingdom to Canada; redemption or purchase, mainly in advance of maturity, of Canadian security obligations held in the United Kingdom; and the accumulation of sterling balances held by the foreign exchange control board on deposit in London.

Gold payments by the United Kingdom have amounted to $250,000,000 over this whole period. As the house is aware, the last payment was received in December, 1940, and since that time the whole of the sterling area deficit has been financed by Canada out of its own resources. Over the period as a whole gold payments have covered less than 15 per cent of the sterling area deficit in Canada.

Not only have gold payments by the United Kingdom been kept to relatively modest proportions, but every ounce of gold we obtained from the United Kingdom was promptly converted into United States funds and used to pay for United States goods needed to complete war orders for the United Kingdom. We cannot make the tanks, the anti-aircraft guns, the mechanized equipment of all sorts which we have supplied to our British allies, entirely out of our own domestic resources. We must purchase in the United States steel, machinery and machine tools, and coal and oil to drive the huge industrial plant which we have created and are still creating. For those things we must pay United States dollars. Exact statistics are not available, but there can be no doubt whatever that the amounts we have paid out in United States exchange in connection with British war orders in Canada are very greatly in excess of the amount of hard currency settlement received from the United Kingdom.

Our war production has, in fact, involved us in very heavy expenditures of American dollars in the United States. Until December, 1940, the United Kingdom shared with us the burden of providing the necessary hard currency. Since then we have taken the whole burden on our own shoulders. The burden has not been a light one, in spite of the measures agreed upon at Hyde Park last April between the Prime Minister and President Roosevelt, which were calculated in part to alleviate our United States exchange difficulties.

I warned the house in introducing the budget last April that the need for United States exchange conservation had not passed; and lest anyone should think that the Hyde Park agreement has solved our United States dollar exchange problem, I should like to say that our official reserves of gold and United States dollars fell by $142,000,000, United States dollars, in 1941. Moreover, although the outlook is far from clear, it must be recognized that, failing remedial action, we appear to be faced with another sizable loss of reserves this year. Our United States dollar position is, therefore, still a major cause of concern. I stress this point because our United States dollar problem and our need of foreign exchange control are in part a direct consequence of our assistance to Great Britain, and it seems to me that at this time, when we are proposing to open a new chapter in our financial relations, the record regarding the past should be made quite clear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister referred to the export of gold and the repatriation of unmatured Canadian securities. Did he mean all classes of unmatured Canadian securities, or only government or government-guaranteed? I do not think he was specific.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall make that very clear just a little later on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sorry.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall state exactly what has been brought back.

Reverting now to the method by which the sterling area's deficit of Canadian dollars was financed up to the end of February, 1942, I come to the second method, namely, redemption or purchase, mainly in advance of maturity, of Canadian debts owing in the United Kingdom. This falls into two parts, official governmental repatriation, and private repatriation. The former is by far of greater importance, amounting as it does to over $400,000,000, while the private repatriation of capital amounts to nearly $125,000,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, so far, liquidated. But that does not begin to cover the whole field over there, does it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Those are the ones that have been brought back.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, liquidated. That is what I mean—brought back or repatriated.

Mr. ILSLEY: There have been four separate repatriations by the government of its own direct or guaranteed securities to date, apart from the new proposed repatriation of about $295,000,000 to which I shall refer later. The first of these, the 3½ per cent dominion government loan of 1930/50, was announced in October, 1939, and was to an amount of over $90,000,000; the 4 per cent dominion government loan of 1940/60, the repatriation of which was announced in June, 1940, yielded $75,000,000; the third repatriation, that of the government-guaranteed Grand Trunk railway 4 per cent perpetual consolidated debenture stock, announced in October, 1940, yielded $105,000,000; and the fourth, the repatriation of the 4 per cent dominion government loan of 1953/58, the 3¼ per cent dominion government loan of 1958/63, announced in August, 1941, had to the end of February, 1942, yielded $130,000,000.

Through these transactions, the government has used up a fair proportion of the sterling accumulated by the foreign exchange control board in London.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the total of these figures?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is $400,000,000 for the repatriation of government and railway securities. As I have explained to the house on a previous occasion, the principal way in which the British requirements of Canadian dollars have been met since December, 1940, has been through the foreign exchange control board buying sterling from the British exchange control authorities for Canadian dollars. By thus purchasing the sterling, Canadian dollars are made available to the British government for its purchases and other expenditures in Canada. The sterling purchased by us has been held on deposit in British banks to the credit of our foreign exchange control board, which of course acts as the agent of the government in these matters. These are the sterling balances to which I have made frequent references in the past, and the whole process has been popularly called the accumulation of sterling balances.

The amount of sterling held by the foreign exchange control board on deposit in London has, of course, been reduced through the sale of sterling from time to time to the dominion government to purchase from the United Kingdom treasury the repatriated securities. After allowing for these and all other sales of sterling, including substantial sums used by the dominion government in maintaining our forces overseas, Canada's net accumulation of sterling balances from the outbreak of war to the end of February, 1942, has amounted to $992,000,000.

To summarize this part of my statement, the sterling area's deficit of Canadian dollars up to the end of February 1942 amounted to approximately $1,770,000,000, of which $250,000,000 was financed by the United Kingdom; nearly $125,000,000 was privately financed by discharge of private Canadian debts to the United Kingdom, including certain sales in the Canadian market of securities vested by the British treasury, and $1,400,000,000 directly financed by the dominion government—about $400,000,000 through repatriation of securities and nearly $1,000,000,000 through the accumulation of sterling balances in London.

Mr. COLDWELL: Could the minister give us any idea of what the total British investment in Canada, of all kinds, was and is at the present time?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the accurate figures, but there are Canadian dollar securities still owned in the United Kingdom having an approximate value of $700 million. Also there are certain sterling securities on or in Canadian property and enterprises which may have a value of something like $300 million. That is all as far as we know that is left.

Mr. COLDWELL: About a billion dollars.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and a distinction must be drawn between sterling securities and dollar securities; the difference is substantial from our point of view. The value of the dollar securities held by residents of the United Kingdom on properties or in enterprises in Canada is approximately $700 million, the amount of the dollar obligations being provided for by this bill.

In order to assist the house in studying the development of the sterling area's deficit of Canadian dollars and the varying methods by which it has been financed, I am placing on Hansard a table summarizing the most relevant data available. The information is shown for three separate periods: (1) September 15, 1939, to March 31, 1940; (2) the fiscal year 1940-41; and (3) the fiscal year 1941-42. The figures for the current financial year involve an estimate for the month of March and are therefore tentative:

STERLING AREA'S CASH DEFICIENCY OF CANADIAN DOLLARS

—	Sept. 15, 1939, to Mar. 31, 1940	Fiscal Year 1940-41	Fiscal Year 1941-42 (Estimate)	Sept. 15, 1939, to Mar. 31, 1942 (Estimate)
	$	$	$	$
1—Net cash deficiency	127	668	1,075	1,870
of which—
2—Total financed by United Kingdom through sale of gold to Canada	12	238	0	250
3—Total financed by Canada	115	430	1,075	1,620
(a) by governmental financing:—
(i) accumulation of Sterling	16	189	1,029	1,494
(ii) official repatriation of securities	88	172
(b) by private repatriation of securities, gifts, etc	11	69	46	126

The most striking feature of this table is, of course, the enormous magnitude of the recent Canadian dollar requirements of the sterling area. Its net cash deficiency, which amounted to $127 million from September, 1939, to the close of that fiscal year, rose to $668 million in the next fiscal year and it is estimated that it will approximate $1,075 million in the fiscal year now drawing to a close. Since December, 1940, the whole deficiency has been financed by Canada and practically the entire financing task has naturally fallen on the dominion government. We now estimate, it will be noted, that during the current fiscal year our own cash requirements for financing British war expenditures in Canada will be approximately of $1,029 million.

It is obvious that Britain's (and the sterling area's) purchases of foodstuffs, raw materials, munitions and war supplies in Canada must continue, and probably increase. Canada has, indeed become an arsenal of democracy—after the United States and Britain the most important arsenal of democracy. The production of war supplies, including foodstuffs and war materials, and their supply to our allies, constitute one of the most important contributions which Canada can make to the winning of the war—to our own defence and security as well as to that of our allies. It would be unthinkable that any shortage of Canadian dollars should make it impossible, let us say, for Britain to secure from Canada the munitions and supplies necessary to equip and maintain her armed forces fighting on the front line, and the foodstuffs necessary to feed her gallant people. It was with this conviction that the Canadian government long ago advised the British Prime Minister that the United Kingdom could continue to buy in Canada all essential supplies that could be procured and transported without any fear of her shortage of dollars—that somehow or another we would see that the Canadian dollars were made available. I believe that all Canadians approved the assurance thus given to the government of the United Kingdom. The enormous purchases and expenditures made in Canada by Britain and the rest of the sterling area have, of course, been an important factor in the expansion of production, employment and national income in this country.

The continuance of these purchases and expenditures, however, involves a continuance of the huge deficit of the sterling area in its balance of payments with Canada which must be financed (very largely at least, perhaps wholly) by Canada itself. We have realized for some time that the accumulation of sterling balances which, as I have explained, was the most important method of financing this deficit, was appropriate only as an interim or transitional form of financial assistance. It involved the growing up of what was nominally a demand liability by Britain to Canada, the future of which was bound to involve uncertainties, particularly as the amount grew far beyond anything which could be repaid by Britain in Canadian dollars except perhaps over a very long period of time. Moreover, the indefinite growth of this obligation, if permitted to continue for years, would have led to the existence after the war of what would be in effect a huge and unmanageable war debt owed by Britain to Canada.

I am sure that hon. members can recall the grave international problems and difficulties which arose in the nineteen-twenties and nineteen-thirties from the huge international war debts which had grown up during and immediately following the last great war. Here it is necessary to emphasize the distinction between a domestic debt and an international debt. Domestic debts involve payments between one person and another in the same country and give rise to no problems of currency and exchange. International debts, on the other hand, can be settled only by the transfer of goods and services from the debtor country to the creditor country. Such transfers can be made, only if and to the extent that the creditor country is prepared to accept goods and services from the debtor country for not only principal repayments but also annual interest charges. In other words, the creditor country must be prepared to see an increase in its imports or a decrease in its exports, or both. Experience has shown that countries will accept these payments in the form of imports only to a limited extent on balance, if at all. To do so, of course, exposes their producers to more intense competition from abroad, and the excess of imports serves as a deflationary influence which appears to be unwelcome in normal peace times. On the other hand, the inability of debtor nations to make payment when the creditor nation will not readily accept imported goods and services in payment, is bound to lead to international misunderstandings and frictions. Consequently, there is a practical limit to the amount of international debt which can be satisfactorily carried and repaid, particularly when such debt arises from the economically wasteful processes of war. The experiences of the last twenty-five years are too well known for me to labour this point at greater length.

With these considerations in mind, and believing that it was the desire of the Canadian people to do their utmost to contribute to the success of the common cause, the government felt that Canada should not continue to accumulate these financial claims against Britain at the rapid rate at which these claims have accumulated in the past twelve months. We believed that the existing short-term and relatively informal interim obligations in the form of sterling balances, should be converted into a formal long-term loan, to the extent to which they could not immediately be used to redeem or purchase dominion government or Canadian National railway bonds owned by British investors. This would clarify the existing situation and remove any uncertainty as to the disposition of the large amounts of sterling balances which have been standing to Canada's credit in London. This, of course, would not result in any change in the balance of indebtedness between Canada and Britain, but would be merely a change in form, with some offsetting of one claim against another.

In order to prevent the further rapid accumulation of sterling balances, the government believed that the best course to follow was to make an outright gift to Britain of the foodstuffs, raw materials, planes, tanks, guns and other war supplies which we would send to her, up to the value of $1,000 million. Of course, we shall continue to receive some goods and services from Britain which will automatically make available to her a certain supply of Canadian dollars or otherwise reduce her deficit with us. In other words, she will have receipts arising out of her ordinary exports to Canada, the shipping and insurance services she renders, interest and dividends on certain Canadian securities which will still be held by British investors, and the expenditures which we shall be required to make on our own armed forces in Britain.

Thus funds received in the normal way will meet part of the cost of British purchases and expenditures in Canada, and the $1,000 million dollar gift will be used in meeting the remainder of Britain's bills here; that is, in meeting what I have referred to earlier as the Canadian dollar deficit of the sterling area. This deficit of course arises almost entirely from Britain's requirements for foodstuffs, raw materials, munitions and other war supplies purchased here, so that the proposed gift will, in effect, take the form of these war supplies.

The explanation I have just given has been in very general terms. Perhaps I can make the matter clearer to the house if I now attempt to explain the more important provisions of the bill which this resolution seeks authority to introduce. In essence, the proposals are simple and straightforward; but because of the number and nature of the various transactions involved, and perhaps also because they deal in part with matters of exchange, which is a mystery to many persons, the details and perhaps the bill itself may appear complicated to many members of the house.

Let me state first that to-day the dominion is holding sterling balances to the value of approximately $1,070,000,000, at the current mid-rate of exchange, namely $4.45 to the pound sterling. By the time the bill has been enacted this amount will be somewhat larger, but it will, I think, conduce to clarity in our discussions if we take to-day's figures of our sterling holdings as the basis of our discussions. Sections 4 and 5 of the bill will provide in effect that approximately $1,000 million worth of these balances may be used for two purposes: first, an amount equivalent to $700 million will be transferred back to the British government in exchange for a British government obligation to pay $700 million Canadian dollars; and, second, a further amount will be used to purchase Dominion of Canada or Canadian National railway securities formerly held by British investors, but recently vested by the British government. The first of these provisions, it will be noted, merely provides for the conversion of sterling balances into a Canadian dollar obligation of the British government. This obligation will be non-interest bearing until the termination of the war, and thereafter the two governments will agree as to the rate of interest and other terms that will be applicable from that time forward. It has also been proposed to the British government, and they have agreed, that the funds arising from any redemption or repayment during the war of Canadian securities owned in Britain will be applied to the reduction of the loan—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, the $700,000,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes—as well as the proceeds of any sales to persons outside the United Kingdom of Canadian dollar securities now owned by residents of the United Kingdom. This will automatically result in a reduction of Britain's debt to Canada, at the same time that Canadian debts to Britain are reduced by the types of transaction I have mentioned.

The second provision involves simply another case of what I have called an official repatriation operation. This time we shall repatriate all the remaining dominion government and Canadian National railway securities still held in Britain, which are estimated to have a value of approximately $295 million. In this connection I may point out that these securities have been vested at the current market prices prevailing just before the public announcement of the proposals, namely on January 26 of this year.

It will be noted that these two provisions will use up nearly all the sterling balances standing to our credit at the time the bill will become law. I shall refer a little later to what we intend to do with the remaining amount of the sterling balances standing to our credit.

So much for the refinancing of past transactions which is to be accomplished by sections 4 and 5 of the bill. The main provision, of course, relates to the future, and is found in section 3 of the bill, which simply empowers the Minister of Finance, subject to regulations to be made by the governor in council, to pay to the British government out of the consolidated revenue fund sums of money up to an aggregate of $1,000 million to enable the British government to purchase in Canada foodstuffs, raw materials, munitions and other war supplies, and to defray other expenses incurred in Canada arising out of the war. Under the regulations to be approved, the Minister of Finance may make payments or advances from time to time upon his being satisfied that the amount thereof is necessary to make the said purchases and defray the said expenditures.

I can now say that it is our purpose, and the bill will so provide, that any sterling balances which are not required for the current operations of the foreign exchange control board after the provisions of sections 4 and 5 of the bill already referred to have been carried out, will be transferred to Britain and the dollar equivalent thereof will be charged to this appropriation of $1,000 million. In this way all the sterling balances except those necessary for the current working purposes of the foreign exchange control board will be used up, and the gift will, in effect, begin sometime early this month, earlier than to-day. Until the exact amount of the securities to be repatriated has been determined it will be impossible to say what will be the amount of this excess sterling which will be handled in this way, but if our estimate of $295 million, representing the value of the securities to be repatriated, is correct, it will probably be of the order of $70 or $80 million.

The figure of a $1,000 million, representing the maximum amount of the gift to be provided for, was selected as being roughly the amount that would be necessary to meet the requirements of about a year's operations, on the basis of recent experience. If $70 or $80 million, as I have just estimated, is to be expended from the appropriation during the present fiscal year, the amount available for the new fiscal year will, of course, be $920 or $930 million. This should provide sufficient funds to take care of Britain's dollar deficit until sometime early in 1943. The house will, I am sure, appreciate the difficulty of making a more precise estimate at this time. When the various sections of the bill are under consideration in committee of the whole, I shall be able to explain the various transactions which will be necessary with the foreign exchange control board to convert sterling balances into a Canadian dollar obligation of the British government, and to repatriate the dominion and Canadian National railway securities, but I believe that any attempt to explain these matters now might be needlessly confusing. I need only add that the bill will include the usual provisions found in any Canadian National railway financing and guarantee act enabling the government to make temporary loans to the Canadian National Railway Company in order to enable it to purchase its own securities, and that the concluding section of the bill will authorize the borrowing of moneys for the purposes of the bill up to an amount not exceeding $1,000 million.

When the repatriation operation has been completed and Britain has given its $700 million obligation to Canada in exchange for an equivalent amount of sterling balances, the balance of international indebtedness between Britain and Canada will remain on a reasonable and manageable basis. Britain will no longer hold any direct obligations of the Dominion of Canada or any securities of the Canadian National railway system, but she will continue to hold a considerable range of other Canadian securities and assets which will give her a continuing interest in Canadian prosperity. Included in these securities will be obligations expressed in Canadian dollars which I understand will amount in aggregate to roughly the same figure as the $700 million which Britain will owe to Canada in the form of the loan now proposed. That is the information I gave the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) a few moments ago. In addition, of course, Britain will hold a moderate amount of sterling obligations of Canadian debtors of various types other than dominion and the Canadian National Railways. The hon. gentleman asked me how much those were, or I undertook to tell him how much they were, and I said $300 million. I do not know, but we think it is in the neighbourhood of $300 million.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I saw a newspaper report which mentioned $1,200 million, but I do not know whether that is true.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, it could not be, in Canadian sterling obligations.

I believe the house will agree that it is highly desirable that Britain should continue to have a financial interest in Canada and that Canada should continue to have a financial interest in Britain, rather than that we should attempt to cancel off all Canadian obligations to Britain against obligations to Canada. The mutual financial interest which will remain is bound to strengthen the other economic ties between the two countries which have been of such great value to each in the past and will continue to be of great value in the future. The fact that both countries will now be creditors in relation to one another as well as debtors reflects the developing economic maturity of Canada. Perhaps I should add that this developing maturity should carry with it a growing sense of responsibility—responsibility among other things to accept imports from abroad in substantial volume as a normal course of events.

The arrangements which are proposed in this resolution and which I have outlined, I hope in sufficient detail, will enable us to continue to implement the pledge we gave to Britain last year that she could continue to purchase what she needed in Canada for war purposes up to the limit of our capacity, and that we would see to it that the dollars she required for this purpose were made available. That pledge, and these new arrangements, are further instances of the way in which we are not allowing financial considerations to limit or interfere with our war effort either in regard to our own forces or in regard to the assistance we are giving to Britain. We are making finance adjust itself to the hard realities of the unlimited demands of war.

I should also mention that the arrangements proposed in this resolution do not alter the amount of money we must raise in Canada for war purposes. That is determined by the scope of our effort and not by the method of settling the accounts. Whether we lend the money to Britain, or give the goods to her, we must continue to find the funds to pay Canadian farmers, fishermen, lumbermen, miners and munitions workers who produce the goods. All that is really in question in this resolution, and the bill which will follow it is the means by which the accounts are to be settled—who is to be charged for them and what form the international balance sheet will take. Of course, these matters will be of importance in post-war times, and it is my belief that the plan now proposed is best calculated to satisfy our post-war needs and conditions.

I need not emphasize that the bill which this resolution precedes is one of first importance, and, indeed, one without real precedent. Its purpose is to enable Canada to make the fullest and most effective use of its material resources by feeding and equipping the people and armed forces of Britain in order that they may be able with us to win their fight and our fight against a ruthless and powerful foe who threatens to make this year, 1942, the most critical year in the history of civilization. The free and unconditional gift from the people of Canada to the people of Britain will express emphatically the will of the Canadian people to do everything in their power to help achieve victory and thus assure their survival and ours.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the statement just made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is one that is full of interest for all loyal Canadians who are anxious to see a total war effort by Canada. A little later in the course of the brief remarks I have to make I hope I shall be able to produce other convincing reasons for supporting the resolution aside from those of a more or less economic nature to which the minister has referred, although indeed in the latter part of his remarks he did give voice to sentiments similar to my own.

Before entering upon a brief discussion of the resolution I should like to be informed by the minister as to the important reasons to which he made reference last night for wanting this bill passed before the Easter vacation. I had hoped that in his statement to-day he might clarify the statement he made last night, as reported at page 1403 of Hansard. He said then that he dreaded the possibility of arriving at Friday of next week with the bill founded on this resolution not having gone through. I say that at a later stage he should tell us exactly his reason for saying that. He has also told us that he expects the resolution to be fully debated at this stage, and I hope that it will be.

If I understood the minister's statement last night, and his statement of to-day, the proposed bill does not relate exclusively to the next fiscal year; it will provide continuing statutory authority not related to that particular year, but which will run into the following year. And for the small portion at least relating to the balance of sterling accumulated over there it will relate perhaps to this fiscal year. But it does not seem to me that with the amount unascertained, and being relatively small, there can be any great reason for haste.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is $70,000,000 or $80,000,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is $70,000,000 or $80,000,000 between friends in this war, and the way this government has been spending? It is a mere bagatelle. In days gone by it would have amounted to something. In that connection may I say this—and I had intended to say it at a later stage—that there is much sound truth in what the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said last night about the government's system of accounting to parliament and the people for these expenditures. When the minister's peace-time estimates are before the committee I hope hon. members will be free to express their opinion upon the methods adopted and the form in which the public accounts are now presented to the people. To my mind they are not satisfactory. I am not speaking about huge expenditures, but about the ordinary expenditures of the country. Even if it costs money, if we are to let the people have a little daylight on the details of expenditures now being made, I believe we will have to revert to some other method.

So that my first inquiry of the minister under this resolution is this: Why the need for haste? No reasons he gave last night, and so far as I can see no reason he gave to-day, constitute a justification for haste or for putting the bill through before the Easter vacation. It can of course relate back to transactions which may have occurred during this present month, but for the most part the expenditure of the billion dollars will relate to the future, not to the past.

The proposal contained in this resolution, the details of which are not before us and will not be until we see the bill, implement the pledge contained in the speech from the throne wherein it was indicated that parliament would be asked—

> —as an integral part of Canada's direct war effort, to approve a contribution to Britain of vast quantities of munitions, foodstuffs and supplies.

This was further elaborated upon in the speech of the Prime Minister in the debate on the address in reply.

The proposal as I understand it—the minister has made it quite clear to-day, and I congratulate him upon the clarity of his statement—covers much more than the allocation of a billion dollars for the purposes indicated. It encompasses not only that large appropriation of money, but also a second proposal which empowers the Minister of Finance to accept from the government of Great Britain $700,000,000 in terms of Canadian dollars to balance the existing indebtedness of the United Kingdom to Canada for expenditures heretofore incurred by Canada for Great Britain in connection with the war, and without interest, and until the termination of the war. The technical part of the operation has been explained to us in part. If elaboration is needed of the whole operation or of the technicalities of the operation, I am sure that this will be made plain to us after we have had time to study the minister's statement. I am sure the minister will be glad to do that.

Then it covers the third proposal enumerated in the Prime Minister's statement, and more elaborately set out now in the minister's statement. This enables the government to purchase from the government of Britain certain unmatured securities or obligations, direct or indirect, of the government of Canada. That, of course, constitutes a continuation of the policy heretofore pursued, which was, I think, a natural policy for this or any other government to have pursued in the circumstances. I refer to the repatriation of our own debt. As the minister has indicated, there will be a continuation of the position of both debtor and creditor as between the two countries which will give each one an economic interest in the other. Of course that is important, but it is not the whole position.

I should like to point out in this connection that the government's proposal as such does not encompass the repatriation by this government of securities heretofore issued by Canadian corporations. I am not making any complaint about that; I presume it is a matter of arrangement between the government and those who seek to sell them in the Canadian market. There are certain misconceptions abroad with regard to this situation. I have heard the statement that the government are buying securities of distilleries and the like, bringing them back here and selling them to the country. I should like to clear the government of any charge of the kind. It does not cover that position at all. I think the minister should clear up this situation and make the position absolutely clear. I had some correspondence with the department about it, and I was reassured and reaffirmed in my own opinion. These stories are being loosely told throughout the country, and these things ought not to be.

Mr. REID: Likewise about the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All these corporations. One story that reached me was with regard to the securities of the liquor interests of Canada held in the United Kingdom. I have even heard the government charged with supporting the liquor business, and I had to come to their rescue. The minister comes from the Annapolis valley, and his religious beliefs being what they are I am sure that he would not tolerate for a moment anything of that sort. I do not want to appear to be frivolous in the matter. These are misconceptions which the minister should clear up if he finds it is necessary to do so, as I think it is. However, that is merely by way of passing.

Mr. ROWE: Clear up the liquor business itself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There are two opinions about that. There is no doubt that there is grave anxiety about that position in certain parts of Canada, and one result has been that the liquor control boards in the provinces down by the sea have had to reduce very materially their sales. I have no doubt the minister has had an earful about that long before this, as I have had.

Mr. KINLEY: Do you not think that that is right?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I certainly do; there is no question about where I stand. At this point I should like to ask the minister if any consideration has been given by this government to the repatriation by this government, or by provincial or municipal governments with the assistance of this government, of securities heretofore issued by provincial and municipal governments and held in Great Britain. I believe there are such, but I have never heard that any of them have been repatriated.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It occurs to me that there must be such securities, heretofore marketed in Great Britain, which are now held by the British government under its policy of marshalling foreign and dominion securities.

The fourth power sought and introduced in the resolution is an enabling power. This follows the usual practice and calls for no particular comment at this stage.

I should like to express the hope and wish that this measure will receive the unanimous support of this house and of the country. We should get behind the minister and the government in this measure. The proposal before us is much more than a gesture; it is a tangible recognition of an obligation, the payment of which is long past due by Canada. Make no mistake about that. For generations before this war began Britain has been guarding our sea lanes and our trade routes and providing protection for our very existence, all without any cost to us. It has always been a matter of great regret to me that we have accepted this protection, in most cases without even an acknowledgment. We have accepted help and protection of inestimable value without, to our shame be it said, ever contributing a single dollar or a single man. That was before the war.

Since the war began Britain has been defending Canada on the seven seas and in every theatre of war. Our proposed contribution to Britain does not begin to measure up to the value of Britain's contribution to Canada in this war. I should like to emphasize that. I am not seeking for a minute to minimize what Canada has done for herself, but without Britain's contribution in this war we would be another Norway or Denmark. The minister and the Prime Minister talk about the contribution by the government of Canada. That is not the correct designation. This is a contribution by the Canadian people and not by the government of Canada. I think that should be emphasized. I do not wish to be misinterpreted, neither do I wish to derogate from the credit due to the government for the proposal. But it should never be forgotten that this splendid contribution is first and foremost the contribution of the Canadian people. It is an expression of gratitude for services rendered, for value received, both before and since the war began.

An additional justification for this proposal, if any be needed, is to be found in the lease-lend policy of the United States. That policy and the operations under it long before the United States entered the war have been of great value to Britain in her defence, and in the defence of the world. I would go so far as to say, in the defence of the United States. It has been of great value to our gallant allies, the Russians. If one will recall the recent speech of Lord Halifax in connection with this and other matters he will realize the ramifications of the whole lease-lend policy. As I understand it, Britain has given to Russia in the form of certain equipment even more than she has received from the United States. I suggest to this House of Commons and to the people of Canada that we can hardly be less generous to Great Britain than has the United States, having regard to our comparable resources. We have not the resources that the United States have, or as many of them.

There is a further important reason why we should make this grant. In peace time Great Britain has been our best customer for food products. The minister gave figures to-day to show the adverse balance of trade against Great Britain in recent years since the war began. That has been true for many years. The principal item making up that balance of trade has been food and food products from Canada, and in a more limited degree, and this is particularly true of our coast provinces east and west, our forest products.

Mr. REID: And fish.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And fish. Since the war began Great Britain has been practically our only customer for food products. The United States have taken certain quotas of beef cattle and the like, but by and large Britain has been our best customer for food products over a long period of years.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Then there is the post-war period; where shall we look then but to Britain again for an outlet for a substantial part of our food products? Someone will say, the continent of Europe. Well, the peoples of Europe will have to be fed, but I doubt very much whether they will be able to pay for it. All these are to me at least compelling reasons why all loyal Canadians should and will support this grant.

I wish now to refer to a matter that may not be received with as much satisfaction as what I have just said. I desire to call the attention of the house and of the Minister of Finance to a speech reputed to have been made by his colleague the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) on February 7 last at a political rally during the by-election campaign in Quebec East, in the course of which, as reported by the Canadian Press, a reliable organization, the minister made the strange and in my view unwarranted and uncalled-for declaration that by March, 1943, Canada would be financially and economically free from Britain. He is further reported to have said, and I am now quoting his remarks as they appear in the press report:

> We will have furnished enough provisions and arms by that time to pay off all debts that Canada owed to British capital.

The report goes on:

> Being financially and economically free from Britain will mean, Mr. Michaud said, we shall be free to find markets where we wish. We shall no longer have to import from Britain things that our own workers can produce.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I was astonished when I read that press report. Just what did the minister mean? Are we not free and have we not always been free to find markets for our products whenever and wherever we wished?

Mr. MARTIN: Did not the minister deny that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know. I never heard it denied. He should come in and deny it now if it never occurred. Then perhaps we should have some further investigation into the matter.

Mr. MARTIN: My recollection is that he did deny it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I never heard it. I should have called attention to it long ago. I blame myself for not having done so.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman did.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I referred to it just in passing. I did not elaborate on it as I am doing now. I do not recall this statement ever having been denied in this house; I am speaking subject to correction. What did the minister mean by "being financially and economically free from Britain?" Since when have we been in bondage financially and economically to Britain, and since when have we been bound to import from Britain things that our own workers can produce? I frame these questions on the allegations as reported in the press. All this was being said at a time when Britain was fighting our battles on land and sea and in the air—and said to win a by-election; a miserable performance if ever there was one.

Mr. MacNICOL: Like the machine gun matter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, like the machine gun matter. What kind of mentality does a minister of the crown possess who would at this of all times give expression to such a view? I hope the Minister of Finance will repudiate it. In the present position he owes it to himself, he owes it to the government of which he is a member, and he owes it to Canada and to all Canadians to repudiate such views. I do not for a moment suggest that the Minister of Fisheries was expressing the views of the government or expounding government policies. I should be astonished beyond measure if that were so. But I have never seen anywhere that the Prime Minister has repudiated these views or utterances of the minister, as reported in a reputable press agency of this country, and I call upon the Minister of Finance and the government to repudiate them. I call to mind a somewhat similar situation in the time of Sir Wilfrid Laurier when the Hon. J. Israel Tarte, taking advantage of Sir Wilfrid's absence from the country to attend a conference overseas, went about Canada enunciating doctrines at variance, on paper at least, although not in reality, with government policy. What happened to him? Well, he was just sacked—that is what happened to him, and that is what ought to happen to the Minister of Fisheries if he said what is reported is true.

In the Royal Bank review of March, reference is made to what is termed a "misunderstanding" which appears to have arisen about this proposal of the government, a misunderstanding which I personally had not been aware of, since I had not seen any adverse criticism of the proposal or any evidence of a misunderstanding. I made some inquiries and I presume there may be such by the man on the street who is questioning this transaction, who may think that if we give a billion dollars to Britain we shall have just that much less to spend in Canada. But as I understand it, and as the minister I think has made abundantly clear this afternoon, that is not the proposal. The government is asking the Canadian people, through parliament, to make provision for meeting Britain's shortage of Canadian dollars by supplying, free of charge and without obligation, to Britain, not money, but munitions of war, raw materials and foodstuffs, up to a total amount of one billion dollars.

We must realize that these munitions, raw materials and foodstuffs are in fact part of our own defence. The term "one billion dollars" is only a convenient way of expressing the total of these munitions, raw materials and foodstuffs which we shall send overseas. That money, the public should understand, will all be spent in Canada, for wages and salaries, raw materials, company earnings, and what not. Much of it, I venture to think, will find its way back into the public treasury and into the coffers of the provinces and municipalities in the form of taxation. So that perhaps it is not quite as much as at first it would appear. That, of course, is just an incidence of the expenditure.

In the first two years of this war we shipped to Britain goods, supplies, and munitions of war in excess of one billion dollars. Payment was made by Britain in several ways, the three most important being (a) shipments of gold to Canada; (b) shipments of goods exported to Canada, and certain services, shipping and the like, the collection of interest and dividends, which are usually termed services, I think; and (c) the repatriation of Canadian government and government guaranteed securities.

But a large portion of it, as stated here this afternoon in exact terms, is supplied, as I understand it, by Canada by lending the money to Britain with the resulting accumulation of sterling by Canada. The effect of the two operations is not greatly dissimilar, for the time being at least. In neither case are we sending actual money. It is retained in Canada and gives employment to Canadians. But, as the minister has pointed out, the real difference will be apparent in the post-war period when the problem of final settlement of all war debts will arise. I think it is reasonably certain that, if the war goes on long enough—and it looks as though it would—Britain will not be able to pay her debit balances to us. Presumably her only means of payment would be in gold, goods and services. Payment in gold is most unlikely, I think, from now on. I doubt if she will have any to send us; for doubtless her gold will be exhausted by requirements in other quarters. I doubt if we shall want the gold anyway, except to use it in the way the minister has indicated the gold has already been used, namely, for shipment out of the country in exchange for commodities in the United States. If we accept payment in goods, is that going to affect our post-war economy? This is a question which we must look squarely in the face.

Mr. MARTIN: It depends on what kind of goods they are.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course I agree that it depends on what kind of goods they are. We must visualize the acceptance of some goods—I am willing to go with the the minister that far. But just how far can we go, having regard to the preservation of our own economy? I know there are utopians who think that we are going to have the millenium with regard to trade after the war, and they interpret the Atlantic charter as the first step towards utopia. Let me again point out what I mentioned here a short time ago, that a very high authority in Britain, at the time we were over there, charged with this question of rehabilitation, and discussing this very matter with us, told us definitely, referring to the Atlantic charter, that when the time came every country would have its own interpretation of that charter. That is the situation which we must visualize.

I return to my previous question: how is it going to affect our post-war economy? I ask it only for the purpose of stimulating thought, because we must have some thought for the future. At that time we shall be endeavouring to transform our war economy into a peace-time programme of employment for our own people—I mean our returned soldiers and sailors and our civilian population. That is the duty which will be cast upon the doorstep of this or some other government. We might as well ask ourselves right here, are we going to accept goods from Germany made under starvation conditions, perhaps on a fourteen-hour day basis—because that is what may happen if the German nation survives—in competition with goods produced by Canadian workmen? I leave the matter there.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): We did, after the last war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, if we did after the last war, perhaps we can profit and benefit by experience. I am not going to take any decided position, because possibly I shall not have any responsibility in regard to it. But I ask the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), in whose town are being manufactured certain goods with which these imports might come into competition. I ask the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) who also lives in a community whose products may be in competition with those of the war-torn nations of Europe, nations which will want to live after this war is over, which will probably have to buy our food, and which may be producing under economic conditions and living standards which no Canadian would want to tolerate for himself or his people. At the moment I do not know the solution of the problem, nor do I attempt to give any.

I talked to a great industrialist in Canada about this problem not many months ago. We were speaking about the prospects of exports of Canadian-manufactured goods—not food products—and he said that he saw no daylight in the outlook for sales of our industrial products, which would meet immediate competition from continental Europe.

Mr. REID: Some industrialists are getting ready right now for that very fight.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We ought to take some long view in this matter. Certainly industrialists do not visualize any great happiness in connection with the export of industrial production from this country or the United States, countries whose standard of living is relatively high, in competition with countries in which there is bound to be a very low standard of living after the war. Of course if we are to have a system of communism—I do not use that word in its political sense—if we are to have a socialistic state where all will be at the same level, the Canadian workman may look forward to being dragged down to that level, not carried up to a higher standard. When peace comes we shall be faced with the problem of transforming our war economy to a peace-time programme of employment for our returned soldiers, sailors and airmen and for our civilian population theretofore employed in war work; and of reestablishing our industries on a peace-time basis, and of building up our domestic markets for consumer goods and finding markets abroad for our farm products and for such portions of our industrial output as we have available for export.

We do not want, I agree, to see a repetition of the position which obtained after the last great war, when international balances grew to dimensions which could not be dealt with, and when moratoria had to be declared. I should like to state this, however, that Great Britain certainly took care of her debt to Canada, and without any pressure at all.

This gift of one billion dollars, not in cash but in kind, and in the manner indicated by the minister—details of which we shall examine further when the bill is before the committee of the whole—is not only a great contribution to the winning of the war but it will, I believe, be some contribution to the winning of peace.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to say just a few words this afternoon, for I think it is necessary to read very carefully the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in introducing this resolution this afternoon before making any extended comment upon what he has said.

I want first of all to congratulate him upon the clarity with which the statement was made, and to say that as I listened to him I thought it was one of the most interesting and probably most significant statements that has ever been made in this house. I say that because I think there was for the first time a clear recognition that, after all, all the economic obligations among nations are settled by exchanges of goods and services, and that while figures in the ledger may signify some things, money as we have known it does not enter into the transaction at all. Consequently we have to think, at the present time and in the post-war years, in terms of goods and services not money.

Speaking on behalf of the group with which I am associated, I want to say that we support this gift to Great Britain. We are, however, under no illusions. Had we had any illusions as to the idealism that seemed to lie behind this gift, I think the words of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) this afternoon will have torn them all from us. We are making this gift not only because we want to do something to assist in maintaining the morale of Great Britain and the winning of the war, but because under a capitalist economy we dare not allow our best customer to get into our debt. In other words, we have the paradox of capitalistic society outlined very clearly this afternoon, and we need not be hypocritical in thinking we are doing this entirely from altruistic motives. We are not.

I once heard a former leader of the opposition—I refer to the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett—say that when negotiating with the representatives of British business it was well to remember that they are quite hard-boiled. I was born over there; I lived there the first twenty-one years of my life; I know something of them, and I know the history of the country in which I was born. I thoroughly agree with what Viscount Bennett said when he was leader of the opposition. I think that by the same token we should view this matter realistically and not obscure the real issues that are behind this gift by all kinds of platitudinous statements about our obligations and our patriotism.

One reason why I support this gift is that I want to see assistance given to the hard-pressed British people. When I was over there last autumn I saw something of their difficulties, some of their privations. But at the same time I want to keep clearly in my mind that in this parliament I represent the Canadian people, or a fraction of them, and I want to view this matter realistically from the Canadian point of view.

The Minister of Finance said in the course of his remarks that if we make this gift and do not receive securities from Great Britain by way of repatriation, it will give her a continuing interest in Canadian prosperity. That is a fairly realistic statement, and I agree with it, that so long as interest and dividends continue to flow from Canada to Great Britain, so long will certain people in Great Britain be interested in commercial relationships with us. But it is precisely that kind of thing which, after the war, I should like to see removed from our relationship with Great Britain, and removed from the world, for that is neither more nor less than hard-boiled economic imperialism. If we are going to consider these matters from the point of view of hard-boiled commercial economics, then we should try to view the whole picture in its proper setting.

I must confess I was surprised this afternoon when, in reply to a question which I asked, the Minister of Finance indicated that to-day the holdings of British investors in this country have been reduced to approximately $1,000 million.

Mr. ILSLEY: I may be wrong in that, sterling; that is the result of my inquiries.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, as the leader of the opposition said, when we are discussing balances, what are seventy, or eighty or a hundred millions between friends? I was surprised, I must confess, to hear that the amount had been reduced so substantially. I brought down with me this afternoon a copy of the "Canadian Balance of International Payments", published in 1939. Speaking again in round figures, I find that in 1937, the last year recorded here, the balance of British investments in Canada was approximately $2,500 million. Therefore, since the war broke out, the amount has been reduced by approximately $1,500 million. I am glad that that reduction has been made, for while these interest and dividend payments are made to Great Britain, they go to only a very small class in Britain who own the securities upon which they are paid.

Mr. MARTIN: All that is involved is a change of ownership.

Mr. COLDWELL: The goods and services which are exported from this country are the product of the toil and labour of the Canadian people, and consequently there is a lien, if you will, upon the labour of the Canadian people from outside this country.

Mr. MARTIN: That is economic nationalism.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is nothing of the kind.

Mr. MARTIN: It is the worst type of it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Nothing of the kind. If economic nationalism means that the people of a nation are going to own their own resources, utilize them for the raising of their own standards of living and the satisfaction of their own needs, both national and international, then of course that is economic nationalism. But if the only basis of trade between nations is going to be between some great creditor nation and a large number of debtor nations, then we have most of the nations in the world held in slavery to one nation. That is the antithesis of freedom, the antithesis of liberalism and the antithesis of the right kind of human relationships.

At this point I should like to ask the minister to tell the house—not now, but at some future time—just what our economic position is in relation to the United States and what effect the war is having upon that relationship.

Mr. MARTIN: What about Canadian investments abroad, in other countries?

Mr. COLDWELL: If nations in which we have made investments can, by the production of goods and services, pay them off, then to that extent those nations are or should be better off internally.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No more free enterprise.

Mr. COLDWELL: "No more free enterprise," someone murmurs. That is analogous to the statement made earlier this afternoon, that socialism meant a dead level of equality. Well, of course, anyone who makes that statement is crassly ignorant of modern conditions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I object to the use of the words "crassly ignorant," and ask that they be withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the reference by the hon. member was to the leader of the opposition, I would ask that the remark be withdrawn.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will withdraw the word "crassly".

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not good enough. The hon. gentleman should not attribute ignorance to me or any other hon. member.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will say this, then, that the hon. gentleman appeared to me to be ignorant of modern conditions.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think that should be withdrawn too.

Mr. COLDWELL: I need not withdraw that, because I am giving my opinion of the statement of the leader of the opposition; and I am not going to withdraw a warranted expression of opinion. To-day we have nations at war. We have Germany, which prostituted some of the features of socialism and called it national socialism; and even a prostituted socialism built up an economy which is causing us great trouble to-day. On the other hand, we have another nation with another theory called communism, which built up its form of socialism under conditions with which I profoundly disagree; but the basis was planning. The basis was the control and utilization of the economic resources and labour of those nations. To-day, whether we like it or not, we have to admit that they did a remarkable job in a short space of time. The challenge to us in the democratic countries is that if we are to survive under our democratic institutions, we must plan our internal economies so that men and women may live, produce, increase their standards of living after the war, and carry through the great war effort in which we are at present engaged.

But I was rather deflected from what I intended to say. I said I was surprised at the amount of securities already repatriated in Canada. In 1937, as I understood it, government securities including dominion, provincial and municipal securities, held in Great Britain amounted to $514,000,000; railway securities to $1,065,000,000, and manufacturing, mining and other securities to $1,105,000,000.

Mr. REID: Are the interest payments given?

Mr. COLDWELL: They are given, but I did not note them. On the other hand, Canadian investments in Great Britain amounted to approximately $41,000,000, or an amount almost negligible when considering the large sums with which we are dealing to-day. I was particularly interested in a break-down of some of these figures. Referring to page 25 of the document I mentioned previously, and using the last available figures for 1936, we find that bonds and debentures totalled some $841,000,000, less the estimated purchase back of $100,600,000, or a net of $140,500,000. That $841,000,000 was made up as follows: Canadian National Railways, guaranteed, $406,000,000; Canadian National Railways, not guaranteed, $107,000,000, or a total of $513,000,000. Canadian Pacific railway securities held in Great Britain were as follows: common stock, $175,000,000; preferred stock, $133,000,000, or a total of $308,000,000, and, in addition, debentures $288,000,000. That, as I say, was several years ago.

To-day the minister said that up to the end of 1941 we had already repatriated approximately $400,000,000 of securities, and that $295,000,000, or thereabouts, would be repatriated this year. In addition, if I heard him aright and got it down correctly, some private securities have been repatriated, amounting probably to another $125,000,000. Therefore the total repatriated up to date, and intended to be repatriated this year, will amount to $820,000,000. I want to get this quite clear, so that I understand it. The amount, therefore, that has been repatriated will be about $400,000,000. Was the $125,000,000 repatriated before the end of 1941? I was not quite clear on that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, up to the present.

Mr. COLDWELL: So the additional amount for this year will be $295,000,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. COLDWELL: As I understand it, the Canadian Pacific railway stocks held in Great Britain, to the par value of about $308,000,000, and the debentures of the same company, amounting to some $288,000,000, or a total of about $596,600,000, have not been repatriated and are not being repatriated now?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Canadian National obligations will have been repatriated at the end of the coming year?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not suggesting that this should be done in connection with this $1,000 million, but when we come to make a settlement, having made this gift, why not also consider the repatriation of the Canadian Pacific securities? Further, what is happening to these repatriated securities? What percentage of them is being held by the government; what percentage sold? If they are sold, all we are doing is replacing one set of investors with another set of investors. True, our own investors in this country will then own the repatriated securities, and henceforth interest payments will be made to people in Canada. But what we are actually doing is substituting the Canadian investor for the British investor and, as the minister and the leader of the opposition both recognized, there may be some disadvantage in that from the point of view of trade and commerce, under our present economic structure.

I should like to see more of these securities, particularly of industries like—if and when we repatriate them—International Nickel, some of our power corporations and the Canadian Pacific Railway, held by the government, so that we might have a controlling interest in some of these organizations when the war ends. In the post-war years we are going to face serious problems of rehabilitation, and if we are to face them realistically, the control of some of our great resources and some of our great industries may be of fundamental interest to us. Therefore I should like to see a policy worked out in connection with repatriation plans whereby we would hold at least some of the securities so that we may have some determining voice in the control of Canadian industry when this war ends.

In conclusion, I should like to express this point of view once more—I felt it when I was in Great Britain; and others to whom I have listened since I came back, notably Mr. Brockington and others over the radio, have expressed the same opinion—that in Great Britain this is not only a war; it is something more than a war. It is the precursor of great social and economic change.

Only a few days ago I received a letter from a young man in Great Britain whom I met there, a young man who had been a member of a large elected body on which he sat as a Conservative. I sent over to him some of our literature, and the only criticism he made of that literature was this, that we were not going as far in our economic and social proposals as some of the younger men with whom he was associated in Great Britain were prepared and were determined to go.

Mr. JACKMAN: Conservatives.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, at present in the Conservative party, it is true. But they will have to leave the Conservative party in Great Britain, as others have had to do, before they are able to make any progress whatsoever; for to-day, I may tell my hon. friend, in my opinion the break-down we are seeing in the British empire is largely the result of blind, Tory policies pursued by reactionary governments of Great Britain.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The applause is from across the floor; there is the Tory party to-day.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not refer to my hon. friends to the right as Tories. I referred to the Tories of Great Britain. But I am quite convinced of this, that our hon. friends to the right of Mr. Speaker are so close to the wall on the right that it is useless for our Conservative friends who sit to the left of Mr. Speaker to try to get between them and that wall; make no mistake about that.

But we have not yet apprehended aright what is going on. If we apprehend aright, we shall see that in our own country after this war we shall have to follow the world trend, and that world trend will be ever more and more in the direction of greater public control, public ownership—socialization, if you like the word better—

Mr. MacNICOL: Certainly not the way the government is operating its manufacturing plants.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not think any government can operate a manufacturing plant; no government would ever attempt to do it. But the government of Canada could, as any other government can, hire just the same type of technicians, just the same brain, and they would act with even greater enthusiasm to carry on in the interests of the people rather than in the interests of the exploitation of the people. So I say that that does not frighten me a little bit.

I am very glad that this gift is being made. But let us view it realistically. We are prepared to give this to the British people, and we hope they will get it. We hope the British people will benefit from this, and not a few people in Great Britain. We hope that in the making of this gift it will ultimately benefit the people of Canada, too, not a few people in Canada—because otherwise the obligation which this involves may mean that there will be still $1,000 million worth of claims on the labour of the Canadian people for a very long time to come.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, in his speech the minister raised a number of interesting points which will no doubt raise many questions in the minds of hon. members. Those questions will have to be left over to the committee stage.

I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in his criticism of some of the statements made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). It is intolerable to feel that to-day we are fighting for a continuation of conditions such as existed in this country before the war, conditions which apparently the leader of the opposition feels must exist again at the end of this war. We have been told by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by other members of the government that there will be a new social order at the end of the war. But judging from the statements made by the ministers themselves and by the leader of the opposition, it is quite evident they do not really believe there will be any fundamental change in future policies.

At the very outset I wish to say that the members of this group are whole-heartedly behind the government in the proposal to give to Great Britain outright a billion dollars' worth of goods. We feel that this should be regarded merely as a start of a new policy as between allied nations. It involves of course a completely new principle, and I am going to deal with that from two different angles. First I shall discuss the moral, and then the economic side.

Speaking first about the moral side, I think we will all agree that to-day there is only one real issue before this and every other one of the Allied Nations, and that is to defeat the enemy wherever he may be found, whether it be in Europe, in Asia, in Australia or in New Zealand. If we do not meet and defeat the enemy in those places we will eventually have to meet and defeat him on the North American continent. It is very important that the people of this country as a whole should meet that fact face to face, and more realistically. Unfortunately many people in this country still think that we can sit back on our doorsteps and wait for the enemy to appear. Let us constantly keep before our minds this all-important fact, that the battle in Russia to-day is our battle, that the conflict raging in the Dutch East Indies is our conflict, and the same is true of Burma, China, Africa, wherever the enemy may be found. Let us realize this before we have to add America to the list.

I think it is apparent to everyone that the allies should cast every ounce of their strength against the enemy at this time. In order that this may be done it is very necessary that we should mobilize our maximum strength. I do not think we have done it up to the present time. I think I can show shortly that we in this country are a long way from having done that, and the same can be said of every one of our allies, including Britain. We should reduce all non-essential services down to the very minimum. We shall have to be content to maintain a standard of living just barely sufficient to guarantee that our people can be maintained in a state of health and efficiency.

In my opinion the total available resources of all the allies should be pooled for a united effort under a united command. No matter where the battle may be, no matter in what part of this world we may have to fight, the total resources of all the allies should be available to a united command. This united command should be able to throw these total resources into the conflict disregarding completely who owned them before they were turned over. For example, let us assume that the united effort of Great Britain represents eight units; that of Canada four units; that of the United States ten units, and Russia twelve units. I am not suggesting for one moment that these figures represent a true comparison, I am just using them as examples. All these units should be made available for a common effort against the enemy.

Would the United States be justified in saying that they are only prepared to put into that common pool eight of their units, but would sell the other two to any one of the more pressed nations? Apparently the minister thinks that there might be some justification for that, because he says we are giving a billion dollars to Great Britain and are having to find foreign exchange to buy from the United States. Personally I can see no justification for giving a billion dollars' worth of goods to Great Britain, on the one hand and, on the other hand, having to buy from the United States. This is just as much the war of the United States as it is the war of Canada, of Britain or of Russia. I cannot see any possible excuse for buying, on the one hand and giving on the other. We should do everything in our power to convince the United States that this is just as much their war as it is ours, and therefore that they should be prepared to give to the common pool instead of lending.

As I was saying, at the present time apparently some people in Canada feel that we should give only one of our units and should lend or sell the rest. Again I say that the same thing that I referred to with regards to U.S.A. applies to Canada. I am reminded of an example which was drawn to my attention. Two men, one large and one small, were standing with their backs to the wall facing the enemy. The large man said to the small man, "I can fight a great deal better than you; I am going to put one of my hands behind my back and fight just with the other so we can put forth an equal effort. However, I will sell you the use of that arm in order that we can put up a better fight." Surely he should realize that unless he uses both arms, he as well as the other man will be licked. It is essential that he use both arms, whether or not he is able to sell them.

There should be no loans or sales as between the allied nations. Furthermore, at the end of the war, when the time comes for rehabilitating the devastated areas of the allies, that work should be done on the same basis, without loans or debts. If at the present time better use can be made of our tanks in Great Britain, then those tanks should be given to Great Britain. If at the present time better use can be made of our tanks in Russia, then those tanks should be given to Russia. In order that such a proposal may be carried out in an equitable way it is essential that every one of these nations should maintain their production at its maximum level and reduce non-essential services and be satisfied with a moderate standard of living. It would not be fair for one nation to say that it is going to have "business as usual" while the other nations cut down their expenditures to the very minimum. There must be an equality of sacrifice to the greatest degree possible.

Are we in Canada maintaining our production at the present time at its maximum level? I shall take one of the primary industries, that of agriculture. I know enough about agriculture to know that our production can be extended tremendously in many lines, such as poultry, hogs, honey, cheese, and so on. This can be done if the people are assured that they will get a price equal to the cost of production, and if the necessary organization is put into operation to produce this result. Unfortunately in this country to-day we are still thinking in terms of jobs instead of maximum production. Instead of organizing our production to its maximum, in order to provide jobs for people we are willing to allow certain non-essential services to continue. I have an important example of this before me which I should like to give to the house. I have before me a copy of the Financial Post of February 21. I should like to quote from page 17 to show how far some people are from understanding the real problem that faces this country. I quote:

> Gold Fights for Canada
> Canada's story is typical of that of other united nations. For Canada, gold provides:
> 1. Foreign exchange—about $205 millions in 1941, equal to one-fourth of all the U.S. dollars provided by Canadian exports in that year, one-ninth of all Canada's exports.

I shall take one section of this at a time. If the United States were willing to let us have goods on the same basis as that on which we are giving them to England, it would not be necessary to export gold to the United States. That gold does not help the war effort of the United States in one single degree. If the United States are really interested in winning this war, would it not be better for them to say that they do not need this gold, that we should put our 32,000 miners, most of them skilled labourers, to work in war industries in order to expand our war effort? Paragraph 2 reads:

2. Taxes on approximately $60 millions of wages and salaries; on the $21 millions of supplies purchased; on the $94 millions left for direct taxes on mining profits, depreciation and dividends; on the personal income gained from roughly $50 millions paid in dividends by purely gold mining companies.

If those same men were put to work in war industries, would not the government be getting taxation from those war industries? Taxation derived from gold mining is no more valuable to the government than the same amount of taxation derived from war industries.

Paragraph 3 is the funniest part of it all. I cannot imagine that any person would be guilty at a time like this of making such a foolish statement. It reads:

3. A living—for 32,000 miners, their families and the communities built up to serve them. Rough estimate of the total number supported by the gold mines has been placed at over 200,000 Canadians.

This publication contends that we should continue gold mining in order to provide jobs for 32,000 men; yet we are told in this house day after day that our production has reached its maximum capacity because we have not the skilled labour available. These men are mostly skilled machinists and miners; they are the type of men that are needed greatly to-day in our war effort. But apparently those with the gold mentality would rather go on mining gold, would rather keep these men working at some non-essential service that might handicap our war effort. I defy the minister or any one in this house to show me how these men are helping the united war effort of the allies in any degree whatsoever. If you leave the United States out of the war, yes, that might make it necessary for us to buy from them with gold. But with the United States in the war, you cannot say that gold helps in the slightest degree.

Paragraph 4 deals with morale. It says:

Gold production maintains the morale of the civilians.

To what extent would the morale of the people of this country be hurt if we stopped producing gold? On the contrary it would be raised considerably, because the people would realize that the government was waking up and at last cutting down on non-essential services. But the Financial Post says that gold production builds up the morale of the people. Yes—the people who are getting dividends from the gold mines. That is all that the Financial Post worries about—the shareholders. It goes on to say:

Many of those serving the miners could not find other jobs and would become reliefees instead of taxpayers if it were not for the steady production of the gold mines.

If these men were put into war industry they would not be out of work or on relief. But is the government really interested in planning war production at this time? Do the words of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) mean nothing when they say that we are short of skilled labour? One would almost be led to believe so.

I want to refer briefly to a statement made by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). I am sure he was perfectly sincere in what he said and I am not going to attack him on that basis. But I would point out that some of his arguments were not very sound. What he said was spoken in another debate during the present session and I cannot read it, but I shall briefly summarize some of his points. He asks us not to allow 65,000 people to be thrown out of employment by stopping the production of gold. I do not know where he got that 65,000. I thought it was around 60,000, but I wrote to the bureau of statistics and they assured me that the total number of men in all classes of the gold mining industry would not number more than between 32,000 and 33,000, with the exception of prospectors. But we will use the hon. member's own figure of 65,000, because he may include in that number the men who are providing food for the miners. He said that he was not discussing the gold standard. He did not want to get into that argument. But what possible justification can there be for supporting the production of gold unless at the same time you are prepared to support the gold standard? He urged that these men at work in the gold mines be not thrown out of work but be put on essential services. We are not urging that they be thrown out of work. There would be no sense in that. We are asking that the production of gold be stopped to release these men for essential services. The hon. member for Cochrane seems to think that we want to throw them out of work.

He also contended that if men should be kept on farms when there is a surplus of wheat, surely, therefore, gold mining should not be discontinued. He seemed to think we were inconsistent in wanting to keep men on the farms producing wheat not needed now, and at the same time condemning the gold mining industry. There again I point out that the number of men required to produce wheat is comparatively small. The part of agriculture that requires the greatest proportion of labour is not the raising of wheat, but live stock and dairying, the products of which are very much needed to-day. One man may be running a one-section grain farm, with an additional man to help at the harvest. My boy has been running a one and a quarter section farm, running the combine and engine himself, and the only help he has is a man to haul the grain away.

Mr. MARTIN: He is doing better than his dad.

Mr. QUELCH: He has better machinery than I had. On the other hand, just as soon as he started to go into live stock he had to have additional help. It is that which takes men for the farm. In the days of the old threshing machine we needed a lot of labour. It required ten men on a threshing gang. But to-day one man can handle what took ten men before the advent of modern machinery. Of course some members may say: If that is so, it cannot cost much to raise wheat. I do not want to leave that impression. It costs a great deal of money to buy that type of machinery, and the depreciation on it is very heavy indeed. That is where the money goes, to machinery companies, instead of to labour.

Another point. Even if the wheat is not urgently required, and I admit that it is not urgently required to-day, we realize that it is necessary to build up great reserves of wheat for the future. But even if it were not urgently required, that wheat at least is not harmful to anyone. No one would suggest that. On the other hand, large accumulations of gold are harmful because they give rise to an ever-growing demand on the part of certain people in high places that the country should go back to the gold standard. It would be a bold man who would say that the gold standard has not done tremendous harm to nations in the past.

I noticed a statement in a paper recently that gave me a great deal of concern. I raised the matter in the house this session, at page 60 of Hansard, as follows:

On January 21, 1942, there appeared in the Edmonton Journal an account of the scheme to be submitted to the Rio conference. Section 2 of the proposal, as outlined in the article reads:

"Creation of a free international exchange currency to facilitate flow of goods and prevent delay in transactions. It would be on a gold basis and in addition to the American nations, Great Britain, China, the Netherlands, India and all British dominions would enter into the agreement. A pool of allied gold holdings would be created. The Latin American countries would agree to peg their national currencies into the free international exchange currency."

I asked the Prime Minister whether or not Canada had any commitments, and he said that Canada had not any commitments, and that there has not been any correspondence on this matter. He did not state whether there had been any discussions. I am satisfied that there have been discussions; there cannot be any doubt about that. I cannot believe that a statement such as the one I have just read would be submitted to the conference unless there was some foundation for it, and the statement says definitely, "Great Britain and all British dominions." Would that statement be made without any foundation? So that while the Prime Minister's statement that there has been no correspondence may be correct, I maintain that undoubtedly there have been discussions, if not on the part of the Prime Minister himself, at least by men in official positions. I shall refer to one of these gentlemen. I have here a copy of National Money News, published by the League for Economic Democracy. In its issue of January 15 at page 3, this item appears:

Doctor James going to Britain to discuss post-war plans.

Ottawa, January 13 (CP).—Doctor F. Cyril James, principal and vice-chancellor of McGill University, will go to Britain shortly to consult United Kingdom authorities on post-war reconstruction, officials at the Department of Pensions and National Health said to-day. Doctor James is chairman of the seven-man committee on reconstruction which acts as advisory committee to the federal cabinet.

Undoubtedly Doctor James has a definite official position in connection with post-war reconstruction. The dispatch goes on to quote from a statement that appeared in the Toronto Daily Star, which I have taken pains to verify, and here is the statement from the Toronto Daily Star of September 17, 1940:

That was an interesting speech to the American bar association at Philadelphia by Doctor F. Cyril James, principal of McGill. The gold question, he declared, must be considered as a problem of social and political philosophy rather than one of pure monetary theory. If you believe in national isolation and autarchy, he said, the present gold policy of the United States is perhaps the most stupendous piece of folly in history. But if you believe in democratic capitalism and some kind of world economic order, it may be regarded as the most constructive contribution now being made, in any part of the world, to the future welfare of the United States and all mankind.

Doctor James used to be professor of finance at the Wharton school of finance and commerce at the university of Pennsylvania and is therefore an authority. He declared that the United States gold holdings—

This is the interesting point.

—now exceeding $21,000,000,000, were at stake in the war—

In other words, we are fighting to maintain the value of the $21,000,000,000 of gold holdings in the United States.

—and that their value would depend on who won. A British victory meant continuance of gold as the monetary medium—

Mind you, this man, I take it, is speaking on behalf of the government. He is chairman of this seven-man committee. Otherwise he is talking out of turn.

—whereas a German victory, as Doctor Funk himself recently made bluntly clear, would mean the setting up of regional autarchies in which gold would be useless except for economic decoration. Another definite reason, if any were required, for Canadians doing their utmost, in war loans and everything else, for the defeat of Germany! One of our greatest industries is gold mining and, to protect our economic order as well as our country and our homes, victory must be assured.

The whole speech is in defence of gold. He is chairman of this committee on post-war reconstruction. Therefore I do not doubt for one minute that there have been discussions. Maybe he is responsible for the statement made at the Rio conference.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is reconstruction on a gold basis.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, it is reconstruction on a gold basis. I do not think there is any doubt of that. Anyone who reads the Financial Post to-day knows that they are continually harping on the fact that we shall be back to the gold standard after the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, no.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister may shake his head, but Doctor James is of the very definite opinion that that is the thing we are fighting for to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I can tell the hon. member that Doctor James is not running the policies of this government.

Mr. QUELCH: But he is chairman of the seven-man committee, acting in an advisory capacity to the government. It says so here. I suggest that it is high time the government got new advisers if they do not approve his advice. Why keep a man to advise you if you do not agree with his advice?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It may be window-dressing on the part of the government.

Mr. QUELCH: If so, it is a very objectionable type of window-dressing, and not the kind of thing which is going to create the morale so necessary to the people of this country, or instil the will to victory.

An hon. MEMBER: It is time to clean house.

Mr. QUELCH: Most definitely so.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. MARTIN: He represents one point of view on a committee which includes many points of view.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But all representing the government point of view.

Mr. QUELCH: I hope his point of view is only his own, but if the government have one man on the committee who represents that viewpoint, there is every reason to suppose that there are also others of the same opinion.

An hon. MEMBER: The government cannot control a man's speeches.

Mr. QUELCH: If he, the chairman, was appointed by the dominion government, I think the government should have some control. A statement of that kind will be detrimental to the war effort. If the people get the idea that they are fighting to maintain our gold reserves and the interests of shareholders in gold mines, it is not going to have any good effect.

Mr. MARTIN: Let us call it a McGill university indiscretion.

Mr. QUELCH: That is a very mild term. There are many non-essential services, but I think this is the most glaring example of one which can be done away with without causing privation to anybody. Until we are rid of this kind of service I believe our war effort will fall far short of what it should be.

Another business which is in the same category is the liquor traffic. Does any one believe to-day that we could not very well ration liquor?

Mr. MacNICOL: It depends on the man's capacity.

Mr. QUELCH: Would the hon. member suggest that if we rationed it, he would be any worse off physically than when he is allowed to drink an unlimited amount?

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not drink. I am a teetotaller.

Mr. QUELCH: I would suggest, joking apart, it would not hurt anyone for the duration of the war to be limited to, say a bottle of whisky a year.

An hon. MEMBER: A week!

An hon. MEMBER: A day!

Mr. QUELCH: I understand some member to say that in British Columbia it has been reduced to one bottle a day. Perhaps the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) can give us some information in that regard.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. QUELCH: I do not want anyone to say that I advocate that the rum issue to the troops should be done away with. I do not suggest that for a moment. When men undergo what they have to undergo, a drop of rum makes a very great difference, at a time such as stand-to in the morning. But I do not believe that people in civil life need to be able to buy bottle after bottle week in and week out, and if their supply were curtailed severely it would mean not only a saving of labour but, I believe, an increase in efficiency. Last week-end I was in Montreal, and although I was there only one night I saw three brawls in the streets. They were caused by drunks, and when the policemen came up they just sat in their car and watched the fight. I am not casting any aspersions at Montreal; I do not doubt that similar scenes are taking place in many other cities.

We not only let down our allies but are false to ourselves when we do not put forward the maximum effort of which we are capable.

On motion of Mr. Quelch the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 19, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CUSTODIAN OF ENEMY PROPERTY

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

1. What is the value of the property of all kinds held by the custodian in respect to interned persons?

2. Is there an advisory committee to the custodian of enemy property?

3. If so, what are the names of the members of such committee; when were they appointed, and by whom were they appointed?

4. What salary, allowance, fee or other emolument, including travelling expenses, is paid to each member of the advisory committee; and what is the total amount paid to each member since his appointment?

*SASKATCHEWAN EMERGENCY LANDING FIELDS

Mr. PERLEY:

Will the emergency landing fields at Moosomin, Broadview, Wolseley and Indian Head, Saskatchewan, be further developed?

Mr. HOWE: This is a matter dealing with the future, and it would be very hard to answer yes or no. We might decide in 1945 that we would make some addition; so I suggest that it be dropped.

Mr. PERLEY: Nothing in the near future, then?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say.

3. As at December 31, 1941, how many employees came under the operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act?

4. In the event of an employee enlisting before having made the 180 payments which entitle him to benefit, is there a refund of payments to the employee and the employer?

3. Up to December 31, 1941, approximately 2,200,000 books had been issued to persons working in insured employment.

4. No.

*RADIO BROADCASTING—MADAME PIERRE F. CASGRAIN

Mr. ROY:

1. Does Madame Pierre F. Casgrain broadcast over the C.B.C. for the Department of National Defence or for the war services of the Department of Finance?

2. If so, what sums has she been paid for such services since the 1st of January, 1941, to date?

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned the answer to the first question is no, and the answer to the second is, none.

Mr. ROY:

1. Is Madame Pierre Casgrain in charge of, or does she take part in any of the broadcasting programmes of the C.B.C.?

2. If so, (a) what is the nature of these programmes; (b) what remuneration does she receive for each one; (c) how much has been paid to her by the C.B.C. for all services from January 1, 1941, to date?

Mr. THORSON:

1. Yes.

2. (a) (i) "Femina", a 30-minute weekly programme devoted to women's interests.

(ii) News of women's activities—15 minutes five times a week.

(b) Nil.

(c) Nil.

*ASSISTANCE TO MEDICAL STUDENTS JOINING H.M. FORCES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What action has the government taken regarding the application made by the medical faculties of Canadian universities for some direct assistance to those medical students who are entering the medical branches of His Majesty's forces?

2. What representations have been made, by whom and for how many students?

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to make a verbal answer to this question, because it gives me an opportunity to make a statement with regard to the question of policy in assisting medical students who intend to enlist in the armed services. With regard to part 1 of the question, it is estimated that the armed services will, during the ensuing fiscal year, require probably 800 medical officers, of which 50 will be needed by the navy, 600 by the army and 150 by the air force. As a matter of fact the army could take on almost at once probably 150 medical officers; and the air force, I am informed, probably 75 to 100. These requirements are being brought to the attention of the medical profession throughout Canada and the Canadian Medical Association is cooperating by sending out a questionnaire to all members of the profession.

I come now to the direct answer to my hon. friend's question. In order to assist in increasing the future supply of medical officers for the armed forces the medical services of the navy, army and air are cooperating in a scheme designed to aid worthy students of medicine who propose to enlist. This arrangement is the result of a thorough study of the medical needs of the armed forces, and has been proposed after consultation with the medical faculties of the universities throughout Canada. Briefly the scheme is as follows.

The universities will be asked to accelerate their courses, while maintaining the same standard of training, by reducing the normal summer vacation periods to a minimum. In this way a student will be able to cover his full course in a considerably shorter period. By this acceleration of courses students will be debarred from earning in the long summer vacation. The plan is designed to make up for this loss of income. It is proposed that the armed services will enlist students at any time during the two final years before they qualify for a licence to practice. They will thus, during this period, become members of the armed forces and will then be granted leave with pay and subsistence allowance which will enable them to complete their courses and to obtain a licence to practise.

This assistance to medical students who intend to join the armed forces will be supplemented by the Department of Labour, in cooperation with the provincial governments, by extending the present system of scholarships. These scholarships, up to a maximum of perhaps $300 per year, will also be open to other worthy students who because of the acceleration of the courses will be deprived of the opportunity to earn during what would be the normal vacation period.

The students who will be eligible for these scholarships will be those who are in need of such assistance, who possess good academic standing and who give satisfactory assurance to serve in the national war effort in the capacity in which they have been trained.

There will also be some expenditure involved in connection with additional costs to universities on account of the accelerated courses.

The Department of Labour is now in correspondence with the provincial governments with a view to enlisting their cooperation in implementing this extended plan. I may say the provincial governments, or at least some of them, have already cooperated in connection with the plan for scholarships, which is already in force.

In the result, medical students who intend to join the armed forces will, after the first year, receive assistance from the Department of Labour, in cooperation with the provincial governments, by way of scholarships, during the earlier years of their courses, and during the last two years they will receive pay and subsistence allowance as duly enlisted members of the armed forces.

That is the answer to the first part of the question. The second part of the question is:

What representations have been made, by whom and for how many students?

I would point out that we have received representations from Doctor Cody, the university of Toronto; Doctor James, of McGill university; Doctor Harvey Agnew, of the Canadian Medical Association; Mr. Edward B. Campbell, Chairman of the Canadian Association of Medical Students and Internes, of the university of Toronto; Doctor J. C. Meakins, of McGill university; Doctor Stanley C. Best, of the Medical Society, university of Toronto; Mr. Robert T. Noble, of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario, and Doctor Deadman, of Hamilton. There may have been other representations, but those are all that have been called to my attention.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY—INTERIM APPROPRIATION

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide that a sum not exceeding $500,000,000 be granted to his majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending the thirty-first day of March, 1943, for the purposes and subject to the terms, conditions and limitations set out in the resolution to provide that sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 be granted to his majesty, which resolution was referred to the committee of the whole on the 17th of March, 1942; and being one-fourth of the said amount of $2,000,000,000.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

RADIO BROADCASTING

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL IN SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Ross (St. Paul's) be substituted for that of Mr. Bence on the select committee on radio broadcasting.

Motion agreed to.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

ROUTE FROM EDMONTON TO FORT ST. JOHN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he is now in a position to answer the question I asked on the sixth instant about the Alaska highway. In the agreement between the United States and Canada tabled yesterday there is no answer to that question. I should like to ask the Prime Minister how the road from Edmonton, on the south, is to reach Fort St. John. There is only one bridge across the Peace river, and that is at the town of Peace River. Is the road to go over that bridge?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must apologize to my hon. friend, because I quite forgot about his question. However I shall look into the matter. I do not know whether or not I shall be able to enlighten him, but I shall get the best information I can.

PRIVILEGE—MR. FAUTEUX

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. LACOMBE IN DEBATE ON MARCH 16

Mr. GASPARD FAUTEUX (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, on March 16 the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) made a statement in the House of Commons against which I wish to protest. With your permission I shall read the statement as it appears on page 1322 of Hansard:

> The people will understand now why the government of Quebec, placed as is the federal administration under the thumb of high finance, has mobilized its millionaire friends, its election parasites, its vote "telegraphers" from Montreal and Quebec to steal the recent Quebec East and Montreal-St. Mary contests.

I think, Mr. Speaker, —

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. member to say he was rising to a question of privilege either with respect to himself or to the house.

An hon. MEMBER: He is the hon. member for St. Mary.

Mr. SPEAKER: So far as the hon. member has gone, I have not noticed any question of privilege. Of course I do not know what he will read subsequently.

Mr. FAUTEUX: The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains has said the election in Montreal-St. Mary riding was stolen. As the representative of that constituency I am keenly interested.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order.

An hon. MEMBER: There is no point of order.

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, standing order 36 is as follows:

> If anything shall come in question touching the conduct of any member, or his election, or his right to hold his seat, he may make a statement and shall withdraw during the time the matter is in debate.

I ask the hon. member to withdraw during the time the matter is in debate.

An hon. MEMBER: He has not made a statement.

Mr. LACOMBE: He has made a statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member can hardly withdraw before he has made a statement. The hon. member will please continue.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has made a statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not hear what the hon. member said.

Mr. FAUTEUX: I said that the declaration and the accusation of the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains are absolutely unjustified. He is accusing the provincial Liberal party of having stolen the election in St. Mary, when he should know, as everybody in my constituency knows, that I did not have any help from the Liberal organization of Montreal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member not to introduce controversial matters into a denial of statements that have been made by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains. He is entitled to deny any statement that was made by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains, but he is not entitled to enter into an argument to justify his statement.

Mr. FAUTEUX: I am referring to the speech of the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains in which he said that the election was stolen in my county. It is very disagreeable to be obliged to talk about this matter, but I believe it is my duty to justify myself as well as my electors. I believe if the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains knew the facts he would be the first one to say that this statement is unjustified.

Mr. LACOMBE: Absolutely, no.

Mr. FAUTEUX: Only last Monday Mr. Périard went to the Liberal organization in Montreal and offered his services—

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, please.

Mr. LACOMBE: I ask that the hon. member—

An hon. MEMBER: Too late.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: —withdraw immediately.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I understand that the hon. member has completed his statement on the question of privilege. There is no debate upon a question of privilege. The matter is now closed.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, standing order 36 reads:

> If anything shall come in question touching the conduct of any member, or his election, or his right to hold his seat, he may make a statement and then shall withdraw during the time the matter is in debate.

I ask that the hon. member withdraw from this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member need not withdraw. There is no debate on this matter.

Mr. LACOMBE: I want to make a debate on this question raised by the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. member to take his seat. The hon. member for St. Mary is entitled to make a statement on the question of privilege and he has done so. There is no debate.

Mr. HANSELL: I rise to a point of order. Standing order 36—

An hon. MEMBER: Too late.

Mr. HANSELL: It is not too late; I have the floor. Standing order 36 reads:

If anything shall come in question touching the conduct of any member,—

I claim that the member has risen on a question of privilege which is involved in the term, "if anything shall come in question touching the conduct of any member." The standing order continues:

—or his election, or his right to hold his seat, he may make a statement—

Which the hon. gentleman has done—

—and then shall withdraw during the time the matter is in debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is referring to the rules of the house which deal with the conduct of an hon. member. There is nothing before the house regarding the conduct of the hon. member; there is only the question of privilege in regard to an election that was held in Montreal.

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order. It is not only the conduct of the hon. member, but the conduct of this election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot raise a point of order on a point of order. The point of order has been taken already and it has been ruled upon; therefore that is the end of it.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

PROCEDURE WITH RESPECT TO QUESTIONS ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty), which is based upon a resolution which I have received from the Roblin branch of the Canadian legion. The resolution reads—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I assume that the question the hon. member is now proposing to ask is the same as the question that I ruled out of order yesterday, stating that it would have to be placed upon the order paper. Is that not so?

Mr. WARD: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot allow it to be asked to-day.

Mr. WARD: On a question of privilege. After all, this question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yesterday I asked the hon. member if he could say that this was a matter affecting the privileges of the house, and he said he could not. The hon. member now informs me that he is endeavouring to ask, on a point of privilege, the same question that I ruled out of order yesterday. The position now is the same as it was then, and the hon. member should not proceed with the matter on the orders of the day.

WAR APPROPRIATION

UNITED KINGDOM FINANCING—WAR SUPPLIES, FOOD AND LOAN WITHOUT INTEREST

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley that the house go into committee on a resolution to provide for granting to His Majesty sums not exceeding $1,000,000,000 to assist in enabling the government of the United Kingdom to defray expenditures incurred in Canada for war purposes, and to provide for a loan to the government of the United Kingdom of $700,000,000 without interest.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, just before adjournment yesterday I was pointing out that this group was wholeheartedly behind the proposal to give to Great Britain one billion dollars' worth of goods. Moreover, I urged that this should be carried further so that there might be an agreement between the allied nations under which their total resources would be put into a common pool for a united effort without incurring debt as between themselves. I justified this proposal on moral grounds, and I stressed the fact that to carry it out in the most equitable way possible it would be essential for each one of these nations to maintain its production at a maximum level, to curtail all non-essential services and to be satisfied to endure a standard of living no more than sufficient to ensure its people a state of health and efficiency.

This proposal is merely an extension to an international basis of what we have been advocating on a national basis. We have urged in the past, and we still urge to-day, that the dominion government should be given the credit to finance its war expenditures without incurring debt, and to drain off any surplus purchasing power through taxation rather than by the sale of bonds.

Under the proposal before the house we are giving to Britain a credit of one billion dollars to buy Canadian goods, but to-day we are not draining off the total amount of purchasing power by taxation but are using to a large extent public issues of bonds. However, we realize that the government is not supporting this proposal on moral grounds.

Under the present system the repayment of large war debts embarrasses both the creditor nation and the impoverished debtor nation. What appears to be worrying the Minister of Finance is how if we become a great creditor nation will the people of Canada be able to buy the goods accepted in payment of war debts. It never seems to enter the minister's head that the people of Canada could be given a credit to buy these goods in just exactly the same way as we are making a credit available to Britain for this billion dollars' worth of goods. Under a balanced economy, one in which the physical demand of the people was made effective against the total production of the country, this would be no problem. As a matter of fact it would be regarded as a great blessing. It would be merely a question of making the physical demand of the people effective against the production of the country. This might be done, if there were unemployed, by instituting large-scale public works projects, by increasing the amount of old age pensions, and by paying pensions to people who were physically incapacitated. Or, on the other hand, it could be accomplished by putting into operation a price discount on the sale of goods in exactly the same way as to-day we apply the sales tax for the opposite purpose.

While we support the principle of giving these goods to Britain we are not in accord with all the provisions of this resolution. I shall leave clauses 2 and 3 of the resolution to discuss at the committee stage, but I want now to refer to clause 4, which reads:

> 4. That the governor in council be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money not exceeding in the whole the sum of one thousand million dollars ($1,000,000,000) as may be required for the purpose of defraying the expenditures and making the purchases referred to herein, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

[Mr. Quelch.]

We are opposed to the general principle of that clause. We believe in the principle of financing the war without incurring debt. We believe, and the minister himself has admitted time and again in this house, that the real cost of a war is met while the war is being fought, met by the loss of lives and the destruction of property and war materials. We cannot see why, if the real cost of the war is met during the war, we should allow any financial costs to be left to be paid afterwards. In other words, we are saying that we want to have the right to consume goods during the war but we also want the right to issue claims against future generations for the payment of these goods. We maintain to-day, and we have maintained consistently since the declaration of war, that if people can go through the war maintaining a decent standard of living and come out of it no worse off than they were at the start, they should consider themselves indeed lucky. It would be advisable, no doubt, to allow the purchase of a limited number of interest-free war savings certificates so that people may be allowed to put aside a certain amount of money to take care of certain eventualities; in other words, put aside a little for a rainy day. Therefore we urge again that to the extent that taxation and the sale of interest-free war savings certificates fail to meet the government's expenditures the services of the Bank of Canada should be utilized. When I say that, I do not use the expression "interest-free", because it makes little or no difference what the rate of interest in that case would be, because all profits of the Bank of Canada come back to the people and therefore the interest charges also come back after all expenses are met. I maintain that under such a proposal there would actually be far less danger of inflation than under the present method, because the Minister of Finance has admitted that fundamentally the main reason for taxation and the sale of bonds is to curtail the spending of the people, to withdraw money from circulation.

What actually happens when bonds are sold? You may see high-pressure salesmen persuading people to buy bonds who in reality are not in a position to buy them, and the result is that within a short space of time a certain number of these bonds are resold to the chartered banks. When these bonds are sold to the banks, the banks create the money with which to buy them, so that the very purpose which the government is trying to accomplish by selling bonds is defeated by the chartered banks in creating that new money.

Not only that, but in the 1941 victory loan campaign $135,000,000 was created by the chartered banks for the purpose of lending to people to buy bonds. There you have, on the one hand, the government selling bonds in order to withdraw money from circulation, and on the other hand, you have the chartered banks creating $135,000,000 of new money with which to buy those bonds, thereby defeating the very thing the government is trying to do. As time goes on, undoubtedly more and more of these bonds will be sold to the chartered banks, which in effect will be inflationary.

On the other hand, if you were financing this war on a true pay-as-you-go basis, withdrawing all surplus purchasing power from circulation by taxation, it would not be possible for the chartered banks to expand the amount of money in circulation by the purchase of bonds from the people.

In closing, I should like to say that we do appreciate the fact that step by step the government is being compelled to recognize the soundness of so many of the things which we have been advocating in the past. For instance, consistently from 1935 to 1939 we propounded the principle that anything that is physically possible and desirable should be made financially possible. To-day nobody would dispute that principle, which was ridiculed time and again during those five years. To-day, however, the government never misses an opportunity of emphasizing the fact that no financial restrictions of any kind whatsoever shall be allowed to impede our war effort. I only hope for the benefit of the people of Canada as a whole that the government will continue that policy after the war and tell the people then that no financial restrictions of any kind whatsoever shall be allowed to impede our peace effort. But already, I am afraid, we are being told by people in high places that when the war ends the screws will be put on and people must be prepared to tighten their belts and cash in on their war savings certificates to provide the money to take them through the depression which many people seem to think s inevitable after the war.

Another thing we advocated time and again was that when there is a condition of unemployment it is possible to have a creation of money for the purpose of providing full employment by a further expansion of the production of the country; and again we were invariably met with the cry of "inflation". But the very first declaration of the Minister of Finance, then acting minister of finance, in this house when he was discussing the war policy was that there would be monetary expansion for the purpose of providing employment and expanding our resources. If it is sound to have monetary expansion for the purpose of providing full employment in order to develop the resources of the nation at war, surely it should be just as sound to do the same thing in peace, in order to raise the standards of living of the people.

Another point. When we advocated monetary reform in the past we were often accused of supporting something of an inflationary nature. However we always stressed the need for price control. I dealt with this last session. The minister himself ridiculed in past years the idea of price control; yet to-day we have it.

Lastly, as to making goods available to Britain without debt, let me assure the minister that we in this corner will be only too pleased to cooperate with him at any time he finds it necessary or desirable to do those things which we have been advocating consistently in the past.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, may I crave your indulgence for a few moments in order to keep the record straight and, also to alleviate the worry of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) about the security of Britain because of a statement which I am reported as having made in the city of Quebec on February 7 last. The outburst of the hon. gentleman yesterday does not worry me a bit; in fact, it amuses me. I have known him for many years, and know that he is given to periodic attempts at making purges in his opponents' political camps. In fact I recall that two years ago he started on a rampage to purge the Liberal party of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and started the campaign with the slogan, "King must go." He carried it on for a while in the House of Commons, but he woke up one morning to find out that he was the one to go and that he himself had been purged of the leadership of his party. I am not at all worried about the purge which he attempted yesterday, but I want to keep the record straight, and I think that the house and, indeed, the hon. gentleman, is entitled to the explanation he asked of me.

The statement I made in Quebec was reported by the Canadian Press on February 9, and was made on the Saturday evening previous, the seventh. The statement, as reported and as placed on Hansard yesterday is, so far as I can recall, as accurate a translation as could be made of the words which I used while speaking in the French language. However, they must be taken with the context of the whole speech. I do not accept the interpretation placed upon them by the leader of the opposition. What I did say was this:

> We will have furnished enough provisions and arms by that time to pay off all debts that Canada owed to British capital.

If the house recalls the elaborate and clear statement made yesterday by the Minister of Finance, and reapproaches them in the light of the statements made on January 26 by the Prime Minister with regard to our lease-give proposals to Great Britain, I believe it will be agreed that they justify the conclusion which I drew from these proposals when I was trying to explain them to the electors of Quebec. At this particular meeting I was trying to justify this so-called gift to Britain and the financial proposals which had been made public by the Prime Minister just a few days previously, and to show that they would be not only in the interests of Britain, but in the interests of Canada, of Canadians, and of my listeners.

These proposals were not popular, not merely in that district but among very loyal people in Ontario and all the provinces of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who?

Mr. MICHAUD: Oh, well, "who"! Among many people, because of the misunderstandings to which the leader of the opposition referred yesterday, and which were so important that the Royal bank review of March had to make reference to these misconceptions which appear to have arisen concerning the policy of the government. I had, as most other hon. members have had, to explain privately the nature of these proposals to various individuals. I had also to explain them publicly and to refute arguments in opposition to them which had been made to me, not only in Ottawa but in many places in Canada, and which were repeated in this campaign. They were to the effect that the government was ruining Canada, was making the country bankrupt by giving $1,000,000,000 to Britain; that it was ridiculous to assert that it was a good transaction for this country, and that the money was not needed by Britain in view of the fact that shortly after this proposal was made Britain turned around and offered to China a loan equal to half the amount which we were giving to Britain. These are the arguments which I was trying to contradict, explain and refute when I drew in my own language the conclusions to which my hon. friend objects.

I stated also, as far as I can recollect, that as a result of these proposals and these transactions, Britain would be owing to Canada alone as much money as the British capitalists had invested in Canada. I think that will be the consequence or the result of the transaction. And, putting it in my own way, I said that that would mean the financial independence of Canada from British capital. I never said or intended to say that it meant the political independence of Canada.

[Mr. Michaud.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I never said that you did.

Mr. MICHAUD: It had no reference to the moral obligations of Canada towards Britain. I used the words "financial independence" to designate the relation in which Canada would be towards British investors in this country after this financial arrangement had been concluded.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the amount of their investment in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a complete equality, just as my hon. friend says, so far as dollar obligations are concerned: $700,000,000 will be owed by Canada to Great Britain and $700,000,000 by Great Britain to Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To the rescue.

Mr. MICHAUD: I would not dare use that word for fear I might be attacked for disloyalty, but this is the fact. Now I continue my argument. I said that Canada being independent financially it followed that she would be independent economically. I never said or intended to say that our economic relations with Britain would thereupon cease and discontinue for the future. I meant that it was a logical consequence of the fact of our being economically or financially independent, as I understood it. I said that would be the consequence of the financial proposals. I presume it would be another logical consequence that we should be free to find markets where we wished. Is it not a fact that being financially, economically independent one of another we would be free to enter into relations with and find markets in Britain or to do so wherever we might wish?

An hon. MEMBER: Have we not that right now?

Mr. MICHAUD: I never claimed that we had not that right, but we shall be freer to make such arrangements. I would refer the house to what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said yesterday, as reported at page 1420 of Hansard, beginning with the last paragraph at the bottom of the left hand corner:

> The continuance of these purchases and expenditures, however, involves a continuance of the huge deficit of the sterling area in its balance of payments with Canada which must be financed (very largely at least, perhaps wholly) by Canada itself. We have realized for some time that the accumulation of sterling balances which, as I have explained, was the most important method of financing this deficit, was appropriate only as an interim or transitional form of financial assistance. It involved the growing up of what was nominally a demand liability by Britain to Canada, the future of which was bound to involve uncertainties, particularly as the amount grew far beyond anything which could be repaid by Britain in Canadian dollars except perhaps over a very long period of time. Moreover, the indefinite growth of this obligation, if permitted to continue for years, would have led to the existence after the war of what would be in effect a huge and unmanageable war debt owed by Britain to Canada.

I am sure that hon. members can recall the grave international problems and difficulties which arose in the nineteen-twenties and nineteen-thirties from the huge international war debts which had grown up during and immediately following the last great war. Here it is necessary to emphasize the distinction between a domestic debt and an international debt. Domestic debts involve payments between one person and another in the same country and give rise to no problems of currency and exchange. International debts, on the other hand, can be settled only by the transfer of goods and services from the debtor country to the creditor country. Such transfers can be made, only if and to the extent that the creditor country is prepared to accept goods and services from the debtor country for not only principal repayments but also annual interest charges. In other words, the creditor country must be prepared to see an increase in its imports or a decrease in its exports, or both. Experience has shown that countries will accept these payments in the form of imports only to a limited extent on balance, if at all. To do so, of course, exposes their producers to more intense competition from abroad and the excess of imports serves as a deflationary influence which appears to be unwelcome in normal peace times. On the other hand, the inability of debtor nations to make payment when the creditor nation will not readily accept imported goods and services in payment, is bound to lead to international misunderstandings and frictions. Consequently, there is a practical limit to the amount of international debt which can be satisfactorily carried and repaid, particularly when such debt arises from the economically wasteful processes of war. The experiences of the last twenty-five years are too well known for me to labour this point at greater length.

It is to avoid this situation that the lease-give proposals have been made to Britain and have been accepted. What are the implications of these proposals? They imply that we shall have balanced our indebtedness; that each country will owe to the other as much as the other owes; that there will be no accumulated debt in sterling or accumulated credit in sterling to our account in London so as to compel us, to obligate us to accept in payment goods which might come into conflict and competition with similar goods manufactured in our country. My hon. friend saw that point yesterday and clearly elaborated on it, and in this regard we are agreed. That was why I concluded my argument on the occasion I spoke in Quebec by saying that we should have to avoid purchasing, or that we should no longer have to import, from Britain, things that our own workmen can produce. I meant that instead of making a loan to Britain of so many million dollars in sterling for certain goods, munitions of war, supplies, foodstuffs and so on, instead of asking them to make a deposit of sterling to our credit in London to that extent, we would be better off if we made a free gift of these goods, not being obligated after the war, during the period of post-war construction, to accept goods in payment—and this for the reasons mentioned by those who have already spoken.

The leader of the opposition at page 1427 of Hansard, expressed his misapprehension of what might happen if we had to take merchandise in payment of indebtedness to us which had accumulated on the part of Britain. He said:

> The effect of the two operations is not greatly dissimilar for the time being at least. In neither case are we sending actual money.

That is perfectly true, as we are trying to get the Canadian people to understand. We are not sending one billion dollars in dollars to Britain when we make this gift. The money remains in Canada and we are sending goods, munitions, supplies, foodstuffs and so on. The leader of the opposition continues:

> It is retained in Canada and gives employment to Canadians. But, as the minister has pointed out, the real difference will be apparent in the post-war period when the problem of final settlement of all war debts will arise.

And later on:

> Of course I agree that it depends on what kind of goods they are. We must visualize the acceptance of some goods—I am willing to go with the minister that far.

I agree with that; but what I said at Quebec was that after this war we must try to avoid, as far as possible, accepting from other countries goods that can be manufactured in this country, in order that we may give employment to our returned soldiers and our workmen who are now employed in war industries.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My hon. friend's leader called that economic nationalism during the 1935 election campaign.

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes. That was a long time ago; since then many things have changed, as many more things will change. Many philosophies and policies will change when the time comes to settle for what is going on in the present conflict.

I have no apology to make and no excuse to offer for what I said. I had before me, as all hon. members had and as the people of this county, had, the Atlantic charter which was signed by Right Hon. Winston Churchill and President Franklin Roosevelt on August 14, 1941. The fourth paragraph of that charter reads:

They will endeavour, with due respect for their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment by all states, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity.

I might also support my statement by the text of the lend-lease pact, signed on February 23, 1942, and also to support the conclusions I drew in the closing portion of my remarks at Quebec city. First let me read part of the first paragraph of the preamble of the lease-lend pact:

Whereas the governments of the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland declare that they are engaged in a cooperative undertaking, together with every other nation or people of like mind, to the end of laying the bases of a just and enduring world peace securing order under law to themselves and all nations . . .

Then I go on to article VII:

In the final determination of the benefits to be provided to the United States of America by the government of the United Kingdom in return for aid furnished under the act of Congress of March 11, 1941, the terms and conditions thereof shall be such as not to burden commerce between the two countries, but to promote advantageous economic relations between them and the betterment of world-wide economic relations. To that end they shall include provision for agreed action by the United States of America and the United Kingdom, open to participation by all other countries of like mind, directed to the expansion, by appropriate international and domestic measures, of production, employment and the exchange and consumption of goods, which are the material foundations of the liberty and welfare of all peoples; to the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce, and to the reduction of tariffs and other barriers; and, in general, to the attainment of the economic objectives set forth in the joint declaration made on August 12, 1941, by the president of the United States of America and the prime minister of the United Kingdom.

I submit, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that I was amply justified in making the statement I did make on the occasion in question; and I think the leader of the opposition was not at all justified in trying to have me "sacked" from the government for making it. Knowing the hon. gentleman as I do, I anticipate that it was not the security of Britain with which he was concerned yesterday so much as the electors down in New Brunswick.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Both.

Mr. MICHAUD: I think more particularly the electors in New Brunswick. But if it was his intention to impugn or cast any reflection upon my loyalty or patriotism, I must say that I have no lesson to learn from him in loyalty, and I will take none. I think that should suffice for the time being. I have always made it my purpose, more particularly during this war, to serve as best I could; and my loyalty is just as real, just as complete and at times just as heart-burning as his. It may not always be as pharisaical as his; nevertheless it is as real and sincere.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If the minister would permit a question, he was reported in the same press dispatch to have said that the Prime Minister was endeavouring to find a happy medium whereby we could prosecute the war at the present time. How about that?

Mr. MICHAUD: I never made any such statement.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It was so reported in the press at the time.

Mr. MICHAUD: Then if it was so reported, that portion of the report was not accurate. The other was.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wonder if it is in order to call me a pharisee. I am not particular myself, but in order to keep the record straight—especially with reference to the agitation of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston)—I must rise now to a point of order and privilege and ask that this remark be stricken from the record. I am not a pharisee.

Mr. SPEAKER: I entirely agree, and I think the remark should be withdrawn.

Mr. MICHAUD: I withdraw the word, and substitute "ostentatious" or "vociferous," whichever word is acceptable to the hon. gentleman.

Now, by way of conclusion, I wish to repeat what I have said privately and publicly, outside this house, that this proposal of a gift of a billion dollars' worth of munitions, war supplies and foodstuffs to Britain is simply a contribution by Canada to the general war effort, which we should be proud to make and proud to be able to make under the present circumstances. Not only will it react to the benefit of our senior partner, Great Britain; it will react to the benefit of Canada herself; and we should have no apology to make and no excuse to offer for this so-called gift. The proposition should be accepted unanimously by all concerned, on all sides of the house, representing all shades of opinion.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to see introduced the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) respecting the gift to Great Britain. That is one of the most creditable acts, as far as the government is concerned, since the war started. During the last few years before the war when we relied on status and all that, hardly a single member in the front government benches appeared to believe in the British empire.

The resolution refers to the war, and certainly the war overshadows every other subject. Nothing else matters to-day, notwithstanding the fact that we have many domestic problems which have had consideration for almost forty days since the beginning of this session. But those domestic matters amount to nothing; if the war is not won, life will not be worth living in this country.

The resolution is divided into four paragraphs. In my opinion primary matters should come first, and for the remainder of the session we should have a war session. That is what has happened in England. Anyone who will read the English daily Hansard will find that from the first to the last of their sessions the discussions have related entirely to war matters. While in England they have many gigantic domestic problems, problems connected with rehabilitation and matters of that kind, the government over there realizes that those matters must wait until after the war.

Notwithstanding what has been said this afternoon by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud), on trade and commerce and markets, Canadians know the truth, and they know in their very bones that everything we have in this country in the way of defence, freedom, civilization and liberty we owe to the mother country and to no other agency. We threw away our defences and our friends, with the result that when war broke out we were back to where we were in 1812, in a condition of complete dependence on the mother country for all the protection, security and freedom we enjoy to-day. The hour has now come when the people of Canada and other parts of the empire must decide one great question. They must decide whether Canada will resume its place as one of the senior partners in the empire, and as a senior dominion supporting the mother country in its fight for freedom and salvation of religion and of the world, or whether we shall be content to be blotted out for all time, and content to permit our empire and all it has stood for through the ages to fall, as have other empires in the past. We read about what happened in the days of Greece and Rome, and we must ask ourselves whether we are content to wither away. Heaven forfend that this empire should ever pass away like that, because it is before the world to-day as one of the main, last bulwarks of Christianity, freedom and liberty.

I say this because we must remember that parliamentary institutions were firmly established, for all time after the first meeting of the Reformation parliament. Then two little islands at the edge of Europe leaped up and became a great nation, a pioneer in freedom and civilization and liberty, the world over, with the right to worship God as one pleased. The great growth which has taken place from those days of Elizabeth; the inventions of medicine and science; the development of art and the glory of Elizabethan literature—the growth of all these things was phenomenal. The English bible was translated into many languages the world over. Great Britain became the pioneer, the protector of the weak, as she spread the principle of freedom throughout the world. The new world in America owes her a debt of gratitude they can never repay before God. Since this war began, she stands clearly as the trustee for a better world.
