And so on. I read this to show my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, that the broad ideas which he finds in the Government of to-day were probably brought in by himself when he joined that Government, and are due to his long previous connection with the old Conservative party.

I heard my hon. friend say something which really surprised me, and, I am sure, everybody else who heard him. He purely and simply accused the hon. leader of the Opposition of being the cause of all that turmoil in the American Senate to-day. He said that the speech of the leader of the Opposition—of course, he was careful not to quote any of them—had been used in the Senate by one of the senators who supported that famous Bill. Well, I have had the honour of sitting with the hon. leader of the Opposition in Parliament for many years, and I do not know of any man who has been more abused, but this is the first time I have ever heard him accused of speaking against the interest of Canada. He has often been accused of the reverse; he has frequently been charged with standing up so much for Canada against the United States that he aroused the ire of the Americans. This accusation of my hon. friend falls very flat indeed. The present leader of the Opposition has been too long in public life for any one to believe that anything he ever said, in any circumstance, was not always in the best interests of his country.

My hon. friend spoke of the Treaty of Washington, but passed over that subject very rapidly. Of course, he had the excuse of not being a lawyer, but simply a man possessed of a great deal of common sense, and he limited himself to declaring that the Treaty of Washington granted free navigation, and that free navigation means, without doubt, the right of transshipment. Will the hon. gentleman say whether the Americans believe also that it involves transshipment. Let me remind him that, not only do we require transshipment, but we require also the right to land and warehouse our goods. If the hon. gentleman will read the "Globe" of to-day, he will find that the men who went from Vancouver to Fort Wrangel for Mackenzie & Mann, had a most terrible trip, although they sailed in an ocean vessel; and, when he speaks of small vessels of 300 or 400 tons in which men are going to sail from Vancouver to Wrangel, I hope that he will take the precaution of insuring their lives before they start. The hon. gentleman will find that it is absolutely necessary to use ocean vessels on that part of the coast. Take a vessel with a tonnage of 6,000 tons, which is about as small a tonnage as any of them will be, when you come to tranship from such a vessel into other vessels of 200 or 300 tons, you will find that more than the right of transshipment is required. You will find that we shall require the right of warehousing. But will the hon. gentleman have that right? How does he know the Americans will grant it? He says he stands on the faith of treaties. Treaties, Mr. Speaker, have been broken before now, and very often. We have had experience already with the United States, and our experience has been that, so long as it serves the interest of Americans, they will stand by a treaty, but when it does not, they will take every possible means to avoid it. England has a treaty to-day with the United States. In considering our position, we have to take everything into account, and I ask the hon. gentleman, if the Americans refuse to grant us what we are entitled to by treaty, what he is going to do? Will he apply to the mother country? The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) exclaimed, the other day, with a great deal of thunder, that the Government policy was: No surrender.

If you cannot get the Americans to stand by that treaty, what will you do? Apply to the mother country—you cannot do otherwise. Do you believe that, at this moment, England will go into war with the United States for a few acres of land, as they would call it, in the northern part of America? No, Sir. Treaties are written, but they can be broken, as other things can. Let me remind the Prime Minister that the constitution of this country is a written constitution, but it can be broken. I hope you will not prevent me, Mr. Speaker, reading one section; I read it to prove my point.

Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the union, or is thereafter established by the legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor in Council—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BERGERON. Some people laugh now, but they will not laugh when they get before their electors—

—from any act or decision of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

At this very moment, while the Prime Minister is enjoying his position and the Minister of Public Works also enjoys his, there is an aggrieved minority in this country. Suppose that the Bill passed by the United States Senate should be adopted by Congress and signed by President McKinley, where will you be? For these reasons, it was eminently proper that the hon. leader of the Opposition and gentlemen on this side should earnestly—not for party purposes, but in the interest of the country—ask the Government to drop the scheme before the House and bring down a measure which, if it is in the interest of the country, this side will heartily support. Before leaving this subject, I may say that one of the things about the speech of the hon. Minister of Public Works that first struck me was the surprise he manifested that we should ask the Government to abandon this scheme. He wound up by a very strong declaration that this measure would carry. The hon. gentleman has read the contract, in fact, I think I recognize his hand in the drafting of it. Clause 25 says: "this contract shall be subject to the approval of Parliament." What is the meaning of that? Does the hon. Minister of Public Works think that every member of this House came for the purpose simply of hearing the speech of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair)—who did not seem to understand the subject very well—and the speech of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), and say "amen" to them. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) himself was a fighter in Opposition; he did not come here simply to endorse everything that the Government might bring down. It was puerile on his part to be surprised that we should want the Government to abandon this scheme. Now, why do we want the Government to abandon this scheme? I speak simply as an elector of this country.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. The Prime Minister says "hear, hear." I think that is the way we should all speak here, because we represent the people who are outside. Suppose one of the electors of the county were here and this scheme were submitted to him. Looking at the map he would see that the distance from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake, between which points this road is to be built, is not very great. He would naturally ask: What length of time will this save a man who is on his way to the gold fields from Halifax or Montreal, and he would be told that it would save five hours. He would read the contract and would find that you are giving everything to Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie. You give them 3,750,000 acres of land. You are giving them really more than that; the contract provides that you are to give them 25,000 acres per mile, and Mr. Jennings, one of the Government engineers, says that there will be 165 miles of railway, so that this land grant would amount to about 4,125,000 acres of mineral land of the Yukon. When it was known that there was gold in the north-west the Government very properly issued rules and regulations. I do not intend to discuss them, for I am not sufficiently posted on mining laws and the ways of miners. Taking them as they are, they are very severe. The miner will get a claim of 250 feet of land, or about one and one-fifth acres. He will pay $10 for a certificate; he will pay $15 annually to be allowed to work the claim. He has to select his claim within ten days after location. He has to work his claim, and if he does not work it for a period of seventy-two hours, he loses his claim and all the money he has paid. Then he must pay a royalty of 10 per cent on all the gold he gets. That explains why we have heard hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, men who know about these matters, stating that it costs a dollar to take a dollar's worth of gold out of the earth. Now, the elector whom I supposed to be here would see that it is proposed to give Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann over four millions of acres of mineral lands to be held in fee simple, in return for the building of 150 miles of railway.

They have not got to pay $10 or $15, and you are only charging them 1 per cent royalty when you are charging the poor man 10 per cent. You are giving them all that land, and you give them three years in which to choose half of it, and three years more in which to choose the other half—six years in which to go through what we expect will prove to be the best mining district in the world. Now if there is any clash between the agents of Mann & Mackenzie and some of the bona fide settlers on that land, who will be the loser? The poor man. Mann & Mackenzie, by their contract, can never lose. Do you suppose, Sir, that the people of this country would be willing to sanction such a bargain as that? Why, let any member of this House go out amongst his constituents and he will come back loaded with opinions gathered right and left, that this is the most nefarious scheme that was ever brought before Parliament. There is no doubt that the discovery of this gold district is the greatest opportunity that was ever afforded to Canadians, but I am afraid we are going to lose the opportunity. Since this discussion commenced we have learned from the newspapers that our own Yukon district is at present merely an outlet for California and the other Pacific states, and that three-fourths of its wealth will go to those states. At present there are three Americans on the way to the Klondike to one Canadian, and they know their business better than our own people do, because they have been accustomed to it. In fact, we may say that the rich mines of the Klondike are to-day in the hands of the Americans, and as good as lost to Canada. But I may be asked, Why do you object to the construction of a railway? Sir, I do not object to the construction of this railway, but I object to the way in which this contract is awarded, I object to a grant of such immense value as we are giving to these contractors, I object to the monopoly which we are putting into their hands to the detriment of the poor miners of this country. What does history teach us in regard to mining in California? In the Fifties there was a mining tax in California of $3 per month, and some times $5 per month, imposed upon every foreigner who mined in the gold districts of California. The Americans can not pay that tax, there was that advantage given in favour of the Americans against any foreigner who chose to go there to mine for gold. Why should not the Government of this country in like manner impose a tax upon foreigners? Let me mention, also, in connection with the California mining history, that when the Panama Railway was built in the fifties, it was constructed for a purpose similar to that for which we are constructing our road. It was constructed in a rush, and it was much harder to build that railway than it is to build the railway which we are now discussing; and it was built by a private company without a dollar of assistance from any Federal or State Government. After it had been in operation for six years, the stock of that company was from 600 to 800 above par. All this enormous profit had been paid by the people who had travelled over that railway to reach the California gold mines. Now, Sir, I have risen on this occasion solely for the purpose of entering my protest against this project. I think that a scheme like the present one was never before put before the people of this country, and I urge once more upon the Government to refrain from pushing it forward. It is their own business I know, but it is my duty to oppose it, and to urge upon the Government to abandon it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, in his speech the other day, which I listened to with great pleasure, because he always says something which I consider interesting, declared that the construction of this railway was absolutely necessary. Well, I would put that declaration alongside what fell from the lips of the right hon. Premier yesterday, in regard to the difficulties that might arise in consequence of action by the United States Government. The Premier said yesterday, that we could always rely upon another road from Telegraph Creek down to Port Simpson, and he said it was the intention of the Government to come before Parliament and ask for an appropriation for that purpose. Now, Sir, I ask whether it would not be better for the Government to break this bargain with Mann & Mackenzie at once, before going any further, to withdraw from this contract made before the opening of Parliament, a contract made against all the professions of the Liberal party when they were in Opposition, made without tenders, made without giving anybody a chance to build a road cheaper than Mann & Mackenzie are doing. I ask the Government, Would it not be better to tear that contract to pieces and ask for tenders to build a railway at once from Teslin Lake down to Fort Simpson? I am sure that if the Government would call for tenders for that purpose, and if there is the amount of gold in that country that we are told there is, there will be not less than one hundred contractors glad to come forward with offers to build that railway. If the Government choose to do that, I can say with my hon. chief the leader of the Opposition, that I would be ready to assist them in making a grant of land or of money for the construction of such railway. Then, Sir, we will have an all-Canadian route, we will be on Canadian territory, we will not be obliged to negotiate with our neighbours for the right to navigate the Stikine, nor be dependent upon their will and consent to reach our own territory. I think I have answered all the points that were made by the Minister of Public Works. We have heard all the legal points discussed thoroughly, and it is not necessary to go over them again. I thought it well to answer the hon. Minister of Public Works on account of the position he holds, although I am bound to say that he has not brought forward any new arguments in favour of this contract. It is my intention to support the amendment of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden).

Mr. MORRISON. I do not rise for the purpose of replying to the last speaker, for the simple reason that there is nothing to which to reply; nor shall I attempt to reply to any extent to any of the hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken. My hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), spoke at great length, and I think the most effective part of his speech related to the legal aspect of this question. For my part

I am perfectly willing to place against his arguments the opinions and the arguments which we have heard from hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, notably from the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). Now, I think I am correct in saying that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), and the hon. member for Halifax, both eminent legal gentlemen, agree in the main on the question, and no successful attempt has been made by any hon. gentleman to controvert their contention. So that as regards these salient points there is no issue as between the Opposition and the Government, and I think any hon. member on the other side who shall attempt to deal with that question will not succeed in displacing these contentions, which have been advanced and supported by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I consider, therefore, it would be presumption on my part to take up the time of the House in talking upon the treaty rights of Canada and Great Britain as against the contention of the United States, and I will not detain the House by dwelling on that point. I am quite satisfied with the conclusion at which I have arrived, after reading all that is available here on the question and after having heard what has been stated, namely, that the free navigation of the Stikine is open to the subjects of Great Britain, and we all know what the free navigation of a river or water means. I contend that any further time taken up in discussing this point would be wasted so far as this House is concerned.

I am very sorry that hon. gentlemen opposite have studiously avoided the main points of this controversy. I regret exceedingly that on such a broad national question as this, hon. gentlemen opposite have not been more charitable, and instead of forgetting the fact that they are not here for the purpose of defeating measures but for the purpose of assisting the Government in carrying on the affairs of the country, they have seen fit to occupy much time and thrown many obstacles in the way of the Government, who, I am confident, are actuated by the best of motives and by a desire to advance the best interests of the country. It would be very much more to the purpose and much more likely to meet with public approval if hon. gentlemen opposite advanced some weighty reasons why this agreement should not be approved and this Bill passed; but if they are not satisfied with the line of action taken by the Government, why do they not submit some alternative scheme whereby the Government could conserve the interests of the people, which they allege, and wrongly of course, are being neglected by the present Administration. I am very sorry hon. gentlemen opposite are so uncharitable as not to offer some advice, to suggest some method by which the difficulties can be overcome. They forget the position in which the Government found itself at the inception of this undertaking. I regret that they forget that the Government was confronted by an entirely new condition. The condition which met the Government was, I repeat, an entirely new one, and being so it is not, I think, a matter for criticism on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite that the Government should have adopted, to say the least, a unique line of action to meet that new condition. Hon. gentlemen opposite contend that this was a novel and entirely unusual treatment. The fact that the condition was new would justify new treatment. At the outset of the debate one of the main grounds taken against the Government was that they had been a little lax in grasping the situation. We were told that the state of affairs existing in the Yukon had been known to the Government for some weeks or some months; and the Opposition tried to make a point out of that fact and contended that the Government did not display sufficient activity. They must have forgotten that the Government knew, as hon. gentlemen opposite themselves knew, that for many years gold had been discovered in the Yukon. The Government knew it from various reports made to the Department of the Interior, which department had been under the control of hon. gentlemen opposite for eighteen years, and gold to a more or less extent had been discovered in the Yukon as far back as 1825. The Government knew, and hon. gentlemen opposite knew as well, that fact from the very full reports, no doubt authentic reports, in the public archives. These reports were at the disposal of hon. gentlemen opposite during all those years, and they have been at the disposal of the present Government for a few months. From those reports the Government knew that the Yukon district was the same as that portion of British Columbia lying south of the 60th parallel, geologically speaking; and they knew in addition, that not being different geologically from the southern portion of British Columbia, the Yukon had disadvantages, arising from having an arctic climate and being icebound, and having all the elements of inaccessibility and remoteness that always militate against the development and government of any section. They knew, and hon. gentlemen opposite knew, those facts for many years. They knew further that that portion of Canada had been traversed by trappers and adventurers for many years, but only the very hardiest and venturesome people could travel or subsist there. They knew the history of placer mining in Canada, Australia, South Africa, South America and other parts of the civilized world. They knew from the experience of British Columbia and from the experience of Cariboo, in which district something like $50,000,000 had been taken out, William's Creek alone furnishing about $20,000,000, that these placer finds began abruptly and ended equally abrupt. They knew that since that time prospectors have been travelling over the country signing option after option and throwing them up because they found that the history of William Creek and Lightning Creek would probably not be repeated. The Government had those facts and those reports before them. They had the report of Mr. McConnell, an accredited officer of the Government, and I refer hon. gentlemen to that document, for they do not appear to have consulted the material lying at their hands, furnished by the Government at very great expense.

If hon. gentlemen consulted that pamphlet of Dr. Dawson, dated 1887, and revised in 1898, they would find passages in it describing the sensitiveness of miners to placer excitements. At page 232, there is a statement from Mr. McConnell as to how little it takes to cause a stampede into a country where there is supposed to be placer mining, and what we are having in the Yukon country to-day is nothing more nor less than a stampede. Mr. McConnell, in referring to Forty-Mile Creek, one of the very places about which the excitement now exists, relates the following incident, which occurred in the year 1887 :—

A few days before my arrival a stampede had been made for Beaver River, a northern tributary of the Yukon, which is stated to enter the latter about 120 miles below the mouth of the Porcupine, but with somewhat disastrous results. The amount of information required to stampede a mining camp is very small, and in the present case was almost ridiculous. A report was brought up by the men on the steamer that a man had boarded the boat at the mouth of Beaver River, and after talking in a hurried manner to the captain, had suddenly departed, and in his haste had left his purse behind him. The miners reasoned that nothing but a rich find would cause such an excitement, and 150 men immediately loaded their boats and started on a wild goose chase down the river, only to meet with disappointment at the end of their journey. A few received a passage up again on the steamer, but the greater number drifted on towards St. Michael's and left the mining country altogether.

There is a sample of what little will cause a mining stampede. The Government had no reason to believe but that in the beginning this stampede towards the Yukon was caused by equally trifling circumstances, and let me ask, would any sane man blame the Government for taking precautions against swallowing wholesale excitable despatches coming through the medium of the American Press Association. Mr. McConnell, in his report, also shows how speedily these placer claims are worked out, and that opinion of his is supported by the experience under similar circumstances all over the known world. At page 233 of this report, Mr. McConnell enumerates some of the difficulties of prospecting in the Yukon region, and he says :

Mr. MORRISON.

Added to this is the shortness of the period available for work, which under the most favourable circumstances never exceeds three months, and in seasons of exceptional high water, such as the present, is very much less. In view of these drawbacks, prospecting must proceed slowly, and up to the present has been confined almost entirely to the larger and more accessible streams.

The present season has proved much less remunerative, partly owing to the unfavourable state of the water and partly to the fact that the rich claims first discovered have been worked out, the auriferous gravels being of little depth and easily exhausted.

That was true in the year 1887 of Forty-Mile Creek and the vicinity of the Klondike, and there is no reason for us to assume that it is not true to-day. The Government knew that, and, as sensible men, they were justified in discounting these very coloured reports which reached them from doubtful sources. This, in my opinion, is sufficient grounds for the precautionary steps taken by the Government before rushing headlong into an expensive railway enterprise. During those few months they had no accredited reports from their agents, but the excitement was all the time accumulating. For a number of years the northern Pacific Coast has been quite a resort for tourists. Hundreds of people from the United States and further afield have gone there during the hot summer months, and the glaciers near Dyea and Skagway had become the objective attraction of these tourists. When these people returned, they made that Yukon district a theme for magazine articles, newspaper writings, and even poems. There had been quite a number of miners in there, and wishing to dispose of their claims, they came to San Francisco and Seattle, telling extraordinary stories of the amount of gold to be found, and for the obvious reason of booming their own enterprises. In the spring of 1896, when this part of Canada had been made so well known to the outer world, the conditions were such that, owing to the disturbances in South Africa, the attention of miners was diverted from that part of the world. Australia, as a gold field, had apparently been set aside, and we heard nothing of the mining excitement in the United States, or in South America, or in Mexico. The Jubilee celebration came along, and Canada, as never before, became prominent before the people of the old country. Just at that time the newspapers commenced to publish despatches, almost incredible, as to the inconceivable wealth of the Yukon. Money was going a-begging in London, and was it any wonder that the attention of the English-speaking people was directed to the Yukon as a field for investment? Then the prospectors came out from the Yukon, alleging they had made their pile, and you could not go along the streets of the Pacific Coast cities without seeing a heap of what was said to be gold taken from such and such a creek. The people became intoxicated, as it were, but should the Government, as a sober and sensible aggregation of men, swallow all the stories that were told, and propose to spend millions of dollars to construct a railway on the basis of such rumours? Later in the year came Mr. Ogilvie's report. A great deal has been said of this report, and I do not propose to minimize its importance, but, on my own responsibility, I do say, that it was a great misfortune that Mr. Ogilvie's report was written as it has been, because I maintain confidently that any report based very largely on hearsay evidence is dangerous and apt to be misleading. The great bulk of the information therein contained, as well as in Dr. Dawson's report of 1887, as to gold production, is hearsay. Those of the legal profession will understand the value of hearsay evidence and the weight attached to such evidence in a court of law, is certainly a good criterion for us to follow. I venture to say, that up to the present time the chief evidence before us as to the gold in the Klondike is largely hearsay. Take Mr. Ogilvie's estimate of the richest claims, and you will find him guarding himself by saying: If reports can be believed, such a river is worth a million dollars, or, if what Tom Jones told John Smith about Fakir Creek is true, the finds there are of marvellous value.

So far as his reference to the gold fields in the Yukon country is concerned, with all due deference to Mr. Ogilvie—and I do not want to be understood as criticising him adversely—that is all that it amounts to. Now, do the Opposition want the country to believe that this Government, or any Government, would for a moment expend and dissipate the money of the people of this country upon the strength of such reports as that in regard to the mineral value of the country? Mr. Ogilvie is a first-class surveyor; but I venture to say that there is not a capitalist in this country who would wish to invest $100,000 upon the strength of Mr. Ogilvie's or Dr. Dawson's report on a gold mine. We know that in the Kootenay district there have been dozens of claims reported upon by expert mining engineers as worthy of being invested in; and capitalists invested their money in them only to find, on attempting to develop them, that they were valueless, and they had to be abandoned. How many abandoned mines are there to-day in the Kootenay district, admittedly the richest gold-bearing country in the world, which had been taken up on the reports of expert mining engineers? If the reports of expert mining engineers are so unreliable, what reliance can be placed upon the report, not of a geologist or a mining expert, but of a Dominion land surveyor. Mr. Ogilvie does not hold himself out as a mining engineer or a geologist; and no one can say that his opinion is that of an expert mining engineer. Nor can it be said that Mr.

Ogilvie represents the claims to be as rich as hon. gentlemen opposite say they are. I am trying to make the point that these hon. gentlemen are greatly exaggerating the known value of these lands, which are agreed to be given to Mackenzie & Mann in this contract. I say that there is no evidence that the lands in the Yukon district are as rich as hon. gentlemen opposite try to make them out; and until there is some tangible evidence before the Government in regard to their value, the Government are perfectly justified in taking the course they are taking, and in not expending money at the present time. Knowing that there was a tremendous influx of people into a region without any adequate means of communication, the Government were perfectly justified in giving some inducement to reliable contractors, and in giving that inducement in the shape of this land acreage; and I venture to say that two years hence, if we are living then, hon. gentlemen opposite will admit that the position which the Government have taken, and which I am now supporting, is correct. The Government, I say, had no more information before them than those reports, and the experience of British Columbia and other placer mining countries. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), as we all know, went up there. It is needless for me to recite what he accomplished or tried to accomplish. He went as far as he could go to the locus in quo; and although he saw, and had from officers and men there substantially what he had read in the reports published, there was nothing that he saw or heard that would justify him in concluding the mineral wealth of that country was of any permanence. But he had ample and conclusive evidence that a tremendous and unprecedented influx of people was imminent, and he would have been recreant to his duty as a Minister of the Crown, and the Government would have been recreant to their duty as sworn trustees of the people, anticipating, as they must have done, that the crime of the century would have been perpetrated, had they not taken steps to provide facilities for the transportation of people and goods into that country. I say they would have been recreant to their duty if they had not been willing to take very extraordinary steps to prevent suffering among those people, and to take those steps promptly. The steps they have taken are not, however, extraordinary. They have simply taken the steps that would have been taken by any level-headed body of men who had a proper conception of their duty in the circumstances. The Minister of the Interior no doubt also saw, what people here knew from the reports that were current, that the people on the Pacific Coast of the United States were moving heaven and earth in their efforts to corral the trade of the tremendous number of people who were going into the Yukon country. Those people from Seattle down to San Francisco, spent hundreds of thousands of dollars, sat up nights, lied, and resorted to every artifice to secure that trade for themselves. They misrepresented in print and on the platform. They even misrepresented the printed customs regulations of this country, and adopted every ingenious means known to Americans to circulate those misrepresentations. They even hired column after column of such well-known papers as the "New York Journal" for the purpose of falsifying such well-known matters as the customs regulations, the coasting laws and the mining regulations applied to that part of Canada. The trades people on the Pacific Coast of the United States have a population of some 50,000,000 or 60,000,000 people to draw upon, and the surplus population of that great nation would be likely to resort to the Pacific Coast. They tried in every possible way to get these people to go by Seattle. They were not satisfied to confine their efforts to the United States, but they came across to Canada, and unfortunately succeeded in inveigling a great many people to the United States to purchase their supplies and equipment, who ought to have gone to Canadian ports. In these ways they diverted a great deal of trade, and it is needless for me to say that when a trade is diverted, it is very difficult to get a restitution of that trade. It no doubt impressed itself on the Minister of the Interior, as it did on the minds of the Government, that the tremendous efforts made by the people of the United States Pacific Coast to capture that trade would have to be met, and the only way in which they could be met was by the Government taking prompt and active steps to get an all-Canadian route which would secure, if not the whole of that trade, at any rate, a large measure of it, for Canada. I contend that the Government have succeeded in doing that, and what they have done will result in drawing to this country three-fourths, if not the whole of that trade. The most relentless and ungenerous opponents of this road, are the people of Seattle and of other United States cities on the Pacific Coast.

They are hardly second to hon. gentlemen opposite in their attacks upon this route. Why do the people of Seattle attack the Stikine and Teslin Lake route? I would be very sorry indeed to find myself in the same boat on a question of this kind with the people of Seattle and the United States. If hon. gentlemen opposite would only reflect a moment and realize that they are in the same boat with those on the Pacific Coast of the United States and other parts of the American Union in this matter, they would be reluctant indeed to follow out the course they are pursuing so thoughtlessly and for party purposes. The Government, having all those circumstances before them, set about considering what they had better do, and of course their first consideration was to decide what route should be selected in order that we might capture the trade then just beginning. Glancing along the coast, it was evident that the first means of ingress was by the Yukon River, but of course that was entirely out of the question. In the few remarks I made on the first reading of the Bill I attempted to show—and my argument has not been controverted—that 10,000 people were within the passes of the Yukon, and that estimating twenty-five steamers as the largest number which could navigate that river during the short season when it is navigable, all that these boats could carry would be about 2,650 tons of provisions, which would be quite insufficient to feed 10,000 people, let alone 50,000, which is a very low estimate of the number which will be there ere long. To keep 50,000 people, you will require 25,000 tons of provision. This shows the total inadequacy of the Yukon as a means of furnishing supplies.

That road, therefore, had to be abandoned, and the only feasible route was the Stikine. It was not a new route to the Government and it could not have been a new route to the Opposition, because we all know that in 1799 it was well known to the Russians, and afterwards to the Hudson Bay people and North Pacific traders. Wrangel was a trading post a hundred years ago, but known by a different name. Fifty years ago it was quite a trading post, and up to the Stikine River and along that telegraph trail was a well beaten path. The route was not a novel one to the Government or the Opposition. The Government passed by the Taku route and the Lynn Canal route for the very good reason that by those routes we would have to go over American territory; and there is not a gentleman here disinterested who will say for a moment that the Government would have been justified in building a railway, one of the termini of which would be in the United States. The Teslin-Stikine route, therefore, was the only apparently available.

The debate, since the second reading, has been almost entirely confined to an attack on the Stikine route as not being an all-Canadian route, and from that aspect of the case arose these discussions on the treaty rights of Great Britain and the United States. I shall not dwell on that question. I am satisfied with the statement given on this side that we are entitled to the free navigation of the Stikine River with all that such a right implies; and I do not know that the country desires anything more.

The right of free navigation being settled, the next position to consider is whether the river is navigable. We have been told by the other side that it is not. Well, these hon. gentlemen had information at their hands, if they chose to avail themselves of it. We find in the report of Dr. Dawson—and there is not a gentleman on the other side who will attempt to controvert what he says, the following on page 6:—

In addition to this we now have instrumental surveys of the Stikine from its mouth up to the head of navigation (Telegraph Creek).

What does navigation mean? The Government were quite satisfied to assume that the Stikine was navigable to Telegraph Creek, the head of navigation, in the same way that they are satisfied that the Fraser River is navigable to Yale, the head of navigation. Further on, at page 15, Dr. Dawson says:

The Stikine is navigable by stern-wheel steamers for a distance of 138 miles, as more fully stated in a subsequent part of this report, where also details respecting the connecting trail to Dease Lake are given. This constitutes the travelled route to the Cassiar mining district.

The Government took the ground, and they were perfectly right in doing so, that it would be a work of supererogation on their part, having an official report in their hands certifying that that river is navigable, to go to the expense of sending out a man to test its navigability. Had they done so, they would have been attacked right and left by hon. gentlemen opposite for going to an unnecessary expenditure for the purpose of ascertaining information which we had before us. At page 44, we find something more about the Skagway and Stikine rivers. Hon. gentlemen opposite, and particularly the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart), attempted to minimize the importance of the navigability of the Stikine River. They tried to make out it was an unknown route, concerning the feasibility of which the Government should have satisfied themselves before coming to a decision. We find that Dr. Dawson, at page 44, said:

Like the Fraser, the Skeena, the Nass and several other smaller streams, it rises to the east of the broad belt of mountains which constitutes the Coast ranges, and cuts completely through this belt with a nearly uniform gradient. In size and general character the Stikine closely resembles the Skeena, which reaches the coast 200 miles further south.

And the Skeena River is one of the most important of the Dominion. Referring still to the Stikine:

It is navigable for stern-wheel steamers of light draught and good power to Glenora, 126 miles from Rothsay Point, at its mouth, and under favourable circumstances to Telegraph Creek, twelve miles farther.

Further on, Dr. Dawson says:

This route has long been known to the Indians, the Stikine having been to them from time immemorial an important avenue of trade, by which, as by the Skeena, the coast trade penetrated a considerable distance inland.

Again, on page 45, as to the depth of this river, Dr. Dawson says:

The current of the navigable portion of the Stikine is swift throughout, but there are no rapids properly so called, though the Little Cañon (53 miles above the great bend) forms a serious impediment to navigation when the river is at its highest stage, in June or July, in consequence of the great velocity of the current in this narrow and rocky though deep gorge.

Near the mouth of the river the current scarcely surpasses two miles an hour, but it increases as the river is ascended, till it attains a rate of six to seven miles in many places between the Great Bend and Telegraph Creek, the swifter water being chiefly met with above the Little Cañon. The average rate of flow of the navigable portion of the river must be about five miles an hour.

Gentlemen who are not familiar with river navigation may think that a current of five miles an hour is an impediment to navigation. But, on the Fraser River, opposite New Westminster, the water is quite navigable and is resorted to by shipping from the old country, Australia, Hong Kong and all over the world. And the current in May goes up to eight miles an hour, and, even then, it is not the slightest impediment to navigation, being navigated by crafts of all draughts. The width of the Stikine River opposite Telegraph Creek on May 29th was 489 feet, but it is reported as being deep—Dr. Dawson's Report. The current ran at 6.08 miles an hour as decided by several observations. The river rose later in the season, and the current was swifter. So we see that at the terminus of this road, Dr. Dawson in 1887 states that the water is deep, and in June and July it was rising rapidly owing to the melting of the snow on the mountains. The Government would not have been justified at all in assuming that there would not be enough water in the river or that it was other than navigable for crafts of light draught. Crafts that may sail from Victoria, Vancouver, New Westminster and other places to Port Simpson can go on up to Glenora. I see it stated in the Victoria "Colonist," which paper supports hon. gentlemen opposite—but which, by the way, is vigorously supporting the Government in this measure—that the Canadian Pacific Navigation Company, a local company and entirely distinct from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, is taking the boats "Yosemite" and "R. P. Rithet," which are trading now from Victoria and Vancouver and Westminster from that route and putting them on the route between Port Simpson and Glenora. They are boats that can cross the Gulf of Georgia, which has often been compared to the English Channel, and is a rough piece of water. They have been navigating up the Fraser River and to Vancouver. They are stern wheel boats. The fact that they are being taken off their present route and sent on the route from Port Simpson to Glenora, furnishes an answer to the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite that you cannot tranship or lighter at Port Simpson with safety and carry the goods up to Glenora.

So, even if hon. gentlemen opposite are right and the United States Senate could interfere with us at Wrangel, we are independent of that. But I do not admit for a moment that there is any difficulty in the transshipment question at Wrangel or at any other point on the Stikine. But, assuming that there is any difficulty, we can transship at Port Simpson to boats that will navigate the Dixon channel and run up to Glenora. The "Yosemite" has been in service for years. She is an old boat and was taken off the Sacramento River. If she can navigate the Gulf of Georgia, it is mere nonsense for gentlemen opposite to say that it is not safe for her to trade between Port Simpson and Glenora on the coast waters of British Columbia.

So much for the navigability of the route. On this ground, as we have seen, the Government had every reason for selecting this route by the Stikine River. They also had the report of Dr. Dawson that the Stikine River is open for a longer period during the year than is the River St. Lawrence. At page 58, he states the following concerning the time the river opened :

According to Mr. J. C. Callbreath, of Telegraph Creek—

—a gentleman well known in British Columbia, and a high authority on the Yukon,— —the Stikine generally opens for navigation between April 20 and May 1. Ice or "sludge" usually begins to run in the river about the first of November.

That is to say, the river is open from the middle of April to the end of November, a greater period than that during which the St. Lawrence is open. So hon. gentlemen can find little relief in saying that the Stikine, besides the international objections against it, has little water in it. And they are equally without support when they say that it is open for only a few months in the year. So, in the first place, we have our rights guaranteed by treaty. In the second place, we have a sufficient depth of water. And, in the third place, we have a river free from ice for a sufficient time during the year to justify the Government in adopting it as a means of reaching the Yukon country. On all these points, the Government's action is completely justified.

But, coming to the contract, were the Government justified in granting the concessions that they have granted to Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie? Were they justified in assuming that there was so much gold in that country as hon. gentlemen opposite would have us suppose there is? Were they justified in assuming that all these millions of acres of land were mineral land? They are often spoken of as such. I say that there is no sufficient evidence that even a large part, or even any considerable part of them is mineral land. I say that the Government are perfectly justified in assuming that these lands were not mineral lands to the extent that hon. gentlemen opposite tried to make out they were. Neither Mr. Ogilvie, nor Mr. McConnel, nor Dr. Dawson, nor any of the men who went up there and gave reports of that country stated that they discovered gold, or even that they knew of any great quantity. Trappers had gone over that territory, tourists and hunters, like Mr. Warburton Pyke and Lord Lonsdale, after big game, have traversed the country and found no gold. Mr. Ogilvie and Dr. Dawson walked over the Klondike in 1887 and found no gold, or, at least, did not report it. Who did find the gold? A few miners went in there and we have their report. Did hon. gentlemen opposite ever hear of such a thing as "salting" a mine? Take some of these prospectors who talk of immensely rich claims there, some of the people you meet about hotel corridors in this city or in Seattle or Vancouver, who say they have made tremendously rich strikes. Are hon. gentlemen opposite prepared to take every statement of these as to the tremendous riches of that country as exactly true?

I, for one, would be loath to take their statements, and in saying this, I do not wish to reflect upon some of those gentlemen who say they have made good discoveries. But as regards the great bulk of these people, I would not take their word in matters of less importance than mining, and I certainly would not take their unsupported statement as to the tremendous possibilities of the gold-bearing districts in that country. The Government, no doubt, in considering the reports of these miners, had in their minds Mark Twain's definition of a mine—a hole in the ground, the owner being a liar. I think it would be safe to take that definition as regards most of these people. Now, I have heard an argument used that these placer deposits are glacial deposits, that they are deposited there by glaciers from the north. If we ask, where did these glaciers come from, the obvious superficial answer would be, that they came from the Arctic Ocean. I would not be at all surprised to hear from hon. gentlemen opposite, in view of their extraordinary contentions on other points, get up and say that the glaciers naturally would come down from the Arctic regions. But anybody who has read anything of the theory of the glacial period knows that such is not the case. There are people who contend that the glaciers come from the equator. We know that at present they are found almost entirely in the temperate zone. During the glacial period the climate surrounding the poles was highly temperate. We have evidence of this in the fossil finds in the Tertiary beds at Greenland for instance, in the northern parts of British America and Russia, and the land surrounding the Arctic Ocean. These placer deposits are more apt to be found further south; and if there is such a thing as a mother lode, from which these placer deposits have come, that mother lode is more probably in Mexico or Honduras than in the Yukon. So that, even going on the theory that these placer finds are glacial deposits, I think the hon. gentlemen will find very little consolation in that contention. Now, no doubt the Government considered all the other possible routes into that territory, and I have no doubt there are hon. gentlemen on the other side who would get up and argue against every one of them far more cogently than they can argue against this route. But I think that every other possible route or mode of getting into that country is far more open to attack than the one that has been chosen. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to take up any other possible route into that country, and we can advance stronger objections against it than can be advanced against this route adopted by the Government. Now, I wish to make some reference to the speech made the other day by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). I was very sorry to hear that hon. gentleman adopt so narrow a course, to use a mild term, as he did on that occasion. He took an extremely narrow view of the whole question, and I was surprised to hear a gentleman of his ability and of his general information standing up here and making use of the arguments that he did against his own party on such a very important matter as this. He argued, not from the standpoint of a resident of the North-west Territories, as a whole, but from the standpoint of a resident of the immediate vicinity of Edmonton. He went on to say, that as the building of this road would not inure to the advantages of the town of Edmonton and that part of country immediately surrounding Edmonton, therefore he would not support it, and he solicited the aid of hon. gentlemen opposite in his opposition to this route. I must say, Sir, that I think the action of the hon. gentleman on that occasion was most discredit-able: it was discredit-able in this way, that he was driven into the necessity of taking an individual position, and in arguing against one section of our country in order to benefit his own particular locality. I wish to avoid that in any remarks that I may make. I do not wish to be understood as saying that the Edmonton route is not a good route, and that a line from Edmonton should not be built into the Yukon country. But I will repeat what has already been said, that there is nothing necessarily antagonistic between the Stikine route and the Edmonton route. The Edmonton route at the proper time is all right, but it is irrelevant in the consideration of the route that is now before the House. He went on to argue that, inasmuch as the country immediately surrounding Edmonton was the only base of production in that portion of the Dominion, therefore this road would be under the disadvantage of being far away from the base of production, and consequently the people east of Edmonton would derive no benefit from this Stikine route, that British Columbia would reap but a small benefit from it, while the bulk of the food would be furnished by the United States. He made that bald statement without any foundation. Now, I wish to take issue with the hon. gentleman on that point. He thus refers to the geographical position:

The nearest points of production of surplus food products in the Dominion to the Yukon is that part of the country in which I live—the country immediately surrounding Edmonton—and the next nearest point is the country immediately surrounding Regina and extending eastward to Winnipeg. If the food products, therefore, which are consumed in the Yukon cannot be drawn from those localities they cannot be drawn from any other part of Canada, but must be obtained from some other and foreign country.

Meaning, of course, from the United States. Now, I say, that the hon. member, in making that statement from his seat in the House, having the reputation which he enjoys for intelligence and the possession of information on general topics, took advantage of his position, either intentionally or otherwise, to mislead this House and the country into discrediting the action of the Government in building this urgency route from the Stikine River into Teslin Lake. Now, he does not give any reason in support of his statement that the vicinity of Edmonton is the nearest base of production. Let me tell the hon. gentleman, that the country immediately in the vicinity of Edmonton is not the nearest point of production to the Yukon. The province of British Columbia, in which this railway is being built, is the nearest point of production, if there is any point in that. It is not only the nearest point, but I argue confidently that, perhaps, it is the greatest point of production in the Dominion of Canada. In saying that, I do not deprecate the other portions of the Dominion which are capable of producing more than enough to supply, not only the Yukon and the Dominion of Canada, but the world at large.

Mr. COCHRANE. Does British Columbia produce enough to feed itself?

Mr. MORRISON. I happen to belong to British Columbia, and I have been sustained up to this time.

Mr. COCHRANE. If the hon. member had to depend on British Columbia alone, he would not be here.

Mr. MORRISON. If the hon. gentleman will take a trip there, perhaps he will be better sustained. I desire now to say a few words with respect to the products of British Columbia. I am not going to say that British Columbia is the only province in the Dominion of Canada, but I think it is right that the hon. member for Alberta should be enlightened as to its resources, and I am glad the hon. member is in his seat. The hon. gentleman should not confine himself to gaining information with respect to his own bailiwick, but should ascertain what is being produced and exported by other provinces, including British Columbia. The hon. gentleman has evidently not availed himself of the facilities offered hon. members to post himself as to the resources of that great province. Even if I were not a resident, I would feel it incumbent on me to secure information in regard to British Columbia. I now refer the hon. gentleman to the official Hand-book published by authority of the Government of the province.

Mr. OLIVER. I should like to ask the hon. member a question before he goes further. I think he has misquoted me. I said that British Columbia was not a point of food production.

Mr. MORRISON. I will read from "Hansard" what the hon. gentleman said:

The nearest point of production of surplus food products in the Dominion to the Yukon is that part of the country in which I live—the country immediately surrounding Edmonton—and the next nearest point is the country immediately surrounding Regina and extending eastward to Winnipeg. If the food products, therefore, which are consumed in the Yukon cannot be drawn from those localities, they cannot be drawn from any other part of Canada, but must be obtained from some other and foreign country.

It is a categorical statement. I am now about to show that the town of Edmonton and the country around is not the nearest point of surplus food production in Canada for the Yukon. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to read the Hand-book, and he must have received one, he will find that British Columbia is the largest producer in the world per head except Holland. That should stimulate the hon. gentleman to find out why such is the fact.

Mr. OLIVER. This appears to be a question of veracity between the hon. gentleman and myself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. OLIVER. The hon. gentleman has charged me with speaking without knowledge, either intentionally or unintentionally. I wish to repeat the point I made. It was, that British Columbia is not an exporter of food products. I beg to repeat that statement, and I challenge the hon. gentleman to deny it and to prove his denial.

Mr. MORRISON. Whether British Columbia is an exporter of food products would involve a discussion of what the hon. gentleman means by food products.

Mr. OLIVER. Agricultural products.

Mr. MORRISON. That is the point to which I was coming. If the hon. gentleman will abide his time I will show conclusively that British Columbia is a very considerable exporter. At all events it is confining the discussion to a very narrow local argument, to compare Edmonton and the country around it with any part of the Dominion as a producer of food for the Yukon.

Mr. MORRISON.

Mr. OLIVER. I am sure I do not challenge or question the fact that British Columbia furnishes food products, but I deny the assertion that British Columbia exports agricultural food products.

Mr. MORRISON. I am denying the statement made by the hon. gentleman, his categorical statement that Edmonton and the surrounding country constitute the nearest point for export of food products to the Yukon. The hon. gentleman has made that categorical statement, and a proper inference is that British Columbia is not a point of food production for the Yukon country. I leave other hon. gentlemen to deal with the point so far as the other provinces are concerned.

I lay down this proposition, that the value of any country to its inhabitants depends on four conditions. One is its supporting capacity. This may be by agriculture, ranching or stock producing. Coming down to the very narrow comparison to be made as between British Columbia and that part of the North-west Territories represented by the hon. gentleman, we find that in the district of Kootenay there are 16,500,000 acres, in the district of Yale, 13,000,000 acres, in Lillooet 12,500,000, in New Westminster 36,000,000 acres, Cariboo, 59,250,000 acres. Cassiar district comprises the whole western portion of British Columbia from 23 degrees of longitude, all these districts together comprising an area of 383,000 square miles, and there are 640 acres to the square mile, and I allow the hon. gentleman to make the calculation as to how many millions of acres there are in British Columbia. Statisticians tell us that an individual can sustain life on something like 3 acres of land, without the proverbial cow. I am not extravagant when I say that out of 300,000,000 acres in British Columbia a very modest calculation would be 10,000,000 as arable and food producing land. Therefore, assuming that three acres will sustain an individual, there is a supporting capacity for two, three or four millions of people in that province.

Another condition is the exporting capacity of a country. Looking at the Trade and Navigation Returns, with which the hon. gentleman from Edmonton must be familiar, we find at page 27 that the total value of exports of products exported from British Columbia in 1897 was $14,017,678, and for the whole of the North-west Territories in the same year, exports were of the value of $166,000.

Mr. DAVIN. Might I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) what is the exporting port of the North-west Territories?

Mr. MORRISON. The reference to that will come in in another branch of my argument.

Mr. DAVIN. What is the port from which the products of the North-west Territories are sent?

Mr. MORRISON. I do not quite understand the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DAVIN. May I explain? These figures that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) is putting before the House are utterly misleading, because the exports of the North-west Territories are not tabulated in that book, and there is no means of getting at what the North-west Territories export for the purposes of that book that is published there.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not presume for a moment that the North-west Territories export anything for the purposes of this book, but I apprehend that the Trade and Navigation Returns of Canada are reliable.

Mr. OLIVER. May I ask, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) finds that the $14,000,000 of exports from British Columbia is composed of agricultural products, or what proportion of it?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 9th March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 62) to incorporate the Lake Tamagamingue Railway Company.—(Mr. McHugh.)

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY—REPLY TO ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, a copy of a despatch dated 22nd July, 1897, from the Right Honourable Joseph Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the Colonies, relative to the Joint Address to the Queen from the Senate and House of Commons, tendering their congratulations on the happy occasion of the completion of the sixtieth year of Her Majesty's reign.

A copy of the gracious reply of Her Majesty, as referred to in the despatch, is also herewith transmitted.

Government House,

Ottawa, 9th March, 1898.

(Mr. Chamberlain to Lord Aberdeen.)

Canada.

No. 263.

Downing Street, 22nd July, 1897.

My Lord,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your despatch No. 159 of the 10th June, covering a Joint Address to the Queen from the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada, tendering their congratulations on the happy occasion of the completion of the sixtieth year of Her Majesty's reign.

This Address was presented to Her Majesty in person by the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to whom the Queen was pleased to hand a gracious reply.

I have, &c.,

(Sgd.) J. CHAMBERLAIN.

Governor General,

&c., &c., &c.

Copy of Her Majesty's reply to the Joint Address from the Senate and House of Commons, presented by the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

"I thank the Canadian Parliament for their loyal and dutiful Address. I am deeply touched and gratified by this manifestation of the loyalty and affection which they bear to my Throne and Person.

"I request you to convey my sincere thanks to the Canadian Parliament for their Address, and for the beautiful casket in which it is inclosed."

ALIENS AND MINING INTERESTS.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 63) to amend the law relating to aliens. He said: The Bill provides that any person who desires to own or occupy or become a director of any mining company or mining interest in Canada, must be a resident of Her Majesty's realm for at least twelve months prior to so doing, or of a country in which there is no alien labour law in opposition to Her Majesty's subjects.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BANK OF COMMERCE—BRANCH IN THE YUKON.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

Has the Government made any arrangement with the Bank of Commerce for establishing a branch of that bank in the Yukon district? If so, what is the arrangement made? Has any other bank made proposals to the Government looking towards establishing branches in the Yukon district?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). In reply to the first question, I beg to say, yes. In reply to the second, I beg to say: Under the arrangement made, the Canadian Bank of Commerce is to establish an agency at Dawson City and to be employed by the Government to do the Government's general banking business in the district, including the collection of royalties. The bank is to be allowed the privilege of erecting a building within the police enclosures. This arrangement is temporary, and the compensation to be allowed for the bank's services is to be fixed hereafter at the discretion of the Minister of Finance. Except as to the business and privilege above mentioned, the bank will stand in the same position as any other bank that may be established in the district, and any other privilege or protection that may be given the Canadian Bank of Commerce, under the arrangement with that bank, will be given to any other bank that may be established in the district. The correspondence on the subject will be laid on the Table to-morrow. In reply to the third question, I beg to say that it is already answered in the above.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I understood the hon. Minister of Finance to say that the Bank of Commerce would collect the royalties. That does not mean, I suppose, that they become the collectors outside, but simply that they receive the royalties on deposit.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They will receive the royalties in whatever form they may be collected. Under the regulations issued by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), it is provided that the royalties may be paid to the banking agent of the Government, or to any one of certain Government officials. In any case, however, the bank will become the receiver of the royalties on behalf of the Government.

BADDECK DRILL SHED.

Mr. BETHUNE asked,

Is the Government aware that the title of a piece of land at Baddeck, Cape Breton, has been made to Her Majesty for the purpose of having a drill shed erected thereon? Has the Government taken into consideration the necessity there exists of having a drill shed erected at regimental headquarters, Baddeck? If so, will the drill shed be built at an early date?

Mr. McMULLEN.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: 1. There is no record in the department to show that a piece of land at Baddeck, C.B., has been deeded to Her Majesty for the purpose of having a drill shed erected thereon. 2. It is highly desirable that there should exist at the headquarters of the 94th Battalion a headquarters drill shed, wherein all the arms and accoutrements of the battalion should be stored. 3. The D.O.C. at Halifax has been asked for a report. No decision can be reached until the report is received.

WHARF AT RIVIERE A LA PIPE.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Dugas) asked,

Have the Government sent instructions to any person at Rivière à la Pipe, in the county of Chicoutimi, as to the preparation of timber required for the building of a wharf at that place, and, if so, to whom; what are the prices paid, and what quantity has been allotted to each person?

Are the Government aware that this timber has been allotted to certain store-keepers in large parcels; that the said store-keepers refuse to give anything but store pay in return for the work of the settlers and that many of the latter have thus been deprived of the advantage of making timber at the price fixed by the department?

Have the Government instructed any person at Rivière à la Pipe or elsewhere to haul stone to the site of the proposed wharf; if so, who are the persons, and what are the prices offered?

Are the Government aware that several of the settlers are now hauling the said stone, without supervision, without any fixed price, and calculating on working by the day?

Who set the said persons to work? Is the departmental engineer on the spot, in order to set the work in operation and fix the prices?

How much have the Government paid for the special journey made by the engineer in order to locate the wharf, for travelling and living expenses and cost of survey?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: No work has yet been done on the wharf at Rivière à la Pipe. An engineer has been detailed to that point, and left about two weeks ago in order to procure the necessary materials required for the construction and see to the price thereof. No allotment of timber nor of the stone has yet been made or reported to the department. The engineer is now on the spot in order to set the work in operation. The site of the proposed work was selected after a survey made a few years ago by one of the engineers of the department not now in its employ—Mr. Guay—and, while in the Chicoutimi district, superintending some other works during last season, the engineer in charge—Mr. Blais—went to Rivière à la Pipe to examine the site and give any further information to the department that might be required. His expenses from Chicoutimi to Rivière à la Pipe and return were the following:—Transportation, $18; board, $2.50.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT CHAMBORD, CHICOUTIMI.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Dugas) asked,

1. Is it true that the Government have established a custom-house at Chambord, in the county of Chicoutimi, and if so, at whose request?
2. Do the Government pay to P. C. Dupuis, or to any other person, any sum of money, by way of rent, or for other considerations, in connection with the use of the buildings wherein the said customs office is located, and if so, what sum?
3. What is the amount of duties paid at the said office, since its establishment, and on what articles have duties been collected?
4. What is the amount of the outlay incurred for the maintenance of this branch, since its establishment, including cost of installation?
5. What is the salary of the officer in charge of the office, and his name and residence?
6. What amount has been paid him, up to date, for salary, travelling expenses and other considerations?
7. Are the Government aware that that officer lives six miles away from Chambord?
8. For what reasons did the Government establish the said office?
9. What are the goods which have been entered at the said office, and the names of the persons who entered and passed the same?
10. Do the Government intend to maintain the said office?
11. Is it true that the late Government refused to open the said office, and that it was in view of a promise made prior to the Dominion elections that the said P. C. Dupuis opposed the Conservative candidate and supported the Liberal candidate?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: 1. Chambord Junction was established as an outport of customs under the survey of the port of Quebec, by Order in Council to take effect from the 1st May, 1897. Attention was called by Dupuis, Demers & Co. to the necessity for customs facilities for the Lake St. John district. 2. The Government do not pay any sum of money to P. C. Dupuis, or any one else, at Chambord Junction, for rent or use of buildings for customs purposes. 3. The duties paid at said outport from its establishment up to the 28th February, 1898, amounted to $589.65. It would be necessary to have a special return from the port under which Chambord Junction is before an answer could be given to the inquiry as to the articles upon which duties have been collected. 4. The salary of the officer, from the 19th June, 1897, to 1st March, 1898, was $210. Cost of installation about $22; total, $232. 5. Auguste Gagné is sub-collector of customs at Chambord Junction at a salary of $300 per annum, and his place of residence at the time of his appointment is stated as at St. Jerome (Lake St. John). 6. The amount of his salary to 1st March, 1898, is $210. He has not been paid any sum whatever for travelling expenses or other considerations. 7. The Government are not aware how far away from Chambord Junction the officer lives at present. 8. The outport was established in order to accommodate the customs business of the Lake St. John district and vicinity. 9. It is not usual to publish the details of individual importations made through custom-houses. Moreover, the information required under this inquiry could not be furnished without special returns from the port of Quebec. 10. It is the intention of the Government at present to keep the office open. 11. The Government is not aware of the late Government's refusal to open the office, or of any promise made prior to the Dominion elections with regard thereto.

POSTMASTER AT ASHCROFT, B.C.

Mr. PRIOR (by Mr. Earle) asked,

1. Who is the present postmaster at Ashcroft, British Columbia, and where did he reside previous to his appointment?
2. By whom was he recommended for the position?
3. How many applicants were there for the position, and what were their names?
4. What were their post office addresses, and by whom were they recommended?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: 1. The present postmaster of Ashcroft, British Columbia, is Mrs. Mary J. Cornwall. She has been postmaster since 6th October, 1892. She resided at Ashcroft previous to her appointment. 2. She was recommended for the position by Clement J. Cornwall, county court judge, at the request of J. A. Mara, Esq., M.P. 3 and 4. There were no other applicants for the position. I fancy that my hon. friend intended to ask concerning the postmaster at Ashcroft Station, and if so, my answer will not meet his requirements; but I can only give the answer as I have it now, and which refers to the post office known as Ashcroft.

Mr. EARLE. I think the post office intended to be referred to must be Ashcroft Station.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If the hon. gentleman will put his question again on the paper, I will obtain the answer.

MILITARY HARNESS AND SADDLERY CONTRACT.

Mr. MONK asked,

1. What contracts for military harness or saddlery have been given by the Government of Canada since the 1st of September, 1896?
2. By whom, and where were said contracts executed?
3. What is the amount fixed for the execution of said contracts, and have the amounts been paid?
4. Were tenders for the execution of said contracts publicly called for, and was the contract in each case awarded to the lowest tenderer?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). I must ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) to be kind enough to move for a return in the regular way. The same observation will apply to his two succeeding questions respecting military clothing and repairs and additions to Montreal drill shed, respectively.

BRITISH JOINT STOCK COMPANIES AND THE YUKON.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked,

In regard to regulations governing placer mining in the provisional district of Yukon, Northwest Territories: Interpretation, "joint stock company shall mean any company incorporated for mining purposes under a Canadian charter or licensed by the Government of Canada." Section 2. "A free miner's certificate may be granted for one year, to run from the date thereof or from the expiration of the applicant's then existing certificate, upon the payment of the sum of $10, unless the certificate is issued in favour of a joint stock company, in which case the fee shall be $50 for a company having a capital of $100,000 or less, and for a company having a nominal capital exceeding $100,000 the fee shall be $100. Only one person or joint stock shall be named in a certificate." Reading the interpretation and section 2 together, is it the intention to prevent companies chartered in Great Britain under the English Joint Stock Companies doing business in the Yukon district; or is the intention of the Government to permit such companies to registration in Canada, and thus bring them under the same terms and conditions that relate to Canadian companies? If it is the intention, has any action been taken by the Government to facilitate registration, and on what terms, conditions and registration fees?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I beg to say that it is the intention to permit these companies to register, and legislation will be introduced at the present session of Parliament for the purpose of providing a system of registration.

POST OFFICE OF ST. MICHEL DE NAPIERVILLE.

Mr. BERGERON asked,

1. Who instructed Mr. Bain to write the following letter:—

Office of the Post Office Inspector,
Montreal, 17th February, 1898.

Sir,—It is my duty to inform you that I am instructed by the Postmaster General to take the requisite steps to transfer the post office of St. Michel de Napierville to the charge of Mr. F. X. Paradis.

I cannot state the precise date on which the transfer will be made, but it will be done as soon as possible.

Yours, &c.,
(Sgd.) J. W. BAIN,
Post Office Inspector.

Mr. A. Laberge,
Postmaster,
St. Michel de Napierville.

2. On what grounds did the Postmaster General cause the dismissal of Mr. Laberge?

3. Was an inquiry held?

Mr. MONK.

4. Is the Minister aware that the present post office is not inhabited at night?

5. Has the Postmaster General received a petition signed by a large number of the parishioners of St. Michel, asking that the post office be allowed to remain under the control of Mr. Laberge?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The Postmaster General's instructions were conveyed to Mr. Bain, the post office inspector, through the secretary of the department. 2. The last postmaster of St. Michel de Napierville, Mr. A. Laberge, was dismissed for undue partisanship in the general election of June, 1896. 3. He was dismissed on the representations of Mr. D. Monet, M.P., and in view of the terms in which Mr. Monet's representations were made an inquiry was not considered necessary. 4. The department is not aware that such is the case. 5. A petition has been received purporting to be signed by a large number of the residents of St. Michel de Napierville, asking that no change should be made in the postmastership of the office.

RAILWAY COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Mr. JAMESON (by Mr. Richardson) asked,

1. Who are the members of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council?

2. How many meetings of that committee were held during the year 1897?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The members of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council are:—Hon. A. G. Blair, Minister of Railways and Canals, chairman; Hon. David Mills, Minister of Justice; Hon. J. Israel Tarte, Minister of Public Works; Hon. William Mulock, Postmaster General; Hon. Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière, Minister of Inland Revenue; Hon. R. R. Dobell, P.C. Mr. Collingwood Schreiber, Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, is the secretary. There were thirteen meetings held during the calendar year of 1897.

SALE OF LIQUOR IN THE YUKON TERRITORY.

Mr. RICHARDSON asked,

Has the Government under consideration the desirability of refusing to grant licenses or permits for the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Yukon territory?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The answer to the hon. gentleman is: Yes.

TELEGRAPH CONNECTION WITH YUKON MINES.

Mr. McINNES asked,

What steps have been taken to establish telegraph communication with the Yukon mining districts?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). This whole question is now under the consideration of the Government.

LAVALTRIE MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. DUGAS asked,

1. When was the contract awarded for carrying the mail from the Canadian Pacific Railway depot to the village of Lavaltrie and vice versa ?
2. To whom ?
3. How many tenders were there, what was the amount in each case, and for what time was the contract awarded ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. The contract for the mail service between Lavaltrie and railway station was awarded on the 18th August, 1897. 2. It was awarded to Joseph Grenier. 3. There were five tenders, as follows :—Joseph Grenier, $195 ; Auguste Perreault, $195 ; Clement Laporte, $195 ; Jean Laplume, $199 ; Felix Hetu, $240. The contract is for four years from the 1st October, 1897.

REPORTS.

Department of Indian Affairs for the year ending 30th June, 1897.—(Mr. Sifton).

Department of Agriculture.—(Mr. Fisher).

RAILWAY RATE WAR AND MANITOBA SETTLERS.

Mr. MACLEAN. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to direct the attention of the Government, and especially of the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) to a statement in the Toronto "Globe" of yesterday under the heading of "A hurtful rate war." With the permission of the House I will read it :

One result of the present rate war which is going on between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway is that intending settlers in Manitoba are being seriously inconvenienced. There is not now, nor can there be while this war continues, any adequate through service over either line to points in Manitoba for all settlers from Ontario who desire to take their families and effects with them. There is considerable complaint on the part of intending settlers, and it is understood that a report has gone forward to the Manitoba Government describing the position of affairs in Ontario.

A great deal of Manitoba business, in fact the larger proportion, comes from points on the Grand Trunk Railway not touched by the Canadian Pacific at all. In the case of a settler desiring to go to Manitoba from any Grand Trunk point with his family and effects, he is placed in a decidedly unpleasant position. He cannot ticket himself and family over the Grand Trunk to North Bay, there to connect with the Canadian Pacific, and the latter road will not accept exchange tickets from the Grand Trunk at North Bay, and if the settler went that way he would simply have to pay the Canadian Pacific the local rate from North Bay to the point in Manitoba where he is going. He therefore has to send his family over the Canadian Pacific by way of Smith's Falls. But he cannot take his stock and effects round that way, because the Grand Trunk will not accept the freight unless it goes by way of North Bay, to be handed over there to the Canadian Pacific. Neither can the Grand Trunk take the effects into local points in Manitoba, for it has no entrance, except at Winnipeg. Therefore, the settler has to send his family over the Canadian Pacific via Smith's Falls, and he accompanies his effects to North Bay, where, of course, he has to wait until the Canadian Pacific express comes along. Even then, he is not sure of making a connection with the train in which his family is going through. After being put to all this trouble and inconvenience, he has not the satisfaction of getting even cut rates, for the Canadian Pacific, knowing that it controls the business in Manitoba, and must, in the nature of things, continue to control it, has not thought it necessary to give intending settlers in Manitoba the cheap rates it has made to other points. The question of settlement in Manitoba, in fact, does not enter into the present controversy at all. If it did, the Canadian Pacific would before this have cut rates into the prairie province, for the other lines are meeting the Canadian Pacific's rates to Winnipeg.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if necessary, I shall make a motion in order to bring this matter before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. Unless the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) is going to confine himself to the asking of a question, he must make a motion.

Mr. MACLEAN. I intend to make a motion, Mr. Speaker. I wish to direct the attention of the House to the inconvenience now suffered by the people of Ontario through this rate war and the failure of the two great railways to effect some kind of running arrangement between Toronto and North Bay. We know that up to a very few weeks ago there was a reasonable arrangement between the two roads and they did interchange traffic and so accommodate the public. For some reason best known to the management of these two roads, they have seen fit to end that agreement. The attention of the House was called to this matter the other day by my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule). Here we have a statement in a leading public journal showing that the inconvenience still continues. It is a very serious inconvenience and demands the attention of Parliament. It involves questions even more important than does the Yukon proposition now occupying our attention. How is this service given? It is given, first of all, by the old Northern Railway, which received large public grants. In the next place by the Ontario Pacific Junction Railway, which was almost created by the grant given by this Parliament—these roads are controlled by the Grand Trunk Railway Co., which received large sums in the old days from the old Parliament of Canada—and by the Canadian Pacific Railway which also has received large sums of money and large grants of land from the Parliament of Canada.

These railroads, for some reason best known to themselves, and in spite of the large grants they have received from the people of Canada, choose to play ducks and drakes with the interests of the people of this country; and it is time for this Government to undertake to discipline these railways and compel them to treat the public fairly, and to give a decent service in going to and coming from Manitoba. It may be said that this Parliament has no power legally to control these roads. I think the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) pointed out the other day that under the charter creating these roads, they were bound to consult the public interests, they were bound to give running rights to each other, and they were bound to give reasonable treatment to the people. I believe that the Minister of Railways, or the Railway Committee, has power to send an order out to these railways to-day and to say to them: You must accommodate the public; you must quit this rate war; you must amend your ways. If the hon. gentleman says that he has no power, he and this Parliament have power in another way. To-day both the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway receive large annual grants from us in the way of postal subsidies, and we can cut off these postal subsidies if they do not see fit to serve the public in a proper way. There is another thing that we can do. They are here every day for legislation: the Canadian Pacific Railway was to-day represented in the Railway Committee, and the Grand Trunk Railway will be there to-morrow. The Government have it in their power to say to these gentlemen, and this House has it in its power to say to these gentlemen: Not one Bill, not one concession, will be granted to you by the Railway Committee or by Parliament, until you adjust your quarrels with each other, and give the public the services they had up to six weeks ago. It is with that object in view that I call the attention of the Government to this matter, and I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WALLACE. I think if the Government have not power to apply the remedy suggested by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), there is a desire that Parliament should have such power. Parliament is in session now, and can legislate so as to compel these roads to give an efficient and proper service to the public. Another grievance that I think the Government should consider, is the fact that the Parry Sound Railway and this road running from Toronto to North Bay, do not furnish convenience to the public. I am told that the Parry Sound road passes through Scotia

Mr. MACLEAN.

Junction at an hour before the other train reaches there, so that a passenger going up to that country west of North Bay, has to remain about 22 or 23 hours at Scotia Junction before he can go on. The mails are put under the same ban, and I apprehend that the Postmaster General could apply a remedy there speedily and effectually. As has been pointed out, this Parliament has paid large sums of money to these railways, some persons think exorbitant sums, for the carriage of the mails; and I think we can fairly and reasonably demand that the railroads arrange their business matters so that the mails and public may be carried promptly instead of remaining there, as passengers have to remain at Scotia Junction for 22 or 23 hours before they are sent forward to their destination. This is a state of affairs that should not continue, and I think that the Government should act in the first instance, and if the Government has not sufficient power, then Parliament should step in right now and give the Government sufficient power to deal with these roads promptly and effectually.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I can assure the House that I am fully sensible of the gravity of the situation which has been referred to by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and that the subject is at this moment engaging my serious and closest attention. I had the pleasure of meeting the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and having a discussion with him upon this subject, going over the legislation which has been passed in relation to it, and examining with him the question in all its bearings. He understands very fully the nature of the complicated questions which arise in connection with the legislation. I pointed out to him the views that I entertained upon the subject, and I have concluded upon a course of action, not by any means as drastic as the hon. member has pointed out, not by any means as broad, but a course of action which I hope will be attended with beneficial results. These matters are not, I may say, as easily disposed of as hon. gentlemen might think off-hand. But I trust we will be able to make an impression upon these differing corporations. As the law now stands, the jurisdiction which has been vested in the Railway Committee of the Privy Council can only be exercised practically at the instance of one or other of the railway corporations involved; and if, as seems to be the present condition of affairs, neither of the railway companies are prepared to move, or desire to take advantage of the powers which have been conferred by legislation upon the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, or desire to set in motion the machinery of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, then a difficulty presents itself upon the very threshold. I do not think any good purpose could be served by dwelling at this moment, at all events, upon the various phases of the question that have presented themselves to my mind, or the difficulties that arise. I am in hopes that the line of procedure that I have marked out for myself, and which the hon. member for East Grey has concurred in as being desirable, may be productive of some results.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would the hon. gentleman kindly indicate what that line of action is?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have no objection to do so. It is to communicate with the two companies concerned, pointing out to them what I think we might, in the public interest, fairly demand at their hands, and asking them to present their views upon the question, and the reasons why neither of them, have evinced any disposition to avail themselves of the provisions of the existing law, also asking them to communicate with me at once so that I may know the attitude they take upon the matter. Then, having a statement from them as to their views, we will be in a position, I think, the better to take any action that may be open to us, and which will be proper for us to take in the public interest. I think the matter may be permitted to rest there for the present. I can assure the House that I will not lose sight of it in any way.

Mr. DAVIN. There is no part of the country so interested in this question as the part of the North-west from which I come. I think this general proposition may be laid down, that in regard to corporations that are creations of Parliament, Parliament should be supreme. It is for the hon. gentlemen who occupy those Olympian heights—to use a figure that was frequently used by my right hon. friend when he was in the cold shades of Opposition—it is for the hon. gentlemen who occupy those Olympian heights on the Treasury benches, to find a solution for difficulties of this kind. But I think the general proposition is unassailable that in regard to corporations which are the creations of Parliament, Parliament should be supreme.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I may perhaps be permitted to supplement the remarks made a few moments ago by the Minister of Railways. Whatever power there may be in the existing law of Parliament over this question, I think we are all agreed that the present law is insufficient and ought to be supplemented by other legislation. The time has come when the attention of Parliament will be invited to it. The question has been lying dormant, and has not pressed before the present time in active form. The Government have had the subject under discussion. Whether or not it will be advisable to introduce legislation during this session, will largely depend on the length of the session; but the Government are fully aware that something has to be done with respect to giving power to the Government and to the authorities to deal with this question which is now engaging public attention.

Mr. SPROULE. I was induced to bring this question to the notice of the House at first from seeing in the press of Toronto the urgent necessity of the interchange of traffic between these two roads. It had grown to such an extent that a conference had taken place between the mayor and city council and the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), who expressed very freely before the elections his opinion that it was most desirable a new road should be built to the west because traffic was very much interrupted. Since that time a special committee has been appointed for the purpose of devising ways and means to secure connection between Toronto and the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, so that the trade of Toronto, Hamilton and London and the south-western part of Ontario should be carried over it. I very well remember that at the time the Northern Pacific Junction and Sault Ste. Marie road was incorporated, the people of western Canada, feeling the urgent need of obtaining some connection between the western system of railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, pressed on the attention of the Government that some independent line should be built, and that the Government should assist that company by a grant sufficiently large to prevent its absorption by any company, so that it might be made an independent line. At that time several deputations interviewed the Government. We said that we felt when the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway was constructed that our western country would be largely side-tracked, because trade would be more direct between Montreal and Manitoba and the North-west than it could possibly be between Toronto, Manitoba and the North-west, and unless we secured some independent connecting link to join our western system with the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, a gross injustice would be done to our part of the country. The Government acquiesced in this view, and gave assistance to this road. For that purpose they first assisted the road to the extent of $6,000 per mile. But the company found they could not finance the undertaking with that amount and keep the road an independent one, although they could do so if they came under the control of another road. In the following year the company asked a further grant, and the Government gave an additional $6,000 per mile, with the distinct understanding that there should be an interchange of traffic between this and other connecting roads, and surrounded by every safeguard to ensure for all time a connecting link between the south-western portion of Ontario and the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. At that time every condition was inserted in the Act that was thought desirable to secure that result. Afterwards it appears that there was some defect, and at my interview with the Minister of Railways, upon close examination of the Act and lease, it appears there is a loop-hole by which the companies can practically avoid carrying out what was the well-understood intention of Parliament and the country at that time; and I am glad to say on behalf of the Minister of Railways that he showed every possible desire to remove this difficulty. He desired to avail himself of the law, and he is prepared to use it as far as possible; but I agree that on examining the law it appears to be defective, although the defect was certainly not intentional. When the Act was passed it provided:

For the purpose of ensuring free interchange of traffic coming to or going from the railway so to be constructed between the lessees' railways and the railways connecting therewith, so far as such interchange shall be under the control of the lessees, the said lease shall also contain a provision that in the event of the Parliament of Canada being at any time hereafter of opinion that the traffic of the railway system of the lessees coming from or going to the projected railway, and interchanged with lines connecting with the lessees' system of railways is not so interchanged without preference or prejudice as between such connections, then being of such opinion the Parliament of Canada may, if it see fit, cancel the said lease and take over the said railway.

We thought that was a guarantee. There was a provision in the other Act that if this road was leased to any other company there must be a provision inserted in the lease:

Provided further that the company who may become lessees thereof and the railway leased shall be subject to all obligations hereby imposed on the company hereby incorporated.

And those were the obligations imposed on the railway company. Whether there is power under the Act to take possession of that road or not, and to compel the railway company to do what is in the interest of the country, it was intended at that time that such powers should be therein contained, and that in the event of the railway companies refusing to interchange traffic, Parliament should act; and it is on this ground that I am urging action on Parliament to-day. On the other hand, I thought it very strange that the city of Toronto found it necessary to appoint a special committee on the subject, and that the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Bertram) should desire additional connection between Toronto and the main line going to Manitoba and the North-west, when there is on the Statute-book a law that gave the right to enforce the maintenance of railway connection, if it were called into operation, and the only party that I knew which had power to call it into operation was the Government. Remembering this fact and the object we had in view when these provisions were inserted in the Act in order to ensure the interchange of traffic between the south-western lines connecting at Toronto and the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I brought the subject to the attention of the Government and urged that the Government should take action. I was somewhat surprised to see that the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) sat silent in his seat during the discussion, in view of the fact that during the election he declared he regarded this as one of the most urgent necessities of the city.

Mr. BERTRAM. I desire to say a word or two in regard to this subject which has been brought up by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) and the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). It seems to me that at the present time this is simply a quarrel between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and of course it is very difficult when railways quarrel to arrive at a satisfactory solution. If there is any remedy that can be applied by the Government in some way, it should be applied, because it is very injurious to the interests of Toronto and western Canada that these two great corporations should be quarrelling as they are doing. I have always held that Toronto and western Ontario, owing to their very imperfect connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway for the western trade occupy an unfortunate position, and on that account I have always supported, in the interest of Toronto and the province of Ontario that an independent line should be built to give us better connection. In the meantime we have the connection by way of North Bay, and it is unreasonable and unjust that passengers by the Canadian Pacific Railway should be obliged to come around by way of Smith's Falls, and thus waste much valuable time. I hope the Government will look carefully into the matter and give it their best consideration and remedy this disgraceful condition of affairs that exists at the present moment. I believe the Government have been giving the matter consideration for the past few days, and therefore I was willing to leave it in their hands. I heartily endorse what has been said regarding the condition of things which exists at the present moment, and I believe there should be some pressure brought to bear upon these railways to compel them to act more in accordance with the public interest.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

VACANCY IN PRINCE, P. E. I.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I wish to ask the right hon. the Prime Minister, if a returning officer has been appointed for the election in the vacant constituency of Prince, P.E.I., with regard to which Mr. Speaker announced a few days ago that he had issued his warrant?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). A writ has not yet been issued. We received news only to-day of the funeral of the late Mr. Perry, and we thought it advisable to allow a few days at least to elapse before the writ was issued.

RAILWAY RATE WAR—THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to ask the Minister of Railways whether there is any truth in the rumour which has been current in the newspapers for some time, as to the Intercolonial Railway taking part in the present rate war involving a lowering of the schedule rates on the Government railways?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I think there is no truth in the report. There is no cut rate at all on the Intercolonial Railway, as far as I am aware.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Blair for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) an Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned last night I was drawing attention to the statements made by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), which were in substance: that the nearest point of production for supplies for the Yukon was the country immediately surrounding Edmonton, and, that if the food products which are consumed in the Yukon did not come from that circumscribed territory, then the necessaries of life for that mining population would be drawn from a foreign country. I based my objections to such a contention upon this: That the value of any country to its inhabitants depends mainly upon four conditions, one of these being the supporting capacity of that country, and I proceeded to show, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) was astray in his argument, because the province of British Columbia, which is immediately south of the Yukon territory has a supporting and productive capacity more than sufficient to furnish all the food products necessary for consumption in the Yukon. I did not mean when I said that, nor do I mean now to say, that the district of Alberta is not also capable of furnishing these food supplies. The area of the province of British Columbia is some 300,000,000 acres, and I pointed out last night that it was a very small estimate that 10,000,000 acres of that was highly fertile and capable of producing for millions of people. It might surprise the hon. member for Alberta to know, that in one of the districts of that great province of British Columbia—and it is a fact which he should be as proud of as I am—the producing capacity of one acre of wheat land is something greater than in Manitoba. At page 99 of the hand-book issued by the Department of the Interior, I find the following in reference to the district of New Westminster:—

The soil is rich and strong, the climate mild, resembling that of England, with more marked seasons of rainy and dry weather, and heavy yields are obtained without much labour. Very large returns of wheat have been got from land in this locality, as much as sixty-two bushels from the measured acre of wheat, ninety bushels of oats per acre, and hay that yielded three and a half to five tons to the acre, and frequently two crops, totalling six tons. Experiments have also been made in fruit-growing, with the most satisfactory results.

Now, there is evidence of the producing capacity of a large section of the province of British Columbia, and in the face of that, the member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver)—no doubt unintentionally—was certainly misleading the House and the country, when he made such a categorical statement as he did in his speech. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) went further, and to show the recklessness with which he was giving what he said were facts against this Bill and against the policy of the Government, I have simply to point out his observation: That he was not speaking of the rest of the country. Well, Sir, I am speaking of the rest of the country, and I hold that every hon. gentleman in this House ought to speak of the rest of the country, and ought to bear the rest of the country in mind and not only his own particular district or constituency, when he is discussing such a question as this. This is a matter of national import. It is not a matter that affects British Columbia alone, and even if it did, it should be of great concern to the rest of Canada considering the tremendous resources of that province, and considering the fact that the destinies of this Dominion rest upon the progress and prosperity of British Columbia. The fact that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) was not speaking of the rest of the country may account for a great many of the fallacies he gave expression to. He told us:

I am not arguing on principle or politics——and he might have gone further and said: Nor on common sense. He says:

I am not arguing on principle or politics, but merely placing an undoubted fact before this House, so that the position we take will be understood, and why we are taking it.

Now, one of the undoubted facts which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) placed before this House was :

In my humble opinion you hand over to Mackenzie & Mann the total gold-bearing area of that country.

That is to say the least of it a most unwarranted and extravagant statement, and one which I challenge the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) or his friends on the opposite side of the House to prove. Then he goes on :

I say it is essentially unfair that for the building of a railroad west of the mountains that can only benefit the country west of the mountains, these people should be given the right of selection east of the mountains as well.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) cannot support his statement, that this railroad built west of the mountains is of benefit only to the country west of the mountains. I deny that statement, and I shall not reflect upon the intelligence of this House to take up a moment's time in controverting it. I merely point it out to show the extravagant and unwarranted statements made by the hon. member (Mr. Oliver). Then he states :

There was a rush to the Yukon last year, a rush that was entirely unexpected, a rush for which we are largely unprepared, and we have every assurance that there will be no starvation there this year for the reason that those who were in danger of starvation simply got up and walked out, a very natural proceeding on their part.

The hon. member tells this House, and tries to score a point against the Government by saying, that the reason there will be no starvation in the Yukon this year is because those who were in danger of starvation last year got up and walked out. I cannot see the philosophy or the sense of a statement of that kind ; because we have it on reliable authority that before the first of January of this year there were 10,000 people within the passes to the Yukon ; and the people who came out were sturdy men, who were supplied with every facility that money could afford, who had strong constitutions, who took the precaution, no doubt, to take sufficient supplies in to bring them back. These were the people who came out, and not by any means people on the verge of starvation. And even some of them were fed on the way out with provisions furnished by the Government whom the hon. gentleman is attacking for their policy ; and those who had not means were assisted by the Mounted Police. Now, I say that there is every danger of starvation if the tremendous number of people who are now converging to that country go in there, and if such facilities as are proposed by the Government are not afforded.

Mr. MORRISON.

The hon. gentleman went on to indulge in a number of platitudes. I agree with a great deal of what he said, for instance :

If there is gold in the Yukon district, it is our gold.

Nobody disputes that.

If it is there to-day, it will be there to-morrow.

I could hardly, perhaps, go that far, because that depends on circumstances.

It will be there ten years from now if it is not taken out.

I quite agree with the hon. gentleman in that ; we will be here for a hundred years, if we do not die.

It is money in the bank for this Canadian nation. I will take the liberty of saying that I do not believe the Canadian nation should go into mining speculation.

I agree with the hon. gentleman, and I think they should not go into railway speculation either ; and the fact that the Government do not wish to go into mining speculation is the very reason why they propose to give to these contractors this large acreage of 3,750,000 acres, or whatever it is. I quite agree that the Government ought not to go into mining speculation ; and especially they should not go into railway speculation, such as the hon. gentleman is advocating so strenuously at the present juncture.

There is no rational member of this House who will for one moment entertain the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Alberta as against those advanced by the hon. Minister of the Interior. I contend that this Government have the interest of the Yukon country as much at heart, and have as much at stake there, as the hon. member for Alberta. They are as much interested in the welfare of the Edmonton district as he is. The mere fact that he resides there does not make him any more interested in that part of the Dominion than I am or than any member of the Government is. But because he cannot see the advantage that will accrue to himself or his district from the proposed line of railway, therefore he must oppose it. Let him follow that line of action to its logical conclusion in every day life, and where will it land him ? If we were to pursue the narrow, shortsighted course which the hon. member for Alberta pursues in opposing this Bill, in what position would we find ourselves ?

The remarks which I have just made have reference to the first condition on which I said the advantage of a country to its population depended. The other was its exporting capacity, and in referring to that I referred to the Trade and Navigation Returns. The hon. member for Alberta and his friend the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) took issue with me in that regard, and stated that the figures I gave were misleading, and that the arguments based on those figures were fallacious. I am perhaps as well aware as are these hon. gentlemen that the Trade and Navigation Returns do not show all the products of the respective provinces which go out of the provinces. They only pretend to show the exports, and it was the word "exports" I used. I may have been misunderstood. I said that the second advantage on which the people of a country depended was its exporting capacity. If I sent a case of canned salmon from British Columbia to Edmonton, I would not find anything about that in the items I spoke of last night. I am endeavouring to show that the province of British Columbia exported a great deal more in value than the North-west Territories, and à fortiori more than the district of Alberta. I stated that the value of the exports from British Columbia was $14,000,000. There is no doubt that that $14,000,000 might include some flour shipped by Mr. Ogilvie, the milling man of Manitoba, to Australia; but the amount that should be subtracted from the total on that account is very small, because the total exports of the mine from British Columbia alone in 1897 was $8,903,904, by all odds the very largest export of the product of the mines from any province in Canada. The export of fish from the province of British Columbia in the same year was $3,400,645, the largest in value of any province in the Dominion except Nova Scotia, which is very little more. So that, even if you allowed for all the articles credited to British Columbia that ought to be credited to Manitoba and the North-west Territories, you would still have very much more to the credit of British Columbia than you would have to the credit of the North-west Territories. I am not referring to those outside of Alberta, but apparently they are not separated; so I am taking the whole of the North-west Territories together. What I am referring to particularly is the district of Alberta, and I say confidently that the district of Alberta is not an exporting district, but rather an importing district. I do not know what its imports and exports for the present year are, but I venture to say that up to a year ago the district of Alberta did not produce enough provisions to supply its own inhabitants. If I am wrong in that, I shall be pleased to have the hon. member for Alberta correct me; I want his figures. I say that the province of British Columbia, which is nearer the Yukon than the district of Alberta, has not only as great a supporting capacity as that district to-day, but a greater exporting capacity, and as such is of more value to the Dominion of Canada than the district of Alberta. Therefore the argument advanced by the hon. gentleman that inasmuch as this road benefited British Columbia, he would not be justified in supporting it, is an argument on a false basis; because if this road does benefit the province of British Columbia, it at the same time benefits the whole Dominion, and that would be no reason why he should refuse to support the Bill, or why he should attack the policy of the Government in that respect.

The third condition of advantage to the inhabitants of a country is its position as regards foreign commerce. I am very sorry to have to come down to the very narrow and miserable line of argument of comparing one province against another, because all the provinces are our heritage, and though we may live in different parts of the Dominion, we ought each to defend and promote the interests of every other part. (That is what we are here for; we are not sent here as parish politicians, but to advance and promote the interest of every section, even the most extreme or most obscure. But I feel bound to make this comparison in order to show how unwarranted were the statements of my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), and because of the great stress which hon. gentlemen opposite are laying on these statements. To show the extent to which the commerce of British Columbia has gone, let me refer to the Trade and Navigation reports. According to these reports British Columbia sends her exports to Great Britain, the United States, Australia, British Africa, Central America, the Argentine Republic, Italy, China, Japan, France, the French colonial possessions, Hawaii, Switzerland, the United States of Columbia. As against that vast range, I find that the district of Alberta only exports to Great Britain and the United States alone, according to the latest returns, those of the year 1897. I also find that the customs duties collected in the town of Edmonton, which is the largest centre of population in northern Alberta, amounted in 1897 to $3,246, whereas in the town of Rossland, B.C., which was not known five or six years ago, the duties collected in 1897 amounted to $122,646. And at Fort Steele, which is in a remote part of the province of British Columbia, I find that the customs duties collected inside of seven months amounted to $17,000. In the province of British Columbia as a whole, the total duties collected amounted to $1,555,589. How much were collected in the North-west Territories? $52,000. There is therefore no comparison to be made between the two. If the hon. gentleman can show me that the Trade and Navigation Returns are misleading, and do not render justice to his section of the Dominion, I shall be the first to congratulate him and express my pleasure at his disclosing facts which give a different showing. I invite my hon. friend to take up these reports, to look through the general statement of imports and exports, and examine into the different items of goods exported by the different provinces. He will find at page 386, under the heading of "wheat," that the number of bushels of wheat exported from British Columbia in 1887 was 63,-

471, and from the North-west Territories 820. He may say, but I do not think he can prove his statement that that amount of 63,471 bushels was not grown in British Columbia, but still he cannot deny that the export largely exceeded that from his district. In every item, I find that British Columbia, as regards foreign commerce, gives an infinitely better showing than the district of Alberta. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, I am not pretending for a moment that if the district of Alberta were populated and cultivated, it would not furnish a tremendous return. I do not deny that it would not then grow sufficient to furnish food supplies for the Yukon, but that is not the point I am discussing. Even admitting, for the sake of argument, that British Columbia does not export any food or agricultural products, that does not do away with the indisputable fact that she is capable of producing a tremendous return in these products if she were accorded markets and trading facilities. She has the requisite soil and climate to perfection. In Alberta there is the requisite soil, but the climate is very capricious. However, I shall not undertake to dwell on the disadvantages of any particular section of Canada, as we are interested in them all, but regarding the climate of British Columbia, let me refer to the Dominion hand-book, and then the hon. gentleman may draw a comparison, if he likes, between our province and his own part of the Dominion. At page 114, I find it is said :

There are several climates in British Columbia. In the southern portion, both of the mainland and of Vancouver Island, the climate is superior to that of southern England or central France. In this section of the province, snow seldom falls, and then lies but a few hours or days. Vegetation remains green, and the flowers are bright throughout the greater part of the winter, while in the spring and summer excessively heavy rains and long-continued fogs are unknown.

The hon. gentleman may compare that condition with the climatic conditions in Alberta. Having those conditions I have mentioned, having in the province of British Columbia extensive arable, fertile and cultivatable lands, where crops can be successfully harvested—having all the elements necessary for the raising of products to support life, I ask the hon. gentleman to draw a comparison with his own province, and then ask him if he can have the assurance to stand up in this House and declare that the district of Alberta is the nearest and only food-producing section of the Dominion to the Yukon.

I regret very much the necessity that impels me to make this reference to the speech of my hon. friend, and I trust he will take in good part anything I have said. I have endeavoured to reply in as dispassionate a manner as possible, but

Mr. MORRISON.

I did not think, in justice to my own constituency or province, nor the Dominion at large, that I could allow the statement to go forth uncontradicted that the comparatively isolated and circumscribed district of Alberta is the only possible centre of food production in the Dominion for the Yukon, and that if railway facilities are not furnished at once to get products into the Yukon from that district, then the people of Canada will be compelled to go down to the United States for their supplies. What is the natural inference that must be drawn from such a statement by people who are now preparing to go to the Yukon. If I were a stranger in Ottawa and read the hon. gentleman's speech, I would conclude that unless I got my supplies and went by the Edmonton route to the Yukon, I would have to go to Seattle or San Francisco and give the province of British Columbia the go-by, because in that province I could not obtain the supplies I required. The whole thing is preposterous, and I trust the hon. gentleman will take the first occasion to withdraw what he said, or, at any rate, fully explain what he meant.

I wish just to say a few words as to the amendment of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden). That amendment reads as follows :—

That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be left out and the following words be added instead thereof: the Bill No. 6, an Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and Donald A. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company, be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved, that this House, while recognizing the necessity of providing adequate facilities for transportation into the Canadian Yukon gold fields, regards as indefensible the terms and conditions of the proposed contract.

I draw particular attention to the wording of the amendment. Now, what are the terms and conditions of the proposed contract? I will not detain the House to go over the whole contract, but there are one or two of its terms which, I venture to say, are not understood by hon. gentlemen opposite, and perhaps not by many of this side of the House. Take section 10 of the Bill. I cannot see, for the life of me, why a lawyer, and particularly a lawyer of the eminent standing of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) should say that he regards that term of the contract to be indefensible. It deals with the powers of the company, and provides :

And upon the said contract being assigned by the contractors to the company, and upon the company covenanting with Her Majesty to carry it out, and upon the railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake mentioned in the said contract being completed and accepted as therein provided, the contractors shall be relieved from personal responsibility under the said contract and the company shall be thereafter deemed to be the parties of the second part thereto in lieu of the contractors and shall be bound as such and be entitled to their rights thereunder.

That is, it is a condition precedent to acquiring rights under this contract that all these things should be done. The words are used conjunctively, and it will not do for the company to do only one or other of them; it must do them all, or its rights do not come into force under the contract and cannot be enforced by them. Then I take up section 21. The intervening sections are simply the usual sections, and I take it that the amendment does not refer to them. This section deals with the question of tolls. What was the objections made by hon. gentlemen opposite to that? The tolls are to be imposed only on the line of railway, and not upon the roadway or the right of way. Therefore, this road now being built by the company can be traversed by anybody and no tolls can be exacted. What is the objection on the score of rates? I cannot see. I should like to hear some particularity in the objections to the contract. As to the limit of exemptions from taxation, which has been criticised, I think it is most satisfactory, and I cannot see how it can be successfully attacked. Coming to section 23, which, in my opinion, is the most important section in the Bill as distinguished from the contract, we find that it reads as follows:—

The lands referred to in the contract out of which selection may be made shall be such lands only as are at the disposal of the Government at the time of selection.

Now, I would ask the particular attention of gentlemen on both sides of the House to this. Under this section, if Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie postpone selection of these lands for six years or three years, then any person who may have applied for or staked out claims on this land will have a prior right to these contractors. Unless Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie, immediately on building the road and complying with the terms of their contract, make selection of their land, the Government may in the meantime dispose of the land in any manner, just as they could have done five years ago. If hon. gentlemen would bear that section of the contract in mind, I think it would give a different colour entirely to the conditions of this agreement. Coming to the contract which is incorporated in the Bill, we find that the usual stringent expressions are inserted. I cannot, for the life of me, see why any hon. gentleman should contend that the terms of the first section are indefensible. It will not do for hon. gentlemen simply to say that these terms are indefensible; we want something more definite than that. The latter part of the section says:

Provided also, that the location of said railway between the points mentioned shall be such as the contractors may decide upon without filing plans thereof prior to completion, provided that the grant of land hereby contracted for shall not be made upon a larger mileage than the Minister of Railways considers reasonably necessary for traversing the distance between the terminal points.

The point is being raised that, inasmuch as Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie are to get 25,000 acres a mile, they may build in a circuitous way and so increase the mileage. But this section provides safeguards in the interest of the country. The Government have taken every precaution. It is said that the Government were at the mercy of the solicitor of Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie. Were he never so virtuous, the solicitor of Mann & Mackenzie would hardly insert such a section as this in the contract. Section 2, which seems to me important next to section 23 of the Bill, was read by the right hon. the leader of the House. But I wish to emphasize a section which must be read with this, and that is section 5 of the contract. I would direct the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite, who have the contract before them, particularly to this clause. Section 2 provides that the agreement shall be submitted to Parliament, and also provides for an extension northward to Dawson City, and for an extension southward to a point in British Columbia to be designated by the Government, and capable of being made an ocean port. Read with that section 5 of the contract, which states:

5. The contractors and the contractors' company shall be entitled to receive in preference to any other person or company during ten years from the said 1st of September, 1898, such aid or assistance in land or money as the Government may be authorized and may see fit to grant in aid of a line of railway from the Stikine River to an ocean port in British Columbia, provided that the contractors or contractors' company are willing to undertake the construction of the same at once and completion thereof within a reasonable time upon receiving notice thereof from the Government.

That is, for ten years the Government has the privilege of granting a subsidy to Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie for the construction of a road or the extension of this road down to an ocean port in the province of British Columbia. But I would call your attention to the fact that, in order to be entitled to the subsidy, they must begin the construction of the road at once, and complete it within a reasonable time. So, as I understand the contract, if the Government were now to instruct Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie to extend that road to Port Simpson, they would be obliged to do so, or if they did not do so, it would be a violation of the terms of the contract, and there would be no obligation on the part of the Government to give them the subsidy.

Now, I ask the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), what he finds in that important section of the contract that is indefensible. Under that section Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann have no privilege to extend the time. In order to have the preferential concession as to that subsidy, they must begin the construction of that line at once upon the Government asking them to do so. On this point, I think, some hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House have been labouring under a mistake. Now, in section 8 it is provided that contractors shall immediately construct a practicable sleigh road upon which no tolls are to be collected. I cannot see anything indefensible in that section.

The contractors or the contractors' company shall provide, or arrange with others to provide, steamboat transport of freight and passengers between the terminus of said railway on Teslin Lake, or other terminus northerly thereof, and Dawson City to and fro.

I cannot see anything indefensible in that section. Then, coming down to section 3, as to the land :

Upon the incorporation of such company and upon the assignment by the contractors to such company of this agreement, and upon the said company covenanting with the Government to carry out the same, and upon the said railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake being completed and accepted as aforesaid, the contractors should then and not before be relieved from personal responsibility hereunder, and the company should be thereafter deemed to be the parties of the second part hereto in lieu of the contractors, and shall be bound as such, and be entitled to their rights hereunder.

So that, unless all these conjunctive things are done and done together, the company are not in a position to ask the Government to perform its part of the contract, and the company will have violated and committed a breach of the contract unless they do all these things. As I said before, they are conjunctive, and they are conditions precedent to the acquirement of these lands. Now the company are not to get one acre of the land grant unless they comply with all these provisions. Section 11 deals with the conditions which must be complied with before the company can get a grant of this land. I would like hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House to remember that not one foot of this vast acreage is to be vested in the company unless the railroad has been fully completed and accepted, and unless, in addition, the company have gone to work and selected their lands. They must complete the road, that road must be accepted, and they must select their lands before they can get possession of one acre; so that the Government has taken every precaution possible, and I really cannot see that there is anything indefensible in that section of the contract. Then, section 13 provides :

The contractors should make selection of one-half of the lands to which they become entitled under this contract, within three years from the 1st day of September, 1898, and of the remainder within six years of that date.

Mr. MORRISON.

And by the next section free navigation, and the rights of traffic along those navigable streams are retained. Now, until Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie will have completed all these terms, which may cover a number of years, the Government are permitted by this contract to dispose of these lands to whomsoever they please; and if the great influx of people which is imminent, takes place, and if these people take up claims, as they have a right to do, up to the 1st of September—and nobody can stop them—where does the tremendous advantage which hon. gentlemen opposite have been declaiming about, accrue to Mann & Mackenzie? That is a question that surprises me. Thousands of people will go in there, all of whom will stake out claims, and those claims will have a prior right to the claims of Mann & Mackenzie, who cannot, at any rate conveniently, before July, start in to acquire one foot of that land, and so shut out other people. Then, take section 18. In this section the word "reserve" is used, which must be distinguished from "being granted."

So soon as any ten continuous miles of said railway between Stikine River and Teslin Lake have been completed and in running order and certified so to be by an officer named by the Minister of Railways in that behalf, the contractors may select—

They cannot buy, but they may select.

—ninety-two thousand one hundred and sixty acres, or two blocks of land hereunder, and thereupon such blocks shall be reserved by the Government—

Not granted by the Government, not disposed of by the Government, but reserved. After the full completion of the contract by Mann & Mackenzie, the land grant shall be reserved from sale or location, and upon the completion from time to time of ten miles of railway, the contractors shall have a similar right to select 92,160 acres, or two blocks, which shall thereupon be similarly reserved, not granted.

And upon the completion of the said railway and acceptance thereof, by the Government as completed, the blocks so reserved shall be granted to the contractors.

All these conditions precedent must be complied with by Mackenzie & Mann before one foot of land is alienated by the Government of Canada, and the Government will see, and we shall all see, that the contractors do comply with the requirements of this contract.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understood the hon. gentleman to refer to a number of clauses of this contract, and to say that the land grant was conditional upon the performance by the contractors of all these provisions. Am I correct in understanding the hon. gentleman to say that the obtaining of this land grant is conditional upon the performance of the provisions of section 5, or of section 6, or of section 8, or of section 9, of the contract ?

Mr. MORRISON. I mean to say that this contract is not divisible ; I mean to say that, having in view section 3, which states :

Upon the incorporation of said company and upon the assignment by the contractors to such company of this agreement, and upon the said company covenanting with the Government to carry out the same—

What does the word "same" mean ?

—--and upon the said railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake being completed and accepted as aforesaid the contractors shall then, but not before, be relieved from personal responsibility hereunder, and the company shall be thereafter deemed to be the party of the second part hereto in lieu of the contractors and shall be bound as such, and be entitled to their rights hereunder.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Of course, I do not desire to argue with the hon. gentleman ; I merely want to understand what he means. I think one paragraph of the contract provides that they shall build a sleigh road, that is in clause 8 ; they shall immediately construct a practicable sleigh road. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to argue, that if they do not construct that sleigh road, but perform every other part of the work, they forfeit the land grant ?

Mr. MORRISON. No ; I do not think the hon. gentleman can put any such construction as that upon my contention, because that is not the section that goes to the root of the contract. The subject matter of this contract is a railway, and not a sleigh road ; the work for which they are to receive this 25,000 acres of land per mile is the railway, and these other sections I mentioned refer to the railway.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Permit me to ask—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Of course, I cannot ask the question unless I have the hon. gentleman's permission.

Mr. MORRISON. You have my entire permission.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). With regard to clause 9 of the contract, which says that the contractors shall provide or arrange with others to provide steamboat transport of freight and passengers ?

Mr. MORRISON. I have precisely the same answer to make to that clause ; it is one that does not go to the root of the matter.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Then, will the hon. gentleman state which of the clauses of the contract are of the character that he mentioned a moment ago ?

Mr. MORRISON. I read the clauses of the contract which are the backbone and substance of the contract, which go to the root of the matter, and a breach of which would be a breach of the contract. I refer the hon. gentleman to these, as I do not wish to go over them and repeat them.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not wish the hon. gentleman to go over them, would he merely name them by number ?

Mr. MORRISON. I have mentioned them one after another. I could not repeat them in the order in which I gave them before. There is no hon. gentleman in the House whom I would more willingly oblige than the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, but I think he is asking me too much when he asks me to go over the arguments and repeat what I have said in his hearing. If I was not speaking in a manner audible to him, I cannot help it. I decline to repeat, word for word, what I have just completed saying. The hon. gentleman has the right of reply, and I invite his criticism of my arguments. If there is any particular point which he did not understand, I shall be pleased to go over that point again.

But I do not intend to go again over every section which I have already discussed. I have endeavoured as explicitly as possible to explain the principal sections of the contract and to show that they are by no means indefensible, and those which are not salient sections I have not read, but they likewise are not open to objection. I am very sorry the hon. gentleman has interrupted me as he has done. I was going on to say that the road must be completed and that the conditions precedent must be complied with before one acre of land is alienated. That was the point with which I was dealing when I was interrupted by the hon. member for Halifax. I drew attention to that section—that these conditions precedent must be complied with before an acre of land is alienated ; and it is that point which is disturbing hon. gentlemen opposite. Unless these conditions are complied with and sections are taken up by Mackenzie & Mann, those sections may be taken up by miners in advance. Again, there is a section providing for the reservation of arable lands. There are arable lands within the Yukon district, and it is a very wise provision for the Government to reserve them. Then there is section 24 in regard to water rights—and every one acquainted with a mining country knows the extreme value of such a right—as follows :—

Water available for hydraulic or placer mining on the contractors' lands, or on Government lands, shall be used by those mining on such lands under such regulations as may be established by or under the authority of the Governor in Council for the purpose of securing an equitable and fair division and use thereof.

This affords additional evidence that the Government throughout the whole contract have taken every precaution to protect the public and particularly the miners' interests in the Yukon. I thank hon. gentlemen opposite and the leader for their kind indulgence in consenting to the adjournment of the debate last night, and also for the indulgence shown by both sides of the House during my remarks this afternoon.

Mr. OLIVER. I am very much obliged to the hon. member for Westminster (Mr. Morrison) for the attention he has paid me in discussing the merits of the arguments that I have placed before the House, but I apologize sincerely to the House for having been the occasion of so much waste of time. However, I hope the House will consider that I at least was innocent in the matter. I shall not follow the example of the hon. gentleman and traverse the statements made or alleged arguments put forward. I made certain statements to this House as matters of fact, as information for the House, without regard to politics or principles, but simply as conveying information which was within my knowledge. In so far only as the hon. gentleman's contradiction of my statement of facts is concerned, will I trouble the House to follow his argument. I stated, and the whole weight of my opposition to the present contract rests on this point, that owing to geographical considerations the Dominion of Canada is not in a position to benefit from the demand for food products that would arise in the Yukon, if the only means of communication with the Yukon was by the route from the Pacific Coast. That statement is either correct or incorrect; it can be proved or disproved, and upon the truth of that statement I rest my case. The hon. gentleman only controverts my statement on the ground that British Columbia is a reasonable source of food supply for the Yukon. He does not contradict the statement as regards any other part of Canada, that Manitoba and the North-west are necessarily the only sources of food supply. He says that British Columbia is a possible and probable source of food supply for the Yukon, and the hon. gentleman quoted from the Trade and Navigation Returns in proof of this assertion. If British Columbia does not at present produce enough to support its population, it has no food products to export to the Yukon, and if it does produce more than is sufficient for the population of the province, its being on the sea-coast, the Trade and Navigation Returns must necessarily show the facts. I have examined the Trade and Navigation Returns and this is what I find in the returns for 1897. The total imports of British Columbia for that year entered for home consumption, were of the value of $6,926,000. Of this amount I find that products to the value of $4,117,373 came from the United States, which I hold proves my point, namely, that the food products used in British Columbia itself to a large extent come from the United States, and British Columbia, therefore, has no food products to export to the Yukon. As a matter of fact in the settled parts of British Columbia the United States is the competitor of the North-west in supplying that country with food; and if the United States can compete with the North-west in supplying the settled portion of the province, certainly it will compete under much favourable circumstances over the proposed route to the Yukon. As to the trade in food products to the Yukon, it may be worth while to say a word. Take the population to be in the Yukon at 50,000. Those people will use 1,000 pounds of food per man per year, and that food at the point of production would be worth anywhere from $100 to $200. In other words, taking the lowest estimate as to the population of the Yukon, the trade in food products will be worth $10,000,000 yearly, and the question before the House is whether that $10,000,000 of trade shall be done by the United States or by our North-west.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) raised the issue that I was speaking from a local standpoint and counselled me that I should have spoken from a national standpoint. In that regard I am prepared to stand comparison with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) himself. There are three constituencies on the Pacific Coast, one of them represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Morrison,) which are directly interested in the Yukon trade by way of the proposed coast route. It is a matter of fact and it is acknowledged on all hands, that every other constituency in the Dominion of Canada is more interested in an interior route. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) feels that he is justified in supporting the case of three constituencies on the Pacific Coast, as against the rest of the Dominion, and if he thinks that that is not local politics, then, Mr. Speaker, I hope I am justified in supporting the wants and needs of the rest of the Dominion on the ground that neither is that merely local politics.

Let me say this in regard to the attacks that have been made on my position as to the merits of the bargain itself, by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) and the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Fitzpatrick). In the remarks which I made the other day, I did not speak of the Edmonton route, nor did I suggest a route from the eastern side of the Rocky Mountains to the Yukon. I did not mention it for the reason that I did not think it was necessary to my argument, but seeing that these two gentlemen have mentioned it, and seeing that they have taken up the time of the House about it, which I was too modest to do, I think I may be justified in following their example and so I shall refer to it now. I have just a few words to say to correct some slight misapprehensions which seem to have arisen in regard to this route, and as to the position taken by myself and others towards it. In the first place, it has been taken for granted that we east of the mountains are demanding that the Dominion of Canada should build a railroad from Edmonton to Dawson City, a distance of 1,500 miles. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that neither I nor any one else whom I know has made any such demand upon the Government of the day.

We are willing to recognize the limitations of the resources of the Dominion; we are willing to recognize the possibility of mining in the Yukon not being permanent, and we are willing to recognize the desirability of a road being built in from the Pacific Coast. I entirely disclaim the position in which the hon. member for Westminster (Mr. Morrison) seeks to put me when he says I am against the coast route and that the people in favour of the eastern route are necessarily against the western. What we do ask, Mr. Speaker, is that when the resources of this country are being pledged for the purpose of inducing trade from the United States into the Yukon, the trade of our own country should have equal facilities or equal consideration at least. We do not ask the Government of the day to build a railroad to Dawson City. The very modest request was made that the Government should open up a pack trail, or possibly a wagon road from Edmonton to Pelly River, which stands to this route in the same position as Teslin Lake does to the coast route. That was the sole demand that has been made on the Government in behalf of the eastern route, and if that demand should be granted the House and the country can rest assured that there never was an expenditure made by the Dominion of Canada that gave such a good return to the treasury of the country, and to the trade and manufactures of the country, as will that comparatively trifling expenditure.

The hon. Solicitor General estimated that the cost of a railroad over the Edmonton route would be something like $30,000,000. Let me correct him. The broad gauge, substantially built railroad that runs from Calgary north to Edmonton cost $12,000 per mile, according to the statement of the construction company. If that railroad had been built on the principle and standard of the proposed Teslin Lake road, I suppose it could have been built for $8,000 a mile, so that the distance of 1,000 miles from Edmonton to the navigable waters of Pelly River would cost $8,000 multiplied by 1,000 miles; or in all $8,000,000 would build a railroad from Edmonton to the navigable waters of Pelly River which would give the food trade of that country to eastern Canada, and would give our eastern railroad system direct communication with the Yukon. I maintain, Sir, that such a railroad would secure to the Dominion of Canada practically every dollar's worth of the trade of that country. It would make Canada mistress in her own house, so that we would have no questions to ask a foreign country as to bonding privileges, or as to the control of a foreign country over our actions. If there are any international complications likely to arise, the remedy for these international complications is to build a road over what is unquestionably our own territory for the benefit of our own trade.

Since I last spoke on this question, Mr. Speaker, the Teslin Lake project has taken on a new phase. At that time, it was expected that there would only be the construction of 150 miles of railway. That was all that was asked for and the resources of the Dominion were pledged to that. Since then, however, it has transpired that such is not the project, but that the project is now to extend the line on the Pacific Coast to Alice Arm, a distance as the crow flies of 350 miles from Teslin Lake, and considering that there are one or two mountain ranges to cross, and considering that the country has never yet been even explored much less surveyed, there is every probability that a proper railroad cannot be built between those two points in a less distance than 450 miles. Now then, Sir, I leave it to this House to judge, if it is not cheaper, if it will not in the very nature of things cost this country less money—suppose we should look at it from the point of view of the cost alone—to build a railroad from Edmonton to Pelly River than to build from Alice Arm to Teslin Lake. The present estimate of the cost of the Stikine Railway is $25,000 per mile. Figure out 450 miles at $25,000 a mile, and 1,000 miles from Edmonton at $8,000 a mile, and you will find that it takes less to build the 1,000 miles than the 450 miles. Remember that the building of the 1,000 miles of road from the interior would give the entire trade of the Yukon to Canada, and would make Canada supreme politically in that country. Sir, if two weeks ago there was a reason for supporting the interior route (the Edmonton route if you like to call it), that reason is ten times stronger to-day in view of the further light we have received on this question.

A word as to the practicability of the Edmonton route. It has been said that there is necessity for further exploration there and that the country is not known. Let me tell this honourable House that every foot of the country from Edmonton to the navigable waters of the Pelly River has been traversed, has been surveyed, has been mapped, has been reported upon by officials of this country; and those maps and reports are still extant, and the men who made them are still in the employ of this country. In view of this fact, it is unreasonable to say that the country is not known or that this Parliament cannot have any idea of what the construction of a pack trail, a wagon road or a railroad from Edmonton to the navigable waters of the Pelly River would cost. I understand that before this Parliament rises, and before there is any possibility of having the route explored or surveyed, a sum of money is likely to be voted for a railway from Alice Arm to Telegraph Creek. At the present time there is no exploration, there is no survey of that country, there is practically no official knowledge of it. That, Mr. Speaker, is all I have to say about the Edmonton route. It is not I who have intruded it upon this House or the country; but I think it is only reasonable, when such vast interests are involved, that I should say that much in reply to the arguments of the hon. member for New Westminster.

Another point I would refer to is this. The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) said that, in any scheme for the construction of a railway to the Yukon, the proposed line from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake would be a necessary part. I regret to have to differ from the hon. gentleman. I say that a road from Edmonton to the navigable waters of the Yukon River would not go to Teslin Lake or Telegraph Creek, unless it went 250 miles out of its way. A wagon road could reach the navigable waters of the Pelly River, which is the main branch of the Yukon River, by a shorter distance from Edmonton than it could reach Teslin Lake if it went by Telegraph Creek.

In regard to my assurance in taking up the time of the House upon a local question, upon a question which the hon. gentleman says affects only the district which I represent, I would like to ask: Since when has it become a cause of offence in this House that a member should speak on behalf of the constituency he represents? If I understand the duty of a representative in this House, Mr. Speaker, it is to represent the interests of the constituency which has elected him; and I hope that duty does not rest more lightly on me because of the fact that the constituency which I have the honour to represent contains such a very large proportion of the total area of this great Dominion, and such a very large proportion of the valuable agricultural and pastoral lands of this Dominion. But, let me say, I am not speaking only for the district of Alberta, and I was careful in all that I said to show that I was not so speaking. What is the interest of Alberta in this matter is the interest of Manitoba, Assiniboia and Saskatchewan. It is the interest of the whole of that central Canada which extends from Rat Portage to the Rocky Mountains—that agricultural area upon whose development the progress of the Dominion depends. Every point in that area—Winnipeg, Brandon, Regina, Prince Albert, Edmonton—is affected by this question of getting a market in the Yukon country for the products of the North-west. It is a question, Mr. Speaker, of a home market for that country. You know how the farmers of eastern Canada have been persuaded to vote for certain measures in the hope of getting a home market for their products. No doubt they thought it was of value to them, and no doubt it was. I am not going to say it was not; but I say it is as important to the farmers of the North-west that they should get the home market which the trade of the Yukon country will afford to them, as it was for the farmers of eastern Canada to get their home market. That is what we say. We want the benefit of the natural home market for the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. If that is parish politics, it is big enough politics for me, as long as I am a member of this House. If it is possible to secure to the Dominion of Canada the trade in food products of the Yukon, if it is possible to obtain for the farmers of the North-west Territories $10,000,000 of extra trade, $10,000,000 of a home market for their products, this year or next year, I ask, am I not justified in coming before this House and discussing that proposition? Am I speaking locally or discussing parish politics, when I do so? What have we heard in this House since the North-west Territories were first brought into the Dominion? What did we hear when the Canadian Pacific Railway was being built? When any great project is brought before this House, the main argument put forward in its favour is, that it will help to develop and fill up the North-west, because everybody recognizes that the filling up of the North-west means prosperity to the whole Dominion. So I say, here is an opportunity to secure a home market for the farmers of the North-west and thus to add to the prosperity of the whole Dominion that is not offered by any other project known to this country at the present time. There is no other project before the Dominion at the present time that will add so much to the prosperity of the Dominion as the opening up of the Yukon country by an eastern trade route. Let me here read an extract stating a fact which some hon. members of this House ought to know something about. This is a telegram from Victoria, B.C., dated March 3rd:

In supporting a resolution moved by the president of the Victoria Board of Trade, that the Canadian Government build a line from some British Columbia port to connect with the Stikine-Teslin Railway, Mr. R. Stein, secretary of the Vancouver Board of Trade, said he had calculated that at the rate of trade now being done, $24,000,000 was being lost to British Columbia yearly.

This is surely a trade worth having, and worth incurring some slight expenditure to secure. This is not a trade with regard to which the members of this House will be justified in taking the position of agnostics, of know-nothings; from which they do not know whether there is any money to be made or not, or whether they will be justified in expending any portion of the resources of this country to secure. If it is parish politics to endeavour to secure a trade of $24,000,000 a year, then, Mr. Speaker, this is parish politics.

In regard to the point made by the hon. member for New Westminster, that I was arguing unduly against the interests of the Pacific Coast, when I objected to the gold lands east of the mountains being taken for a road that could only benefit the country west of the mountains, I might turn the argument another way, and say that, for the sake of securing the outfitting trade to the Yukon for two western cities, the hon. gentleman demands that the gold lands east of the mountains shall be hypothecated, as well as those of the west. It seems to me that it is not we who are making an unreasonable demand, if I may go so far, it is they who are doing so. We do not oppose the granting of assistance by this country to the opening up of a road to the coast. We do not begrudge Victoria or Vancouver their share of the outfitting trade, but in face of the fact declared by a Victoria merchant, that we are losing $24,000,000 a year in trade, which should be ours, and which is being done by the Americans, I should think that the people of British Columbia would be perfectly willing to allow an effort to be made to secure for the people of the eastern provinces a share, at any rate, of that trade which at present we have lost. If $24,000,000 of trade is to be fought for, surely we and they may each fight our own battles, and there is plenty room for both of us, especially if, after doing the best we can, the United States are going to get the greater share. At any rate, despite all the hon. gentleman has said, there is no cause of complaint on the part of the people of the Pacific Coast against the Edmonton route, or against any means whereby the producers of Canada in the interior can secure the market of the Yukon.

Let me put our case briefly again. Our objection is not to a route from the coast, but to the coast route being used as a means of locking up the resources of the country, and we object to its being used to prevent another and better route from being opened. We are willing to support the coast route, but we ask the people of the Pacific Coast to support us. We ask them to support any reasonable efforts made to secure to the eastern part of Canada a fair share of that $24,000,000 of trade which to-day they are not getting, but which the Americans are getting, and which—if I have made a correct statement—we cannot get over the Stikine Railway. We must have other means of access to the Yukon district if we want to capture that trade, and unless we have this other means of access, that trade will remain with the United States. I believe that my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) is the only public man in British Columbia who would take the position he has taken in this House. I do not believe there is another one. I have not seen any such position taken by any of the newspapers of his province. Everybody in that province, on the contrary, wishes well to the Edmonton route, believing that there is sufficient trade in the Yukon district for all parts of the Dominion.

Mr. MORRISON. I trust the hon. gentleman will pardon me if I interrupt. I do not think the interpretation he has given my remarks can be borne out by anything I have said. I did not oppose the Edmonton route, but studiously avoided doing so, and I hope the hon. gentleman will do me the justice of not misconstruing or misinterpreting what I said.

Mr. OLIVER. I did not quote the hon. gentleman, but merely stated the impression which his remarks made on my mind, and that certainly is the impression which they did make. I have no desire to go into figures to any great extent, but since the hon. gentleman challenged the correctness of the statement I made with regard to British Columbia not being an exporter of food products, let me give a few of the returns that I glean from the Trade and Navigation Report. I find that in the year ending June, 1897, the export of barley from British Columbia was 31 bushels; oatmeal, 1 barrel; hay, 4 tons; oats, 71 bushels.

Mr. MORRISON. I would ask the hon. gentleman to give me the page of the Trade and Navigation Returns from which he quoted.

Mr. OLIVER. They are the pages preceding and following that from which he took his return, showing that British Columbia exported 63,000 bushels of wheat.

Mr. MORRISON. How much was exported from Alberta in the same time? Will the hon. gentleman read that?

Mr. OLIVER. It is not a question of Alberta, but of the products of the agricultural region extending from Rat Portage to the Rocky Mountains. But for the hon. gentleman's further information, I find that British Columbia exported four tons of hay, ten horses, one head of cattle; swine, none; sheep, none; poultry, 130. At the same time, let me tell him that my hon. friend from Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) informs me that the export of wheat from his riding last season was 3,000,000 bushels.

I have taken up the time of the House longer than I intended. The case I put, is that the people of the Dominion want the benefits of the trade of the Yukon in agricultural products, directly and indirectly, and that that trade, which will amount to anything from ten million dollars to twenty-four million dollars, we cannot get by any proposition giving a line of communication only to the coast; that for Canada to get her share of that trade there must be some line of communication from the interior. That is my whole case and position, and I submit it without prejudice to the Government or the action of the Government in the matter. I put it before the House as strongly as I can, in the belief that the Government have not considered the question in that light, and since it has been put before them and has the approval of the House, to a very large extent. I hope the Government will consider that it is necessary and desirable to take the only means whereby that trade in food products for the Yukon can be secured to Canada.

Mr. QUINN. If any excuse, Mr. Speaker, were required—which I do not admit—for the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. and senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), it would be found in the speech which has just been made by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). He, like myself, joined issue with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison), who seems to have the misfortune of running foul of nearly every member who has ventured to speak on any subject to which my hon. friend addresses himself. The hon. gentleman was not happy in his remarks, particularly in his opening remarks. For example, last night he, a mere tyro in politics—sitting here for the first, second, or possibly, as myself, the third session—began his address by stating that he would not attempt to answer what had been said by the hon. member who preceded him—a member of twenty years' experience in this House—because what that hon. member said was not worthy of a reply.

Mr. MORRISON. I wish at this juncture—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. QUINN. We can understand that such language coming from one whose leader—

Mr. MORRISON. I wish to state—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MORRISON. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is attributing to me a remark which I did not make, and I think that, in justice to myself, he ought to give me the opportunity of setting him right, and not persist in attributing to me words I did not use.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is not a point of order.

Mr. MORRISON. It was merely a personal explanation which I desire to make.

Mr. QUINN. I do not pretend that I have used the exact language used by the hon. member. It is not such language as would fasten itself in my mind, as it is language altogether foreign to my nature and to the nature of hon. members who carry on debate in this House. But for the benefit of the hon. gentleman—not for the enlightenment of the House or for the elevation of debate—I will read exactly what he said :

I do not rise for the purpose of replying to the last speaker, for the simple reason that there is nothing to reply to.

These were his opening words. I say I do not wonder at such language coming from a gentleman who follows a leader who boasts that in that part of the country from which he comes, "the wild and woolly west," as he calls it, certain proceedings are followed which are not recognized in the effete east.

But I think that the hon. member, and even his hon. leader might with satisfaction benefit themselves, and certainly do credit to the House, by sitting in silence for a while and taking some lessons from this effete east in the proper methods of debating subjects in the Canadian Parliament. This is all the attention I intend to give to the hon. member or his remarks, except to point out that he was equally unfortunate with the hon. member who has just sat down. Whatever may have been his intentions in the opening remarks I have quoted as to the Edmonton route, there is no doubt that he was very unhappy in his expressions, because the hon. member who has just sat down understood him to say that he was opposed to the Edmonton route. It may be that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) is not accustomed to speak in the House of Commons. Though a practising barrister, I understand he is only accustomed to speak in certain courts where the audience is usually not such as is to be found in the House of Commons or in the higher courts. He may in that way become master of a certain style of expression which does not either adequately reflect his ideas or impress his hearers.

Before speaking on the merits of this question, I should like to refer to some of the incidents of the debate. What I call incidents of the debate are subjects which have been dragged into this discussion, so to speak, by different members of the Government, for one purpose or another; probably, as I think, for the purpose of misleading the House and the country as to the real question before us, to lead the public on a false track, and to defend themselves before the people by pretending that the Conservative party have not been actuated by good motives in opposing the scheme which is now being agitated. The first of these incidents—and there are only three that I can remember at the present time—I would call the treaty incident, the second I would call the Hamilton Smith incident, and the third, an important incident indeed, the great solicitude that appears in the speech of nearly every Minister who has spoken as to the welfare of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, the deep and warm sympathy for them in this contract, and the earnest hope that seems to fill their hearts that these gentlemen shall make a great deal of money out of it. Beginning with the last, I will say this. There has been some fault found in this House, which I have never heard denied by any hon. member of the Government, as to relations, more than business-like relations, existing between a certain member of this company and an hon. member of the Government. Besides this, the air is charged with rumours concerning this great contract. Hon. Ministers can hardly deny that they have not heard these rumours. One need only move about the streets of Ottawa to hear the question discussed and to learn that speculation is rife as to what are the interests of the different individuals connected with this affair. The reason that will certainly be ascribed by the ordinary voter of this country for this great solicitude on the part of so many members of the Government is that there is really more behind the Mackenzie & Mann contract than mere consideration for the personal interest of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, something akin to personal interest on the part of hon. gentlemen who feel this solicitude.

Mr. BRITTON. I rise to a point of order. I am not very familiar with the rules of debate in this House, but I should like to know if it is in order for an hon. member to insinuate corruption, for that is what the hon. member (Mr. Quinn) means—he must mean that if he means anything—against members of the Government in their dealings with public contractors.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I was just going to draw the attention of the hon. member (Mr. Quinn) to the fact that such charges should not be made, if made at all in the form in which he puts them. I do not think the hon. member should make insinuations without making direct charges concerning which proof can be offered.

Mr. QUINN. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that I have committed the fault of making insinuations. It is certainly not my nature to make insinuations and not make direct charges. I simply wished to put the members of the Government in possession of the rumours that are flying about. I say that the members of the Government surely cannot be blind or deaf to the these things; and I say that if these rumours remain uncontradicted until this debate closes, in all probability they will reach the electorate and be believed by them. I do not say that there is anything in them.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) would be justified in making insinuations of corruption against members of the Government, basing those insinuations upon rumours.

Mr. QUINN. Mr. Speaker, I am not making any insinuations, I simply made a statement of fact that these rumours are prevalent, that they exist, and I wish to put the Government in possession of the fact, if they do not know it already. Now, Sir, the next point to which I would refer is the treaty question. It has been stated more than once here by hon. members on the other side of the House that the Opposition have been traitors to this country because they have given reason to the United States to interfere with the rights of Canada at Port Wrangel and on the Stikine. It has even been said that the leader of the Opposition has shown himself a craven by wishing to strike his colours at the very first blow that has been made at Canada by the United States Senate. It has also been said by hon. gentlemen opposite that this question of the treaty was introduced by members on this side of the House for the purpose of leading the House astray, and of leading the country astray, as to the position which Canada occupied in regard to this matter. Now, I wish to show that any question that arose in this House as to the rights of Canada at Fort Wrangel under the treaty, came up for the first time when the Minister of Railways and Canals introduced this Bill and asked for its first reading. In doing so I do not think it necessary for me to preface my remarks by saying that the Minister of Railways and Canals at that moment spoke for the Government of this country. He did not speak, I presume, in his individual capacity but spoke for the Government; and if it were necessary for me to cite authority for that, I would simply cite the hon. Minister himself when, in answer to the ex-Minister of Finance, and in speaking on this very question, he stated that the Government did or did not know such and such things about it. I would therefore refer first, to pages 201, 202 and 203 of the "Hansard," where hon. gentlemen will find the position that the Government took upon this question on February 8, 1898. The information of the Government at that time, I take it, ought to have been perfect, when they undertook to put before this House a proposition, and ask the assent of this House to a proposition, involving the first reading of a Bill containing the contract between the Government and Mackenzie & Mann, and the charter to incorporate a company of which they were to be the head. At that time, on the 8th February, 1898, the Minister of Railways and Canals said:

In order to utilize that route, vessels will reach the ocean port in closest proximity to it at Fort Wrangel, a distance probably of not more than 150 miles from Telegraph Creek to Glenora.

Mr. FOSTER. In what territory is Fort Wrangel?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think it is probably in United States territory; at all events, they claim it, and they are in possession of it, and have a customs port at Fort Wrangel. But the Stikine River, whose waters we propose to use, is a river that, under treaty with that country, we are entitled to use without being subject to any conditions. Navigation upon it is open to us as it is open to them.

So that if hon. members will look over their "Hansards" they will find that at that moment, for the first time, the question of the treaty between the two countries was introduced and brought into this debate. Therefore the Opposition is not responsible for having dragged the treaty question into this debate; but the Minister of Railways and Canals, and through him the Government, has dragged in the question of the treaty, and made it a point which ought to be discussed in the consideration of this contract before the House. More light is thrown upon the question by reading a little further in that same speech of the Minister of Railways and Canals. We find him expressing himself so clearly and so forcibly that Canada cannot be interfered with in the slightest degree at Fort Wrangel; so confident is he, that he says the Government did not think it necessary even to consult the Minister of Justice on the question. He says he does not know that the Minister of Justice was consulted. But if he does not know, who should know? Surely it was within the power, and moreover within the duty, of the Minister of Railways and Canals who was obliged to father the Bill, to consult the Minister of Justice. If the hon. gentleman should say: I am not the father of the Bill, I am simply its godfather, still he cannot escape the responsibility, because, so far as this House is concerned, he must assume the paternity of the Bill. He is Minister of Railways and Canals, and as this Bill deals with a railway, he is consequently responsible for it. Up to this time we find that the Minister, and consequently the Government, did not think it necessary to consult the Department of Justice or any other legal authority as to the rights of Canada at Fort Wrangel and upon the Stikine River. But after the Minister of Railways had made this extraordinary statement, the ex-Minister of Finance asked him:

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask another question for information? A vessel starting from Victoria, bound with freight and passengers for Glenora, will it be able to go to Glenora, and be able to land its goods on the wharf there for the railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Certainly not, unless it is a very shallow craft.

Mr. FOSTER. Where will it have to unship?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The ocean transit will terminate at or in the immediate neighbourhood of Fort Wrangel, near the mouth of the Stikine River.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to ask the hon. gentleman, for the sake of clearness: Does he mean to say that such goods starting from Victoria and reshipping at Fort Wrangel, a port in United States territory, and going up to Glenora, even though we have free navigation of the Stikine

Mr. QUINN.

River, will not be subject to the United States customs?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think I am quite justified in going that far, and in saying that a ship which is freighted from Victoria or Vancouver, the object of which is to effect a transshipment at or near Fort Wrangel, may do so without encountering any obstacles from customs authorities—I think so. I will show the House why I think so. I presume that if an ocean steamer proposed to land at Fort Wrangel and tie up at the wharf there and unload goods at that port, they would be subject to the customs authorities; but I know no reason myself why a craft such as is used, or any other small craft available for the transshipment of this freight by the Stikine River, should not lie alongside a steamer which carries freight from our own ports to Fort Wrangel, or to that locality, and transfer the freight from the larger to the smaller vessel, and the latter might then pass on its way. However, whether I am right or not in this, that is the condition that exists.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the House will see at once that the Minister of Railways, in making that broad statement, opened up the whole question before this House, opened up the whole question of the rights of Canada on the Stikine River and at Fort Wrangel. There was no possibility of the House escaping a discussion of this question, because it had been forced upon us by the statement of the Minister of Railways. If the statement had gone uncontradicted, why it would be said, as the members of the Government say to-day, that the Opposition in this House were responsible for all the consequences that might follow, and it would have put the Conservative party in a false position. Therefore I say that this question was dragged into this debate by the Minister of Railways and Canals, dragged in in such a way that it would be impossible for the Opposition to remain silent or to refrain from discussing it, if they wished to do justice to the question which is under discussion.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. QUINN. Mr. Speaker, I was about finishing my illustration that this question of treaties had been dragged into the debate before the House by the Minister of Railways and Canals, and I think by continuing with one or two other extracts from the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman on February 8th, I will conclude this portion of my argument.

Mr. TAYLOR. I rise to a point of order. There is not a quorum of members present.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman press the point?

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not press it.

Mr. QUINN. Immediately following the extract of the speech which I read before the House rose at six, comes this question :

Mr. FOSTER. I hope my hon. friend will not think I am interrupting him, for this matter is, by his own admission, one of very great moment. As those four routes were thrown aside by the Government because of that consideration, has the Government taken the precaution of getting an authoritative statement from the law officer of the Crown on that point ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not, Mr. Speaker, obtained any opinion from the law officer of the Crown on that subject.

Mr. FOSTER. Or has my hon. friend, or any member from the Government, got from the United States Government their contention and claim as to what would be their rights under such circumstances ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot inform the hon. gentleman what information any other member of the Government may have received upon this subject.

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the hon. gentleman excuse me a moment. We will go on with private bills.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 53) to incorporate the Prudential Life Assurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Bain.)

Bill (No. 54) respecting the Edmonton District Railway Company.—(Mr. Oliver.)

Bill (No. 55) respecting the Atlas Loan Company.—(Mr. Casey.)

Bill (No. 56) respecting the Montreal and Province Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Penny.)

Bill (No. 57) respecting the Manufacturers' Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company, and to change its name to "The Dominion of Canada Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company."—(Mr. Clarke.)

Bill (No. 58) respecting the Queenston Heights Bridge Company.—(Mr. Clarke.)

Bill (No. 59) to incorporate the Victoria Fire Insurance Company.—(Mr. Quinn.)

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. QUINN. I was about to conclude the answer of the Minister of Railways to the question put by the ex-Minister of Finance, in which the hon. gentleman said :

I am stating the case as it appears from my own knowledge and my own information with regard to it.

From these extracts which I have read it will be plain to any one that at the time the Minister of Railways and Canals introduced this Bill in this House, the Government, from his own language here, was not in a position to state that it had considered the rights of Canada at Fort Wrangel or on the Stikine River, or what interference might have been made by the Government of the United States to Canada at either of those points ; and I would remark, in parenthesis, that this was fourteen days after the contract had been signed between Mackenzie & Mann and the Government of this country. Some seven days afterwards the Minister of Railways moved the second reading of the Bill ; but in the meantime his statement on this question had caused considerable discussion not only in this House, but throughout the country. Newspapers from one end of the Dominion to the other were filled with comments on the conduct of the Government in endeavouring to enter into such a serious contract without having first provided for the transshipment, storage or handling of goods at Fort Wrangel, so that no interference on the part of the United States Government could there occur. Not only were the newspapers full of this subject, but questions were asked across the floor of the right hon. Prime Minister and other members of the Government who happened to lead at that particular moment, as to whether any arrangement had been made with the United States, or whether this question had been discussed, or whether any understanding had been arrived at between the two Governments. Consequently, when the Minister of Railways and Canals came down eight days afterwards to discuss this subject, he was thoroughly informed as to the importance of this particular point. What did he then declare ? He declared :

It may possibly be, as I have said, that the customs officers at Fort Wrangel may claim, under the regulations of the United States Government, that our transshipments should take place under their eyes. But supposing they should, what great hardship would there be in that ? What great wrong would be done to us ? That would be only fair and reasonable exercise of precautions by the United States Government, that before foreign ships should be allowed to take advantage of the right to navigate the Stikine River, which they have under treaty, the United States authorities should, in order to protect themselves against smuggling or any other frauds that might be committed by persons using that river, exercise this power of overseeing transshipment.

That was the position then taken by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), and it showed that the question had not been understood by the Government of this country, either at the time the contract was signed, or even when he addressed this House. It was only when the leader of the Opposition referred, in the most scathing terms, to the conduct of the Government, that their attention was really brought to the point, and that they realized the importance of the proposition that was set out by the hon. the leader of the Opposition. The language used by the leader of the Opposition that day was sufficiently pointed to draw the attention of even the most obtuse member of the Government to this important issue. He said :

We all recognize the ability and talent of hon. gentlemen opposite, and we know that whenever they have a semblance of a case, they will put it with all the force and all the tact in their power ; but it is only when they are brought face to face with a condition of facts for which they have no answer, that they are compelled to fall back on a policy of silence, in the hope that that will protect them. Was it or was it not right, I ask, that the people of Canada should expect this Government, before signing a contract by which they were giving 3,750,000 acres of rich gold lands to a company of contractors, to have made known to themselves what our rights at Wrangel were ? The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, that distinguished know-nothing, who has signalized himself by the introduction of this Bill, and who has again signalized himself to-day by, if possible, greater ignorance of the measure he undertook to introduce to this House, can perhaps answer. Tell me, I ask the hon. gentleman, in the presence of this House, how you dared to put your signature—he did not put his signature, he got some one else to do it—to that contract without first knowing what the rights of the people of Canada were at Fort Wrangel ? You admitted, in your speech on the introduction of the Bill, that you did not know anything about it.

The attention of the Government was drawn to the point in the most forcible language, and the Minister of the Interior did not attempt to answer the argument or attempt to explain the position of the Government, but he did attempt to draw a herring across the track by raising a discussion as to whether the Conservative or the Liberal party passed the Treaty of 1871. That question has been debated, almost to the utter exclusion of the real question as to what our rights were at Fort Wrangel and on the Stikine River. This is how the Minister of the Interior dealt with the subject (Unrevised "Hansard," February 16th, page 662) :

These hon. gentlemen are getting very restless. They know what is coming, and they do not like it. Now, will the House take cognizance of the fact that the subjects of His Britannic Majesty possessed, under this treaty with Russia, a proprietary right, for all purposes whatever, in the Stikine River until that right was interfered with by the statesmanship of our friends on the other side. These gentlemen apparently had never read this treaty. They did not know what it contained, they had not the remotest conception of what they were doing when they put this clause in the Washington Treaty, which they have been boasting about ever since the question of the Stikine River came up.

Again, he said :

We are indebted to the sublime statesmanship of our friends on the other side for the curtailing, to a very great extent, of the privileges which we did enjoy on the Stikine River. Instead of this article, which gave us an unrestricted proprietary right in the Stikine River, we have now the following :—

I assert, Sir, that at the time the contract was entered into with Mackenzie & Mann, on the 25th January, 1898, we were perfectly justified in assuming, from the language of the Minister of Railways, that the Government had not considered the question, had not taken counsel with the law officers of the Crown here, nor had they consulted or arranged with the United States Government as to the rights of Canada at Fort Wrangel and on the Stikine River. And when the attention of the Government was forcibly drawn to the fact that this was a question which deserved their attention even before they attempted to enter into this contract, the Minister of the Interior attempted to distract the attention of the House from the consideration of that very serious matter by raising a discussion as to who was responsible for the passage of the Treaty of 1871.

I shall not stop here to criticise the conduct of the Minister of the Interior, that hero of the bloodless battle of the Separate schools of Manitoba, nor shall I put him in contrast with that great statesman whose name will live in the history of Canada so long as the name of Canada is known to the world. I will not criticise the Minister of the Interior as the critic of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, whose memory will be cherished by every Canadian who has a spark of patriotism in his bosom, so long as Canada lasts. I leave it, not only to the judgment of this House, but I leave it to the judgment of our country, to watch the career of the Minister of the Interior and see, not if now in his youth, but if at any time in his life hereafter, he shall attain a position which will even be in touching distance of the heel of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald.

Now, Sir, I shall pass to another question incident to this debate, a question which, as another spectre or bogey, has been raised by the Government for the purpose of distracting the attention of the people of Canada from the proper consideration of the merits of this contract. I refer to the Hamilton Smith incident. Every member of this House will recollect how the name of Mr. Hamilton Smith came up for discussion at all. My hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) was making a speech on this Bill, and that day an article appeared in the Montreal "Star," saying that Mr. Hamilton Smith and Mr. Bratnober had made a proposition to the Government for the building of a line into the Yukon, which proposition had been refused. In the course of his speech, the hon. member (Mr. Clarke) asked the Minister who was leading the House, if such were true. That was the first time that the name of Mr. Hamilton Smith had been mentioned in the debate ; and I do not know that it was even mentioned at that time in the "Star," that Mr. Hamilton Smith represented the Rothschilds ; I do not think it was. At any rate, the answer was then given by the Minister, that there had been no negotiations with Mr. Hamilton Smith in connection with a railway into the Yukon. After a while it was proven here that the proposition had been made within a short time—either before or after the introduction of this Bill—by Mr. Hamilton Smith for the building of a road—this very road, I think. There was no question at that time that Mr. Hamilton Smith or his associates represented the Rothschilds, and it did not enter into the merits of his proposition whether he represented Lord Rothschild or Lord anybody else.

It was simply a proposition made to the Government by a man professing to have sufficient financial standing to carry out a large undertaking like this, offering to build this railroad for a very much smaller figure than that which had been offered by the contract to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. There was no question about whom he represented. It was not the interest of any one to know whom he represented, so long as it could be established that he was a responsible individual. The question for the Government to consider at that time was not whether Mr. Smith represented Mr. Jones or Mr. Robinson or anybody else, but to consider whether he was a responsible man. Yet, from the conduct of the right hon. Prime Minister in this case, it appeared that the question was to get a denial from the representative of Canada in London, of a statement that was never made by Mr. Hamilton Smith, that is, that he was the representative of the Rothschilds. Not only this, but the right hon. Prime Minister, after he had promised to bring before this House the telegram which called forth the answer from Lord Strathcona which has been read to this House, backed down from the position he had taken and said: "It is a private telegram, and I cannot produce it." If the telegram that was sent to Lord Strathcona was a private telegram, the answer to that telegram was a private telegram. You cannot say that a telegram sent to a man is private, and that the answer to that telegram is a public document. No one can tell what importance to attach to the answer without seeing the telegram which drew forth that answer. It matters not who the gentleman may be whose name is signed at the bottom of the telegram which has been read in this House, what guarantee have we, what guarantee has the Prime Minister that this message was signed by Lord Strathcona? The right hon. gentleman certainly has not given any guarantee to this House, because he refuses to produce the telegram that would give it authenticity and make it pass current here, that is, the document to which it was an answer. But, as I said before, the question before us was not whether Mr. Smith represented Lord Rothschild or not. The question was whether Mr. Smith was a man of sufficient financial importance to carry out the undertaking. The Government could have found that out very easily. A private member of this House, within twenty-four hours of the receipt of the answer from Lord Strathcona, produced before this House ample proof of the financial responsibility of Mr. Hamilton Smith. I have no hesitation in saying that that hon. gentleman had that information in his possession some days before he gave it to this House. Now, if a private member of this House could obtain that information regarding Mr. Hamilton Smith, how much more easily could the Government of this country have obtained it, just in the way they obtained a denial of a statement that was never made by Mr. Smith? I quote now from "Hansard," at page 1047, from the remarks of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). He said:

I found that Mr. Hamilton Smith is a gentleman who is entrusted in England with a contract amounting in value to £4,000,000 sterling—that is about $20,000,000, or about six times what it is calculated by the Government will be sufficient to build this Yukon Railway. He has associated with him in this offer a gentleman by the name of Harry Mosenthal. That gentleman, I find, on application to the banking community, is the head of the large firm of Mosenthal Bros., and is reputed to be worth, in his own name, no less a sum than $5,000,000, or £1,000,000 sterling. I also find that he has associated with him in this offer a gentleman—and he is not a New York man either—by the name of J. H. Lukach, who signs on behalf of an exploration company which has a paid-up capital of £1,100,000 sterling, and whose assets are estimated at no less a sum than £2,000,000 sterling. In addition to these, I find, among the applicants for this contract, Mr. Herbert Gibbs, who, I am informed, is a member of the firm of Anthony Gibbs & Sons. Their exact rating I was not able to obtain, but I found that they are one of the most reliable and richest houses in London. Then I come to Mr. Lionel Phillipps, another of the applicants, who is a member of the firm of Wernhor, Beid & Company, who are rated as the very richest financial firm in the whole city of London. The next gentleman I find on the list of Mr. Smith's associates is Lord Farquhar. It may be that the hon. gentleman from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) looks upon him as an American, but he was the late head of the firm of Sir Samuel Scott & Company, and was a partner in that firm with the Duke of Fife. He is, I understand, one of the rich men of England.

There is information which would be of inestimable value to the Government if they had any intention of obtaining the construction of the road which we are discussing for the least possible money. There is the information obtained by a private member of this House within a few days of the first time the name of Mr. Hamilton Smith was mentioned; and I say that when a private member of this House could obtain that information so readily, how much more readily could the Government of this country, by communication with its representative in London, have obtained the information—not that this man did not represent Lord Rothschild, whom he never pretended to represent, but that he was a man able to carry out not only this contract, but any other contract in connection with this railroad that the Government might think proper to place in his hands.

But there is no question of doubt, Mr. Speaker, this is another case of an attempt to draw a herring across the trail. This is another attempt on the part of the Government to mislead the people, to distract their attention from the consideration of the contract, to make it appear before this country that an enormous crime has been committed by Mr. Hamilton Smith, that is, that he told a lie, that he made a false representation about Lord Rothschild. The people of this country will not think whether Mr. Smith made any such representation or not. They are too intelligent to be led astray on that point. They can read the statement in the letter sent by Mr. Smith, that he never pretended to represent Lord Rothschild, and they can see that this is—I will not say a subterfuge on the part of the Government, but I cannot find another word in the English language to characterize such conduct, and I leave it to the imagination of hon. members to say what it is. It certainly is not a straight and fair way of putting a question before this House. I cannot but regret that the right hon. Prime Minister, when asked to lay on the Table of this House the original telegram which he sent to Lord Strathcona, which brought forth the answer which was read to this House, and when told that he was bound in honour to produce it, said that he would be the guardian of his own honour, that he was responsible to the world for his own honour. But, Sir, the honour of the Prime Minister of Canada, if you will allow me to say so, is not in his own personal keeping. The honour of the Prime Minister of Canada is as dear to every Canadian as it is to the individual himself. It is not his property. It is my property; it is the property of every hon. gentleman on this side of the House, because we have a proper feeling in this regard. It is the property of every gentleman on this side of the House, and in public matters every hon. member on this side will guard it just as jealously as he would his own. I regretted to hear the right hon. gentleman say that he alone was the guardian of his honour. No, Sir, the First Minister of Canada is the property of every citizen in this country. To every citizen in Canada he is responsible, and he should rather remember the words of the poet:

Honour and fame from no condition rise,
Act well thy part, there all true honour lies.

Having, therefore, proven that the attempts which were made to distract the attention of the country from the consideration of this most unfortunate contract, did not come from the Opposition, I shall now, as briefly as possible, review some of the objections made to the Bill and some of the arguments by members of the Government in its favour.

Mr. QUINN.

our, more particularly by their supporters within the last few days.

Addressing myself first to the argument of the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), who, I am sorry, is not in his place this afternoon, with regard to the treaty question, I have only a word to say. I would not like to believe that an hon. gentleman occupying the position of Solicitor General of Canada would misquote a legal authority. I hold the hon. gentleman in too high esteem personally to believe that he would do so knowingly, but I fear he has fallen into the very same error that his colleague the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) did, when he attempted to quote from the speech of the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart). The hon. Solicitor General, no doubt, spoke from a prepared brief. No doubt, he had put into his hands a list of authorities and certain extracts from these authorities, and did not take the trouble of comparing these extracts with the authorities themselves, and therefore gave us a construction which was not really the opinion of the authorities quoted. He mentioned the names of Wharton, Phillimore, Grotius, Puffendorf and Vattel as authorities holding a certain opinion which he enunciated to this House. I have not had the opportunity of examining all these authorities, but I remembered having read in my early youth one of them, Phillimore, and my understanding of the position taken by him was in direct contradiction to that attributed to him by my hon. friend the Solicitor General. I was very much astonished to hear the Solicitor General make such a quotation, and took the trouble of verifying it. I say that the Solicitor General was misled—to put the most charitable construction on the matter—by the quotation put into his hands from that author. The hon. gentleman read the and other like purposes. Then Phillimore work:

It has been contended that the principle of this law has been engrafted upon international law, and that it is a maxim of that law that the ocean is free to all mankind, and rivers to all riparian inhabitants. So that the nation which possessed both banks of the river, where it disembogued itself into the sea, was not at liberty to refuse the nation or nations which possessed the banks of the river higher up, from the use of the water for the passage of vessels to the sea, and from the incidental use of the banks for the purposes mentioned above.

These are for loading and unloading cargoes, and other like purposes. Then Phillimore goes on:

The opinion of Grotius seems to be in favour of this position.

My hon. friend stopped there. He failed to read the rest of this paragraph; but anybody who reads thus far will see that Phillimore was simply stating a contention by certain authors in international law, and had not yet given his opinion. The Solicitor

General concluded from this that Phillimore's opinion was in favour of that contention, but further down we find Phillimore thus stating his own conclusion :

For, the reason of the thing and the opinion of other jurists, speaking generally, seem to agree in holding that the right can only be what is called (however improperly) by Vattel and other writers imperfect, and that the state through whose domain the passage is to be made must be the sole judge as to whether it be innocent or injurious in its character.

We therefore see that if the hon. Solicitor General had taken care to verify his authorities, he would have never laid down the proposition he did as coming from Phillimore, but he would have laid down directly the opposite. I did not take the trouble to examine the other authors quoted, but I assume—and am justified in assuming—from this quotation, that my hon. friend was not any more careful with his other authorities than he was with Phillimore. I do not know that I shall refer to anything more in the address of the Solicitor General except to punctuate that point and to ask you, Sir, to consider fully all the authorities which he cited, in the light thrown upon them by the citation from Phillimore.

The hon. Minister of Public Works said :

Hamilton Smith is playing the game of the thirty-four senators in Washington, and so are his hon. friends in the Opposition.

If the hon. Minister of Public Works is anything at all, he is an enthusiast. This is the first time I ever heard him address this House or any other assembly without arousing the enthusiasm of his hearers and firing their hearts with zeal; but the other night he laboured for three-quarters of an hour, and even when he brought out, in his ringing tones, this statement that Mr. Smith was playing the game of the thirty-four senators in Washington and that the Opposition here were playing the same game, it fell as flat as ditch-water upon his supporters behind him. And why? Because nobody believed it. Everybody in this House had, from the very beginning of this debate, heard the leader of the Government catechised as to a certain action taken very early last month by the Senate of the United States with regard to the bonding privilege and transshipping of goods at Fort Wrangel. That was before there was any question of the Senate Bill at all.

Nobody in this House was moved by the statement of the hon. Minister of Public Works that the Opposition in this House had attempted in any way to stir up the United States against the Government of this country. If there is any charge which cannot be made against the Conservative party, without causing the people to feel the statement to be an insult to their intelligence—and I care not to what constituency you go—it is the charge that the Conservative party have not always held clearly before them the idea of serving the best interests of the country and assisting its progress. The names of the leaders of the Conservative party are household words throughout this country, and will be so long as this country has a history.

The hon. gentleman made a very amusing remark—that the charge had always been made by the Conservative party that the Liberal party was composed of timid men. If that threat is considered an insult by the hon. Minister of Public Works or any other member of that exceedingly clever Government, I do not think it will ever be made again. Nobody who has read the terms of the proposition we have now before the House would so misapply the word "timid" as to use it as describing the men who have laid it before the House. Timid men! Why, the wonder is that they should dare to come before this House with a proposition of this kind. Timid! Why, "boldness" does not express their quality in this matter. It would be impossible, I think, to find a word in the English language, the antithesis of "timid" which would express what they are when they attempt to force this project through the House. It may be that they have got this boldness through the introduction of the Conservative representative into the Cabinet. Is that the idea the hon. Minister of Public Works wishes to convey? Perhaps it is. Certainly, there never was in any Conservative Government a man so bold as to introduce a measure of this kind, a man so utterly regardless of public sentiment as to put a measure before the House, a measure which had been so little considered by the Government as is this, or on which the members of the Government would show themselves so utterly ignorant.

The hon. Minister of Public Works said also that the Government dog is all right. I do not know what the Government dog is, I do not know to which member of the Government he applied this term; but, whoever it was, I think he ought to horsewhip the hon. Minister of Public Works. The Minister assures us that the Government dog will not be eaten up. Well, there has been considerable doubt about the question whether, not the Government dog, but rather the property of the country would not be eaten up by a certain firm of contractors. I think Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann are not the kind of men to eat dogs. They prefer gold lands. I do not know what the hon. Minister meant when he said that the Government dog would not be eaten up.

Now, I have very little to say as to this contract. It is so objectionable in almost every feature that I can say almost all I have to say against it by voting "nay" on the second reading. But I cannot conclude without calling attention to one or two of what I call salient features. Take, first, the effect of giving such an enormous terrtory to any private contractors—our heritage and the heritage of our children. An hon. member on this side has said—I do not say that he was exactly correct, but I think the statement is substantially accurate—that these contractors are being given a tract of land three times the size of the province of Prince Edward Island. And what for? Is it to build a road that will be the property of this country after it has been built? No. Is it in order that the people of this country may have privileges in going over that road? By no means, for those going over or sending goods over it will have to pay not merely ordinary passenger fare and freight rates, but most exorbitant figures for both. Therefore, I say the Government of this country is attempting to give to a firm of contractors a piece of territory three times the size of Prince Edward Island and has obtained absolutely nothing in return for it.

Now, the Minister of Railways and Canals, gives as a reason for paying such a large amount of money—because after all, the land that is to be given is worth so much money—to this company, that the road must be built within a very short time, must be finished on the 1st of September next. He says it will be utterly impossible to get this road built under ordinary conditions or at the ordinary price. The Minister of the Interior, in speaking on that question said that the Government was in this position, that it would have to provide for the going into that country of possibly 50,000 or 100,000 or even 200,000 people within the next few months. He said also that the condition of things presented itself to the Government only a short time ago, and that, using the greatest diligence, they sent out engineers to examine the country and to decide upon the proper route for a railway. But, the hon. gentleman forgot that a few pages before he had made this explanation. Speaking on the 15th of February, as reported at 602 of the unrevised "Hansard," he said:

But we did not realize, and I do not think the House will blame us for not realizing, until the summer had nearly passed there was going to be anything like the rush to that country which materialized last fall.

So we have the statement from the Minister of the Interior that at any rate before the summer had completely passed the Government did realize that there was going to be a large rush of people to the Klondike last fall, which would be continued next spring. Now, the charge has been made by the leader of the Opposition and by other members of the Opposition, that the Government remained quiet, that the Government did nothing between the time they first realized, as the Minister said, that there was going to be a rush to that country, and the time that he sent out engineers to survey and to examine the country. Sir, there has not been any answer from the Government benches showing that the Government did anything between those dates. Here we have the statement of the Minister of the Interior that before the summer had passed the Government knew there would be a rush to that country, and the first thing the Government did was to send out its engineers some time in September for the purpose of examining the country before laying out a railroad to get in there. What other proof have we? We have the proof that on the 15th August—and of course they did not do it in a day—arrangements had been made with Major Walsh to go to that country as administrator; we have the proof that his assent was obtained, and the assent of Judge McGuire to accompany him, on the 15th August; so that prior to the 15th August, allowing sufficient time to bring Major Walsh and Judge McGuire to Ottawa, if they came here, allowing sufficient time to communicate with them, we are justified in saying that the Government knew about the latter end of July that it was necessary to provide for the administration of justice in that country. Why? On account of the great rush of people that would go in there owing to the excitement that had been caused by the large discoveries of gold. So that we have, at any rate, proven by the acts of the Government themselves that as early as the latter part of July there was something before them to show that they were justified in going to the expense of $200,000 in sending out Major Walsh and his party to administer justice in that country. Now, that forces us to the natural conclusion, not only that the Government expected a large rush of people into that country as early as last July, but that the Government had private information and knew that they were justified in making this expenditure, because they were sending these men to the largest and richest gold country that the world had ever heard of; otherwise they would not have been justified in making this expenditure. Now, I think that point is proven beyond any question of doubt. Hon. members of the Government have not given any answer; and as one of the hon. members here has said, they have been beaten to their knees on the question, and it is impossible for them to give anything like a lucid or proper explanation in answer to that charge. So that if it is proven, as it is amply proven, that the Government of this country knew as early as July that there was going to be a rush of people to that country, that it was the richest gold country that had ever been discovered in this world, why, we are then forced to the conclusion that this Government was asleep from the middle of July till the middle of October, aye, until the 25th January, when they signed the contract with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann; or else, if they had not been asleep, they would at once have set about providing some means for people to get into that country, providing means for the transportation of supplies to that country, providing means of communication not only between the North-west Territories and that country, but between the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, with that country, before the 25th January, 1898. What might they not have done? I have no doubt that if we could get the real facts of the case here, we would find that they were in possession of this information not only as I have proven here, by the middle of July, but that they were actually in possession of this information before this House rose on the 28th June last. I think if we had this information it would be proven beyond any doubt that such was the case. What, then, was the duty of the Government, if such were the case? It was the duty of the Government then and there to have apprised this House of that fact, to have allowed the representatives of the people of this country in Parliament assembled to know that such a country existed, to know that this rich country was right at our doors, to know that thousands of people were trying to enter that country in order to extract from the unwilling bowels of the earth the gold which they contained, to know that not only these people were going in, but that there would be a large influx of people within the next six months; and to call upon these representatives of the people to give them then and there power to build a railroad, or to take any other means that would to them appear sufficient in order to afford communication with that vastly rich country. But they did not do so. They rested, they remained quiet, they did nothing until late in the winter, until, we may say, the 25th January, or until a few days before the 25th January, when, with all the hurry, with all the haste, with all the speed possible, they entered into a contract with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann to build this route. Now, Sir, I do not propose to discuss the question of this particular route. I remember the castigation, I will not call it a merited castigation, which one hon. gentleman who took the liberty of addressing this House a second time when he had no right to do so, I refer to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison); I say I remember the castigation which he attempted to give to a gentleman who did not merit it, when he said that the crude and crass ignorance of the geography of the country displayed by the hon. gentleman was really marvellous. It is quite true that we are not very well posted on the geography of that country, but it is not our fault. If the Government had taken proper steps when they first knew of the existence of that gold country, when they first knew of its importance, when they first knew that the interest of this House would be centered upon that region to-day, they would have provided every member of this House with a map which would have given him distinctly and clearly to understand what the geography of the country was. We do not all enjoy the privilege of living at New Westminster, or of living in the province of British Columbia; we do not all even enjoy the privilege of having travelled that far. But we know as much about that country as the information which has been given us by the Government, who were bound to give us all the information possible, will allow us to know. So I say we have only to take the speeches of hon. gentlemen who, like the member for New Westminster, do know something about it, and from them extract what information we can. Now, what did the hon. member for New Westminster say on this question of the knowledge that was possessed by the Government about the condition of that country. The hon. gentleman was very anxious and very zealous in support of the Minister of Railways on the 8th February, and wishing to impart to this House as he had a perfect right to do, all the information which he possessed upon it, and not thinking that his own words would be brought up in judgment against him some day, delivered himself of the following:—

As I said, there will be 10,000 people in there soon after navigation opens. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken thought a conservative estimate would place at 50,000 the additional number of people who will go in there by some means or other. Now it is a matter of calculation that it will take 25,000 tons of provisions to feed 50,000 people.

And he goes on then to estimate how many people will go in there:

The 50,000 people will not go in by the Yukon River, they must go over those passes, that is, if they can get over them, and what does that mean? Of food, baggage, machinery and tools, all of which are absolutely necessary to every man who goes in there, about two tons will be required to every man.

Then he makes use of this extraordinary language:

Any person who has been at Vancouver, Victoria, New Westminster, Seattle, or Tacoma, during the past six months, must be specially blind if he could not see that at least 100,000 people would be in the Yukon country this season, and may have gone there since I left the coast.

So that the hon. member for New Westminster says that anybody who was at either of these places mentioned at any time within the last six months, that is, since 1st July last, must have been blind, if he did not see that 100,000 people would go in there within the six months which are just ending and the opening of the spring. Accordingly, by his own words he convicts the Government of either having known six months ago that 100,000 people would go in, or blindness on their part. I leave the hon. gentleman and the hon. Minister of the Interior to settle between them whether they were blind or stupid. But it is abundantly proven that the Government were in possession of this information, and that consequently the excuse of haste does not hold under the circumstances. It is quite true, that hon. gentlemen opposite have sheltered themselves behind the fact that no person in this country would have been able to build this railway except Mackenzie & Mann. I am not going to express any opinion, as all the Ministers have found it necessary to do—probably because they want to keep friends with these very wealthy contractors, and they know they are going to be very wealthy—as to whether these contractors will make any money out of the contract or not. I have nothing to say against Mackenzie & Mann. I know both of those gentlemen, one of whom I have known only a short time, but the other during some years, and I have no reason to wish them any harm, and, in common with all my fellowmen, I wish them well; but I do not think that if I were a member of a government, I would consider it necessary because I had friendly feelings towards those gentlemen, to go out of my way to give them a contract for which they will receive payment in the shape of 2,750,000 acres of gold-bearing lands for building a road which will prove eminently remunerative to them. What have all hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the Government side of the House on this question proved? At one time they say this railway will never pay. But they are confronted with the argument that if it is not going to pay, where is the necessity for it? Next, they say there will be 100,000 people going into that country by that railway within the next six months. Then, they are met with the statement that if 100,000 people go in within the next six months, they will require 50,000 tons of freight in the shape of supplies and food products; so that a moderate estimate of the receipts of the railway would be $1,500,000 for the first six months. Hon. gentlemen must take one or the other proposition; they cannot shift about, as they have done, from one side to the other every few minutes; they must pin their fate to something. It is not for the Opposition to put before them any scheme to carry through; they are responsible for the scheme, they must carry it through and pin their faith to it. So they must either show that this railway will pay and that it will be used for the accommodation of the public, or they must admit there was no necessity for haste in building. If there was no necessity for haste, we may not consider the other question, whether this is the most advantageous route or not, because if there was no necessity for haste in building the road, I, in common with every hon. member, I think, will say that this road should have been built in all-Canadian territory, and we should not have run any risk of being interfered with in any way by the United States Government.

The hon. gentleman has made a great point of the assertion, that one of the advantages of this road and the reason why it should be built is, that it is going to be constructed in all-Canadian territory. I fail to see the advantage of that, since we are brought face to face with the fact, now apparent, that the United States Government is going to use all its power to prevent us from getting at the terminus of that road nearest the ocean. What matters it to this country that 150 miles of railway should be built to some point in the Yukon district and carry the traveller 150 miles on his journey of 1,600 miles, and that this road should be built all in Canadian territory, if before he can reach that point, there are 150 miles between that railway and the steamer which has brought him to the mainland of that country? What difference if this road should be built all in Canadian territory, if between that road and him intervenes a foreign government, which will have the right to tax his food products, every article of raiment, every piece of machinery he brings into that country? What matters it that this road should be built in Canadian territory, if between him and that road is a piece of foreign territory to the government of which he may have to pay tax before he can set his foot there? What advantage to this country would it be to build an all-Canadian route all through Canadian territory under such circumstances? Would it not be a greater boom to this country to wait until a road could be built, not over 150 miles, but over 300 or 400 miles, if necessary, so that, not only would it be an all-Canadian route, but its approach and its outlet would be in Canadian territory. This is a point that I think has been lost sight of by the Government, and it is a point on which the leader of the Opposition was perfectly justified in saying that the Government should withdraw the Bill now under the consideration of the House.

But I think the most monstrous proposition in all this contract is, that Mackenzie & Mann should have the right to obtain of the territory of this country such an enormous portion as is provided by this contract. Sir, this land is the heritage of the people of this country; it is the heritage of the children of this country; it is the heritage not only of us who live here now, but of our children and our children's children. It may be valueless to-day, but may in the future contain such wealth as would make every citizen of Canada enormously rich. It has been said that this is a gambling transaction. If that be so, then I say, if the Government are prepared to sanction a gambling transaction, then let every man, woman and child in Canada have the right to gamble in the Yukon, too.

If the Government insist upon forcing this contract through the House, and insist on chartering a company to carry out the work, I would like to see that charter prepared in such a way that it would give every individual in this country a share in the enormous wealth of that gold region. I would like to see the Government insert in that contract, a clause compelling Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann to organize a company of $10,000,000 capital with shares at $1 each, so that every man, woman and child in Canada might have a chance to invest in it. I would like to see the number of shares in that company held by any one person, limited to 1,000 so that individual capitalists would not have the power to get more than a fair proportion. I would like to see the Government insert an advertisement in the papers of Canada inviting our citizens to subscribe to that capital stock, and I prophesy that if that be done, long before the first of September, even long before the first of May the $10,000,000 of capital stock will be taken up by our citizens who are anxious and willing to take a gamble in the Yukon. By so doing, provision could be made to meet even the most urgent demands of the Ministers who are so solicitous for the welfare of Mackenzie & Mann. I would be disposed to deal liberally with those gentlemen, but I would compel them to accept out of the $10,000,000 capital, 25 per cent, 35 per cent or 40 per cent profit on the actual cost of the railroad which would be ascertained by Government engineers; I would compel them to accept a percentage of profit and take that in full payment of their investment. We would then have a road owned by the people of Canada; we would then have a road really controlled by the populace; we would then have in this country a large tract of mineral land owned by the people. I would further have inserted in the contract a clause providing that if the total capital should not be subscribed before the 1st of September, the balance unsubscribed would be owned by Mackenzie & Mann if they so wished, or be open to public subscription. If this were done, that immense tract of country would not be appropriated to making multi-millionaires of two men, but it would give every citizen in Canada an opportunity of having something substantial to his credit in this golden heritage which Providence has placed within our control. If the Government do that, they will have achieved something that will make their names favourably remembered, longer even than the Yukon district will be remembered in the history of Canada.

Now, Sir, I do not know that I have very much more to say on this question, but I urgently press upon the Government this proposition which I have outlined. I do not put it before the House as an idea that has originated with myself alone, because I know that many others have looked upon this as a proper way in which to administer this very rich territory. I do not take to myself the credit of originating the idea as I have said, but I do urge it with all the earnestness in my power on the consideration of the Government. If these gentlemen opposite insist upon the Bill now before the House, and do not withdraw it, I commend my suggestions as a proper means of enabling the people of Canada to share in the wealth of this region. Many people will say that there is no guarantee that the millions of acres given to Mackenzie & Mann contain large quantities of gold, but, Sir, gold is not the only thing valuable in that country. It has been repeated over and over again by members on this side of the House, although members on the other side seem to forget it, that gold is not the only thing that is of value in the Yukon district. The people of that country cannot eat gold, the people of that country cannot warm themselves with gold, the people of that country cannot clothe themselves with gold, the people of that country cannot build houses out of gold nor can they construct furniture out of gold, and one of the strongest objections to that contract is that Mackenzie & Mann have it within their power, not only to take a very large proportion of the mineral bearing lands but to monopolize almost all the timber in that country. Owning the railway which carries food and supplies to the Yukon, they can prevent the importation of any wood except such as is cut on their own reserves. They can charge almost any price they like for transportation, and even if there were not an ounce of gold in the region, they can make millions of dollars out of the timber which must be found on this vast land grant.

From what I have already said I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that I need add, that it is my intention to vote against the second reading of the Bill. I shall take this course, not because I have any ill-will to the Government, not because I come here to create a factious opposition to measures of the Government, not because I have any ill-will towards the men who have been given this contract, not because I am not willing that they should make all the money they possibly can in the conduct of their business, but because I feel as a representative of the people, that it is my duty to consider well every point of connection with this contract before I vote upon it.

In coming to this conclusion I have put myself in the position, in my own mind, of one who had it in his power to decide whether this railroad should be built or not. I have taken into consideration whether I would run the risk of having a number of people suffer a great deal in that country rather than that Canada should be robbed of this large amount of territory for the purpose of building that road. But it is because I do not fear that people will suffer as much as has been said through the fault of this Parliament, because I do not fear that this country will lose any great amount of trade by preventing the building of this road in the immediate future, because I think that this country is paying too high a price for the contract which has been entered into by the Government, and because I think it is criminal or almost criminal on the part of the Parliament of this country to vote away, to individuals, such a large territory, the heritage of the children of this country, that I have determined to give my vote against the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that we have all listened with a great deal of interest to the eloquent words of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Quinn). I am sure that it rejoices all our hearts to know that he has given this subject such mature consideration, and I am sure that we on this side deeply regret that he has come to the decision which he has made known before sitting down. I am almost afraid, Mr. Speaker, to venture into this debate, owing to the very severe castigation which a third-session member of this House has already received; but as I listened to the hon. member, especially in the covert insinuation which he made by introducing the rumours of the street into this House, I felt that even a third-session member would hardly be so indiscreet as to commit such a blunder as that. What is rumour but gossip, and what is gossip but slander? and it seems to me very unwise for a wise man like the hon. member for Montreal Centre to bring in the slanders of the street for the purpose of insidiously blackening the characters of men whom we all know and respect. The hon. member complained, in his opening remarks, that the Government had not taken into consideration our rights at Wrangel. That seemed to me a very foolish question to raise, because I cannot imagine that the Government would be so lax in their duty in that regard. But what need had they to inquire into our rights particularly? Those rights are well defined, and they are well known; and I was glad, and I am sure the country rejoices, at the position which the Prime Minister took when he said that he would stand firmly and unflinchingly by the rights which the Washington Treaty gives to Canada. I think, Mr. Speaker, that we ought to try to understand the position of the Government with regard to this railway contract. Of course, our view of the contract will depend greatly on our view of the circumstances in which the Government were placed. We on the Pacific Coast have perhaps had a better idea than most hon. members of this House of the position the Government occupied. One of the fiercest struggles or battles for trade was being fought out there that perhaps had ever been fought, not only in this country, but in almost any other country in the world. On the one hand, we had the

Mr. QUINN.

Americans, who were alive to the discovery which had been made on the Klondike, and the trade and traffic which that discovery would create.

They had the men, they had the ships,
They had the money too.

We on our side, realizing that that country belonged to Canada, were determined that as far as possible that trade should be done by the merchants of Canada and also by the farmers of Canada. Now, out of that situation there arose one of the greatest emergencies which could possibly confront a Government or a people. There were some people in the east who had no idea that such an emergency existed. One wise luminary in the Conservative party, or one that seeks to help the Conservative party in the city of Ottawa, the Ottawa "Citizen," in an article said that this railway was not necessitated by the emergency of the moment. We have a far wiser Conservative light on the Pacific Coast; I refer to the Victoria "Colonist," a paper which I think every Conservative member of this House will recognize as a very valuable aid and a very valuable friend in all their struggles. In reply to this article of the Ottawa "Citizen" the Victoria "Colonist" published a special article dealing with the question, in which, among other things, it said:

We tell the "Citizen" that an emergency exists, and one of the gravest character. The Yukon needs a railway. The exploitation of its enormous wealth will be impossible without a railway. Unless a line is built this year there will certainly be a great deal of distress among the miners next winter, and what perhaps is of even greater importance, the development of the wealth of the region will be seriously retarded.

The case is one in which it was necessary for the Government to come to the assistance of the business men by adopting a policy that will secure the early construction of the railway. The coast cities of Canada were handicapped in the struggle by the fact that all the trans-continental railway lines in the United States, all the newspapers, and many commercial organizations were fighting them. Capital in large amounts and prejudice in immeasurable quantity were massed against them. They realized that there was only one way in which to keep what is theirs by right, and that was to secure the construction of a line of railway from the Stikine to Lake Teslin, which line can be reached in summer by steamers carrying the flag of Canada, and can later be extended to an open port in British Columbia, thereby securing for all time to come Canadian supremacy in Canadian territory.

That is the expression of Conservative sentiment on the Pacific Coast with regard to this emergency; and I challenge contradiction of that statement from hon. gentlemen opposite. Shakspeare reminds us that—

There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which taken at the flood leads on to fortune.

I believe that the Government of this country, realizing the tide which was about to flow over our land in the shape of commercial prosperity, took advantage of it, and that, in this contract, which we are considering, and upon which I hope we shall soon be called upon to vote, we have that which will lead on the people of Canada to great commercial prosperity as well as great happiness. So far as the Pacific Coast is concerned, I know that we were full of zeal and earnestness and enthusiasm for this railway, and I believe Conservatives and Liberals alike exerted the greatest pressure possible upon the Government to do something in order to secure the trade of this region for the people of Canada. As I glance over the various steps which the Government has taken, I cannot but see in them indications that the Government was alive to the occasion. We had, for example, the sending out of the North-west mounted police, and here let me say that the men who were sent out were about the finest specimens physically that a country could possibly boast of possessing, and I consider it my duty to say that, so far as I have met them and heard of them in that distant country, they are a credit to Canada and Canada ought to feel proud of them. Again the wisdom of the Government in sending out these men has been more than evidenced by the fact that they have not only preserved law and order in that country, but have been helpful in many other ways, not only in feeding those who might have perished from hunger, but in saving others who had almost lain down by the wayside, and who, but for timely assistance, would have perished from the cold. The humanitarian deeds which the police have performed in that country have earned for them among the people of Skagway and Dyea and all those who pass through those districts, everlasting gratitude and admiration. Then we had the appointment of Major Walsh as administrator. I need hardly refer to the chorus of praise which came from every part of Canada for the wisdom shown by the Government in selecting this gentleman, and as I had the honour of travelling with him through Skagway and Dyea, I am in a position to bear evidence to his wonderful nerve and ability and fitness in every respect for the work to which he has been assigned, and I look forward to his administration of that country with great confidence and hope. We had also the appointment of Judge Maguire, and those who know that amiable gentleman have perfect confidence in his ability to wisely and impartially administer justice in that country. But perhaps the thing which most revealed the earnestness of the Government and their desire to do the best they could for this distant country, and likewise to obtain for the people of the other portions of Canada the prosperity which the development of that country must naturally create, was the determination of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) to go out himself, that he might examine the different routes, come in contact with the different classes of people in the different sections, and on the information thus obtained frame a policy which would be of national benefit. I take pride in saying that no man has ever tried to serve his country better than did my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, that no man has ever been more faithful or alert in the prosecution of his duties, and I say that there is no man in this House who can come near the hon. Minister as regards an intimate and accurate knowledge of the position. The decision of the hon. Minister in this matter was based upon the best information obtainable and the most complete knowledge which was possible for any individual man or Minister to acquire. All these things together, weighed seriously and earnestly, justify to my mind at least, the completeness and comprehensiveness the grasp which the Government has for the needs of the Yukon country.

The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) criticised, as in duty bound, the policy of the Government in this and other respects. There is no one in this House who listens to him with more pleasure than I do. I consider that he is a Canadian wonder, a man of wonderful vitality and earnestness, and of whom we may all be proud, but criticism may, like ambition, over-leap itself. Wise criticism has a salutary effect, but as reckless criticism misses the mark. I think I never heard the hon. gentleman speak so ineffectively, because I never heard him speak so recklessly as when criticising this policy of the Government. He told us that the Government had gone to sleep. "Do nothingness" was also one of the classical terms which he applied to the Administration, and then, with that vim which he possesses so abundantly, he told us that the Government had shamefully neglected its duties. These words seem to me like tinkling brass and sounding cymbals. There was no reason for the noise he made or for this particular criticism, and I believe that I am voicing the sentiment of the people when I say that such criticisms are perfectly unjustifiable and of no particular effect. They resemble rockets rising, one by one, into the air and making a noise as they go up, but ending in smoke and eternal blackness. Of course I know that a leader of an Opposition has to say something, and I know that something must have in it that which will rouse the drooping courage and the fainting hearts of his followers, as he leads them on to what they know is a hopeless battle. But all the same I rejoice to know that there are those on the Conservative side of this House who can rise superior to the inglorious exigencies of party, and who prefer to stick to the truth than to what is best but a dream of fiction. I believe that the Government did all that a wise and up to date Government could possibly do; I believe that they acted wisely and well; I believe that every movement they made, every appointment they made, every decision arrived at, were all so many evidences that they are men who counted the cost, and had complete knowledge of what they ought to do and hence acted intelligently and wisely, I believe further that whatever errors the Government may have committed, we cannot consistently lay this charge of "do nothingness" or masterly inactivity at their doors. I might say further that if that had only been my opinion or the opinion of those who sit on this side, or those who are friendly to the Government outside of the House, it might not carry much weight, but I call to my assistance leading exponents of the Conservative party on the Pacific Coast. In one of the articles of the Conservative organs, we read that if ever there was a time for action it was this one, if ever there was an emergency, one existed in this matter, that the Government have dealt with it promptly, and their promptness has evoked an expression of congratulation on all sides. Now, I am glad to know that there are some wise men on the Conservative side as well as on this side. There are no newspapers in Canada that have better knowledge of the circumstances and the facts than the coast papers of British Columbia.

But we are told, on one hand, that the Government acted slowly; that they went to sleep. And then we are told, on the other hand, that the Government acted with undue haste. Of course, I am not attempting to reconcile these opinions. One of the chief objections that has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite was, that the Government acted with undue haste, that they ought to have waited until Parliament met, that they should not have made an arrangement with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann until we assembled, and so on. Now, I could understand this objection, if it came from men who only made the objection of undue haste; but when it comes from those who state that the Government have gone to sleep and done nothing and shamefully neglected their duties, I cannot understand the force of it. We can hardly expect, if the Government had acted slowly, that they could also act quickly; and, if they had acted quickly, how can it be charged that they have gone too slowly, and thus shamefully neglected their duties? Is this the kind of criticism that the people of this country expect? I believe the people are willing to profit by honest and fair criticism; but, when, on one hand, we have one kind of criticism, and on the other another kind which contradicts the first, I think the people will come to the conclusion that there is a lack of genuine conviction about a great deal of the criticism which is passed by hon. gentlemen opposite. I am rejoiced further to say that another Conservative member comes to my support on this point. I take a clipping from a newspaper to this effect:

The member for South Norfolk, another member of the late Conservative Administration who happened to be in Montreal, was also interviewed. He said: "It was necessary to place the work in the hands of reliable and energetic men, and the Government has certainly succeeded in doing this. In the matter of time he thinks the Government was fully justified in acting promptly and in not waiting for Parliament to meet. Delay was to have been avoided at all hazards."

So, on the question of promptness and on the question of making the contract before the House met, we have the testimony of Conservatives in different parts of the country, justifying the action of the Government.

As I have hinted, I went with the Minister of the Interior, last fall, on his trip, to see for myself about the country and to get all the information I could possibly obtain with regard to these routes. When you come to consider the question of a route, I think the Victoria "Colonist," which is the leading Conservative newspaper on the coast, speaks to the point when it says:

This railway must be built to a point in Canada or to one in the United States. If it is to be one in the United States, a great city will grow up at its southern terminus, and the trade of the country will pass into the hands of Americans. If the terminus of the road is in Canada the freight will be controlled by Canadians.

I think that is a very fair statement of the case. When we look at Skagway, for example, one is at once convinced that for us to start a railway there is certainly to build up the town of Skagway at the expense of Canada. This is even more true with regard to Dyea, because you not only help to build up a town at Dyea, but also one about 12 miles inland, before the most difficult ascent begins. The same is true in connection with the Chilkat Pass and also with the Taku Inlet. The only available route in that section of the country, the only one which presents itself to any one seeking information, as one likely to benefit the people of Canada, is the route by the Stikine River. I do not say that that is the best route; I would not be so selfish as to say that, though it runs in connection with my own constituency. But it was the only route, I think, speaking in all fairness, it was the one most available, the one that could be best used, the one that could be brought into such a state that most of the goods that would have to be taken into that country could most easily be taken by that particular way. Now, by adopting this route, what are we doing? We are building up the town of Glenora. So many people have settled there that I have received an application for a post office. We are building a town also at Telegraph Creek. The people are beginning to congregate there, so I had to make application that a postmaster be appointed there also. So that, in spite of all complications that may arise at Wrangel, the policy of the Government is building up towns on the Canadian side and holding a trade that will be of service commercially and otherwise to the whole people of Canada. With regard to the question of shipping, I do not intend to enter into that, because I think it has been very freely discussed. I cannot help saying that a great deal more has been said about this than is necessary. I do not know that it was wise of us to discuss these questions at the present moment in Parliament. Further, it seems to me—I hope I am mistaken—as if at least some hon. gentlemen on the opposite side would be very glad, it would be a matter of great rejoicing to them, one of the sweetest things that ever entered into their lives, if the Americans should in any way block the policy of the Government by putting obstructions in their way at the mouth of the Stikine River. I hold that there are times in our lives when we ought to rise superior to mere party instincts or desires. There are times when our country ought to be dearer to us than mere party success. And, if ever there was a time in the history of Canada when we ought to act as one, one in sentiment and one in aim, it is the present moment. We should show the American people that, while we may fight and wrangle over our own home affairs, when it comes to the question of Canada's honour, we are willing to bury these differences and join as one man in support of our country.

I was amused with the speech of the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). It has already been referred to, but I think I ought to say a word or two with regard to it. I did not like the speech at all, because I thought it was so unlike the hon. gentleman, who generally takes a very broad view of any question he discusses. This evening, he again commenced to discuss this Stikine route. Evidently, he does not like it, because one of his first statements was that the Dominion of Canada would not benefit in the trade for food products by this route as it would if some other route had been adopted, but particularly one near his own section of country.

Then he said there are ten million dollars worth of trade to be done by the United States or by Canada, and he asked who was going to do that trade. He said further that there were only three constituencies in British Columbia who were interested in the Stikine route, and that all the other constituencies represented in this House were interested in some route near to Edmonton. Now, I say that is neither a fair nor a true statement of the case at all. I say with all due respect to the hon. member for Alberta, that the people of Canada will be as much benefited by the Stikine route as by any other route which might have been adopted by the Government. Of course, I cannot agree with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) when he said that we could at the present moment supply the food for the people who are passing into the Yukon. We do not produce enough to supply our own wants at the present time. But where do we get it from? The hon. member for Alberta referred to the fact that we imported somewhere about four million dollars worth from the United States. But then what is that composed of, and at what particular places in British Columbia does this trade take place? Most hon. members know that in the Rossland district, especially at the beginning, almost the whole of that section fell into the hands of Americans on account of the proximity of the place to Spokane. Even at the present moment a great many merchants do business there. Then again we have to import a great deal of fruit into British Columbia from California. We have had to import likewise a great deal of machinery for our mines in British Columbia, because the people of eastern Canada were not prepared to supply it, and there are a great many other things necessary to our mining development which they are not yet prepared to supply. So that when you come down to actual food supplies imported from California or other states, they dwindle almost into insignificance. But what benefit will this Stikine route be to eastern people? Now I am glad I do not need to say very much so far as that is concerned; but I will quote you the testimony of one of the leading merchants of Montreal, who said:

Our manufacturers are working day and night, some of them in the endeavour to overtake orders which they have for supplies. Grocers, clothiers, rubber manufacturers, boot and shoe people, are all blessing their good fortune; and the completion of the railway will bring much more of the Yukon gold down here in payment for food and clothing.

Now, it seems to me all nonsense for any one to talk about this Stikine route being opposed to the interests of the people of eastern Canada. I say that almost every particle of stuff that we are selling in Vancouver, in Victoria and in New Westminster to-day, in connection with this trade we are bringing from Alberta, and from Manitoba, Ontario and Québec. Every business in every district in Canada to-day is being benefited in equal measure by the extraordinary prosperity which this Yukon development and the policy of the Government are bringing about at the present time. Now, another objection has been brought against the Government because they did not call for tenders. The question each one has to decide for himself is, Was the Government justified in acting as they did? Considering the circumstances of the case—and we all believe that circumstances alter cases—it seems to me that, owing to the emergent nature of the case, the Government were perfectly justified in acting as they have done. There are times in every individual life, there are times in the life of a business man, there are times even in the history of a nation, when delay means defeat and disaster all round. I say that delay in connection with this case was what the people of Canada did not want, as it would have retarded the commercial prosperity of the country, and would have been playing into the hands of Americans and benefiting them commercially. So I say again that the Government were perfectly justified in acting thus, because at the very moment when that position was made known to the country a complete change took place in the direction taken by people going to the coast, and from that day began the great prosperity which we are enjoying at the present time. Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen opposite have been making a great fuss about a gentleman called Hamilton Smith. I do not know anything about the gentleman, I do not want to say anything disrespectful about him, but we know in British Columbia a great deal about these men who represent great capital, and in nine cases out of ten these very men cannot pay their board bills.

Mr. MILLS. Is that the case with Hamilton Smith?

Mr. MAXWELL. I do not know anything about him.

Mr. MILLS. No, nor do you want to know.

Mr. MAXWELL. I say I do not wish to say anything disrespectful about him; but out in British Columbia our experience with men coming out from different countries and pretending to represent great capital, has been that in nine cases out of ten they cannot pay their board bills. We are sick of those men altogether. We talk about the Canadian people, we boast on this and that platform about our growing Canadian life, and our national sentiment. Well, here we have two Canadians in Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, men who have been born in the country, men against whom not one single word has been said on either side of the House, men in whom we seem to have perfect confidence, men who are able and willing to do this work; why, then, in the name of common sense, is it that these hon. gentlemen have so much love for a man about whom they know very little, a stranger to the country, and yet will not support men of their own blood, of their own country? Now, with regard to the land subsidy, I may say that I am strongly opposed to giving away our land. We have suffered very severely in British Columbia by a policy which I think has been a failure on the part of our government out there, in giving away the land of the people to this and that railway company, to this and that individual. Perhaps there is no part of the Dominion at the present time affording a better object lesson of the evils of giving away land than in British Columbia. But in my opinion, there is all the difference in the world between agricultural land and supposed mineralized land. Is there any consistency, for example, in the policy of the Opposition in this respect? I could appreciate the force of their objections if their own policy had been in any wise different. When they were in power they gave away the best land of the North-west, the land that was their heritage and the heritage of their children and of their children's children. But not a word of complaint, not a murmur did we hear from them against that wholesale slaughter of this invaluable heritage. And yet here is land about which we know little or nothing as to what may be in it, and oh, what horror, what dreadful compunction of soul, seizes upon these hon. gentlemen at the thought of giving away some of this land. We have no particular knowledge as to whether there is any value in it, but so far as agricultural land is concerned, we know there is a value in that. You can always compute the number of dollars that will be taken out of agricultural land, that is always a valuable asset, and always will be of importance to a people, and to those who own it. So far as that land in the Yukon is concerned, there seems to be a small section of it that may be valuable, so far as we know, but so far as the great bulk of it is concerned, we do not know that it ever will be worth a single cent to any individual or to the contractors to whom it may be given when the time comes. Sir, we see at the present time in hon. gentlemen opposite a wonderful exhibition of the working of the imagination. Sometimes individuals and parties develop one bump and afterwards develop another bump. The Opposition are at the present time developing the imaginative faculty. Of course the poet is the man to whom this faculty is supposed to belong; but I do not know whether hon. gentlemen opposite want to treat the subject in a poetical manner or not, although they are giving great scope to this particular faculty. But we know that some people have diseased imaginations and it almost seems to me as if the Opposition were giving evidence that their imaginations were diseased at the present time. What is the simple statement of the case? The Government want a railway built. The Government take the position that it is for Canadian interests that a railway should be built in to the Yukon. They offer so many acres of land, about which they know nothing. The contractors after consideration, and possibly giving a little rein to their imaginative faculty, decide to accept the conditions of the Government. The Opposition of the present moment with the aid of this wonderful organ seems to think that Mr. Mackenzie is a sort of modern Aladdin with the wonderful lamp of the Yukon in his hand and with unimaginable riches in his possession. Any one who has read Disraeli's works will know about the gambler. We can imagine the gambler sitting down with money in his hand, imagining to himself that if he makes his risk a fortune will pass into his pocket. He takes the risk; but he may lose or he may win. As regards this contract, I will not call it a gamble, but it is a matter into which the contractors have gone with their eyes open, determined to build the road and make the best of the bargain entered into with the Government; and I think, considering all the circumstances, the best wishes of this House ought to follow these men in the heroic endeavours they are about to make for the opening up of this portion of the Dominion. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think that this contract is in favour of the contractors. There are some men, however, who take a correct view of this bargain, and I have pleasure in calling as a witness a Conservative, a man who is regarded as a staunch Conservative and one of the pillars of the party—I refer to Mr. Edward Gurney, President of the Board of Trade of Toronto. He said:

Mr. MAXWELL.

I think that if the Canadian Government had advertised for tenders upon the basis of 3,700,000 acres of land with the other conditions that attach to this contract, and had called upon people to bid in the usual way, providing a cash payment for any increase in the terms of the offer, the whole thing would have any time within the past year been taken as a piece of humour, and the people who are howling most loudly now would have been the loudest laughers at the absurd proposition. It is the old Toronto complaint of not valuing things till some one gets his hands on them; then comes the rub. I believe the Government has done a good thing. I cannot conceive how it is possible for Mr. Mackenzie to carry out the stipulated conditions. I suppose, however, he has given the matter thought before putting his name to paper.

That is the testimony of a man, who if he has not the instincts of government, has at least the instincts of business, and that is the instinct which is most necessary when discussing a business transaction.

Again, with respect to this proposed gamble, we have other Conservative testimony which I may read for the benefit of the Conservative party—I refer to the Victoria "Colonist." That journal says:

As we have already said, the contractors have taken a great risk, and the compensation allowed them therefor may or may not be excessive. Under the best system of calculating that can be devised this must remain an open question. We repeat that the people here on the coast, who know the situation and who understand what a loss to the whole country delay will mean, are not disposed to listen with much patience to quibbling over details.

These men know the situation and are alive to its importance, and I only hope the wisdom of that paper will be inculcated into members of the Conservative party to such an amount as may yet result in a unanimous vote being given in favour of the contract now before the House.

I need not refer to the charge made that this road will not be a railway. I merely wish to say on that point that any man who goes over the Slocan and Kaslo Railway or who knows anything about it will never say that the railway from Glenora to Teslin Lake, which is to be built in the same fashion, is not a railway. It is true the Slocan and Kaslo is a narrow-gauge road, but in every other respect it is one of the most perfect railways we have in the whole Dominion.

Again, it is charged that the contractors will make large sums out of this contract. I merely wish to say that the rush which is on at the present time may be the only rush in connection with the Yukon country. That rush will be over in September, before the railway can be opened. So far as my knowledge of the condition of affairs goes and from my reading of reports, I must say that it is not certain there will be sufficient traffic over the road after September to pay the company. The only possible way in which I can see that the railway may pay will be on account of the freight that must be carried in order to provide for the wants of the people who may go into the country; so that if the contractors don't make money out of the land, I do not expect they will make very much money out of the railway after it is built.

In conclusion, I support this contract because I think it is a contract which the people desired the Government to make. I support it because it is one which seems to rise to the occasion and meet the wants of the people at the present moment. I support it because its terms are fair alike to the people and to the contractors, and more especially fair to the people. I support it because of the action of the Government in reserving alternate claims in the lands. I support it further because every miner who is now in the country will have a sufficient opportunity to select his claim before these contractors have an opportunity of taking up lands, and so thousands of claims will be located by the miners in the Yukon. I believe also that after the contractors have taken their chance, miners will make discoveries and through those discoveries other miners will be attracted, and thus a large number of claims will be taken up before Mackenzie & Mann even hear of those discoveries.

So, take it altogether, while there may be some things that may be objectionable, some things, perhaps, that you would like taken out, and other things you would like to put in; yet, take it all in all, considering how the Government were pressed and hurried, considering the clamour for some way into and some way out of the Yukon country, considering that this is building up Canadian trade and commerce and Canadian towns and villages, and considering what will likely flow to the people of Canada from this project, I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that I shall vote heartily for the second reading of this Bill.

To me, this amendment is a mere skeleton; there is no life in it; it is a mere clap trap; it is a trap, for example, to try and catch my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver); but I hope that he may be wise enough to see through the machinations of the evil party on the opposite side. The amendment says that the scheme is indefensible. Why, Sir, this amendment itself is absolutely indefensible. There is nothing to defend in it. What I have seen take place in this House to-day was to me one of the greatest wonders, because, when the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) was speaking, and when he was talking about the Edmonton route, whenever he said a word against the Stikine route, we had "Hear, hears" and applause from hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir, in the days when the solid six came from British Columbia, these were the days when the Conservative party thought wonders of British Columbia. But that is all changed. When we have to tell the people out there that anything that is being done by this Government to build up British Columbia is jeered at by the Conservative side of the House, the people of British Columbia will have their eyes open to the character of the Conservative party; and I believe their confidence and support will go out more fully to this Liberal Government, which is trying to do something, not merely for British Columbia, but for the whole people of Canada. I say, in conclusion, that in accordance with the sentiment which I have always expressed, the question which is before us is one which ought to rise above partisanship. The most bigoted political partisan must recognize that Canada is waking from the dead; it is rising up to a new life. There are signs of commercial prosperity through all and over all the provinces. I make no claim as to who brings that prosperity, but it is evident to all that there is prosperity in the country, that our people are busy and more than busy. Why, most business places in Vancouver have had to double their accommodation and to double their stores. The iron works have had to be extended; they are importing men from the east; we have our shipbuilding yards making boats for the Stikine and Teslin Lake and other places. Never the like business activity has been seen in the history of British Columbia as we witness at the present time. Gentlemen, are you going to block this; are you going to play into the hands of the enemy? I do not care what the Americans may do; to me it is not of the slightest interest what the American Senate may do, but I say this, that the members of this House ought to feel so well disposed to their rights, to their privileges, to their opportunities upon the highway which treaty has given them that if the American people should attempt to block us, so far as the Stikine River is concerned, we ought to be as one in our determination that if we cannot get the all-Canadian route that way, we shall have it another way, so that the whole trade of this country may be preserved for the Canadian people.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, Walter Savage Landor tells us, in one of his imaginary conversations between Pitt and Canning, that when Pitt thinks he is about to hand over his illustrious successor the reins of government, he attempts to inculcate into him the mysteries of political administration. There are a few words that particularly apply to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maxwell) who has just taken his seat. "My dear Canning," said he, "when the clouds gather around you, when you find yourself in a difficult position, above all things, Canning, be patriotic, be patriotic. Swear to the Gods that you only remain in power to serve the interests of your country, and that you are unwilling in this great crisis in your country's history to hand over her destinies to be the prey of cruel demagogues. Canning, as a last resort, be pious; the people believe in religion, and the people believe in piety."

My friend the illustrious representative from Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) has played both roles to-night: he commenced by being patriotic; he wound up by being pious. Just what particular bump in his cranium had been disturbed, or what particular ganglion in his cerebral make up has been affected, I do not know. There has been some change in his life by which the preaching of religion has been given up for the practice of it in politics—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. POWELL. Hon. gentlemen opposite must see that I was paying the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maxwell) a great compliment. I said he gave up the preaching of religion and now attended to the practice of it. Hon. gentlemen opposite were hasty in their cries of dissent.

Mr. FOSTER. They did not believe you.

Mr. POWELL. If that does not suit, to use the expression of my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Monk), we might reverse the laugh, and I think the contrary would meet with more condemnation probably than the correct understanding of what I have said. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maxwell) has referred to the action of the Government as not being hasty. Whether it be hasty or not hasty, I am not going this evening to discuss, but there is one thing I shall say. The action of the Government is submitted to Parliament for its approval or for its disapproval, and this scheme comes before the House to-night as if it were a scheme coming for the opinion of the House in the first instance. And, Sir, when we are weighing the arguments advanced, we must weigh them free entirely from any consideration as to what the results to the Government may be, for in the terms of the contract itself, it must be approved by the Parliament of Canada before it can be operative, and unless a statute of ratification is passed, the contract simply falls to the ground.

The Solicitor General, the other evening, expressed great surprise, and he told us that the discussion had been a series of surprises. I can assure him, this discussion has been a series of surprises to gentlemen on this side of the House. It was a great surprise, when a gentleman of the ability of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) came before the House with one of the most important measures that had ever been submitted to Parliament—and I shall justify my assertion in a few moments by showing how it is one of the most important measures that has been submitted to this Parliament—it was a great surprise that that hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) should come before this House and glory in his enormous wealth of ignorance concerning this contract; and it was a great surprise that the only thing he could advance to this House as a ground on which we could endorse and ratify the action of the Government, was, because it was a subject on which the Government knew nothing and the transaction with Mann & Mackenzie was a huge gamble.

That, Sir, was a great surprise. It was greater surprise that a gentleman of his ability, upon a great question like this, upon which he should have risen to the dignity of statesmanship, should have side-tracked the discussion to a spirited, able and decent discussion of the manners of the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) when he was a boy. It was also, Sir, a great surprise to this House to find the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Fitzpatrick), who from his position is entitled to have his words treated as being at least the genuine expression of his heart and mind, resorting to what, if it were not unparliamentary, I would say, was the trick of a pettifogger in giving to the House the view of Mr. Phillimore by reading from a text-book one-half of a passage, and suppressing the other which contained the author's disapproval of the first half which has merely a recital of opinions he condemned. It was a surprise to this House that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) a young man—whatever may be his ability I care not—that one of his short existence in the House should have directed to a gentleman of the age and experience and reputation of the hon. leader of the Opposition, language and demeanour which would lead us to suppose that during his stay in the wild and woolly west he had acquired some possessions coarser than fine gold. It was also a surprise to this House that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), a gentleman whose long parliamentary record is an honourable one, should have treated the question in the manner he did. Whatever suspicions we may have of other men on that side of the House, I would pay him the compliment of saying that the members of the Opposition in this House, and the country generally, have never supposed his course to be directed by mercenary considerations, nor by other than fairly high political principles. It was a surprise, I say, that a man of his ability, when this great question of national importance was before us, had nothing more to offer to this House and the country than a complicated mosaic of stale witticisms of most antique pattern.

It is necessary for us, Mr. Speaker, in discussing this matter, to look fairly and squarely in the face the issue as submitted to Parliament. What is submitted to Parliament? A scheme to construct a railway across the coast range of mountains. The great object these gentlemen have in view is to open up communication with the great northern country known as the Yukon district. That is their great object; and for their alleged haste they put upon record this justification. They say that the road is demanded in the interests of trade and good government and that it was necessary under the circumstances to violate that sacred political principle that every scheme involving a disposition of the public funds of this country, should in the first place receive the assent of Parliament. They say that their justification for the course they have taken was the emergency of the situation, and that emergency imperatively demanded immediate action.

Gentlemen on this side of the House are as anxious that a highway should be opened to the Yukon country as gentlemen on that side of the House. If it is essential that that means of ingress into and egress from the district should be opened up immediately, we are as willing to open it up as they are. If this scheme is a good one and to carry it out involves a tax upon the public treasury of this country, is the record of the Liberal-Conservative party such that they are afraid to spend public money for the necessary opening up and development of any section of this country? Hon. gentlemen talk about extravagant land grants made by the Conservative party when in power in connection with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I myself might declare that I am in favour of no monopoly of any kind; and at the time that monopoly in land was foisted upon this country, the reason it was done was because of the clamour of the Liberal party in this Parliament, the Opposition of the day, who protested against taking from the public treasury a dollar for opening up a country which they claimed was destined for ages and ages to be the home of the wolf and the bear. But, Sir, when the country rose to a just appreciation of the magnitude of that country, and realized how wise and patriotic was the principle that directed the party led by Sir John Macdonald, and when the Government of the day, feeling that the monopoly of land was too large, proposed to take 10,000,000 acres of that land back, who raised the howl but hon. gentlemen opposite.

They say that they wish to get a means of communication to the Yukon country during the present autumn—for what purpose? In order that famine and disease shall not be rampant in that lone land. I can assure them that we on this side of the House have as much sympathy for our fellow-men as they have. We are willing to go to any reasonable expense to help out those adventurous men of our own nationality who have gone to be the pioneers in that land; but I for one, object to the expenditure of one cent to aid any alien proletariat who go into that country, not for the purpose of building up Canada, but for the purpose of filching our riches and carrying them off to a foreign country.

Now, Sir, this scheme which is submitted to the House opens up four considerations. In the first place, is it necessary to have means of communication into that country at all? In the second place, is it necessary to have means of communication into that country opened up before the 1st of September, 1898? In the third place, so far as a railway forms a link in the chain of proposed communication, is it necessary to select the Stikine route? And, lastly, is it advisable to give this enormous land grant which the Government propose to give to this company? To the consideration of these four matters I shall now address myself for a few moments.

With the object of opening up to the outside world this great country, we on this side are in most hearty sympathy; I regard this, as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat regards it, as one of the great epochs or turning points in the history of this country. In the history of every country in which large quantities of gold have been discovered—in Australia, California, New Zealand—the opening up of large and rich tracts of gold-bearing lands has been ever the cause of stupendous development of the country. Victoria was simply a colony of convicts until the discovery of gold, after which her population leaped up in one decade from about 75,000 to about 541,000 souls. The population of California, the year before the discovery of gold, was about 100,000, and four years afterwards it had increased to about 225,000. The only reason why the discovery of gold in British Columbia did not give the same great impetus to the development of that country, was that geographical conditions were against it. California and Australia had great stretches of arable land fit for cultivation, and the settlement of those lands followed the discovery of gold. There is a lesson for the Government to ponder over and profit by.

Let us look for one moment at the geographical condition of the Yukon. That district lies, severed from Eastern Canada by a long untraversed stretch of country. It is in close proximity to the Pacific Ocean. Lay out a map before you and the great fact will strike you immediately, that to make a entrepot for the district on the Pacific slope is to rob us of the great advantages that are now opening up before us. There can be no question but that the development of the Yukon must increase trade enormously. In all probability the increase in the next ten years in the trade in agricultural and manufactured products will range between $10,000,000 and $20,000,000 annually. The province of British Columbia, despite the eloquent arguments made by my hon. friend from that province (Mr. Morrison), last evening and this afternoon is not an agricultural country. It is absurd to talk about it as such. Almost the entire agricultural products consumed in that province either come from the Canadian North-west or from the Pacific States in the great Republic to the south. So far as agricultural products are concerned, what countries are going to compete for the trade of the whole, and what is likely to be the amount of that trade? If you will take the estimate of the requirements of the British army, making allowance for horses and cattle which will be taken into the country, you will find that a population of 100,000 and there will probably be that many the next year or the year after in that region—means a trade in agricultural products of about $5,000,000 per annum. Who is going to get that trade is the question for this Government to solve in the interests of our people. $5,000,000 annually! Is it going to flow into the pockets of the farmers of Canada or shall it go into the pockets of the farmers of Oregon and Washington Territory and California, who are our great competitors for that trade? How do we stand as respecting our facilities to capture this trade? Against the Americans are the customs duties of Canada; but against the Canadian North-west is a long stretch of transportation with a series of transshipments. Circumstances are overwhelmingly in favour of the Americans, and I have no hesitation in saying that, so far as the trade in agricultural products is concerned, the Americans have even now stolen that away from us, if this iniquitous contract is proceeded with. The Government have committed themselves to a policy which, if carried out, would be most detrimental to the interests of the farmers of Canada. They lack foresight and are unequal to the occasion.

Then the other branch of trade is that in manufactured articles. In the lighter lines, there is no question but a large amount of that trade will go to Canada. But in the heavier and bulkier articles, it is as certain as that the sun will rise to-morrow, that the geographical conditions of the country will force that trade to states of the great Republic lying on the Pacific slope, unless British Columbia rises up and becomes a great manufacturing country—which it cannot become simply because it has not constituency enough for trade. The plea of these hon. gentlemen opposite is that they are opening up this country and building this railway—for what? To give Canada the trade? Why, does not the force of the absurdity of such a plea dawn upon you? If the natural circumstances in favour of the United States are such that without any railway that trade is going to be filched away from us by the republic, will not the increased facilities which we are opening to the United States as well as ourselves to get into that country make it still easier for them to capture that trade? That plea, Sir, is false and hollow. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) has been referred to by the correspondent of the Montreal "Witness" as a perfect Napoleon in commercial strategy. Well, Mr. Speaker, if he were a perfect Napoleon in commercial strategy, he would never have undertaken the scheme he is endeavouring to thrust upon this country. He is the Napoleon of Leipzig and Waterloo. The rule in military, and it applies in commercial matters as well, is to get your base of supplies as close to the field of action as possible. Start your road, as my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) has said, start your means of communication, say at Edmonton, push it up directly to the Pelly River, and then have steamboat navigation to the gold fields of the Yukon. By doing that, you will ensure for all time the trade of that country in agricultural products to the people of the North-west, and the member of the North-west who votes for this contract is untrue to his constituents, and, in the language of John Quincy Adams, "will go down to posterity but damned to eternal fame." The moment hon. gentlemen reflect that the agricultural products of Canada, to compete with the products of the United States, have to cross and recross the Rockies, subject to transshipment and whatever bothersome regulations the United States may make as regards the navigation of the Stikine, that moment you recognize our weakness in successful competition, in agricultural products by way of any Pacific Coast line.

I return to the trade in manufactured articles. So far as that is concerned, build your road from Edmonton, and its strategic importance is such that Canada, as long as she is a manufacturing country, will have the trade in manufactured products and the United States cannot compete with her. As a matter of strategy, the interest of this country would be served by preventing any access whatever from the Pacific Ocean for agricultural and manufactured products, by allowing nothing further than means of access simply for the men who choose to go in and out of the country. That barrier of the rocky mountain Providence has put there. Construct a railway and you open for the American Cyrus a path through the impregnable walls that guard this Babylon. The moment that is done you guarantee the loss to Canada of one-half if not nine-tenths of the Yukon trade.

The second point is: I will discuss the desirability to have that road constructed by the 1st of September? What is the plea of the Government? It is that the rush of adventurous spirits into that country will be such that during the present winter famine will stare them in the face. All I have to say about it, that if it is necessary to have that road constructed and an avenue opened up for trade before the 1st of September, for this reason, then these gentlemen on the Treasury benches have created the necessity. Did not every man who went in there last year take sufficient provisions to last him throughout the winter? The people of the world knew the requirements, and those who went in went prepared to meet the difficulties of the case. But if men going in this year are not prepared, it is because those gentlemen opposite have given out to the world that by the 1st of September there will be abundant facilities for taking in supplies and all fear of famine might be scattered to the winds. It is not necessary for me to discuss at any length the question whether it is necessary by the 1st of September to complete this road. I ask you, what reason exists for opening up that country during the present year at all. The one great object of getting into that country is to get the gold. That cannot rot; it must remain there, secure in its casement of frost. It will not run away; it will not be stolen; men must go there to take it out, and if men do not go there to take it out it will remain, and whether it is taken out this year or next year is perfectly immaterial, so long as we are guaranteed the trade when it is taken out.

I hear a remark from the hon. member from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), but I do not catch exactly what he says. The hon. member has such a euphonic voice that I always like to hear him. Will he please repeat this observation?

An hon. MEMBER. He settled the question.

Mr. POWELL. It was a very effectual settlement of one question when he, one of the great leaders of the Liberal party who had shared in the battle was neglected in the division of the spoil. I think it will take a little of the gold of the Yukon to smooth over the difficulties in his case.

Now, let us pass on to the Stikine route. We must bear in mind that the railway is only one of three stages of communication. First, there is the navigation of the Stikine River to Glenora; second, there is the railway across from the Stikine to the head of Teslin Lake, and, in the third place, there is the navigation of the chain of lakes and rivers down to Dawson City. Take these three stages by themselves. First, the portion from the mouth of the Stikine to the head of navigation on it. Remember that all the material for the construction of the railway has to be taken up the Stikine River, and has to be there for the 1st of September. Hon. gentlemen if they reflect one moment, will see clearly that all the boats that these gentlemen, Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie, are preparing to put on that route will not of themselves be equal to the task of the carriage of the railway material. What do these little steamboats that are to be put upon this route amount to? It is said that large boats can be towed up the river. I do not intend to quibble about the size of the boats; but I say that any man who has had any experience of nautical affairs at all who will propound to this House as a practical proposition that steamboats can go up an eight-mile current in a crooked river and tow barges, is either a knave or a fool. In the first place, think what an enormous current an eight-mile current is. It must be an eight-mile freight boat that holds her own against it. And if she has to tow a barge, and if the barge is as large as herself, it would take a most powerful and fast boat to make her way up that river, if it were possible against the current. The engine power of such a boat would be enormous, and there is not the depth of water to float her. I claim in respect to this matter, to have considerable practical knowledge and I venture the assertion that no steamboat can go up that stream against an eight-knot current herself unless assisted by warps around the turns. This is borne out by the reports submitted by the Government. The moment she puts her bow past a point where there is a sharp turn in the river, and is struck on the bow by the current, she is swung around as quick as lightning and, with the speed she has got on she must be dashed on the rocks opposite the point. Anybody who knows anything about vessels will appreciate the almost impossible difficulties to contend against. The Minister of Public Works may talk about this as though it were an easy matter. Mr. Ogilvie in his report mentions the fact that a boat going up the river was obliged to use warps to get around the turn. They were not obliged to use warps to overcome the current, but to keep the vessel in the channel. A warp attached to the bow of the boat is made fast to the shore and as she strikes the current coming around a bend in the river her bow is held, and instead of being driven over to the opposite shore, she is gradually turned in line with the rushing current, and when she is turned she can steam up on again. It is easy to see how impracticable it would be with a barge in tow to get around these turns.

Again, these gentlemen furnish information so contradictory that it is difficult to know what to rely upon and what to reject. I take it that the reliable information as to the Stikine River is not the report of Mr. Jennings or the report of Mr. Ogilvie, but the report of Mr. St. Cyr, who was selected by Mr. Jennings to make the report on this river, and is the only man who has made anything like an exhaustive survey of the river. What does he say? First, as respects the steamboat route, he tells you plainly that it takes one whole day to go up to the foot of Little Cañon, about ninety miles from the sea. The balance of the distance is fifty miles, and it takes two whole days to cover it. When a steamboat, and a powerful steamboat, requires three days to go up the river, what would a steamboat require with barges in tow? It would take a day to unload at Glenora at the head of navigation, a day to load at Wrangel. You can safely calculate on it requiring not less than six or seven days for a round trip for any of these steamboats now being constructed. These men have thirty days in which to work after the 1st of September, when the road is supposed to be completed. All the goods have to be got to the head waters of Teslin Lake before the last of September, otherwise they cannot be got down to Dawson City on account of the closing of ice of the Hootalinqua River in the first days of October. One steamboat, then, will be able to make at the outside, five trips, and that only in the best of weather. The hon. Minister of Marine is the Neptune of Canada; and his colleague the forcastle member of the Government (Mr. Dobell) seems to be the Æolus. Which of them controls the winds and waves and locks them up in a dark cavern? I do not know; at any rate, I think his jurisdiction does not extend to the Dixon Inlet. Remember, the last half of the month of September is generally very stormy. The equinoxials are on about the 21st. Every one who has had any experience of the sea knows what weather is then to be expected. I candidly admit that there are times when one could venture on the bosom of the Atlantic in a birch bark canoe. And in the same way, there are times when these scows or barges could be brought across from Wrangel to the Stikine in safety and their steamers must cross that portion of open sea. But there are other times, especially from the 15th to the end of September when it would be impossible to get these light draft steamers and barges away from Wrangel at all. But suppose we assume, all things considered, that a steamboat makes five trips a month. What is to be taken up? Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that 50,000 tons of freight will be required to meet the wants of the people who will be there next winter.

Why, these river boats would not take more than 150 tons at the best. That means five trips apiece, it requires fifty steamboats, and I understand they are only preparing three. Now as far as the railway is concerned, what do we find? We find an attempt to deceive this House, the same as I charge the Solicitor General with attempting to deceive this House respecting international law, and as I charge the Minister of the Interior with deliberately attempting to deceive this House and trifle with its intelligence when he attempted to palm off the encomiums of a United States paper on this contract, when the terms upon which the encomiums were based were entirely different from the terms of the contract itself. This policy of hoodwinking, this policy of deceiving, is carried even into the agreement between Mann & Mackenzie and the Government. If this scheme has merits, this scheme that they talk about as the salvation of Canada, if it is going to subserve the interests of Canada to the unparalleled extent claimed, why is it necessary to indulge in falsehood and deception about it? Give us the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. I have the dimensions of these boats now building for the Stikine River. They will carry less than 150 tons each. These people in the Yukon will require 100,000 barrels of flour for the closed season of '98-'99. They will require also 13,000,000 pounds of meat. These two articles of food alone amount to 16,750 tons. To carry them up the Stikine will require 35 steamboats of the capacity of these steamboats making five trips each. Instead of 35 steamboats the contractors have not five. This steamship line has not one-seventh of the capacity necessary to take food enough up the river to keep the miners in the country.

Now in this contract there is written in as the length of the road 150 miles. Turn to Mr. St. Cyr's report, he was the engineer who made the report on the route, (Mr. Jennings was simply the pilot who went ahead of him). Mr. St. Cyr says that it is possible, from Glenora to the head waters of the Teslin Lake, to construct a road, a trail 175 miles long that will cost from $100 to $200 per mile, according to its completeness and capacity to stand wear and tear. Now, if that trail is to be 175 miles long, what is the length of the railroad going to be? This railroad will not probably be less than 200 miles long. I have not the slightest doubt from the information I have but it will. When they make their calculation of

3,750,000 acres of land to be given to Mann & Mackenzie, they are astray according to the report of their own engineer whom they are bound to trust, and upon whose survey of the country they have entered into this contract and have submitted it to Parliament. According to his report of the probable length of that railway, at the very least the Government will be bound to give no less a quantity than 4,375,000 acres, that is, if I am right in assuming that to build a railway would require as long a route as to build a trail. We all know how much shorter a trail would ordinarily be made than a railway—and if I am right in assuming it is going to be 260 miles long, then it is not only 3,700,000 acres of land, but 5,000,000 acres the Government will have to give, or 4,000,000 more than Mr. Hamilton Smith is willing to construct the road for. But I will discuss this matter later. What is the carrying capacity of this railway? In the first place it is going to have a 28-pound rail. Any gentleman in this House who knows anything about railroads will acknowledge that it is utterly absurd to talk about 10-ton cars on such a rail. The grade is such, the rails will require so light an engine, that it will be impossible to put cars on that road carrying more than seven tons. On the Intercolonial Railway in its early days, coal was carried in 7-ton cars, which were enlarged to 10 and 15 tons capacity as the rails were made heavier. Allow 12 cars of 7 tons carrying capacity each as a fair train and this is too liberal an allowance, and you will find that in order to get 50,000 tons of freight through from the first day of September up to the first day of October, when navigation closes, exclusive of passenger trains, it will require no less than 20 trains per day going and 20 trains per day coming, or forty trains per day on the road at one time to carry this amount of freight. Have the Government looked these facts in the face? I do not believe they have. They are rushing madly into this scheme, and are trying to hoodwink this House and to deceive the people of Canada in reference to it. Mann & Mackenzie, and they understand each other, know exactly the position they are in, because as the hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) pointed it out to the House, there does not rest on the contractors the slightest obligation in the world to provide, for the coming autumn, more than one engine and one car. There is no provision in that contract as to what equipment should be deemed sufficient. Indeed this contract is the greatest curiosity that I ever saw. I would be sorry to suppose that the Minister of Railways and Canals had anything to do with drawing up such a contract. The name of the Minister of Railways and Canals is signed to it, signed by an acting Minister, but he never had anything to do with that contract. I know him too well; I have spent too many days, too many weeks, and too many months associated with him as counsel in legal cases, to believe that he ever was the father of "such a howling slip of wilderness" as this. Suppose that the insuperable difficulties of the Stikine and the railway are past, and the 50,000 tons of freight is landed at the head of the Teslin Lake, it has to be taken down the river before the 1st day of October as I have said. The round trip is 1,300 miles and one of the members of the Government stated that the boats were supposed to carry 70 tons apiece. How many boats then will it take to do the business? It will take 700 round trips. It will take 25 days to make a round trip, and a steamer can only make one round trip in the month of September, she cannot venture on a second because the river is frozen up in the early part of October. To get these provisions and supplies down the river in order to prevent this population from starving, in order to clothe and house them for the winter, it will require 700 steamboats upon the river and upon Teslin Lake. The company cannot have more than 6 at the outside. Now, when this contract was up for discussion it was mentioned by some hon. gentlemen opposite with a great flourish of trumpets that $250,000 had been put up as security by these contractors. Just how that $250,000 remains with the Government I do not know, I defy any hon. gentleman in this House to decide the status of that $250,000. It is there as a security. If we give a security for the performance of any promise that security is simply liable for the damages that accrue on account of its non-performance; and if this contract is not carried out, then the $250,000 of a security can only be liable to the extent that the Government has suffered. Now, I ask the Ministers: What damages can the Government suffer? The possible damages are so remote, that the Government can in any case receive only nominal damages for a breach of the contract. But supposing they are right, and that the $250,000 remains with them to be forfeited in case of non-fulfilment of this contract, it remains as a guarantee for only one-third of the contract, that is, only for the construction of the railway. The other two stages of this great transportation scheme remain without the guarantee of a solitary dollar or even the personal responsibility of the contractors for their being completed this year. This is the way that the Government have looked after the interests of Canada. This shows what is worse, the duplicity and deception that are attempted to be practised upon the country. The next feature to which I direct my attention is the land grant. A great boast is made by the Government and their friends that they are getting this railway constructed without the expenditure of a single dollar from the public treasury. Why, Sir, these gentlemen are Liberals, these are men who have outgrown the swaddling clothes of the early monopolists and protectionists of the country; yet these same men go back into medieval days when the bullion theory was all in all, and the only wealth was gold. If the country has immense wealth in the Yukon itself, what difference does it make whether we draw on the public treasury to construct this railway, or whether we use up that which is as good as if it were in the public treasury? But it makes a great deal of difference to the country if land that we could turn into cash is given to the extent of ten or twenty times the value of the cash required to build it.

But to proceed. These contractors are to receive 4,650,000 or 5,000,000 acres—which? What does that mean? Hon. gentlemen opposite say that this is only a drop in the bucket, and that the lands are worth nothing. Why, Mr. Speaker, is not this whole scheme based on the supposition that the lands are not only worth something, but that their value is enormous? What does the scheme amount to, if these lands do not possess some value? It is idle to talk about it. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not fit to occupy their present position, unless the lands possess some value, because this Government should not do what they themselves surely regard, and what their predecessors in our Parliaments have regarded, as an act hostile to the interests of this country, and as immoral, and have placed laws on the Statute-book to suppress—and that is the act of gambling. Their course would be censurable on another ground. The Government should never give undue impetus to the adventurous spirit of those who are simply going to squander their means and obtain nothing in return.

But are these lands worth nothing? What do we know? Simply what we get from the report of officers who are in the employ of hon. gentlemen opposite themselves, not his fame as a scientist gone, not only as being high officials, but as bearing world-wide reputations. Take Dr. Dawson. Has not his fame as a scientist gone, not only through this land and the whole of America, but over Europe? Sir, he has secured world-wide fame. Take the other gentlemen associated with him. It is true their fame is not so widespread, but they are most highly-respected and competent scientists. And what do they say? We heard Mr. Ogilvie in the opera house. The Government kindly adjourned the House so that members might listen to his lecture, and what did he tell his audience, which included hon. gentlemen who are now occupying the Treasury benches? He said that in the Yukon there is gold enough in sight to occupy the energies of all the people that can get into the country for the next ten years. He declared that this was one of the richest gold fields the world possessed. He told of a man who had four claims and had reaped such a golden harvest from them that a San Francisco syndicate had given him $2,000,000 for them, nearly two-thirds of the total cost of this proposed railway. He told us that there was a mountain that was all gold-bearing rock, worth from $6 to $12 per ton, awaiting the advent of machinery to work it. Any one who knows anything about gold is aware that unless it is very peculiar rock, it must pay such high returns so soon as a stamp mill is taken in there, that the owner will become a Croesus. Is the land worth nothing? Take up the first newspaper at hand, and hon. gentlemen will find reports of men who returned with $175,000 or $150,000 and down to $30,000, as the result of last winter's operations. Is the land worth nothing? It is said by the Government that the gold-bearing lands are so extensive that these contractors will only receive one-twentieth of the whole. That is another attempt to hoodwink the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to assume that there is not sufficient intelligence among hon. members to discriminate between gold measures and the localities where gold is actually found. For illustration, take the maritime provinces. One-half of New Brunswick lies in the carboniferous area, but in the most of the area there is not enough coal found to fill a man's eye. Take the actual gold-bearing portion of Nova Scotia, and you could count it by the tens of acres, and yet there are almost a million of acres of auriferous formation in that province. I am sorry the hon. member for Guysborough is not here. He would object to the Government's method of gauging values by bulk as not having been pursued in his case.

An hon. MEMBER. He is on strike.

Mr. POWELL. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) prepared an elaborate plan according to scale, which he exhibited in the House, and pointed out how small was the square painted black, I think—it should have been green. This square was for the purpose of comparing the lands granted with the total area of the whole gold-bearing tract. The adoption of the means of comparison is too absurd to attack. The point is, how much of actual gold-producing land this area will cover. From 7,000 to 8,000 square miles are given to Mann & Mackenzie. There is a width of 300 feet allowed on the river as a claim for placer mining. They can start a base line where they please. That will give them six miles to start with and the privilege of extending 9 miles on each side, giving a total stretch of 24 miles. They can run a base line in two ways: either according to the cardinal points of the compass, or according to the direction of the stream. If they adopt the former, they get 6 miles in length, the first block taking in the stream, and the Government gets alternate sections of the balance—along the base line—the contractors can extend the first block 9 miles up and 9 miles down stream. As the great majority of the rivers where gold is found run east and west, the man is a mere tyro in surveying who could not place the base line so as to take 24 miles of the stream, and if the contract is ratified, as it stands, they could take in 1,200 miles of stream, or at all events, 1,000 of the 1,400 miles of placer bed in the whole Yukon district. After they got this haul there would be a million or two acres with which to scoop in the gold mountain, coal beds, timber lands and every thing in sight. The Minister of Railways told the House that the contractors take all the chances. We might add the definition some time given of a Scotchman. He keeps Sunday and everything else he can put his hands on. These contractors not only take the chances, but they take the country and everything as well. Take the amount of the grant at 4,375,000, as if the railway will only be 175 miles long. What does it mean? It has been shown that one of the placer claims is 250 feet wide. This grant of 6,000 miles would give five belts right around the whole globe, each 250 feet wide. Imagine a belt one-quarter of a mile wide around the world, of the richest bearing gold land. I was astonished at the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture. He said the land was not of much value. The top dressing for this grant in this province would cost twenty times what he values the richest gold-bearing area in the world. A change, I understand, is going to be made in the matter of the selection of these blocks. Let us see what that change means. It is in respect to the extension of the three blocks of three miles square each on each side of the contractors' blocks along the base line. The intimation given was simply that these will alternate between the Government and the country. What does that involve? That this company can take the first block of 3 miles contiguous to the six they have in any block on the base line, and the Government will take the next. The contractors then have twelve continuous miles and will not be obliged to go further; and then they can run out another base line, get another continuous 12 miles, and it does not require many blocks of 12 miles to constitute a Vanderbilt.

As was pointed out by the hon. gentleman from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), one of the great evils in this contract is not so much the vast extent of territory it gives as the power of selection with which it invests these contractors. The Government engineer, as I have said, mentions 175 miles as the very shortest distance the railway can be, and the sinuosities of the route will doubtless increase it twenty-five miles more, so that the contractors have 111 selections; an enormous privilege. This country may not meet expectations, it may not pan out well, it may simply be a temporary excitement that is running over the world in respect to it. But what the Government has done is to place in the hands of Mann & Mackenzie the power to take advantage of this excitement and make millions out of it. The Minister of the Interior knows how the applications are pouring into his department day after day by the hundreds from England and elsewhere to secure these lands, and I have no hesitation in saying that in view of this gold excitement, Mann & Mackenzie can go on the English market and float this charter at $50,000,000 or $60,000,000. Supposing the land be not worth so much as the scientific men say, yet the evil is that the Government are bartering away a magnificent chance, and absolutely handing all its possibilities over to these men. I shall not go into details of the defects of this agreement. The agreement itself, Mr. Speaker, is so monstrous, it so does violence to every principle of wholesome economy, it is drafted so loosely, slovenly and inartificially, it gives such enormous rights, privileges, franchises and monopolies, that to use the language of Dean Swift: I do not think the Government could have done worse if they had gone to Hades for their principles and to Bedlam for their discretion.

The magnificent possibilities of this country should be for the young men of Canada. If trade is increasing at the present moment, it is due to the thrill of national inspiration that is the resultant of the discovery of these gold fields. If these mining regulations be continued as they are, handing our minerals over to aliens, tying up the whole country in the hands of this monopoly, the result will be discouragement and dissatisfaction among Canadians. I can assure the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches that if they seek to maintain order and good government in that country with this iniquitous grant and its unjust provisions in force, it will tax the resources of the militia of this country to its fullest extent. We know what restive people these miners are. We know what will be their discontent when, working on a claim adjoining that of Mann & Mackenzie, they will have to pay 10 per cent royalty while Mann & Mackenzie only pay 1 per cent. We know that these miners will endeavour to get even with the Government and with Mann & Mackenzie in some way. But, Sir, not only does the gold go to Mann & Mackenzie, but the valuable forests on the land which is given to them also, and which means untold wealth in themselves. In addition, they can scoop out the coal mines of the country, and these coal mines as incidental to mining operations in such a remote territory are almost as valuable as the gold itself.

I have spoken to gentlemen who are familiar with that country on the subject, and their testimony and the reports of Dr. Dawson and of Mr. McConnell and of others bear me out in the statement that it is a very easy thing indeed to build a road from Edmonton to the Pelley River. The right hon. First Minister told us yesterday that the road from Edmonton would have to go over the range of the Rocky Mountains. I beg to inform the right hon. gentleman that the Liard River, where it strikes the course of the Rocky Mountains, reach a fault and the Rockies at this point actually leap forty-two miles to the eastward, and the river goes through by a gap not over 2,500 feet above the level of the sea, and the route as easy as over a prairie, so far as railway construction is concerned. Not only that, but along this route on the Liard River and the had water of St. Francis Lake, and the lower reaches of the Pelly, there are magnificent forests. They tell us in the reports that there are thousands and thousands of acres, yes, thousands of miles, of spruce. And if a road taps these forests, there would immediately be opened up a great trade in lumber for the North-west. Vast gold fields exist along this route also. The moment the Edmonton Railway would be opened up, there would be the great advantage and inducement to the settler that he would have an immediate market which the pioneer in the North-west had not. Every settler means a purchaser for the eastern manufacturer. And the eastern provinces of the Dominion share in the great benefits of the boom and in the greater resulting permanent benefits. The people who are going in and coming out of the country have no inducement to settle if the railway went by the Pacific slope. By the Edmonton route settlers have the virgin lands of the Peace River district, extending 400 miles from Edmonton, one of the richest and most fertile pastoral regions, they say, on the whole face of the globe, with the splendid market in the Yukon for their agricultural products. From my conversation with those people who know whereof they affirm and from the reports of Dr. Dawson, Mr. McConnell and others, I have no hesitation in saying that contractors could be found who would be content to build the railway from Edmonton to the Pelly River for less than the grant of gold lands given these favoured contractors for the construction of this tramway. If the Government adopt the policy suggested from this side of the House the young men of this country would have great hope in the future, but if this deal is consummated, our rising generation will find themselves on going out there simply "the sport and prey of a racking" monopoly.

My hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney), in his eloquent address, during the course of this debate, associated these contractors, by way of illustration, with Jason and his company who sailed after the Golden Fleece. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) owes an apology to Jason. The idea of comparing Jason and his band of heroes to this piratical crew that are to take possession of the Yukon and squeeze it to its death. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) waxed warm when addressing the House yesterday. It was a perfect melodrama not to be exceeded by anything from Shakspeare, not even by the wrath which Macbeth conjures up when he discants on the horrors of the murder of poor Duncan. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was going to force this deal through. The Government, he told us have taken it in hand, and the old war-horse when he scented the battle from afar pawed in the valley and the glory of his snorting was terrible. Is the hon. gentleman in this Macbethian frenzy to appease the inward monitor? The Government is going to put this contract through. Yes, Sir, they are, heedless of all the warnings that are given, they pay no respect to the criticisms of the press of the country; they have made up their minds to rush madly on. Why, Sir, he suggested to me the captain of the vessel in "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea," who rushed on and on and on and finally landed his vessel and crew in the maelstrom. Sir, the maelstrom of public discontent and public disapproval is ahead of these gentlemen on the Treasury benches, unless they abandon their proposal. The contract is here to be dealt with as in the first instance. If members of this House believe that a better bargain could be made, they are in honour bound to vote for it, because the contract is subject to the approval of Parliament. We have a better offer, an offer by which the road can be built for one-fourth of the quantity of gold lands offered to these people—an offer from the strongest syndicate of capitalists that can be got together.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I thank you and the House for the kind and considerate attention you have given me. I deprecate ratifying this contract, with all its enormities, with all the franchises and monopolies which it hands over to these people. It suggests the Laocoon, Canada and Canada's two children, the Yukon district and the Mackenzie district, will writhe in the coils of this python monopoly for generations, and one of the not less horrible features about it is that we, law-abiding citizens of Canada are bound at our own expense to throw around these people the ægis of the law, to protect them in their extortion, to secure them in their plunder.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Fowell), being a legal gentleman, has discussed the other side of this subject fairly well. As a rule, Mr. Speaker, legal gentlemen can speak equally well on either side of a question; but, if the hon. gentleman had been arguing the question from this side of the House, he could have made a much better speech than the one he has just made. Now, I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman through the whole course of his speech. All I intend to do on this occasion is to give my opinion of this contract from a purely business standpoint. The hon. gentleman advocates the Edmonton route. I also, Mr. Speaker, would advocate the Edmonton route if conditions permitted.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. I would be very glad if the circumstances were such that the railroad to be built to the Klondike would go through our agricultural country, and thereby hold a large population in the country who might perhaps be disappointed in the production of gold. I would be very glad if that could be done; but are the circumstances at present such as to permit of that being done? I do not think they are, for the reason that the building of a railroad by the Edmonton route would under present conditions take far too long a time. The hon. gentleman condemns the contract under all circumstances. He apparently would not have it at all. He would not have Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann build the railroad, but he would have Mr. Hamilton Smith build it on the same route for a less grant of ground. There is that one inconsistency, at any rate, in his remarks. Furthermore, according to him the building of the road by the Stikine and Teslin Lake route, by the more rapid route, is going to lose to Canada a tremendously large traffic, and is going to divert it to the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. Hon. gentlemen say, "hear, hear." I do not think the business men of this country will say "hear, hear." I do not think one sound business man in this country will say "hear, hear."

An hon. MEMBER. Prove it.

Mr. EDWARDS. The building of this road as it is now being done is just what is going to give Canada a large amount of business which would have gone to the United States if we had waited to build by the Edmonton route.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. Hon. gentlemen may go on with their interruptions, but I intend to make my speech. It will not be a very long speech. I am not in the habit of making long speeches. Another remark made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat was that this railway is being built in the interests of people who are going to filch our wealth from us; and later on he said that he hoped that that country would be preserved to the youth of Canada. Mr. Speaker, as a business man, my position is that I hope that not one of the agriculturists of Canada will go to the Klondike, but I hope that the rest of the world will go to the Klondike and engage in the production of gold. What is the profit we are to get out of the Klondike? Is it in the immediate production of the gold itself? Not at all. The advantage to Canada is in the business to be developed in the production of the gold, not in the immediate production of the gold itself. What is the history of the production of gold? Has the gold of the world been produced at a profit? The gold of the world up to date has been produced at a loss, and is the experience of the Klondike going to be different from that of all the other gold fields of the world? I hope it will be. I hope that a turn will be taken, and that gold will be produced in that country at a profit. But I do not think it will. A few men will make fortunes, but the great body of the men engaged in the production of gold will produce it at a loss; and I will be very glad indeed if those who the hon. gentleman terms as those who are going to filch our wealth and the class who will go there are not the agriculturists of Canada. The great question before the Canadian people, in my judgment, is this: is it desirable that communication should be established with that country by railroad and by navigation? I believe it should be established, and in the quickest possible way. I believe it should be established in the interest of the people of Canada, and my judgment is that the very best route has been chosen under the circumstances. The next question is: is the bargain a good one or a bad one? My opinion is that the bargain is a good one. I believe it is a good one, for the reason that the road we are to have is a certainty.

An hon. MEMBER. A tramway.

Mr. EDWARDS. A tramway, the hon. gentleman says. But it is a great question whether the men who are building the road will ever get anything for it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. Hon. gentlemen say, "hear, hear." Is there one single gentleman sitting on the opposite side of the House who would take the position of the contractors?

Mr. MACLEAN. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. Is there one single gentleman on the other side of the House who is possessed of a million dollars who would stake his million dollars and take their position?

An hon. MEMBER. Scores of them.

Mr. EDWARDS. There is not a single one of them who would stake a million dollars and take their position.

An hon. MEMBER. Would you take it?

Mr. EDWARDS. I would not take $2,000,000 in gold and take their position.

Mr. EDWARDS.

Mr. BERGERON. What about the tenders?

Mr. EDWARDS. We will come to the question of tenders a little later. I make that statement as a business man, and I am not a very timid business man either, but there are those who are more speculative than I, and have greater confidence in the results of gold mining. My opinion is, that the Government are getting this railway built for nothing. That is my opinion, but I sincerely hope that the gentlemen who have undertaken the contract will make money out of it. Will it hurt Canada if they do make a large amount of money out of it? Not at all. What is going to become of that great area? Is it not going to be given away to miners? Will not each individual who goes out there and takes up a mining claim, get his claim and be permitted to go on and mine? Certainly he will. Supposing that gold is found on the grant given to Mackenzie & Mann, and found in great value, the same advantage will accrue to Canada from the mining of it as from the mining in the rest of the world.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. EDWARDS. Precisely the same. Who are to be benefited, apart from the business men of Canada, by the construction of this road? It is the men who are going in there as miners to develop the country. Its total area is, I understand, about 175,000 square miles, equal to 112,000,000 acres, and the gold-bearing district covers an area of 125,000 square miles, equal to 80,000,000 acres. Out of this, a small piece of 3,750,000 acres is given for the construction of the railway and for the benefit of all the remaining portion of that country. I do not think that that is any disadvantage at all to those who will go in there as miners, or to the people of Canada.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are very much exercised over this. They are pleading, or pretend they are, for Canada, but my opinion is that they are simply offering opposition without any good basis of argument at all. They are acting on the general principle of opposing the Government, and that is all there is to it. It would appear, judging by the declamations of these hon. gentlemen, that this is the first instance in Canada where public lands were given for the construction of a railway. But to show the contrary we need only go back to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, when the public Treasury was taxed, perhaps for all time, by a money grant, as well as a large land grant. Previous to and since that time, land grants have been given for the construction of railways. In this very district of Ottawa, 4,000,000 acres of land were voted for the construction of a railway, and there is no comparison as regards valuation between that grant and the one given to Mackenzie & Mann. Was there any such tremendous howl made in Canada then as is made to-day? By no means; and yet those 4,000,000 acres were worth ten times, perhaps one hundred times, as much as the whole of the Klondike region. There is no parallel whatever between giving lands from an agricultural district of great wealth bearing great areas of timber, and giving away land in a territory whose value is purely speculative. No one knows anything about the value of these lands at all. But we have the certainty that the railway will be built, and equipped, and run, in the interest of the people, whereas the contractors take their chances as to what return they are to get.

Mr. SPROULE. What part of the contract secures the running and equipment?

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not think it has ever yet been the case, in the history of Canada, that a railway has been taken over by the Government unless inspected and all the requirements complied with, and the railway found suited for the work it has to perform. I think the same course will be followed in this instance, and I have not the slightest fear that Mackenzie & Mann are such fools as to build a railway and not equip it for the business it is to perform. If 25,000 acres of land per mile were given for the construction of a railway in a timber district, no fault would be found, judging by our past history. We know that, in the province of Quebec, large areas were given away formerly, and even in recent years, and there was no howl made about it. The eyes of the whole people of Canada to-day are upon the Klondike; they think it possesses the wealth of Canada; but, Mr. Speaker, it possesses only a trifling portion of our wealth. Our agricultural lands are our greatest wealth, and next to them are our timber lands, and if I were offered one-eighth of the spruce timber of Quebec for ten Klondikes, I would take the one-eighth of the spruce lands, and in saying this, I have no desire to detract in the slightest from the value of the Klondike. I sincerely hope that every man who goes in there will make money, but there is a very great difference between what we see and know and what we know not of.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. Hon. gentlemen say, "Hear, hear." Well, we know the value of our agriculture and timber lands, but the value of these mineral lands will have to be determined in future years by developing them.

The first notice I saw of this contract was at some distance from here. At first sight, it appeared to me that a large grant was being given for the construction of the railway, but in thinking over the matter by myself, regardless of any remarks made here, I arrived at the conclusion that the contract is in the interests of the people and of the miners who are going to develop that country. In my judgment, it is the best bargain I have ever known to be made between individuals, and certainly the best made between a government and individuals. The Bill has my hearty support, and the amendment before the House, I am of opinion, ought to be rejected.

Mr. CLANCY. As the hour is very late, I hope the right hon. the First Minister will consent to the adjournment of the debate.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I hope that my hon. friend will be ready to go on with his speech, which we are anxious to hear. We must reach the conclusion of this debate some time, and, surely, after three or four weeks devoted to it, we should look to make rapid progress to that end.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. More amendments.

The PRIME MINISTER. All the more reason to go on, even until six o'clock in the morning.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, I promise you that I shall not detain the House at great length. I probably might be excused, as I think any hon. member of this House might be excused, for occupying a short time upon a question of such magnitude and importance as this. I think that every hon. member will be justified in rising and entering his protest against this, the most extraordinary scheme that has ever been presented to the Canadian Parliament. We have had some lectures as to the attitude of the Opposition in discussing this question. We have been told that it involves a cold business transaction, and so we should discuss it in that light and discuss it dispassionately. I agree that that is the way to approach a question, and I venture to say that the Opposition have maintained that course throughout. If hon. gentlemen on this side have been forced to use what, under other circumstances might appear rather strong language, they have not in no case used the language of raillery, but have discussed the question upon fair grounds and have made no attack that was not warranted by the facts. We had a moment ago a speech on this subject, from a business man. Of course we always receive with great deference any opinion of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards).

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On lumber.

Mr. CLANCY. Exactly, on lumber. He has been a most successful man in this province. If we were to judge of the contract before we heard the hon. gentleman's speech we might have wondered how he arrived at his rather enviable position for a business man. He has stated in positive terms that he comes to a conclusion favourable to this contract on one ground and that ground is that the contractors have made a bad bargain. Of all the arguments given in its favour, this is the most extraordinary one. I wonder if Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann were in the gallery. Had they been, I wonder what they would think of hon. gentlemen opposite rising one after another to throw their doubts upon this contract from the contractors point of view by saying that it is worthless. We need nothing more than that a statement of this kind should go before the country; that hon. gentlemen opposite, having entered upon a contract involving four millions acres of land to build a railway into the Yukon can find only one defence, and that is that the contractors have been unwise to accept the contract. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) states that he believed the price to be excessive until when? Until he became convinced that this land was worth nothing. He asks: How then are we to derive a profit from it? And his answer is: Simply from the traffic that will arise. I ask him if it is likely that traffic will arise if this is a bad bargain and the land is worth nothing? How is he going to reconcile the two statements? If we get the return he looks for, then, these gentlemen will run no risks. It is because we believe that there is something in that country, that we believe that these contractors have made a good bargain for them. We have the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) talking in much the same way, and what was his idea? His idea was that we were to place no confidence whatever in the report of Mr. Ogilvie in regard to that country. He said he took upon himself to make that statement. I do not know whether he was put up to make that statement or not. But I ask hon. gentlemen on that side who have sent out these reports from one end of Canada to another, from one end of the world to another, with the purpose of inducing men to go into that country, why they should rise in their places and declare that these reports must be taken with a discount. The hon. member for New Westminster says that this is a matter of mere hearsay so far as Mr. Ogilvie is concerned, and so his report in this respect is not to be relied on. Are hon. gentlemen opposite to talk in one way to induce members in this House to take a certain course upon this Bill, and in another way to induce men to go into that country? Are they to issue these reports to show that this country has attractions and, in this House to say that there is no gold in that country, that the reports are perfectly unreliable and that members of the House are not to pay the slightest attention to that. I ask the reading people of this country, what can they think of such statements as that coming from hon. gentlemen opposite. I ask these hon. gentlemen opposite who have launched this scheme and launched it hurriedly and apparently, without due thought, what must be thought of them when they begin discrediting their own engineer and other officers and who may have spoken favourably of that country, hoping by this means to place themselves in a favourable position. It seems to me one of the most extraordinary positions I ever knew a Government to take.

Before entering upon the merits of the case, I desire to refer for a moment to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). That gentleman made what he wished the House to understand to be a very patriotic speech. He made reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway and to the conduct of the great leader of that time, Sir John Macdonald, and to the speech that was made by the present hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) pointing out to hon. members opposite, who were then sitting on this side, their duties with regard to this great work. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) seemed quite unconscious that he was administering a very severe rebuke to his own friends. Where were they upon that occasion? Why, Sir, they were decrying that great scheme. That scheme was not one parallel with this in any sense. But it seemed that the Minister of Public Works forgot for the time that he breathed a different atmosphere in those times from that he breathes to-day.

He had forgotten that he belonged to a party which, as Sir John A. Macdonald said, must always remain in Opposition because they had never been equal to the task imposed upon them. That is as true to-day as it was then, as is shown by the weakness they have displayed in the scheme now before the House. But that hon. gentleman made the extraordinary statement that this Bill was going through in spite of opposition. Why, Sir, I wonder if hon. gentlemen have given up their rights as members of this House. I wonder if we have come to a day in the Parliament of Canada when hon. gentlemen will rise in this House and declare that any Bill will go through. If we have reached that state of things, we might as well prorogue the House and go home, and leave the Government to conduct the business without the aid of Parliament. Now the one strong ground urged in favour of this scheme is that of urgency, that it was important to construct that road as speedily as possible in order to have some means of getting into that country. One would suppose that if it were necessary to send a military expedition into that country there could not be greater urgency than is now urged for the construction of this road. But here we are not providing for any absolute or immediate need. There is no condition of affairs in the country now existing that would prevent the Government from taking a reasonable time to consider this scheme which they are now asking the House to sanction. If there is a sane man in this House I am sure he will say that the Government would be justified in taking a month, in taking two months, in taking six months, nay more, in taking a year rather than entering upon such a transaction as the one we are now asked to sanction. If we had not a penny in the treasury, if Canada were bankrupt, and we had nothing else but lands to offer, why then it might be pleaded that we were forced by the circumstances of the case to give these lands because we had nothing else to give. If there could be a strong condemnation from start to finish of this transaction, it is that hon. gentlemen have stated that they knew nothing about what they were entering upon. Well, Sir, this country demands that these hon. gentlemen, no matter what the urgency may be, should know something of a scheme of this magnitude before they entered upon it. The building of the railway that is now in question, is only the commencement, if this country turns out to be anything like what we hope and expect, of a much larger system of communication. The construction of this railway is not to serve only a present need or the exigencies of a single year, but it will have a broader and wider significance. You would think to hear some hon. gentlemen talk that this was going to be only a temporary arrangement, temporary in the light of serving a purpose of a momentary character. The First Minister told us that this road is to be merely a road to last possibly for a single year. But when they found later on that some unpleasant complications were threatened between Canada and the United States with regard to bonding and other privileges, these gentlemen have all of a sudden discovered that they must widen their scheme, that they would not be warranted in adhering to the statement of the First Minister that this road was only to serve a temporary purpose. I repeat that there is no question of urgency in that country to-day that can justify the course the Government have taken. One of the reasons urged in favour of this scheme was that in regard to supplies. I watched my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Edwards) and I had hoped that he, as a business man, would be able to find some defence for this contract. It has been repeated frequently on this side of the House that so far as the question of supplies is concerned, there is no immediate demand in that country. The men who have gone into that country are fully equipped, it would be impossible for any one to attempt to cope with all the difficulties incident to a new country like that, if he were not fully equipped with food and clothing, and all other things requisite under the circumstances. Why, then, this hurry about the contract? Why this most indecent haste to meet a need that does not exist at this hour? Where is the demand for rushing this contract through? Have the Government to send a relief expedition up there? The hon. Minister of the Interior made a trip to that country, he looked into the promised land without entering it. I did not hear the hon. gentleman's speech, but I read it with great care, because I was told that he had made an able plea in defence of the Bill, and had answered all the attacks made from this side. I searched that speech in vain to find that the hon. gentleman had met one single argument advanced from this side of the House. He put up men of straw and he knocked them down. He prepared questions himself in order that he might answer them as he liked. We had made the most complete arraignments against the Bill on this side of the House which the hon. gentleman did not attempt to meet. The strongest argument that has been advanced against this contract is that there is no immediate demand made upon the Government for entering into it. They were not taken by surprise by any circumstances that have occurred. They were not taken by surprise because a rebellion had broken out in that country. No such reason could be urged for entering upon that contract so hastily. The Minister of the Interior showed great fear lest the authority of this Government should be overthrown in the Yukon district. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what particular warning he had of that. That is a question that has not yet arisen in that country. I can tell him that if his contract should receive the assent of the House and this Bill should become law, he has already laid the foundation of a rebellion in that country. A cheaper means to avoid rebellion is by laying down a more reasonable and equitable set of rules for the government of the men that are likely to go in there. If the authority of this country is ever in danger of being overthrown, it will be because the men working there will feel that they are treated unjustly, it will be because they endure hardships as a result of this contract. The trouble can only come from a few men who have come from other countries and not from men who have always been a law unto themselves in every mining country in the world. If rebellion should arise in that country the hon. gentleman himself has invited that rebellion, and has laid the foundation for it by placing over the heads of these men laws under which they will chafe, and if rebellion should follow, it is only what might reasonably be expected.

I will not detain the House by discussing at any length the provisions of this contract. They have been discussed very fully by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and I regret no answer has been given to the very grave objections made to the contract. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) and the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) presented the strongest objections possible to this contract. It was stated that it was drawn in the most slipshod manner, and it does not require a legal training to arrive at the conclusion that the contract was purposely left loose or drawn by the solicitor for the contractors; and it is not necessary to read between the lines themselves to observe that it is drawn in the interest of the contractors entirely, and that the interest of the people must suffer. No hon. gentleman opposite has dared to rise and controvert any of these charges. The House heard the hon. Solicitor General last evening. Hon. members waited with baited breath, anxious to hear his answer to these charges. The hon. gentleman discussed the question for a very considerable time, but he made no attempt to answer the arguments presented by the two hon. gentlemen to whom I have referred. Hon. gentlemen opposite fancy, I think, that it will be very much easier to allow these arguments to go unanswered than undertake to answer them, but any layman can see that these defects in the contract are sufficient to justify its rejection by the House, if there were not other grounds. Hon. gentlemen opposite declare that they were unable to get any other contractors but Mackenzie & Mann to take this contract. A more childish declaration, one that places the Government in a more unenviable position or tends more to show the weakness of the Government can scarcely be imagined, than to see the Government hold up their hands in despair and declare that these were the only men who could undertake the work.

If that be true, who brought that situation about? Has it been brought about by special circumstances, independent of hon. gentlemen opposite, or by some cause over which they have no control. The truth is that the Government placed a time limit so that it was utterly futile to suppose that contractors could fulfil such a contract. When those hon. gentlemen laid down at the last moment, as the Minister of the Interior declared he did, that the Government had only ten or twelve days to consider the contract, that he received the report of the engineer on 13th December and let the contract on the 25th January, I ask what was the impelling power that compelled the hon. gentleman to let the contract on that date, instead of on 25th February, by which date he could have obtained offers from other quarters? The country will come to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman fixed a time limit, not because there was a question of urgency, but for purposes that are apparent on the face of the contract—I will not charge hon. gentlemen opposite with corruption, but the contract bears all the evidences of bad faith. Mr. Kersey was, in fact, forced within a single day to make an offer, and he was compelled to return and say that there was not time to make an offer, and therefore he was compelled to withdraw any proposals he had made in the past. Why could not the hon. gentleman have extended the time? I ask the Minister of the Interior now, what was the pressing reason which impelled him to close the contract on the 25th of January? I hope the hon. gentleman will do me the honour of replying to my question.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Will the hon. gentleman repeat the question?

Mr. CLANCY. I shall be glad to repeat the question, and I regret that the hon. gentleman takes so little interest in the affairs of the country that he asks me to repeat a question that has been asked in this House so often. I now ask the hon. gentleman what was the reason that induced the hon. gentleman to let that contract on 25th January rather than have waited for some reasonable time, some days, if not weeks or a month, to get further propositions or offers to construct the road?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I think the hon. gentleman is not doing very much credit to his intelligence. The object of letting the contract was to get the road built.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman has not done much credit to his intelligence and hon. members will not do much credit to themselves if they accept the hon. gentleman's answer. The object, the hon. gentleman says, was to have the railway built. It is the most extraordinary answer I ever heard, and it does not do credit to hon. gentlemen opposite if they are unable to offer a better answer. Let the hon. gentleman's answer go to the country, and we are willing to go to the country upon it, if hon. gentlemen opposite have no better answer to furnish. Any little boy in the street could have given a better answer, if he could not give a better answer, he should be chastised. But after all, is not this part of the general scheme? This answer is as good an answer as hon. gentlemen opposite have been accustomed to give, and as good as we have been accustomed to expect. It suits the purposes of hon. gentlemen opposite to offer no reason for entering into this contract, and the hon. Minister has declared, after having had plenty of time to consider the matter, that this contract was let so suddenly to secure the building of the railway. The country will expect a very much better answer from the hon. gentleman, and, whatever he may be able to do with his own friends, and however much the threat of the Minister of Public Works will have effect upon them, I say that the people of this country will not take his view of it, when they get a chance to express their opinion at the polls. I hold that the time limit fixed for receiving the proposals made it absolutely impossible for the Government to have guarded the public interest. If the Government had all the information necessary to enable them to enter upon a business transaction of this kind, there might be some excuse for having rushed through the contract in such haste, but we have the extraordinary spectacle exhibited in Parliament to-day—for the first time, I believe, in the history of Canada—of members of the Government coming before the representatives of the people and telling them that the ground on which they rushed the contract through was, because they knew nothing whatever about it. One Minister, indeed, told us that the contract was all right, because both parties to it knew nothing at all about it. If that is the principle which is to guide us in the transaction of public business in Canada, then, let the Government take the responsibility of telling the people that such is their policy, and gentlemen on this side of the House may be perfectly content to leave them in the hands of the electors. The Ministers tell us that they knew nothing about this contract. Well, if there is one reason stronger than another why they should not have signed it, it is that they should wait until they did know something about it: and wait until they knew whether or not they were engaging in a proper transaction. If there was this great urgency, I myself would not be disposed to censure the Government if even prior to obtaining the sanction of Parliament, they paid some money to place them in possession of all the facts concerning this territory which they were giving away. The Government knew nothing about it, and so the contractors could make their own terms with the Government. These contractors are not such great fools as the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) takes them to be, and when the members of the Government told them that they knew nothing at all about the business, these gentlemen were wise enough to insist upon their own terms. If there was any figuring down or figuring up, the Government had to do the figuring with their eyes shut. How absurd it is for these gentlemen on the Treasury benches to tell us, in one breath, that they knew nothing at all about this matter, and, in the next, that they tried to cut down the original demands of the contractors. How did they know whether ten millions of acres or three millions of acres was a sufficient grant, when, as they say, they knew nothing at all about it? Again, we are told by gentlemen opposite that the contractors took all the risk and that the Government—or rather, the people, because it is the people who will have to suffer in the last instance—took no risk. But did the contractors take no risk? Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that there will be an influx of from fifty to two hundred and fifty thousand people go into that country this year, and that because of this the railway was a pressing want. Now, even from that statement, we can see that, whether or not that country turns out to be a disappointment to the gold seekers, the people will have to go into that country and come out again, and the railway company will have all the advantages. Each man who goes there must pay tolls to the railway to go in, and pay tolls to the railway to come out, and so the contractors will be indemnified to the full extent of their outlay by the receipts from the traffic on that road, even if they reap no advantage from the land grant. Hon. gentlemen opposite, to be consistent, must admit that, if the urgency of the road was on account of the vast influx of people into that country, then, that immense passenger traffic and the transportation of the supplies necessary for these people, was full security to the contractors for the outlay they make.

There is another feature in this matter which is of some importance. The Government of Canada will have to provide for the maintenance of law and order in that country, and for the new state of things which will obtain there. We cannot expect to reap direct benefits from the gold mining in that country, but we may naturally expect to reap indirect benefits, and we will have to pay all the expenses in connection with that. I venture to predict that, when the Estimates are brought down, we will find large sums of money appropriated for the government of that country. After all, do not the people of Canada take all the risks, and is it not a fact that the contractors take none? I believe there will be large indirect benefits; and I am prepared to vote any reasonable sum of money to provide a proper means of communication with that country. But I am not prepared to vote for an irrational scheme, one that has been ill-considered, that has not been carefully thought out. The right hon. First Minister himself was forced to declare in his place only a day or so ago that if we were threatened with difficulties and harassments from the United States, he would, not in the future, but at once, be prepared to ask this Parliament for a grant for the purpose of going on and constructing an extension of this railway that would make it entirely a Canadian route. What do the people of this country expect of a Government, charged with the conduct of the affairs of this country, at a critical moment like this? I say that no Government can utterly disregard the state of things that has arisen within a few days. We should have no cheese-paring policy at such a time. The Government are bound to come down with a scheme that will not place us for a single hour in the power of a nation that has been hostile to us. What has the hon. gentleman told us? "This is a case of the greatest emergency; we were forced to enter into this contract without taking time to consider it; the case was so urgent that we had to get the railway built at once." I ask the hon. gentleman what would become of that great scheme if the railway were interrupted for an hour—if it were tied up by hostile regulations of the American Government, such as we are now threatened with? We cannot close our eyes to the state of affairs that exists, and it becomes this Parliament and the people of this country to consider the situation. If there is to be a difficulty in the future, let us provide for it now. It is perfectly idle for any member of this House to say that the members on the Opposition side have receded at the first shriek of the American eagle. It is unworthy of hon. gentlemen to put forth such an argument. We have not receded, and it would be silly and cowardly for any hon. member on either side of the House to take such a position. We gave these gentlemen warning, and we hoped that they had taken the warning to themselves. It seems that the right hon. First Minister has not taken it, but that he is proceeding on the lines on which he has probably proceeded all his life, from the day his responsibilities began, to provide for the single day, and no more—never to provide for the time to come. The hon. gentleman expects this House to assent to a proposition that we are to vote for a railway which is only a half measure; and when this is concluded, we are to go on further. I ask him where he is going to get the money to build the others. He has dried up every possibility and all the means in the construction of the 150 miles. When he wants to build any more, he must tax the people for them. He is building the smallest portion of the railway with the greatest portion of our capital for the building of railways. After he has given practically the whole of the gold lands in the country for the building of a portion of railway that may be closed up in a single day by the hostile action of our neighbours, and we are obliged to enter on the larger and safer scheme, where are we to get the means of doing it? I have waited to hear some hon. gentleman explain that, and up to the present hour I have not heard a single solution of the question. Parliament may be asked to vote the money; but I say that Parliament will not be justified in voting one dollar under the circumstances as they exist, for the building of a railway to Port Simpson or elsewhere, having no more lands for the purpose. The Government are proposing to give away a sum in gold lands that ought to have built a dozen railways of that kind.

I do not wish to detain the House at any great length. It would probably be waste of time for any member on this side of the House to attempt to urge, after all that has been said, anything that would appeal to the hon. Minister of the Interior. He set about letting a contract, and he made it impossible for any other person than Mackenzie & Mann to get it. He is bound now to carry it through, and he has the assurance of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) that it will be carried through. The

First Minister was not in his place when that statement was made, and I wonder whether he endorses it. The hon. Minister of Public Works said to us: "That contract will be carried through; you may say what you like; you may urge what reasons you may; you may have common sense and good judgment and force on your side; it makes no difference, we are going to carry the contract through, because we have the greater number on our side of the House, and we rely on that fact, and that alone."

Now, we have come to what seems to me to be a very serious state of affairs in this country. We are entering upon the construction of a railway that may mean what? If we may judge from what has fallen from the right hon. First Minister it may mean in the near future the construction of a railway through by way of Edmonton. The hon. Minister of the Interior suggested that this was only the beginning of a great scheme. Then, should there be commercial hostilities between Canada and the United States in connection with the railway under consideration, we are told that we may have another to Port Simpson. With the possibility of these great expenditures staring Canada in the face, we have these gentlemen taking all the resources in sight for the construction of this railway. Taking the words of the hon. gentlemen themselves, they say: "That country is of no use without the construction of this railway, and we are bound to make that country pay for its own railways." I ask them how they propose to make it pay for the balance of the railways they propose, including the railway from Edmonton and the railway from Port Simpson. I venture to say they have no answer to that.

We have come to a stage when the Government can afford to retrace their steps. What defence have they made of this scheme? One defence is that the leader of the Opposition declared himself in favour of it. But on that occasion the hon. gentleman took it for granted that the Government had a well-considered scheme, that they were entering upon a defensible transaction. He found himself afterwards in the unpleasant position, in which we all found ourselves, of having been deceived. The whole country were deceived by the language of hon. gentlemen opposite into believing that the scheme was one which could be defended, and we were all anxious to have as soon as possible a railway into that country. Hardly an hon. gentleman opposite who has risen to defend this measure has failed to quote that interview in which the leader of the Opposition expressed himself in favour of building a railway into that country, and it is rather strange to find these hon. gentlemen coming to the leader of the Opposition for a certificate after the abuse they have been heaping upon him for years. I trust that the right hon. First Minister will see fit to retrace his steps. It takes some little courage for any gentleman, even in private life, to admit that he has been wrong, but it is always better to admit a wrong than to defend it. The opportunity has come for the right hon. gentleman to take the right course. He declared only a day ago, that we might be confronted with a state of circumstances which would entirely alter the scheme, and I ask him therefore to withdraw it now and submit a comprehensive scheme which will be capable of being defended. It is idle to discuss what treaty rights we have when these rights are set at naught. It is not a question now of discussing what treaty rights we have, but of preparing for a condition of things that may be precipitated on us at any moment. The Government have now the opportunity of retreating, and I would say honourably retreating, and I appeal to the right hon. First Minister to make a record, which will be in contradiction with his past, by withdrawing this Bill and submitting one that will be worthy of approval.

Bill (No. 64) respecting the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern Railway Company.—(Mr. McInnes.)

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. DAVIS moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 65) further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892. He said: Clauses 736, 738, 739, 740 and 741 of the Criminal Code make the Lieutenant-Governor of a province responsible for the disposition of the criminal, or the accused persons who are innocent. My belief is this has arisen from a mistake in drafting, and is not the intention of Parliament. Therefore, I propose to substitute for the Lieutenant-Governor the Governor General and restore the criminal law in this matter to what it originally was. The next clause provides for the repeal of the section of the criminal law—I think it is section 748—which enables the Minister of Justice to grant a new trial. I have never heard a jurist of any standing who did not think that it was a mistake to introduce that clause into the Criminal Act, and therefore I propose that it shall be repealed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MOUNTED POLICE AND EDMONTON ROUTE TO KLONDIKE.

Mr. DAVIS asked,

Was there a detachment of North-west Mounted Police sent by the Government over the Edmonton route to the Yukon? When did the detachment start? Has it arrived at Dawson City yet? If not, at what time do the Government expect it to reach there?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). A detachment of police, composed of one officer and five men left Edmonton via the overland route on the 4th September last. When last heard from they were some miles west of St. John on the Peace River. It is hoped that they will reach the Yukon next month.

GOVERNMENT CATTLE, BATTLEFORD AGENCY.

Mr. DAVIS asked,

What number of Government cattle died on the different reserves in the Battleford agency during the winter of 1895 and 1896? What was the cause?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The number of Government cattle that died on the several reserves is as follows:—On Stony reserve, 7; on Red Pheasant's reserve, 6; on Sweet Grass reserve, 4; on Moosomin's reserve, 4; on Thunderchild's reserve, 6; on Little Pine's reserve, 6; on Poundmaker's reserve, 7. The cause of death of these cattle is not known to the department with certainty, but is believed to be lack of sufficient provender being provided under the direction of the agent.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL AT BATTLEFORD.

Mr. DAVIS asked,

1. What was the cost of maintenance of the industrial school at Battleford, North-west Territories, during the last fiscal year?
2. How many pupils are in the school?
3. What is the cost to the Government per capita per annum?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:—1. The cost of maintenance of the Battleford Industrial School for the last fiscal year was $16,472.37. 2. The report for the last Deember quarter gives the number of pupils as 107. 3. The per capita per annum cost to the Government is $161.49.

DISMISSAL OF POSTMASTER AT KILDARE.

Mr. DUGAS asked,

1. Who is at present postmaster of St. Ambroise de Kildare, county of Iberville ?

2. When was he appointed ?

3. Who was his predecessor ?

4. Why and when was the latter discharged ?

5. At whose request ?

6. Were complaints in writing, against the former postmaster, laid before the Government or the Post Office Department ?

7. What is the nature of the said complaints, and who made them ?

8. Was an inquiry granted to the former postmaster, prior to his discharge ; if so, by whom was it held ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:—1. There is no post office named St. Ambroise de Kildare. If Kildare post office, county of Joliette, should be the post office referred to, the present postmaster is J. A. Riberdy, M.D. 2. He was appointed on the 10th November, 1897. 3. His predecessor was Oliver Vigneault. 4 and 5. He was dismissed on the 19th June, 1897, for offensive partisanship in the general election of June, 1896, on representations of Mr. Charles Bazinet, M.P. 6. The charges against the late postmaster were made in writing. 7. This is covered by answers already given. 8. An inquiry was not considered necessary, in view of the terms of the charges made by Mr. Bazinet.

MAILS FOR POINTS EAST OF TRURO. N.S.

Mr. McDUGALL asked,

1. By what lines of railways are the mails destined for points east of Truro, Nova Scotia, forwarded from Ottawa, and what is the distance by such route between Ottawa and Truro ?

2. By what railway lines are mails from points east of Truro, Nova Scotia, and destined for Ottawa received, and what is the distance over such route ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:—1. By Canadian Pacific and Intercolonial Railway, distance 814 miles. By Canadian Pacific, Grand Trunk and Intercolonial Railways, distance 905 miles. 2. By Intercolonial and Canadian Pacific Railways, distance 814 miles. By Intercolonial, Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railways, distance 905 miles.

MAGDALEN ISLANDS AND MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. LEMIEUX (by Mr. Choquette) asked,

1. Has application been made to the Post Office Department for a mail service between the Magdalene Islands and the mainland during the winter season ?

Mr. SIFTON.

2. Has the application been granted ?

3. By whom was the application made ?

4. Why has there been no winter service ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I would say that this question concerns the Department of Trade and Commerce, as well as the Post Office Department. Replying for the Post Office Department, I may say that the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) made application for the establishment of a mail service between the mainland and the Magdalene Islands. The Post Office Department looked into the matter, and found that it fell within the purview of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Accordingly, a conference was held between the Ministers of Trade and Commerce, Marine and Fisheries and Post Office and, after giving the best consideration to the matter, the conclusion was arrived at that the dangers of the voyage and the expense were such that it was not possible to comply with the hon. gentleman's request. The officers of the Department of Marine and Fisheries said that they did not consider it would be safe to trust human life with undertaking the voyage as asked for.

TRANSLATION OF MR. OGILVIE'S REPORT AND OF "HANSARD."

Mr. CASGRAIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the First Minister to the fact that we have not yet got Mr. Ogilvie's report in French. I do not wish to make any complaints at all, because I understand that, being technical matter, it is very difficult to translate, and it is also long. I receive letters almost every day asking for it ; people who want to go to the Klondike from the province of Quebec are asking for it from all quarters. I would be glad if the hon. gentleman could hurry up the translation. He would not only be conferring a great favour upon the members of this House who speak and read French better than they do English, but also upon a large class of the electors of the province of Quebec. I think the right hon. gentleman himself will recognize the justice of my request. While I am on my feet I would like also to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the French translation of the "Hansard" is far in arrear, and has only been done up to the 18th February. This is the 10th March, so that the work is far behind. It is not fair for the French members of the House who understand French and read French better than English, that there should be so much delay in the translation of Mr. Ogilvie's work and also of the "Hansard."

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have some reason to believe that at this moment the translation of Mr. Ogilvie's report is concluded and in the hands of the printers. About a week ago, I took trouble to inquire about it, and the translation was then three-quarters finished. I think, by this time, it is probably in the hands of the printers. At all events, I am quite sure it very soon will be. I have seen the translation so far as it had been done at the time. With regard to the translation of the "Hansard," if it is to-day only one month behind, it is quite a progress on preceding years. It has always been behind time. The only thing I can do is to call the attention of the committee to the subject.

Mr. BERGERON. So far as the "Hansard" is concerned, I myself asked the chief translator the reason of the delay, and he told me that the French "Hansard" was following the English "Hansard" as closely as possible, but that the delay came from the printing office. I think the attention of the Debates Committee should be called to the matter.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. At the last meeting of the committee, we had a report from the printers of the French translation, who said that they were only six days behind.

Mr. BERGERON. The "Hansard" at present is twenty days behind.

TROOPS FOR THE YUKON.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask a question—I see the Minister of Militia is not present, but perhaps the First Minister, or the Minister of the Interior, could give the information. It is as to the rumour which seems to be pretty well assured, that a detachment of the militia or of the permanent force of Canada is to be sent to the Yukon to supplement the Mounted Police force there. Is that rumour true, and have matters progressed so far that the route is determined which this military force is to take?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There is truth in the rumour to which my hon. friend alludes. In view of the very large influx of people who are expected to crowd into the Yukon, it has been thought advisable to have a sufficient force there to maintain law and order. This could not be done unless the Mounted Police, which is practically a military body, were largely increased. But we thought it well to follow the practice that has obtained in other countries, and since we have a small permanent force, to employ it in that country, where the need has recently arisen. Therefore, a small corps is being prepared at the present time to be sent out at the earliest moment to the Yukon. As to what progress has been made and whether a route has been determined upon, I am not in a position to inform my hon. friend to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Militia and Defence, who has come in, might be able to tell us how many men are to be sent in, and by what route.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The number determined upon is 200 or thereabouts. The route has not been absolutely determined upon, but Colonel Lake is making the necessary inquiries now which will enable us to come to a conclusion.

CHEESE FACTORIES IN THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, Sir, I would like to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) to an article published in a Quebec newspaper "L'Avant-Garde," in connection with the cheese factories in the province of Quebec. I believe I could not do better justice to the grievance I wish to point out to the House, than by giving the most important paragraphs of that article, under the heading: "The cheese factories in the province of Quebec, a grievance that should be remedied." Here it is:

The sale of our cheese takes place in most cases through an exchange of cablegrams between the shipper in Canada and the buyer on the continent. The price is fixed according to the place of origin.

Now, cheese from Ontario is as a rule, classed beforehand as superior to the Quebec cheese, notwithstanding the fact that the latter is equal to the former in quality. Therefore, shippers cannot give to the Quebec cheese-makers the same price they give the Ontario cheese-makers, for the same quality of cheese. Should they pay for the Quebec cheese what it is really worth, they would have to ship it under the description of Ontario cheese in order to safeguard their profits.

On the other hand, it is obviously in the interest of shippers to substitute Quebec cheese for Ontario cheese of the same quality, as they are thus enabled to market it at the same price as the latter, while paying less for it, and to realize larger profits without any trouble. As a matter of fact, cases of substitution have come to the knowledge of the public.

Those shipments under a false designation are enormously detrimental to our farmers as they have for effect to keep up instead of breaking down the prejudices which exist on the English market against Quebec cheese. Therefore, as a matter of urgency, steps should be taken to break down those prejudices and of doing away with the causes calculated to strengthen them.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that the committee on agriculture have decided, by a majority of its members, that there should be a special stamp or mark on every box and package of cheese, showing the place of origin and also, I think, the month and year of its manufacture.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman may ask his question, but he cannot go any further.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I intend to conclude by a motion of adjournment of the House. I should like to know whether the Government intend remedying such a state of affairs, which is most detrimental to the farming class of the province of Quebec. The Quebec cheese-makers are very seriously handicapped, as the cheese buyers abroad are under the impression that the article produced and sold in Quebec is not as fine as that coming from the province of Ontario. Owing to that serious drawback, the Quebec cheese-makers cannot successfully compete with those of Ontario.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman has a question to put founded upon that article, he can ask the question, but he must stop there.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I would like to know whether the Government intend taking steps to remove the grievance complained of?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). (Translation.) In reply to the hon. gentleman, I would say that we have, last session, passed an Act to that effect. That Act secures to everybody the advantage of registering their cheese factories and creameries. Such was the purport of the legislation passed by Parliament at its last session. If the cheese-makers of the province of Quebec wish to avail themselves of the provisions of that Act they may do so, and they will not suffer from the prejudices mentioned by the hon. gentleman. That is what I have never ceased pressing upon my hearers, in the many localities in which I had the opportunity of addressing meetings throughout the province of Quebec in presence of representative farmers. I have always endeavoured to explain to the farmers and cheese-makers and to all those interested in the development and progress of the dairying industry, the various provisions of the Act passed last year.

The cheese and butter-makers and the owners of cheese factories and creameries in the province of Quebec may therefore avail themselves of the steps taken under this legislation, I trust, therefore, that the interested parties will be enabled thereby to avoid the danger pointed out by the hon. gentleman.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Blair for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) an Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. MARCOTTE.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, it is with feelings of timidity and hesitation that I approach the discussion of this question this afternoon, after the implied rebuke administered to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and, perhaps, by implication, to many on the other side of the House, by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) last evening. I still remember the fine scorn with which he alluded to my unfortunate friend, a lawyer who represents the county of Westmoreland in this House (Mr. Powell), for having ventured to approach this question from a standpoint of incomplete information and inexperience, and I equally well remember the self-satisfied air with which the hon. gentleman drew himself up as much as to say, Now, you are going to hear from a business man. Well, Sir, I listened with both ears, as I think did every hon. gentleman present on this side of the House, for the utterances of this business man on the Yukon scheme; and I am free to say that if a lawyer from the county of Westmoreland could not make a better business plea than did this business man who represents the county of Russell, I would be ashamed of him. For when it was all boiled down, what did the hon. gentleman from Russell say? Naively enough he confessed that at first blush he did not like this scheme at all; but after the party whip had been cracked and party discipline brought into play, he began to find it not so objectionable as it had first seemed to him. When the hon. gentleman came to give the reasons why he proposed to vote for that contract, and why he proposed to give his adhesion to the scheme, I was lost in admiration. He gave it as his opinion as a business man that the contract was a good one, and there he stopped. Now, an opinion like that is quite sufficient for the man who holds it, if he holds it strongly but an opinion which is not backed up by reasons good and sufficient, is of no earthly use to men who do not wish simply to be led by the opinion of a man but by the well-based and reasonable opinion of a man. When he had occasion to speak of the business part of the arrangement, the contract with Mackenzie & Mann for instance, he made the extraordinary proposition that he was in favour of it because it was a bad thing for Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, that there was nothing in it for them; and ten minutes afterwards he declared that that contract ought to be carried through and he gave it his support because in that way this country would conserve to itself $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 worth of trade that would otherwise be lost to Canada in respect to the Yukon country. It would seem to me, though I am not a business man in this sense, that if the contract is carried out with Mackenzie & Mann and they come by that into possession of a transport franchise, and that by reason of the opening up of the country in which that franchise is situated there arises trade to the extent of $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 per year, two things follow as a necessary consequence: first, it must be a rich country in order to call for that trade; and second, that the traffic and transportation over the railway will be as regards Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann very profitable and remunerative. So much, then, with respect to the business view of it; and I mention it simply to show that the monopoly of knowledge and of argument and reason with respect to this which, after all, is a very common-sense proposition, is not the property of any one member in this House, even though that member be the boasted business man from the county of Russell.

Now, would it not be well, Mr. Speaker, for a moment to ask ourselves what is not the question to be debated on this the second reading of the Yukon Bill, because I think an attempt has been made on the opposite side of the House to introduce issues which do not fairly belong to this question? In the first place, I wish to state that we are not discussing a question of patriotism, either absolute or relative; that in approaching this subject and in discussing and deciding this we can do it from a point of view which does not raise the question of the relative or absolute patriotic standing of either party in this matter. But it is significant and somewhat amusing to see hon. gentlemen climbing into these new clothes of theirs labelled "patriotic" all over the back, front and sides, after they have been trying to cover themselves for fifteen years with the tattered rags of every policy in the world. Sir, the Liberal-Conservative party does not need to spend one minute to convince itself or the country of its patriotism, its desire for the prosperity and benefit of Canada or its adhesion to the principles of the union of Canada and every other part of the British Empire. It is not a question either of maintaining the rights of this country as compared with the United States. We can approach this question and discuss it and settle it and both sides be just as strongly in favour of maintaining whatever the rights of Canada may be in the premises. But it is a little significant that hon. gentlemen opposite are to-day in their position of responsibility as the executive rulers of the country brought up by a pretty sharp turn in face of some of their expressions, for the last ten, twelve or fifteen years with respect to this very question. What I mean to say is this: that the Conservative side of the House is in favour of the maintenance of every just right that Canada possesses, on sea-coast or frontîer, and will not yield one single one of those rights so far as it is concerned to the United States when they attempt to force concessions from us, to press for something which they wish to secure along the Atlantic Coast or in connection with the Yukon trade. It is not either a question of the absolute opening up of a route into the Yukon. Both sides of the House may be equally in favour of opening up that country; and yet there may be an honest difference of opinion as to what is the best route and what is the best method of securing that route.

Let us, if we can, then, for a moment brush away these extraneous considerations as not being vital to the matter in hand, and let us see what the question under discussion really is. It is simply a business question. It is a question as to what is the best route for Canada to adopt in order to get into that Yukon country, not what is the best route temporarily, not what is the best route for a particular section, but what, taken as a whole, looking at the interest of Canada on the one hand as a whole and the possibilities of that new country on the other, what is the best route for us to adopt. We have to take the best route, considered also in two other respects, first, and in the least important respect, as to the adventurous spirits that are proposing to go into that country; secondly, and in a much more vital respect, as to the source of supply and its disposition geographically with reference to the Yukon country. This is a grave question. Associated with that is the question: How may we best obtain this road into the Yukon, when once we decide as to what is the best route? If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that in my humble opinion there has been quite too much of the rush and the stampede in this matter as it has been placed before us by the Government. What I mean to say is, that we to-day are preparing legislation which will vitally affect this country for years and years to come, and it is worth while taking sufficient time and gathering sufficient information before we plunge into the heavy expense of opening up what is to be the route, and the best route, into the Yukon country. And, Sir, if there is any plan by which the necessary exigencies of this present year—and perhaps part of the next year—can be met by a moderate expense, let us meet it in that way and reserve for the time when greater knowledge will be at our disposal the more important and far more expensive proposition of opening up a permanent route into this region.

Another question which allies itself with this is: What is the reasonable cost which this country can afford to pay, and in what is it best that that cost should be payable, money or lands, or partly in each? It is a plain fact that too much may be asked for opening up any route into that country, when we come to compare it with what may be got as compensation in return. The question may very well arise, and indeed has arisen now, and a grave question it is: whether it is economy and in the best interests of the country to pay in cash or to pay by alienating the prospective wealth of the country; and, Sir, statesmen may awake to find that what they supposed was good economy in alienating the prospective wealth of the country in order to avoid a present drain upon our finances, may turn out to be a most extravagant method and one which in the end will inure, not to the greatest benefit of Canada financially, but just the opposite. We must be careful that, to avoid the criticism of the man who does not want an extra few cents of taxation to-day, we shall not take the other alternative which may rob that very man and every citizen of this country of $100 for every cent of present taxation, by this transfer of future prospective wealth.

It is a simple question: What is the best route, how may we best attain it, and in what should we pay the cost? That is a business question which any man on either side of the House can approach with the hope of coming to some fair solution of it. Before entering into that question, however, I desire to say this: that certain incidental circumstances have prejudiced my mind, and I will venture to say have prejudiced the minds of every cool observer of events in this country during the last three months. Let us contemplate the various side-lights thrown on this question. Sir, one of these side lights is the utter contempt for parliamentary precedents which has been shown by the Government in most important particulars in the way it has been proposed to make this bargain and to impose it upon this House and upon the country. I ask any man sitting opposite me to-day, partisan though he be, is he prepared to stand on his feet in this House and before this constitutionally governed country, and affirm this proposition: that we no longer have any use in this country for that old parliamentary and constitutional principle, that the franchises of Canada are the property of its Parliament and ought not to be given away by its executive. There is no man, not even the most utter partisan on the Government benches, who would dare in the white light of public opinion to contradict that principle. Let me ask you a question: Has not that principle been utterly and openly violated in this case? No man can answer that it has not, and the only question that remains for every honest man to ask himself is: Was there any reasonable reason why that principle should be thus utterly violated in this case, and his answer must be to his conscience.

Sir, the principle which from the reign of King John down to the time of the Georges was the central principle around which waged the war for parliamentary and political freedom in Great Britain is not of so little importance that at this time in the parliamentary history of Canada a man can afford to give the lie to it without having a very urgent and sufficient reason to justify his political conscience, to justify himself to his constituents, in setting at naught the principles of parliamentary freedom which govern in a country like this. Is there a man sitting on the opposite side of the House to-day who will affirm in this Parliament that it is not for the best government of the Dominion that when any great public franchise is to be given it ought to be open to public competition by tender and sealed by contract? Let any man dare contradict this and he pleads for the worst forms of corruption that could be brought into the government of any country. No man on that side of the House will affirm that the principle which I have enunciated is not correct, and yet, Sir, every man sitting behind the Government knows that this principle has been contemptuously and determinedly violated in this very case. Was there any great national exigency involving the public weal which made it absolutely necessary that time should not be taken for that open competition and call for tenders? That is the question which every man has to answer to his own conscience and to his constituents.

Now, Sir, that is one of the things which predisposes me, and predisposes the majority of people in this country—and I will go further and say, predisposes the majority of men sitting on the opposite side of the House—to feel dissatisfied with this arrangement when it first came to their notice; and many of them to feel dissatisfied with it up to this very date, though they may be whipped into line and made to vote for the contract. I know whereof I am speaking, and I know that is true.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Our friends seem to have made you their father-confessor.

Mr. FOSTER. I would be sorry, Sir, to be the hon. gentleman's confessor; I fear I should have to listen to more black malice than any parishoner ever poured into the ear of a parish priest, though, for some time it has appeared as if the good things of office which the hon. gentleman had taken into his system has made him almost an apostle of sweetness and light, and that the old malice had almost entirely left his system. I congratulate the hon. gentleman on the change; but should he go out of office again, should he get back to the old condition, I beg to be excused from being his father confessor.

There is another side-light which disposes me against this scheme, and which I believe disposes the large majority of the people of this country against it. What is that? It is the duplicity—and I use the word advisedly—that has characterized these transactions from the first that we knew of them, and I do not know how long before, up to the present time; and I will endeavour to prove that. What reason was there, Sir, why the Government, in December or January last, in the discussion and deliberation upon the opening up of the resources of so great and promising a section of country as the Yukon district—what reason of state or of public utility was there, why they should have barred the door, and locked themselves within the Council Chamber, and let practically no one know of the plans which they were discussing or the propositions which they wished to bring to fulfilment, until they had made the final contract, and had practically in black and white their ultimatum to present to Parliament and the people? The answer has not been given to that question; the answer cannot be given to it. And yet, Sir, although newspaper reporters are fairly enterprising, and the people of this country are intelligent and wide awake, there was scarcely a breath of suspicion in the public mind of this country that anything like a measure to build a railway and form a system of transport and communication with the Yukon was even in the wind, until we received the notice in the "Globe" when the contract had practically been signed. Unless some reason of public utility is given, there can be no other motive for this concealment than this, that there is a reason behind which has not yet come out; and it is for the Government themselves to take away the suspicion of a baser and less worthy reason by stating to this country, in terms unequivocal and easily to be understood, why secrecy and duplicity surrounded that transaction from last July up to the 26th day of January, 1898. Sir, when they had hatched the whole scheme, and not only hatched it, but handed it over to its sponsors, Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie, they sent for a trusted newspaper friend of the Government, and put their case into the hands of the "Globe" editor or correspondent, to give to the public of Canada the first and formal intimation, not of what they proposed to do, but of what they had done. I have no hesitation in saying, Sir, that that information, as it was arranged and put out, was meant to have, as it actually had, the effect of catching a public approval which the scheme itself did not warrant—catching it by two methods; by skilful concealment of terms in the bargain which would prove disagreeable; and by, if not wilful, yet on the face of it, when you come to understand the bargain, patent misrepresentation of the facts of the case. What was the first impression that was conveyed to the people? That, in the first place, the Government had been immensely careful—that in giving this franchise and in opening up the country, they had conserved the farmer's interest, to wit, in that they had withdrawn all arable lands from the operation of this contract. My hon. friends laugh. Well, they may. They know that no man who has the run of this House, and who understands that country, would be misled by that observation, which entitled the Government, in the mind of the man who gave it forth, to very great praise and very great honour. They know that that would be laughed at by members of the House; but they know also that nine-tenths of the people of this country have not the least idea as to whether there is arable land in the Yukon country or not; and from that great mass of intelligent men, but who are on this point ignorant, simply because they have no means of being informed, they snatched a favourable opinion for themselves by representing that they had withdrawn all arable lands from the operation of this contract. What more? The first idea that was put out by that official communication, by the gentleman who had the particulars of the contract put into his hands by Ministers of the Crown, regarding the cost of building the railway, was that it would have cost the Government $7,000,000 or $8,000,000, but that by this arrangement they would get it built without costing the country one cent. There were two misrepresentations in that. At the very moment the Ministers authorized that information to be spread before the public, they had under their hand the testimony and report of their own engineer that the whole road could be built for $3,200,000, on the mileage which has been taken by themselves in this contract. And yet, Sir, they put forth, to snatch a snap verdict from the great public of this country, that they had saved immensely, because they had not plunged the people into an expenditure of $7,000,000 or $8,000,000; and it was days before I knew myself—and I follow these things pretty well—that the contract was not for a good, broad gauge, solid road, but simply a tramway, with an indifferent track and an indifferent weight of rails.

What happened next, Sir? There immediately commenced in the press of hon. gentlemen opposite—and it was followed up in this House—an attempt to minimize the value of the lands in the Yukon. A crusade has been set on foot by hon. gentlemen opposite to minimize the value of the lands in the Yukon district. Why? Because, forsooth, if they could only persuade the people that these lands are not worth much, they would thereby minimize the value of the tremendously heavy subsidy which they have granted to Mackenzie & Mann. Without a thought of consistency, Minister after Minister, and speaker after speaker, in this House and through the columns of the country press and the city press which reported them, began a crusade for minimizing the value of those lands. Are those gentlemen in a confidence game? And if so, who are they attempting to confidence? Why, before any Minister opened his mouth, before any member sitting behind the Ministers opened his mouth to minimize and detract from the value of those lands, the Government itself authorized the publication of a Klondike official guide. That guide was published under the authority of the Department of the Interior, and sent broadcast throughout this and every country in the world. As I am informed, more than half a million copies are already upon the market, and every line and every page of that work extols and magnifies the value and the richness of those lands in the Yukon. Is that work, published under the Government imprimatur, true or is it false in its facts? If it is true, these Ministers and their supporters who now seek to deprecate the value of these lands, are guilty of basely denying their own official information. For what purpose? In order to confidence this House, or that side of it at least, into supporting this measure on the ground that the lands are worth very little or nothing. Or are they confiding the great public and the world, to whom they have sent broadcast this official guide, vouched for by the Minister of the Interior, written, as Mr. Ogilvie says, under the express authority of that hon. Minister. Which are they trying to do—gull the world and the adventurous seekers of riches by false information, or endeavouring to get this contract through this House by a persistent attempt to make it appear to the conscience and minds of the members of this House, or as many as they can influence, that, after all, if you give away 4,000,000 acres of picked gold land, it amounts to nothing because nobody knows whether it is worth anything or not?

I find another instance of this duplicity in the fact that they have warped the official and engineering mileage of this road in the contract they have presented to this House. We have had no explanation of that. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) ought to be here to explain it now, and I ask the right hon. First Minister at this juncture of the debate—and I have a right to an answer: When Mr. Jennings reports to you that it will take 200 and odd miles of railway to reach from a certain point to another point, by what authority or on what information have you reduced that 200 miles to 150 miles in the contract you have presented to us? For any other purpose than to apparently diminish the area of the land grant by the amount that it would have been augmented, if you were to multiply the difference in mileage by 25,000 acres per mile? Has the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), has the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), has any of the Ministers any satisfactory explanation to give why they ask subsidy for 150 miles of road, more or less, when there is not a line in the official report—and they cannot get any better information than that at this moment—which warrants them in asking less than for 175 to 200 miles, more or less? Why this duplicity? Why cannot the Ministers be honest and above-board? Unless they have reasons to give for cutting down the mileage, why do they not, like men, say that it is 200 or 175 miles and not 150, and honestly face the larger land grant?

Again, we have been told that this measure should be put through because of three great considerations, namely, impending starvation, possible rebellion, and a contingent loss of the territory to Canada forever. In this House, and in another House, all those have been urged—the last one most strongly in the other House—by a member of this Government; and I well remember how this Napoleonic Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) became inflated in size and elevated in power of voice, as he declared that he was not above going down to Washington and seeing Mr. Alger, if thereby he could be a saviour of the poor starving wretches in the Yukon country, and a minister of mercy to those who wanted bread. And he went down and saw the humane Mr. Alger, and prevailed upon him to consider him as the saviour of the poor starving unfortunates in that country. Reindeers were purchased, stores were obtained, but when Mr. Alger at last woke up to proper reports and information, he countermanded the whole thing. He sold his reindeers and sold or gave away his supplies, and came to the conclusion that the "tale of woe" of the Minister of the Interior was an imaginary one. Why, the Minister of the Interior himself contradicted it, when he boasted that on our side of the line, from before Christmas to the present, not one man had gone hungry, so well had he posted his men and his Commissioner Walsh. The cry of preventing starvation had some effect at first but the strength has gone from it, and every one to-day sees that it is as hollow as some of the other pretensions of the hon. gentleman why this measure should be put through.

Then he raised the bogey of rebellion—there was to be rebellion. But how, or when, was that rebellion to come? At the best, on the calculation of hon. gentlemen themselves, this road cannot be completed before the first of September. I am not much of a prophet, but I venture to say, that if they do get this Bill through Parliament, there will be no ingress or egress by that road on the first of September or October either. There are some things that man cannot fight against, and I am inclined to think that hon. gentlemen opposite have run up against one of these things. Rebellion? I think I questioned the hon. gentleman as to how many mounted police he had up there. He told me that he had 270 there and on the way thither. To-day we have been told that 200 men of the permanent force are to be sent in addition. Is not this force sufficient? What right has he to say that he expected there would be rebellion? Law and order has always been the grace and pride of this Dominion. Take the southern British Columbia region, overrun by miners of every nationality in the world—men who, before they came there, carried their pistols in their hip-pockets, and knives in their belts and shot and stabbed at sight—when they came over to this country, they simply laid them aside on the shelves and became law-abiding citizens. Throughout the whole of the British Columbia mining region law and order have been as well maintained as on the streets of Ottawa—even if I might not say better. Was there any ground for supposing that under honest and just conditions law and order would not be maintained in the Yukon district? Disorder and anarchy take place in a mining region, in ninety cases out of a hundred, only when rank injustice is done to the miners and not without that. There is no body of men, fishermen, artisans, farmers—no body of men anywhere, who are so vitally interested in justice being done as a body of miners in a mining country, because their wealth, their whole stake depends upon it.

But there was something more frightful still—that we might lose that country. I have not heard that scare of late. When the Minister in another place was pressed to tell what were his reasons for fearing this, he would not give them; they were safely folded within his bosom; they involved such a state secret that he could not impart it to them; but if they knew what he knew, there would be nothing but the most patriotic clamour for that Teslin Lake Railway to be built and built at once. The First Minister has not brought that machine into operation in this House. I do not think he will do so, because it proved so little effective in the other House, and has now the reputation of being an altogether out-of-date instrument of war.

More than that, if there was not a deliberate attempt, there was an effectually successful attempt to prevent every contractor, every financial concern in the world, from getting any chance to make a fair, open tender for the work of constructing the Teslin Lake Railway. Whether it was deliberate, determined upon in the sanctum of the Minister of the Interior months before the contract was signed, or whether it was not, makes no difference in the ultimate outcome or in the turpitude with which the affair might be branded. The outcome was this—that capitalists in Canada and throughout the world had no chance whatever to put in their propositions and compete for the building of this road. Why not? Is there any answer to that? What is a Minister if he is not a trustee for the people? What business has he to be a Minister if his object is not to get the best for the least for the country. And I have the evidence of my hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who sits before me that he is not going to resort to the miserable technicality that because the offer was not in at a certain time, though it proved to be a better offer, it ought not to be accepted in the interest of the country. I have him down in black and white on that subject. And yet he has stood up once or twice in this House and come very close to the assertion that it is all very well for men to put in their propositions after the contract is signed, but they should not be accepted. He might speak in this way of those who had had an opportunity openly to put in their tenders and had failed to do so. But when my hon. friend asks for no tender, locks the door against tenders and then makes a contract, if, after the contract is made, it is found that capitalists are ready to build for less than the contract price, my right hon. friend is estopped, if he has any regard for consistency and his knightly word, from raising a single objection. Well, Sir, what happened? Mr. Hamilton Smith came forward. Mr. Hamilton Smith, of whom hon. gentlemen opposite speak as “one Hamilton Smith” and as “Smith” and as “that prevaricator” and as “a busted bubble,” to use the elegant language of my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), or, to use the fine insinuation, the fine, I had almost said religious insinuation of the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) that man Smith, who might not be able to pay his board bill—as if such a man should be shown any consideration. Sir, I venture to say that the First Minister had only to cable to proper sources of information to find that Mr. Hamilton Smith and the men behind him were men in every way capable of undertaking such a contract as this and carrying it out to successful completion. But, Sir, probably Mr. Hamilton Smith did not have before the knowledge that he has now of the ways in which a Liberal Canadian Government carry on these things. I suppose he thought that when capitalists were eager to compete for a public work, the Government would be eager to have them compete; and when he once intimated that he was in a position to compete, he supposed he would be given an opportunity to compete. That was a rather old-fashioned idea of Mr. Hamilton Smith; but still, he held it, and he pays the penalty so far as the Ministry sitting opposite is concerned. But, Sir, I beg again to disagree with the First Minister with regard to that Hamilton Smith episode in two particulars. One is that the right hon. gentleman himself, though having definite information under his hand and over Mr. Hamilton Smith's own signature that he had never made or been authorized to make a proposition on behalf of the Rothschilds, sent some sort of telegram to Lord Strathcona to put himself in direct communication with the Rothschilds and get a repudiation of Mr. Hamilton Smith's alleged representation of that great firm. Now, what did the First Minister want to get, if he was honest in his request for information? He wanted to meet an assertion made in this House and in the country, that Mr. Hamilton Smith had offered to build the road and that the Rothschilds were backing him. Was not that it? If that was the information he wanted, that information had been given to him by Mr.

Hamilton Smith over his own signature in these words: I have never been authorized to make any proposition on behalf of N. M. Rothschild & Co. And, if he were honest and wished nothing more than to meet that alleged statement on the part of the members of this House, the press and the country, all he had to do was to rise in this House, take Mr. Hamilton Smith's letter and read that gentleman's own statement that he had never made a proposition on behalf of the Rothschilds and had never been authorized to do so. That would have met the allegation and would have set right the distorted view of the press and the public. Why did not the right hon. gentleman do that? He was after something else which would act as a repudiation of Mr. Hamilton Smith and so lower him in the estimation of hon. members and in the mind of any one who was following this question. Now, Sir, I would put it to the right hon. the First Minister—who took occasion to leave this House the moment I broached this question—whether he did an honourable thing from one gentleman to another when, having Mr. Hamilton Smith's disavowal, he went behind the gentleman's back and sent the secret telegram to Lord Strathcona.

The word of one gentleman is as good as the word of another; and all that the Prime Minister could have needed in his most exigent mood, was to ask Mr. Hamilton Smith whether he did really represent the Rothschilds or not. When he was told that he did not, he had all that was required, and he had simply to use that information that he got at first hand. But instead of doing that he telegraphed to Lord Strathcona to put himself in communication with the Rothschilds. What more? We do not know; we want to know, the House has a right to know, Mr. Hamilton Smith has a right to know, the public of this country has a right to know. A telegram received in reply to that private telegram is heralded in the press of this country, given to the reporters and sent everywhere, and newspaper head-lines come out, "Hamilton Smith repudiated by the Rothschilds." That was an answer to a telegram. When we asked the First Minister for the telegram he said, I will bring it down to-morrow. But when the morrow came he said, I cannot bring it down, it is a private telegram. In the first place, there can be no such thing as a private telegram on public business where you give the resulting answer to the public and then refuse to give the question put on behalf of the public. In the second place, I say to the Prime Minister that when he refuses to read that telegram the only conclusion you can draw from it is that the question was improperly worded, that he either made a statement in the telegram that Hamilton Smith represented himself as an agent of the Rothschilds, which was false, or some other thing was put into the question which the First Minister found was incorrect and would not, if published, inure to his political advantage, and he took the alternative of pocketing his honour rather than suffering politically. I am, says the hon. gentleman, the keeper of my own honour. Then, for God's sake, let him keep all such honour; no one else wants it.

Then, Sir, there was the Van Horne episode. Mr. Hamilton Smith put himself in communication with Sir William Van Horne. Sir William Van Horne put himself in communication with the Minister of the Interior. Is there any denial to that? There cannot be, the Minister himself has acknowledged it. Of the language of the conversation that took place between Sir William Van Horne and the Minister of the Interior, we know absolutely nothing. It was "casual," as the Minister of the Interior says. So the information about the sleigh road is "casual," according to the Minister of the Interior. The first pert and boyish answer, when asked the grave question across the floor of this House, was: Well, I have no telegraph line to Wrangel. Of course not. Then when he became a little ashamed of that pert answer, he led us to suppose that having had a "casual conversation," the sleigh road was completed. I ask the Minister now, as responsible in part for that legislation, as responsible for that clause which is an essential part of it, if he is in a position to inform this House to-day that 300 miles of practicable sleigh road has been built, with shelters at every twenty-five miles, and is now in operation for travellers across that country and pass to-day? The Minister has no answer, he cannot give an answer and save himself. He is wiser than he was the other day, and simply takes refuge in silence. The "casual conversation" has perhaps developed into a little more stated interview. Anyway, if the Minister can make that affirmation he ought to make it, for several reasons, and I will tell him why. The Minister may feel his responsibility or he may not. He may think that he is simply plain Mr. Sifton, of Brandon, but the facts are that, to whatever it is due, he has been translated out of that sphere, and is to-day one of Her Majesty's Ministers in this House. As Her Majesty's Minister in this House and representative of the Government, he has caused it to be heralded broadcast as an important and essential part of a contract made, that by the 10th day of March all intending adventurers seeking the gold fields of the Yukon can use a practicable sleigh road, with shelters at every twenty-five miles for 300 miles, from the mouth of the Stikine to the head of Teslin Lake; and hundreds and thousands of young men in this country, from all its provinces, are to-day either on the route, or they are preparing to go there, or are already there, under the impression that the Minister's word was to be relied on, and that they would find there what has been stated in this Parliament would be found. They go, Sir, to the mouth of the Stikine, they are camping there to-day by the thousands. The least casual conversation with Mr. Mann will give the Minister that information. They are camped there without a shadow of a chance to get further, it may be, for two or three months, brought there and put in that position by a statement of one of Her Majesty's Ministers, on a provision placed in a contract, and with a tremendous deposit to be forfeited if the contract is not carried out that the road will be ready. Is it or is it not? Let him reckon with that public opinion outraged in that way, with practical men taking it for granted that it is true, and having their hopes disappointed, their health and their prospects interfered with because it is not as it ought to be. Yes, and let him reckon with his own conscience.

But to return, Sir. The Minister of the Interior knew from Sir William Van Horne that Mr. Hamilton Smith, backed by a syndicate of capitalists, wanted to tender for the building of that road. He does not deny it, he cannot deny it. He knew that before the 25th December, he does not deny it, he cannot deny it. If he had looked upon himself as a trustee of the people would he not have grasped at the information that a body of capitalists headed by Mr. Hamilton Smith, wished to have an opportunity to tender or to bargain for the building of that road? Why, what were the anxious days and nights of the Ministers? You heard it graphically described by that master of language, of much language and little knowledge, the Minister of Railways and Canals. A man can always describe his experience more graphically than something that is at a distance and that he does not know well. We heard him attempting to describe the route, to describe the gold fields, to describe even the terms of the contract, where the Minister was a know-nothing. But when he came to describe in pathetic words how he and his colleagues, and a committee of his colleagues, and in fact all his colleagues together, went down on bended knees and pleaded with Mann & Mackenzie, saying: O, Mann & Mackenzie, make it a little less than 25,000 acres of land, behold, these stern and hardened wretches, without any bowels of compassion or mercy, looked all the Ministers in the face and said: No, gentlemen, we are not fresh enough for that, it is 25,000 or it is nothing—how graphically that was described. But how easily my hon. friend could have been taken out of his misery by a simple expedient, just to have said to Mann & Mackenzie, these hard and obdurate wretches: Well, if you don't do it for less than 25,000 acres, we will just call in Hamilton Smith or some other man who will do it for less. Sir, Mann & Mackenzie would have been brought to their marrow-bones inside of an hour, and my hon. friend's genuflexions, and the piteous and tearful pleadings of this aggregated ministerial phalanx, with one after another marching up to plead with Mann & Mackenzie, would all have been spared. Now, Sir, the question arises here, was the Minister of the Interior the trustee for the people? Was it his bounden duty to get that road built for the least amount possible? Who doubts it? No one. Did he know that Mr. Hamilton Smith and a body of capitalists wanted to talk over the matter with a view to building the road? He knew it. On what ground did he refuse to send for them and talk the matter over and give them a chance to tender for it? As matters turn out, they were prepared to build this and another road for less than one-half of the subsidy granted to Mackenzie & Mann. Did the Minister of the Interior treasure that information simply in his own breast, or did he, as he ought to have done, go immediately to his Prime Minister and say: I am told that Mr. Hamilton Smith and a syndicate of English capitalists want to bid for this road. Evidently he did not go to his chief, for his chief was a very much surprised man when he found that Mr. Hamilton Smith had ever spoken of a proposition to build the road. Then, Sir, I charge the Minister of the Interior with one of two things: either with being lax in his position and guilty in his position as a trustee of the people's franchise in that he did not take up that clue and communicate with those capitalists; or, what may be worse, that for other reason best known to himself, he did not apprise his colleagues in the Cabinet that such a proposition had been made to him and take conference with those colleagues on the matter. Anyway it is plain enough that Sir William Van Horne knew it and that Sir William gave his information to the Minister of the Interior; that the Minister of the Interior knew, and the Minister of the Interior deliberately kept his knowledge to himself and signed the Mackenzie & Mann contract, and refused to let other parties have a chance of offering to build the railway.

The Minister of the Interior has something else for which to answer. He has officially issued "The Klondike Official Guide" in French and English, the publishing being given to Dan Rose & Company, Toronto, for a consideration, and the hon. gentleman has published editions of 500,000 copies and scattered them over every quarter of the globe. There is in that guide book a statement made by the Minister himself under his authority, and it is thus the statement of the Interior Department and of the Government. What does the hon. gentleman say?

Since the following pages were written the Canadian Government has completed arrangements which will, during the coming season,—

What do people understand by the words "coming season?" That season of the year when people go into the Klondike for prospecting and for work, and the months in which they have to work.

—remove the great difficulties which have heretofore stood in the way of travel and transport to the Yukon district. The route to be opened is by steamer from Victoria or Vancouver to Wrangell, thence by the Stikine River to Telegraph Creek, thence overland 150 miles to Teslin Lake, thence down Teslin Lake, the Hootalinqua, Lewes and Yukon rivers to Dawson City. Large steamers run the year round to the mouth of the Stikine River.

Suppose they did. Suppose they ran there in November, December, January, February, March and April, what use was that except as a lure to the foreign travelling public? The vessel might go to the Stikine, and the searcher after wealth might leave the vessel there, but he could not in the face of natural obstacles enter the Yukon by that route during seven months in the year.

From that point a sleigh road to Teslin Lake will be open for travel, with stopping places every twenty-five miles, on the 10th of March.

That is the contract with the travelling public of the world bound for the Yukon.

Persons going in can thus reach Teslin Lake and make their preparations to go down from that point by water when the ice goes out, which is usually about May 15. While those who wish to prospect in the south-eastern part of the Yukon district may find it to their advantage to go by one of the overland routes, the great bulk of the travel to Dawson City and its neighbourhood will find an easy route by way of the Stikine and Teslin Lake.

River steamers will ply all summer from the mouth of the Stikine to Telegraph Creek. A wagon road with abundance of transportation facilities will be available from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Creek, and steamers will be plying on this lake to the Hootalinqua, Lewes and Yukon rivers. On the first day of September a railway will be in operation from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake.

That is the point I desire to come to. The hon. Minister of the Interior has advertised to the world that a wagon road will be available from the mouth of the Stikine to Teslin Lake. When first asked about it he gave the impression to the House that the wagon road would be completed and the Government would see it was completed. When he was told that it did not appear in the contract and was questioned a little more closely, the hon. gentleman stated the other day to the House that the Government were not responsible for that wagon road and did not propose to build it. What right have the Government of Canada to publish to the world, as one part of a contract to the travelling public, that there would be a wagon road there, unless either by their own appropriation or work, or by contract with some responsible party they made certain their word would be implemented by deeds? They have not done so. The Minister of the Interior confessed they had not made any preparations, and asserted that the Government were not responsible for building the road. If the Government were not responsible, this announcement should not have been made in the official guide book. There is not a member in this House who will contravene that statement.

Then there is the sidelight of misrepresentation. That is a strong word to use, but it is true. Hon. gentlemen, warned by their bitter experience of 1891, earlier and later, wanted to catch on to a cry which they thought would be popular, and which they had reason to think would be popular in this country, and therefore they advertised these 150 miles of tramway as the all-Canadian route. Europeans read this official guide book and said: Ho! for the Klondike: there is an all-Canadian route, which will be ready on 1st September, a wagon road and sleigh road supplying the facilities up to that time. Men in England and in different parts of the world, men in Australia and mining countries, read this announcement and said: Why, there is to be an all-Canadian route to the Klondike. Now, what does this Canadian route consist of? It consists of 150 miles of poor tramway, commencing somewhere in the mountains and ending nowhere. But when you approach these wily men they say: Well, this statement is true; the first of the 150 miles commences in Canadian territory and the last of the 150 miles ends in Canadian territory, and therefore it is an all-Canadian route. You might as well go up to the confluence of the Lewes with the Pelly River and build a road from Rink Rapids on to Dawson City and put that down as an all-Canadian route, all through Canadian territory. This all-Canadian route covered by the contract now before the House covers simply 150 miles of tramway out of a total distance of 1,500 miles from Vancouver to Dawson City; yet up to this day hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to secure support for this contract by appealing to the sympathies and susceptibilities of the people in favour of an all-Canadian route.

Hon. gentlemen opposite also published to the world the statement that this was the route, and the only route, that could be chosen. Why? Because, they said, it was free from all international complications and difficulties. The Minister of Railways and the Minister of the Interior made that the chief point in their advocacy of the scheme. They told us: We take this route, not Pyramid Harbour, not the Chilkoot Pass, not the White Pass, but we take this route simply because there are no international complications. And yet, what has happened? In the course of a few days' debate, not only have they themselves gone back on that position, but the Prime Minister had to rise in this House and acknowledge, that there were grave international complications. And what was the statement of the right hon. the leader of the Government? "Yes," he said, "there is legislation threatened by the American Senate, but there is a treaty, and the treaty gives us the right of free navigation. Go on, vote the land, vote the contract, build the 150 miles of railroad, set your great all-Canadian route into operation, and, if they interfere with us at Wrangel, we have a supreme and instant remedy." And what was his remedy? To appeal to the courts of the United States to quash an enactment of their own Congress. That is the learned, that is the invaluable, that is the wise remedy proposed by our right hon. Premier. Was ever such a humiliating position taken by any man in the Government of Canada as is taken by the right hon. gentleman? Now, Mr. Speaker, these side-lights thrown upon the operations antecedent to the giving of this contract, and thrown upon this contract, and upon the methods of the Government, are what predispose me, and every cool and careful man in this country, against this contract and against this scheme. Let us go now to the discussion of the scheme itself. This Yukon policy is only one more blunder added to successive blunders of the Government and of the party which supports the Government. I wish I could say it was the last blunder of the Government. It is the latest blunder, but I cannot hope that it is the last blunder that this party and Government will make. It is only in the line of sequence. These hon. gentlemen blundered, when, as a party, they were in Opposition long years before they came into power. On the trade question they blundered. In 1878, as a party, they took strong and radical ground against protection; they fought the principle of protection up until 1896, and then, Sir, they proved their own blunder by adopting the principle of protection and putting it upon the statute-books of this country. They, as a party, fought the Canadian Pacific Railway, tooth and nail; they have ended by embracing the Canadian Pacific Railway, by gobbling up as many of its fat positions as they possibly could, and by affirming day and night, in their action and in their statements, that the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway is the very basis of the present prosperity and the future progress of this great north-western country of ours. They blundered for years, and they acknowledge the blunder now by the changed aspect in which they view the Canadian Pacific Railway. The right hon. the leader himself made the same trouble upon the fisheries question, when in 1886 and 1888, and along in that period, we were endeavouring to stand by the fishery rights of this country in respect to the Treaty of 1818. What was the position of the leader of the Liberal party then? It was one of carping criticism, one of fault-finding at the severity and barbarity, as he called it, of the execution of the laws and the maintenance of the rights of Canada. The statement that he then made at St. Thomas was so bald and so pointed, that his own party paper, the Toronto "Globe," was obliged, on the 29th August, 1888, to call him to task in these words:

How far is it possible to go in conciliation? The mere continuance of privileges granted to American fishermen by the modus vivendi will not satisfy the Washington claim that the privilege of transhipment in bond should be freely accorded to American fish cargoes. We fail to see how that privilege can be permanently accorded gratis by Canada. To yield it and what would logically and inevitably have to be given with it would be to make waste paper of the convention of 1818, and practically to surrender our inshore fisheries for nothing at all. Till Mr. Laurier disposes of the argument by which we yesterday maintained this opinion we must with all deference and good will to him maintain that the fisheries policy of Canada has not been unfriendly to the States.

Could there be any exigency greater than to call forth from a faithful party paper this rebuke to the chief of the party because of his unpatriotic stand in reference to the Treaty of 1818? What applies to the right hon. gentleman, applies as well to the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries; the one quotation points the argument against them all. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) made a mistake, when he made Boston the centre of his political warfare, and when, on one memorable occasion, he stood before the inhabitants of a hostile country in many respects, and said, that Great Britain had been inhuman and severe in the way in which she treated her American cousins during the civil war; declaring before all of them in Boston, that Great Britain had made a mistake; declaring before the face of a hostile country in many respects, that he must say, a Canadian before everything else, that if it came to be the best for Canada that the ways should part between Canada and Great Britain, he would stand by Canada, that he preferred at any time to take, as he expressed it, the Yankee dollar to the English shilling. These mistakes culminated after 1896, in that famous interview in the Chicago "Record," where he threw the Treaty of 1818—established as firm as the granite rock of the mountains is established—when he threw the fishery dispute in Behring Sea—in which we were as clearly within our rights as could possibly be demonstrated—when he threw them both in with a lot of other trifling questions, and declared to the United States, that he was quite willing, for the sake of peace and amity, to wipe off the whole slate, bonding privileges included.

Sir, it is these blunders that hon. gentlemen made when they were in Opposition and since they have got into power, which are but followed now by these later administrative blunders, the latest and worst of which is this one of the Mann-Mackenzie deal. As we expected, so it has turned out.

Now, what was there in this question to face? Simply as to what was the best commercial route. I take leave to reiterate to a certain extent, and maybe to amplify in some particulars, the excellent argument made by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) in his speech in this House four or five days ago—the only speech on that side of the House which has been addressed to the business aspect of the question, and which has not been answered or attempted to be answered by any gentleman on that side, but has been persistently evaded. I say that in looking into this question of opening up the Yukon country, the question was simply one of providing transport facilities, so that the greatest trade for Canada could be secured; and the placing of the line of transport as far removed from international complications as possible. These were the essence of what was to be considered, and with reference to which a conclusion was to be reached.

In the first place, was the question rightly approached by the Ministry? They have made the plea of urgency; they have made the plea of haste—for what they themselves have acknowledged to be undue haste in this matter. I disagree in toto with the argument attempted to be made by the Minister of the Interior. I say that neither he nor any other hon. gentleman on that side of the House has made out a sufficient plea of urgency in this matter, or has been able to defend the Government from the charge of negligence in the early part of these transactions. I am not going into the details; they have been gone into by other hon. gentlemen, who have successfully proved where this negligence took place. The plea of the hon. Minister of the Interior was that he had no knowledge. That plea cannot stand before the facts of the case. That hon. gentleman was obliged to answer a question which was put to him a little later, as to when Mr. Ogilvie's reports came into the possession of his department. First, he declared that they had no knowledge, and afterwards he admitted that one or two of these reports had been given out to one or two members about July. Where were those reports, Sir? The first report of Mr. Ogilvie, of September 6th, 1896, came to his department on October 19th, 1896; the second, of August 18th, 1896, reached his department on October 22nd, 1896; the third, of November 6th, 1896, arrived on February 16th, 1897; the next, of December 9th, 1897, was received on February 27th, 1897; the next, of January 11th, 1897, on March 16th, 1897; and the last one, of January 23rd, 1897, on the same day, March 16th, 1897. On the 16th day of March, 1897, then the hon. gentleman had under his hands the whole of the information which his own officer had transmitted to him by report, and the essence of that information was that large and rich and repeated gold finds were being brought to light in that country, that there was intense excitement there, and that there was no doubt that there would be a great influx of people into the country the moment the news reached the outside world. Now, every man knows what mining fevers are. Any man who is conversant with the mining history of the world knows that the very announcement of rich gold finds in any quarter of the globe will bring a rushing troop of adventurous seekers for riches from every part of the globe—and now more than ever, when the means of transportation and the means of telegraphic communication spread the news and bring the seekers for wealth from every portion of the globe in an astonishingly short space of time.

What more? In the October session of 1896, the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) passed through this House an appropriation of $6,000, on the request of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior), for the exploration and investigation of the Stikine River and the Taku Inlet routes leading over the mountains to the water basins on the other side. That appropriation was got by this Government in October, 1896, and a discussion upon it took place in this House; yet, so far as I know, not one single move was made with that money in hand to carry out the object for which it was appropriated—to get the information which the House at that time wanted it to get. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) himself as has been already pointed out, said that before the House rose last year the Ministers had this question forced upon their attention. Why, Sir, before we left this House last year the papers were bringing news of tremendous finds in the Yukon country; and the first of that band of adventurers who had spent the winter of 1896 in those regions were coming out and spreading over the whole world the news of the rich finds which they had made.

With all this information, the fact that the Minister of the Interior, specially charged with that subject, should sit down and practically do nothing until the 25th day of September, 1897, shows negligence of the grossest and most culpable kind. What length of time did it take for the Government's engineer to make his investigations? Do not let us run away with the idea that all this time was consumed by the engineer. Mr. Jennings started on the ground on the 25th of September. He finished his exploration on the 25th day of October. Of all the time he took simply one month to do the engineering investigation. Mr. St. Cyr, who was ordered to explore the Hootalinqua River and Teslin

Lake, got on the ground on the 14th of October, and in thirteen days, or on the 27th of October, he had finished his survey. What does that mean? It means that it took these engineers less than a month to gather all the information which the Government needed both as to the railway and as to the rivers at both ends of the railway. Why were they not sent out in July? Why were they not sent out in August? If it took them but a month, one of them, and but thirteen days, the other, what reason in the wide world was there why a Government, with all the necessary means and information at its disposal, should not have had these engineers out there in July, and had their information back here in August? There is no reason in the world. Nay, more, if Mr. St. Cyr finished his work on the 27th October, as he did, who is to blame if that report did not get into the Minister's hands until the 6th January, 1897? Was there any reason why that report—not an abstruse or voluminous one—should not have been in the Minister's hands within three weeks, at least, after it was completed, which would have been the middle or latter part of November. There is no reason; it was simply stupid negligence—negligence which cannot be condoned. That negligence was shown, in the first place, by the Government not sending engineers out long before they did, and in the next place by their not obtaining a report before the 6th of January, when the work of the engineers was finished on the 27th of October. Therefore the charge of gross and inexcusable negligence lies at the door of hon. gentlemen opposite. They had July and August for making preparations and for gathering information, they had then September and October for deliberating and coming to a conclusion, and then they had November and December and part of January to ask for and obtain tenders, and then they could have met Parliament very shortly after the 1st of January, and not a single fundamental principle of constitutional and parliamentary government would have been contravened. That they did not do this shows negligence in the first place, which they attempted to cover by haste in the second place, and for both they are responsible.

I have spoken about the methods of this contract as being indefensible, and shall not amplify that point. The very fact that the negotiations were conducted in secret condemns it. But these hon. gentlemen say: How could we have made our intentions known? I ask how did you make the contract known? You made it known in a moment, when you wished to, by publishing it in the press, and it went all over the country and the world. What was there to prevent the Government stating, through their organs, or in any other authoritative way, that they were proposing to build a railway line into the Yukon by Teslin Lake or any other route, and letting the public know that they were willing to meet capitalists and give them an opportunity to tender for the work. Why, the simplest announcement would have carried the news broadcast, and we would have had the benefit of competition almost world-wide, and the benefit of having this line built at a very much decreased cost than now proposed.

One of my greatest objections, the thing I quarrel with the Government most about, is that indefensible blanket which they give Mackenzie & Mann over the gold lands of the Yukon. What incited these hon. gentlemen to do that? They have confessed their own cowardice from their own mouths. They were afraid, after their long years in Opposition of protesting economy—they were afraid after their experience in trying to pass through the Drummond deal, which has a capitalization of $7,000,000, they were afraid after they had passed through the Crow's Nest transaction which cost us $2,000,000 more than was necessary, they were afraid, after having made the largest expenditure on current account ever made in this country—and so their courage suddenly oozed out, and they themselves alleged that they did not dare ask the people for one million or two million dollars to open up the great Yukon. So they adopted a subterfuge, as unworthy as it has proved costly, and proposed to deceive the people with the statement that this was not going to cost them anything, and at the same time give away nine-tenths of the eligible gold lands in the Yukon. Sir, this country has never yet proved itself indisposed to bear public burdens for a great public good, when once it has been placed fairly and well before it. The history of the last twenty years bears that out. To open up the Yukon country to the men of Canada as well as the people of other countries, this country would not have found fault with the Government for promising a vote of $2,000,000 or even more, and have thus kept our heritage. I want to make this statement just as strongly as I can make it, that this plan of handing over the placer and gold mining regions of the country to a perpetual monopoly is a thing unheard of in the annals of Anglo-Saxon government. Basing their first action upon the history of the mining world, these gentlemen, on the 18th January, promulgated their latest regulations, which affirmed that the placer mining of that country should be kept for the individual miner, that every man with a mining license had a right to enter and prospect and take up land wherever he found it, to a certain extent, with the exceptions of town sites. Yet seven days afterwards, they went back on the salutary history of all mining countries, they went back upon their own reasoned-out judgment, as embodied in their regulations, and made a blanket of 3,750,000 acres of picked gold placer mining country, and gave it to a monopoly in perpetuity, from which they get nothing in return, except a trifling fee in the shape of one per cent royalty.

I want to call the attention of this country to the statement made by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), and made also by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair). What matters it, said the hon. member for Russell, anyway, about two million or three million acres of land? What is the difference whether Mackenzie & Mann get it or whether it becomes the property of many individuals? If individual miners get it, they will strip the wealth out of it and put it in their own pockets. If Mackenzie & Mann get it, they cannot do anything more than that. Then what are you making this bother about? Well, Mr. Speaker, if that be good reasoning, carry it out to its logical conclusion, and just give the whole of the gold lands of this country to one single firm. They will only take the gold out—that is all. But has it come to this, that the trustees of the wealth of the country are going to give that wealth into one hand and rob the multitude of their patrimony—rob them of possessions which for centuries have been the acknowledged right of the individual miner and prospector in all Anglo-Saxon countries where mining has been carried on. Carry that argument a little further. The extremely foolish stand was taken by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) of holding up a map and showing a little black spot on that map, and saying: You are making a terrible time about the amount of land given to Mackenzie & Mann, look at this wide map and that little spot on it, that is all that Mackenzie & Mann get out of it. The Minister of the Interior, refining a little more, said: There is a lot of waste land about mining, just as there is waste cloth in cutting out a garment. All you can get there is a three-hundred-foot pay streak and when you calculate the quantity of land in this three-hundred-foot pay-streak throughout this 3,750,000 acres, you find it amounts to only a few acres of land—so, what have these men got? Exactly, but go to the Le Roi mine, measure the acreage of land, and measure the width of pay-streak, and you will see that the owners though rich now would be illimitably richer if they had a pay-streak three hundred feet wide. Why, every mining country in the world has to take its waste lands along with its pay-streak, either in lode or alluvial mining; and a mine is valuable only according to the extent of pay-streak or payable lode that is in it. But the point about that dot on the map was that to be accurate the whole country should have been reduced in the same proportion which the three-hundred-foot pay-streak in the country bore to the quantity of the pay-streak that Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie are to get. If the map had been constructed on that principle you would have found that Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie's pay-streak would take about nine-tenths of the valuable placer mining pay-streak in the Yukon. I have no hesitation, then, in saying that, with the machinery they have, with the time at their disposal and the opportunity which they will make the most of in that great country, they will get the major part by far of all the paying alluvial placer mining lands in the Yukon. Now, what does this mean? Take this official Klondike guide. I do not want to read what has already been read, but if you take the summing up by Mr. Ogilvie you will see what this means. I will read just one sentence:

Taking this division—

That is only one division—

—as a whole, including the three creeks named, confluent to Indian Creek, a distance of some thirty-five miles in length and twenty-five or more in width, if the indications can be relied on, there are one hundred millions of dollars in sight in that area.

Suppose that Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie get but one such property in their whole one hundred blocks of 72 square miles each, suppose that in the location and search and pick of these lands they get simply one stretch of country equivalent to this, we have given them a bonanza. Suppose that, in every block they only get one good find, they will have one hundred finds, which may average them, for each, $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 or $20,000,000. The fact is that the knowledge upon this point is so indefinite, the prospect is so rich as shown by the reports of the officers of the Government, that it is the height of folly and extravagance to give one single foot of picked gold lands for the building of this road. It ought to be the policy of this Government and of this country to save these lands for the people of the country, and to pay what cash may be necessary in order to secure the building of the road.

The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) said that he hoped no Canadians would go into that territory, that he did not want the young and sturdy sons of farmers to go there. I cannot help what he wants; I know that they are going there and will go there in increasing numbers; and I, for my part, bid them God-speed in their search for independence and a fortune in that great country that is to be exploited for Canada. I tell you plainly, I would not vote a penny for opening up the Yukon if I did not think our own people would have an opportunity to get there. If only foreigners are to go there and to take the gold from the country, so far as we are concerned let them get in and out the best way they can, let them provide their own means of transport, and pay for it. No consideration of mere trade would cause me to favour the spending of a single dollar of public money for transport facilities. The great point with me is that in the opening up of that country we are giving our own young men an opportunity to go there and seek their fortunes, as many will, though no doubt many will be disappointed. The question has been suggested, what will be the spirit of the miners going into that country when they find that monopolists have the choice of the rich ground and are working at an advantage as compared with themselves? The miners' sense of justice is keen, and that sense of justice must be reckoned with by every Government that has a mining country to develop. Besides the alien miners who will go there, there will be the young men out of our own country who will go there this year and next year and future years. Retribution will begin to overtake hon. gentlemen opposite, when, in two or three years from now if they are successful in putting this deal through and blanketing that country, our young men from every quarter of Canada go up there with their brawny arms and their small capital to prospect the country in the hope of finding fortunes, only to find that they have been preceded by monopolists, and that a country which ought to be their birthright has been given away. Then, Sir, the people of this country will have an accounting with hon. gentlemen opposite. From a mere party point of view I might be willing, so far as I am concerned to let them put through this scheme and take the onus of it, because I would be sure of the retribution which would follow. But there is one consideration which makes any such thought impossible, and that is that once done this is irrevocable; once that land is given into the hands of monopolists it is perpetually alienated from the people, and, so far as I am concerned, and, I believe, so far as this side of the House is concerned, we propose to use our best efforts to defeat such a proposal.

Then, what follows? The inevitable muddle. International complication may arise elsewhere, therefore choose all-Canadian route, and build the 150 miles of tramway to Glenora, and then you can go up the Stikine River, says the Government. And yet, before a single stroke has been done on this road, hon. gentlemen opposite are face to face with international complications which they can no longer ignore or deny. And they have largely brought it on themselves. If, last July and August and September, instead of taking their comfort and enjoying themselves, in different parts of this country they had been diligently making way with the Government at Washington and had been putting into shape a fair system of bonding on the Pacific Coast, I believe they could have had arrangements completed before this contract was given so that courteous and amicable treatment on both sides would have been assured on the Pacific Coast. But, instead of taking a single, step in that direction, they dilly-dallied, they made no overtures, they made no arrangements. The first thing they did was to throw defiance to the people of the United States by saying: We will prevent roads built across your territory from connecting with the Yukon, we will build by the route that we choose, and we will prevent the United States trade from going into that country.

It is right that any Government should seek to take the most of the trade and keep it for our people. But they were unfortunate in not making their arrangement with the United States Government before they threw out that challenge, when, as I verily believe, they could have had this arranged in an amicable and friendly way, and without any trouble on this score. But, Sir, here we are, and we have now to look at this scheme just as it is, threatened with international complications greater there than at any other point on the Pacific Coast, with our right to navigate undoubted, a right which, I am glad to know, the right hon. gentleman proposes to maintain, as we on this side of the House propose to help him to maintain, but a right which, at the same time, is surrounded by certain complications for which my hon. friend himself can only find a remedy in the tedious and futile process of an appeal to a court of the United States, and the Minister of the Interior in a five or six years' course of negotiations and arbitration with the United States. What, then, is the position we are forced to? We are forced to this position, that, according to the statement of the First Minister himself, we are asked to-day to decide upon an incomplete proposition, which they admit is incomplete—they propose to add something to it, and they do not tell us what they propose to add; and so they ask us to vote a partial scheme through at immense expense instead of bringing down their whole proposition as a remedy under the present set of circumstances, and placing it in its entirety before this House.

What do we get now? We get, after all said and done, simply 150 miles of tramway, commencing 150 miles from the coast at Wrangel, ending some 600 or 700 miles this side of Dawson, which, for seven months in the year, is perfectly useless, and for five months in the year has tedious and expensive navigation on each side of it, with the inevitable shifts, and transfers, and changes in whatever you carry into or out of that country. You have that, Sir, and, in addition, the complications that are threatened by actual and impending legislation in the United States Congress, and which, however we may hope for the better, we yet fear will be put through. This tramway, by the calculation of Mr. Jennings himself, will cost about three million dollars. That is what we get. Now, what do we give? I think the House has, to a certain extent lost sight of one of the franchises that we give to those contractors, that is, the profits on the operation of the road itself. I propose to make a calculation, which I will present to this House and invite criticism upon it. We have been unable to get the Government to say what are the maximum tolls they are going to allow on that road for passengers and freight; but we have this statement of the Minister of the Interior, that they will be high, very much higher than on any railroads which are known in this country at the present time. Now, I say it is necessary, to a proper judgment upon this question, that we should have the maximum of the toll and of the freights. Then, you take power to make two reductions of 25 per cent each in seven years, and when ten years have passed, you are to bring them under the operation of the general railway law. That carries out the proposition that they are to be high, very much higher than any railroad tolls and freights that are known. Now, if these tolls are to be at a certain amount, and the travel is to be what hon. gentlemen have estimated, the franchise of that road is a most valuable consideration in itself. Let me ask the attention of the House for a moment. I have taken the tolls at the rate of 10 cents per mile for a passenger, that is, $15 over the 150 miles. I have taken the calculation made by the Minister himself as to the cost of the tonnage of freight, at $50 per ton. Now, how does that work out? For 150 miles of road, taking their own calculation and Mr. Jennings's calculation of the cost, the contractors will expend $2,700,000 of capital to build it. On the basis that 20,000 passengers and 20,000 tons of freight go into that country in a season, that is, going in and coming out, on that calculation, the earnings of the road, after you have taken out $60,000 as the estimated cost of working, will give a profit of $700,000. Now, is that to be laughed at?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). How many trains do you allow a day?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not going into the details.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. How can you tell what it will cost to run, unless you do that?

Mr. FOSTER. I take the engineer's estimate, and I add $10,000 to it; and I have not heard from the Minister of Railways, and he has no report of an engineer to show that it will cost more than that to run it for five months in the year; and, until he makes a statement, either on his own authority or of that of his engineers, I will have to take the authority of the only engineer whose report we have before us, and I have been generous in adding to his estimate. Now, I say, that on that basis, which is below the lowest estimate of the Minister of Railways himself, it will make a profit of $700,000 over the cost of operating.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I made no estimate of the number of people that would travel over the road.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend says he made no estimate of the number of people who would travel over the road. Why, Sir, his own language is before you, in the "Hansard."

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You had better point it out.

Mr. FOSTER. I will tell my hon. friend what it is, without pointing it out. He went over the different estimates, and showed that some people had estimated that 250,000 would go in, others had estimated that 200,000 would go in, others that 100,000 would go in, and he brought it down and based his estimate upon 50,000 going in.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is quite true I did state that the lowest estimate that has been made of the number of people who would go into that country in one year, was about 50,000; but I did not say, nor did I suggest, that that number of people would use this railway, because, I said, they were already commencing to go into the country, and would continue to do so long before the railway was built.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend thinks he can get out of it that way for the Government.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am stating what I said.

Mr. FOSTER. I will just bring this to his attention. For what purpose is the Government building the railroad?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Chiefly to get tonnage in; the people can get in there, but the tonnage cannot.

Mr. FOSTER. The raison d'être of the building of the railway, according to the argument of every hon. gentleman opposite, is that if the Government build this road they do so to make sure the Canadian trade will go in by that route. Canadian freight cannot go in unless passengers go in. The whole argument adduced by hon. members opposite is that: You have to build the road so that when it is constructed you will divert the trade into Canadian channels, and if you do not direct the trade and the passenger traffic there, no argument is presented for building the road at all. But I am safe even in that presentation of the case, when the hon. gentleman stated that 50,000 people would go into that district, and that 20,000 would come out. Will the hon. Minister deny that such was his proposition?

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not give any estimate of the number of people who will use that railway.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. members know that the hon. Minister did not seem to be very well informed or very accurate. On the assumption that 50,000 people will go in and out, that is 25,000 in and 25,000 out, and the hon. gentleman mentioned that no one had made a lower estimate of the number than 50,000, certain calculations may be made. Those are the hon. gentleman's figures as reported in "Hansard." Assuming 50,000 people will go in and out and 50,000 tons of freight will go in and out—and the hon. gentleman has admitted that the tonnage must go that way—what profits would accrue from that traffic, after taking out the running expenses? There would remain $3,190,000 as net profit. If 100,000 people go in and out, 50,000 each way, or 75,000 in and 25,000 out, and you calculate one ton of freight for each person, and that is a small allowance, for the quantity will be found to be nearer three tons than one ton for each person—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose you take one ton of freight for each person and estimate that 100,000 persons go in, the profits, after taking out the working expenses, would show $6,000,000 in a single season.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What percentage of the receipts is the hon. gentleman taking out for working expense?

Mr. FOSTER. $500,000.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. How do you get at that sum?

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. Minister of Railways say that a railway operated for five months and carrying 100,000 people and freight, will cost more than half a million dollars to operate during that time?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I never ran a railway up there.

Mr. FOSTER. I want the hon. gentleman, from a business point of view, to take up that calculation and tell me wherein it is extravagant. Are hon. gentlemen going to place an average rate for carrying passengers per mile at 10 cents and freight at 2½ cents per pound? If they are going to adopt such rates, then my estimates, taking the passengers and freight as named, give the result I have stated. So in three years of successful operation these gentlemen will pay for the whole of the railway and lay up $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, undoubtedly, of profits.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen opposite may smile or laugh at these figures as they please, but let them tell the House the tolls they are going to charge.

Mr. DOMVILLE. They are charging $500 now as tolls at Stikine, and the man walks.

Mr. FOSTER. Let the Government inform the House as to what tolls they are going to charge on passengers and freight. If the rate is to be 10 cents or 8 cents or 5 cents, let us know it. Let them state what freight tolls they are going to allow Mackenzie & Mann to charge. We are handicapped for lack of this knowledge; but if the tolls are to be anything like those I have named, the contractors will, in three years, be able to repay every dollar expended out of the profits of the road, and have millions of surplus for themselves. But we give them even more than what I have stated.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Why not incorporate that mine of wealth?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is always inclined to take a thrifty view.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Are these Mr. Hamilton Smith's figures?

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt he would endorse them. I am not, however, in the habit of submitting figures handed to me by some other person, though the hon. gentleman may be in the habit of doing so. These contractors also obtain bonding powers, and they are empowered to issue mortgages, debentures or stock on all their properties and undertakings. The Government give the contractors a five-year monopoly of the road to the north, with the opportunity of building by the route over the Chilkat Pass if they wish, and they give the contractors a preference clause as regards the southern extension, which means that if such an extension is built Government aid will be given, and Government aid must be given to that portion of the road. In addition, they give the contractors a grant which will actually cover over 4,000,000 acres of the mineral lands in the Yukon. It is an immense franchise which these contractors are given—and for what? For simply building 150 miles of tramway, beginning 150 miles from the ocean and ending 650 miles from Dawson City.

The Minister of the Interior alleged that the country would obtain some other benefits from the road. He contends that the building of this road is necessary for the preservation of law and order. However, I find I am entering on a new and what will be the last phase of my subject, and I will be pleased if Mr. Speaker will now call it six o'clock.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was going on to state, what it was that the Government got out of this arrangement, how much it would cost in the way of outlay of capital to the contractors, the franchises and subsidies which the contractors were to get from the Government, and I think the contrast is a sufficiently striking and significant one. We get 150 miles of mountain tramway, beginning somewhere in the hills 150 miles or so from the mouth of the Stikine River at a point which is totally inaccessible during the winter season, and which is accessible only by difficult and tedious navigation for five or five and a half months in the year. This railway ends 150 miles further on, somewhere near the head of Teslin Lake which is 600 or 700 miles away from Dawson City or the centre of the Yukon country, and which distance has to be traversed in small boats by a tortuous line of navigation involving possible portages and transshipments, and certainly taking up a great length of time in the round trip on account of the speed and strength of the currents by which those boats will be met on the return. This tramway is practically all that the contractors give to the Government. Under Mr. Jennings's report and his statement as to the cost of the road, the outlay of capital necessary to build that tramway is in the neighbourhood of three million dollars, in round figures. I was going on to state that we give the company the road and its possible profits, and I took the statements which were made by the Ministers, and took what I considered a fair good average, on the information given by the Minister of the Interior as to the rates of tolls and carriage of freight, and I calculated the profits on the incoming and outgoing, first, of twenty thousand people and their freight, second, of fifty thousand people and their freight, and third, of one hundred thousand people and their freight. I submit these calculations to both sides of the House and to the intelligent public, as it is impossible for us to get from the Government the knowledge which is absolutely necessary to this Parliament before it can come to any fair conclusion as to whether the grant we are giving is an inordinate and unreasonable one or is not. As the Government refuses to give us that information, I have assumed these railway rates, and I have made my calculation upon them. I state without fear of contradiction, that you can make a very large reduction on these rates, and even on that basis you must come to the conclusion, that if this road is patronized at all as the promoters, and the Government suppose it will be, then the company stands to make in two or three years of its operation, not only the original cost of the road, but all its charges of operation as well as a very handsome return of millions of dollars on their investment. I was also stating, Sir, that the contractors are not called upon to put their hands in their pockets to build that road; the Government has looked after that. On all this wide basis of a rich franchise, they have given the contractors the power of raising as much money as they wish: yes, Sir, many times as much money as is needed, by bonds and mortgages which they can put upon their property and which they can raise upon the mileage of this road. And, Sir, with that franchise, with the reports that have gone broadcast as regards the richness of that territory, with the inevitable and openly patent spirit of speculation which is showing itself in all parts of the world in regard to this gold country, and the rush (as the records of the Department of the Interior will show) for mining franchises; I assert that that franchise alone placed upon the London market, or any other great money market, will give, in a small moiety of it, more than sufficient returns for these men to pay for all their outlay and leave them a large surplus of funds for future operations or for division amongst themselves. I added, that beside that, they had a monopoly which renders these territories tolerably safe and certain to them, a monopoly of five years on the north, or what is equally as good an option to build a road from Pyramid Harbour on to Rink Rapids towards Dawson City, giving them what is the real commercial route, and a ten years' preference of building a railway on the southern extension, with the inevitable Government aid which the right hon. gentleman who leads the House has declared Parliament would be asked for, if this road be extended. That is what the company gets. It gets besides this, charter powers of a very wide extent and of very great importance, viz., the power to build branch lines from all its possessions to the principal railways, the power to do almost all businesses under the sun, and what is of no slight account in a country where timber will be almost next in value to gold—the timber can be used and is to be used for nothing else, comparatively speaking, than for the operations and needs of the miners themselves—these contractors get the best timbered lands in that district, which timber they can sell out to the miners at very profitable rates. Although the miner may have the opportunity of going on Government lands and taking from them such timber as he chooses for his operations, yet he cannot touch a stick of timber on the lands of Mann & Mackenzie; that timber belongs to these gentlemen and they will keep it as a source of profit, as they are perfectly entitled to do.

Now I am aware that the Ministers said, we get more than that. What is it? The Ministers have declared to the country and to the House, that we get what is absolutely necessary to guarantee law and order in that community. I take absolute exception to that statement. I ask my hon. friends opposite what they expect in the way of difficulties in keeping law and order in the Yukon district. Into that district will pour a large number of people from the settled portions of Canada, law-abiding and orderly people every one of them, who will be, next to the mounted policemen so far as keeping law and order is concerned, the right arm of everything that is right and proper to be carried out. There are going into that country hundreds and thousands of young Englishmen of character and of force, and every Englishman who goes there is an upholder of English law and order by nature, and by custom, and by practice, and by his own self interest as well. From the Australian colonies are coming adventurers trained in mining who understand what law and order means to themselves in Australia, and who will carry the same respect for law and order into the Yukon territory. And of those who come from the United States—more in this than perhaps in any previous great excitement—a better class of men are forming themselves into syndicates of ten, and twenty, and thirty to go to that country. Are they going to fight law and order and the representatives of that justice which alone can give them security in their possessions?

I questioned the Ministry not long ago, and they said that in that country or on the way to it there were 270 mounted policemen. I asked the Government to-day how many of the militia or the permanent force they are going to send in there, and I had the answer, 200 men. What in the name of heaven do we need with four or five hundred mounted police and military to keep order among the people going into that country? I ask the right hon. gentleman one question. He has been urging us to vote this measure through for the sake of keeping law and order in the Yukon country. I ask him, is one of those 270 mounted policemen going to stay out of that country until Mann & Mackenzie's road is completed; or are they going in now, and will they continue to go in so as to get there on the first of July, or as soon thereafter as possible? I ask the right hon. gentleman if one of those 200 men of the permanent force, which he is going to send in as a right arm to the mounted police is going to wait until Mann & Mackenzie get the road completed, and go in after the first of September? He would not dare to take the risk of such a contingency. No; those men are to be sent in at once, and before Mann & Mackenzie strike one blow on that road the 270 mounted policemen and the 200 of the permanent force will be in the Yukon, or far on their way thither, and they will be quite sufficient to keep law and order in that country. It is a false pretense to put before this country that we must go it blind and put this work through during the coming summer for the purpose of keeping law and order in the Yukon district. Now, when do you want to keep law and order in the Yukon district? In the summer season? Measurably so. In the winter season? Measurably so. Let us be sensible. In the summer season where are the 50,000 men who are in the country? Scattered over the country, in twos or threes or fives or sixes. These people will keep their own law and order. They are there not to fight against the civil power; they are there to search out the riches of the country for themselves, and they know that their best protection is that they shall be the observers of the law. In the winter season what are you going to do? Are the 50,000 people who are going in next summer going to camp there next winter; to live in that delightfully torrid season in the northern part of the Yukon district, for the simple pleasure of living? There will be two classes among that 50,000; the class of prospectors who this year will have struck something and will have something to work upon—they will be working on their claims next winter; and the class who will have struck nothing, and who either do not have to work or do not want to work on their claims, and will not care to have the pleasure of remaining in the Yukon country during the winter. He will find that next fall these will be on their way out to civilization on the coast. And in the winter season where will be the men who remain in the country? How many points have you there in which the men can congregate? I believe one or two, or three points at the most. Do you mean to say that four hundred mounted police and militia are not sufficient to keep law and order at Dawson City and the one or two other places in the country? It is a pretense that is blown away at the very first attempt you make to analyse it, that we perforce are to vote this thing, or law or order will be placed in jeopardy. Again, I ask the right hon. gentleman, is he going to wait until we get that road built on the first of September next before he sends in the police and his permanent force of infantry? If not, he does not want the road for that purpose. I will put another question. Is he going to send in with the men themselves, or by other means, the supplies they will require next winter, or is he going to keep them back until Mann & Mackenzie get the road completed? He does not dare to say that he will leave the men who will go there as guardians of the peace, dependent for their food and supplies for next winter upon the contingency that Mann & Mackenzie will get that road built by the first of September, or in sufficient time thereafter to send the food and supplies over it. No, Sir; the men will take their food and supplies in themselves, or have them sent in by the routes that will be available during the coming summer. They will not depend upon the contingency of this road being completed in time. If they did, they might find themselves in a bad box if Mann & Mackenzie failed to finish the road in time.

Then, we were appealed to on humanitarian grounds. Our susceptibilities as to suffering were harrowed up, and we were told that it was absolutely necessary to carry through this secret contract and get it into operation—to do what? To save people from the pangs of starvation in the Yukon country. Starvation during what period of the year? Starvation this spring, next summer or next fall? No, because by this road not a pound of food will go in under the best of circumstances before the 1st of September; and up to that time, whatever food is necessary will be taken in by other and well-known routes. So that, so far as staving off starvation during this summer season is concerned, that road is of no more use than would be a road in the north of Siberia. Have the Government undertaken to keep people from starvation in that country from next autumn on? If so, they have undertaken a contract which they had no business to undertake, which this country never authorized, and I think will not authorize them to undertake. By what right have this Parliament, as the representatives of the taxpayers of this country, to say to the world, to adventurers and aliens from every clime: "Rush in; never mind your provisions; we will see that you shall not starve when you get there." Lay that down as an axiom in the conduct of the Government of this country, and where would you be? No Government dare lay down such a policy. These hon. gentlemen have gone far towards laying down that policy in this case; and if next winter men are found in that country with insufficient supplies, the guilt will lie at the doors of hon. gentlemen opposite, who advertised in their queer way to the world at large that they would build a line of railway into that country to prevent starvation next winter. But I take the more common-sense view, and I hazard the assertion that you may go to Dyea or to the Stikine or to the wharfs of Victoria and Vancouver, and you will find that nineteen out of every twenty of the men who are going into that country are going there with the determination either to come out next autumn, or, if not, with a sufficient supply of provisions in their possession for one and a half or two years. The tales of starvation and the dangers of starvation which have been heralded through the press of this country, and the press of every other country, have awakened every adventurer who turns his face towards that northern clime, to the fact that he must insure himself against the danger of starvation. The result is that nineteen out of every twenty men who are going in, with these examples before their eyes, with the constant admonition to take in plenty of supplies, with the admonition of Commissioner Walsh that they must have at least a year's provisions with them, will go in well supplied with provisions; and what they lack the trading and supply companies which are operating in the country by the dozen, will see that they have provisions to sell when the starving time comes and the people have to buy. Now, I think I have thoroughly exploded the idea that owing to the fear of starvation we have to put our hands into the treasure-house of this country and denude it of its greatest value for the purpose of keeping the people in that country from starvation. But they say: Oh, we want to save the trade for Canada. Let us examine that from a common-sense point of view. There are two things the Government are trading on. They are, first, trading on the cry of "An all-Canadian route," which is a pure pretense so far as this contract is concerned, and are trying to get the country to stand by them on this pretext. An ostrich may stick its head in a heap of sand and think it will thereby escape the attacks of its enemies, but so long as its huge posterior bulk is found to obtrude, its enemies are sure to find it out. This ostrich Government sticks its head in a mass of moss and snow, 150 miles from the mouth of the Stikine River, and cries out that this railway of 150 miles, on a route which is more than 1,500 miles in total extent, is an all-Canadian route. This is an ostrich policy, which the criticism of its opponents will soon make very short work of. Save the trade for Canada? I have said there are two things which these hon. gentlemen are trading on. One is the all-Canadian cry, and the other is that they are patriotically determined to preserve the trade of Canada for Canadians. Let us examine their scheme and bring to bear on it a little common sense. I ask this question of the right hon. leader of the Government; Will the building or not building of the Teslin Lake Railway, 150 miles in length, save one ounce or vary one pound of the Yukon trade for this year? Every man who proposes to go there this season, has either started on his way or has made all the preparations to get there. He has purchased his supplies, whether he has purchased them here or in any other country. And, so far as the 20,000 or 30,000 or 50,000 people who are going into that country to prospect for minerals this year is concerned, not one pound of the supplies they will take will be in the least degree influenced by the building of that 150 miles of road during this summer. Well, if the building of that road will not vary the trade of the Klondike one ounce, or a pound, this season, let us go beyond that into the wider question and test what this Yukon Railway scheme, as propounded by this Government—for we must take it exactly as it is before us to-day—amounts to. There may be prophecies and promises as to something else that is to come, but we know nothing about that. This Parliament is dealing now with the simple Teslin Lake route and the contract which we are asked to pass upon. Let us ask what its effect will be on trade. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not a whit more eager that Canada shall have all the trade possible in opening that country than we are. But hon. gentlemen on this side, or the other side, might just as well come down to plain matters of fact and look into the question outside of anything else but the hard facts of the case. I propose to discuss briefly this question of the Canadian trade, and I make bold to say, this,—and I say it before I bring my proof, in order that it may catch the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite who may think that I am extravagant in my statement—that if hon. gentlemen opposite had searched the whole line of coast to the interior, they could not have selected a more disadvantageous route for the carrying of heavy provisions than this half-and-half scheme of the Teslin Lake 150-mile tramway business, with its attendant water stretches on either side.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. As the hon. gentleman's leader says so well.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has given utterance to one of his wise remarks. He will now, as in the past, find that my hon. leader is quite able to take care of himself and the Minister of Trade and Commerce to boot. He will also find, if he wishes to look into the matter, that there is not very much difference between my opinion and the opinion of my hon. friend who sits beside me.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. And if there be a difference, it is that difference of opinion which every man on this side claims a right to have in looking at these questions from his point of view.

Mr. LANDERKIN. There are no misgivings.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend had to apologize the other night, and he will find that quietness is the best policy for some people, under certain circumstances. What I want to state is this, and I state it again, because the facetious remark of my hon. friend quite overcame me for the time being. I was looking into the matter of the trade of Canada to be obtained by the opening up of the Yukon district, and I said that hon. gentlemen opposite would find it difficult to discover a line of transport which would labour under greater disabilities in the carrying of heavy freight than this scheme which is submitted to us.

My hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) discussed this question of supplying the great bulk of products which will go into the Yukon district, from an intensely practical point of view, and much better than I can state it; but I propose to make another statement of fact, in order that it may be taken into consideration, if possible, even with greater attention by hon. gentlemen on the other side. When you speak of the Yukon district and of diverting the trade of Canada into that district, against competition from other quarters, there are three things to take into account. In the first place, you have to distinguish between what you may call the simple distribution of supplies what you may call the production of these supplies. It is a good thing, if the distributors or handlers of goods can get out of the Yukon trade a profit that comes to them as the medium of transmission, whether these goods are the products of their own country or simply handled in transshipment from another country. Every distributor being a medium for the passage of these products from the source of production to the place of consumption gets his profit upon it, and these profits are distributed to a large extent in the cities and towns in which these distributors live. So that, if nothing of this were produced in Canada, if a large proportion of it were handled by distributors in Victoria, Vancouver and other towns, the trade would be worth looking after, and could be profitably done in this country. But every hon. gentleman knows that that is not the important point. When we talk of having the trade of the Yukon for Canada, we mean that we want to have the productions of Canada consumed in the Yukon. We want our own men to handle the goods also. Then we have the double advantage of profits on production and handling as well. But every business man knows that as between the two, the profit that comes to Canada from sending in products of our own country are far greater than those which we get from the distribution of a similar quantity of products of other countries. When you come down to that point, you have three things to think of—first, the cost of production; second, the cost of transport, and, third, the incidence of customs duties. I think I am right when I say, as I think the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) was right when he said that the greater part of what will be taken into the country as it fills up will be provisions of different kinds. A mining camp is proverbially lavish and almost wasteful. Man for man, the workers in a mining camp will consume two or three times as much as labourers in other classes of labour. So that a great feature in the supply of a mining camp is in provisions. These you may divide into two classes, those that are, so to speak, dead and those that are taken in on foot. Now, as to the cost of production. I take it that I am not uttering a hearsay when I state that in Washington, Oregon, on the Pacific Coast of the United States you can produce these staple provisions at as little cost as you can produce them in Manitoba or the North-west. I am not going into a laboured argument on that point. I will simply take it for granted that the cost of production of meats of all kinds and provisions of all kinds is as great on the plains near Calgary or further east, as on the fertile stretches of Washington and Oregon. Let us see, then, how we stand for the securing of this trade by the Stikine route in competition with the producers in Oregon and Washington. Call it unpatriotic if you like; say that we are not sounding the praises of our own country, but business, as an eminent authority on the other side says, is business, and we have to look at facts as well as to study sentiment. Taking the cost of production as equal in our North-west on one side and in Washington and Oregon on the other, what are the difficulties, if any, in the way of our competing with them? You have to take your provisions and cattle from the North-west on this side of the Rocky Mountains, and transport them for six hundred to a thousand miles down to the sea-board. You have to take them up by a vessel to the mouth of the Stikine River; you have to transfer them there to smaller vessels and take them up the Stikine River. And then you transfer to the tramway and take them over that road a distance of 150 miles. You must here make another change and take them by boat down Teslin Lake and Hootalinqua River until you get them to Dawson City. Count up the cost of that method of transport. Then take the cities of Oregon and Washington, where production is equally cheap and there you have a route less in mileage and less expensive, because it is by water entirely, until you reach the port where you leave them to be re-embarked for inland transportation. Will anybody tell me that you are going to give the producers of meats and provisions in Canada a fair chance to secure that trade of the Yukon under these circumstances? I do not believe you are. The question has come up whether British Columbia is a producer of surplus agricultural products. Everybody knows that she is not. I hope the time will come when she will be. She has rich lands and a very good selection of them, but we are dealing with facts as they are, and the facts that British Columbia has to import a large proportion of her food products, and she imports them from the United States and from the western part of the North-west Territories. If this supply of food for the Yukon is to come from Canada, then it must come from this side of the Rocky Mountains. That brings up the question whether it is possible for competition to take place with regard to these things, competition which will bring a large quantity of Canadian products into the Yukon district for consumption there. Then, take the next large item of trade in the Yukon. A great deal of machinery and tools will be needed, also furniture and that sort of thing. Now, machinery is heavy and furniture is fairly bulky. Applying the same line of argument, and you can easily see that it is a question whether you would be able to compete with the United States in these articles, and whether things of that bulky kind will go over that road along the Teslin Lake and over this railway, or seek some way where there are not so many transshipments or where the cost will not be so great.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) says "hear, hear." I am glad the argument is sinking into his mind. I thought that after much reiteration I should bring my hon. friend to say "hear, hear."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It sounds like an argument from a Tacoma paper.

Mr. FOSTER. I could not ask for anything more apt to illustrate my argument than this ejaculation of my hon. friend. Defeated in argument, with the facts of the case against him, his last resource is simply to ring the patriotic bell, to declare: Why this man who is talking to you reflects the ideas of a Tacoma newspaper. My hon. friend is welcome to that trick; he has used it before and he can use it again. It will never stop an argument, from a business point of view, so far as I am concerned. Besides the articles I have named, you have clothing and the like of that. It may be possible for eastern Canada to compete, even by the coast route, in this line of goods. That is a question which I will not take up. I deal simply with the principal items, provisions and machinery, tools, furniture and such like. So I say one of the most important things that this Government and Parliament has to take into consideration before they put any permanent route into operation is what route will really give to Canada the business of producing the goods that will be needed in the Yukon trade.

Is it this? If it is, let us put it through; if it is not, don't let us put it through. Let us make whatever transport is necessary on the Pacific slope to-day, temporary, but sufficient for the time being. Let us wait for time and knowledge until we gather what is sufficient, and are able to come to a permanent conclusion, for the best interests of Canada are involved in this. Will hon. gentlemen think of one thing? Have you heard of any quarrel between Canadians and outside suppliers with relation to these people and parties that are going in by the Edmonton route? Where do these men outfit for their provisions? Nine-tenths of it is done in Canadian territory. The route settles the question. Where else would they get their provisions and their meats? They pass right through the source of supply, and they take their line for the Yukon out of the very centre of the source of supply. The question solves itself, and that adds additional interest to this discussion as to where shall be the route into which Canada shall put its hard earned money, but its well spent money if the result of spending it is to be a permanent arrangement towards increasing the markets of this country. Let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that they have no greater opportunity to provide a market for the agriculturists of this country and the North-west in particular, than is opened up to them to-day in the Yukon district. If it is a country of the rich promise that their officials say it is, if it bears out one-tenth of the promise which to-day it holds forth to the public of Canada and to the world, there will be a centre of consumption which will be better for that great North-west in the supply of provisions than any foreign market that you can go into by preferential trade or reciprocity which discriminates, or any other plan that you might wish to propose. It is the very market that the people need, the very market which Providence seems to be opening up at the very doors of the district of Alberta and that section of country, far removed from the seaboard to the east, and far removed from the seaboard to the west, and consequently under the disadvantage of long hauls and expensive freight charges. I earnestly ask hon. members on both sides of the House not to be stampeded by a flurry, and not to put the inestimable wealth of Canada into the building of a 150-mile tramway until we are certain from investigation, and calm discussion and deliberation, that we are getting a route which will do for the productions of Canada that which we all wish to have done. Now, Canada has one great advantage. What is it? She has the advantage of the impost of the duties. That is an advantage which will counteract to a certain extent the cost of transport and distance from the field. But you can count upon that only to a very small extent if you bring into the route such costliness of transport as tends to more than compensate the advantage that is given to you by the impost of the duties upon the articles that go in.

Now let me go on to another point. According to the Ministers themselves there will either be no difficulty practically with the United States of America on the coast, or there will be difficulty. I take this broad ground, that if there is to be difficulty at Wrangel, there will be difficulty at Dyea, and Pyramid Harbour, and on the Yukon River just the same. There will be no difficulty at Wrangel, if the good will of the United States is secured and manifested to us: and if she is disposed to manifest good will to us there, she is equally disposed to manifest it to us on the Yukon River, and at Dyea, at other ports along that coast. There cannot be any doubt as to the soundness of that position. What say hon. gentlemen opposite? They say that they have had unfailing courtesy shown them at Washington, and good relations with the Government of the United States heretofore, and they expect that these will continue. Is the Minister of Customs here to-night? I ask him a question. To-day, in your arrangements with the United States, have you a basis of satisfactory operations on the Yukon River, and at Dyea, and at Skagway? What is the answer of the Minister of Customs? The answer that he gave us a month ago, that there is now in operation, and so far as we know will continue in operation, an arrangement at these two mentioned ports and on the river, which allows the free interchange and passage of goods under a customs arrangement which is not burdensome, and which is mutually satisfactory. Now, what I say is this: If the United States proposes to squeeze Canada at Wrangel, she will squeeze Canada on general principles at Dyea, and on the Yukon River as well. If she does not do it on these, she will not do it at Wrangel; and despite all that has been said in the United States Senate and elsewhere, I am not yet going to lose hope that the United States, in its executive government, will so model and carry out things that in the end, although it may take some little time, we will have a modus vivendi which will be agreeable to both countries. Why not, Sir? The United States of America on that Yukon stretch has more to gain than to lose by having these amicable arrangements. Take the 141st meridian and run north. When you get a little north of Dawson City you have the United States territory of the Yukon. Will any one say that it is not liable to be as rich in gold as the Canadian side? It is just as liable, and if finds of gold are made in that United States portion of the Yukon along the 141st meridian, the United States would be just as glad as we would be to have an arrangement by which they could take their goods in bond across the intervening territory, and take them by rail way at all seasons of the year, and so deliver them to the centres of consumption in that country. Now, I believe this general proposition to be true; if the United States proposes to squeeze Canada they will do it in these other portions just the same as at Wrangel. If it gives facilities at Wrangel, it will give facilities elsewhere just the same. Under these circumstances let us look at this route as compared with other routes. Suppose that the United States gives us facilities all along that coast. Now, take your Stikine route, with this hybrid arrangement that you have, and compare it with the road which might be built from Pyramid Harbour along the Dalton trail down to the Rink Rapids, and so get into deep water communication for the summer, with Dawson City, and the not difficult communication in winter, some 225 miles. Place your merchant on the wharf at Vancouver and give him a choice of routes. He has piled around him everything that he wishes to export, flour, beef, pork and all kinds of provisions, heavy machinery, light machinery, tools, mechanical appliances, bedding, furniture and all that like. Ask him which route he will take—take the route via the Stikine, the Teslin Lake, the Hootalinqua, and the Lewes River down to Dawson, with its mixed navigation and land carriage, with its costly system of transport, a transport made costly by transshipments necessitated by the small size of the vessels which must inevitably do the transportation on the river stretches, both in the Stikine and in Teslin Lake and in the Hootalinqua; ask him whether he will send by that route, or whether he would send by a route, if it were open, by which he could take his goods up the Lynn Canal, hand them over to a railway at Pyramid Harbour, put them through on the railway to Rink Rapids in a day, get them from within 225 miles of Dawson City by an uninterrupted line of good water communication in the summer, and by fair stretches of snow road, or by railroad, in the winter. Should there be one moment's hesitation as to what route should be taken—the one an expensive route, a tedious route, involving both time and delay and great expense; and the other a speedy route, involving the least charge for transshipment and for loading and unloading, and open every day in the year, while the other will be shut up for seven months in the year? That is a business proposition. Let us ask ourselves, which route should be adopted. If the Minister of Railways were here, if the Minister of the Interior were here, I would ask the hon. gentleman whether it was true or was not true, that Mackenzie & Mann themselves wanted, as a commercial project, to build the railway by the Chilkat Pass, and were wedded to that route. If the Minister were here, he would be obliged, if he answered, to say that was true; the Ministers know it is true. Mackenzie & Mann had been over that route—it was their pet route. There they saw the most speedy means of communication, there they saw the least interruption and change, there they saw the best methods of transportation both for the carrier and for the person whose goods were transported. As a commercial route, that was the line they favoured. As a commercial line, it was the route which every business man would adopt, one open the whole year round, and consequently giving communication between the sources of supply and communication every day in the year, and not shut up for seven months, during which people could not enter the country with supplies of any heavy kind or in large quantity.

Suppose the United States acts fairly or does not act fairly by us—let them take whichever course they please—the same obstructions would be met at Wrangel as at Lynn Canal and on the Yukon River, no more and no less, for we would be dependent ultimately on the good will of the United States as to arrangements they would make with us. Stand by your treaty rights as firmly as you please, say that the treaty means untrammelled freedom so far as we are concerned, the United States is at liberty to say that the treaty means something else so far as they are concerned; and there is no way of coming to a conclusion except by long diplomatic correspondence and probably the decision of a tribunal in the end. When the matter was settled and the United States came to the conclusion to treat us on a fair and amicable basis, there would be no obstacle in either case. On either of the assumptions, the Stikine River route so far as I am able to look into it, will not commercially compare with other routes which may be opened up ultimately from other ports on the coast. I am not going to elaborate this point; I have laid down the outlines, and every business man in this House can work out the calculations and details for himself. Hon. gentlemen opposite state that this is an all-Canadian route. I dealt with that before the dinner hour, and I do not propose to say anything more particularly in relation to it, only I again desire to bring to the attention of the House and the country, that the Canadian route passes through a strip of United States territory. On the Lynn Canal route, you come to territory which is indisputably ours, by the terms of the treaty, as we interpret them, but which the United States may claim, as they interpret the treaty. But the chances there are in our favour. The chances respecting the Stikine route are not in our favour and, inevitably, there is United States territory which we shall have to pass through. The territorial line has to be passed, and a length of 150 miles of tedious and somewhat intricate navigation in summer has to be passed, and in winter a chaos of snow and ice, impassible for the passage of man, let alone of freight, whether heavy or light.

Sir, I am told that we are estopped from asking the Government to consider the propositions which have since been made, even though they save the country one-half of the cost this secret bargain entails on it. Will the leader of the Government take that position, or will he say here to-night, that under the circumstances we are stewards and trustees for the people, and if we can get this route, or as good route, or two routes, built for one-half the cost to the country this bargain will entail on it, that for the sake of the country Parliament, which has the undoubted right to pass in freedom on this subject, may reject or modify this contract as it pleases, has nothing else to do than save the country's resources and secure the building of the proposed railway for a smaller sum of money? Will the hon. gentleman controvert that proposition? My right hon. friend is estopped from controverting it. My right hon. friend spoke with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway contract, and in his speech he made a statement which I think it worth while to place on the "Hansard" of this House. It was as follows:—

It is stated that the offer is not seriously made, that it is a political dodge got up by the Opposition. Mr. Speaker, if the Opposition have organized this scheme they will have still another claim to the gratitude of the country, for whatever may have been the motives that induced these capitalists to make the Government this new offer, these motives are of little consequence, provided that we obtain the result, and the result is that the new company now offers more advantageous terms than those we have now before us.

It is stated that the offer is not serious. But there is a very simple means of ascertaining the fact, and that is to put these capitalists to the test. They are ready to deposit the money and give all the security the Government may require.

I fling the words of the right hon. gentleman before him to-night. I tell him he has an offer under his hands from capitalists of undoubted ability, to build this road for 1,000,000 acres, instead of 4,000,000 acres and over, and to build this road and the Pyramid Harbour route and Dalton trail route, to boot, both of them, for little less than one-half of the land subsidy to be given to Mackenzie & Mann for building 150 miles of tramway. Will the hon. gentleman try to crawl out of accepting that offer because "it is a political dodge got up by the Opposition?" Let him take his own words, which I quote to him, where he says, "If the Opposition have organized this scheme, they will have still another claim to the gratitude of the country, because they will have got the work carried out at a saving of cost to the country." Does the right hon. gentleman take the ground, that Mr. Hamilton Smith and his associates are not responsible men and able to build the road? I quote his words to him: "Put these capitalists to the test." That is what he said before; but put them to the test, not by a private telegram, the answer to which the right hon. gentleman made public, by a telegram which he himself promised to lay before the House, when he knew as well as he knows to-night the nature of the telegram, for he himself sent it, and which, the next day, he refused to give to the House, thereby doing gross injustice to a gentleman whom he should have treated as a gentleman, and degrading the dignity and standing of a Minister of the Crown in this Parliament. Let the hon. gentleman, instead of sending winding and tortuous telegrams that he dare not produce to the House, let him put the matter to the test and telegraph London to know whether Hamilton Smith and his associates are men of means and men of worth, able to put this contract through, and I vouch he will get an answer that will set that matter at rest. What will the Prime Minister do? Will he eat his words as he has eaten them time after time; eat his words until his bad faith is becoming a byword in this country? What pledge of public policy has he made that he has not gone back on? And even a pledge that he makes across the floor of this House, knowing well every condition of it, when he wakes up the next day he comes in and repudiates and says, that though he breaks his word he will keep his honour in his own charge.

Sir, I have one word more to say and though I may reiterate something I have said before, I shall put on record once more my protest against alienating the rich alluvial placer grounds of the Yukon to any two men, or to any monopoly of men in this country. I want to affirm that, that is the heritage of the common people of this country and should be kept for the common people. By the common people I mean the people of worth and substance in the rural districts, our artisans in the towns, all that class of men who though they have not large capital have the hearts and the brawn which makes Canada strong and gives her a guarantee of the future. I put on record my protest against this departure from the settled principle of every Anglo-Saxon mining country in the world, as well as an outrage upon the rights of this country. If these gentlemen opposite succeed in putting this through and setting their monopolists at work, the harvest that will be reaped will be a harvest full of sorrow and of retribution to them.

Mr. GIBSON. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentlemen laugh; irresponsible men are noted for laughing, irresponsible men have nothing but a sneer or a laugh, but the right hon. gentleman who leads this Government does not laugh just now. On his shoulders rest two weights. One is the dignity and interests of the country which he sometimes forgets, but which we call to his mind, and the other is that long stream of pap-hunters and patronage-seekers in his own party which renders every hour of his life a bitterness and which is ageing him fast as he sits in this House. I leave the hon. member for Lincoln to put himself in whichever of these classes he pleases; but the man who sneers and laughs when his country's best and richest portion is given away to contractors, is a man who can feel very little of the responsibilities of the situation.

I repeat, that we should not give away this heritage to monopolists. Do these gentlemen opposite think it is profitable for the country? Take your official guide book of the Klondike, discount the promises revealed in that by 50 per cent, give this monopoly to Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie, let them blanket four million acres of picked gold fields, and see how that is going to work out from the financial point of view. Suppose that in the next three or four years, out of that four million acres of picked land Mann & Mackenzie work 5,000 claims, and suppose that if it had not been given to Mann & Mackenzie five thousand prospectors would have taken these claims and worked them. How does that stand with reference to the revenues of this country? Mann & Mackenzie will work these 5,000 claims, we will say, for the sake of argument, five men to the claim. They will work them every year with these 25,000 men, and not a man of these pays his $10 a year for a miner's license, or his $15 fee for the entry of his claim. If these claims were worked by 25,000 free miners, they would pay a fee of $10 each per year, making $250,000, and all that is lost to the country by reason of this monopoly. They would pay $15 entrance fee for each claim, making $75,000 to be added to the loss. Suppose they worked out $5,000,000 of gold, they would pay 10 per cent of a royalty, but Mann & Mackenzie only nine-tenths of that sum, and so you have to add another $450,000 as a loss because of this monopoly. That makes $775,000 loss to the revenues of the country on these five thousand claims that would be worked by Mann & Mackenzie. The Minister of Trade and Commerce laughs. He no doubt thinks that this is imaginary, but I have based it on the published statements of his Government and I take it they are worthy of credence. I look upon that as a promising land, and I say that out of 4,000,000 acres of picked gold fields, it is not extravagant to say that in a few years Mann & Mackenzie will have 5,000 claims working, and they are very great fools if they do not have four times five thousand. That is how this huge grant works with regard to the revenues of this country, and the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) showed how it works as regards the trade of the country. Look at it in whatever light you please, it is an extravagant arrangement, and we are doing our duty in protesting against it so long as we have the power. Though the mechanical majority may be whipped into line and may vote for it; numbers of them not wishing to do so, numbers of them praying that they might be relieved from doing so; the time will come when in the country hon. gentlemen opposite will meet with the judgment of that tribunal, before which we as members of Parliament have each to go and before which we have to give an account of our trust.

Mr. FOSTER.

Now, Sir, I have finished what I have to say. If I may be allowed to offer a bit of advice, I would say that the Ministry had better now stop for a moment, take stock of the situation, and see what is the best thing to do under the circumstances. My own opinion is, that something like this would be best: go to work under the present conditions now that the urgency is past for the present year, use your means of having investigation as to all the different routes possible into that country, go slowly, go only to the extent of putting what is necessary as a wagon road, across that Stikine passage if you please, and a wagon road from Edmonton north, and leave in abeyance that weightier question on the conclusion of which the future of Canada so greatly depends. Leave it to a time when you can have sufficient information gathered, and when you can come to a fair conclusion as to where the permanent roadway should be; and then place Canada's contribution towards opening up that country for Canadian people and Canadian trade cheerfully on that roadway, and keep for Canada the great benefits that are likely to accrue from the rich blessings in the shape of gold lands that Providence has given us in the great north.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, this House is engaged at the present time in the consideration of a problem of the same character as other problems that have previously called for our attention, and of the same character as problems that will undoubtedly hereafter call for our action. The matter now pending before this Parliament is one of first-class importance. It is a question that has to do with the future welfare of this Dominion. It is a question that ought to be approached in a judicial spirit, and not in a mere partisan spirit. It is a question that has to do with the future development of this country—a vast area, with changing conditions, where we are now laying the foundations of a future nation—a country with enormous resources, the extent of which increase in our estimation, year by year, as we become better acquainted with them; a country capable of supporting 75,000,000 inhabitants from food raised on its own soil. It is a grave problem—a problem that should call for our most careful, most candid and most honest consideration; and I propose, Mr. Speaker, so far as my judgment will enable me to do so, to approach the consideration of the problem in that spirit.

We have had, as I said a moment ago, other great problems of a similar character to deal with. In 1881 we had before us the question of building a railway across this continent. I believe, Sir, that the conception of that work was a statesmanlike one. I believe that the building of that road was a beneficial step in the history of Canada. Whatever we may say with regard to the details of its construction, and the expenses that were incurred, which received criticism at the time, and which are liable to criticism to-day, the step itself, primarily considered, was a statesmanlike one. We are dealing with a question of a similar character now, and we shall be called upon to deal with similar questions in the future.

Now, what is the character of this question that demands our attention? We are suddenly confronted with the question of how we may best develop resources that were hitherto undreamed of in this country. We know, of course, that we had a vast auriferous area extending from the United States boundary line along each side of the Rocky Mountains to an indefinite distance northward. We knew that we had resources of the utmost importance in the minerals of this Dominion, but late last summer the world was startled by the fabulous discoveries of wealth in the Klondike; and this revelation of mineral wealth seemed to have awakened that spirit of adventure which is characteristic not only of the Anglo-Saxon, but of almost all races, and promised to throw upon that country a great tide of immigration in the near future. Here was a question that suddenly confronted the Government—a question that required prompt and immediate action, a question differing in its character from any question that had ever before confronted the Government of this country; and what we have to consider is, what has been the character of the Government's conduct and policy in reference to this matter? Have they dealt with it with that degree of promptitude and vigour which the importance and sudden appearance of the question demanded?

Now, in dealing with a question of this kind, the Government would be necessarily placed in a certain sense at a disadvantage. They would be unable to consider at their leisure, or after the lapse of months, the proper course to pursue, for the simple reason that instant action was demanded by the circumstances of the case, and the Government did act instantly, did act promptly, did act vigorously and courageously; and I believe, Sir, that the outcome of their action will be in the interest of this country and will redound to their own credit. My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) says that if they had not been loafing around last July and August, they might have made satisfactory and amicable arrangements with the American Government—that had they been attending to their duty, all the difficulties that have now arisen with regard to the bonding privileges and the free navigation of the Stikine, &c., could have been avoided. Why, Sir, the condition of things was scarcely known in July last. The first mutterings of the news that spread over the world with regard to the riches of the Klondike was just being received at that time. The Government had not had time to act; they had not been placed in possession of the facts in relation to the matter. But, Sir, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), a young man, a vigorous man, a courageous man, a western man, familiar with that country, with its wants, with the character of its population, with its geography, and with its physical resources, did not remain here in his office at Ottawa to inform himself by hearsay and by report as to the character of the country and its requirements in this new emergency, but he at once departed to the scene of operations.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When?

Mr. CHARLTON. He left here in September, shortly after the news had come of the gold discoveries in the Klondike. He acted promptly in the matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may tell the hon. gentleman that the Minister of the Interior was in Winnipeg on his way to the west on the 27th day of September.

Mr. CHARLTON. I said he left here in September. Early in October the Minister of the Interior was investigating the character of the routes from Dyea and Skagway. In October he ascended the Stikine River. In October he sent Mr. Jennings to report on the balance of the route which he had not visited himself. He acquired by personal observation at the earliest possible moment a knowledge of the facts to enable him to judge intelligently as to the best steps to be taken to meet this problem. He came to Ottawa and entered into communication with his colleagues. This question received immediate and due attention at the hands of the Ministry; and after considering it fully, definitely and carefully, the Ministry set about providing for means of ingress and egress to and from that region. So rapidly did they proceed with the consideration of the question that an arrangement was made, and the contract was ready to be entered into on the 25th day of January. Now, Sir, I claim that the Government cannot be accused of dilatory conduct, or of having failed to realize the sudden emergency that had confronted them, or of having failed to the best of their ability to meet that emergency.

My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) almost succeeded in persuading himself that we did not need a railway at all. He told us that no miner would go into that country without ample provisions to last him until the fall, if he intended to come out then, or to last him a year and a half if he did not; and that to talk about the emergency that confronted the Government and the necessity for the immediate construction of that road was sheer nonsense. Then he said that the Government did not need to send in troops, because we have already 150 mounted police in that country, and will soon have 400 police and militia. But suppose an emergency arose that required, not 150 men, but three or four battalions in that country, with all the paraphernalia necessary for a large military force, would there not then be a necessity for the railway? And is it not a part of prudence, that in a country which is likely to be filled up with a population of a character difficult to control, the Government should be prepared for any emergency that may arise?

My hon. friend went on to state the superior advantages of the Edmonton route. From what he said, I must infer that he is not in favour of a railway running into the Yukon from an ocean port on the Pacific, that he believes it is unpatriotic to build such a road, and that he would prefer a road from Edmonton, which would cost at least $25,000,000 and would not be in operation for two or three years. He, in fact, asked the Government to adopt a policy which would leave the gold fields of the Yukon without railway communication or any means, except those furnished by nature, of getting in supplies. I have no faith in any such scheme.

He said also that if the United States squeezes us at Wrangel, we are just as badly off going by the Stikine route as we would be if we went through Dyea, Skagway, or any of the other proposed routes from the coast. Well, Mr. Speaker, in my estimation, the great point in favour of the route adopted is that it is part of a route on Canadian territory, from a Canadian seaport on the Pacific Coast to the navigable waters of the Yukon. That is what the project has in its favour. If the Americans allow us transshipment without interruption at Fort Wrangel, and if we can make use of the Stikine River to the road from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake we shall enjoy the facilities we desire. But if we are denied access to the Stikine River, if the American regulations are such that we are deprived of our treaty rights, we are building a road which simply requires an extension of 180 or 200 miles southward and then we shall have a complete railway line, starting from our own seaport, and running through our own territory, to the waters of the Yukon. When these gentlemen talk about the superior commercial advantages of a line starting from Dyea or Skagway or Taku, or any other point, the one thing that renders the construction of any such line impolitic and improper is the fact that it would have to cross American territory and have its ocean terminus upon American soil. We are therefore bound by the necessity of building a road upon the line proposed in this contract in order that we may have it upon our own territory. The Government carefully considered these points and circumstances, they entered coolly, carefully and dispassionately into the calculation as to what is the better course to pursue, and they concluded naturally that this movement to the Yukon may be ephemeral in its nature, that these rich placers may be confined to one or two streams, and that the thousands who flock into that country may be disappointed, as thousands of gold-seekers have been before. They realized that there may be a necessity for the railway or that possibly no such necessity may continue. They realized that any investment in a railway line to that country might prove to be a dead loss, and therefore adopted a scheme whereby communication is secured without the expenditure of a dollar of public money. That is a strong point in favour of this scheme. Under all the circumstances, considering the uncertain character of the business the road is to develop, considering its doubtful permanency, the Government, by securing the construction of a road without the investment of a dollar of public money, have made, in my estimation, an exceedingly good bargain. The risk is great to the parties who have undertaken to build the road, and the Government have given them a speculative chance to make something. It is merely speculative, there is no certainty about it, and later on I think I will be able to show that the extravagant statements made on the other side regarding bonanzas and the enormous amount of wealth which will accrue to this company from these placer lands are purely visionary.

My hon. friend opposite makes a strong point against the Government for having violated that principle which we on this side recognize as the proper one to observe, namely, that Parliament ought to be consulted and tenders asked for in all cases when contracts are let. He contends that until the initiatory steps were taken by Parliament and tenders received, the Government should not have proceeded with this scheme. He said that the franchises of this country belong to Parliament and the people, that they are a sacred trust, and that the Government have violated this trust. He charges the Government with having set aside parliamentary precedents, and I could not help asking myself what parliamentary precedents the hon. gentleman was alluding to—whether he might not have been alluding to some of those which he himself helped to make and which are quite consonant with any action by the Government in proceeding to make contracts or anything else without advertising for tenders or without reference to the people's representatives. The hon. gentleman's remarks recalled to my mind some circumstances in connection with his own parliamentary career. He inquired whether a greater outrage than this had ever been perpetrated in the history of any Anglo-Saxon commonwealth, and I was about to ask him what he thought of the granting of timber limits some years ago without advertisement or tenders, what he thought of the granting of pasture lands without calling for tenders, what he thought of the letting of contracts on Sheik's Dam in the same manner, and what he thought of the inception of that great enterprise, the construction of a railway across this continent, without advertising for tenders. Were these the parliamentary precedents the hon. gentleman alluded to in the remarks which he made? I presume they were not. Perhaps the hon. gentleman was oblivious to these circumstances. I have here, in the "Hansard," of 1886, page 1035, if the hon. gentleman wishes to look at it, the record of land grants made when my hon. friend was a supporter of the Government, grants of timber limits that were made without advertising for tenders, and on application merely. These grants were made secretly in the line of backstair influence, through the supporters of the Government coming in and quietly presenting their claims and getting their demands, a condition of things that led to the granting of 25,000 square miles of the territory of this Dominion in timber lands. I have a list of eighteen members of this House, all Conservatives who have received timber limits. I have a list of some 50 or 60 timber limits obtained upon the application by members of Parliament for friends. I have a list here of some applications that were made by members for limits that were granted to others, and consequently could not be granted to them. Among those who made application I find the name of G. E. Foster, M.P. This gentleman applies on the 18th April, 1883, for a timber limit for himself. Some other good boy had got it, and so he could not get it. He applied on the 25th April, 1886, for a timber limit for John Saddler, I do not know who that may be. He also applied for a timber limit for Henry Muirhead. Here are three timber limits applied for by my hon. friend who warmed my heart by his fierce denunciation of the corruption and violation of parliamentary precedent—not this kind of precedent—of which this Government was guilty when it proposed to provide for the construction of 150 miles of railway without advertising for tenders. I have in this list the name of another gentleman who sits in the House, Mr. John Haggart. There are also applications by other members, which include Sir Adolphe Caron, M.P. I do not see the names of any others who were members of the House then, and are members now, because the personnel of the House has changed very rapidly. But I mention this to temper somewhat the indignation of my hon. friend from York as to the conduct of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. Mine was a very modest one.

Mr. CHARLTON. It was a small affair, of course, only 50 square miles, and if my hon. friend had had his application granted to be got for nothing, except the payment of $5 per square mile annually for ground rent.

Mr. FOSTER. Not half as much as Mercier got under the dredging arrangement.

Mr. CHARLTON. On the subject of the Government entering upon large undertakings without advertising for tenders, I call the attention of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) to a case that arose before the hon. member for York was a member of the House, and perhaps it is a piece of history with which that hon. gentleman is not acquainted. In 1880 the Government entered into a contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, a work of vast magnitude, an undertaking to give a subsidy of $25,000,000; to build about 630 miles of the road and to give a land grant of 25,000,000 acres. This was an undertaking of sufficient magnitude to warrant the Government in taking the precaution of advertising for tenders. Yet they failed to do so. They were guilty not only of breach of the general and sound principle of advertising for tenders, but were actually guilty of a violation of the law of the land. The Canadian Pacific Railway Act provided—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is outlawed.

Mr. CHARLTON. It will be well for the good name of the country when it is forgotten. The Canadian Pacific Railway Act provided that work undertaken on any section of subsection of the railway should not be given out to any contractors without advertising for tenders. The Opposition took exception to the conduct of the Government, and Mr. Blake moved a resolution to condemn the Government for having violated the law as well as disregarded the salutary principle of advertising for tenders.

Mr. MILLS. Does that wrong make this right?

Mr. CHARLTON. I am talking about the consistency of my hon. friends. That is something we have a right to speak about. If these hon. gentlemen denounce in unmeasured terms a small transaction after having been guilty of a much larger one, we are naturally disposed to question the patriotic motives that actuate them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think my hon. friends on this side are hardly treating the hon. gentlemen opposite fairly, and I think that I must interpose on their behalf. Hon. gentlemen opposite have one solitary support on this matter, and that is the opinion of my humble self, and it is too bad for any one to interrupt any hon. gentleman when he is adducing the only justification they can possibly have for this proposal.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have in the House at this moment nine gentlemen on the Government side who then were in Opposition, and who voted for this motion of Mr. Blake to condemn the Government. Nine are all that are left out of the fifty-one members who voted for that proposition. But Providence has been kinder to this small band than to the other, for retribution appears to have overtaken a larger number. Of 140 members who voted that this wrong was right, only eight remain. These include Mr. Wallace, Sir Charles Tupper, Mr. Domville—who has seen the error of his ways and will not do it again—Mr. Costigan, Mr. Haggart and Mr. Bergeron.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell how many now there are in the House who supported Mr. Blake.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is a piece of information the hon. gentleman is entitled to and I shall be very glad to give it. The names are, Bain, Borden, Cameron (Huron), Cartwright, Casey, Charlton, Laurier, Paterson and Scriver. These are the men who stood then for this salutary principle, and, speaking for myself, I say as a matter of principle that if I cannot give a satisfactory reason for adopting the course I do, I will vote against this Bill.

We have not on this occasion the condition of things that existed in 1881. We had then a Bill proposed to Parliament that allowed ten years time to carry the project into effect. The Government were not pressed by being confronted by a great and overmastering necessity, but could proceed at their leisure and carry out a project which had been discussed for years, ever since the annexation of the North-west.

They adopted a measure that gave ten years' time to consummate the thing, and there was not the shadow of necessity for failing to advertise for tenders in this case, because no reasons could be assigned then, such as can be assigned to-day, in the shape of urgency for immediate action, that prevented adherence to the ordinary practice of advertising for tenders. Now, I am free to say, that my first impression as to this measure now before the House, was an unfavourable one. I felt that the position I had taken in 1881 was hardly consonant with the support of this measure. I felt that it would be necessary, if I did support this measure, to find reasons that would justify me in doing so; and I proceeded to examine the case with the view of ascertaining whether I could conscientiously support the Government in this matter, or whether I should be compelled to withhold my support. I presume, there are a large number of Liberals in the Dominion of Canada, and more especially in the province of Ontario, who look at this matter as I did; and I dare say, the process of reasoning by which I have arrived at a conclusion will be one, perhaps, satisfactory to them, as well as to myself. If I did not satisfy myself, if I did not satisfy my reason, if I did not satisfy my conscience, then I could not support this measure. Now, Sir, I repeat, that the principle of advertising for tenders is a salutary principle; but I assert that there may be circumstances, emergencies that will render a temporary failure to adopt that principle not only justifiable, but possibly in the highest degree necessary. There may be emergencies confronting the Government that render compliance with this principle not only inconvenient, but impossible, without sacrificing the public interests. The Government itself must be the judge as to whether such an emergency exists. They will act upon their judgment, they are at the mercy of Parliament as to whether that arrangement should be confirmed and their action approved. They take their lives in their hands when they do it, and if Parliament does not agree with them, that the exigencies of the public service justified their action, why, it is the duty of Parliament to withhold its sanction. That is the case here, and it will be the case under similar circumstances at all times. Now, the reason, if any reason existed, for justification in this case was, that it was necessary to secure communication with that country promptly; that time was the essence of the contract; that the Government had not time to comply with the usual dilatory movements in connection with the advertisement for and the consideration of tenders, thus spending the time necessary to consummate arrangements under such conditions, and that it had to move more rapidly than circumstances would permit had it adopted that course. The Government evidently entertained that view of the case in this matter. The question for me to decide, in casting my vote upon this Bill, is whether the judgment of the Government in this respect was correct. If it was not, why, I am bound to say that they are not entitled to my support; if it was correct, I am bound to say that I shall support them. I have arrived at the conclusion that their judgment was correct. So far as exigency was concerned, so far as the necessity for action was concerned, so far as the necessity of securing the construction of the road at the speediest moment was concerned, I have arrived at the conclusion that their judgment was correct. Now, if they were correct in taking that line, the next thing I have to decide is, whether the means they have adopted for securing the end they sought for are such as should receive popular approval or not, and I shall discuss at some little length that phase of the question.

Before proceeding, however, to discuss that, I wish to say a few more words about the antecedents of the gentlemen who are criticising so severely the conduct of the Government in this matter. I referred, a few moments ago, to the fact that we had, in 1881, a public work of great magnitude and great importance, of greater magnitude and importance than any other ever constructed in Canada, and we had that work entered into without tenders being asked. Parliament was called together on the 9th of December, 1880, called together to consider a contract entered into by the Government with the Canadian Pacific Railway syndicate. When we met here at Ottawa, we found that a scheme had been arranged for proceeding with the construction of a railroad from Callander to Port Moody, 2,530 miles in length; that of this 2,530 miles, the Government was to construct a portion, from Fort William to Selkirk, and a portion in British Columbia, making in all 635 miles, leaving 1,895 miles to be constructed by the syndicate with whom the Government had made a contract without advertising for tenders. We found by the terms of that contract, laid before the House in this manner, that ten years were granted to these men to perform the work and carry out their contract; that the syndicate was to receive for the portion of the road it was to build, 13,000 acres of selected land per mile, or 25,000,000 acres for the 1,895 miles; they were to receive, in addition, $13,000 in cash per mile, and they had certain additional advantages of a very important character. For instance, the road and its equipment were to be free from taxation perpetually; the land grant of the road was to be free from taxation for twenty years after the issuing of the patents; the company were to have a transportation monopoly of the whole of that vast Canadian North-west, a monopoly worth millions upon millions of dollars, a monopoly that it required a very serious and costly effort to get the company to relinquish. It was found that they were to have the free importation of material, and, by the construction of the law, it has been held that the renewal of the road after it was built, that the bridge material for renewals could be imported free of duty also. It was found that, under the conditions of this contract thus entered into surreptitiously, they were free from Government supervision as to tolls until they were earning a net dividend of 10 per cent, a condition of things impossible for a road of that character to reach, a condition of things, at all events, that rendered it impossible for the Government to make any effectual arrangement in the public interest. We found also that the standard of this road was to be the low standard of the Union Pacific as first constructed. This was the contract that confronted us when we assembled on the 9th December, 1880, a contract sanctioned by the gentlemen who are to-night, and have been throughout this debate, condemning the Government for having, under the pressure of a paramount necessity, entered into arrangements for meeting an emergency without wasting the time that would have been required, had they advertised for tenders. We had on that occasion also an instructive experience in the line of a better offer. We have had Hamilton Smith's offer under consideration to-night; we had a better offer then. When that contract was laid before the people of Canada, we had, on the 17th January following the 9th December when this contract was made public—we had an offer made to construct that road for 3,000,000 acres less land, for $3,000,000 less money, without the monopoly privilege, without exemption from taxation perpetually of the roadbed and rolling stock, without exemption from land taxation for twenty years after the issuing of the patents of the land granted, without free importation of material, leaving the Government to regulate the tolls of the road, and offering to adopt the then standard of the Union Pacific road, and not the standard of that road when first constructed. This was the better offer. The first syndicate had been required, by the terms of the contract, to deposit a million dollars. The second syndicate, which made the better offer, voluntarily deposited $1,395,000 as an earnest of good faith. Who were the gentlemen that made the second offer? Not an obscure Hamilton Smith, of whom we do not know anything more to-day than we did when he made the offer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You do not want to know.

Mr. CHARLTON. One who got into collision with a Minister of the Crown as to a question of veracity, and referred to a high official of a railway as witness that he had made an offer, and whose statement was formally denied by that official. I have here a list of the names of those who made the better offer, and it includes Senator McPherson, Senator McMaster, Wm. Hendry, J. Stuart, present president of the Bank of Hamilton, A. T. Wood, A. W. Ross, Geo. A. Cox, president of the Bank of Commerce, P. Howland, P. Larkin, Allen Gillmore, James McLaren, Alexander Gibson and others. These men had almost enough private means themselves to build the road. This syndicate made their offer shortly after the proposition of the first syndicate had been made public, and put up $395,000 in excess of the deposit required. What did the present leader of the Opposition say? Why, he said this was merely a political dodge. But why did he not take the men at their word and thus scoop in $1,395,000? This deposit was put up subject to the call of the Government. Where was it put up? There were $500,000 at the Bank of Commerce, $100,000 in the Bank of Ontario at Woodstock, $100,000 in the Federal Bank of Canada, $100,000 in the Bank of Ottawa, $500,000 in the Bank of British North America, and a large sum in the Quebec Bank, all these amounts being subject to the call of the Government and although this offer would have saved millions of dollars, directly and indirectly, to the country, it was rejected. Those are the hon. gentlemen who come here with Hamilton Smith's offer to build a line we do not want, with its termination in the United States, and they tell us about his respectable connections, and on testing his responsibility it appears that he prevaricated with a gentleman whom he asserted acted as a go-between on behalf of himself with the Minister of the Interior, but the gentleman who was alleged to have so acted explicitly denied he did anything of the kind. Could the Government trust this man? Why did he not put up $250,000? The other syndicate that made the offer to build the Canadian Pacific Railway put up the required deposit of $1,000,000 and another extra amount of $395,000. If Hamilton Smith had put $225,000 we might have imagined he was not engaged in making a bluff. But would any business man, any prudent, sagacious man with a knowledge of the world, put an end to or suspend most important negotiations then in progress on receiving an offer such as that made by Hamilton Smith, who represented he was somebody, but gave no proof, and cast discredit on himself by a circumstance which came out in connection with this matter, that when he came into collision on a question of veracity with a Minister of the Crown he was repudiated by the president of the greatest railway corporation on the continent of North America.

When we found, Mr. Speaker, that this second offer to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, made in the interest of the country—of course it would have meant fortunes for the men who made it, because the old syndicate contract has established a plutocracy in Canada—was not accepted; when we found the Government would not retrace their steps and would not accept this second and more favourable offer, we proceeded to attempt to minimize some of the obnoxious features of the contract. Sir Richard Cartwright moved an amendment against the contract on the ground that the grant was excessive, that the Government had an offer of 3,000,000 acres better as regards land and $3,000,000 as regards money, with incidental advantages as regards taxation and monopoly, which were worth millions more. This amendment was defeated on a strict party vote, the present leader of the Opposition voting against it. Mr. Mills moved an amendment against the monopoly clause. This amendment we defeated likewise on a strict party vote, the present leader of the Opposition, the ex-Minister of Railways and every Conservative in the House at that time voting against it. I moved an amendment against exemptions of the property of the company from taxation. That was also defeated. Mr. Ross, the present Minister of Education of Ontario, moved against the clause preventing the Government interfering with the tolls until the road had made a net return of 10 per cent. That amendment was also defeated. Mr. Casey moved a provision in favour of giving power to the Government to acquire the road, which the second syndicate was willing to accept as they were ready at any time to agree to the Government taking the road on paying the company 10 per cent more than the actual cost. All these amendments were defeated. Here are the gentlemen who entered on that great contract without advertising for tenders, who gave away 25,000 square miles of timber lands without advertising for tenders, who disposed of millions of acres of lands including mineral lands, without advertising for tenders, who allowed these outrageous provisions to go into effect and refused to entertain the offer of the second syndicate though it was backed up by a deposit of $395,000 more than was demanded—these men rise in this house and make all this row about this little line of 150 miles, to be built from pressure of necessity to meet an immediate want with respect to the Yukon territory. This record is not a good guarantee as to the patriotic motives of hon. gentlemen opposite who are taking the Government to task to-day in connection with this Bill we have under discussion. The member for York says that the Government throughout all the transactions in connection with this scheme have been guilty of secrecy and duplicity, which has characterized every action since last July. Was there secrecy or duplicity in the journey of the Minister of the Interior to the very spot where action was rendered necessary, in order that he might obtain practical knowledge—that kind of knowledge which is so much superior to theoretical knowledge—whose impressions were derived from actual inspection of the country, visiting the different ports which might be made the terminus of the railway, examining the Stikine River, and calculating by actual observation what steps were necessary to be taken, and what the character of the exigency that confronted the Government was? Was there any duplicity or secrecy about this most necessary and commendable action on the part of the Minister of the Interior in gaining upon the ground information upon which we can rest implicitly in dealing with this question? No, Sir; on the contrary, he deserves commendation, and the Government of which he is a member deserves nothing but commendation and praise for the promptitude and efficiency of the measures they adopted. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) was very facetious about the humbug of starvation in that country. He told us that the American Government had sold their reindeer, that the Minister of the Interior had gone to unnecessary trouble to rescue starving men, and again he charged the Minister (Mr. Sifton) with duplicity and secrecy for being guilty of the humane motives that prompted him to save these miners from the lingering and painful death of starvation in that inhospitable region. I do not see anything to be facetious about in the action taken by the American and Canadian Governments, even though it happily proved to be unnecessary. It was a wise precaution. Then the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) tells us, that it is all nonsense about fearing a rebellion out there. He believes that you can pour in 50,000 or 100,000 such characters as congregate in mining camps, men who have vigilance committees, and make and execute their own laws, men who might take a notion to establish a government of their own in that country, men who might defy constituted law and authority; he tells us that there is no danger from the congregation of these men in a remote territory of our country. Well, it ill-becomes my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) to belittle the apprehensions of the Government as to the danger that might arise from such a population, and it ill-becomes him to sneer at the desire of Ministers to preserve law and order, and so retain in our possession the great heritage that belongs to the people of Canada. He tells us that it is all humbug about any fear of filibustering, but I tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) that there was danger, and I tell him that it was prudent and proper and necessary that the Government should take precautionary measures and should place themselves in a position, by constructing this railway, to send troops into that country if it ever became necessary to assert our sovereignty and to hold that country under the British flag.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) threw discredit upon the Government because of the character of the road. He told us that it was 150 miles long, commencing nowhere and ending nowhere; it is a cry in the wilderness, he said, a voice that will be lost in the great wilds of that country. He believed it was a piece of fatuity on the part of the Government to invest in any such undertaking, but let us see about that. As I have said, in providing for the urgency that confronted the Government, time was the essence of the contract, days were important. If communication with the Yukon was to be secured before the frosts of next winter set in, there was not a day to be lost. The Government realized the paramount necessity that rested upon it of prompt and vigorous and decisive action. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) have built a road from Edmonton, which about four years from now would have answered the purpose in view? Would he have gone from Pyramid Harbour to Rink Rapids and built a road that terminated in American territory and placed us in a position in which the United States could have taken us by the throat and throttled us as regards our commerce? Perhaps he might, but the Government concluded that none of these routes would answer, and for the simple reason that the terminus was in American territory. We once built a railroad on this side of the continent to reach the sea-coast through our own territory. It was a longer road, and it was not the best commercial route to reach the sea, for we could have accomplished that end more easily and cheaply by going to Portland or Boston or New York. Indeed, we need not have invested a dollar in such an enterprise, because there were already railroads reaching these points and anxious for our trade. But we built the Intercolonial Railway at a cost of $50,000,000, and why? It was because we wanted to reach the ocean upon our own territory. Sir, the conditions that governed us in that case are precisely the conditions that actuated this Government to decide upon the route to the Yukon which they have selected. If we could not avail of the railroads to Portland and Boston and New York to reach the ocean, the same reasons apply to Dyea, Pyramid Harbour, Skagway or to any other point upon the Pacific Coast that is in American territory. If this Government acted consistently, if they followed precedent, if they acted in consonance with the traditional policy of this country, they were bound to select the route which could be made independent of foreign interference. I say they did right in carrying out this policy. We presumed upon our treaty rights being accorded us, and on our being able to navigate the Stikine, but in the event of our being disappointed we are still building a road upon the proper line, and one which may simply be extended 180 miles or 200 miles further to the sea, and then we have got a line of our own in our own territory. The Government did exactly what they ought to do, and they would have deserved censure if they had failed to do it. All this talk about shorter routes, about better commercial routes, or about routes across the White Pass, or any other pass which terminates in that strip of territory which unfortunately the Americans own extending from Mount St. Elias, down, as they claim, to the Portland Canal; all this talk is misleading. Nobody denies that these routes are the best commercial routes, but what we assert is, that national considerations compelled the Government to disregard the natural advantages of these routes and to build a line on Canadian territory which will enable us to be independent of foreign control or foreign interference, and after all, this understanding is not a very serious one. Of course, we are in some degree ignorant of the character of the route from the southern terminus of the Teslin Lake line to Portland Canal or Observatory Inlet, but we have reason to believe it is inside of 200 miles, and we know we can get across the first chain of mountains by going down the Cañon of the Stikine.

Men who have traversed western railways, running through the Cañon of the Arkansas, the Cañon of the Gunnison, the Cañon of the Sacramento, or any of those western roads which have had to overcome great engineering difficulties, are surprised at the comparative ease with which a railway could be constructed where nature has made an opening and where the grades are light. We can cross the range of mountains at any rate by the Cañon of the Stikine, and we have every reason to believe that we can get a favourable route thence to Portland Canal. We have also reason to believe that the interests of British Columbia, in having a road located through her territory to a port on her coast, will prompt her to relieve Canada largely from expense in carrying out the extension of this line.

My hon. friend from York, in the course of his remarks, dwelt upon the ease with which we might have secured favourable arrangements with the United States last July. One would infer, from what he said, that the Government had lost a golden opportunity—that there would not have been the slightest difficulty about their securing those rights if they had only attended to the matter in proper season. Well, Sir, I fear that the hon. gentleman comes into collision with another very prominent member of his party. His assertion that the Government were loafing around last July and August and were missing a golden opportunity, will scarcely agree with statements made by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) the other night with regard to the conduct and characteristics of the American Government in its dealings with Canada. That hon. gentleman said :

I say we cannot rely on those people showing towards us the slightest measure of fair-play.

Again, he says :

How those people to the south of us, represented by their government, will twist and vary treaties, and will twist and torture principles of law, but will scheme and arrange so as to grasp every advantage possible, regardless of any consequences whatever.

And then he proceeds to say :

When dealing with the United States, any member of this House may without fear warn the Government of Canada that they are relying upon a broken reed when they rely upon the good faith of the United States.

Further on, he says :

Their citizens on the Pacific Coast are bringing all the pressure they can bring to bear on the Washington authorities, to give them every conceivable advantage in this Yukon country, and in the trade connected with it. I have no manner of doubt whatever, Mr. Speaker, that not only is that their purpose, but from the legislation now before Congress there is cause for any reasonable man to assume that, so far as they can go, short of actual offensive and warlike demonstrations and action against us, the people of the United States will compel the Administration of the day will go.

Mr. CHARLTON.

And again, he says :

I am, therefore, in the strongest manner against, and will vote against any proposition for the expenditure of a dollar, or the assumption of responsibility for any action, which is dependent upon United States good-will at the present time for its successful accomplishment.

That was rather inconsistent with the declaration made by the hon. member for York—and I take occasion here to lament the intemperate language indulged in by the hon. member whose words I have quoted. At the present time sentiments of that kind expressed here are not only unfair to the country against which they are expressed, but they are mischievous in their tendency to produce strained and unfriendly relations between the two countries, and are calculated to embarrass the Government here in the attempt which they will necessarily and properly, to the best of their ability make to smooth out the difficulties between the two countries, and to promote Canadian interests by striving to bring about friendly relations between them. As that kind of language is calculated to thwart such efforts, I must condemn the use of it by any member of this House.

Then the hon. member for York proceeds to say that we have insulted the United States. We have insulted them in what way? Why, he says we have insulted them in not professing to care about getting a road across their territory. We have insulted them by wanting to have a line of our own in our own country, where it will be independent of any interference which the United States will be able to make, if that country should assume an unfriendly attitude. I do not think that they will feel that we have insulted them because we wished to have an independent railway in our own country, and be in a position to control the trade of our own country.

My hon. friend made some remarks about the course of duplicity followed by the Government in exempting from the grant to this railway company the arable lands of the Yukon district, where there were no arable lands. I do not know that that was a very proper foundation for an unfavourable criticism. The hon. gentleman may not be aware of it, but there are arable lands north of parallel 60—lands capable of producing barley, potatoes, roots, grass—large pasture areas—lands that will be valuable for agricultural purposes; and the Government, in taking the course which my hon. friend ridicules, simply showed that they were possessed of more accurate information than my hon. friend himself evidently is. These arable lands, whatever may be their extent or value, are under the terms of this contract exempt from appropriation by this railway company; and in making that arrangement, the Government have acted in the public interest.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having dealt with the reasons that may be urged as good and sufficient ones for the selection of the route which the Government have selected, and for the course that has been adopted by them—the pressure of necessity, the urgency of the case, that did not admit of waiting for weeks and months if we were to provide an outlet and inlet for that country in the season of 1898; having dealt with the offer of Mr. Hamilton Smith, with no tangible proof of any financial ability to supplement his proposal; having contrasted the assumed principles of hon. gentlemen opposite with their conduct when in power, and the outrageous violation, year after year, of the principles which they are sticklers for to-day; let us examine for a few moments the question of the probable cost of this road. We are told that it is a poor, miserable tramway, which will be thrown together in the utmost haste. We might almost suppose, from the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, that it would be almost as easy to build this road as to make a sleigh road for a logging camp. This road of 150 miles, we must remember, will be a road in the wilderness, a long distance from the base of supplies. The contractors will have to transport every ounce of material, all the food, implements, rolling stock, rails and everything, first, to the Pacific Coast, then up the coast, and up the Stikine River to Glenora, 150 miles, and thence along the line through an unbroken solid wilderness for 150 miles. They have to build that road and put it into operation by the first of September next. That may seem a rather trivial task to my hon. friend—the task of making the surveys, preparing the road beds, laying the rails, getting in the rolling stock, etc. Why, I venture to say that the company could lay down a narrow-gauge railway from Montreal to Toronto by the first of September next and do it cheaper than they can build this 150 miles from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake, through that howling wilderness. I think it can be demonstrated that that road, 330 miles long, from Montreal to Toronto, could be built quicker and cheaper than this road from Telegraph Creek to Lake Teslin.

Mr. BERGERON. How much would that cost?

Mr. CHARLTON. A narrow-gauge road from Montreal to Toronto, built in that way, with great haste, would cost $4,500,000. Of course it could be built cheaper, if they had ten years to do it in, as our friends on the Canadian Pacific had.

My hon. friend from York gave us a calculation of the earnings of this road, and he complained that the Government had neglected to retain the power to regulate the tolls. If that be his belief, he is mistaken, for under section 21 the Government can regulate the tolls. Later on he asked what the tolls were to be. He wants to know, before a mile of the track is laid, before the conditions are understood, before the cost of the road is known, before the difficulties are over, what the tolls will be. The Government will naturally wait until the road is ready to carry something before deciding what tolls shall be. Then my hon. friend made some estimates as to the probable earnings, and in these he demonstrated that he is one of the greatest railway authorities of this century. He ought to be made Minister of Railways without delay, and I have no doubt that under his supervision the Intercolonial would be made to pay.

Mr. FOSTER. I would give the hon. gentleman a pass the first thing.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think I would have earned it after this recommendation of the qualities and abilities of my hon. friend. He assumes that the fares on this road for passengers will be $15 for 150 miles, or ten cents a mile. I do not know that that assumption is unreasonable. The company will have to fix the fares at a rate at which a man can not afford to walk the distance. But assuming that the passenger rate will be $15 for 150 miles, the hon. gentleman assumes that the freight rate will be $50 per ton. Here the brilliancy of his calculation comes into play. $15 per passenger and $50 per ton of freight or $2.50 per one hundred weight. Why, on the trunk lines between Chicago and New York it costs $2.50 to $3 and in some cases $4 per ton of freight, according to the season of the year, and $20 for a first-class passage. My hon. friend has made the cost of a ton of freight three and a half times higher than the cost of a passage, when the usual ratio for freight of trunk lines is one-third or one-quarter the cost of a passenger. Corn can be sent from Chicago to New York at 18 cents per cwt., or $3.60 per ton, while the fare for a passenger is many times more. At a way station in western Ontario—I speak from knowledge because I recently imported a car load of corn—it cost 13½ cents per hundred weight, or $2.70 a ton, for freight from Chicago to that way station, in the middle of Ontario, near the Niagara frontier, where we had to pay local rates. You can send it down to New York for very little more, and yet my hon. friend talks about $50 per ton or $2.50 per hundredweight for the transportation of freight 150 miles. The statement is preposterous.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it?

Mr. CHARLTON. It is. The carriage of freight, by ordinary rules, will not be one-half the cost of a first-class passenger fare. Then the hon. gentleman calculated that if there were 20,000 passengers and 20,000 tons of freight, that would give a net revenue of $700,000. He was careful, however, not to say what the running expenses would be. He said that 50,000 passengers and 50,000 tons of freight would give a net earning of $3,250,000, and one hundred thousand passengers and 100,000 tons of freight would yield the snug sum of $6,000,000 net earnings. Even Baron Munchausen could not get up such a railway statement as that. He had not the imagination. He could easily, however, have made a statement, in the wildest efforts of his fancy, that would be more reliable than this.

Mr. FOSTER. Is my hon. friend aware that the Government engineer who was sent out there to report, both as to the cost of building the railway and the cost of transportation to the lake, estimated it at $50 per ton?

Mr. CHARLTON. I was not aware of it, and if he did, he knew as little about it as my hon. friend.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. Minister of Railways took that as his basis of calculation.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS (Mr. Blair). I did nothing of the kind.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have heard a good deal of the character of the road. The cost of building it will be enormous beyond doubt. The men whom these contractors will employ will be right on the way to the Yuokn gold fields, where men are receiving perhaps a dollar an hour, and navvies cannot be kept on the road for less than $5 or $6 a day. The cost of labour in constructing that road will be five times greater than it would be in a settled country. But hon. gentlemen opposite do not stop to consider the enormous disadvantages under which these contractors will labour in the construction of that road. Then, as to the character of the road, there is a great deal of fun made about this narrow-gauge, but railway men know that a narrow-gauge road is considered the most economical for the performance of business of any road at all. The proportion of dead weight to live weight or paying freight is less on a narrow-gauge road than on a wider one. The proportion of freight to dead weight on a four foot eight inch gauge is very much less than on a three-foot gauge; and the reason for the universal adoption of the four-foot eight-inch gauge is because uniformity of gauge is necessary in order to avoid breaking freight. You can imagine the advantage, in sending freight from Chicago, in running the same car through to Portland or New Orleans, whereas, if you had two or three different gauges, you must have two or three transshipments. We started in this country with a five foot six inch gauge. We had a gauge of four feet eight inches prevalent in the northern States, and a gauge of five feet in the Southern States. There were some very important narrow-gauge roads. For instance, there was the Denver and Rio Grande Road, which had a gauge of three feet six inches, and an admirable road it was. The gauge was changed, because its connection east and west were the standard gauge, and not because it was not an economical or efficient road. This line, of which so much fun is made, is almost identical in character with the entire railway system of South Africa, from Cape Town up through the Orange Free State, the Transvaal, Mashonaland, Mataberland, Bechuanaland, and reaching out to the Zambesi, a great stretch of two or three thousand miles of line, including the lateral lines to the ocean at different points. That whole system is a narrow-gauge system. And yet we are told that this narrow-gauge road is not going to be able to do the business between Telegraph Creek and Teslin Lake. Another advantage in favour of the narrow-gauge is that you can surmount heavier grades and go around sharper curves. You can lay down a more efficient road through a difficult country at a small cost and overcome engineering difficulties more easily than with a road of a broader gauge. So far as any disability arising from gauge is concerned, there is no reason why this road should not be an efficient and economical one.

Mr. DAVIN. Before my hon. friend leaves that point, with his permission, I would ask him a question. Is a narrow-gauge road as suitable as a broad-gauge road for a country having a great deal of snow?

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not think there is a great difference. A heavy fall of snow is very awkward in any case, whether on a broad or narrow-gauge road. I think I may claim to have a little knowledge of these narrow-gauge roads. Some years ago, I carried on a large lumber operation, transporting long timber and masts on a road having a gauge of three feet two inches in a country where the snowfall was heavy. We had an iron rail of 22 pounds to the yard. We loaded on truck loads of masts that would weigh 25 or 30 tons, and hauled them down to the lake. We had no difficulty with the snow more than we should have had with a standard gauge road. I do not think that there is any difference. You have to clear off the snow, and it is at least as easy to clear the snow off a narrow road as to clear it off a broad one.

Mr. FOSTER. How did you get the long timbers around the curves?

Mr. CHARLTON. We had a pretty straight line. We are not calculating to draw masts on this Teslin Lake road.

Now, as regards the value of the land grant. As my hon. friend is aware, this grant does not cover arable lands. Messrs Mann & Mackenzie must take rock and mountain, that class of land which is useless for any purpose but minerals, and what little scraggy timber may be growing, which would be useless except for mining purposes. This is a large land grant, nominally. The Canadian Pacific got 13,000 acres a mile of arable land for the portion of the main line constructed by the syndicate; this company gets 25,000 acres a mile of non-arable land, worthless except for minerals. My hon. friend talks as though the whole of the land grant would be placer diggings or quartz leads. With this grant of lands laid out on base lines, with three-mile blocks on each side, or six miles wide on the line of a stream, there would be a mile of stream to 3,840 acres of land. Assuming that the placer diggings on streams large and small are three chains wide, and that is wider than the average will be, out of 3,840 acres of land, there are 24 acres for placer diggings. On the entire land grant, laid out in blocks three miles wide on each side of streams, there will be 1,000 miles of stream beds. But we may assume that there will be lateral branches coming in, perhaps a rod wide or so, which will add a thousand miles more to the length of the streams that will be given in this grant of four million acres of land. Let us assume that there are three chains wide of placer diggings on each stream, and that is a liberal estimate, because some will be smaller, and because this is wider than the small California streams. Having three chains of twelve rods in width in each, there will be a total of 48,000 acres of placer diggings on 2,000 miles of stream bed, out of the whole land grant. Yet my hon. friend gets up and talks about four millions of acres of gold lands. But when you simmer down to 48,000 acres of placer diggings, you can realize the exaggeration that is indulged in in criticizing this scheme. Moreover, it costs gold to get gold. My hon. friend, in his ideas of the richness of this country, is like the Irishman who landed in America with exaggerated notions of the chance he would have with getting on in the world. He chanced to see a dollar lying in the street, but he passed it by. When asked by a friend why he did not pick up that dollar, he answered: "I am going where they grow on the bushes." My hon. friend seems to think that gold grows on the bushes in the Yukon district. I can tell him that the price of getting gold must be special effort, hard work and much uncertainty. It must not be forgotten that the conditions of life in the Yukon region are infinitely more onerous than in the placer diggings of California. The hon. gentleman must not forget that the frost is never out of the ground in that country. In the summer the sun thaws out the ground for from one to three feet, but underneath is eternal frost, extending to the bed-rock. The placer miner carries on his work by building a fire to thaw out the ground and start a hole, then throws the thawed earth aside, then makes another fire to thaw out more of the earth, and so on down to the gravel on the bed-rock, and then must tunnel under by means of fires, throwing out the dirt and leaving it on the surface until the summer sun thaws it out and it can be panned out.

There is no certainty in the results. One man may strike it rich, when fifty will be beggared by their operations in placer diggings. All this talk about the wonderful returns to be held in the placer diggings of the Yukon are misleading, whether intended so or not, like all the information given us by hon. gentlemen who indulge in these criticisms. I do not know whether my hon. friend has followed closely the methods of taking out gold in the various parts of the world. California was probably the richest gold field ever discovered. I have gone through this, over the old placer diggings, where the whole country was torn to pieces, the miners having gone down to bed-rock, having taken out hundreds of millions of dollars. I have investigated the average character of the result on the part of those hardy miners, and the result in that country, with all the advantages that it possesses, with the richness of its placer diggings, was that not more than one man in fifty made a fortune, and that the majority of the men failed to make wages. That is the character of the placer diggings in California. They have there the mother lode, as they term it, and many rich quartz leads are being worked, and in all cases these quartz leads are more or less uncertain. They may, as the miners term it, pinch out, they may grow lean, they may peter out as they go down into the earth. Experience shows that the business of quartz mining in California, in Colorado, in Idaho, in Montana, and in all the mining districts of the United States, is hazardous, uncertain, and that on the average it costs a dollar to get a dollar in gold. There are no prizes even in that favoured country such as my hon. friend imagines. Then if he goes to other countries he will find substantially the same condition of things. There is just one gold field in the world, the Witwatersrand in the Transvaal, where there is some degree of regularity and certainty as to the yield of the mines. The blanket or conglomerate carrying gold there, has a uniform quality and yields gold in paying quantities. The miners there sink their shafts and reach the blanket or conglomerate, and they can figure pretty accurately what the returns will be. But even there it costs 80 to 90 per cent of the value of the gold to extract it. Go north to Mataberland and Mashonaland where it is supposed there are great gold deposits, and where evidences of former gold mining operations are abundant on every side, and the whole question as to whether it will pay to extract gold is purely problematical to-day. So it is the world over ; and I repeat there is just one locality, the Witwatersrand (white water ridge) in the Transvaal, where there is any degree of certainty as to what returns will be secured from gold mining operations. All this talk about the fabulous wealth of Alaska, about the heritage of the people, and about the enormous returns that will be secured in working these frozen placers, frozen down to bed-rock, is pure moonshine and nonsense. To extract the gold in Alaska, if the company that has this contract proceeded afterwards to the work of mining, they have got to hire labour, they have got to employ men, they have got to develop the country by spending money, and it is a problem of the most doubtful character whether they will get back the money they put in. They get at best 4,000,000 acres out of 80,000,000, about one-twentieth of the placer area and the general area of that country. When I was studying this matter over and deciding for myself, whether I could reasonably and honestly satisfy myself that these men were not getting more than they ought to, I asked myself this question : Would you invest money in that enterprise? And I said no, I would not put in a dollar, and I would not ; and you won't find one business man in fifty in this House or in this country, who will give to that question the attention that a man will naturally give to something where he is going to bank his money, and who will venture to put money in that enterprise. These men are entitled to the chance to make something ; they have bravely taken a great chance to lose something ; and the only parties in this matter who are perfectly free from danger of loss, and who have a sure thing, is the Government.

Now, my hon. friend says, this Government is a cowardly Government, it does not dare to make any investment in money, it is afraid to put a dollar into this road, it sneaks out of the obligation that rests upon it as the custodian of the public interests, and it goes and barter away this vast heritage of the people, rather than place a tax upon them to build a road, the necessity for the construction of which is a pure problem. Now we do not know what the character of these placers will be, we do not know whether the men that will go into the Yukon district this spring will come out in the fall, every man of them cursing the country and will never go back, or whether some will stay there, whether there will be continued development or a complete and disastrous collapse of a boom that may dissipate into thin air like the South Sea bubble. The recklessness and risk is on the side of the men who are taking the contract, it is the Government who are in a perfectly safe and sure position. It gets the road built without money, it gives to the company a grant, that, if it proves to be worth anything, the company has got to develop, has got to pay money to develop, and it has got to develop for the Government just as much placer diggings as it develops for itself. The Government ascertains through the expenditure of this company, through the hard money it invests in developing these placer diggings, the Government ascertains without the expenditure of a cent, whether it has got any value in the alternate blocks. The whole matter when we come to look it over, is one that gives satisfactory proof of the judiciousness of the Government in taking the course that it has taken in this matter.

Now, when we talk about the fabulous richness of these placer diggings, the wonderful reserve of gold in this country, what foundation have we for arriving at the conclusion that hon. gentlemen opposite have arrived at? This country, Mr. Speaker, has been prospected for ten years, there have been thousands of miners in this country roaming over it from end to end, on the American side and on the Canada side, year after year. There has been a settlement below Circle City of American miners who have wintered there year after year, grubbing along, some making enough to pay expenses, some making a little more, some making a little less ; and these hardy adventurous men have gone down the streams on the Canadian side and on the American side, making investigation far and wide, and the result of ten years of exploration, ten years of investigation, is to find one Klondike. And yet these hon. gentlemen would have us suppose that every valley, every gulch, every gully, in the Yukon Valley is glittering with gold. Why, I hardly think my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster), has yet recovered from the influence of the nursery story where he learned to believe that by following a rainbow he could find a pot of gold at the further end.

We have travelled far afield in the discussion of this question. We have had a good deal said about treaty rights, about international obligations, and international good faith, and international regulations. We have had from one set of gentlemen on the other side praises for the United States, for its kindness, its generosity, its fairness in dealing with us, and lamentations that we did not avail ourselves of the chance last summer to get arrangements that we might have got so easily. And we have on the part of other hon. gentlemen the assertion that they are grasping, and guilty of bad faith, that they would not invest a dollar upon their good faith and upon their word. I do not know on which side to believe, are the sentiments that our hon. friends opposite entertain. Now, with regard to treaty obligations, the Stikine is a free river, and if we are deprived of the free navigation of that stream, it will be truly an outrageous over-riding of our treaty rights. We have no business to assume that will be the case, I do not believe it will be the case. I do not believe the United States Government would deprive us of a right assured to us by solemn treaty ; I do not believe there is a disposition to do it. But as I said before, even if the policy that the United States Government has deliberately decided to follow will lead them to shut us out of the Stikine, the same policy will make it in the highest degree impolitic for us to build a road upon their territory at any point on the Pacific Coast. I repeat what I said before, that even in that eventuality we are working on the right line, for we are building 150 miles of road which, by building 180 or 200 miles more, will lead us to a port of our own and make us independent of interference of any kind. That is the only safe course to take. If the Government were putting a road to Dyea or Skagway, they would be voluntarily incurring risks as to interruption of communication that they would not be justified in incurring. They are doing exactly what they ought to do, exactly what meets my approval in this matter ; and in the haste with which they have acted in this matter, temporarily overriding a principle which in itself is a good one, but like all other principles must be set aside in great emergencies. I say they have acted in my belief properly, because it was necessary to take time by the forelock, and to make instant provision to secure what they desired to obtain.

It follows from what I have said that we must have our own road as a matter of prudence. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) made a most unwarranted attack on the Premier of this Dominion—he made several attacks, in fact, but I will allude to one only. He made an attack on my right hon. friend because of language attributed to him in an address delivered at Boston. The right hon. First Minister has time and again told the House that the report was one never submitted to him. He cannot be bound by a report of a speech he did not sanction. I know how liable a speaker is to have his language misconstrued and misstatements made through ignorance and not through a desire to misrepresent, and especially is this the case with reporters who may be desirous of construing language used by speakers so as to convey an impression which the language was not calculated to convey. All I have to say about the right hon. Premier is that he may now be judged by his acts, by his record. Hon. gentlemen opposite were in power eighteen years, and during the whole of that term they failed to secure from the inhabitants of the motherland that warm and effusive response to the action of this Government evoked when we granted the mother country preferential treatment in our markets. The British people recognized the right hon. Premier and the Ministers of this Dominion as their friends. They have a warmer place in their hearts for these men than they ever had for public officials of Canada before, and I repeat that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues may be judged by their record, that is all they need point to, and the carping, barking criticism on the part of men who would deny to these high-minded, statesman-like officials the meed of praise due them, will pass for what they are worth, and that is infinitely less than little.

With respect to the statement made by my hon. friend that the golden opportunity had been missed of securing better relations with the United States, all I have to say to that is, that in my belief the present Government has lost no opportunity and has never failed to use its utmost efforts to secure better, broader and more friendly relations with the United States ; that this Government realizes fully and to the utmost extent the importance of such relations ; that it realizes its importance as regards ourselves, that it realizes its importance in a high degree as relates to the promotion of friendly feelings between the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon family ; that this Government is wide-awake to its duty, and will never fail to seize any opportunity that presents itself to secure broader, freer, friendlier social and business relations with the great republic to the south of us.

But we must maintain our self-respect ; we cannot surrender our rights, that is a thing this Government will not do. A few months ago the right hon. Premier and the Minister of Marine were in Washington, and they were asked by an American diplomat, the official in charge of the negotiations, to surrender what we might term our trump card and then wait until the United States were ready to treat in regard to other matters. We were asked to put an end to pelagic sealing, which the Americans are anxious we should do, and they would be ready in due time to take up other questions. The right hon. Premier very properly and astutely said : We are ready on the instant, without a moment's delay, to enter into the consideration of the whole broad question of pelagic sealing and all other questions, and we are anxious to get these questions out of the way as speedily as possible ; but a partial settlement, especially of the kind proposed, would not be calculated to promote freer trade relations between the two countries. So my right hon. friend declined the offer, and this was evidence of his ability, and he thus indicated the proper course for the Canadian Government to pursue.

While we have an anxiety to secure such relations as will ensure freedom of commercial intercourse and friendly relations which will serve to promote union between all the Anglo-Saxon commonwealths of the world in the interest of humanity, while this Government will go as fast and as far as possible in that direction, this Government will still maintain its self-respect. If its offers are rejected and its advances met with rebuff, what can we do? We can simply wait our time. And we are now doing tolerably well. It was thought some years ago, I thought so myself, that admission of our agricultural produce to the American market was essential, that we must obtain it or we could not prosper. I do not think so to-day; it would be highly advantageous and most desirable, but it is not absolutely essential. We are getting along, and I am happy to say we are getting along famously. We have the goodwill of England, thanks to the conduct of this Liberal Government. Other things being equal, we will now get preference in that market; they will take us by the hand and say: Good boys, if you do anywhere near what is right you are pretty sure of our market. In the province of Ontario we have received $1 per 100 pounds for live hogs through the past season in excess of the price in Buffalo or Chicago, and this has been obtained at our country stations. We are exporting increased quantities of bacon and ham to England; but we will not realize the extent of our increased exports until next year's Trade and Navigation Returns are brought down. We are exporting to England two or three times as much cheese as do the United States. Our farmers in Ontario were in a better position last season than farmers in the United States. They only suffered in one respect: a combination of wheat buyers gave our farmers 5 to 10 cents per bushel less than they should have obtained. But as regards pork, cheese and beef, we have had splendid prices and an unlimited market, and the result is great prosperity; and if we cannot gain access to the markets of the United States, which are essential in some lines, the farmers can simply change their mode of farming, and instead of raising poultry, barley, vegetables and hay for the American market, can turn their attention to pork and cheese, thus changing the character of the output, and our exports on these lines have been for the last year or two increasing rapidly.

Mr. CLANCY. It took you a long time to see it.

Mr. CHARLTON. It takes a man a long time to see a thing that has not come yet. There was once a Dutchman who said that if his foresight had been as good as his hindsight, he would have avoided many difficulties. I saw it as soon as it arrived.

Mr. FOSTER. He would have been a sight better off.

Mr. CHARLTON. I shall not follow the example of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) and make a four hours' speech. A few words more and I shall conclude. This Government that I am a supporter of will, in my honest belief, do everything to secure a fair settlement of outstanding questions with the United States, and towards that end will make every effort that can in reason be demanded of them. If their efforts are met in the same spirit as they are made, then these questions will soon be settled. This Government hails with joy the sweeping away, or the opportunity to sweep away social prejudices, business prejudices, trade repression, and all things and everything that stands in the way of a close connection and a responsive feeling between the two great Anglo-Saxon commonwealths upon this continent. We will bear with fortitude our position whatever it may be; we have a grand future before us, we have a great country abounding with resources, resources the character and extent of which have been undreamed of heretofore by ourselves, and which we fail even yet to realize a tithe of. We have a country extending from ocean to ocean; a country inhabited by a hardy and an enterprising race. I believe, Sir, the very fact that we have two nationalities in this Dominion will ultimately result in increasing the vigour and the enterprise of our people. I listened to a speech to-day in another part in this building by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) a speech every word of which I endorse, a speech in which that hon. gentleman contemplated the possibility of our having scope for all our resources and all our population in Canada. That day is coming, Sir, when our young men will cease to drift away to the United States, and it is coming more rapidly in consequence of the existence of a Liberal Government in this country. The day is coming, the day is near at hand, when this will be a great and prosperous and powerful state, founded upon British precedents and upon British institutions, avoiding the mistakes that exist on the other side of the line, a nation that will be a model I trust to all nationalities now in existence or which may hereafter come into existence upon the face of the globe. Sir, the efforts of this Government are in the direction of bringing about such a happy condition in our Dominion. The efforts of this Government, even in the matter under consideration are in that direction. They seek to afford to that great Yukon region an immediate outlet and inlet for travel, for trade, for export and import.

Mr. MILLS. Where is the machine politician now?

Mr. CHARLTON. The machine politician is on that side of the House; he always has been enrolled under the banners of the Conservative party.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the efforts of this Government are in that direction, and I am sorry to say that the efforts of the Conservative Opposition are in a contrary direction. Whether consciously or unconsciously, whether with intent or without intent, these gentlemen are pursuing a policy which is calculated to injure Canada, and they are questioning the propriety of a policy which is calculated to benefit Canada. They are playing into the hands and exciting the animosities and the prejudices of a party on the other side of the line, and their efforts are calculated to militate against our interests in any future negotiations that may be undertaken with that country.

I have to say, Sir, in conclusion, that I have gone over this question—candidly admitting as I do that at the outset that I looked upon the matter with some disfavour, because of the apparent violation of a cardinal principle in the policy of the Liberal policy, that no contract should be entered into without tender; a principle arrived at in consequence of the abuse of the contract system by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House in 1881, and subsequently to that time. I say that in consequence of that fact I looked with some disfavour on this measure at first. I felt it my duty to examine this measure candidly and carefully—of course I would not arrive at a conclusion hastily that was opposed to the interests of my friends, for I would do them justice if I could—and I am happy to say that I am able to endorse fully, for the reasons I have stated, the action of the Government in this matter. I endorse this Bill, not that I can foresee the outcome, not that the Government professes to be able to see the outcome; I cannot tell whether Mann & Mackenzie may become bankrupt in consequence of undertaking this hazardous enterprise, nor can I tell on the contrary whether they may make large profits out of it; but I do know one thing, and that is: that Mann & Mackenzie take all the risks, that they are entitled to any profit they can get, and that the Government sits quietly by and gets the railroad built without investing a dollar. I believe, Sir, that this policy of the Government is a very good one.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat refreshing even at this late stage of the debate, and after the many days of discussion upon this important question, to listen to the speech which we have thus heard from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). We of the Conservative party have sometimes said during the last couple of years, that it was worth while getting these gentlemen on the Treasury benches, because when we got them there we made patriotic men out of those who were unpatriotic before, we made lovers of Canada out of those who were lovers of the United States, and we made those men opposite feel that they had an interest in Canada, and that they had a country which was worth speaking for and fighting for. We have had no better illustration of that, either in the present session or any previous one of this Parliament, than the speech of the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) to-night. Sir, I have been a member of this House for 20 years; I have listened to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) during that long time, and for 17 years out of these 20 he invariably ran down his own country and stood up for the United States. To-night he has taken a different course. Formerly he could see no good in Canada, nothing to admire in the statesmanship of her people, nothing worth living for here. He believed in former days that everything that was done by the Government was calculated to exasperate the people of the United States. To-day his friends are in power, and though they are pursuing the very same policy as was pursued by Conservatives in the past, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) believes that everything is all right and nothing wrong. The very same thing which was wrong in his political opponents is the very best of policy in his political friends.

Now in reference to this question before the House, and on which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) has given such valuable information, according to rumour it was said, that from the date of the meeting of Parliament up to the present, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) was opposed to the Yukon contract, and that he was one of the members supporting the Government who was likely to get up at any time and condemn the scheme in toto. I believe there was some justification for that rumour, but strange to say at the very last moment the hon. gentleman has found new light, and through some peculiar change he becomes an enthusiastic supporter of this Yukon tramway. When the scales fell from off his eyes, we do not know—whether it was on his way to Damascus, or to Room 16, or to some private closet where he communed with his heart and conscience, or with the leader of the Government. What was the balm of Gilead which caused him to change his mind and to display this sturdy manhood which he has displayed to-night—we must leave the future to bring us the information; we cannot know it to-night. But it is sufficient to know, that within the last few days the hon. gentleman was opposed to this scheme, that he saw no virtue in it, whereas to-night he speaks as if he had examined it carefully and found it to be worthy of every commendation.

Now, I wish to refer for a short time to a few remarks made by the hon. gentleman with reference to the hopeful outlook of this country for the future. He says this country is great because it is inhabited by two races. I was just wondering how that remark accorded with the sentiment of a letter which the hon. gentleman wrote to his friends a few years ago, when, referring to the present leader of the Government, he said: "With a French Roman Catholic for a leader, and machine politicians to back him up. I can see no hope for the future of the country." To-day, there is a virtue in two races, but then it was a vice. To-day, there is a bright outlook for the future, but then he could entertain no hope for the future while we had machine politicians. He says, the leader of the Government should be judged by his acts, and not by his past record. I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite would gladly have their past record blotted out; and no one among them I am sure, would be more pleased to have his past record blotted out than the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, for no man has been more influenced by party exigencies than the hon. gentleman. What has his record been? In the early seventies he was a protectionist; after that he was a free trader except in everything that concerned himself. When his friends were out of power, he was a free trader; but as soon as they get back to power, he becomes a protectionist again, and their protectionist policy, when they passed their last Customs Bill, was, according to the hon. gentleman, everything to be desired. We required it in the defence of Canadian interests, whereas a few years ago it was opposed to the best interests of Canada. At one time the hon. gentleman was himself opposed to this deal, and was expected to make a very strong attack upon it; but now the attack of the Opposition upon it is unwarranted. It was necessary, he says, for the Government to be prepared to throw troops and munitions of war into that country at a moment's notice—why? Because there was danger of a rebellion, or an invasion, or something of the kind, occurring in that country. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, what value would this railway be to throw troops into that country when they would have to cross American territory? What power would the Treaty of Washington give us to throw troops into that country if that privilege were refused to us by the United States, as they refused to allow Canadian troops to go by way of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal when we were sending troops to Manitoba and the North-west? What value would this road be, if they undertook to do that? It would be of no value at all. The hon. gentleman said that the Conservative Government did not advertise for tenders for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and therefore this Government was justified in not advertising for tenders in this instance. The whole gist of his argument appeared to me to be this. Every argument advanced on this side against the letting of that contract and against the principle on which it was let, was answered by saying: You are just as bad; you did the same thing when in power. But that hon. gentleman forgot that, for eighteen years, he condemned the principle on which the Canadian Pacific Railway was built—the principle of giving away mining lands, grazing leases, timber lands. He condemned the principle of monopoly as strongly as any man in this House; but, to-night, he has nothing to say against it, but every word he utters in defence of it. Is it possible that what was wrong for eighteen years in his opponents must be a right in his friends to-day? Is it possible that two wrongs can make a right? What is wrong when done by his opponents, must surely be wrong when it is done by his friends. The hon. gentleman has always been voluminous in his arguments, and he is very logical, I must say; and he has advanced strong arguments in the past against the principle of monopoly, involved in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and against the large grants of land made for that work; but if he succeeded in advancing strong arguments against the Canadian Pacific Railway contract, there is not one of those arguments that does not apply with stronger force against the course followed by his friends to-day, in locking up 4,000,000 acres of land in the Yukon country for the building of 150 miles of railway.

The hon. gentleman gave, as a strong reason for supporting the present Bill, that the railway was secured without the expenditure of a dollar. I thought of what I saw in a paper a few days ago, about a farmer who went and traded off his land and nearly everything he had, to buy a fine piano and a horse and carriage. Showing them to his wife, he said, "What a beautiful piano and horse and carriage I have got, and the best of it is, I did not pay a dollar of cash for them." His wife said, "You old fool, you have traded off the whole farm for them." We have traded off the whole country in the Yukon district for the purpose of getting a railway built to enable the owners of it to develop their own lands and take out the gold. The great argument which the hon. gentleman advanced in favour of this road was its great urgency. He said the Minister of the Interior had left for the scene of action as soon as it became known that gold existed there in fabulous quantities. When did he leave? He left in September of last year. When did he get the first information in relation to the gold discoveries? In December, 1896, and again in January, 1897; and nine months after that he left to make this inquiry on the scene of action. I would like to ask the hon. member for North Norfolk, if the Government did not know anything about the gold discoveries, last fall, when the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) brought the matter to their attention, that there was an item in the Estimates of $6,000 to defray the expenses of exploring and surveying the country lying between the Stikine River and the sources of the Yukon. Mr. Prior asked:

Has anything been done yet on this work?

Mr. DOBELL. No, nothing has been done.

Mr. PRIOR. I would like to draw the hon. Minister's attention to the fact that there is another route besides the one from the Stikine River to the Yukon. The other route is from the head of Lynn Canal over the White Pass to Teslin Lake, and thence to the Yukon River. There is no proper road now for miners to come in by, and it is very hard for them to get their goods in in any quantity. At present nearly all the goods going to the Yukon country are coming around by the mouth of the Yukon. They have to go up by St. Michael's, and they are American goods that are mostly coming in. If we could get a good road through the Lynn Canal into the Teslin Lake and so on to the Yukon, that would be much shorter. If that cannot be found, I take it that the Stikine is the best. The Government should put on two surveyors.

Mr. DOBELL. It is the intention to survey all possible routes to open up that country, and not to spare any expense in having the routes properly surveyed.

Mr. PRIOR. I should like to see it done as soon as possible. Better spend $15,000 in one year than five or six thousand dollars per year in three years.

Mr. DOBELL. It will be gone on with early next spring.

Now, the whole gist of that conversation goes to show that in October, 1896, the Government were aware of the urgency and were providing for it. The hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Dobell) said they were prepared to survey every part of the route, and yet it was nearly a year later before the Minister of the Interior went into that country to examine it. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says that as soon as ever it was known that gold existed there in large quantities, the Minister of the Interior went to the scene himself and endured all those hardships which that hon. gentleman described for the purpose of acquiring information and providing for the carrying through of the road at the earliest possible moment. How does that agree with the fact of which there can be no doubt, that the reports of the hon. Minister's own engineers lay in his office nine months before he ever moved a hand or foot, during which time he and his colleagues were travelling all over the country, junketing and banqueting, going everywhere except to that part of the country where they should have gone to get information. Then they got into a terrible hurry at the last moment, and decided to give the contract so as to have the work done by the 1st of September.

The hon. member for Norfolk said that we did not ask for tenders for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He forgets, or if he did not forget, he should have told the House that there was an offer on the records of this Parliament for two or three years, announcing that the Government was prepared to give a large amount of lands and money to any company which would build that Canadian Pacific Railway, and his own leader, Mr. Mackenzie, sent Mr. Sandford Fleming to England to try and induce capitalists to undertake this great work. Mr. Mackenzie spent a great deal of time advertising tenders all over the world, but did not succeed in getting an offer. Then, when he was defeated and the Conservatives took office, they renewed the offer, and it stood upon "Hansard" up to the time that the bargain was entered into by them with the men who built the road. Unless the hon. gentleman's memory is very defective, he must remember that circumstance, and he cannot pretend that the Conservative party, in giving that great contract for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway did anything which warrants the course taken by the Government at present.

I would have contented myself with giving a silent vote, were it not for the fact that my silence might be construed into the belief that I did not think that this is one of the worst schemes ever submitted to Parliament during my time in this House. I am opposed to this scheme on account of the route chosen. I am opposed to the route chosen for commercial reasons. I believe it to be the very worst possible that could have been selected. Why? Because it is more calculated to give advantage to the people of the United States than to the people of Canada? Why do I say so? Because the Americans have free navigation from Seattle, Puget Sound, Washington Territory, Tacoma, or up in San Francisco, and can send their goods over this road right into the Yukon district. I opposed it because I believe that the large body of miners who will go in there during the next three or four years ought to be supplied with produce raised on Canadian farms and goods manufactured in Canadian factories. I oppose it because it is a route calculated to serve the interests and requirements of Americans rather than Canadians. My principle is Canada for the Canadians—not a portion of Canada, but all Canada for all the Canadians. My principle is Canada for all the Canadians, and not for a few to make millionaires of them. My principle is the expenditure of the people's money so as to benefit the great mass of the people of Canada rather than the people of the United States. I do not wonder that the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) advocates this Bill, because he was always an advocate for the United States against Canada. The whole history of his career, in and out of Parliament, has been on the same line—everything for his friends in the United States and nothing for our own people. He has been feeding labour in the United States for twenty-five years by the saw-logs taken out of Canada that should have been manufactured in Canada. He has been fighting year after year against the imposition of an export duty on logs to keep Canadian logs in Canada. He has been fighting against the making of regulations that would compel the manufacture in Canada of Canadian logs? Why? Because the mills at Tonawanda, where his interests lie, and where his brother is employed, have been kept going by sawing Canadian logs. Every effort we made to bring about a change was fought in the most strenuous way by the hon. gentleman. To my mind, this is the very worst road we could possibly have for commercial purposes. Let us compare for a few moments what the results would be to the Canadian people if we had that road through Edmonton. Eastern Canada and the North-west Territories would be the country of supply for the people going into the Yukon. We would have an all-rail route right through for the transport of the manufactured goods of this country and the products of the farm to supply the hundred thousand people who are estimated to go in there. The Americans would not be able to compete, because after bringing their goods to Vancouver, they would have to send them across the Rockies in order to make connection with the Canadian road. The long haulage they would have to pay and the customs duty would make competition on their part impossible. And had we chosen the road to Edmonton we would also open up the great arable district in the Peace River country, to open up which we must build a railway some time, and if we build it to-day, the expense would not have to be incurred again. That railway would be the natural outlet for the products of the farms of the North-west, Manitoba and the eastern provinces. It would be an outlet for the manufacturers of mining machinery to supply the people in that country. Where are they supplied from to-day? We are told that last year about $20,000,000 worth of products were brought into British Columbia for home consumption and for the people in the Yukon. What was that composed of? It was principally food products to supply the people going to those mines. British Columbia is not raising those products. If you had this road from Edmonton, the North-west Territories, Manitoba and Ontario would supply these products, and they would not be brought in from Montana, Dakota and San Francisco. $10,000,000 worth of food products was brought in last year, when there was not half the number there that there will be this year. I favour the route by Edmonton because all the miners would go over that route when they go to these gold fields, many of these will become discouraged and return, but in the meantime they will have visited the rich agricultural country of the Peace River and when they leave the Yukon district they go over the arable land again. What will be the result? Probably 75 per cent of them will stay there and become permanent settlers to the benefit of this country at large and the settlement of that region. This would be a great colonization railway besides opening up the route to the gold fields. When I asked why not build by the Edmonton route, the right hon. Premier answered that it would be a line of 1,500 miles long. I am told that it would be only about 1,000 miles to reach the navigable waters of the Pelly.

Mr. DAVIN. Nine hundred miles.

Mr. SPROULE. I am told by my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) who ought to be an authority on this subject that it would only be 900 miles. I believe we could build this road for less money than we could build the 450 miles for that we shall have to build before we can be sure of gaining uninterrupted access to that country by this coast route. And when disappointed gold seekers come out by that road they will disappear to every quarter of the world. Not ten per cent of them will remain in Canada to settle. For these reasons I say it is a mistake to build that road by the route chosen. The Government will build it there in the interest of United States rather than of Canada. It is a mistake also from a military point of view. The Government are to-day sending a military expedition through to the gold fields. How do they know that that expedition will be allowed to go up the Stikine River? In fact, they have the strongest reason in the world for believing that it will not do so. And if they are obliged to send this expedition through by way of Edmonton, this should prove to them unmistakably that the route that they have chosen is the worst route for military purposes. If they apprehend danger in the Yukon country, the route furthest from the frontier is the route they should have chosen.

I oppose this scheme because it costs too much. What is the length of the route? We are told that it is 150 miles; but the engineer says it is 208 miles, and I take it that the engineer who examined it ought to know better than those who have not been over the ground. The Government have contracted to give 25,000 acres of land, including mineral rights, per mile. For 208 miles this would mean over four million acres.

My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Robertson) gave what to my mind, was a very fair estimate of the value of the gold-bearing lands. He said that in Ontario where the Government is selling mineral bearing lands, which are not supposed to be worth one-tenth as much as these, the price is $2 per acre. At that price, this subsidy would represent $8,000,000, for the building of about 200 miles of tramway. If the road proves to be longer, we are going to pay more than that. At the lowest price at which you can at all fairly estimate the land, we are paying too much. But, besides the land, we are giving great privileges which, if they were given to independent miners would bring millions into the treasury of this country. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) gave a calculation which I have made in another way. I think he was very modest and that the calculation I have made is more likely to prove correct. Suppose the amount of land given to this company for building the road were given to free miners, what would it bring to the treasury? In the first place, we will suppose that 500,000 free miners went into that country and located the various claims comprised in these 4,000,000 acres. Two years would be a very moderate estimate of the time required for this. Now, 500,000 miners, at $10 apiece—what they want for a free miner's license—would be $5,000,000 for the right to go there and begin prospecting. This same amount would have had to be paid the following year. In order to take up this amount of land each miner must locate eight claims, making four million claims. At $15 each for locating claims this would be $60,000,000. If they continued to work these claims the second year they would pay $60,000,000 more. If they took an average of $100 of gold out of each claim—and that is moderate when you consider that men have claims that they can sell for $2,000,000, the royalty as compared to what Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie would pay would amount to $9,000,000. This makes a total of $139,000,000, which would be paid by poor men going into that country. Suppose that twenty men form this Mann & Mackenzie company. We make a multimillionaire of each of them. I contend that a Government charged with the duty of looking after land has no right to give away that domain.

Compare the situation of the poor man with the situation in which the Government places this company. He goes in and pays $10 for the right to hunt for gold, and when he takes up a claim he pays $15 for it, and every year he continues to work that claim, he pays $15. If he takes out any gold he pays 10 per cent royalty. When the company go in there they pay nothing at all for the right to examine the country, nothing for the claims, and they pay only one per cent royalty. They put the poor man down in a hole, and he has got to pay 10 per cent of all the gold he takes out to satisfy the voracious appetite of the Government for a royalty, while at the same time they allow the millionaire to dig his gold, and he only pays one per cent to the Government of what he takes out. How is that for the labouring man? How can they square themselves with the poor men of this country when they handicap them in this manner in the race of life, while at the same time they give away the rich domain of the people with other great franchises to these contractors. They impover-ish the poor man and put him down almost as low as a slave for the rest of his life, for the purpose of making millionaires of a few capitalists in this country. They cannot justify such action when they go before the people of this country. But what more do they do? They are locking up this vast territory where no man will want to dig as a free miner. This company takes possession of all that large gold-bearing territory that is open for free mining, and the Government have taken the alternate blocks. How will the free miner know in that country where to go and locate his claim? How will he know where to hunt for gold? There are no stakes to tell him the portions of land that are exempt from those that are not exempt, the portions that belong to the Government from those that do not belong to the Government. I say that the monopoly thus established will render it impossible for the free miner to work successfully in that country. Three-fourths of his time will be wasted in endeavouring to find gold in some portion of country that is not taken up by the monopolists. Then I say there will be confusion for the free miner, he will be handicapped, he will be prevented from carrying on operations in that country as he ought to have a right to do. But there is another question in regard to which I would like to have some information. I see by the regulations here that the Government reserves for themselves every alternate ten claims. They are taking every alternate ten claims of that region; do they reserve that from the free miner, or what do they do with it? There is nothing to show whether they reserve it or not. But if the company takes ten claims and the Government takes ten claims, then it is all reserved. Where is the free miner to come in? How is the Government to sell their ten claims or to get value out of them? The company take their ten claims and work them on one per cent royalty, and without any other charges that are made upon the free miner, and which will assuredly prevent him from succeeding in the race of life the same as others succeed. I oppose this contract for the reason that, in my judgment, it is too high, it costs too much, they get too much land. Again I say we not only give this company that large territory, but we have got to protect their rights. How are we going to protect their rights? Did the Government ever take into consideration what it would cost to protect their rights, to keep others from trespassing on their property? How many policemen will they require to do it? How many military expeditions will they require up there for that purpose? I say if we could only count that up, and calculate it by any right principle of reasoning, we would come to the conclusion that the Government have made a very bad bargain and one which this House should not sanction. I say it will be practically impossible to protect their rights there. No number of men, whether policemen or military, will be able to do it. But we not only give them the gold, we give them the silver, the lead, the copper, the timber, the iron, and the coal, in that country. I saw an article the other day showing that lumber was worth $250 a thousand feet, and there is a lot of fine timber in that country. When these men go up there, and lumber is needed for their purposes, they will start out wherever they can find a good timber limit and take possession of it. If they strike a coal mine, they will do the same; if they strike an iron mine they will do the same. We give them the great value that is in the timber there, the immense value, a value that we do not know how to appreciate here, because timber there is worth so much while here it is worth so little, they will take the coal mines as well in that country. But we have made it possible for this company to take nearly all the valuable timber of that country and no doubt they will do it. It will be one of their great sources of wealth when they take possession of their territory. But they will not only take the timber, they will take the coal mines that are found. Coal is one of the essentials for successful mining. They will take the gold mines, they will take the lead mines, they will take the iron mines, or any other class of mines because this property is given to them in fee simple, and they have it exempt from taxation for at least ten years. Now I oppose this contract because it was let in a wrong way. It was let in private, it was let without public competition, it was let without any notice to the world that the Government required this work to be done. If a man wants to do any important work, the first thing he does is to put a notice in the papers, asking capitalists to compete for the work. But the Government did not think it was necessary to do that? they bargained with their friends to do it at a price agreed upon between them, without any outsiders knowing that this work was to be done. Therefore, I say, the contract is a very bad one. Now, there are no men in this country who condemned that principle of letting contracts in private more strongly and more vehemently than the hon. member for North Norfolk, the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government, and the men who are surrounding him. For the last 18 years they have been strongly condemning the principle of letting contracts without tender, but as soon as they came into power they violate their past record, they violate every principle they defended before. The hon. member for North Norfolk asked us not to judge them by their past records, but to judge them by their present acts. We are judging them by their present acts, and when we find that their present acts do not accord with their past record, we are justified in concluding either that they were dishonest before, or that they are unfair now. We had information given us that Mr. Hamilton Smith was willing to build this road for one-fourth of the money. The Minister of the Interior was told that he was prepared to make an offer. But did he invite tenders from him? Did he ask him to come and have a consultation with him? Not at all. They endeavoured to keep Mr. Hamilton Smith and his friends as much as possible in the dark, so that it was impossible for them to tender, or to know what was going on until the contract was let. We are told that this contract cannot be changed in any particular. It is before Parliament, and I sometimes ask myself what is the right, what is the duty of Parliament? It either has a right to refuse to ratify this contract, or it has no rights at all. This contract is made subject to the approval of Parliament; but we are told to-day that the contract is already given, that the men are going on and doing the work, that they have incurred large expense, and that consequently Parliament should ratify it. These hon. gentlemen go on the assumption that Parliament, that the representatives of the people, have a right to ratify it but not to reject it. Again I oppose this contract because it is a bad principle to make large allotments of the property of the state to a few individuals to make millionaires of them. If there is one thing more than another that tends to start a revolution, to create anarchy and socialism in a country, it is when a Government apports out the domain of the state to a few people, to make them immensely wealthy while by so doing they impoverish the great masses of the people. There is nothing calculated to breed contempt for government and for the authorities of a country than that very principle. If you are forcing the majority of the people down to poverty and degradation, while making millionaires of the few, the large number cannot respect the men or the principles of the men who do it. The history of Canada offers ample illustration of the baneful effects of this principle. We have had examples from the very time the seigneurs of the province of Quebec acquired large tracts of land. The Government had to settle the seigniorial tenure and take over the lands. We had the clergy reserves in Upper Canada, whereby large areas became the property of a few people, and the Government were obliged to buy those rights back. We had an example when we gave the Canadian Pacific Railway 25,000,000 acres of land for the building of that railway, a grant which we have regretted many times, and the Government have been obliged to buy back the monopoly privileges granted to that company by virtue of the contract. In the face of all this experience, we have learnt nothing. We are like the Bourbons; if we forget nothing, we never learn anything. Experience is said to be the school for fools; but we are worse than fools, if we learn nothing by the history of the past, and do the same thing which has proved to be so baneful in principle as regards this country. When we give away the public domain to a few and make them immensely wealthy, while we reduce others to poverty and degradation, we are doing an act which tends to breed contempt and anarchy and socialism; and yet we are doing it by this very transaction, and for that reason I oppose it in the strongest manner possible.

I oppose it because it is against the interest of the poor miner, who will find the condition of affairs confusing when he goes into that country; he will find it confusing by not knowing where he may prospect, locate and stake his claim. He will go into a wilderness, and will be in doubt as to where to locate, because he will be ignorant of the fact that these contractors have taken up so much of the country. Thus, the miner will find himself handicapped, especially when he finds he occupies a different position from that of the rich corporation that will own such large areas of the gold-bearing lands there.

I oppose it because it contains a monopoly clause, which is one of the great acts of injustice that we should have avoided. I referred to this matter, when I spoke incidentally on this question before, and the Minister of Marine then contradicted me and said there was no monopoly in the contract. The Minister of the Interior referred to the member for East Grey, who said there was a monopoly, and that Minister said there was no monopoly whatever. Now, I ask what does section 4 mean, which says:

4. For five years from the 1st September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by Parliament to be constructed from Lynn Canal or thereabouts, or from any point at or near the international boundary between Canada and Alaska into the Yukon district, and for five years from said date no aid in land or money shall be granted to any person or company other than the contractors and the contractors' company to assist in building any such railway.

Is not that a monopoly? If it is not, then I do not understand what a monopoly is, and I would like to ask why the Government put it there, if it was not intended to operate as a monopoly in the interest of the company. I find, by another clause, that a monopoly is intended, because it is provided:

5. The contractors and the contractors' company shall be entitled to receive in preference to any other person or company during ten years from the said 1st of September, 1898, such aid or assistance in land or money as the Government may be authorized and may see fit to grant in aid of a line of railway from the Stikine River to an ocean port in British Columbia, provided that the contractors or contractors' company are willing to undertake the construction of the same at once and completion thereof within a reasonable time upon receiving notice thereof from the Government.

This company will get the first offer, and the assistance of the Government. Yet it is declared that there is no monopoly. If so, I do not understand plain English, and I do not understand the meaning of the contract, if it does not contain two monopoly clauses which will prove very injurious in the interest of the country, but very beneficial to the company.

I oppose it because it is not an all-Canadian route, and we can be handicapped any day in carrying on trade through that country by customs regulations imposed by the United States. We have had several gentlemen visit Washington to endeavour to conciliate the Americans and secure the privileges we require. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) proceeded there, and he was thought to be specially useful for that purpose. But with all the sunny ways of the right hon. the Premier and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who instructed the Americans how to squeeze us in our lumbering operations, they were unable to do anything in our interest. It is not an all-Canadian route, and at any time we are likely to be hampered by customs regulations if we adopt this route. The Government are in favour of Canada for the Americans. It was their rule in the past to endeavour to benefit the people of the United States against the people of Canada. This railway will prove to be carried over a route very favourable and especially useful to them, and especially disadvantageous to us. The policy of the Reform party for the last twenty years has been pursued largely on the same lines. It has been so in respect to our timber policy. Over and over again, the hon. member for North Norfolk has brought in some proposition in favour of the Americans as against the Canadians. So has it been with respect to our mines. We allow Americans to come here and usurp our mining privileges, and we give them the same advantages as Canadians, while Canadians cannot go into the United States and locate and own mines unless they become American citizens. I therefore say that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite has been one in favour of the United States rather than in favour of the labourers and artisans of Canada.

I oppose it because it is in favour of the labourer of the United States as against the labourer of Canada. A labourer from the United States can come here and get all the benefit of work in our mines and can take away our gold and nickel, while such privileges are not accorded to the Canadian labourer; and hence I feel that this is an American rather than a Canadian policy. I am in favour of a Canadian policy, that is, keeping Canada not for a few Canadians, but for all Canadians, for the Canadian labourer, manufacturer, artisan and for the Canadian in whatever capacity in life he may be engaged, rather than for the people of the United States. I repeat, that hon. gentlemen opposite have adopted a policy founded on the very opposite principles, because everything they are doing is not in the interest of Canada, but in the interest of the people of the United States.

I have already pointed out the advantages of the Edmonton route; I think they are important, and I have set them forth at sufficient length. I said it was the route for commercial purposes above all others, that it was the route for the benefit of the Canadian manufacturers and farmers and people living between the east and Edmonton. It would be a railroad that once built would be built for all time to come and would not require to incur the expense of building this Teslin Lake Railway, as we propose to do at the present moment. If Parliament is assembled here only for the purpose of giving our nominal assent to a contract when it has been already executed and the parties to it are carrying it out, then I say that such a thing is only making out of Parliament a farce, rather than a representative institution. The functions of Parliament are to oversee these things, and to revise them if, in its judgment, they should be revised. It is the duty of the representatives of the people to pass their judgment on such contracts as this before they take effect, and it is not according to well-founded constitutional principles of government, that after they are brought into operation Parliament should be called merely to assent to them. In view of all these things I am opposed to this Bill, and I am in favour of the amendment. We on the Conservative side are just as anxious as gentlemen opposite and as the members of the Government, to open up a route to the Yukon at the earliest possible moment. We are willing to give substantial assistance to such a project, but we are not willing to give away these valuable domains to such a vast extent for the purpose of securing a road which is neither the most advantageous nor the cheapest for the Canadian people. We are not willing to give away 4,000,000 acres of our heritage of gold lands for that road, especially with the prospect of being called upon afterwards to grant twice as much more to extend that line to Port Simpson, so that we may have an all-Canadian route. I say that if we had a road to Port Simpson at the present time, it would not be the best road for the Canadian farmer in Manitoba or the North-west, or for the Canadian manufacturers in the eastern provinces. I repeat that I am in favour of opening up a route to the Yukon as rapidly as possible. I say that we should have built a wagon road from Edmonton. We are sending cattle over that route now, prospectors are going over it, goods are being taken over it, and if we had started to build a wagon road ten months ago when we had this information, that road would have been completed to-day. We would have all the advantages from it that we expect to have when this railroad is built next fall, and when it will be too late to get any benefit from it this season. If, as the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Dobell) promised in October, 1896, the Government had sent their surveyors to ascertain the best, and quickest, and cheapest route to the Yukon, there would be no necessity for undue haste now. If the Government had acted then we would have all the information that was necessary, and a road would be built into that country at the present time, a road from which the people of Canada rather than the people of the United States would derive benefit.

I regard this as one of the most injurious monopolies that was ever proposed to a Canadian Parliament to be established. I regard it as one of the worst contracts that was ever made by a Canadian Government. We have heard threats of what will be done if this contract is thrown out by the Senate. Sir, if the Senate throw out this contract they will give the best possible reason in the world for their existence as a branch of the Parliament of Canada. My sincere hope is that the Senate will reject this Bill. They have nothing to fear from the people if they do, for the idle threats now made from the Liberal side of the House will have no effect on intelligent electors of Canada. The people of Canada will endorse the Senate in rejecting this measure. If there is one reason greater than another to justify the existence of the Upper Chamber, it is their patriotism in throwing out the Drummond County Railway, the Teslin Lake Railway, and such nefarious contracts as have been submitted to this House by the Government during the past two sessions of Parliament. Mr. Speaker, I will oppose this Bill at every stage, and I will support the amendment that has been offered to this House.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I am aware that I may not be able to throw any more light on this subject, but I have one or two ideas which I would like to give to the House. I can remember the time when the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, and I can remember the promises then made that we were going to get 70,000,000 bushels of wheat out of that country before 1890, and that $53,000,000 would be returned to the treasury out of the proceeds of the sales of mineral lands, wheat lands and timber lands of the North-west. Sir, have these promises been fulfilled to the people of Canada. Has the treasury ever benefited one cent because of the vast tract of land (some people say the most valuable land in Canada) that was given to that railway company. I am astonished at some of the statements made by some of the gentlemen opposite, and I am particularly astonished at the statements of the hon. member (Mr. Sproule) with respect to the timber limits in the Klondike regions. They told us that there were valuable timber limits there in addition to the mineral lands, and that the contractors would secure all this timber. Now, what does the official guide to the Klondike say in respect to the timber in that country. It says:

It may be said that the country might furnish much timber, which, though not fit to be classed as merchandis, would meet many of the requirements of the only industry the country is ever likely to have, viz., mining.

It is not likely that any one will take up timber limits in that country except for the purpose of carrying on their own occupation. When hon. gentlemen opposite speak against this route, I would refer them to the statement of their own leader (Sir Charles Tupper), who told the House that this was the only available route that could be built into that country. In order to demonstrate that, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) gave the following reasons:

I am in opposition to Government aid to railways. I said: I am prepared to take all back so far as this road is concerned. I said: I am convinced of the vital importance to Canada of at once establishing a railway connection between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake that I feel that the Parliament of Canada, so far as I am able to judge—if you will take that scheme up vigorously and put it through at once as a Government work—I believe you will have the hearty support of the people of Canada, the Parliament of Canada and the people of Canada as well.

There is the statement of the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper). There is not the least doubt that he was in earnest when he made it and he made it in the true interests of Canada, and would have stuck to it only he was disciplined by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean). There is not a doubt that he was disciplined by other members of the party, as he was also by an anonymous writer who wrote under the cognomen of "Onlooker." I think the hon. leader of the Opposition took a statesmanlike view of that question; he took the view the Government did; and down to the time he went before the caucus of his own followers he did everything in his power to advance that view. We were asked on the other side of the House if we were going to vote as we were instructed in room number 16. I would like to know who instructs the Opposition how they are going to vote; because they have so many leaders that we do not know who their leader is to-day. I have been astonished at the number of statements they have made. The leader of the Opposition said:

I came to the conclusion that the route by the Stikine River and Teslin Lake was, not only the best route, but the only available route for the construction of a railway during the present season. Having arrived at that conclusion, I felt it my duty, as the question was one far above and beyond party, to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who had been giving it his personal attention, to the subject in an interview I had with him in Victoria; and I ventured to suggest to him, that if the Government of Canada would grapple with that question vigorously, and would undertake to secure the prompt construction of a railway from Stikine River to Lake Teslin, I believed they would receive the hearty support of the Parliament of Canada. I have seen no reason to change that opinion.

There is not the least doubt that the hon. gentleman spoke in sincerity. He said further:

I infinitely prefer the route now under consideration to any route that crosses a foot of territory claimed by the United States, and all the other routes to which I have referred are open to that objection. From Pyramid Harbour down to Dyea and Skagway and Taku Inlet—not so much Taku Inlet, but all the others; the Taku Inlet route is placed beyond consideration by the fact that glaciers render it absolutely dangerous for vessels to attempt to reach the waters of that lake—but all the other routes from the Pacific Coast are, in my judgment, infinitely more objectionable than the route now under consideration.

Now, I leave it to the hon. leader of the Opposition and his followers whether or not that is the best route. The hon. leader of the Opposition is a gentleman of large experience. At the time the contract was entered into he was in British Columbia and received the best information he could get. With respect to the Government having information about the discoveries of gold, I have been astonished at the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Picton stated that we had only begun to hear of the gold being found in large quantities in the Klondike in July, 1897. Another hon. gentleman stated that we had been in possession of that information for six months before. The whip of the Opposition party stated that the Government had been two years before in possession of all the information they are yet in possession of; but the hon. gentleman forgot that the party of which he is the whip was in possession of the Treasury benches at that time; so that if that information was available, they are certainly worthy of the condemnation of this House for not taking action on the information which their whip states they were in possession of before they were turned out on the 23rd of June, 1896. The hon. leader of the Opposition also made this statement:

I asked my right hon. friend to lay on the Table of the House, if he could, a carefully prepared estimate from the best sources in his power of the amount of gold taken out of the Canadian Yukon gold fields, and by whom taken out. Let him lay such a statement on the Table, and I undertake to show that for every dollar a poor Canadian has got, an American has got $500. Is there a man in this country who will say that that is right, considering the laws that the Americans enforce against us, and the manner in which our people are treated when they go into the United States on a similar errand.

If this is correct, that $500 is taken by every American, what is the reason why, when the leader of the Opposition was in power, this was permitted to go on. It is well known that large amounts of gold have been taken out of the Yukon country during the last fifteen or sixteen years. Three or four hundred miners were there in 1888 or 1889. What is the reason the Government of that day did not take steps to protect the gold fields for our own people instead of letting Americans go in there? The hon. gentleman goes on:

Imitation is the sincerest flattery, and I would flatter them in that way. I would copy, line for line and word for word, their laws in relation to tariff as far as I could. When they were putting up the McKinley and Dingley tariffs, I would not have taken off the duty of corn and let it free into this country to impoverish our farmers.

A greater falsity was never uttered than the statement that the removal of the duty from American corn was injuring our farmers. If you look at the quotations to-day, you will find that oats are selling in Toronto at 35 or 36 cents a bushel and that you can purchase corn for 31, 32 or 33 cents. It is ruining our farmers, indeed, that they can get 56 pounds of corn for the same price at which they can sell 34 pounds of oats. A greater benefit was never conferred on the farmers of this country than the taking the duty off corn at a time when it was an absolute necessity to our farmers for feeding purposes.

A good many gentlemen on the other side of the House have spoken of the peculiar circumstances under which this contract has been let. I was very glad that the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) did not repeat one of the objections he made when he spoke on that question before; that was, that it would be found in the time to come that a part of the money that carried the elections in the province of Ontario came from this secret deal.

Mr. SPROULE. I believe it still.

Mr. McMILLAN. These hon. gentlemen have spoken about the Drummond Railway deal. Do they remember that in the session of 1891 large bonuses were granted to railways, that on the 2nd of February the House adjourned, and on the 7th of February $11,000 of the bonus granted during that session was paid to the Drummond County Railway? Do they remember that three or four days afterwards $71,000 was paid to the Drummond County Railway? That was a deal, but the hon. gentleman forgot all about that. He should remember, too, that back in the session of 1896 there was an attempt made on the Treasury of this country, in my opinion for funds to assist in carrying the elections—I mean the attempt made to get $210,000 of extras for Mr. Goodwin, a contractor upon the Soul-anges Canal. That was one of the gravest attempts ever made on the Treasury of this country, when an ex-Minister of Justice, went to the office of the Minister of Justice, and wrote a letter and sent it to the Minister of Railways asking him to send the claim to the Auditor General so that the $210,000 should be paid. Thanks to the vigilance of the Auditor General, that deal was stopped and the money was not paid. And though there has been a case before the courts and Mr. Goodwin has succeeded in getting $73,000 out of $210,000, $130,000 was saved which was to have gone for election purposes. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when they talk about the Drummond Railway and other things, should look back first and see whether or not their own skirts are clean.

With respect to giving large sums for the building of a railway, I have been over a good part of Ontario this fall, and I have never heard the action of this Government condemned, but have heard their conduct approved in letting this contract. I have yet to find an individual in the rural districts who is not well satisfied with its policy, and who does not believe that it is an absolute necessity to have a road built into that country. They are all satisfied that the Government has done the best it possibly could in giving this grant of land to build the road. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) said that when the Canadian Pacific Railway was to be built, an offer was published two long years before any one came forward to accept it. Could this Government have afforded to allow the Klondike districts without some means of egress and ingress for the remainder of the two years? The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) himself gave the answer to this question when he said it was of the utmost importance that this road should be built at the earliest day and commended the Government for its prompt action, because every day that we lost, he said, was to the advantage of the Americans. But to-day these hon. gentlemen would like the project to be given up altogether, and one of the strong reasons they advance is because the Americans are likely to impede the working of the road as regards freight. Let me say this, Mr. Speaker, I am a Canadian first, and after that I am a subject of the British Empire. If there is one thing more than another that I esteem, it is the rights and privileges of this country, and I would be prepared to vote the necessary money for the Government to build from the end of this railway down to the Pacific Coast rather than sacrifice any of our rights. There is not a man with the instincts of a man and of a true Briton who would give up the building of this road simply because the Americans have threatened us. I do not believe that the legislation complained of will ever be put in force, but one thing more than another that would induce them to enforce it would be if Canadians were cowardly enough to withdraw their contract from Mackenzie & Mann because of this legislation. We would then be doing the very thing the Americans want, and would throw the whole trade of the Klondike into their hands for years to come. That country is a benefit at present to almost every manufacturing industry in Ontario. All our woollen mills, which have been running short time and many of them standing idle for years, are working now on full time to fill orders from the North-west. It is a benefit to our manufacturers and merchants and workmen and the whole of the Dominion generally; and the Opposition are committing a very grave mistake in opposing this measure, as they will find out whenever they have to go before the electors. I commend the hon. Minister of the Interior for his prompt action and for the course he took in going into that country himself in order to spy out the land and become thoroughly conversant with all its circumstances; and from the information before us, I find that the moment he had the reports of the engineers in his possession, he took immediate action. It may be argued that this contract was made privately, but if the Government had advertised for offers to build the road for a land grant alone, without any money subsidy, they would not have been able to effect so favourable a bargain as the present one. There is not an hon. member on the Opposition benches who can point to a road ever built into a country similar to this, where there is a large population and no land fit for agricultural purposes. These hon. gentlemen talk about $2 an acre, but where is the individual who would purchase a large tract in that country and give $2 an acre for it. The reports show that all the gold that has been taken out has been taken from 100 lots on one creek and 40 lots on another, covering in all 165 acres; and these have all been taken up long ago. Our hon. friends opposite seem to forget that there is a large number of miners up there at present, and that large companies from England have sent out prospectors. I have read in an English paper that an English company has taken up a large claim of placer mining and that another company has taken up a claim of quartz mining, and that they are working during the winter. The writer in that newspaper says: We were under the impression that prospecting could not be followed during the winter, but it seems that prospecting can be carried on during the winter just as well as in the summer. Therefore, the very richest portions of that territory will have been explored and taken up before the month of June, when Mackenzie & Mann will have built ten miles of road and be in a position to take up a claim.

I was astonished to hear the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) ask what will be done with each alternate claim and declare that the poor miner would not have an opportunity to locate any of these claims. Why, if I understand the contract, these alternate locations, are to be for the benefit of the free miner, who will thus be benefited by the fact that this rich company has explored its claims so that he may take up the adjoining claim. Every miner sent in to explore by the company is increasing the value of each alternate claim which the Government reserve, and is doing for the miner what the miner would have to do for himself—explore the country and see what it is capable of producing.

My hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig) sympathized very strongly with hon. members on this side. He said we could not have examined this scheme very carefully, or in voting for it we would have to vote contrary to our own convictions. The hon. gentleman in that well described his own position when he supported the late Government. He was always very independent until the whip was cracked, and then he always voted straight when called upon.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have reason to believe that the House is very impatient to reach the vote, but I think, under the circumstance, I will be indulged with the opportunity of making a few observations, especially in view of the frequent allusions that have been made to myself by hon. gentlemen opposite. I confess that if I were not a very modest man I should be in danger of having my head turned a little by the immense importance which I find hon. gentlemen on the other side attaching to my opinions. Nothing can be more flattering than the fact that every one of these hon. gentlemen on the other side, who has had a word to say in favour of this measure, has rested his case mainly upon the opinions that I have expressed in relation to it. Now, Sir, as I said before, I cannot accept that in any other light than as extremely complimentary, and I thank hon. gentlemen opposite for that compliment. But is there any gentleman among them, is there any gentleman in this House who will say that, when additional light is thrown upon a great public question, one is not only justified, but is in honour bound by his duty to the people to look at the question in the light of that increased information? Debate would become a farce, if it were assumed that opinions formed at one stage of the discussion and in the absence of complete information, were not to be qualified. Turn to the great mother of parliaments, the British House of Commons, and you will find that on the greatest measures Imperial statesmen have changed and modified their opinions, and Parliament has, in the face of public opinion, in the face of public discussion, actually reversed its decision. Take the question of foreign policy, and you will find that the opinions of the greatest statesmen have been changed in many cases, and completely reversed, because of light thrown on the subject by further discussion.

I must say, I was not a little surprised at the tone adopted by the hon. gentleman who is mainly responsible for this Bill, the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). That hon. gentleman assumed the position of a teacher of parliamentary deportment. He is the last man in this House, I think, to whom gentlemen on either side would look as a teacher in that regard. The hon. gentleman owes his position on the Treasury benches to one of the most scandalous compromises of principle that ever disgraced a Government or a Minister. The opinions that that hon. gentleman had propounded to the people of Manitoba, and by which he obtained their support in the first instance, were sacrificed as the price of obtaining a seat on the Treasury benches of this Dominion, a course as dishonourable to the Government as to the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would like to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that to apply the word "dishonourable" to any member, is not a parliamentary form of expression.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no wish for a single moment to transgress the rules, and if any person can suggest to me an expression—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I bow, Sir, with the most perfect deference to you on any question of that kind.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has made a personal reference to me. Will he allow me a word?

Mr. SPEAKER. I would suggest that it would be better to settle this point of order first.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say, that if I have transgressed the rules of the House, no person can regret it more than I do. I place myself in your hands, Mr. Speaker, and am ready to comply with what you say. After the course that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton), in the discussion of this Bill, after he and his colleagues had made it their main argument in favour of the measure, that I had expressed an opinion favourable to it, I should fail in my duty, if I did not call attention to the unwarranted liberty which hon. gentlemen took on that occasion.

I shall have had the honour, if I live to the 22nd May next, of taking an important part in the public life of this country for forty-three years. I am in the judgment of the House, when I say, that during that period of forty-three years, on every question, I have regarded the interest of my country as supreme. Again and again, I have proved to the people that I regarded personal considerations as utterly insignificant compared with the interests of the country. If there is a man in public life who has invariably shown that he regarded the public interest as greater than personal or party interest, that man is myself. Moreover, I say, that there is no man in public life who more than I has had the courage of his convictions on every subject, even when they brought him in conflict with the views of a great body of his own supporters. I never hesitated to do what I considered in the best interest of Canada.

The hon. gentleman who is in charge of this Bill, was good enough to read me a lecture on the question of leadership. There is not a position of this country that I consider so high or so honourable as that of leader of this great party. I regard the position of my hon. friend opposite (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) as utterly insignificant as compared with the leadership of—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, utterly insignificant, when compared with the leadership of the great party that has made Canada what is to-day, that has lifted Canada from the deplorable position in to which it had sunk during the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite.

It is a party that has enabled Canada to attract the admiration of the world, it is a party that has enabled us to obtain the commendation of the most illustrious statesmen that are living to-day for what we have accomplished. Yet under these circumstances I am to be lectured on the subject of the leadership of the party. Sir, there is no position in the world of which I could be so proud as the position I occupy as the leader of the Liberal-Conservative party; but there is not an intelligent man in that great party who does not know that I accepted the position at the greatest personal sacrifice that any man could be called upon to make. There is no man in that great party who does not know that nothing could confer so great pleasure upon me personally as to be at once relieved of the responsibilities and duties that this high position imposes. But, I am to be told that I changed my opinion on a great public question for the purpose of retaining that position. Sir, it would be as degrading to the party as it would be to myself if I were capable of doing such a thing. The hon. gentleman based his statement upon an interview which I gave to the Toronto "Mail." That interview was not taken down by the interviewer. He had a conversation with me, but he did not make a single note, and he went away and reduced it to writing, and he made some mistakes in regard to it, as the House will at once perceive. The hon. gentleman who supported and expounded this Bill, read to the House that interview, and then he exclaimed: There is Phillip sober, not Phillip drunk. Sir, I can tell him that Phillip is sober still. I can tell him that I can read that interview line for line and justify every word of it. What did I say? I am reading from the "Hansard" what was read by the hon. gentleman:

I stated that the route chosen is the best that could have been selected.

In the light of the information that I had then, and in the light of the information that I have now, and regarding the position in which I believed the question to be, it is an opinion that I entertained then, and that I would entertain now if circumstances were not changed. I will show the hon. gentleman the ground upon which I make that statement. The interview continues:

When I was in the west I made inquiries, and I reached the conclusion that Canada ought at the earliest possible moment to have communication with the Yukon.

Quite true, I say it now.

And I impressed upon the British Columbia Government that it should co-operate with the Dominion Government to ensure the construction of a link between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake.

Quite true, and as that question then stood I am in the same position now, I would say the same thing to-day. The next statement is inaccurate:

At Winnipeg I declared that the undertaking was a necessity, and when I returned to Ottawa I went immediately to Mr. Sifton—

That is entirely inaccurate. It was not at Ottawa that I saw Mr. Sifton; it was in the city of Victoria on or about the 1st November, when he returned from his visit to the Stikine. Therefore, the House will at once see that the reporter misunderstood me in regard to that matter, and locating that interview at Ottawa instead of Victoria.

—and I impressed upon him the absolute necessity of opening up a route to secure Canadian trade. I said to him: You heard my arguments against the Government construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. I am willing to withdraw all that if you will go ahead and give that country a railroad. As a matter of principle I am opposed to Government construction, but here is a case in which I might concede that the country ought to be prepared, if necessary, to build a road in order to secure an all-Canadian route and to secure the trade of the Yukon for Canada.

Every word of that is correct. Sir, I ask any hon. gentleman in this House: Is that the language of a man who is mainly interested in maintaining his own personal and political position? Or is it the language of a man who, deeply impressed with the importance of the question, after the most careful and close examination he could give to the subject regarding it as above party considerations? If the hon. gentleman had adopted the suggestion that I made, I repeat that I believe he would have had the support of every member of the House of Commons in taking up that work as I urged him to do, promptly, and constructing it as a Government work. It would have relieved it from all the difficulties and embarrassments that have since surrounded it. I can tell him, therefore, that Phillip is still sober, and adheres to the accuracy of every line of that statement so far as it has not been entirely changed by circumstances that were known neither to the Minister of the Interior nor to myself at that time.

As to the arrangements made with Mackenzie & Mann, Sir Charles Tupper said they were men who had the capital, the resources, and energy to carry it out. They were probably the only men in Canada who could put the undertaking through in the time that was specified.

I adhere to that. Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, although there are many other contractors of equal ability and probably of equal resources in Canada, were men of high character as contractors, they were known to be men of great financial strength and resources, and I repeat now that in my judgment they were the only men that were in a position to build this railroad from the date that the contract was made on the 25th January, and also to open a sleigh road in six weeks with shelters built every twenty-five miles from the mouth of the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, and to have that railroad ready for operation by the 1st day of September. I repeat now that, in my judgment, they were the only men, and for this reason, that they had a large amount of plant, horses, sleds, men, everything of their organization close to the spot, or comparatively near it, and that they could transport all that plant, and all their men and all their organization to the city of Victoria before any other contractors, who had not their attention drawn to the subject, could organize for the work. They were engaged in the construction of works on the Crow's Nest Pass and they had advantages that no other contractors had. Therefore, I said then what I repeat now, that as that question stood then, they were the only men who could do it. But I say now, and I believe I am stating the truth, that they have found themselves utterly incapable of carrying out the contract which they have made. I do not credit the statement made by the Minister of the Interior that that sleigh road is completed for 250 miles from the mouth of the Stikine River.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I did not make that statement. I was asked if I had seen Mr. Mann, and if so, what he had said, and I repeated what he said. The hon. gentleman cannot put words in my mouth that I had not uttered.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Very good. However, though I have great confidence in the energy and in the financial strength of Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie, I do not believe, with the information that I have as to the date when they were able to put their plant at the mouth of the Stikine River, I believe it to be absolutely impossible that they can have done what the contract required them to do by the 8th day of March. I do not believe that from the mouth of the Stikine River, a sleigh road capable of being operated as a sleigh road for 250 miles through a trail from that point to Teslin Lake, has been built, and I will not believe it until I have better evidence than that which has been offered.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I should like to ask the hon. member a question. I ask him if his company did not offer to take passengers through for $500 each only two months ago over that very same route?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid it will not do for me to be diverted into a discussion altogether aside from the question; but I can tell the hon. gentleman who asked me the question, that the company of which I am a member had reason to believe on 1st November, when I had that interview with the Minister of the Interior and after my interview with the Government of British Columbia, that that work would be promptly taken up and have been in a different position from what it is to-day. That is the answer I give to the hon. gentleman. I proceed:

Sir Charles says that much valuable time has been lost, and if his suggestions had been adopted, operations would have been in a much more forward state than they were now.

Phillip was sober when he made that statement and is sober now and I adhere to every word of it. That the Government lost most valuable time, no person can entertain a doubt who has listened to the debate that has taken place on the floor of this House on this subject:

The fact that a trail was to be put through in six weeks, so that the distance between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake may be covered in three days, is in his judgment of great importance.

It was of great importance in my judgment then, and it is of great importance in my judgment now, and I have nothing to retract as regards anything I have said:

The completion of the road by September is slower work than might have been done had the question been grappled with earlier. Still, it will be of the utmost importance to Canadian interests.

I adhere to that statement now:

Sir Charles gives the Government credit for acting with such vigour as it has shown, and asserts that the opening of the Canadian route was strongly urged by him upon both Governments interested as the proper course to pursue. He does not anticipate any trouble with the United States in transferring cargoes from the ocean boats to river boats at Wrangel.

I did so in the light of the information I possessed, and I will show hon. gentlemen opposite the ground on which I made that statement and the reason I had to believe in the soundness and accuracy of that opinion:

If, however, such should happen, Canada has Port Simpson to fall back upon, which will be equally serviceable.

I did not say it would be equally serviceable, because I know it would not be equally serviceable. I knew it was a long distance from the mouth of the Stikine River; but on the authority of Mr. Ogilvie, who is a Government officer and supposed to be thoroughly acquainted with this question, I stated not that it would be equally serviceable but that it would answer for the purpose. I made that statement in the hope that the United States, if they had any doubts about giving every possible facility to Canadians in these waters, which by the treaty we have the right to enjoy, they would be less inclined to do so if they knew we had a Canadian port that would answer our purpose. There is the whole statement on which the hon. gentleman relies to convict me of failure to maintain the position I took before the country when I made those public statements, and because I am not able to support this contract.

I will give now as briefly as I can the ground that compelled me to take a contrary position to my own wishes and desires when I was compelled to adopt the policy of opposing this contract as to which I had expressed my earnest desire that it should be carried out. If the question stood to-day in the position it did when I made that statement, I would repeat it here and adhere to it, let the consequences to myself be what they might; because while every hon. gentleman must recognize the necessity of fealty to the party to which he belongs, whenever the question becomes one on which a public man has to choose between fealty to his party and failure to serve the best interests of his country, he has no choice but one, if he wishes to preserve that honourable and independent course which is absolutely necessary to the success of a public man.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It throws us back on the coffin.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman, who is such a stickler for accuracy, was guilty in the course of that speech of one of the most palpable acts of deception ever attempted to be practised on any Parliament or body of people.

Som hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will give you, Mr. Speaker, the evidence, and I will leave it to you and hon. gentlemen opposite whether I have maintained my statement or not.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should qualify that statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In what way, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER. I am sure on consideration the hon. gentleman will agree that to accuse a member of a palpable act of deception is beyond the limit of the rules.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, I will withdraw the words "palpable act of deception," and I will read to the House what was done and allow the hon. members to put their own construction on it. The hon. gentleman was quoting or pretending to quote a statement in one of the papers, supporting this Administration, the "Daily Witness" of Montreal. I read it in justification of my changed attitude on this question, showing that the light in which I spoke on this question at the outset was entirely and completely changed when the contract came to be published. My statement was made before the publication of the contract, and I gave in support of the position I took and my right to maintain that position, the statement of the "Daily Witness" pointing out half a dozen important matters in which that journal stated the information which had first been obtained and furnished the country by the newspapers had been entirely and completely changed by the publication of the contract. That was a legitimate thing to do. What did the hon. gentleman undertake to do? He undertook to quote that article from the "Witness," and he quoted a certain portion of it as follows:—

The details of the bargain of the Mackenzie-Mann syndicate reveal objectionable features that do not appear in the information which came to light before the presentation of the contract to Parliament. It was not then known that the railway was to be a very narrow gauge one. It was not then realized, as it seems to be admitted, that the Stikine is not navigable for sea craft, and that bulk must be broken in American waters, and there are, as we have pointed out, possibilities connected with the parcelling of the land grant which are interesting to contemplate.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) was asked to read on. What did he say? He said: "Will we read the balance of it," but did he read the balance of it? He knows he did not. He knows that instead of keeping his word which he had just given to this House, he left out a most important clause in which the "Witness" pointed out that the mode in which these lands were parcelled out would enable these contractors to seize upon comparatively the whole of the gold areas there.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman but—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman had better let me make my statement.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I wish to say this—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Mr. Speaker, I am quite in order. When the leader of the Opposition says that in quoting a certain article I left out a part of it, I have a right to ask the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) if he accuses me of leaving out a part and passing on in such a way as to misquote the article. I state most emphatically that I did nothing of the kind. I did not read the whole article. I was asked by the hon. member for West Assiniboia to read on, and I said to the hon. member (Mr. Davin), that when he came to speak on the question he could read the rest of the article. I quoted from that article what I believed was sufficient for my argument.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hon. gentlemen opposite are too easily satisfied. They are more easily satisfied than the intelligent people of this country will be when they see the narrow and unsubstantial grounds on which the hon. gentleman endeavours to protect himself from the charge I have made, of his having misled this House and attempted to mislead this country. Mark you, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) was asked to read on, and his answer to that was: "Well, we will read the balance of it." Did he read the balance of it, or did he not read something altogether different away down at the bottom of the column, which had no reference to the quotation I gave. If the hon. gentleman had kept his word to the House and read on, and given the balance of it as he said he would, he would have read this:

There would seem, at all events, to be every probability that if there is really any great wealth in the country the syndicate will have no difficulty in reaping the first fruits of it. It looks as though they would be likely to acquire for themselves or to make a profit on almost all the gold lands discovered up to the amount of their available grant. With the power of laying down a base line as may best suit their own advantage, and with the power of securing an uninterrupted territory of twenty-four miles long by three miles in breadth, it looks as though the syndicate could secure the best of the land without sharing on equal terms with the Government. * * * By getting their land through the syndicate, too, the miners, prospectors, or private companies would only have to pay a royalty of one per cent instead of one of ten per cent.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) left out that portion which he knew was the whole question upon which my argument rested, and upon which I had given conclusive evidence that one of the ablest journals supporting hon. gentlemen opposite had been compelled to admit, it was misled when at first blush it saw the statement which was carefully prepared by the Government and which gave to the public a mistaken view of the whole question. The "Witness" pointed out how it had been misled, and that when it came to see the contract, it found it was filled with these most objectionable features. Let me give to the House the conclusion of the evidence as to what dependence hereafter, hon. gentlemen in this House can place upon the word of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton). Here is what he read as the balance :

We doubt, however, if a business man acting in his own interest would, even with all considerations fully before him, recall the bargain as a whole, if he could, much as he might wish he could, alter many of its details. We doubt if any of the Government's critics would, were the case their own, recall the bargain.

Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) read on the balance when he left out the portion I have read and which he omitted? No, he did not. The hon. gentleman knows that I never pretended that the "Daily Witness" could be induced by anything to stand by its criticisms in opposition to this Government, when the Government had determined on its course. I have never said so, but I gave conclusive evidence that one of the strongest newspaper supporters of the Government was compelled to put before the country the fact that it had been altogether misled.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not "altogether."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, "altogether." I have read the evidence to the House and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) must not tell me no.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not "altogether."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Do you want me to read again the statement from the "Daily Witness" that it was misled by the information sent out by the Government, and that when the contract came to be tabled, it found there were six at least most important matters that had been altogether concealed and were unknown to them when they published the first article. Now, Sir, I felt it necessary to draw the attention of the House to that, because I may tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton), and I speak in the light of long continued parliamentary experience; I may tell him that if he wants to obtain that standing and character in this House that will be useful to him as a public man and a credit to his country, he will find that it is not to be attained by trifling with the credulity of members, and endeavouring to take advantage of it on the floor of this House or anywhere else.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

I now come to the question of transhipment, which is a most important consideration in connection with this matter. I do not hesitate to say that I regard the immediate obtaining of an all-Canadian route as of vital importance to Canada. I believe, Sir, that the trade of Canada which would otherwise go to the United States is dependent upon that, and under those circumstances I was prepared to go to any reasonable length, as I am prepared now, to accomplish such an object. Irrespective of any consideration in the world I was prepared to go to any length to support hon. gentlemen opposite in carrying out a policy upon which I believed the best interests of this country depends.

Well, Sir, what did the hon. gentleman say in reference to transhipment? There is no hon. gentleman in this House who will not say that when you are considering the question of an all-Canadian route, it is vital that we should have the advantages which I assumed we would have under the treaty, of free ingress and egress on the Stikine River. Every person knows that an all-Canadian route would be a farce if we could be obstructed on that river. With reference to Port Simpson, I will say that the commissioner of the Hudson Bay Company, Mr. Chipman, who has been for the last two years sending a steamer from Port Simpson up the Stikine River to Telegraph Creek, was here a few days ago, and I asked him the question, "Is the route from Port Simpson practicable for vessels that can go up the Stikine River?" He said, "No, unfortunately, it is not. We have been running a steamer, but we have been sadly hindered because there is an open water, the Dixon Entrance, which is so often hazardous as to be most embarrassing to our trade; and the only way that difficulty can be got over is to have a powerful stern wheel steamer to run from Port Simpson through American territory and tranship again in Canadian territory." This information is conclusive that Port Simpson does not afford the necessary facilities, but that there are days and sometimes weeks together when no communication could be made by a steamer that could go up the river. That information I obtained since I had the opinion that Port Simpson could be relied upon, and I formed that opinion on the statement of a Government officer, Mr. Ogilvie, who I suppose was not as familiar with that branch of the subject as he might have been. What was the position that question of transhipment was in? Let me draw attention for a single moment to a statement made by the Minister of Railways and Canals; and we had a right to assume that that hon. gentleman had given this important subject the attention he was bound to give it. I could not suppose that this Government would undertake to deal with an enormous question of this character without having ascertained that there was no difficulty in regard to the question of transshipment, which lay at the foundation of this line being an all-Canadian route: so that they would know we would be able to enjoy those advantages without let or hindrance. But what did the Minister of Railways and Canals tell us? Mr. Foster asked:

In what territory is Fort Wrangel?

Well, the hon. Minister of Railways, true to that wonderful know-nothingism that characterized his speech on that occasion, said:

I think it is probably in the United States territory.

The hon. gentleman who was introducing this Bill to this House, absolutely did not know that Fort Wrangel was in the United States at all, or in territory claimed by the United States.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Do you know for certain that it is, when the boundary is not settled?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I know that for all practical purposes, for the purposes of this Government and this Parliament it is in American territory, because it has been for a long time in the possession of the United States, who compelled the removal of a Canadian post there, and pushed their boundary farther up the river. Therefore, I am in a position to tell the hon. gentleman what he apparently did not know, that Fort Wrangel is in United States territory.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If you will read on, you will see whether I knew or not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, I will read on, and the further the hon. gentleman went the deeper he got in the mire. He said:

I think it is probably in the United States territory; at all events, they claim it, and they are in possession of it, and have a customs port at Fort Wrangel. But the Stikine River, whose waters we propose to use, is a river that, under treaty with that country, we are entitled to use without being subject to any conditions. Navigation upon it is open to us as it is open to them.

Now, Sir, I ask the hon. gentleman whether we stand in the position in which we stood when the Minister of Railways and Canals, introducing this measure to the House, stated that we could use that navigation without let or hindrance.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will answer the hon. gentleman. I will say, so far as my opinion is concerned, whether it is worth much or little, and in view of all the discussion that has taken place both in the press and in this Parliament, that I could not say anything more, and I would not say anything less than I said when I introduced the Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, it is very difficult to teach the hon. gentleman anything. If he has not learned a good deal on this subject within the last fortnight, I think he will learn something before I sit down.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not profess to be omniscient or infallible.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman said:

I think I am quite justified in going that far, and in saying that a ship which is freighted from Victoria or Vancouver, the object of which is to effect a transshipment at or near Fort Wrangel, may do so without encountering any obstacles from customs authorities—I think so.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. How much greater knowledge has the hon. gentleman now to furnish this House than I furnished the House at that time?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman, I hope, is not so obtuse as he appears. What I am saying to the House is this, that from all the information I could get—and I am not overburdened with confidence in this Government, as a good many people know—I had the fullest confidence that they would not be guilty of so mad, so rash an act as to precipitate this country into a contract of such enormous proportions without seeing that the railway would be of some use to the country after it was completed. What is the position to-day, Sir? Let me read for the information of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals what Mr. Hansbrough said a few days ago. It will be found at page 2771 of the "Congressional Record."

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Is he an authority on international law?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman ought to know me too well to suppose that any of these puerile and childish interruptions are going to turn me aside. Mr. Hansbrough said:

The section proposes to extend the bonding privilege to the port of Wrangel, in Alaska. The Dominion Government claim that they now have, under the treaty of Washington, the right to transport goods, wares and merchandise on that stream to their own territory. That contention by the Dominion Government is disputed by the Treasury officials in this city. The Treasury holds that we are entitled to collect duty on all goods, wares and merchandise which pass up the Stikine, Yukon and Porcupine rivers, the three streams which are mentioned in article 26 of the treaty.

The Dominion Government holds that "free navigation"—the words appearing in that treaty—means that they are entitled to transport merchandise free of duty.

Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that if we cannot transport merchandise free of duty, that is an all-Canadian route?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Do I understand the right hon. gentleman to scoff at the idea that it is not. Will not this completely paralyse the Stikine River as an all-Canadian route. That is a new phase we have to deal with. The right hon. gentleman has reached such a state of enlightenment that he has discovered that though blocked by customs-houses at Fort Wrangel and made to pay duties on everything that goes in and comes out of that country, the Stikine will still be an all-Canadian route? If he can induce any intelligent gentleman sitting behind him to support a route which involves the payment of customs duties to the United States on everything Canadian that goes into the Yukon over it, as an all-Canadian route, he has reached a stage that would warrant us in yoking him up along the side of the Minister of Railways and Canals.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Who is the gentleman who has revised this treaty?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Has not the hon. gentleman learned since he has been listening to gentlemen on this side sufficient to know that the best authorities on international law have been quoted to prove that the First Minister is entirely wrong in his assumption that a treaty overrides the common law of a country, and that the idea which the right hon. gentleman had of appealing to the Supreme Court of the United States in case the treaty is violated is contradicted by every writer on international law. The highest authorities are quoted, text-books given, and yet the Minister of Railways has not found that out.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I admit that I have not.

Mr. SPEAKER. Will you allow me to make a suggestion to hon. gentlemen on the Government benches, that we would get along faster and more pleasantly if there were no interruptions.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not often charge you, Mr. Speaker, with partiality, but I cannot help saying that you have given a very valuable suggestion to my hon. friends opposite. Let me proceed with my quotation:

Mr. President,—the Dominion Government have entered into the contract with a firm of railroad builders—I think the name of the firm is Mackenzie & Mann—for the construction of a line of road from Glenora to a point on the Stikine River in British Columbia; and from there they propose to transport merchandise on the waters of Lake Teslin and down the Hootalinqua River and the Yukon River to Dawson; but before they can make this monopoly a success—

Mark that, Mr. Speaker.

—they must have an uninterrupted egress on the Stikine River. They are not sure that they have that right at this time. We propose to give it to them when they will consent to the construction of competing railroad lines in British Columbia and the North-west Territories. I am informed by persons in a position to know that the Canadian Government is strongly inclined at the present moment to yield that condition, as well as the other conditions I have referred to.

Where did they learn that? We were told that they had assurances—and some gentlemen had the audacity on the other side to insinuate that they had received advice from this side. Let me say to these gentlemen that they will search in vain in the history of the Liberal-Conservative party in this country to find that ever on any occasion we gave the slightest aid or comfort to the enemy. Let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that if the Liberal-Conservatives in this country are characterized by anything especially it is for a loyal devotion to British interests and the maintenance of the best relations between the Government of the United States and the Dominion. Why is it that the whole press of the United States was daily praying for the success of hon. gentlemen opposite? Every one knows that, from week to week and from day to day, the press of the United States were using all the means they could, of every kind and description, to bring hon. gentlemen opposite into power. Why? Because during long years these hon. gentlemen were denouncing the Government of Canada as being unjust in its treatment of that great republic and declaring that when they obtained power all these difficulties with the United States would be set at rest. That was the position and attitude which these hon. gentlemen took. Not only that, but the right hon. gentleman was hardly warm in his seat as Prime Minister when he committed the unpardonable folly of unburdening himself to the reporter of the Chicago "Record"—and we listened with amazement to his admission on the floor of this House, when the question was put to him, that, according to his recollection the report was correct—he told the reporter that his predecessors in office, the Conservative party, had been acting oppressively, unfairly and unjustly to the United States, and that he was prepared to take up this question of the bonding privilege, forsooth, and to barter away our inestimable priceless fisheries for the admission of free fish into the markets of the United States.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." He has forgotten that the tribunal under which the Washington Treaty which he endeavoured to prevent coming into operation, which he did all in his power to destroy and break down, declared after receiving sworn evidence from the United States and Canada, that in addition to the right of free fish, free fishing in Canada could only be measured by $5,500,000 cash paid into the treasury of Canada as equivalent for the benefits that that treaty gave over and above the value of free fish for twelve years. I am doing the hon. gentleman no injustice when I say that he not only committed an unpardonable act of folly on a question of the most delicate diplomacy by unburdening himself in this way, but he had the extreme folly to talk of questions he did not understand, and to pledge himself in advance to barter away the inestimable fisheries of Canada for a mess of pottage.

But that is not all. We now have the fact that this Mr. Edward Farrer was closely identified with hon. gentlemen opposite, engaged in 1891 in a grand conspiracy with Mr. Erastus Wiman and the leaders of the Liberal party of this country to break down what Mr. Blake called the British nationality of Canada is again at work. This Edward Farrer himself in a published pamphlet advised the United States how to bring Canada to her knees. He was associated with the leaders of the Liberal party in the struggle of 1891. He it was who advised the imposition of high duties by the United States and generally the policy that Americans have since carried out to bring Canada to her knees and secure everything that the United States might desire. Is it any wonder that the Americans assumed from a long course of fulsome eulogium of everything American, from the Opposition benches that when the gentlemen got into power they would be able to dictate their own terms. Why, the right hon. gentleman himself told the people that if he were returned to power all these questions with the United States would be amicably and pleasantly settled. Are they settled? Where is the alien labour law? Where is the Dingley Bill? Where are the other measures that the United States have adopted and that are now followed by their declaration, not by an irresponsible man, but backed by an overwhelming majority of the Senate of the United States, which is the most powerful section of the Government in the United States that you must get upon your knees, you must give them whatever they please to ask for or they will shut you out of the Stikine River, treaty or no treaty, and will not allow a pound of Canadian goods to go up or down without the payment of duty. When I spoke upon this subject how could I think that these hon. gentlemen would commit the unpardonable folly of entering into a contract involving the giving away of millions of Canadian treasure for the construction of 150 miles of railway to establish an all-Canadian route without having taken the trouble to learn—because they knew nothing about it—that it might be so effected that it would not be an all-Canadian route at all. Having, under these circumstances, expressed myself in favour of what I was prepared to make any personal sacrifice or even party sacrifice to have accomplished, when I learned that this so-called all-Canadian route was one upon which Canadians and Canadian trade were to be barred, will anybody say that I was not in duty bound to revise my opinion.

What does the hon. Minister of the Interior say on this question? It is very interesting. We have the opinion of the Minister of Railways that all is plain sailing.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I still adhere to that position.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman still adheres to that position and is ready to pay 60 per cent duty on this trade and consider it all right. What does the Minister of the Interior say:

The only question of importance is the question of transshipment, and it is a question on which he can give no positive statement.

Why could he not give a positive statement? He says he was invited by Mr. Alger to go down and confer with him at Washington in regard to matters in which the United States took a deep interest, and he took that opportunity of laying before the Government of the United States the great importance of having facilities at Dyea and Skagway. He says that it is a question which, if disputed, must be decided either by negotiation or by reference to a competent tribunal, but it must be evident that it is utterly out of the question for the Government of Canada in the extraordinary circumstances in which we were placed to open up diplomatic negotiations, and waiting until we got a question of that kind settled before we proceeded to deal with the building of the railway. That is to say, the house must be built first, and then we must ascertain whether we can get a right of way into it. I am not a lawyer, but I think there is not a pettyfogging attorney even in a village in the North-west that such a proposition would commend itself to. He says further:

It would be a ridiculous proposition to go to the government of the country which is now getting the largest portion of the trade which we seek to take away by constructing a railway, and, before starting to construct a railway, to try to get them to agree to something which would have the effect of taking the trade away from them.

Where is the hon. gentleman now, does he still hold the opinion that it was supreme folly for him to raise this question with the United States because it was an effort to take from them trade which they monopolized?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. How would you raise it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Why, when Mr. Alger invited the Minister of the Interior to go down and discuss this question, had I been in the Minister of the Interior's place, I would have told Mr. Alger the Americans were in the enjoyment of inestimable advantages from Canada, that though they shut Canadians out from owning or working the mines, or working as free miners in the United States, thousands of American citizens were entering the richest gold country in the world and carrying the gold away. No Government ever had such a magnificent opportunity to secure the settlement of the questions on just and fair terms. Why, suppose that the Minister of the Interior had said: You must repeal your alien law. They have not repealed it to this day and why? Because of the cowardice of hon. gentlemen opposite. The First Minister, when he found that at Windsor in the county of Essex, I had declared that if my Government was sustained we would have enacted line for line, word for word, the same alien labour law as the United States, unless they repealed these unjust laws the hon. gentleman in this as in other things, outbid me, and going there, pledged himself up to the hilt that if returned to power, unless the Americans repealed these unjust and cruel alien laws with which they were persecuting Canadian subjects, he would have a similar Act passed and put into operation.

What has he done, Sir? Why, in a partial completion of his pledge, he handed this bantling of his over to the tender mercies of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who announced his utter hostility to any thing of the kind such as his leader had pledged himself to; and that emasculated Bill was not allowed to go into operation until a proclamation by the Governor General in Council was made. The result is that, instead of it doing any good, it has inflicted a deep injury upon Canada. They found that although they could boast of what they could do they were afraid of that great Republic, and although they had pledged themselves to do it, they were afraid to put their Bill into operation. They had given the United States Government evidence that their friends were on the Treasury benches in this country, and they might safely rely upon their never doing anything or taking any action that, however, deeply the interests of Canada were involved, would be in the slightest degree unpleasant or objectionable to them.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is the reason that you advise us to withdraw this Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will read the remaining sentences of the Minister of the Interior, and let him give you the answer. He says:

They might possibly say that we were entitled to the privilege of transshipment, but under the extraordinary circumstances it would probably take us some time to get them to say so. Under the circumstances, negotiations might be prolonged for several years.

Now, I ask the First Minister if he is prepared to say that it was an act of wisdom to engage in the construction, at such an enormous cost, of a railway of 150 miles that would be rendered practically useless and abortive as an all-Canadian route unless we could get these privileges? I ask whether Mr. Alger—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Does the hon gentleman—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will be still more uneasy before I sit down. I know the hon. gentleman winces under every touch of the knife, and it is as painful to me to perform the operation as it is for him to suffer. But, Sir, I have a duty to discharge in this Parliament, a duty to the Canadian people, and I intend to discharge it even if my hon. friend should be a little bruised when I get through. The hon. gentleman told us that he had made arrangements for Dyea or Skagway. Why Dyea and Skagway, I want to know, if we were going to have an all-Canadian route? Were Dyea and Skagway more important than the Stikine? He gives his reasons why he did not venture to hint a word of the Stikine to Mr. Alger or to any official of the United States, because, he says, he knew it would take several years, they would find that we were going to take away their trade, and they would get their backs up, and it would be several years before we could get a settlement of the question. So he said, We will build the house first, and then we will see whether we can get a right of way into the front door.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. And yet you advised that the road should be built there?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did advise it, but surely the hon. gentleman has heard what I said a few moments ago. I believed that it was impossible to find a set of men so obtuse upon the subject they undertook to deal with as to be guilty of making such a proposition, to give an enormous contract for the construction of a road without finding whether they could get access to it. I hope the hon. gentleman understands that now. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but there is nothing in it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a single question. Does he feel that it would accord with the dignity of this Government, or with the dignity of the United States Government, that we should ask the United States Government to give us a pledge that they were going to observe a solemn treaty obligation into which they had entered?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, does not the hon. gentleman know that the Minister of the Interior went down to Washington to discuss these very questions with Mr. Alger? Does the hon. gentleman himself not know that the Minister of the Interior obtained from the United States a change in their arrangements with reference to this customs duty at Skagway and

Dyea? The hon. gentleman has a power in his hands such as no government ever had before of being able to say to that great Republic, in face of their determination to capture the rich prizes of our Canadian gold fields, with the power in his hands to shut them out, as they ought to be shut out to-morrow, by the passage of a law precisely word for word like their own mining laws—I say that if any person supposes that by fawning or cringing on the part of the Government of Canada, they are going to succeed in obtaining this arrangement from the United States they sadly deceive themselves. The United States of America, Sir, intend to advance ‘per fas aut nefas’ the interests of their people, and to obtain every advantage for them they can, will go just as far as they think they can venture to go with impunity. Just as you recede they will encroach, until a point is reached when it is impossible to recede further, and when you have lost the ground that otherwise you could have stood firmly upon. Therefore, I say, it is madness for the hon. gentleman to barter away 3 or 4 million acres of the richest gold fields of the world for 150 miles of tramway without being able to use it after it is built. Does he think the United States will think more highly of him because he will proceed in an act of such incomprehensible folly? I say they will not. I say they will come to the conclusion that they can do with the hon. gentleman just what they please, and that they can encroach upon the rights of Canada just as they please, and that it will be tamely submitted to by the hon. gentleman. Does any hon. gentleman suppose that when I expressed myself in favour of the measure at first proposed, that I dreamed for one moment that they were making a contract which could be handed over to the United States to-morrow? After the dissection that this contract has undergone in this House the hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to say like the coon—Don’t shoot, we will come down. Now, they say, We will change all that. It is true they have made a contract with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and have given them a charter which they could sell to-morrow and relieve themselves of all responsibility, they could sell it in the city of New York to American capitalists and thus make this all-Canadian route instead an all-American route. This is the position. And yet these hon. gentlemen pretend that because I ventured to express a favourable opinion of the contract as it was first published, believing it would secure an all-Canadian route, I am now inconsistent in opposing it in the light of subsequent information. I ask whether the most prejudiced man on the opposite side is in a position to say that if he had committed himself in some way to a favourable expression of opinion of a proposal he would not be justified in receding from that expression when he found that the contract was wholly unlike that which he had supposed it to be when it was announced in the press. I do not reflect in that statement of the Minister of Railways because I know he has some legal talent; but I believe he was as ignorant as I was of the terms of the contract until he found his name signed to it by the Minister of Inland Revenue. I believe it was a little thing the Minister of the Interior was manipulating on his own account, and he was not only doing so, but he was determined to keep secret what he was doing, even from his own colleagues. When the First Minister had his interview, when he received from Mr. Hamilton Smith his proposal, he was amazed to find he had never heard anything about it. Why did not the Minister of the Interior tell him? He has since confessed that Sir William Van Horne stated that this gentleman, Mr. Hamilton Smith, was anxious to discuss this question with him. He knew it, yet it was concealed. Why was it concealed, and why was the transaction carried out in secrecy? I have shown already that the plea of urgency has fallen to the ground. I have shown the pretense that he knew nothing at all about what was going on in relation to the conditions of that country, that he had not even read Mr. Ogilvie’s report. And I ask the hon. gentleman now if he does not feel he made a fatal mistake, as head of the department, when, for the purpose of putting his own creatures into office, he drove out of the public service and bowed down and humiliated one of the best men in it and drove others out for the purpose of surrounding himself with other men. Does the hon. gentleman not want any one to know what is going on in his department? It looks like it. When an hon. gentleman adopts, in regard to such a question, secrecy, it engenders suspicion. I will not say more; but the whole of this transaction is one that will cloud the reputation of the hon. gentleman and will seriously affect the character of his colleagues until we know more about it than we know to-day. I ask the hon. gentleman if he was the only person who did not know the fabulous wealth of this region. The Minister of Railways knew it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know the wealth of that country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman did not know it, I wonder how he dare make this statement to the House:

Hon. members of this House will recollect quite clearly that before the close of last session, evidence was pouring in upon us of the immense discoveries of gold that were taking place in the Yukon district, and returning parties from that remote region were bringing us the most fabulous accounts of its mineral deposits. No one who is at all interested in public affairs could fail to realize that very important questions were likely to arise in that country in connection with its great gold discoveries.

Did the hon. gentleman tell the truth when he made that statement to the House?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am usually in the habit of doing so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Why does the hon. gentleman attempt to deny it?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will read it again.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I really did not understand the question the hon. gentleman addressed to me. I will state the matter in three words. I thought the hon. gentleman was saying that I knew the value of the gold fields. I do not know the value of the gold fields or the value of the land.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid it is after dinner with the hon. gentleman. I am getting hopeless. When a statement is plainly made and the hon. gentleman is incapable of appreciating it, something is surely wrong. I cannot understand how any intelligent man could fail to see the form of my statement. Although the Minister of Railways stated before the House that accounts were coming in showing a state of intense excitement respecting the gold discoveries, the only man who knew nothing about it was the Minister of the Interior, to whose department the information was supplied. What did the hon. gentleman say.

But will anybody in his senses undertake to say that when this Parliament prorogued we had any information whatever.

What do those hon. gentlemen say to each other? One of them stated to Parliament that there was a condition of intense excitement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I beg your pardon.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, I will read it again. The hon. gentleman's colleague, the Minister of the Interior said he had no information of it whatever. How could the hon. gentleman make that statement? Did he not know that at that moment when he said he had no information whatever, the whole press of the United Kingdom was ringing with accounts of these marvellous discoveries and there was the wildest excitement in connection with them? I hold in my hand extracts from the London "Times," dated 12th July, 1897. The Ottawa correspondent in a letter dated the 11th, writes, referring to the wonderful gold discoveries in the Yukon River and tributaries. He says:

The latest report to the Government—

That is of the Minister of the Interior, who said he had no information whatever.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The latest report to the Government confirm the previous intelligence of the extraordinary results obtained in placer mining.

References were also made by the following newspapers:—

The Times, Financial News, Financial Times, Daily Mail, The Daily Telegraph, Daily Chronicle, Westminster Gazette, Morning Post, Standard, St. James's Gazette, Evening News, The Sun, The Echo, Pall Mall Gazette, The Morning, Evening Standard, Birmingham Argus, Bristol Times, Sussex Daily News, Manchester Evening News, Liverpool Mercury, Leeds Mercury, Sheffield Telegraph, Liverpool Courier, York Examiner, South Wales Daily News, Leeds Express, North British Daily Mail, Christian World, The Speaker, Baptist, Church Family Newspaper, The Saturday Review, European Mail, Money, Financial Chronicle, and Bristol Mercury.

Here are all the United Kingdom papers ringing with wild excitement over this information; and yet the Minister of the Interior rises in this House and tells us he had no information whatever.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Will the hon. gentleman read what I said?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Well, read it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman said:

But will anybody in his senses undertake to say that when this Parliament prorogued we had any information whatever which led to the supposition that tens of thousands of people were going to the Klondike district last fall and the coming year?

Has the hon. gentleman been dreaming? I told the hon. gentleman that he had been asleep, that he was a Rip Van Winkle, and that while all the world was in excitement on this subject he was the only man who did not know. So wild was the excitement in the old country that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries took occasion at a public meeting to implore people neither to go into the Klondike nor to put any money in any company to develop it. Does the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) shake his head; then I will give him the evidence.

Sir Louis Davies, at Tenbigh, in Wales, said: * * * Later in the day Sir Louis Davies attended a luncheon—

That may account for it.

—given in his honour, and replying to the toast of his health gave an interesting account of the various provinces of Canada, and the immense and unlimited resources of Canada. With reference to the newly discovered Klondike gold fields, he said he had been asked by many men if he could advise them to send their sons out to the fields, and he had answered emphatically, "No"; and when asked if it would be wise to invest money in companies for developing the fields, he replied doubly emphatically, "No."

He was resisting this wild excitement then.

And as a member of the Canadian Government he knew what he was talking about. They were doing their best to establish a provisional government in that region, but they advised that every one who could possibly wait should delay going to the Klondike fields for the present, and he hoped that his words would go further than the room in which he was speaking.

Mr. BERGERON. He did not think it was going to reach here.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He said :

Statements have been made regarding the richness of the mines, but he would ask them to bear in mind the words of the American humorist : " A mine is a hole in the ground, and the owner is a liar."

I ask the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) was he or was he not guilty on that occasion of what I regard as a great crime against the interests of Canada. I say that every honest and intelligent Canadian ought be most anxious to bring British capital into Canada for the development of our enormous resources ; and yet when there was a proposition, as the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) knew, before the financial and commercial men of England, inviting capital, and that by myself, when the hon. gentlemen, as I presume, knew that—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not know it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He told them : As a Minister of the Crown, if you ask me whether you wish to put your money into the development of gold mines in Canada, I say " doubly emphatically, no."

Mr. LISTER. In a few years some of the stockholders may find they had better have kept their money out of it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then it becomes the more important, when men holding responsible positions undertake to invite capitalists to put their money into the development of Canadian resources, that they should be sustained by the Government of Canada instead of decried. I did not intend to refer to this matter until the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) questioned the accuracy of my statement, but what did he do. Who will believe it? When he made that statement he had actually put his name to a letter to be published in the prospectus of his friend, Col. Domville, inviting people to invest their money in Klondike gold mines. The hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) again dissents. Well, I will read him his letter. Although this letter to Col. Domville did not appear until a few days after the hole in the ground and the liar story, strange to say, it was written before :

London, 30th July, 1897.

I have received your note of to-day's date telling me that a syndicate is being organized to open up and develop the Klondike Yukon country. I have no hesitation in saying that the policy of the Government is and will be to assist in the opening up and development of that rich country, and I need not say to you that we shall be glad to look favourably upon every bona fide company which has that for its object. Your personal connection with such a company would be an additional guarantee of its bona fides, and I will be glad to hear that it has been successfully launched.

(Sgd.) L. H. DAVIES.

Mr. FOSTER. To whom did he send that letter?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. To Col. Domville.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I would ask the hon. gentleman for one moment—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Surely you are not all so prejudiced that you will not hear a word from me. I speak most emphatically on that subject and I say, that when Sir Louis Davies wrote that letter, he had no idea that I was going to transport whisky into the Yukon country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Other hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Domville) mean to say that he intended to keep it all for home consumption.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I have a right to answer that question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask you to keep order.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I shall answer that question and I have a right to.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order ; sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. The disorder seems to come from both sides of the House. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Domville) can only ask a question with the leave of the hon. gentleman who is addressing the House.

Mr. DOMVILLE. If the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) does not want me to answer I do not wish to, but if he does wish me to answer, I shall.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, it is rather too late in the evening to allow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Domville) to interrupt me.

Mr. DOMVILLE. That is an old answer from an old man.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The statement that I have applied for a permit, has been emphatically denied by me, as the hon. gentleman knows.

Mr. DOMVILLE. The hon. gentleman did not apply for a permit, but in British Columbia—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I have pointed out to the House that the moment this road was constructed, this charter could be transferred to capitalists of the United States of America, and thus this would be made an American road. I have shown that so far as the transshipment was concerned, the Minister of the Interior himself admitted that it was unwise to raise the question of transshipment at Wrangel, because he expected it would take half a dozen years to get a favourable answer, if ever, from the Government of the United States. I have given, I think, two pretty strong grounds for a change of opinion in regard to this contract, when its misleading character came to be displayed. I will now turn the attention of the House to a still more important phase of it, and I am glad to be able in this case to quote one of the ablest and most independent men sitting on that side of the House in support of my statement. I drew the attention of the House to the fact, which was received with great derision, and I presented a diagram which showed that by the plan provided for in this contract for the appropriation of the lands by the company, they could lock up all the gold lands in the Yukon territory. Under the mode of laying out their lands, establishing the base line where they pleased, and taking a solid block of twenty-four miles, I showed that the country had been completely deceived as to the character of the measure. I will draw the attention of the House to the evidence of the Toronto "Globe" on that subject, when that paper put before the public all the beauties of this beautiful contract, in order to prepare the public mind before it should be shocked by the introduction of the monster itself. The "Globe" said :

Should the company make rich discoveries, the people of Canada, for whom the alternate blocks are reserved on any of the water courses on which these discoveries may be made, will profit by them to an equal extent with the contractors, who must, at their own expense, do all the work of prospecting.

Well, Sir, I presented that diagram to the House, and I showed that the power to cover 3,750,000 acres, which we all now know will be greatly exceeded, and will be more like 4,000,000 acres, on account of the engineer's statement of the length of the line would enable the company to cover all the gold in the Yukon. Is that an extravagant statement? The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) showed that these gold deposits in the Yukon are not extended all over the country, but that they are placer deposits along the streams; and the width of the placer mining in these streams is only about 330 feet. Well, I want to know where the gold would remain under that plan of laying out the lands. My statement was met with derision, but two days afterwards the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) was put up to relieve the startled feelings of gentlemen on that side of the House, who no doubt rose in revolt at such a proceeding, to state that the contractors had agreed to change all that, and to accept alternate blocks in these twenty-four miles. That gave some relief, but it was not unattended by some disadvantage. The block, instead of being twenty-four miles, is extended to forty-two miles by the arrangement for putting in alternate blocks for the Government. I want to know, without these contractors being compelled to register these base lines, what chance has a poor miner in that country after he has spent his toil and labour and perhaps his last dollar in exploring, and gets what he thinks is a mine, and then discovers that it is within forty-two miles of a base line—and a base line it is indeed. There is another reason that would warn any man who had formed a favourable opinion of this contract, to promptly change his opinion. The hon. member for Alberta, having examined the gold and silver and copper mines as I have done, said, and he said truly, that that contract, if it applied to British Columbia, would cover every mine known that has ever paid or that has any prospect of paying in the whole province. Now, is that hon. gentleman's statement to be relied upon? Is it true? It is as true as the gospel. Every man in this House knows that it is true; and I say that in view of that statement and these facts, he is a bold man who will venture to support this contract, and expect to receive the support of intelligent electors in this country afterwards.

The Minister of Railways and Canals gave us another interesting statement and what was it? I am going to read it and ask him if it is true. He said :

Now, Sir, I have endeavoured briefly, and I am quite conscious that I have done it very feebly,—

We all agree to that.

—to state the situation as the Government found in that country; and I might say that immediately after the last session of Parliament, feeling that all the information that it would be possible for us to procure ought to be procured, and that the information should be accurate and reliable, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) himself proceeded to the Pacific Coast.

The hon. gentleman knows that that is not true. The hon. gentleman knows that instead of the Minister of the Interior proceeding to the Pacific Coast immediately after the House rose, I was in Winnipeg when the hon. gentleman was on his way to the Pacific Coast, and that was on the 27th of September. That was the way the Minister of the Interior, who was the only person in Canada who did not know of any gold in that country, and who only gave to his friends advance copies of Mr. Ogilvie's report, dealt with this question. If he had done what the Minister of Railways said he did, and what he did not do, if he had dealt with it the moment the House rose, there would have been no necessity for a secret contract—not only no necessity, but no excuse for a secret contract. That is the position, and the hon. gentleman knows it right well. He let the summer go by, and on the first of November when I met him in Victoria, he had all the information which Mr. Jennings had, because they came down together to Victoria, and even then there was abundant time for him to have said to the contractors of this country: We have not a vast deal of information, but all that we have is at your service. And if he had called on ten or twenty able contractors of this country to tender for the work, instead of dealing with it in secret, he would have been in a different and much more defensible position to-day. The hon. gentleman ventured to say that Mr. Hamilton Smith and the story of his communication with him was a figment of the imagination.

Sir, one of the most discreditable acts that this Government will have to answer for is their treatment of a gentleman of the highest character and standing. I say here, and I stake my position in public life on the statement, that it is within my knowledge that Mr. Hamilton Smith is associated with and has at his back, as an applicant for a charter from this Parliament, half a dozen of the most independent, wealthy and powerful financial firms of the city of London. The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) talked to us of the second offer that was made to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. Why, there was one man in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway Syndicate who, every hon. gentleman opposite knows, could buy up every one of those men who made the second offer, and that without inconvenience. There was one man on this syndicate who could buy up the whole of them and not be particularly disturbed in his financial position after he had done it. But here was a man, Mr. Hamilton Smith, connected with the most powerful and wealthy firms in the city of London, himself a man of immense wealth, connected with great enterprises, a man who, in the United States and the city of London, stands at the very top of his profession as a mining engineer, whose success is such as to give him the confidence and support and command of all the capital he can desire, for any enterprise whatever.

Mr. DOMVILLE. What has that to do with the Stikine route?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman sitting along side the hon. member (Mr. Sifton) feels that it has something to do with it, when he turned his back upon a man of that standing and character and pushed this secret contract through to a conclusion before the Prime Minister knew he had even been approached by Mr. Hamilton Smith. The taunt was thrown across the House by the First Minister that Mr. Smith had communicated with me. What was he to do after the treatment he received, after he had been here looking in vain for an opportunity to tender for a great public work—and no man was better able to carry it to a successful conclusion—what was he to do but put himself in communication with public men and ask what means he could adopt? I did advise him, when he showed me a letter which puts me in a position to say here to-night he has at his back half a dozen of the most powerful and wealthy firms of England, since he could not reach the Minister of the Interior to send a letter to the First Minister, and that I thought it would receive attention. It did receive attention, but I think the right hon. First Minister was hardly prepared, after all that theatrical display of reading this correspondence, for the statement that Sir William Van Horne had approached the Minister of the Interior with regard to Mr. Smith. I do not intend to go into that matter further than to say that a greater indignity by a member of a Government never was perpetrated than when the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) denounced a gentleman of the highest standing and character in the United States and England, where he has been for the last fifteen years, as a prevaricator. It was an act of indignity such as no gentleman has ever been subjected to by any member of a Government who had any respect for the Government or himself.

The whole of Canada was startled. No contractor, no public man outside of the Government knew anything about this negotiation with Mackenzie & Mann until they woke up and found that the whole deal was perpetrated and that it was too late to make any alteration. Let me read, before I pass away from the conduct of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the language of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, which applies exactly to the conduct of the hon. gentleman. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, when Mr. Blake moved a resolution asking this House to take up a proposal to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway, sent in five weeks after the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway was laid upon the Table, said, speaking of the criticisms to which the parties were subjected under the offer:

We have heard the minions of the hon. gentleman—

I ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to give his attention to the name which the Minister of Trade and Commerce gives to the gentlemen who did what he did.

We have heard the minions of the hon. gentleman—set up to do the dirty work which even the hon. Minister of Railways did not choose to do—set up to state that this new contract was a mean, miserable, political dodge, set up to decry the repute and the character of men as honourable as Canada can show.

There is not a word of that but applies to the hon. Minister of Marine. The cases were parallel in this regard and completely analagous. Five weeks after the contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway had been laid on the Table, these gentlemen opposite got up this new syndicate, made a new offer, sent it to me, it was called for and laid upon the Table. What ground did they take? Did they say it was too late? Let me give the answer from a greater man than sits on the Treasury benches to-day, and that is the Hon. Mr. Blake. He moved:

That the contract now on the Table does not come within the provisions of the said Act, and is of no force unless legalized by Parliament.

It was precisely in the position that this contract is, subject to the approval of Parliament and laid upon the Table for that purpose.

That the said contract expressly provides that the same shall be binding only in the event of an Act of incorporation being granted to the projected company, as set in schedule "A" to the contract.

That Parliament is free to reject such a Bill.

How does that sound? These hon. gentlemen voted for it, their names are here on the journal declaring the fact that the contract was made and laid on the Table subject to the approval of the House, and that this Parliament was free to reject the one and accept the other. What more did Mr. Blake say? He said it was now proposed that Parliament should legalize the contract, that this House was under no obligation to do so, and that it was its duty to refuse to do so unless satisfied that the public interest required such a step, that the conditions of the contract were extremely onerous and disadvantageous to the country, and that it now appeared that terms much more favourable to the country could be obtained. There is precisely the case of Mr. Hamilton Smith, with this difference, that in his case, he will have a syndicate of infinitely stronger, more powerful and wealthy, and with greater resources than the parties who have signed the agreement. These parties, though eminently respectable and able, yet, without impugning their means, are utterly insignificant, as regards resources, compared with Mr. Hamilton Smith and his associates. And so I say they are bound by their declaration.

I will not detain the House at this hour to read, as I could read, utterances in point from every one of them who is now in the House who took part in that debate, denunciations of the contract and demand that the offer made five weeks afterwards should be accepted instead of it. When a man of the financial resources of Mr. Hamilton Smith offered to do for one million acres that for which they have agreed to give four million acres, these gentlemen, confronted with their declaration of what Parliament ought to do in a similar case, are left without a shadow of pretext for the position they take to-day. I do not intend to detain the House much longer. I want to refer to a statement of the Minister of the Interior in which he finds himself contradicted point blank. The hon. Minister went into elaborate adulation of Major Walsh. What for? Had anybody attacked or disparaged him? All that I said about Major Walsh was that he was an able man and that I regretted that he had not been charged with his important duties long before he was. The hon. gentleman told us that when Major Walsh was offered the appointment he could not take it up for a month. Was there no other man in the country? I know that Major Walsh was a great favourite of the hon. gentleman and had been closely associated with him. But that is no reason for sacrificing the public interest and the public money. Major Walsh was so late in starting for the seat of his labour that in spite of all his energy he has been unable to get through. In a desperate effort to get forward, he lost an enormous quantity of the provisions that were almost worth their weight in gold, you might say, and a valuable life lost as well. But in spite of all, he finds himself stranded at Salmon River. The Minister of the Interior is a resourceful man to say the least. He was no sooner confronted with this than he stood up and told us that Major Walsh was in the very place he sent him to, and ridiculed the idea of Major Walsh going to Dawson City. Here was the administrator of the country stranded at a place where there was no population, and where he could not possibly perform the important duties with which he had been charged. The hon. gentleman was in the position of the man who was boasting about his dog and its wonderful sagacity and obedience. A friend asked him for a specimen of what the dog could do. So the owner of the dog said, "Rover, go out of doors," and Rover put his tail between his legs and went under the table, whereupon his owner turned and said, "or under the table, which ever you please." So, Major Walsh got his instructions to go to Dawson City, the only place where a reasonable man would expect him to go and when he cannot get any further than Salmon River, the Minister says, That is exactly the place I told him to go. But Major Walsh does not say so.

"Well, Major, were you disappointed at being held up by the ice?"

That is at Salmon River.

"Indeed I was. I was anxious to get on to Selkirk, at least, with the whole of my outfit, and part of it to Dawson City.

There is a point blank contradiction. If the hon. gentleman expects people to give weight to his utterances, he will have to be more careful than he has been in the past. Now, the hon. gentleman made a statement in this House of far greater importance than anything to which I have referred. He went out of his way to state that Canada was utterly dependent upon the United States as to access to that country, that we could not get a man into it except by their permission. He said it would not be at all unlikely that we should find ourselves in a position where we did not own the country at all. In fact, he intimated that if a certain number of lawless men chose to go into that country they could take possession of it and we should lose it. A more discreditable position for a Minister of the Crown to take could hardly be imagined. To say, under any circumstances, that one foot of the soil of Canada could be taken possession of by any power in the world is to make a statement of a most humiliating and degrading character, and one in violation of everything that the honour and integrity and independence of Canada requires. The hon. gentleman attacked me for speaking with such freedom as I did with regard to the United States. I repeat that I will go as far as any man can be required to go in an effort to preserve the most friendly and kindly social and commercial relations with the United States. But, having had a long experience of public life, and having had an opportunity to study that country, I know that the only way that Canada can have her rights respected is to show that we are determined not to yield one jot or tittle of our right at the impudent dictation of the United States. Let me read what the organ of the Government said and see if I was justified in the position I assumed. I hold in my hand the Toronto "Globe," of February 15th. I will not read the whole article, though every line confirms the position I have taken :

It is immaterial to him where he purchases his supplies. The objections arise almost wholly from Pacific Coast cities of the United States, which propose to abolish everything that stands in the way of their securing the whole of the Yukon outfitting trade and they are determined that Congress and officials at Washington shall do everything to neutralize the advantages of the Canadian position.

Can hon. gentlemen read that, can they see what is taking place in Congress, read the statements made by members of Congress, and endorsed by the majority of the Senate, and say that our true course was not to have advanced by securing the modification of these injurious Acts that are calculated to paralyze Canadian trade and hand over the whole Yukon country rather than to go on with the senseless construction of a work that, after it is built, we can have no means of using. They say :

We believe we speak the mind of every section of the country—

And so they do.

—when we express the determination not to be tricked—

--Mark this : I want the Minister of the Interior to mark what his own organ says to the people of this country.

We believe we speak the mind of every section of the country when we express the determination not to be tricked or intimidated out of our natural rights in that region. If the United States Congress thinks proper to break a treaty in order to back up the game of Tacoma and Seattle, our Government will have to proceed forthwith to meet the situation.

For to meet the situation? To use the power you have in your hands, to say to the Government of the United States: We want to have the most friendly commercial relations with you, but if you meet us with alien bills, you force us to meet you with similar bills. If you will not allow Canadians to have mining licenses in the United States, we must deny them to your people. We must pay you the compliment of copying your own legislation in protection of the rights of Canadian citizens. Do you think the United States, if they did not believe they could mould this Government to their own will, would set up such wild and insane pretensions, and undertake to dictate to the Government of Canada that they should revise all their laws at the dictation of the United States of America. The "Globe" goes on :

It will necessitate more extensive railway building than was at first contemplated, but we have entered on the contest, and our American friends can be assured that we will not be balked in our resolution to obtain free and unhampered communication with our possessions in that distant part of the Dominion. If the most absolute guarantees are not obtained on this point, no time should be lost.

And so I say to the hon. gentlemen opposite. Let them first discipline their own press before they undertake to call in question anything I say in regard to this matter. I say, Sir, that you will search the civilized world in vain to find such a proposal as you have in this Bill, alienating four million acres of the richest gold land in the world, allowing two men to absorb all the mining wealth of that country. I say no country would tolerate such a course for a moment; I say it will fail disastrously, and if you wanted to excite rebellion in that country you could take no better means of doing it. You will make every miner who goes into that country the deadly enemy of this Government, you will induce a combination among them, because they will feel that they are suffering the rankest injustice at the hands of the Government that was ever practised upon honest men who wished to obtain a honest livelihood, when you undertake to charge individual miners no less than 10 per cent on what they take out. We heard the hon. member for North Norfolk say that under ordinary circumstances it costs to the miner 80 or 90 per cent to get out a dollars worth of gold, and after you have charged him the 10 per cent royalty, what will he have left? I say if you want a rebellion in that country you will get it, and you will be responsible for having provoked it by laws so unjust that every man will have the sympathy of the outside world instead of having its hostility in the course that is pursued. Sir, there was one answer given to the appeal and misericordium of the Minister of the Interior about these starving thousands of people who would be up there next winter. If there is going to be 50,000 people there, it has been demonstrated that this railway is going to be utterly incapable of furnishing the supplies that would be necessary to prevent destitution. There has been no starvation up to the present time, because every man who went in there felt that he must take a year's provisions with him. Now, you have advertised to the world that you are building a railway because there will be 100,000 starving people in there next winter, and you intend to supply them with food. What will be the result? These people, depending upon the declaration of the Government, and their determination to afford means of taking food to them to prevent starvation, will thereby be induced to make no provision for themselves. The course of the Government is clear. Major Walsh is an energetic man; there are only a few avenues of access to that country, and you have only to give him orders that no man should be admitted to that country unless he goes provided with a year's supply of food, and there will be no starvation. Sir, I should not have risen to speak upon this occasion were it not that constant references had been made by hon. gentlemen to myself and to the course which I have pursued. I think I have given the House reasons that should be satisfactory to any unprejudiced man, that after the light and the information that this contract threw upon this dark transaction, devised in secrecy, and with every means taken by the Government to place unreserved power in the hands of the contractors, I should have been unworthy of a seat in this House had I not adopted the only course that remained to me and explained my position, as I have just done. I cannot believe that this measure will become law, but if it does become law, the result will be to cover this Government with confusion and to expose their utter incapacity to administer the great interests that have been confided to their charge. Before I sit down I wish to say what course I think the Government should adopt. Since the contract was made with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann a complete change has taken place in the situation. The Government are now in a position to say to them, under the circumstances: The objects and aims we had it is impossible to realize, and under these circumstances, if you go on, whatever work you do, we will be prepared to pay you handsomely for, but anything you do must be done for the Government, and not under this contract. Then let the Government take prompt measures to examine this route from Port Simpson from Hastings Arm, or from Alice Arm, in the Portland Channel; examine these routes and I believe that you will find that you can obtain a British Canadian port free from all obstruction, where ocean steamers can go to railway communication, and it will be at no very remote distance from Glenora, where it will make connection with the proposed railway between Teslin Lake and Stikine River.

That is not all. You have in addition the fact that the old telegraph trail running on from Ashcroft, B.C., which was constructed by the Russians many years ago, before the cable was laid, and where there are many miles of wire yet strung, runs, I believe, within ten miles of where the line would extend from Telegraph Creek and by a slight divergence, according to the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) who understands this subject better than I do, the line from Edmonton could join, and both that line and the line from Ashcroft connect with the railway. I believe this House will be prepared, after the able statement made by that hon. member, who has mastered this subject in all its details, to sanction the prompt construction by the Government of a wagon road from Edmonton, opening up the Peace River Valley and giving access to the great food-producing districts in the North-west Territories and in the province of Manitoba, and thus accomplish a work that would be alike creditable to the country, develop its resources and escape the evils of this contract, which has been so rigidly criticised and thoroughly exposed to the view of hon. members of this House so as, I believe, to lead every member of the Government to the conclusion that a more unwise act could not be done on their part than to press this unfortunate measure to a conclusion.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, when, two hours and a half ago, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) was good enough to tell us that he desired to address a few words to this House, knowing his habit, I did not venture to hope that his words would be few, but I did venture to hope that he would disperse a few arguments among them. Unhappily, the length has been in inverse proportion to the quality. The hon. gentleman has traversed every single individual fact or act of his long career, in order to show that in the person of the leader of the Liberal-Conservative party we have the most modest man that ever occupied a similar position; and there is no doubt about it, because he has told it himself, and he ought to know. Sir, I am told that the leadership of the Liberal-Conservative party is the highest position to which mortal man can aspire. It is well known to hon. members that I have always entertained a very high regard for Tories of all description; I have extended that appreciation to the Conservatives also; but I must admit that in so far as regards the Liberal-Conservatives, I have found it utterly impossible to place them in the same category. It may be truly said of those political mulattoes that they have inherited the vices of both parents and the virtues of neither; and while I profess the utmost regard for all true Conservatives, I say regarding these men, whose very name is a sham and a contradiction, who are no more entitled to call themselves Conservative than Liberal, who belong to neither party, that the leadership of these men may possibly be fitly held by the hon. gentleman opposite. Sir, I desire to call the attention of the House, in the first place, to the most remarkable concurrence and accordance between, what shall I call him—the king de jure or the king de facto of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. FOSTER. Of the mulattoes.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The ex-Minister of Finance was good enough to denounce with all his heart and soul, and in words almost as verbose and as tedious as those of the hon. gentleman beside him, the Stikine-Teslin route as the most absurd that the mind of man could conceive and grasp. The hon. gentleman who has taken his seat, and whom my hon. friend calls his leader, has told us that he adheres to every word he previously stated, that not only was the Stikine-Teslin the best route, but it was the only route worthy of consideration, under the circumstances. Sir, every word with respect to the various routes said by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) was in direct and absolute contradiction to every word used by his leader. Why, Sir, the hon. leader of the Opposition still admits that he agrees with the policy of the hon. Minister of the Interior on all points practically but one, that one point being that he says now, although he did not say it a few weeks ago, that he has been misled and deceived on the one point of transshipment, as to which I shall say something by and by, although the hon. gentleman, in a speech, which he did not deny, pointed out that if there were any difficulty in respect to transshipment, it might be avoided by going to Port Simpson. But the hon. gentleman quarrels with us on one point alone. He admits the urgency, he admits that the route was the best, he admits that the contractors chosen were not only the best, but the only men in Canada who, by reason of their financial standing, organization and experience—and, bear in mind, that it requires much more than money to enable contractors to perform such a work—had the least chance of constructing the road within the time given by the hon. Minister. But, Sir, after making a careful examination of the question, whether or not we would be allowed certain privileges of transshipment or bonding at Wrangel, what is the remedy that the leader of the Liberal-Conservative party suggests? Why, that we should go to Washington and ask whether the American Government mean to violate their treaty obligations before we proceed to carry out this project on the faith, which I think we are justified in holding in spite of what has transpired in the United States Senate, that on calm consideration the United States Senate and the people of that country will fulfil their treaty obligations. We ask no more, we want no more than our rights. The hon. gentleman has been on the Pacific Coast and he has had conferences with Hudson's Bay Company's officials, who have made trips for years on the Stikine River. I want to ask the hon. gentleman whether the men connected with that company told him, or whether the hon. gentleman is able to state from his knowledge, that up to the present moment any Canadian goods going up the Stikine have been compelled to pay duty?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not aware of any.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman is not aware of one case, and more or less, for probably more than twenty years, the Hudson Bay Company's officers have used that route, I understand not constantly, but occasionally, for their vessels and it has been used by Canadian vessels. If these goods have not been compelled to pay duty—that being the case, and I believe the hon. gentleman does not deny it—and our people have been allowed to use this route under such conditions, why should we now suppose that a new and altered condition of affairs will take place. The hon. gentleman in the course of his somewhat rambling oration was good enough to call the attention of the House to the Halifax award. I wondered at the hon. gentleman doing so, because I have here as one of my colleagues, a gentleman whose exertions contributed largely to the successful result that Canada obtained on that occasion, and I think I am correct in saying that one of the stumbling blocks that lay in his way and one of the authorities most frequently appealed to in support of the American contention and claim were certain speeches delivered by the hon. gentleman opposite, which were quoted before the American commission in support of their contention that we were asking far too heavy claims for indemnity on account of these same fisheries. I have many reasons for knowing that—perhaps not the hon. gentleman, but certainly his colleagues—were prepared to have gladly accepted a very much smaller sum than we subsequently obtained by way of compensation.

The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) also was good enough to call our attention to the fact, that some minions of his, I suppose I may say, were concerned in a very disreputable transaction which resulted in the stealing of certain private papers belonging,

I believe to Mr. Goldwin Smith, or perhaps to Mr. Edward Farrer, upon which a most preposterous and absurd charge of conspiracy and treason was formulated by himself and some of his late colleagues. It may perhaps interest some of these gentlemen to know, because they probably are not as well posted in Mr. Edward Farrer's antecedents as others are, that Mr. Farrer was a long time editor of the "Mail" newspaper, and was the writer of at least one, and probably more, Tory campaign sheets. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) makes merry at the idea expressed by one of my hon. friends here that, if 100,000 men, not in the habit of rendering always the most implicit obedience to laws of any kind, were collected together at a point almost inaccessible, there might be some difficulty in maintaining law and order. He makes very light of a possible rebellion in our territory. Sir, I can understand these hon. gentlemen opposite making light of rebellions, for their misconduct was the cause of two, and one at least was provoked by the most scandalous neglect and mismanagement on the part of the hon. gentleman's colleagues. Whether or not he was in the Government during the entire time that the seeds of that rebellion were being sown I do not recollect at this moment, but I do recollect, that if ever it was proved that the mismanagement and the gross and scandalous and shameful neglect of their duty to our distant fellow subjects in the Northwest—I will not say justified but excused a rebellion—it was proven in the case of the conduct of that hon. gentleman's colleagues.

Sir, I have not time at this hour to make more than the briefest allusion to the hypocritical criticism against a grant of three or four million acres of rocks under the Arctic circle preferred by these hon. gentlemen, who to our knowledge gave way fifty millions of acres of the most fertile land in the world, and who were prepared to give away a hundred million acres, as the record shows to this hour. The hon. member (Mr. Foster) was good enough to tell us, that not a single pound of trade was likely to accrue from the opening of this road. Unless I am most grievously misinformed—probably my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior or my hon. friend the Minister of Customs can correct me—unless I am most grievously misinformed the moment the contract was signed with Mackenzie & Mann, that moment an instant and great revival took place in the trade of Vancouver and the cities on the coast. And, were we to accept the suggestion of these hon. gentlemen, if we were to stop this contract, if we were to withdraw the men who are now engaged in carrying it out, I venture to say the effect would be felt in all these cities, and the trade which has grown up so quickly would disappear as quickly.

The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper)

tells us, as an excuse for his change of face, that there has been a complete change since this debate began. Yes, there has been a complete change. That was justifiable before, simply on its merits and as being as the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) truly said, the best and only route available to us if it was to go through Canadian territory, has now become, in the very highest degree and sense, a matter of national honour, which we cannot possibly abandon, unless we are prepared to make manifest to the world that the American Congress can dictate to us where our railways should go and under what condition. And, if the hon. gentleman and his friends possessed one spark of real genuine patriotism; if they possessed one particle of the loyalty which they most impudently arrogate to themselves; if they possessed one atom of real regard for the interests of this country, the very moment that Bill was known to pass the American Senate, that moment they would not have asked us to withdraw the Bill, but they would have withdrawn their own opposition to it. I certainly do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to imitate my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) at this hour, and in the very few remarks I now propose to make, I apologize to the House, because it is utterly impossible to deal with this question at this time without some repetition more or less.

With respect to the position occupied by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) himself, I have this to say: It is a fine sight no doubt to see Cæsar disciplining his mutinous troops, but to see the mutinous knaves disciplining Cæsar and reducing him to the position which he now occupies is a spectacle which should give pain to all rightly constituted minds. What has the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) proved? Why, he has proved two things, which we have always admitted from the first. He has proved, I will grant, that if circumstances permitted, it is always wise and right and proper to advertise for tenders for a public work. Who denied it? No one on this side of the House that I have ever heard. He has proved also, that it is right in all such cases to consult the House. Nobody denied it, and this contract is made, as he truly said, subject to the consent of the House. But, the hon. gentleman has not considered the fact, that we were fettered on all points by conditions which he himself has admitted. He has not attempted to disprove—although some of his comrades may have done so—that this was a case of urgency in the highest degree. On the contrary, he admitted this once and again. He has not attempted to disprove that this road lies through our own territory. That, he has had the good sense to abstain from denying, although he does contend that if the navigation of the Stikine is interfered with, it will not be in all respects as useful to us as we hoped it would be. But, suppose the Stikine navigation is interfered with, all the same this piece of railway from the Stikine to the Teslin, is, by his own showing—and out of his own lips I establish it—a most necessary and indispensable link to any action we may take, whether in the extension of the road southward to a port in British Columbia, or for an extension eastward to give connection with Edmonton. It is an indispensable link either way, and if interference is made in the trade, it will be a most valuable means of communication with the Yukon country, and anyhow supplies, in case of need, can be passed through. The Government laid down, and we are accomplishing it in spite of what hon. gentlemen opposite may say, these conditions: That the road should not cost the people of Canada anything, that it should not cost the people of Canada—who have in one way or other expended something like $200,000,000 public and private money in the attempt to open up and colonize the Northwest—that it should not cost them any more of their hard-earned money, but that the Yukon should be opened by means of a reasonable contribution from the resources of the country itself. We also lay down the condition that we should preserve a fair share of any possible profits to the people of Canada; and every man who looks at the contract knows that that is done in the fullest and most complete degree.

Now, I have looked at the amendment which these hon. gentlemen have introduced. What practical alternative have they to propose? Why, they cannot agree among themselves. The hon. ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) had one scheme. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) recommends, I believe, a wagon road. That is the highest point his broad-minded vision will enable him to aspire to. The leader of the Opposition did, in the first instance, like a sensible man, recommend the route my hon. friend has taken, and he has only partially withdrawn from that position. All through his better sense and judgment was quarrelling with the position he was forced to assume by those malcontent followers of his.

We do not mean to say that it would not have been better to ask for tenders; but in this case we had no time. It is utterly impossible for my hon. friend or for any man in his position to have done more than he did; and in the weighty and unanswerable speech, in which he explained his course, a speech which does him honour, and which will live long in Canadian annals, he showed to the satisfaction of every reasonable man in Canada why it was that he was not able to act earlier than he did. Every man of any practical experience in affairs knows well that had my hon. friend asked for tenders, it would have been utterly impossible for us to have obtained any road this year; and the whole reason why we dispensed with tenders and desired to push this road through was because there was, as any man can see for himself, urgent necessity that we should have communication established this year if by any means it can be established.

As to the large land grant, my hon. friend himself has stated, and others have stated, that there is not the slightest doubt that Mackenzie & Mann, in the first instance, did not want to take this land grant and build this road. They would have preferred another road—they made no secret of it—as being easier for commercial purposes. But when the hon. leader of the Opposition talks about our giving away the whole of this valuable gold field by a grant of 4,000,000 acres, or about 6,000 square miles, made under the conditions with which this House is familiar, the hon. gentleman will excuse me for saying that I think a man of his experience should have talked less nonsense. Why it is apparent to him and to everybody that the whole of that country will be flooded, not with thousands, but with tens of thousands of explorers before Mackenzie & Mann can locate a single, solitary acre. In all human probability, every stream on which there is any show of gold, will be taken up before these gentlemen are allowed to select more than the veriest fragment of the land assigned to them. I have not the slightest doubt that Mackenzie & Mann would be very ready to exchange for a very moderate subsidy in hard cash their large land grant: in fact, we have excellent reason to know that they would. Just take the case of any man with an undeveloped property supposed to contain valuable minerals which are not located. Is there any man who would not be willing to have men of capital explore it on condition of his receiving one-half the product? And, remember, we are giving not more than 5 per cent of the lands, because we have eighty or a hundred million acres there out of which we are giving 4,000,000 acres.

Sir, let us apply a little common sense to this matter. Who can tell to-day whether we have struck half a dozen gigantic pockets or whether there is a new California there? The hon. gentleman talks as if we were going to exhaust all the gold-bearing streams of this country. At the outside, all that the company possibly get possession of, under the conditions laid down by the Minister of the Interior, would be 1,000 or 1,500 miles of river bed. Does the hon. gentleman know how many thousand miles of river bed or streamlet bed equally likely to contain gold there are in that country? I have made some attempt, in conjunction with my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, to estimate it, and I think I am safe in saying that there are from 20,000 to 30,000 miles of river bed in that country, which is a mountainous country, abounding in mountain torrents or mountain streams, any single one of which is just as likely to produce gold as any other. Consider under what circumstances these mines are going to be worked. Consider that the expense of working them must be enormous. These miners go to a country to which every pound of supplies must be brought thousands of miles, in an Arctic region, where wages must be five or six times as great as in older Canada, in order to induce men to work at all.

The hon. gentleman made a great deal of an expression used by myself or by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, I forget which, when we said that Mackenzie & Mann had undertaken to make a huge gamble. Quite true, but we never said that Canada had undertaken to make a huge gamble. What Canada has done is what all prudent men would do. Canada has hedged in this matter. Canada, having an enormous area of land, has given a small portion of it, probably not more than 5 per cent, for the purpose of developing and making valuable the rest. The calculation submitted by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) and his leader, and by other gentlemen, are certainly of the most astounding proportions. As became him, the hon. leader of the Opposition maintained his ancient renown. The hon. member for York demonstrated to his own satisfaction, if not to the satisfaction of the House, that this land grant would be worth some $700,000 or $800,000 a year. But this estimate dwarfed into insignificance beside that of his hon. leader, who promised us that Mackenzie & Mann would earn $37,000,000 from converting their land grant into mining licenses. Then, one of our hon. friends from Toronto was good enough to inform us that these 4,000,000 acres were worth $50,000,000. Now, I speak without authority, but I think I can pledge the Government that if the hon. gentleman will take other four million acres and sell them for fifty million dollars, he can have, if he wishes, 20 per cent on the transaction. We are also to have $400,000,000 for the timber. What an Eldorado it all is. If the hon. member for Toronto be correct, we might extinguish the national debt four times over by the sale of our lands in the Yukon. If the leader of the Opposition is correct, we might pension all Canada.

At this hour of the night I do not want to enter into a discussion of the exact position we occupy under the Washington Treaty. But one thing the hon. gentleman said, which I may as well call attention to, because several of his friends behind him chose to take a totally different view of it. He pointed out that a most grave error had been committed in the framing of the Washington Treaty by the substitution of the clause as it now stands, for the clause under which we enjoyed further privileges of navigation on the Stikine River, under the Treaty of 1825, and the subsequent Treaty of St. Petersburg. He pointed that out, while some of his friends, not having duly listened to his words, informed us that, after all is said and done, we were just as well off as we were before. There is no doubt whatever that all the British Commissioners who were present at Washington on that occasion were responsible. They ought to have known all about the treaty which gave us the navigation of the Yukon and Stikine and Porcupine, and it is very little to the credit of any of them that that matter was only discovered after the treaty was signed. I do not pretend to say we are not grievously hampered in our dealings with the United States by the folly of our predecessors. No man who has watched the conduct of public affairs in Canada for the last fifteen years, but is aware of the truth of my statement, made calmly and deliberately and under a sense of responsibility, that the relations between Canada and the United States were never one half so good or friendly as during the period when that honest, sagacious statesman, Alexander Mackenzie, presided over the affairs of this country. But just so soon as the hon. gentleman and his brother jingoes got into office, everything was reversed. His own common sense did at last wake him up to the folly of the career they were running, and his remarks have been quoted over and over again, from these benches, I shall not repeat them. But he pointed out, some nine years after he left office, to what a dangerous position the folly, ignorance and incapacity of some of his brother colleagues had brought the affairs of Canada, until it became necessary for the British Government to send out Mr. Chamberlain, the present Secretary of State, to take these men by the collar and shake them to some sense of their duty. As to the subsequent proceedings at Washington, aye, and as to the hon. gentleman's proceedings at Washington, I will say no more than this, that neither was that famous visit, which began at half past ten and terminated at a quarter to eleven, nor the submission which the hon. gentleman himself was compelled to make to the late Mr. Blaine, things which any Canadian is likely to recall with pleasure or which reflect any credit on our Administration.

It is perfectly true that the extravagant expenditures which these hon. gentlemen have committed the country to have laid a burden upon us which makes it very difficult for us to deal with those other questions as we would like. One of the reasons why we give lands in preference to money for the building of this railway is because our national debt and expenditure are very much greater than a proper administration of the affairs of Canada warranted.

More than that, this question of the Alaska boundary, that is now giving us so much trouble, and which will probably invoke tedious and complicated negotiations—who is to blame if it was not properly settled? These gentlemen were in power from 1878 to 1896—eighteen long years—and they gave themselves very little trouble about this matter, which, if they had been the statesmen they pretend to be, they would not have allowed to remain in abeyance all this time.

The hon. gentleman, in one breath, complains that we allow American miners to operate in the Klondike, and in the next breath he complains that we are taxing these poor fellows for the privileges of doing so. It is a new departure, I grant, and one which does honour and credit to my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton). It is time that the people of Canada, as a whole, should extract some profit, in one way or another, from the enormous resources that providence has showered upon them; and if it be a new departure, it is a wise one. We have spent a couple of hundred million in opening up that region, and if we can extract one or two millions a year from it, that is our legitimate and fair profit, and it is our duty to do it.

One of the reasons, and a very good reason, for selecting Mackenzie & Mann was this obvious one, that in a matter of urgency, a matter in which the very essence of the thing was that this railway should be constructed, if at all possible, in time to provide means of communication before the close of the current year, it was necessary to have contractors who had something more than money at their backs—contractors, like Mackenzie & Mann, of great experience, with a ready organized plant, ready to go into the work at once. In my opinion, very much more money will be spent getting into the country than will be taken out of it, for a considerable time to come, and that is another reason why we should, by all possible means, make easy transport there. If the goods come from Canada, so much the better; but if they come from the United States, Canada will not lose her share, so long as she has experienced officers and proper authorities to support them.

In conclusion, let me say this. Everybody who has paid any attention to this particular class of mining knows perfectly well the truth of the statement made by many of my hon. friends beside me, that we cannot possibly depend or rely on placer mining continuing for more than a very short time. If there are rich quartz mines in the country, they may prove a permanent source of wealth, but all the evidence and experience we have from California, British Columbia, or any other country of the kind, goes to show that it is quite possible that the whole of these great finds of placer mining may be exhausted within two or three years. I do not say that they will, but it is quite possible; and under these circumstances, I put it to the common sense of hon. gentlemen if we would not be censurable if we allowed the public credit to be pledged and the money of the people to be used to any larger extent than is possible to avoid, for the purpose of obtaining access to a country where we cannot tell that we will find 5,000 miners, let alone 50,000, at the expiration of three years from this time. What is the use of proposing plans, if you have any to propose, which it will take three or four years to carry out, under such conditions. I repeat that there is no doubt whatever that if, under existing circumstances, threatened by the American Senate, threatened by some parties in the United States, threatened with condign punishment, forsooth, if we presume to go on opening up our own country in the way we think best—if, under those circumstances, we withdraw our Bill, we would desire to be branded as the most incompetent cowards whoever held the reins of Government.

Mr. McINNES. I do not intend at this late hour to prolong the discussion of the subject before the House. This debate has now lasted nearly a month, and I am sure hon. members are thoroughly acquainted with all the details connected with the bargain which can be of any assistance in aiding them in coming to a conclusion. But inasmuch as this question is of vital importance to the whole country, and I find that the views which I hold on it are unfortunately at variance with those of the majority of the members on this side, and also—which I very much regret—at variance with those of some of the hon. members from British Columbia, I shall briefly give an explanation of the position I take, and the vote I intend to give.

As to the resolution proposed by the Government to ratify this contract, I cannot justify myself in supporting it. I give the Government credit for the desire they have manifested in this contract or otherwise, to secure the construction of a road or some other facilities for communication with the Klondike country. I give them all praise for every legitimate effort they have put forward to secure the trade of that new market for Canada and Canadians. So far as the route they have selected is concerned, I endorse it as good so far as it goes, but I think that the opinion will ultimately prevail that it does not go far enough to serve the purpose we all desire to have served by opening up communication with that country.

But I apprehend that the question is not whether it is desirable to have an all-Canadian route to that country or whether this route is superior to all others. There is very little difference of opinion so far as I have followed the debate, and so far as I have followed opinion in the country on these two points. The question before the House and the country is whether the contract for the construction of what is presumably an all-Canadian route is a good and provident one. Upon that question, I regret to say, I cannot see eye to eye with the Government.

There are several features of the contract which I consider unfortunate. I do not intend to amplify the discussion of them, but shall confine myself to a mere statement of opinion. I believe strongly that a contract of this magnitude should not have been entered into without an opportunity for public competition. I believe, furthermore, that the Government has agreed to give far too much for what they are to get. I believe, moreover, that the kind of assistance they propose to give the contractors for building the road is one that cannot be defended either on principle or in the light of past experience. I think that we should cease to legislate into existence these large corporations with monopolistic rights with regard to transportation and land and mineral wealth. The time has surely come at last for a different policy to be pursued with regard to the construction of railways. So I cannot justify myself in supporting the propositions of the Government.

With regard to the amendment, I think it has been very well described by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell). It is a mere skeleton; there is no life to it, there is no substance in it; it is indefinite; it lacks decision; it embodies no business principle, and, so far as I can pass judgment upon it, it seems to me to be devised more to gather in all the dissentients under it than to supply a definite line of action in case the proposition submitted by the Government should be defeated. No doubt there are other members of the House similarly dissatisfied with both proposals submitted. I do not know whether the views I express and the course I intend to take will satisfy those hon. members, but I feel it would not be doing myself justice to remain silent and record two negative votes which, by themselves, would not be very intelligible. I have prepared an amendment to the amendment which, perhaps, will meet the views of hon. gentlemen who find themselves in the same position as myself:—

That all the words after the word "but" in the eighth line of the amendment be struck out and the following words be added instead thereof:—

That it is expedient to provide transportation facilities with the least possible delay by an all-Canadian route to the mining districts of the Yukon.

That the recent action of the United States Senate gives reason to fear that every possible obstacle will be placed in the way of traffic by the proposed Stikine route, and justifies the reconsideration of the present contract with a view to secure a deep water terminus in Canadian territory.

That the route via Observatory Inlet and Teslin Lake is the only all-Canadian route free from the possibility of international complications immediately available or suitable for railway construction at a comparatively moderate cost.

Therefore, be it resolved, that the Government of Canada call for tenders at the earliest date consistent with public competition, for the construction of a narrow gauge railway from Observatory Inlet to Teslin Lake on either of the following plans:—First, as a Government work; second, on the basis of a cash subsidy to a company constructing the railway and operating it under strict governmental control; provided, that in either case the portion from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake should be completed by 1st October 1898, and the whole railway by 1st September, 1899; and that the Government be authorized to enter into a contract for the construction of such railway with the party submitting the lowest tender, accompanied by satisfactory securities for the completion of the work, on either of the above plans.

I do not think it necessary to add anything at length in the way of explanation of this amendment to the amendment. It declares that in all probability there will be trouble in connection with this route if the lower terminus is at Telegraph Creek, and is not pushed down to Observatory Inlet. I believe it is not a question whether we have rights by treaty which will give us the navigation for commercial purposes of the Stikine River. There is no doubt but there will be differences in the interpretation of the treaty, and there can be no doubt that it will take a long time for the interpretation of our treaty rights to be settled. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) has declared as much. I have every confidence in the ingenuity of the Americans; and I have seen enough of their contemptible tactics on the Pacific Coast, to know that they are sufficiently unneighbourly to resort to almost any trick to prevent the use of this river for the purpose of connecting with this road and so securing the trade for Canada. It also declares that this route is the only available route for present purposes which can be built over all Canadian territory at moderate cost. I think those who are acquainted with all the routes will come to this conclusion, and I do not wish to say anything which will cause any rivalry between that and other routes. My resolution also declares that cash assistance alone should be given towards the construction of that railway, or that it should be undertaken as a Government work. I prefer the latter course, decidedly; but if hon. gentlemen see fit to endorse the other alternative, I shall not complain. As I said, I do not intend to take up the time of the House at this late hour, but I move this amendment to the amendment in accordance with the views I hold upon the question, and I think it also expresses the feeling of other members of the House on this matter.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I am not sure that I have correctly followed the phraseology of the resolution, or fully understand its purport; but if I have, and if I correctly apprehend its meaning, it appears to me not to be a motion which it is competent for the hon. gentleman to move. I think that it infringes upon the prerogative of the Crown, that it is not a motion which can be moved by a private member without the usual governmental recommendation. At all events, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call your attention to the resolution, and to raise the point of order as to whether it is one which the hon. member may properly move.

Mr. SPEAKER. While it is competent for a private individual, without the recommendation of the Crown, to propose an abstract resolution with reference to grants of money, I think this is not an abstract, but a very concrete resolution, providing, directing and authorizing the Government to incur a specific expenditure. For that reason, I do not think the resolution is in order.

Mr. CASEY. I regret that the motion proposed by my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) has been found to be out of order. But, at all events, even as it stands, it serves to express the views which he and I, at any rate, entertain upon this subject, and as you, Sir, have said, to put our views in a simple and concrete form. It is with the deepest regret, and with something more than regret, that, for the first time in my rather long parliamentary career, I have had to differ from any important proposal made by the leaders of the Liberal party, and I should not do so now did I consider that the present proposal was in harmony with my understanding of the principles and past career of that party. I know what is due to party allegiance, perhaps, as well as any other man in this House, and am prepared to yield all that is due to that great principle. While I am prepared to yield on all points merely of judgment or of expediency, I cannot avoid expressing, in this case, where I think there is a difference in principle, the dissent which I really feel. I am sure the Government have the less reason to complain of such an expression of opinion on the part of their followers, because there was no opportunity given for such an expression of opinion before the Government committed themselves and the party to the particular course in question. I am aware of what is due as, I said, to party allegiance, and I am also aware of the sufferings and tribulations of those who are commonly called kickers. I have been one of those who denounced kickers, and have pointed out how much more comfortable, and easy, and defensible it was as an almost invariable rule, to vote with your party through thick and thin, and I admit still that it is the easiest course to maintain, and the easiest course to defend. But, perhaps, Sir, it is in the interests of the party and in the interests of the country that notwithstanding all this, some should kick and some should suffer for their kicking. As my hon. friend from Vancouver has remarked, this is a time for stating conclusions and not arguments, and I will try and follow his example in stating my conclusions. I have deferred speaking on this question until the very end of the debate in the hope that I might find means of avoiding what I had to say. But I am compelled now, as at first, to say that I object to the manner of making this bargain and to the matter of the bargain. The manner of the bargain seemed to me, and still seems to me, to have been characterized by undue and improper haste, and I must add, recklessness in its dealing with the public domain. The matter of the bargain is objectionable for several reasons. I may say that I agree with my hon. friend, the mover of this abortive resolution, in believing that a cash subsidy is the proper method of aiding a railway to develop Government property. Such has always been the policy of the Liberal party for many years, such was the policy of the Liberal Parliament and Liberal Government during the late session, and the session before that. I do not understand the sudden revulsion from that policy, the sudden feeling that seems to have come over the Government that they must give no more cash subsidies, and that they must revert to the principle which we have denounced as vicious on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, the principle of giving away large land grants of unknown value to secure the construction of railways. I was the colleague of those, not a great many, who now sit on the Treasury benches, who opposed the Canadian Pacific Railway contract in 1881 on the very grounds on which I am opposing this to-day. I stand where I then stood, and I see no reason to review my opinion. The Government say it is proper that the territory in the Yukon district should pay for its own development. I quite agree with them, but a Government possessing such talent as they possess, should be able to raise out of the territory funds to build the railway without giving a grant of land which seems to me to be improvident. The Minister of Railways and the Minister of the Interior also have admitted that this was a gamble. I do not think that is the proper method of dealing with an emergency of this kind. Even in an emergency requiring hasty treatment, I do not think that method should be resorted to. The adventurous spirit of the gambler is sometimes exceedingly necessary to a politician or business man. A distinguished railway man once spoke to me of the great difficulties he had sometimes to meet, and he said: Thank heaven, I have been a poker player from my early boyhood, and it is quite an assistance to a man on a pinch. I do not think the Minister of the Interior, from my knowledge of his associations, received that early training, and I do not think he can thank heaven for having been a poker player from his boyhood up. I am afraid, moreover, that he has not shown full knowledge of the game into which he entered, full knowledge of the speculation, to use a milder term than he used. I do not want to urge any of these points too strongly against the Government, but I felt it due to myself to state thus briefly a few of the reasons why I feel compelled to disapprove of this contract. One point only, in addition. The Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke of this great country as so many million acres of rock under the Arctic circle. In all seriousness, that is not the way to speak of a country proved to contain immense riches. No one can say that it contains immense riches everywhere; but until we know what it does contain, the only safe and proper course to obtain railway facilities for it is to give a cash subsidy for its construction, and, if you must gamble, gamble on the chance of getting paid out of that territory.

Again, we are told that Mr. Hamilton Smith's proposition came too late to receive attention. I say it should not have come too late. There is no use denying that that proposal may have emanated from people perfectly able to carry it out. I do not know whether the Government have satisfied themselves on that point or have taken the trouble to do so, considering the proposition came too late. But opportunity for such offers should have been given before the Government tied themselves up to consider this question with respect to one form of contract only, with one set of contractors only, and on one plan only. Although I have spoken of my preference for a cash subsidy scheme, I would not have greatly objected or have been compelled to speak about it, if an opportunity for tendering had been given. If offers to take a subsidy, either in cash or lands, had been invited, I would not have felt called upon to object publicly to the scheme. In saying I object to this scheme and declaring that I would have voted for my hon. friend's resolution and would have seconded it if it had been in order, I do not mean to declare any want of confidence in the Government. I have personally, and as regards their general policy, the utmost confidence in them. I supported their railway policy last year and the year before, voting for the aid to the Crow's Nest Pass line and in favour of the Drummond County road, and I am still prepared to defend those schemes as wise, statesmanlike and in the public interest; but the fact that I voted for them does not compel me to express approval of this contract. I beg leave to say in respect to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), that I agree with the opinion of my hon. friend who moved this resolution, which has been declared out of order, but I cannot support a mere hollow amendment to this scheme. I proposed to second the proposition of my hon. friend from British Columbia (Mr. McInnes), because it was a serious and complete proposition, which I thought was right; but I cannot vote for the vague amendment proposed from the other side of the House.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I ask hon. members to bear with me for a moment while I advert to a personal matter which arose in connection with the hon. leader of the Opposition. The hon. gentleman made a distinct and positive statement that I had been guilty of an attempt to mislead the House in quoting the Montreal "Witness," and that in doing so I quoted part of the article, and when asked to read the balance said I would read the balance and I proceeded to read a portion of the article further down on the page. The evident intention of the hon. gentleman was to convey the impression to the House that I had read a portion of the article and then skipped a portion for the purpose of misleading the House by omitting a portion of the article that did not bear out my argument. I have taken the trouble to obtain the newspaper from which I made the quotation. I need not delay the House by reading it at the present moment; but I desire to say, what I said when I interrupted the hon. gentleman, that I made the quotation with absolute accuracy, line for line and letter for letter. If the hon. gentleman intended that I misquoted or attempted to mislead the House there is not a particle of foundation for the statement. I give the House the date of the paper in which the article appeared which I quoted, the Montreal "Witness," of February 11th, and the article is on the editorial page. In column 598 of the "Hansard," members of the House will read the quotation, and in a moment they will see that I began at the beginning of the article and went down and read as much as I wished to quote. The hon. member for West Assinibolia asked me to continue reading the article, and I said:

I trust that the hon. member for Assinibolia (Mr. Davin) will allow this debate to terminate without addressing the House on the subject, and he will have an opportunity of reading the article himself when he comes to speak.

So every hon. member must have known that I had not read the whole article, but I read from the first word continuously, line for line and letter for letter until I had read that portion I intended to quote. So there is not the slightest foundation for the hon. gentleman's statement. As a matter of fact, this hon. gentleman who has been so long in public life, in making his quotations in his original speech did the very identical thing he accused me of doing. He read the first portion of this very article; he then skipped a portion of the article and went on to another part, having left out the part that did not bear favourably on his contention. Hon. gentlemen will find that to be the case by looking at pages 565 and 568 of the "Hansard." They will find that the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) quoted there as a continuous article, only a portion of this article, and left out that portion which I quoted afterwards and which bore unfavourably on the contention he was making. The hon. gentleman stands in the position of having accused me of an attempt to mislead the House by misquot'ng, when, as a matter of fact, I did nothing of the kind, and when he originally did the very thing he accused me of in the same article.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Mr. Speaker, I do not intend at this late hour of the night, or rather at this early hour of the morning, to occupy the time of the House for more than five minutes, but as I come from a western constituency and one deeply interested in this question, it is only right that I should give vent briefly to my views. I shall commence by saying that I intend to support the Bill before the House, and I shall support it for the good reason that I consider it is in the interest of the constituency I represent and in the interests of the Dominion as a whole. I do not agree with my colleague from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) when he says, that all the trade of the Yukon will be lost to the North-west Territories, because this railway runs from the coast. As a matter of fact, I know that at the present time we have a large coast trade in flour in the county I represent, and I believe there is a larger similar trade done by the constituency of Alberta. It is a well known fact that the duty on flour—that is the principal thing we export from our district—of 30 cents a sack will prohibit the American flour from going in there. We have good reason to suppose also, that if the American flour or produce comes in, the Canadian Pacific Railway will protect their own trade, and they would reduce their freight rates to such an extent as to enable us to retain the trade of that country. We have a precedent for this, because we know that the Canadian Pacific Railway reduced the freight rates into the Kootenay in order to enable Canadians to do that trade.

Let me say a word about the overland route mentioned as running from Edmonton to the Yukon. While I quite agree with the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) that there should be an inland road built in the near future—I would not say from Edmonton, but from some point in the North-west Territories—I think he will agree with me that such a road could not be built in less than three years. In the meantime, if we had to wait for three years to get an opening into that country, the trade in the interval would go to the United States, and it is a well known fact that, when trade once gets into a certain channel, it is a most difficult thing to divert it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver), basing his calculation on the cost of the Calgary and Edmonton road, told us that this road could be built from Edmonton to the Yukon for $8,000 a mile. Now, Sir, it is a well known fact that the Calgary and Edmonton Railway runs through a prairie country which is as level as a plank, and where a road can be constructed cheaply. But, when you go north of Edmonton and into the Yukon district, the conditions change completely, and in place of that railway costing $8,000 a mile, I am satisfied that it would cost not less than $30,000 a mile. When we take into consideration that the Intercolonial Railway cost $32,000 a mile, my estimate is not far out, that the road from Edmonton would cost the amount of money I have said. As I understand the position of the Opposition, it shows that they have gone back on their former policy of giving lands to subsidize railways, and so that we must take it for granted that they intend that this road from the interior should be built by a cash subsidy. A conservative estimate of the cost of that road would be $30,000,000, and I wonder if hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to mortgage the finances of this country to such an extent. I am opposed, and always have been, to giving our lands away to subsidize railways of any kind. However, my judgment always was that that rule should apply only to agricultural lands. The Opposition object to the Government giving 25,000 acres a mile of these Klondike lands to subsidize the Teslin Lake road. Now, Sir, it is a well known fact that this road will cost not less than $25,000 a mile, so that an estimated value of the land grant would be about $1 an acre. The policy of the Conservative party has been heretofore to give 6,200 acres of agricultural lands per mile, to subsidize railways in the Territories, which railways only cost $8,000 per mile to construct. When they did this, they were not giving away lands without any known value as the Government is doing today, but they were giving away the choicest agricultural lands in the North-west Territories and Manitoba; lands that we know are valuable and that are going to be valuable as long as this world lasts. The Yukon lands are of no value whatever, except that minerals may be found on them, and even that is very doubtful. I venture to say that these lands given the contractors in the present case, are such that gold will not be found on more than one acre out of ten thousand acres. The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) claimed that the Government were giving away half of the whole Yukon territory to the contractors, and he held that if a free miner went into that country and made a strike and found gold, Mackenzie & Mann would go to work and blanket all the lands in that locality. If the estimate be correct, that from 100,000 to 200,000 free miners will go into that country this summer, and they are going in now in large numbers, we may take it for granted that many of them will find their way to the Yukon before the first of June.

The contractors will not be able to get an acre of their land grant until the middle of the summer; so that, if there are 100,000 free miners roaming over the country, they will blanket nearly all the creeks before Mackenzie & Mann get there at all. Hon. gentlemen opposite say they want a wagon road from Edmonton to the Yukon. I fancy I know something about this matter, because I have lived in the North-west a good many years, and I claim that a wagon road which people could travel on could not be built. You would have to build a wagon road 1,200 miles long, and it would take parties at least four months to go from Edmonton to the Yukon by such a road. Besides, over 600 miles of that country has not been explored, and we do not know whether there would be fodder for animals or not, and it would not be possible to haul enough fodder to feed the animals that would be required for packing. Nature has provided good highways in that country in the waterways. We have the Athabasca River running into Lake Athabasca, then the Slave River running into Great Slave Lake, and then the Mackenzie River, by which over a small portage you can reach the Porcupine River, which takes you into the Yukon. There are only three portages in the whole distance. If a small amount of money were spent on these, you would have a waterway all the distance from the town of Prince Albert to the Yukon and, as it is all down stream, it would be a very cheap and easy way of getting into the country. I want to read a short extract from a statement by Mr. Moberly, a chief factor of the Hudson Bay Company who has spent forty years of his life in the northern country, who was in charge of all the posts between Fort McMurray and Fort Yukon, and who knows whereof he speaks:

A direct overland route from Edmonton to Peace River in summer is almost impossible on account of swamps. It must run up close to the foothills of the Rocky Mountains, where they will have to cross deep ravines and through large timber, making the expense of opening a wagon road enormous.

A letter appeared in the Ottawa "Free Press" of to-day that was sent by a couple of young men who left here some time ago and went over the Edmonton overland route. They lost their horses, and they are now going by the waterways which I speak of. Now, I believe the Government have done right in this matter. If we are going to have 200,000 people in that country during the coming summer, it is a matter of necessity that we must provide some means of communication into the country before next winter. We can estimate what it would take to provide 200,000 people with food and clothing during the winter, and how long a time it would take to haul that over a wagon road such as the leader of the Opposition advocated.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Borden (Halifax).

That the Bill No. 6, an Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company, be not now read a second time, but that it be Resolved, That this House while recognizing the necessity of providing adequate facilities for transportation into the Canadian Yukon gold fields, regards as indefensible the terms and conditions of the proposed contract, but will cordially support the grant of substantial assistance in aid of the immediate construction of a railway on the best available route, under such conditions and safeguards as will prevent the creation of any railway or mining monopoly.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan).

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would suggest to my hon. friend that we proceed from day to day with the committee stage of the Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think I will have to ask my hon. friend to proceed in the usual way in this case. There has been no opportunity, as he knows for dealing with any private business, and I think he should place his motion on the Notice paper in the ordinary way.

The PRIME MINISTER. That will only give Monday, because I think it is only fair that we should take this up Tuesday and proceed with it from day to day.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should like to call the attention of my hon. friend to a telegram which appeared in the New York press as coming from Ottawa

New York, March 10.—The "Press" has the following from Ottawa:—"Sir Julian Pauncefote has informed the Canadian Ministry officially that he has arranged a convention with the United States, whereby the Alaskan boundary dispute has been settled. Under the terms of the convention the British Government has conceded the claim of the United States that the three marine leagues should be measured from the shore of the mainland, and should proceed along the shores of the inlets, which are thus recognized as arms of the ocean, and not as rivers. The contention of the British and of the Canadian Governments was that the three-league limit should begin on the oceanward side of the island, and that the delimitating line should be run across the inlets and not follow their shores. These inlets are numerous, and extend into the mainland a great distance, and the decision, therefore, is of much importance to the United States. The United States has agreed to the British retaining the boundary on the limit of Chilkoot Pass and the White Pass, because in the Russo-British agreement of 1825 the line of demarcation was fixed as one running along the tops of mountains. The decision, while not entirely unexpected by the Cabinet, is regarded with disfavour. It was understood that the British Government was irritated at the forwardness of the Canadian Ministry, but it was not thought that the surrender would be so sweeping as it is.

I read this to my hon. friend, as it has been put in my hands, and as it appears to have been forwarded from Ottawa to New York press. I do not, for a moment, suppose it possible that it contains the truth, but I draw the attention of my hon. friend to it. In this connection, some measures ought to be taken to prevent, if possible, communications of this kind being sent to the United States press by the Ottawa press. Certainly, so far as this House has any jurisdiction over the parties connected with it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I need not tell my hon. friend that there is not a word of truth in all that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not expect there was.

Motion agreed to, and the House, adjourned at 5.15 a.m. (Friday).

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 11th March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 66) respecting the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company.—(Mr. Rutherford, by Mr. Flint.)

Bill (No. 67) to incorporate the London and Lake Huron Railway Company.—(Mr. Lister, by Mr. Flint.)

Bill (No. 68) respecting the Montfort Colonization Railway Company, and to change its name to the Montfort and Gatineau Colonization Railway Company.—(Mr. Bourassa.)

Bill (No. 69) respecting the Kingston and Pembroke Railway Company.—(Mr. Britton.)

RESTRICTION ON JAPANESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. McINNES moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 70) to amend the Chinese Immigration Act so as to extend its application to Japanese—and to provide for a more equitable distribution of the revenue derived therefrom. He said: In briefly explaining the provisions of the Bill I may say that it contemplates extending the restrictions which are now placed upon Chinese immigration, to the immigration of Japanese. You are aware that we now impose a tax of $50 per head upon Chinese immigrants. My hon. friend from Burrard (Mr. Maxwell), has introduced a Bill this session to increase that restriction to $500 per head. The Bill I introduced to-day contemplates a similar increase on the immigration of Japanese. When this Bill comes up for the second reading I will be prepared to go over the reasons why a similar restriction should be placed upon the people of that nationality. There is a common idea that there exists a material distinction between the character of the Japanese and the Chinese, in consequence of which some people may be disposed to place a restriction upon the immigration of Chinese while they are not prepared to place a restriction upon the immigration of Japanese. I may say, however, Mr. Speaker, in reference to that view that the only class of Chinese that are aimed at under the present Act are the lowest class, and the only class of Japanese that it is contemplated to exclude by this Bill, are the lowest class, the class that come to our country as labourers of the most degraded and menial sort, who are practically slaves, and against whom it is absolutely impossible for white labourers to successfully compete. Another feature of this Bill deals with the distribution of the revenue which is derived under the Chinese Act. As you are aware, the province in which the revenue is collected is entitled under the present Act to one-quarter of the revenue. Now, it has been found by experience that, by reason of the large number of Chinese in British Columbia, the expenses of maintaining jails, asylums, hospitals, and for the administration of justice, are very materially increased. In addition, the people of that province are also put to the expense of maintaining a station for Chinese lepers exclusively, because there are no others. Now, it is felt out there that if we are compelled to have this wretched class of humanity among us, we should not at least be placed in any position of pecuniary disadvantage on account of their presence. I do not think it can be contended for a moment that this is a kind of tax from which the Dominion should seek to raise a revenue further than may be required to defray the expenses of the working of the Act. Any revenue over and above that may fairly be handed over to the province which has to make so large an increased expenditure on account of the presence of the Chinese. With these explanations I move the first reading of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 71) further to amend the Weights and Measures Act. He said: I would like to draw the attention of the House to some provisions in this Bill. Two or three days ago the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin), introduced a Bill which he asked me afterwards to incorporate in this Bill; therefore, I think it might be well to give some explanations to those hon. members who may take an interest in the changes that I propose to make.

The second section of the Bill fixes the weights per bushel of various grains and produce raised by our farmers. When we go into Committee of the Whole I may take occasion to compare these weights with the weights prevailing up to this time, and hon. members will then be able to appreciate the nature of the changes proposed. I may mention one among them, one which we are requested to make by the farmers of the North-west, where, it is known, they raise a great quantity of flaxseed. Up to this time, and according to the weight of law which I am now seeking to amend, a bushel of flaxseed was fixed at 60 pounds. Now, it happens that in England and in the States, and wherever flaxseed is raised, a bushel is only taken to weigh 56 pounds; while here according to the present law, our farmers are obliged, if they sell by the bushel, to deliver 60 pounds. It has been thought advisable, among other changes, to recommend that change, and to put the bushel at the same weight as that which is allowed for a bushel in other countries. There are several other questions that are likely to arise. For instance, the hon. member for Laval has introduced a Bill for altering the legal weight of a bushel of potatoes. According to the law as it stands to-day a bushel of potatoes ought to weigh 60 pounds. Hon. members read quotations from the "Witness" and other Montreal papers, and drew attention to the fact that this weight of 60 pounds is only reached when the potatoes come out of the ground and are in a more or less damp condition and there are particles of soil attached to them. When they have been kept a few months their weight is considerably reduced. As it happens that in nearly all the large cities municipal by-laws provide for the confiscation of goods sold on the market when they do not come up to the weight prescribed by law, it becomes necessary to reduce the standard weight to suit the average size of bags. A number of cases were quoted by the hon. member for Laval in which potatoes were confiscated because the bags were short by two pounds.

There is another question, and it is a very complicated one in regard to hardship endured by farmers in connection with the sale of milk to dealers. It was brought before the House on two different occasions, in 1892 and 1893. In 1893, as I see by "Hansard," there was a very full discussion of the subject. Milk forwarded to cities is sent in cans on the morning trains, these cans being supplied by the dealers, and the milk is afterwards emptied into smaller cans and delivered to customers. At one time it was agreed that these cans should represent 8 gallons; but lately when the dealers have supplied the cans it has been found that many of them hold 9 or 9½ gallons, and this is the ground of complaint by the farmers. Of course the cans must be filled, otherwise the milk will suffer while in transit in the cars, and it can easily be understood that when a farmer supplies ten or twenty cans a day and he finds each can contains 9 or 9½ gallons and is only paid for 8 gallons, he has a ground for serious complaint, and this complaint is very general, especially by farmers in the neighbourhood of Toronto. During the discussion in 1893 the hon. member for Stanstead stated that the department had attempted to grapple with the question, but it had proved one of the greatest difficulty. The officers could not be expected to remain on the market so as to ascertain what use was made of measures or scales, and it is easy to see how difficult it would be for any department to carry out such an inspection. It was proposed at one time to adopt the standard which we are trying to introduce all round, namely, sale by weight. This system does not appear to be practicable in the case of milk on account of confusion that would arise on the arrival of milk trains containing a large number of cans. When the House is in committee on this Bill I trust hon. members will endeavour to aid in arriving at some adequate system to remove the existing hardship, for it is evidently our duty to try and introduce some remedy.

The third clause provides for the more frequent verification of scales and weights. By the present law there is only one inspection made in two years for which the department, has a right to charge, and even then the expenses are so great that there is a deficiency every year of about $40,000. There are two classes of inspection, compulsory and non-compulsory. What may be called non-compulsory may include bakers, grocers, confectioners and others of that class. The people can protect themselves if there is fraud in the use of scales used by these classes of traders. If a man goes to a grocery and buys five pounds of sugar, either he or his wife will soon find out if the weight is light, and the purchaser can then go to another grocer or baker and is not obliged to trade with the man who has cheated him. So the Government does not propose to ask for any change of the law in regard to these classes, because the public can protect themselves. But there are other cases which come under the compulsory class that it is important should be dealt with, I refer to grain elevators, coal scales and scales at railway stations. If a farmer takes to an elevator two or three loads of wheat he has to accept the weight given, for he cannot go elsewhere on account of the question of travelling, as the nearest elevator may be 50 or 60 miles away.

In the coal mines of Cape Breton the coal miners are paid by the ton. As hon. gentlemen know, the coal is dumped down on the scales sometimes from a great height, and it will be understood how impossible it is for these scales to stand the wear and tear of that system for two years, receiving as they do so many tons of coal per day. The workmen in the coal mines must be excused if, as is the case more or less with uneducated men, they mistrust the dealings of those for whom they work and so they have sent several protests against the present system and demand that the scales should be inspected more frequently than at present. If we want to make the miners feel that they receive justice, it is evident that our inspection will only be a farce if it is made only once in two years. We therefore propose under this Bill to place at the disposal of the mine-owners a certain number of our fifty-pound and other weights, and to try to induce the employers to agree with their workmen to test the scales as frequently as it is felt there is ground for complaint. It is thought that in each mine an intelligent workman would be found who had the confidence of his fellow-workmen, and whom they would select to represent them at the inspection of the scales. There would be a representative of the mine-owners on the other side, and thus it would be insured without any additional expense that the scales were correct. By this proposal we would also accomplish the very desirable result of establishing mutual confidence between the mine-owners and their workmen.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman says he has provided for the verification of the scales in the case of coal mines. Does the Bill apply to other large operations in business, where there is a great deal bought and sold and weighed over the same scale?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It would be well to apply that verification of scales to other industries as well as to coal mines, but there are certain difficulties in the way. It is very easy to select a man to represent the workmen in a coal mine where there is a large staff of miners gathered together, but in the case of wheat elevators, for instance, this would be difficult, as the farmers who are interested in the latter are scattered all over the country. If it would be possible to find a man residing near an elevator who would have the confidence of the farmers, and who would assume the responsibilities, I would be only too glad to meet this case and to send a set of these fifty or twenty-five pound weights to the elevators. I attach great importance to the fostering of confidence between the two parties interested, namely, the farmer or miner on one side, and the owner of the elevator or mine on the other. It will be seen at once that this change will entail no extra expenditure. What makes the expense at the present with our Weights and Measures Act is that inspectors have to travel miles over the country with a load of weights in order to test these heavy scales. By this system we can save the time and expense of sending an inspector. There is another matter which this Bill is intended to provide for. It is a singular fact that while in England and the United States—I do not know as to other mercantile countries—spring scales are admitted to inspection, they have never been so admitted in Canada. We have had voluminous requests from dealers all over the Dominion asking that we should inspect spring scales, but the department has had a natural reluctance to grant the request, for the reason that in an ordinary beam scale everything is open to the naked eye and any person can see that it is correct, while in the case of the spring scale the mechanism is completely out of sight, and one can readily understand that if the spring is not of the best quality it may get rusty or strained, and then it becomes inaccurate. I believe, however, that the time has come when we should give our retail traders the advantages of the inspection of these spring scales.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question with regard to the official who is supposed to look after the scales at the mines, particularly at the mines of Cape Breton. Does the hon. gentleman mean that this Bill is only to apply to the mines at Cape Breton?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Oh, no. It is to be general. I only mentioned the mines of Cape Breton as an example. Last year we decided to have a special inspection made for these mines, at the request of the parties interested. As the hon. gentleman knows, there are a large number of mines there in a small compass.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). While economy in various directions is very commendable, yet I think the public is quite willing that a certain expenditure should be made in order that the public interest in this, as in other matters, should be protected. In the Island of Cape Breton, in a comparatively small area there is a population of 100,000 people. That island, I may say in passing, was for thirty-six years a province of itself, with all the paraphernalia appertaining to a government. For years past there was an inspector of weights and measures in that island; but with a view to economy, as the hon. Minister has stated in a letter to myself, that office has been wiped out. Whether an unpaid official such as that honest man he referred to, can be picked up at every mine, and whether such a man would be in a position to perform his duty so as to give satisfaction to the mine-owners and the miners, remains to be seen. This is a new measure, and one we are quite unacquainted with in that part of the country. At first blush, it appears to me, that it would be a case of what is everybody's business is nobody's business, and when there is no regular and permanent official to see that justice is done. I fear that the business of looking after the weights and measures will be neglected. When this Bill is up for its second reading, I will be prepared to go into the question as to whether the law proposed to be introduced by this Bill can with advantage be applied to the Island of Cape Breton.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. When we provide for calling both parties, the owner of the mine and the workmen together, it is not for the regular inspection, and we provide for an appeal to the inspector.

Mr. McDougall. I am very glad to know that it is the intention of the hon. Minister to provide for more frequent inspection of the scales and measures used in connection with the development of our coal mines. I had the honour, a few days ago, to present several petitions from the miners of Cape Breton, asking for a more frequent inspection of the scales used in the weighing of coal at the mines. Those petitions set forth that, for various reasons, the scales are not considered to be properly or sufficiently inspected, and they ask for a monthly inspection. I understand, from the explanation given by the hon. Minister, that he proposes to amend the Act so as to give power to the miners to have a local inspection, so to speak, by a person in the immediate vicinity of the coal mines, who will be available at any time in case of difference between themselves and the proprietors of the mines in respect to the scales. In that connection, I would like to understand from the hon. Minister, whether the intention is to have that inspector appointed by the Government, or whether he will consent to give the miners, so long as, I understand, there is no salary attached to the position, the option of selecting from among themselves a suitable man at each coal mine for this purpose—a man who would also have the confidence of the coal mine proprietors or act in conference with their representatives. I would further recommend, that in case of a dispute, it should be in the power of the aggrieved party to call to their assistance the services of the general inspector of the district. As I understand, at present, in the Island of Cape Breton, there is no inspector. The late inspector having died about two years ago, his position has not been filled, and the inspection is not attended to. Understanding that it is the intention to appoint one, I would like the hon. Minister to keep in view the necessity of having this paid official of the department within as near reach as possible of the great centres of those coal mines where the greatest and most important business is being done. Moreover, in case of calling upon the chief inspector, which is frequently likely to occur, the expenses to the department would be much less by having him within as convenient reach as possible. These are points which I would like the hon. Minister to understand as important to the people of my constituency and the public generally, particularly to those who are interested in this matter, and who have petitioned for this amendment to the Inspection Act.

Mr. Maclean. I would like to ask the hon. Minister, if it is his intention to introduce legislation providing for a standard milk can?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. A moment ago, I explained to the House the difficulty that exists of providing for that, and I referred to what took place in 1892 and 1893. If my hon. friend likes, I will be very glad to go with him over the discussion which took place at that time, as reported in "Hansard," and from which he will see the difficulty that exists. When we are in the Committee of the Whole, it will be the time to consider these details.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADULTERATION ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 72) to amend the Adulteration Act. He said: Considerable expenditure is undertaken by the Dominion Government in efforts to prevent the adulteration of food and fertilizers, a very important work in the interest of the public. We have found it difficult under the existing Act, however, to reach the parties who are really guilty of offences against the law. Our officers, for instance, go to a town or city and collect from dealers samples of food offered for sale—mustard, honey, coffee, and so on. The samples thus collected are submitted to the analyst. But, even where adulteration is proven, very often the dealer from whom the sample has been got is not the party morally guilty of adulteration. As we feel sure that these parties are not guilty, in many cases we do not sue them, and in that case, the $10 or $12 paid to the analyst, as well as the expense of collecting the samples is so much lost. We wish to provide means to reach the really guilty party, who, in many cases, is the manufacturer who put up the goods which are offered for sale by the retailer. It is provided in the Bill that if the dealer in whose hands the adulterated articles are found testifies, giving the name of the manufacturer from whom he bought the goods, the manufacturer will be prosecuted and the retailer called as a witness. In one word the object of the Bill is to provide an easier and cheaper mode of reaching parties who are guilty of adulteration. My hon. friend Mr. Wood (Brockville) will know from his experience, how difficult it has been to carry out the law in this respect.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I do not desire to discuss the Bill at this stage. But I may say that I sympathize with the hon. gentleman's efforts to improve the law respecting adulteration. I would ask the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue if any steps have been taken, based upon the British law, to make standards of pure food?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. When my hon. friend reads the Bill he will see that a good many of these matters have been dealt with. I cannot say that we have met every case, but I may mention that attempt is made to distinguish between adulteration with articles that are of an noxious character and adulteration with harmless substances.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Sir HENRI JOLY DE LOTBINIERE.

GAS INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 73) to amend the Gas Inspection Act. He said: This is a Bill of only two or three lines. Hitherto the classification of gas companies for the collection of the yearly fees has been based on the number of customers. But in many cases one customer has several meters. The object of the Bill is to base the classification upon the number of meters and not upon the number of customers.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PETROLEUM INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 74) to amend the Petroleum Inspection Act. He said: This is a Bill of only two sections. Under the present law petroleum in unmarked packages must not be kept or offered for sale. It is difficult, however, in many cases to prove that the oil has been kept or offered for sale. Of course as my hon. friend knows, a great deal of petroleum is smuggled. The object of this Bill is to provide that even the having in possession of petroleum in unmarked packages shall be an infringement of the law.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INLAND REVENUE ACT.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 75) further to amend the Inland Revenue Act. He said: I need not take up the time of the House in explaining at this stage the different clauses of the Bill. I may, however, mention one point. I was much astonished when, some time ago, I found that the courts had dismissed one of the cases brought by the department for illicit distillation. The still was found in the defendant's possession, but as it was not found on his premises nor in the house he occupied, the law as it now stands, would not cover the case.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 76) to provide for the abolition of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and for the retirement of members of the civil service. He said: This is in the exact language of the Bill which I had the honour to introduce last session, and provides for the abolition of the present Civil Service Superannuation Act and the substitution therefor of an Act for the retirement of civil servants, the two Bills being radically different. I need not point out the features of the present law, as they are familiar to all hon. gentlemen. The present Bill provides for the creation of a retirement fund by deductions from the salaries of officials, and by these deductions being funded and placed to the credit of the officials, and interest computed thereon every half year at the rate of 5 per cent. The fund so created will belong to the officer or his legal representatives whenever the officer ceases to be in the service. In this respect it differs materially from the present law, which only contemplates a retiring fund for the benefit of the officer himself during his lifetime, making no provision whatever for his family. To-day if a civil servant dies in harness, his family gets nothing, his contributions go to the survivors on a sort of tontine principle, so it works hardly on the families of those who die in the service. This Bill provides, as I have intimated, for a fund that should belong to the officer himself or his family in case of death; but it is not within the reach of creditors, or assignable during his period of office. It will be a fund that will enable an officer to withdraw from the service if his interests suggests it. At present when a man enters the civil service his whole interest under the Act is to continue in it during his life. That state of affairs is perhaps not desirable, as it keeps the officers almost in a position of bondage to the Crown, for they cannot retire except under certain conditions set forth in the Act and have any advantage. Therefore they linger in the service when perhaps their own interest and the interest of the public would be served if they withdrew from it. Under the proposed substituted Bill they will always have this fund within their grasp in case they desire to separate themselves from the service. Many other reasons may suggest themselves for the Bill, but without mentioning them, I move for leave to introduce it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not rise for the purpose of offering any remarks upon the explanation of the Postmaster General with regard to this Bill, but I desire to ask him, in anticipation of a motion on the paper which may not be reached for some time, to lay upon the Table of the House the information asked for with reference to the superannuations that have already taken place. I think it is desirable that we should have that information before we come to a second reading of this Bill. I allude to the information that was asked for connected with the superannuations that have taken place within a comparatively recent period.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. An order of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The notice has been given, but as I say, it may not be reached for some time.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We will reach it on Monday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That will probably answer the purpose.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have no doubt that when the House makes the order it will be complied with promptly. At the same time I do not see that the Bill in question is in any way connected with the matters to which my hon. friend refers.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If we had these facts before us, it would assist hon. gentlemen a good deal by showing the absolute necessity of taking the powers of superannuation now existing out of the hands of the Government.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We propose to take the exercise of superannuation out of the hands of the Government altogether by this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

POSTAL FACILITIES IN THE KOOTENAY DISTRICT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of Day are called, I want to call the attention of the Postmaster General, and of the Minister of Customs, to a matter of a very urgent character. I will read a telegram which I received early this morning: From Sand Point, B.C.

The arrangements made by the Government for postal facilities, customs accommodations and other improvements necessary to develop the resources of the Kootenay district in conjunction with the construction of the Crow's Nest Railway, are seriously obstructed and the contractors harassed beyond conception by the apathy of postal department and cast-iron rules of the customs. A certified cheque for $200 was posted by the manager Union Bank, Macleod, on 1st March to customs, Crow's Nest Landing, B.C., to pay duties. The bank wired to that effect, but the orders are "hard cash" or "hold up." This part of British Columbia produces nothing but mountain and refractory ore, so we have to get our forage and other produce from Montana, forty-five miles south of the railway line. There are no facilities for storage, and our oats and hay are piled out in the open, subject to pilferage and other discrepancies till our bank cheque arrives. next Wednesday, 16th instant, or the time it would take me to go half around the world. Kindly help me out and hand this to Press Gallery.

I thought the better course to adopt was to bring this despatch under the immediate notice of the Post Office Department and the Department of Customs.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Can the hon. gentleman say who signs the telegram?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is signed by R. B. Dixon, purchasing agent for Egan & Co. I do not know the parties. The telegram explains fully the matter; that the Customs Department, although they had information from the manager of the bank that there was a cheque for the purpose, refuse to take an accepted cheque, given under authority of the manager of the bank, and therefore all the goods have been left in the open until postal facilities enable this company to be able to comply with the demand. There must be something radically wrong in the administration of the department to permit such a monstrous inconvenience to parties to whom this may be a matter of the very gravest consequence.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Pater-son). All I can say is, that so far as I am personally aware, what the hon. gentleman has read is news to me. Whether there is any correspondence in the department or anything of that kind I will at once take steps to ascertain. The writer of the telegram does not state that he has had any communication with the department.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He states what the action of the department was.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It is giving prominence to a complaint which may not be well founded.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He takes the responsibility of making the complaint.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). So far as my knowledge goes, this is the first time I am made aware of anything wrong in the postal facilities at Sand Point, Kootenay, to serve a moving body of contractors who are constructing several miles of railway per day. It occurs to me that the proper course of procedure in regard to departmental matter is not to publish telegrams in the press, but to apply to the proper department to deal with the matter, and if thereafter the case is not dealt with, it then may become a grievance and ground for complaint. If the hon. gentleman had in advance furnished me with the information I would now have been in a position to state whether the matter had ever been before the department. I observe from the telegram that these contractors are exceedingly anxious to purchase agricultural supplies at Montana in the United States. That may be a very necessary step and it may not; and I should like to know the necessities of the case before, for my part, I am prepared to lend assistance in purchasing supplies in the United States, if they can be purchased in Canada.

MUNICIPAL REGULATIONS IN THE YUKON.

Mr. DAVIN. I desire to ask the Minister of the Interior this question: Pending the introduction of the legislation promised in the Speech from the Throne respecting the Yukon district, what modus vivendi has been established between the Department of the Interior and the Government of the North-west Territories as regards the municipal government of the Yukon? Take, for instance, one detail. As regards liquor permits, a number of my constituents are anxious to get information, which I am not in a position to give them, as to whether the permission to allow liquor to enter the Yukon is at the present moment under the control of the local government or under the control of the Government at Ottawa. I do not wish to raise a question of law as to the party in whom the authority inheres—I have an opinion on that question myself—but I apprehend that some arrangement has been come to between the department and the North-west Government; and what I want to know is, under whose authority issuance of permits in the Yukon rests, if any.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I desire to say in reply to the hon. gentleman that in so far as municipal law and regulations are concerned, the Yukon district is in the same position as any unorganized portions of the North-west Territories, and is administered in the same way. No change has been made, and it is not necessary to anticipate the introduction of the legislation which will be brought down during the present session of Parliament. So far as liquor permits are concerned, the matter is in abeyance, as I stated in the House some time ago in answer to a question respecting the Yukon. The Government of the North-west Territories claim that permits should be issued by the Lieutenant-Governor, with the advice of his Executive Council. That is not the interpretation placed on the statute by the Government here; but there is no real dispute between the two Governments.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. Minister state what is the interpretation put on the statute by the Government here.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The Government consider that the changes that took place in the constitution of the North-west Territory have not altered the position so far as issuing permits are concerned, but the matter has been held in abeyance and no permits are being issued either by the Governor of the North-west Territories or by this Government, and will not be issued until the matter has been finally settled. Correspondence has taken place, and it has been suggested by myself that one of the members of the North-west Territorial Government should come to Ottawa for the purpose of discussing the matter with the members of the Government here. That is the way the matter stands at the present time—nothing is being done.

THE TRANSPORTATION QUESTION.

Mr. MAOLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to draw the attention of the House to a very important matter in regard to the transportation question, and in order to put myself in order I intend to conclude my remarks with a motion. We have heard a good deal in this House with respect to the Yukon Railway proposition, that it was one which was urgent. There is another and a still greater proposition before this country, which was outlined in yesterday's "Globe," in which there is no such urgency as is put forward in behalf of the Yukon proposition, and it is in order to bring this question before the House and give the Government an opportunity to institute some new departure in regard to the railway question that I now bring this matter up. The article in question appears on the first page of yesterday's "Globe," and is headed "The Railway Situation," and there is a second heading, "Great Projects Now Before Parliament for the Development of the Country." The article, after the introduction, goes on to say:

Not since the completion of the main line of the C.P.R. have so many great railway enterprises been before the public. The C.P.R. is pushing through the Crow's Nest Pass into southern British Columbia to tap the rich fields of the Kootenay and ultimately to reach the coast.

It then proceeds to give further details in respect to the Crow's Nest Pass line, and continues:

MANITOBA'S NEW OUTLET.

But while the Canadian Pacific has secured for itself this profitable field, its grasp of another important portion of its traffic is unquestionably loosening. There has long been a feeling in the province of Manitoba against the Canadian Pacific Railway because of alleged excessive rates charged for carrying grain to the east, and especially to Fort William during the season of navigation. An attempt was made some years ago to secure railway competition by subsidizing the Northern Pacific Railway to extend its lines from the American border northward into Manitoba; that extension failed of its purpose, although not altogether useless. Mr. Greenway and his associates cast about for another means of securing cheaper freights to Lake Superior, and for some time negotiations were conducted with a view to securing a railway from Winnipeg to Duluth. Not a little opposition was aroused in eastern Canada to this proposal as one little calculated to bind the provinces closer together. Mr. Greenway was urged to secure his competing line through Canada instead of diverting trade to the ports of the United States. The belief is that arrangements have been practically completed compassing this end. The Ontario and Rainy River Railway, the charter of which is controlled by Mr. William Mackenzie, of Toronto, is projected to run from a point on the Port Arthur, Duluth and Western (a short line running out of Port Arthur) through the gold fields of the Lake of the Woods region to a point on the boundary of Manitoba. It will be met there by the Manitoba and South-eastern Railway, the charter of which is also controlled by Mr. Mackenzie, and which, if built, will earn a Dominion land grant. These two lines will give a new grain route from Manitoba to Lake Superior.

A Strong Combination.

It may be asked what advantage it will be for Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Greenway to arrange for a line to Lake Superior from Winnipeg so long as the C.P.R. holds the interior lines from which the grain must come to Winnipeg. The position is really simple. Between Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie there is a line called the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway, the charter of which contains a clause reserving to the Manitoba Government the right to grant running powers. From Portage la Prairie to Gladstone by the Manitoba North-western Railway a similar arrangement can be made. At Gladstone, the Dauphin Railway, built and controlled by Mr. Mackenzie, is reached, and it runs to Lake Winnipegosis. With the co-operation of the Manitoba Government, therefore, and the granting of the necessary running powers over the links mentioned, Mr. Mackenzie can secure a continuous line from Port Arthur to Lake Winnipegosis. This, however, is not all, for he is understood to have a considerable interest in the Hudson's Bay Railway, which would really be an extension of the Dauphin Railway, the construction of the latter road being the first stage of a road from Manitoba to the Bay. These railway-building projects are set forth here to show that the C.P.R.'s hold of Manitoba will be greatly lessened by the construction of the Ontario and Rainy River and the Manitoba South-eastern by Mr. Mackenzie and his associates.

Ontario and Rainy River Railway.

The time for commencing the Ontario and Rainy River Railway was extended to-day by the Railway Committee of the House of Commons, and in the course of the debate it was asserted that the Ontario and Rainy River charter had fallen into the hands of the C.P.R. This, of course, if true, would mean that the road, while it would still be of advantage to the Ontario gold fields, would be useless as a factor in the proposed scheme. Your correspondent is in a position to state that this assertion is absolutely untrue, and that it is the intention of the holders of the Ontario and Rainy River charter to build and operate in competition with the C.P.R. This notwithstanding the cordial relations existing between Mr. Mackenzie and the management of the C.P.R. It is indeed probable that the actual work of construction will be commenced this year on that part of the railway from Winnipeg to the Lake of the Woods. Here, therefore, we have a railway system in embryo involving the construction of 350 miles of road between Lake Superior and Winnipeg, and the establishment of lake connections with ports on Lakes Erie and Huron. Developments may be looked for during the session of the Manitoba Legislature, which begins to-day.

Then there is the third project and the writer goes on to explain something in connection with the Hudson Bay Railway, which I do not consider pertinent to the subject of my remarks. The writer goes on to say:

These projects total up to 2,200 miles, or over an eighth of the mileage of the existing railways of Canada. There is not one of them that a careful student of the development of the Dominion would put a veto upon as of no value to the country at large. They are grouped here, that the reader may see at a glance the chief projects now under way for the development of the transportation system of Canada.

I consider that we have reached the crucial point in the transportation problem of this country. An effort has been made to solve that problem in the interests of the people and particularly of the interests of the people of the North-west. It is the duty of the Government to see that whatever legislation comes before this House, security ought to be provided that this competition will take place. A private Bill will come before this House—the one referred to in this article and which has been reported by the committee to the House—for the granting of an extension of time for the beginning of the construction of the Rainy River Railway. It is the duty of the Government, before allowing this Bill to go through, to have a clause inserted which will secure to the people the great objects outlined in the article of the "Globe."

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is transgressing the rules if he takes advantage of a motion to adjourn to discuss any order on the paper.

Mr. MACLEAN. I only wish to draw the attention of the Government to this question of railway competition. My position is this, that this Rainy River Railway Bill which is now before the House must be so amended—

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Order.

Mr. MACLEAN. Then I shall say that my position is that the Government should take care that running rights are given to other railways over any new road running from Port Arthur to Winnipeg. I want the Canadian Pacific Railway to have running rights over this Rainy River Railway or any other road between Port Arthur and Winnipeg. I believe that most of all the Grand Trunk Railway ought to have running rights over any railway from Port Arthur to Winnipeg, which is in the receipt of Government subsidy. This railway is in receipt of a subsidy—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot mention a private company, but must confine his remarks to the general subject.

Mr. MACLEAN. What I wish to impress upon the Government is that provision ought to be made for the protection of the public by allowing all railways running rights over any new lines. The Grand Trunk Railway in particular should have running rights over any new railway chartered to reach the province of Manitoba. So should the Canadian Pacific Railway, and if this be done the public will be protected. Further, there ought to be complete control taken by the Government over the question of rates on any railway receiving a charter from this out. It will not do to put in a general clause, such as what is called the model clause, which is inserted in some Bills, but there should be a specific clause giving full protection to the people and full running powers to any railway in the country that may desire to obtain them. The country lying between Winnipeg and Port Arthur is the key to the whole transportation problem. It is like a funnel through which all traffic between east and west must pass, and the Government have the opportunity to-day to protect the public interests in a way they never had before. I trust that when any Bill comes before this House the Government will see that it provides sufficient protection to the public. Hon. members who come from the North-west, and who have in previous sessions complained of the tyranny of the Canadian Pacific Railway have now an opportunity to protect the interest of the country from which they come, and it rests upon them more than upon those of us who come from the east to see that that opportunity is not lost and protect the interests of not only Manitoba and the Territories but of British Columbia as well. Urgency is pleaded in connection with the Yukon Railway for the creation of a monopoly and the concession of a large land grant to the contractors and for the establishment in this country of a false measure of value, when acres of land are made the measure of value in connection with a railway proposition. Land is not the measure of value in this country; money is. Still it was said there was urgency, and we had to give lands and we had to give a monopoly. There is no reason for that to-day. The North-west is claiming consideration, the province of Manitoba is considering it, the province of Ontario is giving a large grant to it, and care must be taken now that the public interest should be protected. It is for this reason I call the attention of the Government to this article, and I trust the Government will make an explanation of what they intend to do and as to what protection they intend to afford the public treasury by allowing no private Bills to go through this House, which when once passed enables these corporations to take it in their hands to regulate and control the transportation question in this country. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. Before the Minister announces his policy on this question, I wish to add a few words to what has already been said. No public man in Canada to-day will deny that there is a strong and growing sentiment in favour of greater parliamentary control over railways. That sentiment is pressed upon our attention all over the country, and everywhere we see the evil effects of the loose system which now obtains, through the absence of control on behalf of the public, either by a railway commission or by Parliament itself. We, as representatives of the people, are induced to turn our attention to some means by which that evil can be remedied. It is held that while we subsidize railways liberally from the treasury of the country or bonus them by land or other grants and give them wide power in their franchises, it is also our duty to exercise control over them in the interests of the people whose property we give away. Year after year railway companies come to this Parliament for charters to build lines competing with those already established, and which existing lines perhaps may have been subsidized by both the Dominion and provincial Parliaments. The desire for railway competition is so strong that public sentiment supports the representatives of the people in incorporating these new companies, and also in giving subsidies to them. This action is taken for the purpose of securing better transportation facilities, and in order to guarantee railway competition. But no sooner is the competing line in operation than a secret agreement is reached putting the two roads under the one management, or the stock of both companies is bought up by one, and consequently the public receive no benefit whatever from the grants which they have made. The serious question then presents itself to us as to what we can do to gain that control over railways which up to the present we have failed to secure. These corporations are the creatures of this Parliament, but the creatures appear to be greater than their creators, and the public ask if it is not possible that some remedy be found for the existing state of affairs. If we subsidize two railways to get competition, and if our object in this direction is frustrated, why should Parliament not hold the control so that the public may get what they are entitled to on account of what they have paid. The great question is, how this end can be accomplished without our going too far. Some contend that Parliament should hold control over the roads even to the extent of determining what the freight rates should be, but I confess that I have never yet been able to see clearly the justice of our going that far, at all events, to the extent of Parliament saying just exactly what the freight rates should be. It appears to me that we could not be in possession of the data that would enable us accurately to calculate what would be a fair or unfair freight rate in every part of the country, for it must be remembered that we are not experts and have not devoted our time and attention to that business. But over and above what may take place under ordinary circumstances, there are extraordinary conditions arising out of the transportation question which Parliament ought to direct its attention to. If we do not think it wise to control the rates, we might go so far perhaps as to compel the great railway corporations to give other companies running powers over their lines, and in this way we might secure competition without building two railroads where one only is necessary to do the work and without involving the country in great additional expense. In the interests of the people of this country, and in order to settle this vexed question of the transportation of our products, Parliament should not only recognize that it has this right and power, but it should exercise that power over these corporations which we have created. We give them liberal subsidies, we give them extensive franchises, we put in their hands instruments by which they can coin money faster than can any other enterprises, by watering their stock and by manipulating their charters one way and another; and yet we leave them supreme to treat the public just as they please. The day is coming and coming soon, when Parliament cannot refrain from taking action in this matter, and when, if Parliament does refrain, then the electorate will send other representatives here to carry out their wishes. Those who are observant of public matters know that this sentiment is growing rapidly, becoming stronger every day, and that we cannot shut our eyes to it much longer. It is the duty of the Government to outline its policy with regard to these great questions. The sooner that is done the better, because it will quiet the feeling of resentment in the country to-day; a feeling which may grow to such proportions as to reach beyond our control. It is sometimes said that a railway commission will accomplish this, but to my mind the experience of the world so far has been that railway commissions, though undoubtedly they have done much good, have not been equal to the occasion. It is also said that parliamentary control, so far as it has been exercised in the past, has signally failed to secure to the people the advantages from the competition of railways to which they are entitled by reason of the large subsidies and grants they have given, but, though railway commissions have failed in the past, and though Parliament has hitherto failed to exercise this beneficial influence on railway corporations, that is no reason why we should become supine or refrain from attempting any other remedy. It is a strong reason why we should grapple with this great problem, and the earlier the better; and if the means at our disposal prove to be insufficient, we should devise others that will meet the case. I apprehend that we can at least go so far as to tack on to every railway charter which we grant the condition that every railway shall have the right to run over the road and carry the trade of the country over it, rather than subsidize another road for the purpose of giving competition, which the experience of the past has proven to us most conclusively it rarely gives. Parliament can-go that far, at least, and if the law is not sufficient to meet the case, we can amend it from time to time. But some people will say, you cannot run the traffic of two or three railways successfully over one line. We have illustrations to the contrary both in Canada and in the United States. I have here a clipping of a paper, which gives one or two illustrations of this, and I will read them for the benefit of those who think that cannot be done :

The track between Newark and Columbus, Ohio, thirty-three miles, was operated in common by the Baltimore and Ohio and the Pittsburg, Cincinnati and St. Louis railways for at least twenty-one years prior to 1887 ; also, the Cleveland and Toledo (afterwards the Lake Shore) and the Cleveland, Columbus and Cincinnati railroads made use of the track from Grafton, Ohio to Cleveland, a distance of twenty-four miles, for about twelve years prior to the same date above named.

Besides this, I need only mention the road from Toronto to Hamilton, one of the busiest roads in Canada. A portion of the New York Central road is also operated, and successfully operated, conjointly by two railways. By this means, we have the advantage of two railways with the cost of one. We have as much competition as we have in those cases where Parliament has subsidized two railways for the purpose of providing competition. There is no reason why what has been done in the cases I have cited cannot be done in others, and Parliament is justified in exercising that power whenever it is needed in the interest of the country. Take the road from Toronto to Gravenhurst. See how the trade of that section of country and of the great city of Toronto is hampered by the quarrels of two railway companies. Parliament subsidized, and subsidized liberally, one line, which is sufficient to carry all the trade, with the intention that it should be used by both railways. That could be done, if it were done agreeably by these two companies. But they have not done it, for reasons best known to themselves, but which are not known by this Parliament. Parliament designed that this should be done when it subsidized this line, in order that the benefit of competition should be secured over it ; but it is not secured and are we to sit idly by when the efforts we have made have proved abortive ? Rather this condition of things should stimulate us to use greater exertions to grapple with this growing and gigantic evil, and remedy it. It is for the purpose of putting myself on record with regard to this matter that I speak at the present time, for the purpose of letting the Government know what I regard as public opinion upon it, and for the purpose of getting some intimation from them at an early day as to what means they propose to Parliament to remedy this great evil which the public service are suffering and groaning under at the present time.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. JAMESON. Mr. Speaker, as I know a good deal about this proposed line, the opportunities of which have been referred to by the hon. member who alluded to it first, I would like to say a few words on the subject. It looks to me like a case of the most sudden conversion on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite that they should take the stand they have been taking, both in the late debate, and at present on the subject of railway monopoly. It is to the legislation of hon. gentlemen opposite that we owe all the difficulties under which the North-west is labouring to-day in the matter of railways. We are tied up in such a way that it becomes a very serious problem for the Government how they can relieve the people of the west from the situation in which they have been placed. We know that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was given certain great privileges such as have never been given to any other railway company in the world. It was given a transportation monopoly which caused almost a rebellion in the North-west, and which was bought off at a great cost to the people of this country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What the hon. gentleman says was bought off at a great cost to the people of Canada, I am in a position to tell him has never cost Canada one dollar and never will. The concessions made by the railway company are advantages to us, by which, instead of paying money, we are receiving it.

Mr. JAMESON. The people of Canada had to pay a large sum of money to get that privilege. It may be that owing to the settlement of that country it has not cost the people of Canada anything in money ; but I can tell the hon. gentleman that it cost the people of Canada a great deal in the loss of immigration it caused. There is no doubt that immigration has been greatly hindered by the existence of that monopoly. I have lived in that country for seventeen years, and I know whereof I am speaking. There is also an exemption of the Canadian Pacific Railway from control of their rates for ever, or at any rate until ten per cent is paid on the cost of the railway. That of itself constitutes a monopoly which it is very difficult to deal with. And yet, in the face of all these difficulties, which have been caused by the vicious legislation of hon. gentlemen opposite in the course of eighteen years, they come here and pose as champions of the North-west, and as its saviours from this Government. However, Christianity teaches us that, while we should suspect, we should not despise sudden conversions, for we have all read the story of the penitent thief ; and therefore I am glad to welcome this sudden conversion of hon. gentlemen opposite, and to say that I am altogether in sympathy with the principles that have been enunciated. I think the time has come when we should take up this railway problem and try to bring it to a successful issue. There is no doubt in the world that both in Ontario and in Manitoba the people believed that competition in railways was the solution of the difficulty. We have found out our mistake. We know how the people in Ontario voted bonuses to railways, and how the railway system of that province has now been absorbed into two great railway systems, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk. We have had the same difficulties in Manitoba. We gave the Northern Pacific a large bonus, and although we did receive a great benefit from the introduction of that railway, there is still a certain amount of monopoly, and we have found there as we have done in Ontario, that the railways do not compete. Consequently we have only one of two things to do. Government ownership of railways being apparently out of the question, what we ought to see is that the Government should exercise that control over railway rates which the Railway Act gives them, except in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We should further provide, as I believe the Manitoba Government intend to do, that wherever aid is given, a certain scale of maximum rates should be fixed.

Mr. MACLEAN. What about running rights?

Mr. JAMESON. I do not quite agree in what the hon. gentleman says. I think that when running powers are given, the railways to which they are given may be hampered in such a way that the privilege would not be effective. I believe, however, that in the Railway Act there is ample power given for the proper exercise by the Government of a control of rates. I understand that railway companies have to submit their schedules of rates to the Governor in Council, and if the Government is independent of the railway—which unfortunately has not always been the case in Canada—there is nothing to prevent the Government effectively exercising the control given them by the Railway Act. I am very glad to welcome the building of the railway outlined by the "Globe." It will be a very great benefit to my constituency and the people of Manitoba and the North-west generally. It will pass through an agricultural region and through the Rainy River district, where mines are constantly being opened up, and I have no doubt that the volume of grain taken out of the country is so large as to afford ample business for two lines of railways. I am very glad this matter has come up, and am entirely in sympathy with the idea of taking up this railway question and introducing legislation which will give the Government more effective control of railways than they have at present.

Mr. DAVIN. The Toronto "Globe" is exceedingly happy at present in having at its head a gentleman, with whom I have the honour of a slight acquaintance, of great journalistic ability, and under whose management the paper, in its literary make up, and also as a news gatherer has very much improved and ranks very high. I will say also that its correspondent in Ottawa—although I believe he is no friend of mine—for indefatigable industry and ability as a writer is deserving of all praise, but this has to be said about the editor and his staff, that while they have the ability to bring out a first-class paper at present, and for many moons back, nobody can read it without seeing that its main motive is not the enlightenment of the public but something behind. Take the article just quoted, any one reading it will see why it was written. It is a double leaded correspondence from Ottawa, and its object apparently is to give to the public of Canada information of what is being done at the capital in railway matters. The real object, however, is to call the attention of the people of Manitoba to a scheme that, I believe, will prove utterly delusive, and in regard to which the people of Manitoba will find themselves as completely duped and tricked as the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) knows they were some years ago with regard to another matter. Any one reading that article carefully will see that the suspicion creeps over the minds of the correspondents that in putting forward this railway of Mr. Greenway as a means of competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway, people will see through the object Mr. Greenway has in view, because the correspondent says that although Mr. Mackenzie is a strong friend of the Canadian Pacific Railway, there cannot be the least doubt that this will give competition. We have all seen a gentleman here—I saw him on the right of the Chair—who used to be a member of this House, and is a member of the Manitoba Government—Mr. Bob Watson—and another gentleman I have seen about the corridors, who is one of the dark men working in the interests of the Manitoba Government, and we know there is an election pending in Manitoba, and that at this moment the Liberal party, if they went to the polls, could not come back with a baker's dozen.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIN. I know what I am talking about. The Liberal party is beaten in Manitoba, and one of the dodges to help Mr. Greenway to win the impending election that is certain to come after next session—

Mr. MCGREGOR. There will be no election in Manitoba for two years.

Mr. DAVIN. If the hon. gentleman wants to reply to me subsequently, he will have every opportunity to do so. I would be glad if every hon. gentleman over there would treat me as I prefer to treat them. I would like to feel that I am addressing a number of British gentlemen meeting together to discuss questions, and it is no pleasure, but positive pain, to me when I have to waste time by taking one member after another, who interrupts me, and silencing him. If I were teaching school, it would not give me the least pleasure to have to take one of my little boys occasionally and give him a squeeze on the ear when he did not behave himself. Hon. gentlemen opposite have never had any cause to complain of me, and it would be better for the management of the business of this House if they would allow the business to proceed without these useless interruptions, because they must know by this that if they could multiply their number by 44 and their power of interruption by 54 they could not prevent me by going on with what I have to say.

I say that my hon. friend, Hugh J. Macdonald, has gone through Manitoba and with his eloquence, charm of manner and political power has swept that province, and Mr. Greenway knows he is beaten. This scheme, outlined in the "Globe," is merely a dodge, such as was practised on the people of Manitoba in the case of the Northern Pacific; and when the election is over and Mr. Greenway once more in power, he will do as he did in the past—fing his election promises to the winds, enjoy his cigar and attend to his farm until another election is impending, and once more it is necessary to invent a new dodge. There is nobody in this House more earnest than I to help the Government, if the Government has any desire to do it, in bringing about railway competition in the North-west Territories. The hon. member for Winnipeg talked about the dreadful oppression that was introduced into the Territories and Manitoba by the Conservative Government, and declared that disallowance nearly brought about a rebellion, and he had to be corrected by my hon. friend who leads the Opposition when he said that it cost this country a large sum to get rid of that disallowance. But will the hon. member tell this House what the people of Manitoba and the North-west have gained by the means that Mr. Greenway took to bring about competition there? The hon. gentleman knows very well, that perfectly fictitious competition was brought in there by Mr. Joe Martin and Mr. Greenway. They went into it in an extravagant manner for the province, and the very minute that the means of competition were provided, everything was arranged in such a way that the Northern Pacific was in a position to arrange as to rates with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the competition turned out to be perfectly fallacious.

Mr. JAMESON. But the rates went down.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. DAVIN. Why, from time to time, the Canadian Pacific Railway has lowered its rates without competition at all. Let me say here what I know will be a very unpopular thing. I hear this talk—it is a cheap, hustings talk, mind you—about the oppression in Manitoba and the North-west at the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I say, that there has never been oppression in Manitoba and the North-west at the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway. On general principles, I object to a monopoly; but I believe the man who is at the head of that great Canadian Pacific Railway corporation, Sir William Van Horne, takes a very enlightened view of this railway's interest—I am not now giving him credit for anything except a desire to advance the progress and prosperity of his railway—and he knows that if the rates are such as to crush the life out of the country, the prosperity of the Canadian Pacific Railway would not be what it is to-day. As a consequence, there has never been a monopoly handled with so much restraint as that monopoly. We have had good crops and good prices in the North-west, and if the subject of railway rates were brought up at a meeting of farmers now, hardly a man would spontaneously make loud complaint of the Canadian Pacific Railway rates. I say that in passing. My main object in rising is to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to some views that I would humbly submit to his judgment with regard to railway matters in Manitoba and the North-west Territories.

If any new railway project should present itself to the Ministry, affecting the whole country, but especially I speak for the country whence I come—Manitoba and the North-west Territories—I hold that he is bound to see that, if it takes the colour of being the medium of producing competition, the whole power of his majority is used to make that competition a genuine, and not a fallacious one; above all, that the competition shall not be of such a character that, one element of it removed, the whole thing will go to pieces. I think we ought to take a new step with regard to bonusing railways. Henceforward, when we bonus a railway, mindful of what has taken place in Canada and on the other side of the line also, we should see to it that the public interest is conserved. On the other side of the line, you will find one State after another receiving large incomes from railways they have bonused. In the charter of any railway that we bonus hereafter, we should have a clause, not merely giving us a firm grip on the rates from the first, but maintaining an effective control of the company. I agree with my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson), that in this Canadian Pacific Act there is an element of efficient control. I say, that the Minister of Railways, if he wishes to use the means placed in his hands, has the power of efficient control of that road. But here is the danger we are in in this free country. It would never have occurred to any one, that such a state of things could take place. Here we have five millions of free people, a free Parliament modelled on the august mother of free parliaments; we have come from where we were oppressed by dukes, and earls, and landlords, and our dream was to have a free yeomanry, to hold our property clear of the power of a dominant and oppressive aristocracy. But what do we do? We make corporations that enable men to make money so quickly that the common citizen of to-day is immensely rich to-morrow. From plain Mr. he becomes first a Sir, and afterwards is almost begged to enter the painted chamber. Take such projects as that we have been discussing. Why, Sir, coronets rain on that page. You will have the Duke of Yukon and the Earl of Klondike; and in that region, where they say that the smallest berry will not grow, the strawberry leaves of English aristocracy will flourish. That is the reason why I oppose the legislation that we have now before us, and that is the reason why I offer my suggestion to the Minister of Railways. I know his difficulty and the difficulty that will meet every Minister of Railways. I heard a Minister of the Crown in England say to another, who was about to become a Minister of the Crown: Wait until you have been three years in office, and you will find that it is one of the most difficult things in the world for a Minister of the Crown to do the good he would like to do. I have no doubt that there is one Minister sitting on that bench who has already, in less than two years, found it true, as the Apostle Paul puts it, in that great moral paradox, "For the good that I would, I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I do." Or, to put it in the words of Tennyson:

His honour rooted in dishonour stands,
And faith, unfaithful, keeps him falsely true.

The difficulty arises from a want of genuine patriotism, a want of far-reaching, historical patriotism. The mere sense of duty will not keep any Minister of the Crown, whether Liberal or Conservative, up to the standard at which he ought to live, because the temptations offered him are so terrible that, unless he has the historical, far-reaching conscience that will enable him to live up to a higher ideal, he will not be able to resist. From the moment he gets into power he is assailed. We know that it is often said, that as soon as a government is born, it begins to die. That is true of all organic things. The Government must fight for its life. There is nothing so nervous as a government in a constitutionally governed country. It is as nervous as a snail—for, though a snail has not a highly-organized nervous system, you have only to touch its horns to see how quick is its sense of apprehension. You find great corporations that want their help, and there is a terrible temptation to allow their judgment to be biased. They are tempted to consider these corporations just as members of Parliament are tempted to consider them. I am a rash person myself, and I do not consider these things.

But we find that members of Parliament do consider them, and we find more than that, that Governments consider them, and what happens is this: that here in this Chamber we are creating corporations that spread out in wealth far overshadowing, for instance, the salary of a Prime Minister, paltry and utterly inadequate as it is for any man fit to hold that high position. Why, it is the salary of a first-class insurance agent in England, or the manager of an insurance company. What signifies the salary of a Minister of the Crown to the splendid income of a railway magnate, whose growth in opulence is phenomenal. The chrysalis of a few years past becomes gorgeous and powerful, and rises from comparatively moderate means to be as rich as Cræsus. We might almost quote the language of the hymn:

One moment here, so mean so low,
The next—beyond the stars.

Well, that is giving a rather spiritual aspect, I admit, to what is a very mundane existence. Now, Sir, although I am sorry to have to say that this Government has not lived up to its professions in the past, has not availed itself of its opportunities, there are yet at least three years of 'locus penitentiæ' left to it; and I would like to see the Prime Minister and his colleagues go into retreat and examine their consciences as to their political sins for the last twenty months, and try to redress the dreadful backslidings that I have witnessed with so much pain. That is what I want them to do in regard to this railway matter. All you have to do is to fall back on your professions, live up to the professions of the Liberal party, live up to the professions of Alexander Mackenzie and George Brown, and then you will be, I won't say ideal statesmen, but you will go as high as will satisfy my humble confidence either in your desire or in your capacity to go. Now in regard to existing railways, I think the Government have control of them if they would only use it. I went once before a Railway Committee of the Privy Council. I remember the ex-Minister was there, and after a time he and his colleagues took what seemed to me to be a very sensible view of the question that had been discussed before them, and they declared that in regard to certain things, for instance the discrimination between points on a railway in regard to rates, they had power to deal with that. I do not know whether they dealt with that point or not, but anyway it was stated that they could deal with it. But what is done is past. It is in regard to future railways that I wish the public of Canada and the Parliament of Canada should be on their guard, and we can easily frame a clause which would enable us to keep our hands on the well-being of the railway that no watering stock can take place without our cognizance. The people of Canada who bonus a line, should have a permanent interest in that line, and after the railway has had a certain percentage on its cost, then a certain percentage should go into the coffers of the Government, and after a certain number of years we would find ourselves in the position of one of the states below the line the other day, which received a large sum in consequence of this claim upon the earnings of the road. We might frame a clause so as to keep a hold upon the rates, we might frame a clause that would make the process of affecting the tolls more simple, a clause that would act automatically, and so relieve the Minister from the odious position of appearing to go against a powerful corporation or a powerful friend—because in popular government we have to keep that constantly before us. The only reason why it is not better for a government to build and run railways is this: That the pressure placed upon the administration of such a line is such that corruption is inevitable. Supporters go to the Minister and press upon him to take men on to the line when they are not needed, and the same thing will take place in regard to the line, as has taken place again and again in Canada, and the Minister would do what Ministers on both sides have done from time to time, he would say: Oh, take him on. That is one of the reasons why the Government cannot run a railway as successfully as a private corporation. My hon. friend, speaking in connection with the railway, referred to the case of the penitent pig. Well, Sir, I come from a land where the pig is supposed to be a classical entity, but about that particular pig I do not know exactly what he did. But I am glad to see my hon. friend, the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) take the part he does to-day. I was not so well pleased with him last evening. I rather thought he went back on himself—and it will help him with his friends—he sacrificed his past self. I know my hon. friend too well to say that he would sacrifice his convictions. I do not think that he would do that—but he sacrificed his past, he sacrificed his constituents to please his friends; but many a man has done that before him. Now, I wish to warn the people of Manitoba that this is the first move in a scheme to throw dust in their eyes, as dust was thrown in their eyes last election, and on the eve of the election before that, and they will find, I am afraid, that the scheme that Mr. Greenway is about to place in that local legislature is nothing but a straw for a drowning man to catch at; because I may tell you he is a beaten man. I warn the people of Manitoba that this is simply a dodge to try and get them to forego the position they have taken up, that they are ready to act on, and that if they trust him the same thing will take place that took place a few years ago when they were filled with strong hopes only to be succeeded by bitter disappointment.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have no doubt the hon. gentleman who introduced this subject this afternoon had a very sincere desire that the evils complained of should be remedied, and in that sentiment the Government very strongly agree. But I must say that I think it open to much question whether any material advantage is to be gained, and whether very much disadvantage may not result from the continued resort to a motion that the House adjourn before the Orders of the Day are taken up, for the purpose of opening up a discussion of this character.

I am sure that a moment's reflection will satisfy hon. gentlemen that unless the case is one of some considerable urgency, unless the particular facts to which they desire to draw attention require in the public interest prompt action, nothing whatever is to be gained by simply repeating what we all know, and in repeating which we do not make any practical business suggestion which the House could consider. We have no motion to which our minds could be addressed. Neither of hon. gentlemen has made a suggestion in any concrete form. They have simply told the House that transportation difficulties exist. We know that these exist all over Canada, and it is known they prevail over the wide world, and there is no country in which these same problems are not arising. No legislation, it appears to me, has ever been framed by which an ideal result has been attained. These questions will continue to arise from time to time, and I venture to suggest that unless hon. gentlemen opposite, who have apparently given some study to the question but without much result, are in a position to present some formal proposition, they should avoid raising a discussion which is likely to result in nothing but inconvenience and disorganization of the public business.

Mr. DAVIN. Let me call the hon. gentleman's attention to what the present Premier was in the habit of saying when he sat on this side of the House: Call me in, and I will make the proposal.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I venture to make this remark in all good feeling, and I have not the slightest doubt as to the bona fides of the hon. gentlemen. I say, and it is a fair claim to put forward on the part of the Government, that until those hon. gentlemen are able to suggest some specific legislation which will provide a remedy, or which at all events in their judgment will provide a remedy, and until they are able to inform the House in what direction it should be framed, hon. gentlemen, in my opinion, should not move a motion of this kind when the House is on the eve of taking up important business.

Mr. DAVIN. May I ask a question? Surely the Minister of Railways is not going to lay down this proposition, that it is a proper thing for a mere independent member to make substantial proposals. I thought the view of Parliament was, that independent members should state grievances and express public opinion, and the doctors who sit on the Treasury benches should prescribe.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman had better look at the Order paper.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would be very sorry to concur in the idea that private members are not entirely free and that it is not part of their duty, if they have thought out any subject, to submit their opinion in order that legislation may be proposed which would prove useful, and at all events that they should retain the privilege of making suggestions to Parliament.

Mr. DAVIN. I must interrupt the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not do so disrespectfully. Last night the Prime Minister ruled out one of his supporters, an independent supporter, who made a substantive proposal, on the ground that it was definite.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Do not let hon. members suppose that a motion to adjourn the House might not be made in an emergency. I do not at all wish hon. gentlemen should feel that—so far as I am entitled to speak the sentiments of the Government on this question—any such privilege or right should be curtailed; but I say our actions in this particular should always be governed by those considerations which spring from public convenience and the promotion of the public business. I am satisfied that members of the House who have followed this discussion will find it quite impossible to lay their fingers on suggestions of any value made by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken to this motion.

I have stated, and I repeat the statement, what the position of the Government is with respect to this great question. I have stated that the Government is of opinion that the existing law, which confers on the Railway Committee of the Privy Council power to deal with emergencies as they arise, is not by any means perfect; that it does not cover all the ground which might advantageously be covered; and I think I stated last year that the Government had reached the conclusion that an experiment might usefully be made in the direction of creating a railway commission, upon which commission even larger powers should be conferred than those now vested in the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. I stated that we hoped during the recess to obtain sufficient information to enable the Government to submit a proposal, in concrete form, to Parliament at the present session, and I have already stated—certainly I so stated before the Railway Committee—that it was found quite impossible during the recess to get the matter into such form that we could present it to Parliament during this session. The question is undoubtedly a very complex one. It is a question that requires to be thought out with very much care; it is a question that involves many intricacies, and the Government would not be doing its duty either to itself or to the people if it presented to Parliament a measure for such a purpose which it had not thought out in the most thoroughly careful manner. I do not feel that the evils under which we have been living in the past are of a very grave character, or of so grave a character as compared with other important subjects that it is essential that this subject be taken up with undue haste. I repeat that it is our purpose at the earliest possible moment, when we can get a measure in such shape as will give us confidence as regards its usefulness and utility, to submit such a proposal to Parliament.

Let me say one or two words in regard to the views put forward by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) and the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who followed him. I think the hon. member for East Grey said that the present law conferred on the Railway Committee of the Privy Council ample powers if they were only exercised.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not put forward such a contention. I said that when the clause was put in the statute, we thought it was ample; but finding it is not ample, we think it desirable to supplement it with something else.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Then I was under a misapprehension as to the hon. gentleman's view. I think that view has been expressed by many hon. members, more particularly with respect to the regulations of rates on railways. I hold that the power which has been conferred by statute on the Governor in Council is ample, and the defects which exist arise in regard to the exercise of that power, as regards its efficient and successful exercise, from the difficulty which must surround all Governments and the departments of Government in working up to the powers which the statute confers. Necessarily there must be want of completeness in the exercise of the powers which are conferred on the Railway Committee of the Privy Council with respect to the question of rates.

We cannot take up in detail and minutely, the conditions which may govern the various localities and sections in the Dominion. It would be impossible for the Government, with all the other duties which devolve upon it, to deal in any sort of thorough or effective way with these constantly altering conditions. I think that perhaps a commission might be able to do so. I may say, that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council never could be so constituted, nor could the Railway Department ever be so regulated as to work out such powers in an efficient manner. And further let me say, the fact that in times past, Ministers of Railways and Railway Committees, ever since that body was constituted, have found that the farthest they could possibly go was to fix a maximum rate beyond which none of the railway companies could go, is some evidence as to the views which have been continually entertained by the hon. members of that committee and by the various Ministers of Railways as to the measure of their powers. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) has suggested, that if there were powers given to the Railway Committee or some other sufficient tribunal to control the running rights by one railway over the other, you would make a large advance in remedying these evils. I can assure the hon. gentleman, that would not be the conclusion which he would arrive at if he had given as careful study to this question as it would be proper to give it. You cannot work out any such system, unless you have a railway company which desires to have the privilege of using the track of another railway. The public may desire it, they may be intensely anxious that this one line of railway should be utilized by two or three different lines, but unless you have another railway company connecting with it which is prepared to set the machinery of the law in motion, you are utterly powerless.

That is the situation with regard to the line between Toronto and North Bay, or the two or three lines which continuously traverse that distance. The Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway have fallen out. They did agree at one time and as a result of their agreement the Canadian Pacific Railway utilized that portion of the line from Gravenhurst to North Bay under arrangements which had been voluntarily entered into between them. The time came when one or the other of them felt that these arrangements were not just to the company complaining, and they withdrew. What is the situation to-day? The situation to-day is, that notwithstanding the agreement which has been entered into and which is made part of the law of the land governing the railway which was added from Gravenhurst to North Bay; notwithstanding that this railway company is subject to the franchise, or easement, or privilege, or whatever you may call it that has been exercised heretofore by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and notwithstanding that it is in the power of any railway company that may be connected with it to exercise that privilege if it desires there has been no railway company coming forward asking for such authority. The Canadian Pacific Railway has not said to us: We desire to use the authority which results from this agreement and compel the Grand Trunk Railway to submit to the use of this line; and in the absence of action on their part I say that the Government is entirely helpless. I fear very much, from what study I have been able to give this question, that it will not be practicable for Parliament by any legislation which it is possible to frame, to provide an adequate remedy for the existing state of things. My hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) has pointed out that there are two or three railways in the United States which have been using each other's lines with great advantage. If my information is correct, the only instance in which one railway company is exercising running powers over another railway, is in the case where they have come to a friendly understanding between themselves and is not the result of the exercise of any superior controlling power. The question is one which is surrounded on all hands with difficulty, and therefore I think it would be unwise on the part of my hon. friends opposite to assume, that any amount of astuteness which might be applied to the framing of a measure constituting a railway commission, or any other tribunal with these large powers, could be depended upon as furnishing an ideal remedy for these difficulties. They have occurred in the past; they will continue to occur in the future, notwithstanding all the laws Parliament may choose to enact in the matter. There is no manner of doubt as to the power of Parliament. It does not help us, to assert that Parliament ought to have the power because Parliament has the power, except so far as it has limited its exercise by an enactment of a contractual nature. The difficulty that surrounds us all is, not to reach that primary conclusion, but to make up our minds as wise legislators, as men who are not willing to disturb the great transportation arrangements of the country, and who are not willing to disturb the existing sound business conditions; the great difficulty with us is to determine just what shall be the precise nature of the legislation which we will pass.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of Railways finds fault with members of this House for bringing up these questions at the time they are now brought forward; but he must bear in mind that though we have been in session more than five weeks, one urgent question has occupied almost the whole time of the House, and other questions of importance as they arise in the country have had to be deferred, so that this is the only possible manner in which they can be brought to the attention of the House. The hon. Minister of Railways has acknowledged that there are very great grievances, but he complains that no member of the House has brought down a concrete settlement of them. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that is hardly the duty of private members of this House. I think it is sufficient for them to call these grievances to the attention of those whose duty it is largely to initiate legislation. The history of this House is, that the efforts of private members to engraft legislation upon the Statute-book has not been very successful, because the Government, with their majority, will usually prevent the passage of the measures proposed. With regard to the Rainy River Railway, the question is—and I would ask the Government to consider it—whether the Grand Trunk shall have running powers over it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I should say so, if it wants them—certainly.

Mr. WALLACE. I am very glad to hear that statement, and I am sure that it will be satisfactory to the people.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would do anything I could do to secure for it any such right, if it wanted to exercise it, or were willing to exercise it.

Mr. WALLACE. I am glad to hear the declaration of the hon. Minister to that effect, because I think this is a very important proposition, and one that will largely solve these North-west questions of transportation that have created so much discussion. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) has told us the reason why the settlement of the North-west has not been more successful than it has been. In this connection, I regret to see that, when this important matter is under discussion in the House, the hon. member for Winnipeg is the only hon. member on that side of the House from Manitoba and the North-west who is here to discuss it, though we all know how in the past, during their election campaigns, they have been making Manitoba and the North-west ring with their denunciations of their political opponents because of these transportation grievances. But to-day, when these questions are being discussed and the attention of the Government may very properly be called to them, there is only one member on that side of the House from the province of Manitoba, or the province of British Columbia, who is prepared—

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I beg to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact, that there are two. I have been listening to this discussion with a great deal of interest.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not mean to say that they are not here. I suppose they are all here, but they are all like the hon. member who has just notified us that he is here—they are dumb, they have nothing to say. I hope this gentle reminder will have the effect of causing our friend from Manitoba to get up and give his views on this important matter.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to say just one word on this subject. I had no idea that the question was coming up for discussion to-day. I want, in the first instance, to call the attention of my hon. friend, if he will allow me to designate him as such, from Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) to the very grave misapprehension he entertains with regard to the position that has been taken by my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) in this House, and also with regard to the position taken by my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean). Both these gentlemen have been for a long time past moving in the direction in which they have been moving to-day. Fourteen or fifteen years ago, I heard my hon. friend from East Grey discussing a question of this kind, and taking exactly the same position that he has taken to-day, except in one particular. At that time, he seemed to be more strongly in favour of the constitution of a railway commission than he seems to be to-day.

Mr. JAMESON. Did he vote that way?

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

Mr. JAMESON. Against disallowance?

Mr. SPROULE. In favour of a railway commission.

Mr. McNEILL. The question that was up had reference to the grievances of the public in connection with these great railway corporations. The fact that these great corporations, which hold in their hands almost the whole carrying trade of the country, could do with the public very much as they pleased, was the subject under discussion at that time. We were considering the possibility of finding a remedy, and my hon. friend from East Grey did not at all hesitate to differ with some of the leaders of his own party on the question. Therefore, I am sure that my hon. friend from Winnipeg will gladly withdraw the imputation he has cast upon my hon. friend in this regard, for he has really done him a great injustice. So far as the main question is concerned, I think the attention of the House could scarcely be directed to anything more important; and, if the Minister of Railways will forgive my saying so, I think his own speech has been a very good answer to the charge that he brought against my hon. friends, of improperly bringing up this question. He spoke as though he thought they were practically wasting the time of the House. In my judgment, however, the speech that has been elicited from the hon. Minister of Railways himself, is an ample justification of the action of my hon. friend from East York. I, for one, am delighted to find that the Government still have it in their minds to address themselves seriously to the remedying of this great grievance, which undoubtedly does exist in the country. There is no doubt that the public feel that the railway companies have too much uncontrolled power; and, for my part, I am quite satisfied that so long as human nature is as it is,—so long as political human nature is as it is, no Railway Committee of the Privy Council can ever deal successfully with these grievances. These great and influential corporations possess enormous political power, and when they choose to exercise it, they are always able to bring enormous pressure to bear upon the members of a Government. So that, when the members of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council come to deal with questions in which these corporations are deeply interested, it is scarcely to be expected that they can deal with them with open minds. It seems to me that we are driven to the conclusion that we must find some remedy outside the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and the constitution of some independent body to deal with such matters seems the obvious and logical solution.

For my part, so far as I have been able to discover, I have not learned that the railway commission in England has been a failure by any means. On the contrary, after having tried that commission for several years in a tentative manner, they constituted it on much stronger, broader and more permanent lines, and I think that while, as the hon. Minister has said, it certainly does not prove itself a perfect remedy for the evils complained of, it has dealt with them more successfully than they have ever been dealt with by any political body. I am only too glad to find that the action taken by my hon. friend has had the effect of eliciting from the hon. Minister of Railways so satisfactory a statement.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). As we had a very long sitting last night, I would propose to my hon. friend that we do not sit after six o'clock, and I hope that will meet his convenience. I would ask, however, that he would agree that we should take up the second order and proceed with it a stage before adjourning.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no objection.

Mr. McNEILL.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House resolved itself into committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to grant and appropriate twenty-five thousand acres of land in the Northwest Territories for each mile of a railway from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, according to the terms of the contract relating to the said railway, copy of which contract has been laid before this House.

Resolution reported.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 6 o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 14th March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVILEGE—EXPLANATION BY MR. SPEAKER.

Mr. SPEAKER. Before calling the Orders of the Day, I would like to mention to the House a matter which is of the nature of privilege, and which I see has been connected by the press with the seat of an hon. member—the member for Richelieu. It is stated that I have received his resignation. If I had received his resignation, I should have issued my warrant for a new election before now. The only occasion when I have had any communication from or with Mr. Bruneau this session was on Friday morning. I had just come into my office when Mr. Bruneau came in. He asked me if I had received a letter from him. I told him I had not. He said that he had called to get a letter back which he had written to me. I told him to wait and I would look among my mail, for I had not yet opened any letters. I turned the unopened letters over in his presence, and he pointed to one with his frank upon it. I asked him if it was his writing on the address and frank. He assured me it was. He told me nothing of its contents, and I asked him nothing, but handed him the letter unopened, and he took it away with him. So far as I know, it had come to my office through the post office, for I had not seen it before. I mention this to avoid any mistake as to facts as far as I am concerned.

THE LATE MR. DUPONT, M.P.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, it becomes my melancholy duty to remind the House of the untimely death of one of our most valued and respected members, Mr. Dupont, the member for Bagot. We have already been called upon to suffer the loss of valued members of this House during the present session, but I am sure that every member on both sides of this House will agree that in his untimely death owing to a railway accident, we have been deprived of the services of one of the most able, one of the most esteemed, and one of the most conscientious members that has ever sat on the floor of this House; and I am sure that we shall all join in the expression of our deep sympathy with the friends and with the family of the deceased. Particularly the great agricultural class which he represented in this House with such ability, will everywhere feel that they have sustained a very great loss. I think we will all be ready to recognize that no member of this House, during the period that that hon. gentleman was a member, ever discharged his duties with a more conscientious regard to what he believed to be right, and in the best interests of the country. While his loss will be deplored by every member of this House, it will be especially deplored by those on this side who regarded him as one of their ablest and one of their most valued colleagues and supporters.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It is to me, Mr. Speaker, a melancholy satisfaction under the circumstances to join my tribute to the eloquent tribute which has just been paid by my hon. friend opposite to the memory of our departed colleague, taken away from us under such peculiarly sad and painful circumstances. Sir, some of us perhaps will be prepared to make the admission that in the heat of political conflict, we are not as fair nor as generous to each other as we ought to be; yet we may congratulate ourselves that there is a better side to our nature, in obedience to which, silently and unconsciously, a sentiment of mutual respect grows up in the heart, and must find expression upon such a solemn occasion as this. For my part, I say very frankly that having been associated with Mr. Dupont in this House, having met him in debate, and very often on the public platform in election campaigns throughout our native province, I had formed the highest estimate of his personal character. No one could know him without admiring his strong yet at the same time genial qualities. He was a strong party man; but his ideas were his own, they were not borrowed from anybody, and he defended them, I am sure, feeling that they were absolutely true. His death is all the more to be deplored inasmuch as he was in the prime of life and vigour, and had before him the prospect of many more years of usefulness. That his death under such circumstances should be mourned by those who were his political friends is but natural, and I may say that those regrets will be shared by all those who, on this side of the House, were his friends likewise, and along with those of our hon. friends opposite will follow him to his premature grave.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. To one coming from the province to which our late colleague belonged, it is more than a painful duty to rise and to join my tribute to those which have been so eloquently expressed by the leader of the Government and by the leader of the Opposition. Sir, Mr. Dupont, during the many years that he sat in this House, commanded universal respect from both sides of it. His views, strong as they were on all questions by reason of the strength of his convictions, were always expressed in a manner which appealed to hon. members on both sides, to those who acted with him and to those who did not view political matters from the same standpoint that he did—to his friends as being the expression of strong convictions, and to his opponents as being submitted to the House in a manner always acceptable. Sir, few men have sat in this Parliament who will leave behind them a more blameless record than the late hon. member for Bagot. There are few members who have sat in this House who had before them a more brilliant future than the hon. member whose loss we deplore. His death is a loss not only to this Parliament, but, I think, a loss to the whole country. He was conscientious, he was able. His convictions were strong, and on all occasions when called upon to take part in debate or in elections, he did so in a manner to convince the people that he was acting, according to his views, in the very best interests of the country.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 30) respecting the Lake Erie and Detroit River Railway Company.—(Mr. McGregor.)

ONTARIO AND RAINY RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved that the order for the consideration in committee of Bill (No. 32) an Act respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company, be discharged, and the Bill be recommitted to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Mr. MACLEAN. Explain.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Bill was amended in the committee in such a way as to affect large interests that were not represented before the committee. The opinions of the members seemed to be that the time should not be extended for the commencement of the work. The Bill as originally presented to the committee did not ask for an extension of the time for the commencement of the work; but some hon. gentlemen, who perhaps had not read the Bill, secured its amendment so as to extend the time, and parties interested in legal agreements thought their rights had been affected; and by consent of the solicitors on both sides it was agreed that the Bill be referred back to the committee.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 62) to incorporate the Tamagamingue Railway Company.—(Mr. McHugh.)

Bill (No. 64) respecting the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway Company.—(Mr. Maxwell.)

Bill (No. 66) respecting the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company.—(Mr. Jameson.)

Bill (No. 67) to incorporate the London and Lake Huron Railway Company.—(Mr. Lister.)

Bill (No. 68) respecting the Montfort Colonization Railway Company, and to change its name to the Montfort and Gatineau Colonization Railway Company.—(Mr. Bourassa.)

Bill (No. 69) respecting the Kingston and Pembroke Railway Company.—(Mr. Britton.)

THE JUDICIARY IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIS asked,

Is it the intention of the Government to appoint an additional judge for the North-west Territories? If so, when will such appointment be made?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Judge McGuire is now in the Yukon, but the Government is not in a position to state whether he intends to remain there permanently or not.

OYSTER FISHERIES, P.E.I.

Mr. YEO asked,

1. Have any leases or grants been given by the Department of Marine and Fisheries of live
Mr. SUTHERLAND.

cyster beds in Malpeque or Richmond Bay, in Prince Edward Island?

2. If so, did the expert, Kemp, recommend such grants or leases being given on the ground that such oyster beds were unproductive, and was it afterwards shown, on investigation held by the inspector of fisheries and from the testimony of oyster fishermen, that the report of Mr. Kemp was not in accordance with the facts?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to allow the oyster beds in Malpeque or Richmond Bay to become depleted by allowing parties engaged in oyster culture to stock their oyster areas from said beds during the close season?

4. What is Mr. Kemp's salary? What are his duties? Has he succeeded, in Bedeque Bay or elsewhere, in rendering any oyster beds productive which would not naturally have become so by having the fishing of oysters in that locality prohibited for a time?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. One lease in Shemody Creek has been granted to Mr. T. H. E. Inman. Mr. Kemp after examining the bed leased did not consider it a live bed as it was shallow and cut to pieces by mud diggers and he recommended the granting of the lease. 2. As yet the department have received no report from the inspector of fisheries on this bed or the granting of this lease. 3. No. The small oysters obtained in Richmond Bay are generally picked from very shallow water and sometimes where the tide leaves them. These cysters would never mature as they would be killed by the ice and frost during the winter months. Permission is only granted to take these small oysters during the regular fishing season. 4. Mr. Kemp's salary is $1,500 per annum. His duties are to examine oyster areas and report on condition of same to department and to clean and plant oyster areas under instructions from department. 5. Yes, at Shediac and Tracadie, N.S.

POSTMASTER AT LOCH LEVEN, C.B.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

1. Did the Honourable the Postmaster General direct that the following letter be sent to Mr. John A. McLellan, postmaster, Loch Leven, Inverness county, Nova Scotia:—

Post Office Department, Canada,
Ottawa, 29th January, 1898.

Sir,—Referring to your communication of the 21st instant, inquiring why you have been removed from the postmastership of Loch Leven, county of Inverness, I am directed to inform you that it is not considered compatible with the proper discharge of the duties of a postmaster that he should take any unduly active part in political elections, and that it having been represented that at a political meeting held in Port Hood prior to the Dominion election of June, 1896, you and others endeavoured to prevent the present member for Inverness from being heard in reply to a speech made by Sir Charles Tupper on that occasion, the Postmaster General has decided to make another appointment to the office in question.

I am to add that it is further stated that on election day you were an active worker in the interests of Dr. Cameron, one of the candidates in the above mentioned election.

I am, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) W. D. LeSUEUR,
Secretary.

2. If so, who made the representations referred to in the said letter ?

3. Did Mr. McLellan inform the Post Office Department by letter that he was prepared to contradict the statements and representations contained in the said letter on oath ?

4. Was an inquiry or formal investigation made into the truth of the statements and representations referred to in said letter ?

5. Has Mr. McLellan been dismissed from the postmastership of Loch Leven, and, if so, why ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. No. The letter mentioned in the question was sent in the ordinary course of business by the secretary of the department in reply to a letter of inquiry from the ex-postmaster, without previous instructions from the Postmaster General, but the Postmaster General assumes full responsibility therefor. 2. Dr. A. McLennan, M.P. 3. Yes. 4. No. 5. Yes, for the reasons mentioned in Dr. McLennan's communication to the department.

MAJOR WALSH'S COMMISSION.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

Is the commission to Mr. Walsh, as embodied in the Order in Council of 17th August, 1897, the only documentary authority under which Mr. Walsh is now acting, or has the Minister of the Interior supplemented this by any instructions and directions of any kind, special or general ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The commission of Major Walsh is issued under the authority of the said Order in Council. He also holds commissions which constitute him senior officer of the North-west Mounted Police, and a police magistrate. Instructions given in addition to the commissions were verbal, and general in their character.

SLEIGH ROAD ON THE YUKON ROUTE.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

Have Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie constructed and finished a practical sleigh road from the mouth of the Stikine River to Teslin Lake ? If so, when was it completed, and what is its length ? Have they provided suitable shelters for travellers at intervals of twenty-five miles along this route, and is this road and are these shelters now available for travellers ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I would ask the hon. gentleman to let that question stand until to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. It is past the 12th of March, you know.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question stands.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND MAINLAND—WINTER COMMUNICATION.

Mr. MARTIN asked,

1. Does the Government propose to take any steps to improve the winter communication between the province of Prince Edward Island and the mainland of Canada ?

2. If so, what are those improvements, and if the Government intend, without further delay, to place a second steamer on the Georgetown-Pictou winter route ?

3. Has any contract been given, or does the Government intend to ask for tenders, for the building of a suitable winter boat, and when ?

4. Has the Government, after their experience with the steamship "Petrel," in the winter of 1896-97, abandoned the scheme of placing a steamer on the Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine ice route ?

5. If so, has the observations made by the officers of the steamship "Petrel," referred to in page 21 of last year's report of the Honourable the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, been of such a definite character as to lead them to that conclusion ?

6. Has the Government considered the present oppressive rate of 3c. per pound for baggage (in excess of thirty pounds) over the Cape Traverse winter route ?

7. If so, do they propose to decrease that exorbitant rate in the public interest ?

8. Is the Government aware that passengers are required to pay a minimum of $2 over that short distance of nine miles, besides being compelled to perform the arduous labour of pulling the Government boats containing Her Majesty's mails over ice and lolly ?

9. Does the Government propose to remedy this grievance ?

10. Has the Government had under consideration the terms of union between Prince Edward Island and Canada, that provides that the province of Prince Edward Island shall be connected with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion, and that the rate for passengers between the province and the mainland of Canada should not exceed the rate per mile on the Intercolonial or the railway system of Canada ?

11. If so, does the Government intend to take steps to reduce the rate for passengers on the steamship "Stanley" to the same mileage rate as prevails on the Intercolonial Railway ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I desire to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) to the fact that the form of this question very flagrantly transgresses the rules of the House. It is argumentative and states facts, instead of asking for information.

Mr. FOSTER. Do you not like facts ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. When one is asked to answer a question he does not like to have certain things set out as "outrageous," and all that sort of thing.

Mr. MARTIN. I did not say outrageous ; I said excessive.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I shall answer the hon. gentleman's question as best I can.

Mr. SPEAKER. Before the Minister answers the question, I wish to say that it occurred to me that the words "oppressive and exorbitant rates," characterizing certain matters about which information is sought, are not quite in order. Hon. gentlemen will remember that in asking a question, they cannot use any argumentative language, nor can they even attack the Government in putting such a question, no matter how strongly they may feel on the subject.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not object to answer the question, but I merely wish to call attention to the irregularity of it. Winter communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland is at present maintained by the ice-boat service at the Capes and the SS. "Stanley" between Georgetown and Pictou. The Government are now considering representations made to them by the member for East Prince and by the Charlottetown Board of Trade and a deputation from Summerside as to the necessity for a second winter boat. The particular route which a second steamer should be placed on in case the Government decides to obtain such steamer has not been determined, but no decision adverse to the Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine route has been reached. No representations have been made to the present Government that the existing baggage rates over Cape Traverse winter route are excessive. The Government is aware of the minimum rate paid by passengers over the route. It is the same rate which has existed for years past. The Government is not aware that the terms of union between Prince Edward Island and Canada provide for the rate to be charged for passengers. The rate was reduced last winter by the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the amount charged by the summer boats between Charlottetown and Pictou.

IMMIGRATION AGENT, L. RANKIN.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Has L. Rankin, of the Dominion Lands office, Regina, been immigration agent in Kansas? What were his instructions? Was he instructed to ignore the Territories and describe himself as of Manitoba?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Mr. L. Rankin has been employed as an immigration agent in Kansas during the winter months. His instructions were to work in conjunction with the agent permanently in charge of our immigration interests in that state. He was not instructed to ignore the Territories and describe himself as of Manitoba.

Mr. MARTIN.

CLAIM OF MISS FLORA CUMMINGS.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Whether it has been decided to place a sum in the territorial exhibition indebtedness estimates to pay the claim of twenty-five dollars ($25) of Miss Flora Cummings, of Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, and with whom the department has corresponded?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). It has not been decided to place a sum in the territorial exhibition indebtedness estimates to pay the claim of $25 to Miss Flora Cummings, of Portage la Prairie, Man. This claim was referred to the accountant of the exhibition at Regina, whose answer was to the effect that he knew nothing of the loss of this exhibit. Miss Cummings's claim was to cover a lost exhibit.

GRAIN STANDARDS.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

What course has the Honourable the Minister of Inland Revenue determined to take respecting grain standards? Does the hon. Minister contemplate any revision of the present inspection system?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). The matter is under consideration.

CONVICTIONS FOR PERJURY AT BATTLEFORD.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Whether at the close of last year J. N. Skelton and T. Dewan, were, in the Supreme Court at Battleford, convicted of perjury? Whether the Court of Appeal at Regina upheld the conviction? Whether at the time of the trial at Battleford, in the case of C. M. Daunais, the jury disagreed? Whether Daunais still stands to be tried under the original indictment and is on bail? Whether he occupies a position in the public service, and if so, what that position is?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). J. N. Skelton and T. Dewan were convicted of perjury. The Court of Appeal at Regina upheld the convictions. At the time of Daunais's trial the jury disagreed and Daunais now stands for trial at the session of the court to be held in May. I am not in a position to answer the last portion of the question as it is not in the knowledge of the Department of Justice whether or not Daunais occupied a position in the public service.

Mr. DAVIN. Probably the Minister of the Interior can answer that. I may point out that the question is asked of the Government, and not of my hon. and learned friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) particularly.

Mr. SPEAKER. These questions are usually asked of the Government, and not of a particular Minister.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The attention of the Minister of the Interior has not been called to that. It will be answered to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER. The latter part of the question will stand, then.

YUKON TERRITORY—WHISKY PERMITS.

Mr. CRAIG asked,

1. How many, if any, and when, have permits or licenses been granted allowing whisky to be taken into the Yukon territory for consumption or sale?

2. If any granted, what are the names of the grantees, and the quantity covered by the permits or licenses, respectively?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). If the hon. gentleman will send me a note saying within what period he wishes this information given, or for which period he wishes it to apply, I will give him the information to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question stands.

PREVENTIVE OFFICER AT GRAND NARROWS.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked,

1. What are the duties performed by the preventive officer at Grand Narrows, Cape Breton?

2. Are such duties performed the same as that, and all, performed by his predecessor?

3. What is the salary?

4. Is it the same as that paid his predecessor?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1 and 2. The duties of the preventive officer at Grand Narrows, C.B., are entering and clearing of vessels, the collection of duties and the prevention of smuggling. So far as the department is aware such duties are the same as, and all that, were performed by said officer's predecessor. 3. $200 per annum. 4. Yes.

QUARANTINE PHYSICIAN AT SYDNEY AND NORTH SYDNEY, C.B.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked,

1. Who is quarantine physician at Sydney and North Sydney, Cape Breton?

2. When was he appointed?

3. Whom did he succeed?

4. How many changes have taken place in that office since June, 1896?

5. What were these changes, and reasons for the same?

6. What is the salary of the present officer?

7. What was the salary of his predecessors?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). 1. Dr. Horace Rindress. 2. 1st October, 1897. 3. Dr. W. McK. McLeod. 4 and 5. On 1st July, 1897, the office of assistant quarantine officer at North Sydney was abolished, and the services of Dr. Lewis W. Johnstone dispensed with. On the same date the salary of Dr. W. McK. McLeod was increased from $1,000 to $1,200 per annum, he assuming the duties of quarantine officer for the whole harbour of Sydney. On the resignation of Dr. McLeod, on 1st October, 1897, Dr. Rindress was appointed at a salary of $1,200. The reason for the abolition of the office of an assistant quarantine officer was, that it was thought that the work could be performed by one officer, if he resided at North Sydney. The increase in salary of Dr. McLeod was for increased duties. Dr. Rindress was appointed owing to resignation of Dr. McLeod. 6. $1,200. 7. Dr. McLeod received $1,000 a year. The salary of the last incumbent was $1,200 at the time of his resignation.

MILITIA GENERAL ORDERS.

Mr. MONK asked,

Are all Militia General Orders approved by Order in Council before their promulgation in the "Canada Gazette"?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). No. General Orders are orders issued to the militia in general by the General Officer Commanding in virtue of his commission, which empowers him to issue orders and commands to all officers or other persons under his command.

INSTRUCTIONS TO LIEUT. SUTTON.

Mr. MONK asked,

1. What instructions were issued to Lieut. F. H. C. Sutton, Royal Canadian Dragoons, on proceeding to England for a course?

2. What examinations did he go up for?

3. What examinations did he fail in?

4. Did Major General Gascoigne recommend his being sent to England?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The instructions, which were not in any way unusual, cover five or six pages of typewritten foolscap, I am told by the officers of my department, and I think it would be more convenient if the hon. gentleman would move for them in the ordinary way. With regard to question 2, the examinations were in cavalry training and musketry. He passed the cavalry examination and failed in the musketry examination. I am informed, that the Major General was not consulted.

Mr. MONK. I would ask the hon. Minister if, to save me trouble, he would let me have the communication, as an answer to the first part of the question, instead of necessitating my moving for a return.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The instructions were the ordinary instructions given under such circumstances. They were not special.

INSPECTION OF THE PERMANENT MILITIA FORCE.

Mr. MONK asked,

1. On what dates has Major General Gascoigne inspected each unit of the permanent militia force?

2. Did he make a written report of each inspection, and, if so, will it be laid on the Table of the House ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. There is no record of such dates in the department, and, as the General Officer Commanding is absent in New York, the information cannot be obtained. 2. It is not customary for the General Officer Commanding to make written reports of such inspections, and, in the event of his doing so, they would not be laid on the Table of the House.

THE WALKS AROUND THE PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Who was the contractor for laying the asphalt walks around the Parliament Buildings last year ? Has the contract been finished and paid for ? Were there extras ? If so, how much did they amount to ? How much was paid under the contract, and how much for extras ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The Sicily Asphaltum Paving Company, Limited, of Montreal, which was the lowest tenderer. The contract is finished, but there is a balance due on work performed. There were no extras to the sidewalk contract. The sidewalk contract was for $2.19 per yard, and no extra or additional payment thereto was made. There were no extras in connection with the sidewalks. There was additional work in making scoria block watercourses and crossings and entrances at Main and East Block gateways. The contract price for the scoria block was $3.50 per yard, and amounted, in all, to $3,570. This work was not considered as an extra, being apart altogether from the contract for the sidewalk.

ST. JACQUES L'ACHIGAN POSTMASTER.

Mr. DUGAS (by Mr. Chauvin) asked,

1. Who is at present the postmaster of St. Jacques L'Achigan, county of Montcalm ?

2. On what recommendation was he appointed, and by whom was the recommendation made ?

3. Did the Postmaster General receive various petitions asking for the appointment of a postmaster for St. Jacques L'Achigan, county of Montcalm ?

4. What are the names of the several applicants, and the number of signatures attached to the petition in each case ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. Mr. Solomon Venne is at present postmaster of St. Jacques, county of Montcalm. There is no post office named St. Jacques L'Achigan. 2. He was appointed on recommendation of Hon. J. I. Tarte, and of Mr. Chas. Bazinet, M.P. 3. No petition was received asking for the appointment of a postmaster at St. Jacques L'Achigan, and one petition only was received asking for the appointment of a postmaster at St. Jacques, county of Montcalm. It asked for the appointment of the present postmaster. 4. There was but one applicant, the present postmaster. The petition in his favour which was received contained five signatures.

Mr. MONK.

TIMBER IN THE YUKON DISTRICT.

Mr. DOMVILLE (by Mr. Penny) asked,

Have the Government authorized Major Walsh to employ any one to dispose of timber in the Yukon district ? If so, who has Major Walsh employed for that purpose, and what instructions has he given him ? Tenders were called for and timber berths sold to the highest tenderer. Is it a fact that having sold timber berths, the Government or their employees are permitting people to go in for mere stumpage and cut timber when the department have already charged a large sum to others ? Is it true that parties are being permitted to cut timber off the limits sold at the foot of Laberge, and has the Government given instructions to the mounted police to protect the timber limits from being plundered ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). No special instructions were given to Major Walsh in regard to the disposal of timber ; but he has reported that he deemed it necessary to take steps to protect the timber. On the 23rd ultimo, two officers left Vancouver for the Yukon district for the purpose of taking charge of the timber business in the district, and Major Walsh was advised by letter of the action of the department. It is not, so far as the department is aware, true that any persons are being authorized to cut timber off limits sold at the foot of Lake Laberge.

THE YUKON TERRITORY—HOMESTEAD PRIVILEGES.

Mr. BERGERON (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

Whether it is the intention of the Government to extend the homestead privileges to the Yukon territory ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). No.

A RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Mr. McMILLAN asked,

Whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint a railway commission ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Government have it in contemplation to take up the subject of a railway commission and deal with it at an early date. I may say that it is not found practicable, owing to the condition of public business and for other reasons, to submit a measure with that object in view during the present session ; but I am in hopes that we may be able to do it next session.

RIVIERE STE. ANNE DE LA PERADE.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Chauvin) asked,

1. Whether the Department of Public Works have expended on repairs to works on Rivière Ste. Anne de la Pérade, the sum of $5,000 voted for that purpose on 20th May, 1897? 2. If not, is it the intention to do so this year?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say:—1. No. 2. Matter under consideration.

• BELLE RIVER, P.E.I., BREAKWATER.

Mr. MARTIN (by Mr. Macdonald, King's, P.E.I.) asked,

1. Does the Government intend to assume control of the breakwater at Belle River, in Prince Edward Island?

2. Has a Government engineer reported as to the importance of this work?

3. If so, what is the nature of the report, and does it refer to the condition of the breakwater or the amount required for its existence?

4. Does the Government intend to extend and improve it, and if so, when?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say:—1. No, not a present. 2. Yes. The late chief engineer, Mr. H. F. Perley, made a report on the 15th February, 1889. 3. Yes. The report states that the works are in a bad condition and estimates the cost of the repairs and extension required at $7,500. 4. Mr. Martin was informed in August, 1896, and April, 1897, in reply to questions asked by him in the House that the breakwater in Belle River was not one of the works that had been assumed by the Federal Government.

COLONIAL PREMIERS, LONDON CONFERENCE.

Mr. FOSTER moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the British Government and the Government of Canada, in reference to the conference of Colonial Premiers held in London in June, 1897, in accordance with Mr. Chamberlain's invitation of January 28th preceding, with the report of the proceedings of the same.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have no objection to the motion being granted, but I do not believe there is at present anything to be brought down which has not been made public. The conference which took place between the First Minister and Mr. Chamberlain is still confidential.

Mr. FOSTER. Whatever can be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

BONDING AND TRANSIT ARRANGEMENTS, &c., ON PACIFIC COAST WITH UNITED STATES.

Mr. FOSTER moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada, or any member thereof, and the United States Government, either directly or through the British Government or its representative at Washington, in reference to bonding or transit arrangements on the Pacific Coast, and to the relief of destitute persons in the Yukon or Alaska districts. Also, any reports of Ministers to the Government on these matters.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have no objection, but my hon. friend must understand that there are negotiations now going on which cannot be brought down until concluded.

Mr. FOSTER. That is always understood.

Motion agreed to.

VICTOR J. A. VENNER.

Mr. McALISTER. There is a motion in my name for information regarding the suspension from office of Victor J. A. Venner as Indian agent for the Restigouche band of Indians. At the time I gave this notice Mr. Venner was simply suspended from office, but since then, I have been informed, he has been dismissed, and I would ask leave to add after the word "suspension" the words "or dismissal."

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Stand.

Mr. FOSTER. This is simply an amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. If there is any objection, of course the motion cannot be moved.

Motion allowed to stand.

SUPPLIES, MILITARY CAMP AT ALDERSHOT.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for:

Return showing the names of all parties furnishing supplies for the military camp at Aldershot, King's county, Nova Scotia, since July, 1896, the rate of allowance or payment of each class of articles supplied, the names of the tenderers, the amount asked by each tenderer, and the amount allowed.

Also, a schedule of prices paid for each class of supplies for the camp at Aldershot, in 1895, 1896, 1897, and the names of the parties supplying each class of articles.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I beg to ask if the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) would object to having the words "from 1888 to 1897, inclusive," inserted in place of the words "in 1895, 1896, 1897," in the last line of the motion? There was really no camp in 1895, and I suppose the hon. gentleman wants to make a comparison.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Then the motion will be amended in the way I suggest?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Very well.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF POSTMASTER AT AGNES.

Mr. POPE moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, inspectors' reports, and all documents respecting the dismissal of the postmaster at Agnes and the removal of the office.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I wish to say to my hon. friend (Mr. Pope), as he has included inspectors' reports in this motion, that it has been customary to treat inspectors' reports as private. I do not know whether there is anything confidential in the report in this case. I have no objection to the motion, but I wish to say to my hon. friend that, if the report is of a confidential nature, it cannot be produced.

BOARD OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. JAMESON moved :

That the public interest demands that the railway companies of Canada should at the earliest possible moment be brought under the control of a Board of Railway Commissioners, clothed with full power to enforce the provisions of the Railway Act and to prescribe and enforce the observance of such regulations as may be necessary in the public interest.

He said: This notice, which stands in my name, was put on the Order paper some time ago. The matter has since been discussed to some extent, but I think that, in view of the importance which is attached to it in the North-west, it will do no harm to obtain an expression of opinion from members of the House on the subject of a railway commission, even although the Government have promised us to bring down a measure of this kind. The word "commission" is one of doubtful meaning. I wish to state briefly to the House the reasons why I think a measure of this kind is necessary, and why I believe it will be approved by the House and by the people of the country at large. While the question of railway transportation is one of interest to all in Canada, it is one of very special interest in western Canada, where I reside. Our situation is a peculiar one. We have to contend with geographical difficulties which other countries with which we have to compete in agricultural products, do not have to contend. In western Canada we have to compete, for instance, with such countries as India, such countries as the Argentine Republic, such countries as Russia, which have much readier access to the markets of the world than we have. Our position in the centre of the continent of America causes us to be geographically handicapped in our competition with other countries. Consequently the railway question is one which has always been considered of great moment to the people of western Canada. With all those disadvantages under which we have to contend the late Government placed legislation on the Statute-book that accentuated our difficulties and made our position far more onerous than it was before, which handicapped and intensified the extreme difficulties with which we have to contend. In Winnipeg, where I live, we are situated 1,500 miles from the Atlantic Coast and 1,500 miles from the Pacific Coast, and portions of the country are at far greater distances than those figures indicate. In addition, we have to contend against the fact that there is no proper tribunal capable of enforcing the provisions of the Railway Act. I contend the railway laws of Canada are not observed by the Canadian Pacific Railway and there is no tribunal sufficiently strong and experienced to force an observance of those laws. Contrast our position with that of the various countries with which we have to compete in the matter of immigration. If an intending emigrant in England wishes to decide as to the country in which he should settle, and considers the railway laws of the different countries, what will he find? He will find that if he goes to New Zealand and Australia there the Government own and control the railways. If he goes to the United States, where they have progressed far beyond Canada in the matter of railway legislation, he will learn that during the last eighteen years, while our Government has been placing a monopoly on the people of western Canada, the United States Government have been obtaining greater control over their railway system. Legislation has been introduced not only into the Federal Congress, but in the various State legislatures, which has given the people more control over the railways within the jurisdiction of the different legislatures. So we find Manitoba in this position, that whereas on one side of the line, that is to say in the State of Minnesota, there is a railway tribunal established—the establishment of which has been attacked as unconstitutional but whose authority has been maintained by the Supreme Court of the State of Minnesota—under the regulations laid down by that commission in the State of Minnesota, which is only separated from Manitoba by a line of iron posts, the rates are determined by the commission, which is composed of three commissioners elected by the people. In our province, on the other hand, the railway rates are established by a railway boss in Montreal. Thus a sharp contrast is presented between the railway laws of western Canada and those of the adjoining states of the republic. This difference greatly handicaps our efforts in the matter of immigration. The intelligent immigrant considers these points. He ascertains that the railway rates in the United States are controlled by the people, and that when he goes under the British flag, as he does when he enters western Canada, these railway rates are controlled by a railway boss in Montreal. Statistics show that this railway discrimination has been very detrimental to the cause of immigration. If we look at the census of 1896, the census of the province of Manitoba, we find that the population increased between 1891 and 1896 from 150,000 to 200,000 people; that is to say, with all our undoubtedly fertile land and with all the advantages we possess, our population increased in those five years only from 150,000 to 200,000 people. The natural increase of that country is at least 5,000 people a year, and therefore during those five years the only real increase has been 25,000, and I contend that that condition of affairs is vastly due to the fact that the railway laws and regulations are inferior to those in other countries with which we have to compete for immigration. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) stated the other day that the Canadian Pacific Railway did not exercise any great tyranny over the people in the west; he said that their rates were not excessive.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not say that.

Mr. JAMESON. I am glad the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) admits they are excessive. Suppose they were not excessive, I object nevertheless. I contend that we should be placed in as fair a position as other countries, such as the United States and countries under the British flag. It is said that in our railway management there is no despotism. It may be that the despotism of Van Horne and O'Shaughnessy may be a benevolent despotism, which they contend it is; but what I contend is that there should not be any discrimination, and that so little control should be exercised by the Government over the rates charged by the railways in Canada. It is not altogether a question of rates, but it is largely one of discrimination. If the railway company had not control of the rates, but the Government and the people exercised such control, as is the case practically to-day in the United States, the condition would be different from what it is to-day. If the companies choose to give special rates and rebates as they are doing to certain firms and corporations, they can make certain firms and corporations very remunerative and destroy others. If they favour particular towns, as they have done; if they discriminate against Winnipeg, as they have done, against my constituents, then there exists a despotism which does not prevail in other countries to which immigrants are invited. Even supposing those railway companies could show that their rates were not excessive, still the present condition should not be allowed to continue. We cannot hope, with that clause of the Canadian Pacific Railway against us, to secure relief; although I will make this suggestion, that an inquiry should be made by the Government as to what the clause means. The clause in the Canadian Pacific Railway Act to which I refer is that, providing that the Government shall have no control over the rates until 10 per cent is paid on the capital actually expended on the construction of the railway. I asked the other day whether this meant the capital actually expended by the railway company and by the Government, or only by the railway company. If it means the capital expended by the railway company, then I believe that point has been reached. I understand the company are paying 4 per cent dividend. Some of the shares were bought at 25 per cent on the dollar; consequently those shareholders are receiving 16 per cent dividend on their investment. This is a point which should be inquired into, whether the Canadian Pacific Railway are not to-day earning 10 per cent on the capital actually expended; and if such should be found to be the case, the Government would have control over the rates and would be in a position to remove special difficulties existing in western Canada which do not prevail in eastern Canada.

I am not going to occupy the time of the House by going into the question of grievances. We have grievances as to rates and as to discrimination, and I could occupy the time of the House two or three hours in enumerating them. I do not, however, base my case on that ground, and probably some other members from the North-west may bring forward instances of that kind. The tribunal which is supposed to control the railway is the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. I contend that the railways of Canada have altogether outgrown any possibility of control by such a body. This tribunal is composed of the Minister of Railways, the Minister of Justice and other members of the Privy Council of Canada. It consists therefore of men who are in charge of large departments of Government, whose time is fully occupied with the administration of the affairs of their departments, and who are consequently unable to give to the duties which devolve upon the Railway Committee, the time, and consideration, and attention that a due performance of these duties demand. In the consideration of even such minor matters as railway crossings, great delays and inconvenience result on account of the infrequent meeting of the committee; besides, no complainant can lay his grievance before this body without the aid of a lawyer. The majority of the members of that committee are not intimately acquainted with railway matters and are therefore at a still further disadvantage in that respect. Now, Sir, that is the great difficulty of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. Some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have contended that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council is a sufficiently strong authority to deal with the railways, but as I have already contended, the Railway Committee of Canada have reached that stage that they have outgrown any possibility of control of that committee. Considering the matters of detail with which these gentlemen have to deal, it seems to me impossible that they should be able to give time to properly administer such affairs, and to keep the railways in check. I have here the Railway Act of Canada which defines some of the duties of these gentlemen of the Railway Committee, and you can see from that the enormous number of details which devolve upon them, and how impossible it is for them to give their time fully, and with advantage to the public, to the performance of these duties. They have to deal, for instance, with the location of tracks, the maintenance of highways, the cost of fencing, adjustment of tolls, running powers, traffic arrangement, and transshipment or interchange of freight. This latter point is one with reference to which we have difficulties in the North-west. The railways in interchanging freight do as they like. They seem to be under no control. The Northern Pacific and the Canadian Pacific Railway in Manitoba do not seem to have any care for the public, they seem to do as they please, and they do not in that case at any rate, obey the provisions of the Railway Act at all. It is true that we cannot obtain the same perfect control over transportation in western Canada that has been obtained in some of the States of the Union, because we are tied up by this 10 per cent clause in the Canadian Pacific Railway charter. However, we can claim far greater control than we have at present. One of the most valuable rights obtained under such a State commission as that of Minnesota, is the right of the State to protect the individual in a far cheaper and more expeditious manner than is at all possible under our laws. If the rights of the individual are detrimentally affected, he has the privilege of appealing to the courts, but in practice this right of appeal gives no protection to the individual. If the ordinary citizen of small means finds his rights invaded by a railway company, he would prefer to suffer loss rather than to bring a lawsuit against a wealthy corporation which could ruin him financially by appealing from court to court. The people in some of the neighbouring

States have recognized this; they have recognized the fact that a private individual, a small farmer in the west, for instance, is not in a position to press a lawsuit against a railway company. The rich corporation can fight him, whether he has right on his side or not, and in view of this some of the States have adopted in their railway commissions a principle which I think should be adopted in any commission which may be established in Canada. That principle is: that if the individual can show a prima facie case, and the railway company refuses to remedy his grievance, then the State will take up the case of the individual against the railway company. That is provided in the Minnesota Act, which I think is about the best of all the Acts in reference to these railway matters. I have studied the Minnesota Act and the Iowa Act, and I have come to the conclusion that the Minnesota Act is on the whole the most perfect legislation in this regard. There is a provision in the law of the State of Minnesota by which the commissioners are constituted as it were, a Board of Arbitration between the public and the railway company. If a man has a grievance in connection with any matter which comes under the Railway Act, he either telegraphs or writes to the commissioners and they investigate it; not on the strict rules of evidence, but just as a minister or board of inquiry would investigate it. If they think that the complainant has just cause of grievance, they notify the railway company to remedy the grievance, and if the railway company does not remedy the grievance, then they have the power to put in motion machinery backed up with all the power of the State in order to ensure that the rights of the individual are protected. This is section 13 of the Minnesota Act to which I refer:

Any person, firm, corporation or association, or any mercantile, agricultural or manufacturing society, or any body politic or municipal organization complaining of anything done or omitting to be done by any common carrier in contravention of the provisions hereto, may apply to said commission by petition, which shall briefly state the facts.

The petition is frequently simply a telegram, as I can show from several Iowa cases which I have reported here. The clause goes on to say:

Whereupon the statement of the charges so made shall be forwarded by the commission to such common carrier, who shall be called upon to satisfy the complaint or to answer the same in writing within a reasonable time to be specified by the commission, and to serve a copy of such answer to the complainant. If such common carrier shall not satisfy the complaint within the time specified, and it shall appear to the commission that there is reasonable ground for investigating the matter set out in said complaint, the commission shall name a time and place when and where a hearing will be had before the commission, in the matter complained of.

It goes on to say as to what the findings of the commission shall be, and at the end :

If said common carrier shall neglect or refuse, within the time specified, to desist from such violation of the law, and make a reparation for the injury done, in compliance with the report and notice of the commission as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the commission to forthwith certify the fact of such neglect or refusal, and forward a copy of its report with such certificate to the Attorney General for the State, for redress and punishment as hereinafter provided.

That is the procedure in the State of Minnesota. There are two valuable principles in the Minnesota Railway Commission Law, and in my humble opinion it is the best Act in reference to these matters, and a law which we could easily imitate here. In the first place, the rates are controlled by the commission, and in the second place, the commissioners are a board of arbitration between the public and the railway companies for the redress of the grievances of the individual. I have in my hand the report of the railway commissioners of the State of Iowa which shows the procedures in the various cases and which is a very valuable book, and may, I suppose, be obtained by any member of Parliament. I obtained this book by writing to the Secretary of State, and I suppose anybody can get a copy of it. I will just read the headings of a number of the cases which were settled by correspondence. They were on these various matters: Overflow of lands, dangerous and dark street crossings, overcharge on buggy, failure to furnish cars, highway crossing, shortage of cars, failure to furnish cars again, books lost in transit, inquiry as to transit privileges, insufficient train service, station facilities, goods damaged in transit, inadequate freight train service, insufficient accommodation for passengers in cabooses, overcharge on young bulls, perishable freight—facilities for storing and shipping, farm crossing, discrimination in passenger fares, site for elevator, discrimination against short haul, discrimination in furnishing cars, refusal to furnish cars, discrimination in furnishing cars again, loading cars from wagons, discrimination in favour of Omaha. All these cases were settled by correspondence, and any cases which it was necessary should go before the courts, went to the courts. I have here a book for 1896, showing the numberless cases which were taken up by this commission and settled by telegram. For instance, a man would send a telegram complaining of not being furnished with cars or of being overcharged, and the commissioners would decide the case and tell the railway company to do justice. After these cases have been fought in the courts for years, matters have come to this point, that all the commissioners have to do is to instruct the railway companies to do justice, and they do justice without taking any chances by going before the courts. The hon. Minister of Railways seemed to think that it would be a stupendous task to legislate in the direction of the appointment of a railway commission in Canada; but I think it would be a great deal easier to do it in Canada than in the United States, for this reason. In the United States the Federal Government has jurisdiction over railways, and each State Government also has absolute jurisdiction over the railways within the limits of the state; but in Canada, it is otherwise. By declaring railways existing under provincial charters to be railways for the general advantage of Canada, we have practically transferred all jurisdiction over railways in Canada to the Federal Government; and therefore it would be necessary to have only one commission to control all the railways in Canada. I suppose we have about 5,000,000 people in Canada. In the agricultural State of Minnesota there are about 2,000,000 people, and if we were to follow their legislation, I think we would not be making a mistake. Fortunately, their legislation has been tested by scores of decisions in their courts. The Act appointing the Minnesota commission is a very short and simple Act, and I do not know that there is anything in it that we could not adopt in Canada, with certain modifications in names. What I would suggest, in conclusion, is that a railway commission should be created, and vested with all the powers of the present Railway Committee, and with further powers similar to those vested in the railway commissioners in Iowa and Minnesota, that is to say, powers sufficient to enable them to see that the provisions of the Railway Act, and all the amendments thereto, are carried out, and also powers to act as a board of arbitration between the public and the railway companies. I believe this is a matter of vital necessity to Canada in general, but especially so to western Canada. If we are to compete successfully for immigration, we must bring our railway laws up to date, and make them as nearly as possible equal to the laws of the countries with which we have to compete for immigration.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Mr. Speaker, I am in complete sympathy with the motion that has been moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson), for the appointment of a railway commission, for the very good reason that we in the west have had a certain number of grievances against the railway corporations for a number of years, and although we have been bringing them before this House and the country, through our representatives and our press, we have not up to the present got any relief. If we can secure a railway commission such as the hon. member proposes, I am sure it will be a boon to the people of the west. We know that existing freight rates are too high; but although they have been often enough brought to the attention of this House and the country, they have not as yet received attention. As the hon. member for Winnipeg says, we cannot interfere with the rates on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But there are a great many branch lines in the Territories, and a railway commission might do something to bring some relief to the people in the rates charged on these lines. I do not think the people are suffering as much from the rates on the main line as they are from those on some of these branch lines. In the district where I live, the people are paying enormous freight rates. The Saskatchewan and Long Lake Railway charges a freight rate of about 90 cents per hundred pounds, and a passenger rate of four cents a mile. When we take into consideration the vast amount of public land given for the construction of that road, and also the fact that it gets a cash subsidy in addition of $80,000 a year for twenty years, I think it will be conceded that the people in my section of country have a right to expect that they will be put in a position to have their produce hauled to market at a lower rate than they are obliged to pay at present. As the hon. member for Winnipeg has truly said, these high rates charged by the railway companies in the west have a great deal to do with preventing people going into the west to settle. We may appoint all the immigration agents and scatter all the immigration literature we please, but as long as the railway rates are kept at the present high figure, we are not going to get that measure of immigration that we have a right to expect. When the railway companies are able to take half the produce for currency charges, people feel, and feel rightly, that they cannot farm at a profit. Another thing which a railway commission would be able to do would be to take up and settle the small disputes constantly arising between farmers and merchants and the railway corporations. In cases of this kind, the settler would rather lose a few dollars than go to the expense of a lawsuit with a large railway corporation. I do not think I need say any more on this question. I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg will be successful in inducing the Government to see eye to eye with him in the matter, and that they will appoint a railway commission. I think it is time such a step should be taken in this country, as has been done by our neighbours on the other side of the line.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. In seconding the motion of my hon. friend, I wish to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, what he has said, and to address to the House a few other arguments in support of the case he has laid before you. It is certainly very necessary that some action should be taken to control our railway system throughout Canada. As matters now stand, the system, or rather want of system, which characterizes the management of our railways, imposes a very heavy burden upon the people, and it is only right that a Liberal Government, which is supposed to be a Government for the people, should take up this great question and deal with it in a manner satisfactory to all concerned. The question is one which should have been taken up years ago. Of late years there has been a great awakening in the public mind throughout the world on the question of railway legislation and railway matters generally, and, as my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) so ably pointed out, we are behind a great many other civilized countries in this respect. It is not so very long since heavy tolls were charged on a great many of the public highways throughout the civilized world, and we know that a wave of public indignation swept away a great many of these old-time barriers to traffic and transportation. But in Canada we are still in very much the same position with regard to railways as we were when the old toll-roads charged excessive rates. No doubt, transportation could be very much more easily and cheaply performed than at present, if our railways were owned by the Government. We have in this country created a great railway monopoly, one which bids fair to control the country, instead of the country controlling it, and it is now almost too late for us to speak about Government ownership of railway. That is an ideal condition to which we ought all to strive to attain, but, under present circumstances, the question of Government ownership of railways, however desirable or correct theoretically it may be, is hardly within the range of practical politics. The mistake was made years ago, when our railway system was first inaugurated. There is no doubt the building, management and control of railways would have been much more cheaply and efficiently carried out, if the people had taken hold of the question in a proper spirit at the start. The arguments adduced by many people against Government ownership and control of railways are fallacious. We have good evidence of that in the history of other countries, and also in the history of our own country, with regard to various public works which are carried on by the Government. The Post Office Department, in Canada and in other countries, is managed and controlled by the Government. In the old country, the telegraph and telephone lines are all conducted by the Government, and conducted most efficiently, satisfactorily and economically, and there is no reason why our railway system should not be carried on in the same way. Because the Intercolonial and other Government railways in Canada have, in the past, been used as political machines, is no reason why we should to-day take that view of the case and stand by it. If a commission were appointed, composed of men selected as our judges are, not so much for their political services as for their integrity and understanding and ability, if politics were excluded entirely from the personnel of the commission, no doubt our railways would be conducted in a business-like way and in the interests of the people of Canada. There are a number of evils in our present system, and one of the principal, perhaps the greatest, is the heavy bonding of roads in the course of construction. Railway companies are chartered and allowed to bond their roads as they are built, at sums very much larger than their cost. In this way, the roads are put in debt to an enormous extent, and, in order to pay the interest, very much heavier freight charges have to be imposed on the people than would otherwise be necessary. This has been the case with regard to the construction of many railways throughout the Dominion. This system is entirely wrong. No railway company should be allowed to issue bonds for more than the actual cost of the road as constructed. The railway which was referred to here the other night by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche), the Lake Dauphin Railway, is one which was constructed on the latter principle. No unnecessary bonds were issued, and there is no debt on the road except for the actual cost of construction. Consequently, that road does not require to earn money over and above the interest on its actual cost; and, as a proof of the wisdom of that policy, that company has, during the first year of its existence managed to pay its interest in full. If the construction of every other railway in Canada were managed in the same way, we would have little or no trouble with high freight rates, provided the roads were conducted honestly, as they should be. This is a very serious matter, as my hon. friend from Winnipeg has said, in Manitoba and the North-west, where we are under the control of a monopoly. In this part of the country you do not feel it to the same extent, because wherever two railways exist, no matter whether they may charge or pretend to charge the same rates, we all know that competition creates a great deal of accommodation which one railway does not give. My hon. friend alluded to the Northern Pacific. Now, the Northern Pacific charges the same rates as the Canadian Pacific Railway—or at least professes to charge the same—but the competition of the two roads makes a vast amount of difference to the people who live at those points in Manitoba which are served both by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Northern Pacific. It makes so much difference that the lumber dealers at Rat Portage and Keewatin have a special schedule, issued only at points which are touched by both railways. At points touched only by the Canadian Pacific Railway, there is a different schedule, because the rates are so much lower at the other points that two schedules have to be printed; and the merchants of Portage la Prairie and Brandon pay considerably less for their lumber than other towns, on account of the Northern Pacific bringing in Minnesota lumber to compete with Canadian lumber. In many others ways also we get accommodation. Those who lived in Portage la Prairie before the advent of the Northern Pacific are well aware of the great benefit which the Northern Pacific gives us by competition, and there is no doubt that the benefit which competing roads give would be very largely augmented, if they were brought under Government control.

The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) mentioned the fact that the roads in our country would not interchange freight. That is the fact as regards the Canadian Pacific Railway and the North-Western, and one or two others there, but it is not a fact as regards the Northern Pacific Railway. That railway is willing and anxious to interchange freight with any other roads, but its advances are invariably rejected. I wish to quote a few figures to show the difficulty under which people labour in Manitoba on account of the refusal of these railways to exchange freight. In quoting these figures, I shall point out the discrimination practised, showing the difference between the local freight rates, which were alluded to by the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) on the spur lines, and those charged on the main lines.

In speaking of the price of lumber at the town of Neepawa, let me quote the following figures:—

Were it not for the railway discrimination, the lumber combine could not control the market as it does. By referring to freight bills, it will be seen that the rate from Little Falls to Portage la Prairie over the N.P.R., a distance of 433 miles, is 16c, and the rate from Portage la Prairie to Neepawa, over the M. & N.W., 61 miles, is 10½c.; from Keewatin to Neepawa, over the C.P.R. and M. & N.W. lines, a distance of 254 miles, the rate is 15c., the C.P.R. share for the 193 miles to Portage la Prairie being 9½c., the M. & N.W. share for the 61 miles from Portage la Prairie to Neepawa 5½c. Thus, you will see the M. & N.W. discriminates against the N.P. in favour of the C.P.R. to the extent of almost double rates on inward freights.

I have a still more striking instance in regard to this same particular locality. The freight rate from Portage la Prairie to Port Arthur or Fort William is 18 cents per hundred pounds. The rate by the Northern Pacific from Portage la Prairie to Duluth is 18 cents also. The freight rate from Neepawa to Fort William over the Manitoba and North-Western and the Canadian Pacific is 19 cents. The rate from Neepawa over the Manitoba North-Western and Northern Pacific to Duluth is 30 cents, a difference of 11 cents. The reason for this is that the Manitoba North-Western, being largely under control of the Canadian Pacific Railway, refuses to transfer freight to the Northern Pacific and charges the full local rate of 12 cents per hundred pounds for the 61 miles from Neepawa to Portage la Prairie. Now, that is practically a prohibitory rate, and, as a consequence, there is no freight shipped from Neepawa by the Northern Pacific to Duluth, but what wheat is shipped is sent via Fort William; for no man can afford to pay 30 cents per hundred for shipping wheat when he can get it shipped for 19 cents. The Northern Pacific have, over and over again, offered to pay the Manitoba North-Western the same differential rate as is paid them by the Canadian Pacific, but their offers have invariably been rejected. Consequently, at any point in Manitoba, except at the points where these two main railways meet, there is no competition.

Now, there is another very serious matter which ought to be taken up by a railway commission, and which a railway commission could very properly handle, and that is a question which, during the past year, has been agitating the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west to a very great extent—the question of the elevator monopoly. We have had a good year in Manitoba and the North-west. While our crop was not a very large one, the price has been very good. The consequence is that the farmers have been fairly prosperous. But, in spite of that prosperity, what do we find? We find farmers all over the country holding meetings and discussing the grievance which they feel is inflicted upon them by the existence of this elevator monopoly? What is this elevator monopoly? With your permission, I will read from a resolution which was passed by the Farmer's Institute of Portage la Prairie, and which was forwarded to me. It goes on to say:

Whereas the railway companies of Manitoba, except the Manitoba North-western Railway,— —and I think the Dauphin Railway should be excepted—refuse to allow farmers to load grain on cars without passing through the elevators;

Whereas the said railway companies will not allow farmers to build or operate elevators or warehouses unless they are of a stipulated capacity and have cleaning and other extensive machinery there;

Whereas the said railway companies do allow milling and elevator companies to load grain through warehouses or uncleaning elevators, even at points where cleaning elevators exist;

Whereas many farmers who have been compelled to ship through these elevators claim to have lost both in grade and price, as the elevator operators will not bind themselves to give out the farmer's own identical grain or any guaranteed grade of the same;

Whereas the granting of this privilege has undoubtedly led to the formation of the combination of elevator and other interests, and this combination, coupled with the machinations practised in our present grading system, has and is seriously interfering with the farmer's rights by controlling largely the price paid for his produce:

Therefore, it is resolved, on behalf of the farmers of Manitoba, that this Institute would emphatically protest against such treatment, and call upon the Federal Government to abrogate the unjust privileges granted to the said railway companies, and request the Government to exercise its power, and, if necessary, compel the railway companies to do justice by accepting grain for transportation from farmers direct from their flat warehouses. And, further, that the Provincial Government be, and is hereby requested to co-operate with the farmers in this matter, and, if necessary, to make a test case in the courts on their behalf.

Now, Sir, this is a matter which agitated the farmers of Minnesota, as has been stated by my hon. friend from Winnipeg, and which agitated the farmers of Dakota also. A few years ago, the legislatures in those States, in order to deal thoroughly with the question established a State railway and warehouse commission—that is, a joint commission. The elevators were made public elevators, and the railways were compelled to accept grain from the farmers' wagons without putting it through elevators. Long platforms were erected at the stations, and the farmers of Minnesota and Dakota enjoy the privilege which is denied our farmers, of loading grain from wagons. The same privilege also exists in Iowa, as I shall show you in a few moments.

Now, the matter on our side, if I understand it properly, stands in this position—there is an agreement between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the owners of the elevators whereby, on condition of the elevators erected being of a certain price and up to a certain standard, the railway company refuse to accept grain from farmers' wagons or through flat warehouses or in any other way. Now, the object of the farmers in obtaining the privilege of loading from wagons or from flat warehouses, is this—that, while we have no doubt that a large majority of the owners and operators of elevators throughout Manitoba and the North-west are men of the highest character, men who would not, under any circumstances, do any thing wrong, still, there is a possibility, that, here and there throughout the country, men may be in charge of elevators whose morals are not up to the required standard. Men in these positions have very large control over farmers in the neighbourhood. The man in charge of the elevator takes in the wheat, but does not guarantee to give the farmer back his own identical wheat—that of course, would be practically impossible in many cases—but he does not even agree to give him wheat of a similar grade. Consequently, the farmers are at the mercy of the elevator man, and many instances are on record where the farmers' confidence has been abused. The farmer regards this as a grievance and claims the right to load his own wheat from his own wagon into the cars, ship it to the commission merchant or anybody he chooses, and thus be able to live independent of the grain men whether in the combine or otherwise. I wish to call your attention to the report of the Iowa state railway commission covering a similar case. I trust the House will not weary if I take a little time in reading the report of this case. It is not long :

J. H. Strong & Co., Luton, vs. Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company.
Filed Oct. 9, 1896.

The complainants in substance protested against an alleged order of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, barring them from track shipping on and after Oct. 9, 1896, stating that this would work a hardship upon them in favour of the elevator men, and asking early attention.

The case was at once taken up with Mr. A. C. Bird, general traffic manager of the respondent company, who answered on Oct. 17, as follows :—

Chicago, Oct. 17, 1896.

Mr. W. W. Ainsworth, Secretary, Railroad Commissioners, Des Moines, Iowa :

Dear Sir,—I have yours of the 13th inst., in which you forward copy of letter from C. J. Milligan and J. H. Strong & Son, protesting against an order issued by our company, which company prevents complainants from track shipping on and after the date named.

In reply I beg to say that it is with the utmost difficulty we can supply our patrons with the necessary means of transportation. The demand for cars at the present time is greater than is our ability to supply, and we are, therefore, obliged to refuse cars to any one who is not able or willing to load them in the usual time.

The shippers referred to are "track buyers," and none of them have warehouses to store grain in, and are thus compelled to load cars from the wagons as the grain is brought in in varying quantities by the farmers. Several cars have been thus delayed from three to ten days. If the gentlemen who complain will load their cars within the regular time limit which is required of every one, they will receive their quota of cars. We cannot fill all orders, but will, as far as possible, give each shipper and each station, for that matter, a pro rata of cars at our disposal.

Yours truly,

A. C. BIRD,
General Traffic Manager.

Copy of the foregoing was sent the complainants on Oct. 22, 1896, calling their special attention to the statement of Mr. Bird, that "if the gentlemen who complain will load their cars within the regular time limit which is required of every one, they will receive their quota of cars."

Nothing further being heard from Mr. Milligan, the case is closed.

Now, Sir, what would have been the result in that case if there had been no railway commission in the state of Iowa? These men might have asked for cars until doomsday, and the chances would have been very much against their getting them; but the State Railway Commission stepped in and ordered the company to supply those men with cars, and they were supplied. We know in many similar grievances throughout the country the farmer is helpless, the merchant is helpless, the ordinary citizen is helpless, because, as was stated by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson), it is out of the question for an ordinary individual to cross swords with a large railway corporation. He may obtain a verdict before a jury, but he is invariably met with an appeal, and appeal follows appeal, until finally he is glad to give up, he is glad to do anything, glad to settle at any price, in order to get out of the enormous expense of litigation to which he has been put. Now, my hon. friend from Winnipeg read the headings of a number of cases which had been settled by correspondence alone. Among these there is a very interesting one he mentions, namely, the site for an elevator. Now, here is a most interesting case. We find that a railway in the west refuses to allow elevators to be built at a certain point where they say there are enough elevators now, and that it is not advisable to have another elevator erected there. We find that the railway companies up there have the right to decide as to the size and capacity and price and standard of the elevator which is to be erected at these stations. Now, here is a case in point also settled in a very satisfactory way by the Iowa State Commission :

Primghar Grain Company, Williams Bros. et al., Primghar, vs. Illinois Central Railroad Company.

Petition filed July 5, 1896.

On July 5 the following petition was filed in the office of the Railroad Commissioners :—

In the matter of the application of the Primghar Grain Company, for an order compelling the Illinois Central Railroad Company to permit an elevator to be erected on the right of way at Primghar, Iowa.

To the Honourable Board of Railroad Commissioners, Iowa :

Gentlemen,—We the undersigned named citizens of O'Brien county, Iowa, who reside in the vicinity of the town of Primghar, and who make said town their trading point and market to sell grain, respectfully petition and ask that an order be made and entered against the Illinois Central Railroad Company, compelling them to allow the Primghar Grain Company, composed of Williams Bros. and others, to erect and operate an elevator on said railroad company's right of way at Primghar, Iowa, and as grounds therefore state the said commissioners the following reasons :—

1st. That the Primghar Grain Company petitioned the Illinois Central Railroad Company for a place to put in an elevator at Primghar and were refused, as shown by letter of C. K. Dixon, superintendent of railroad companies, hereto attached.

2nd. That there are only two elevators at Primghar; one is owned by C. E. Achorn, of Sutherland, and the other by the Chicago and O'Neill Grain Company, of Chicago, and to the best of our knowledge and belief, said two elevators have combined together and have an understanding and agreement about the prices of grain, so there is no competition—

It seems that the grain dealers are very much alike in Iowa and Manitoba. They have an understanding or agreement about the price of grains, so there is no competition.

—and they do not pay the average market price, or as much as is offered for grain at other towns in the county, thereby causing the farmers to haul their grain to Sanborn, Sutherland and Paullina, in order to get the average market price for said grain, greatly to the disadvantage of both the farmers and business men of the town and city of Primghar.

3rd. That the farmers selling grain have frequently been able to get from two to three cents per bushel more for the same grades of grain at the Achorn elevator at Sutherland than they could at the Achorn elevator at Primghar, and the same condition exists at Sanborn and Paullina over Primghar.

Mr. Speaker, I could fancy I was reading about Manitoba, only the names are different, the names of the people and the little towns are different, but we have exactly the same condition of affairs existing up there.

For the reasons above set forth, and in justice to the farmers and business men of Primghar, we, the undersigned petitioners, ask that an order be entered requiring the Illinois Central Railroad Company to grant and furnish for the Primghar Grain Company proper room and space on the right of way of said company at Primghar, suitable for the erection and maintaining of a grain elevator, and to make such other and further orders as by law required in such cases.

Then follow the signatures of the petitioners.

The letter of Mr. C. K. Dixon, superintendent, referred to in the petition, was as follows:—

Cherokee, Iowa, July 8, 1896.

Messrs. Williams Bros., Primghar, Iowa:

Gentlemen,—I inclose herewith copy of a letter written by my superior officer, declining to give you lease of ground for elevator purposes at Primghar. I also inclose copy of your application for the ground, as per your request of the 20th ultimo.

Yours truly,
C. K. DIXON,
Superintendent.

Copy of Inclosure.

Dear Sir,—Referring to your letter of May 7, and returning papers in relation to application of the Primghar Grain Company and Messrs. Henderson and Ingold for lease of the same piece of ground at Primghar, Iowa, for an elevator, which would necessitate the construction of a spur track at an estimated cost of $375:

As there are already two elevators at this point, it does not seem advisable to spend this amount of money for additional tracks, and the application is denied for this reason.

Yours truly,
J. G. HARTIGAN,
Assistant General Superintendent.

On July 15, 1896, copy of the petition was forwarded Mr. J. T. Harahan, second vice-president Illinois Railroad Company, for attention and answer. Under date of July 20, Mr. Harahan wrote the board stating that he would "have this matter looked into at once." Mr. T. F. Ward, attorney for petitioners, was so advised.

On July 1, 1896, the following was received from Mr. H. L. Williams for petitioners:—

Primghar, Iowa, July 30, 1896.

W. W. Ainsworth, Esq., Secretary, etc., Des Moines, Iowa:

Dear Sir,—In reference to the application of the Primghar Grain Company for grounds to erect grain elevators on right of way of Illinois Central Railroad grounds at Primghar, Iowa, would say that unless action is taken at once it will be too late to do anything this year. We trust you will compel—

Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House to that word "compel."

—that you will compel the railroad company to make a showing at once, that we may know what to do.

Yours truly,
H. L. WILLIAMS.

Fancy a merchant or a farmer in Manitoba telling anybody to compel the Canadian Pacific Railway to do anything.

Copy of the foregoing was immediately forwarded to Mr. Harahan, and he was asked whether his investigations had been completed, and, if so, what position his company took in the matter.

In answer thereto, Mr. Harahan wrote the board, under date of August 11, 1896, saying, among other things:

He does not quote the "other things."

I have had this matter carefully looked into, and the information I have now received would tend to show that there is a necessity for another elevator at that point. I have, therefore, instructed that a location be given the Primghar Grain Company, which, I understand, is composed of Williams Bros. and others, on which to erect an elevator.

If a similar request were sent to the Canadian Pacific Railway, no doubt they would say a great "many other things." The reply would be full of "other things"; but we would not get any such concession.

Under date of August 13, the foregoing statement was communicated to Messrs. Williams Bros. for petitioners, who, in a letter received by the board, August 18, 1896, say:

Yours of August 13 received and noted, and we relieve you from further notice, and the case may now be closed as to location for elevator at Primghar, Iowa.

WILLIAMS BROS.

The case is closed.

I apologize for taking up the time of the House by reading this case, but I could not in one hour have more accurately described the difference in the condition of affairs existing in Manitoba from that in Iowa under the railway commission, and I could not have adduced a better argument in support of the creation of a railway commission to control our Canadian railways. Grievances of all kinds would then be looked after by a properly constituted authority. I regretted to hear the hon. Minister of Railways state that it would be impossible to bring in a Bill this session, because we from the North-west, and I am sure a large number of other members from various parts of Canada are anxious to see this question satisfactorily settled as soon as possible. I trust there will be no delay. I trust that even if we cannot have the whole question satisfactorily settled, the hon. Minister will do what he can to remove the grievance inflicted on the farmers in the North-west by the existence of the elevator monopoly. From the answer given to my question the other day by the hon. gentleman it would appear that the Government have the power to deal with that matter under subsection 2 of section 246 of the General Railway Act. If the Government did so this year, the farmers of western Canada would feel deeply and heartily thankful. A commission composed of three gentlemen selected for their ability and integrity, men above suspicion, well trained with no pronounced political proclivities, and sufficiently paid to enable them to put aside all political proclivities and act as do our judges on the bench, solely in the best interest of the people without fear or favour, would be able to do much more and their actions would be infinitely more satisfactory than the present Railway Committee of the Privy Council. No one doubts the ability of the present committee, but it is impossible for men whose time is so fully occupied as is the time of those gentlemen to devote the same attention to questions of rates and similar matters as a railway commission specially constituted for that purpose.

Mr. MACLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I very much regret the absence of so many members to-day when so important a question is brought before the House. I also regret the absence of so many Ministers when this question is up, and I regret especially that the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) is not in his place, because when he occupied a seat on the Opposition benches, he had a forward policy on this transportation question, but now we do not hear his voice. But as one who does believe in railway reform, as one of those forward Conservatives who intend to make this railway question a prominent one at the next elections, and who intends from this day forth to keep it before the people of Canada, I rise to state my views on this great question. I believe it is the greatest issue we have before us in this country to-day.

We can deal with this question in a great many ways. It has been suggested that we should have a railway commission appointed; that we should go in for the nationalization of railways; that we should extend our present state railways; and there is another and immediate course to adopt, and it is to this I will first address myself, and that is that this House can now with the power at present in the hands of the Government, decide, if it sees fit, to take steps to ameliorate the existing state of affairs. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when this question is brought up, are in the habit of saying: you are proposing something radical. Even if it should be something radical, I contend that we should at least endeavour to do something to ameliorate the railway situation and I now propose to suggest the method. In the first place, this Parliament ought to exercise a greater and stronger check on every railway Bill presented to this House. The Government should insist that there should not be unnecessary duplication of roads. That is the curse of the system to-day. Competition does not always bring about reduction in rates. If the number of roads is increased unnecessarily, we at the same time increase the burdens on the freights to be carried from different points. We must, therefore, stop unnecessary duplication and unnecessary stocking and bonding of railways, and in that way we can reduce the burdens which the traffic has to bear. It devolves on the Government to regulate and carefully guard every railway Bill that passes through Parliament. They should first insist on the 2 cents passenger rate. That would be a great reform and relief to the people. But the members of the Government are in the habit of saying that we must make this a sweeping measure. No; let hon. gentlemen embody this change in the first Bill coming before this House; and I will test the opinion of the House at the first opportunity. Another question has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Railways, and it is one in regard to which something should be done now, and that is in respect to the clause in the Canadian Pacific Railway Act providing that the Government shall not interfere with the tolls until the road has earned 10 per cent on the capital of the company. I asked last session whether the Minister intended to take steps to ascertain the capital actually invested in the railway, and the hon. gentleman replied that he did not intend to take any such steps. I contend that it is the duty of the hon. gentleman to ascertain the amount the Canadian Pacific has actually cost, and also to ascertain, what has been suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson), whether 10 per cent earnings applies to the amount spent by the company or the amount spent both by the company and the country. That is a duty that should be discharged at once, and I call on the hon. Minister to inform the House why it has not been discharged, and whether he intends to discharge it or not, and I now draw the attention of the hon. gentleman's colleagues to their duty in that respect. Another way in which to regulate the railways and to ameliorate the grievances is to give the companies no further concessions until they remedy the grievances complained of. We have grievances in Ontario with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. The hon. Minister of Railways is not satisfied that the law is sufficient to regulate them. But these companies are here every day of the session to secure additional favours and concessions, and we should say to them that the Government will grant no favours or concessions until existing grievances are remedied. That would be following the practice in England, where Parliament refuses to grant favours unless grievances are remedied. These grievances exist to-day, and as the representatives of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway are constantly here let the Government announce that no more concessions will be made and no more subsidies granted or favours conferred until they remove the railway grievances prevailing in Ontario. The members of the West, who are in the main supporters of the Government can in this way get a remedy to-morrow almost, for the transportation grievances in their country. They can have the remedy right here in Parliament by insisting on the Government extending our present national railway system to the city of Winnipeg. They have extended the Intercolonial Railway to the city of Montreal. They are committed to the principle, they can go further and take running rights over the Canada Atlantic Railway and the Ottawa and Parry Sound road; they can then get steamer connection to Port Arthur, and now while the Rainy River Railway is in their hands, they have an opportunity to protect the public as to that line. They have an opportunity to put in the Rainy River Railway Bill a provision insuring that the national railway system of Canada shall be extended to Winnipeg. There is a check on the Canadian Pacific Railway for you; there is where hon. gentlemen who call themselves Liberals and who come from the North-west; there is where they can, if they wish to protect their country, take a stand now and call upon the Government to do this. The Government having extended the national railway from Quebec to Montreal, let them take the running rights to Parry Sound, thence by steamer to Port Arthur, and after that, running powers over the Rainy River Railway. That is the most important issue in this country to-day. That is where this House can do something; that is where this Government can do something, and most of all, that is where the members who come from Manitoba, from the Territories, and from British Columbia, can do something to ameliorate these railway grievances of which they complain. If you put the Intercolonial Railway into Winnipeg it is easy to get from Winnipeg across the plains where you make connection with the Crow's Nest road, and running powers have been retained to the state over that road. In that way you will have a transcontinental line controlled and regulated by the state. If we are to secure that, it must be done now, and the Government must have the courage, and the members from the western provinces must have the courage to insist upon its being done.

Another thing the Government can do, is to abolish the pass abuse that exists in this country. The leader of this House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the Postmaster General

Mr MACLEAN.

(Mr. Mulock), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), are on record in this Parliament as saying that the pass abuse must be regulated, but they have not attempted it yet. When do they propose to take action? Until that pass abuse is abolished and until Parliament compels railways either to carry members of Parliament free, or gives members of Parliament money to pay for their railway transportation, there will be no headway in railway legislation in this country. I may tell hon. gentlemen that the people of Canada are satisfied to-day that there is something wrong in this House, that there is some reason why railway reform does not come, and within my knowledge a great many think it is because this pass abuse exists. We have a Government in power now that claims to be progressive, and it is their duty to do something at once in regard to this matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have given a number of instances to show wherein this Government and this Parliament can do a great deal to remedy the evils of the transportation system. I have shown that they can exercise a check on new legislation; that they can insert more stringent clauses in every railway Bill going through this House; that they can give us a 2 cent transportation rate for passengers in every new railway Bill; that they can compel the big corporations to remedy existing grievances by refusing them any further concessions until they remove these grievances; that they can abolish the pass abuse, and that they can extend the national railway to Winnipeg. Sir John A. Macdonald was able to regulate the railways in a way, by withholding legislation, and I direct the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) to that. There was what is called the monopoly clause in the Canadian Pacific Railway charter, and when the Canadian Pacific Railway came to the Government for further aid, Sir John Macdonald said: We will give you that further aid provided you remove that monopoly. That was the way to do it, and the same method is open now to hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Why did they give them a monopoly in the first place?

Mr. MACLEAN. Why are you giving them a monopoly now in the Yukon country; I will put you a question, if you are in that humour. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to make a party issue of this; I deprecate the idea of bringing party into a question of this kind. I am glad to see that this question has been raised by a Liberal member from Manitoba, and, Sir, I will support any Liberal in any progressive measure of railway reform. Any criticism I am offering here on this matter is not of a partisan character; I am ready to give the Government credit where credit is due. I give them credit for bringing the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, although I am not able to approve of the method by which they did that. I give them credit for retaining a certain control in the Crow's Nest Pass Railway; I think they should have retained more. In every way in which the present Government endeavour to solve this transportation problem, I as a Conservative will be only too glad to give them support, and I do not wish in any way to mix up politics with the issue.

But there are other things that can be done. There can be a railway commission established as is now proposed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jameson). That railway commission could accomplish a great deal, and I regret that the hon. Minister (Mr. Blair) told us the other day, that he did not see that we could establish it this session. Why not this session? Is there any question more important to the country? Surely the Government are not holding back the establishment of this railway commission until such time as that monster monopoly the Canadian Pacific Railway has grabbed everything in sight, and until nearly everything will be gone in the way of railway extension. Now is the time to do it, and the Government can do a great deal if they wish to. A first-class railway commission can do a great deal of good, and a comparatively trivial Act of Parliament can begin it this very session. First of all, that commission could take over the jurisdiction of the present Railway Committee of the Privy Council; it could be given additional powers and those powers could be gradually extended. If the Government be in earnest about the matter, that commission could be established this session by simply transferring the powers of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council to this railway commission, and gradually extending and expanding these powers at subsequent sessions of Parliament. I admit that you cannot make all these sweeping reforms at present, but you can begin action, and it is to begin action that I am urging on the Government to-day. That commission will not cost this country a great deal, although I may say I believe in paying these men well. If you have three men whom you expect to give their entire service to Canada in this respect, they ought have $10,000 or $15,000 a year. You should get the very best men in the country and they ought to be free of Government influence or party influence or influence of any kind. They ought to consecrate their efforts to acting as judges between the people and the railway companies, and they ought to be placed in a position to hold court in any part of the country. It is a great inconvenience to people to attend the meetings of the Railway Committee in Ottawa, it is hard to bring the witnesses and get at the facts here; but if we had a commission with power to go to any part of Canada where an issue had arisen it would be a great convenience. They could settle the issues between a farmer and a railway company, between a municipality and railway company, and between railway companies one with the other. That commission would be essentially in the interests of the people; and it would cost comparatively a small sum of money, and it could be instituted this session if the Government were in earnest. I regret that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) who brought up this question quite a number of years ago, is not here to-day to tell the people where he stands on this question. He raised false hopes in their hearts years ago; he said he staked his future on the establishment of a railway commission in Canada, but for a number of years of late, his voice has been silent. I believe that hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) will return to Canada shortly, and I hope he will find occasion to tell the people of Canada what his position is now in regard to the establishment of a railway commission.

Another thing we can do in regard to railway transportation is to lay down the principle, that Canada is to take a stand for the nationalization of her railways. That may be a hopeless programme to some of you, but I know of no idea in the higher field of politics that is growing with more force than the idea of nationalization of railways, all the world over. In Australia they have nationalized their railways and it has proven a great success; in several of the countries of Europe they have nationalized their railways and always with beneficial results. The people have better transportation, they have cheaper transportation, and the countries that adopted the policy of the nationalization of railways are continuing that policy and extending its scope. Only the other day, the people of Switzerland voted in favour of the nationalization of the railways in that country. In the United States, where there are enormous railway grievances, and where it is much more difficult, owing to the constitution of the country, to regulate the railways, there is an agitation for the nationalization of the railways. I know of no means of realizing that fact so easily as by reading an article on the subject in the February number of the "North American Review." The writer of that article shows that the whole issue with regard to railways settles down to this, that there are four or five great countries in the world which are seeking to supply food products to Europe—North America, South America, principally Argentina, Australia and Russia—and he holds that that country which has the cheapest and best transportation will win in the fight. So convinced is he of that, that he holds that the only way the United States can hold its own in the coming competition with Russia, Canada, South America and Australia is, by the nationalization of the Pacific railways west of the Missouri. He says, that he would not take the responsibility of suggesting the nationalization of the railways east of the Mississippi, which is almost too enormous a task; but he shows clearly how it would pay the United States, even at this late date, to nationalize the great continental roads west of the Missouri River. All over the world this movement for the nationalization of railways is in progress, and it is a growing movement. It is a movement with which Liberals ought to identify themselves; but very few of them have yet dared to say, as I have said, that I am in favour of the nationalization of the railways. I do not wish hon. gentlemen to say that I am asking too much, and therefore nothing can be done. A great deal can be done, and done this session, by the Government with the powers they now possess. All they want is the courage and energy to do what can be done; and those Liberals who have railway grievances should insist on the Government doing something in that direction. If we are a people who believe in our representative institutions, these Liberals must join hands with us who claim to be progressives, in seeking to put down monopolies in this country. If there is any force that is threatening our representative institutions, it is these enormous monopolies which we have created. The Canadian Pacific Railway is a dangerous monopoly. It has too much power at this moment. In this connection, I would point out to my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) in what way he could do something to trim the wings of the Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly, that is, in regard to their telegraph monopoly. I believe the time has come when the telegraph lines of this country should be taken over by the state, and administered as a portion of the Post Office Department. As a newspaper man, I can say this further—and Mr. Hays, of the Grand Trunk Railway, pointed it out the other day—that, in the present dispute between the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway had the enormous advantage of controlling the news service supplied to the newspapers of this country. It is high time that that should come to an end, and one way by which it can be brought to an end is, by the Government taking over the telegraph service of this country. To show the House that the people of this country are in earnest in demanding railway reform in the direction of the nationalization of monopolies, I wish to read an account given in the Hamilton "Herald" of a meeting held in that city the other night:

The seating capacity of the Bricklayers' Hall was hardly sufficient to accommodate the attendance of social reformers—

I am a social reformer, Mr. Speaker, if hon. gentlemen like to call me that.

—at the meeting called by the Trades and Labour Council last evening to complete the organization of a general social reform society. Representatives of the East and West End Workingmen's Clubs, Single Tax Society, Socialists, Co-operative Commonwealth, Co-operative Trade Company, Industrial Brotherhood, and others interested in the movement were present. The discussion of the various clauses of the platform occupied the attention of the meeting until a late hour, and resulted in the adoption of the following basis of organization:—

Mr. MACLEAN.

I will only read two or three of those:

4. The operation of all natural monopolies by the Dominion and Provincial Governments, in the interest of the whole people.

5. The operation of all municipal franchises by the municipalities.

The same feeling which pervaded this crowded meeting pervades the people of Toronto. They are in favour of the nationalization of monopolies. It is the question before the people of this country; it is the question before the people of most countries. It is making great strides in most countries where it comes up, and this Parliament, if it wishes to be alive and up to date, must take up these questions and deal with them on the lines of nationalization. At the present time, especially, it must deal with them on the lines of national control. It is a great satisfaction to me to be able to stand up here to-day and say that I am in favour of these reforms. I believe that something should be done to promote them. I hope the Minister, when he makes his statement to-day, will state when he will introduce this proposed railway legislation. I hope he will introduce it this session, notwithstanding what he has said to-day, and I hope he and the First Minister will pay some heed to the things I have said as to what the Government can do at the present moment for the amelioration of the transportation problem of this country. Especially do I ask the members from the Northwest, who are in a position to press upon the Government to do something in the direction of removing the grievances of which they complain.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at any length on this subject, nor would I have spoken at all, had it not been for the importation into the discussion of the question of the elevator monopoly by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford). That question, as most of the members who read the press of the Northwest, and as most of the people of Canada know, is a burning one in that country. It may not be within the knowledge of the members of this House, but it is a fact, nevertheless, that the general impression throughout that country is, that, owing to the elevator monopoly, the farmers of Manitoba and of the North-west Territories suffered a loss in connection with the marketing of their wheat during the past year of $1,000,000. That, Mr. Speaker, is a remarkable statement, but I believe that later on this session I shall be able to prove its accuracy to the House. During the past few months, I have been collecting data with regard to this subject, and I hope, at a later stage, to be able to lay before the House information which, if it does not entirely prove, will go in the direction of proving, the absolute accuracy of that statement. I have introduced a Bill, in the form of an amendment to the general Railway Act, which, if it passes, will compel the railway companies to carry wheat for farmers which may be loaded at the railway stations, not necessarily from the elevators, which is at present compulsory, but from flat warehouses or from farmers' vehicles. These elevators are controlled generally, if not entirely, by grain dealers. In that country, in the last year, there was formed what is known as a syndicate of syndicates. This syndicate of syndicates controls practically all the elevators in that country, with the exception, I believe, of such as are in the hands of the Ogilvies, and consequently all the farmers are obliged to store their grain in these elevators and pay a cent and a half per bushel for that privilege. In the second place, the owners of these elevators whom the syndicate of syndicates control, by mixing the grades, as they seem to be able to do, are able to practically steal from the farmers from one to three cents a bushel. Thus the farmers suffer grievous wrong through this elevator monopoly.

I had hoped that the Government would have been prepared this session to deal with the question of a railway commission. If it were to appoint such a commission as would deal effectively with these questions, it would not be necessary for myself and my hon. friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), who has also introduced a Bill dealing with the same matter, to press our measures to a conclusion. I am quite sure that members from the west who have been studying this question, and who have been pressed by their constituents, from time to time, to bring it before Parliament, will never, until successful, cease in their advocacy of some measure which will effectively kill this elevator monopoly in the North-west. If the Government does not provide for the appointment of a railway commission this session, I shall certainly do my best and I am sure the other members from the west will do the same, to prevail upon the Government to allow this Bill of the hon. member for Assiniboia, or the Bill I have myself introduced to become law. I am sure that the Government and the members of this House, when they see the facts that we shall be able to bring before them will support such a measure. As I have already pointed out, the farmers of our western country suffered to the extent of nearly a million dollars during the past season in the handling of their grain. Hon. members know well how the people of the North-west have struggled to hold their own, and I would appeal to them to stand by those who are preparing to press for legislation to relieve our farmers in this connection. With regard to the point made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) that the west would be assured in the control of rates on the Rainy River Railway, the construction of which is now proposed by virtue of the aid already voted by this House and voted by the Ontario Legislature, and which, it is reported, will be proposed this session by the Manitoba Legislature, I am heartily in accord with his suggestion. I may say that if the Greenway Government had been able to assure absolute control of rates upon the road recently proposed to Duluth, it is my belief that that road would be under construction at present, to connect the wheat fields of Manitoba with Duluth. If it is correct, as reported, that Mr. Greenway is now preparing to secure much needed competition by way of the Rainy River road, then every one will trust that such precautions will be taken as may insure the absolute independence of that road and the control of its rates by the Manitoba Government.

In the States of Minnesota and the Dakotas, the settlers suffered as they do in Manitoba and the North-west by reason of an elevator monopoly, but railway commissions were appointed and that question was so thoroughly dealt with that the farmers of these states have no longer any ground of complaint in that regard. The farmers are enabled to load their grain directly from their vehicles or flat warehouses on to cars at the various stations. I hope to be able to lay before the House the facts in this connection which will be perfectly satisfactory, and I trust will influence members of this House to support the measure I shall submit to them later on.

Mr. SPROULE. As one who has always advocated the appointment of a railway commission, I wish to say a few words. I have never seen occasion to change my mind from the first time the proposition was submitted, and that was many years ago. It was introduced originally in this House, I think, by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), it was advocated for several years, and finally an agreement was reached between the Government and him—upon what ground, whether the sunny ways of conciliation or the influence of the railway companies, I do not know that he should abandon his Bill and that instead a Railway Committee of the Privy Council would be appointed. That was expected to do the same work and just as effectively as any railway commission. The railway Committee of the Privy Council has been in operation many years, and public opinion is to the effect that it has not been instrumental in doing the work expected. It would be interesting to-day to have a report of the classes of complaints submitted to that tribunal for adjudication, because I am sure it would be found that a great many of the cases which it was expected would come before that body never reached it at all. After the trial of a few cases, it was found that the tribunal was one which ordinary individuals could not approach with any hope of getting the consideration they were entitled to. What benefit has resulted from the formation of that Railway Committee of the Privy Council? Largely, I think, it has been instrumental in settling disputes between railway companies themselves with regard to crossings and like matters, or with regard to the right of the public to have highways over railways or to have certain places in cities, where railways pass, protected. These are the cases that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council has dealt with more than any other. But a railway commission would settle a great many other cases which are not taken before the railway committee at all. The moral power behind that commission would help them to settle a great many such cases. What powers should such a commission have? In my opinion, they should have both executive powers and the powers of a court of inquiry. A commission could act more readily here than in the United States. It has been said that the commissions in the United States are not effective, but there is a great obstacle in their way, namely, that they are State commissions. The American railways commissioner is under state laws, whereas here they are under federal laws. A state can only control a railway so far as the powers of the state go, but here the federal power controls the railways all over the country. A railway commission would have a strong moral force. It would not be subject to the political influences to which the Government is subjected, and it would therefore act more independently. Such commission should be composed of at least three members—first, a railway expert; second, a legal expert; and third, a man of good intelligent, common sense.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPROULE. Sometimes these professional men and experts are not possessed of this qualification as men are outside of the professions. What have other governments done in this matter? It has been said that in England, where they have had the same trouble to contend with a great many years, their railway commission has not been a success. But I find that, as far back as 1840, the House of Commons referred the subject of a commission to a special committee of the House. It was referred again in 1844 and again in 1865, and the result of the report that was made by these various committees was that in 1872 a railway commission was appointed. After that commission had been in operation for some time a report was made by a select committee showing some of the things that had been accomplished.

Mr. SPROULE.

The committee reported that it was necessary to maintain some special tribunal to which could be referred questions arising as to the rights and duties of railway companies in relation to the trade and traffic of the country; that the operation of such tribunal should be cheap and expeditious; that this tribunal should have jurisdiction to enforce the provision of special acts of railway companies in any case of illegal charges; and that a 'locus standi' should be given to it in branches of the chamber of commerce and other similar associations of trade and agriculture. That a railway commission could and would do good work on these lines there is no doubt. And the result was, I am told, that the railway commission has been operated in many respects satisfactorily ever since.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I observe that the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution is not present. Had he been here, I would have made a suggestion to him, which would, I think, have met with his approval. It would, if approved, have the effect of affording the hon. gentleman, if he desires it, a later opportunity for the resumption of this discussion. I have no wish that the opportunity should be withheld from any hon. member who might have views on this question which he desires to express. With a few observations preceding the motion, I shall move the adjournment of this debate. I observe that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) has assumed that necessarily I would wish to make some statement on this subject, and I infer that if I abstain altogether from speaking on the question, he might think that I was wanting in courtesy, perhaps, or that I failed to appreciate the magnitude and importance of the subject to which hon. members have been addressing themselves this afternoon.

I do not at all underrate its importance. I feel as strongly as any member of this House that the transportation question is one of the largest questions with which the Parliament of Canada can have to deal. I am not maturing my views upon the question to-day, by any means. I have felt strongly upon it, and have held these views for many years. I would hail with delight the adoption of any scheme of legislation which would, in any substantial degree, redress the grievances of which the people of Canada have to complain; but, Sir, I would not think I was doing my duty, if I allowed the impression to be generally entertained, that I thought, and that the Government thought, so far as I can express its views, that this matter is one susceptible of easy treatment, or that a complete, or even a large, remedy is capable of being applied. I cannot shut my eyes to the adverse facts, when hon. members tell us that a railway commission, if one were created, would remedy these evils, because I know that in those countries where railway commissions have been established, these evils have not been in any considerable degree removed. If we carry our recollections back to the year 1873, when there was a great outcry in the United Kingdom which led to the creation of a railway commission, and if we follow the history of that legislation and of the operation of that commission, we will find that the result was not what the people were led to expect would follow the creation and operation of a railway commission in England, as no considerable measure of relief was afforded to the traders and to the people interested in the great transportation question in that country. It is a fact, that at this very day the people are almost despairing of obtaining any adequate remedy. Now, knowing that, I feel it my duty to disabuse the hon. gentlemen of the impression, which some might perhaps entertain, that the moment we set a railway commission on its feet, that moment we will see a vastly improved condition in these regards. I am in the fullest sympathy with anything which will afford a substantial measure of relief, but I am not sanguine, sympathetic as I am—quite as sympathetic as the hon. gentlemen opposite, and as ready to go as far as my judgment will bear me out to provide this relief—that the consequences will be as complete and as successful as hon. gentlemen believe. Now, the hon. member has said, that all we would have to do to afford substantial relief to the people of this country, would be to constitute a railway commission, and to confer upon it the same powers which are now vested in the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. Now, I know the hon. gentleman has stated that opinion very strongly, and I am quite sure that was his conviction; but, Mr. Speaker, with all deference, I must say that I do not agree with him. My view is, that as regards providing a remedy for the more serious grievances, you would absolutely fail, if you simply invested a commission, no matter how able, with the powers which have been conferred by statute upon the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. My judgment is, whether it is of any value or not, but formed from a somewhat careful study of the provisions of that Act, that such a transfer would not be very effective. I believe that the statute to-day, so far as it provides or confers upon the Railway Committee machinery to meet these evils, is defective. I think it is very defective. Take, for instance, the suggestion to confer upon one railway company the right to use the rails of another company, or, in other words, to confer running rights. Why, Mr. Speaker, you might hand over the whole machinery of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council to a railway commission, and you would not get one step further. We have never had, so far as my information goes, but one or two minor and trifling applications since the Railway Committee has been constituted, from one railway company, asking to have running rights over another's tracks. I presume, the reason of that largely lies in the fact that those who have been advising the railway companies, the counsel of the railway companies, have been forced to the conclusion, from a study of the provisions of that Act, that it is inadequate for that purpose. I am not going to detain the House to-night by going over this field. It is a very large field; it is a subject which one could discuss at great length. There are many matters which suggest themselves to any one who has studied the provisions of the Railway Act relating to this one single branch of it. At all events, the result of that study has been to convince me that it is not sufficient or effective, and cannot be made so simply by transferring the jurisdiction which the Railway Committee now exercises to such a railway commission as would be constituted.

Mr. MACLEAN. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me—will he tell the House whether, in his opinion, he thinks some provision could not be made, for instance, whereby the Intercolonial Railway could be extended to Winnipeg, and the right obtained for that railway to run its cars to Winnipeg?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Sir, I do not wish at all to treat the hon. gentleman with any discourtesy; on the contrary, I wish to treat him with every consideration; but I am bound to tell him that he is roaming into a field which is very much larger than he has any conception of, when he talks about conferring upon any tribunal which we can constitute here, and which we have prescience enough to surround with proper safeguards, the power to use the various railroads of other companies which we would have to take in order to project the Intercolonial Railway into the centre of this continent. Sir, it is a vast subject, and what does it mean? It means that you have to sit down and make provision for using all these various lines of railways, for using the staff of these railways, for using the station-houses and terminals of these railways, and for getting these different railway corporations to come to some sort of understanding with you; and then, after you have done all that, where are you? As the result of the exercise of any power which Parliament could be led to confer upon a commission, you would not give them the right to obtain one dollar's worth of local traffic from one end of the connection to the other. The local traffic must belong, of necessity, to the railway company which owns the road. Just imagine me coming to Parliament on behalf of this Government, and asking Parliament to make a grant of a sufficient sum of money to enable me to run the Intercolonial Railway from its present terminus at Montreal through to Winnipeg, and explaining to Parliament what my needs would be in that case, how much money I would want, and what such an arrangement would involve, say I could only hope to get what through traffic might offer to the railway at the terminals for transfer to Montreal. I could not pick up a ton of freight or a single passenger through hundreds of miles that railway would traverse. I am only just touching the threshold when I suggest this as one of the difficulties which surrounds this subject. I assure the hon. gentleman that when he tells the House that all the Government have to do is to cross a "t" and dot an "i" and the difficulty is settled, he does so from want of knowledge of the details connected with the subject. I sympathize with the hon. gentleman, I will not say in regard to the nationalization of railways, but in the view that we should have a national highway. I am as strongly of the opinion as is the hon. gentleman, that it was a radical error in the policy of the Government of that day—I do not reflect on them, because public opinion would not have sustained them in taking this further step—when they allowed the trans-continental railway to become the property of a private corporation. I feel as strongly as does any man that the true policy in the interest of Canada, the sound policy for its welfare was that at any cost the country should have owned that great highway. Then we could have afforded to treat the people liberally, even though it might involve cost, for the people benefited would have been those who went west to find homes and settle on its broad acres and turn them to profitable account; and people would have been induced to go there and stay there if Canada had owned one great trunk line—I am not going for any more than one, and I do not think more than one would have been necessary—constructed and operated by the Government. I sympathize entirely with the hon. gentleman in that phase of the question, and am heartily with him in that regard. So far as it is possible for me within my sphere in this Government to work out the problem in that direction, I shall be very glad to give it my closest study and very best attention. That is one question. The question of the nationalization of railways is, however, a very large one, one we cannot take up and usefully consider on short notice. It is a live question or becoming a live question in England, and it is likely to grow in intensity in that country; and it is a remarkable fact that there is not on the continent of Europe, with one or two minor exceptions, a country which does not own its railways, and the feeling is growing stronger there day by day and year by year in favour of adhering to the system of state railways. That is undoubtedly a great advantage to a country, and the traders of England now recognize that it would be in the true interests of the country if the Government owned the railways in the United Kingdom. There was a time when it was within the power of the British Parliament to have bought those railways, when it had the statutory authority to buy them, but it did not exercise the power, and the people of the United Kingdom are now face to face with this very great problem which has been settled throughout the continent of Europe by the nationalization of railways. My hon. friend has pointed out how easy, in his opinion, it would be for the Government to take the railway companies by the throat when they come to Parliament and ask for legislation, and compel them to yield to our wishes. We will assume that one company wishes to acquire running rights over the line of another company. Before we would be in a position to deal with the question we would require to have some other company desiring to have such a right conferred. If that were the situation and we had such an application before us it might be possible to exercise enough pressure, even enough moral influence possibly on what would be the subservient railway company to lead it to submit to the exercise of this privilege by another company. But that is a matter which would depend so much on circumstances and contingencies, I scarcely can agree with my hon. friend that it would be an easy thing to do, because we have not the conditions existing. If the hon. gentleman had all the power to-day he could not work out the remedy suggested; in the first place, not having a railway company coming here asking for a favour which could be withheld, and in the second place, not having another company coming here and asking for running rights over such road. Another suggestion my hon. friend made, and he said he intended to try it at the first opportunity when a railway company came here asking for a charter, and that was the introduction of a clause limiting the rate of passenger fares to 2 cents per mile. That would not carry my hon. friend very far, even if he tried and succeeded with his experiment. The hon. gentleman would find himself imposing a rate of 2 cents per mile on some company constructing a line in a new country, occupying a field which had never been covered before, perhaps running a railway under difficulties that would render a 2 cent rate utterly inadequate, and the hon. gentleman would at the same time fail to get at the companies he wants to reach. He would not reach either the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk, or any company by imposing a 2 cent rate other than the company seeking to be incorporated.

When he comes to make his motion he will find many hon. members who will sympathize with his object, but will regard it as unreasonable and impracticable to apply a 2 cent rate to a railway running in some remote section of the Dominion. I would suggest to my hon. friend that having had this somewhat full discussion on this motion, he should not press it to a vote to-night, or if the hon. gentleman desires that the debate should stand over, I would move the adjournment of the debate. I move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. MACLEAN. Before the motion is carried I wish to make one remark. The Minister of Railways has stated that it is almost impossible to make an experiment with a 2 cent passenger rate in respect to a new road. We will have an opportunity this session of applying the 2-cent passenger rate to a railway that controls the key of the situation, the road from Port Arthur to Winnipeg. The highest tariff rate prevails in that district to-day, it is a line that has large travel; it is a line which will be travelled a great deal more hereafter, and it is a line largely subsidized by this Government, by the Ontario Government and by the Manitoba Government. It is a good line on which to make an experiment. Mr. Bagehot, who is one of the greatest authorities in the British Empire on the constitution, lays it down that the great thing in regard to legislation is experiment. I ask the Government here to make the experiment. It is a hard thing to carry out a general principle, but make an experiment. Do not attempt to make a sweeping reform, but go in for an experiment of some kind. We have now an opportunity of making an experiment in regard to the adoption of a 2-cent passenger rate on this railway. It is a line which is generously subsidized by three Governments, a line that is largely travelled over now and likely to be much more largely travelled over, and if the experiment succeeds on it we can apply it all over. I throw out the suggestion, and if my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) adopts some of these progressive ideas we have suggested to-day, a great deal will be done for the improvement of transportation in this country. It is possible to frame legislation to-day that will enable this country at a small expense to extend the national railway system clear to Winnipeg, as it has been extended from Quebec to Montreal, and in that way relief will be afforded to the people of the North-west. I know there are difficulties in the way, but difficulties have to be tackled, and we must begin in some way to try and overcome them. It is not to embarrass the Government, it is not in any way to advance the party on this side of the House, but it is in the interests of the country I throw out the suggestion, and I do hope the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair), who has charge of the Railway Department, will find a means of making an experiment in regard to the transportation problem, on the line between Lake Superior and Winnipeg. When that Bill comes up, I will bring forward a proposition with that end in view.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not intend to discuss the main question, but speaking on the motion to adjourn, I would merely say that I was glad to hear the Minister of Railways tell us that he sympathized with the desire of those who wish to effect something in the way of reduction of freight rates. I remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) that his Government, through his right hon. leader, is pledged to give the North-west Territories relief in the matter of freight rates.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So they have.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not think they have in any marked way up to the present. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) refers to the Crow's Nest Pass arrangement, let me ask him: has that come into operation yet? The reduction of 8 cents that took place east of Port Arthur had no connection whatever with the Crow's Nest road, and would have taken place if that road never existed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The reduction between Port Arthur and the east.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, that reduction of 8 cents between Port Arthur and the east. The Minister of Railways is bound to find a solution of the question. I quite realize, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) does, the difficulties in the way, and it does not seem to me that it is all plain sailing in the matter of a railway commission. We know the history of the railway commission in England, and although my hon. and learned friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has stated that the railway commission in England was a success, so far as I remember the working of that commission it has not been a supreme success at all. The Minister of Railways has, I think, thought out the matter himself on the same lines as my own mind goes on. The moment this House gives a charter to a railway, it really parts with a certain amount of sovereign power, and the real solution I believe will be found to be the resumption of the railways by the state. Although in England the railway commission had all the powers of a court of record, nevertheless it was found that it could not enforce its decisions with the authority of a court of record, and one railway after the other presented a passivity in regard to its decrees that thwarted its usefulness. Nevertheless, it did some good. The subject is surrounded with difficulty, but difficulties are the opportunities of great men. In regard to the line to which my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) has referred, and in regard to any future railways chartered by this House, we might make a beginning, and although maxima were not very successful things in England, yet they were not wholly unsuccessful, and they effected good results for the people. In regard to these lines this House should say: We will not allow you to charge more for freight than a given sum—they may charge less if they like, but they must not charge more. In that way a certain measure of relief will be given and a commencement in the right direction made. I grant you that the whole question is a vast one, and I doubt if the people just now are prepared for it. The only way to prepare the people and to prepare Parliament for the question is by discussions such as we have had to-day in this House and by discussions in the press outside. The real solution, as the Minister of Railways said, is that the state should have control of the main continental line. It is a long way to look forward to that, but I do not see a plan that will offer a thoroughly successful solution short of it.

Mr. McMILLAN. As a farmer from Ontario, let me say that I have had conversations with a good many gentlemen just before the commencement of this Parliament, and business men and farmers alike are all strongly in favour of a railway commission. One of the reasons why that is so is that there is very great discrimination against both individuals and localities. In shipping apples to the old country we have found that wherever we have competition between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway we get a rate of 5 cents or 10 cents less per barrel than where there is no competition. If the reduction is 5 cents, it comes to $9 per car, and if it is 10 cents it comes to $18 per car. In one case in which I was interested a railway commission would certainly have interfered. We shipped three carloads of cattle from Prince Albert to Montreal and we paid $190 per car. We sold a carload of apples to my friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), and we were obliged to pay for these apples going west $518 per single car. That is a case a railway commission would take cognizance of. I know a farmer who shipped cattle to North Bay, a distance of 190 miles, and he paid $90 a car, whereas for a carload of cattle shipped 100 miles west of Chicago, he only paid $65 a car. Why should discriminations of this kind exist against the farmers of Canada? To-day we have free corn in this country, but in consequence of this discrimination on railways we can bring corn from Chicago into Toronto just about as cheaply as we can bring corn from the counties of Kent and Elgin into that city. There is this discrimination against both the farmer who wants to purchase corn, and the farmer in the western part of Ontario, who should get the full price for his corn. Another matter which a railway commission ought to deal with is one which the farmers in the western part of Ontario have felt very keenly, that is, drainage across railways. I have always felt that it would be useless for any farmer to bring his grievance before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council; for the railway companies send their well-trained solicitors there, and everything a farmer might place before them would be set aside at once. But if we had a railway commission, appointed by statute, in the same manner as our Auditor General is appointed, independent of the Government or any corporation, the farmers could go before such a body, and lay their case before it, with full confidence that it would receive attention and be dealt with in a satisfactory manner. When any matter relating to the farmers is brought before the Railway Committee, they are generally in the press of business, and have not time to attend to it properly; whereas if a railway commission were appointed, with ample power to deal with these questions, many of the grievances we suffer under at the present time could be remedied. For instance, at present we find that large corporations can get shipping privileges which the farmers cannot. They can get a cheap rate for taking a carload of cattle from any part of Ontario to Manitoba or the North-west. Why should not any breeder or farmer from the North-west who comes to Ontario to purchase cattle get the same rate as the Live Stock Association, without having to go through any formality, or asking any favour from a railway corporation? All these are questions which a railway commission could deal with, and I think it is important that the Government should take steps to appoint such a commission. Although it may be true that a railway commission could not compel a railway company to grant running powers to another company, yet they could prevent discrimination against individuals. For instance, a small shipper of cattle from western Ontario to Montreal, is led to believe that he can get as good a rate per car load as any one else; but a large shipper who sends eight or ten car loads, gets a rebate. This I hold is an unjust discrimination against the small shipper, and it has the effect of driving our young men out of the country. I hold that if a man takes a full car load of any stuff, he should get the same rate per car as a large corporation which ships a large quantity of stuff. Another thing the cattle shippers in western Ontario have to complain of is, that a shipper can go to Chicago and purchase his cattle there, and ship them to Montreal at as low a rate as can be got from western Ontario to Montreal.

Mr. MACLEAN. And over Canadian roads.

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, and over Canadian roads. This is a great injustice to our farmers and cattle dealers. All these are questions which could be dealt with by a railway commission. I have spoken on this subject with many farmers and business men of the county of Huron, and almost every one was in favour of a railway commission, and I was urged to lift my voice in this House in favour of it; and that is the reason I have risen to speak after the adjournment of the debate has been moved. We believe that a good deal of benefit has been derived by the people of the United States from the railway commission there. I have in my hand the railway rates as settled by the railway experts. In the United States, they have six classes of freight, while in Canada we have ten classes, and I have placed them so as to make as fair a comparison as possible. The different rates per 100 pounds on similar classes of freight are as follows:—

United States Rates.		Canadian Rates.
For 65 miles—
1st class.....	22c.	1st class.	28c.
3rd class.....	15c.	5th class.....	14c.
8th class.....	8c.	9th class.....	11c.
For 115 miles—
1st class.....	24c.	1st class.....	38c.
3rd class.....	19c.	5th class.....	19c.
8th class.....	8½c.	9th class.....	14c.
For 160 miles—
1st class.....	28c.	1st class....	42c.

The lower rates in the United States may be due to competition, but I am inclined to believe that they are the result of the work of the railway commission; and I do not see why a railway commission in Canada would not be equally beneficial. If it did not generally reduce the rates, it could at least see that outlying districts got equal rates for equal distances with those districts which have the benefit of competition. I think it is the duty of the Government to take hold of this question and appoint a railway commission. I am convinced that there is a strong sentiment in favour of it, all over the province of Ontario at least.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to add one word to the few remarks I made when the debate commenced this afternoon. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) spoke of the possibility of securing railway competition for Manitoba and the North-west by the construction of the Rainy River Railway from Port Arthur to the west. I want to point out that, even with that road built, the advantage to Manitoba and the Territories would not be as great as anticipated by many people, in the present condition of affairs. The system of railroads now existing in Manitoba and the Territories is largely controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway. If, therefore, we have competition between Lake Superior and Manitoba, it will be easily seen that if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company applies its local rate on its branch lines, then that local rate plus the through rate from Winnipeg to the head of navigation will be almost a prohibitory rate. The hon. member for East York suggests that we might extend the lines west of Winnipeg. True, I would expect that would be done, and I may say that we have in Manitoba at present the Manitoba and Northern Pacific system, as well as what is known as the Dauphin Railway; and inasmuch as the Manitoba Government has power under the contract with the Northern Pacific Railway to grant running powers over the lines of that railway in Manitoba, any competing railway that we bring into Manitoba now, can secure these running powers over that system; but it is not an adequate system. It only represents a small portion of the province, although it might be very good in this way, but the House will see that if we had a railway commission, it would regulate the local rates and compel the Canadian Pacific Railway to give a rate, say from Morden to Winnipeg, on an equality with the rate from Winnipeg to Lake Superior, and every good object would be attained. I can testify myself to the strong feeling that exists throughout Manitoba and the North-west Territories in favour of a railway commission. While the tariff is a very serious matter in that country, every one who lives there will bear me out in saying that the real grievance in Manitoba and the North-west Territories is that of freight rates. I thought from remarks that reached me when I came down here, that the Government would take up this question of a railway commission and push it through to a conclusion. A commission composed of men of probity, honour and ability would do a great deal to ameliorate the condition of the settlers. I should have been very much pleased to have had a definite statement from the Government that they intend to propose the creation of a railway commission and to press that measure to a conclusion at once.

While on my feet, I wish briefly to refer to another matter, which I presume would not come under the control of a railway commission, but which I take this opportunity of suggesting to the Government because it relates to railways. A large amount of time is lost in the Railway Committee, at every meeting, discussing the immense number of applications for railway charters. In my opinion, no railway charter ought to be given to any set of men unless the Government is thoroughly satisfied that these people intend to build the railway for which they ask the charter. The loss of time to Parliament and the committee is serious, and moreover, by giving these charters, a great many people become possessed of valuable franchises which they hawk about the country, and for which they obtain large sums of money at the expense of the country. I would press earnestly on the Government the desirability of taking steps to promptly nip that sort of speculation in the bud. The country has already lost sufficient money by these chartermongers obtaining charters to build roads in all possible directions—men who have not the slightest intention of spending a copper on these railways, and who secure the charters solely for the purpose of bartering them away in different markets to the highest bidder.

Mr. JAMESON. I would just like to say a word or two with regard to the remarks of the hon. member from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). He referred to the great difficulty of handling a matter of this kind. I have said before that the commission in Iowa has been in existence seventeen years and given every satisfaction to the people. There are railway commissions in, I think, ten states and the people of those states—farmers like the people of western Canada—are satisfied, and believe that they owe their salvation to these commissions. I believe that this Government has sufficient capacity and ability to cope with a question which has been so successfully coped with by the farmers of Minnesota and Iowa.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

THE QUEEN VS. CAMERON.

Mr. BOSTOCK moved for :

Copies of all depositions and papers in connection with the case of the Queen against H. B. Cameron for libel, either before the police magistrate or the Court of Queen's Bench at Montreal, including a copy of the judgment of Hon. Mr. Justice Wurtele upon the motion for the discharge of the bail bond.

He said: This matter, which I desire to bring before the House, has reference to the case which occurred in British Columbia some time ago. This motion was on the Order paper last session, but owing to the late time at which it appeared on the paper, I was not able to bring it up. The facts are as follows:—

In 1892, Dr. Cameron and R. Stevenson located a mining claim of 640 acres on the banks of the Granite Creek in British Columbia. They agreed that Cameron should stay on the claim and "shepherd it" while Stevenson should go to Victoria and Vancouver to look for capital to develop the property. Stevenson did not succeed for a while, but in 1894, met a Mr. W. L. Hogg, of Montreal, in Victoria, who was represented to be in touch with capitalists in the east. He accompanied Stevenson to Granite Creek and after some days an agreement was arrived at that a company should be formed with a capital of $1,000,000 in 100,000 shares of $100 each of which 10 per cent was to be paid up. The company was incorporated under the British Columbia laws as the Stevenson Gold and Platinum Hydraulic Mining Company. Shares were issued in this company and in 1895, Mr.

Mr. RICHARDSON.

Hogg, having ascertained that shareholders who had acquired treasury stock at less than par would be liable for the balance in case that the company should be wound up. He then got the shareholders to agree to procure incorporation under the Canada Joint Stock Companies Act and in the month of January, 1896, a charter was issued to the Granite Creek Mining Company, Limited, for the purpose of acquiring the assets of the Stevenson Company, and to work the claims. Under the new scheme Dr. Cameron, who had been a director of the Stevenson Company was removed from the board and another party named in his place though his original associate was retained as president of the new company. Adjoining some of the lots of the Granite Creek Company, were two claims known as the Swan and Amberty claims, and it was extremely important that they be secured by the Granite Creek Company, and Dr. Cameron urged on both Mr. Stevenson, the president, and Mr. Hogg, the secretary-treasurer, that they acquire same, and they did so during 1895. In February, 1896, a meeting of the shareholders of the Granite Creek Company was called at Montreal, to take over these claims, and a resolution was passed to accept of them from Messrs. Stevenson & Hogg for $25,000 paid up stock. Dr. Cameron was not present at this meeting and was not aware of the nature of the bargain until he came east some months afterwards. Dr. Cameron seeing the way in which the work was being conducted on the property thought it best to come east to consult with the directors and fellow-shareholders and then ascertained about the deal as to the Swan and Amberty claims. On the 10th July, 1896, an informal meeting of shareholders and some of the directors was held in Ottawa, and at it Dr. Cameron charged Messrs. Stevenson & Hogg with having bought the Swan and Amberty claims for the company at $2,500 and then pretending that they were their own property sold them to the company for $25,000, thus clearing $22,500 at the expense of the company. The doctor also made other charges of culpability against the same parties. One of the directors of the company subsequently told the doctor that he was to be arrested for libel.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is the statement which the hon. gentleman is now reading, his own statement, or whose is it?

Mr. BOSTOCK. It is a statement of the facts which I thought it better to put down in this condensed way rather than take up the time of the House by giving it more fully.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has moved for papers, is the statement he is making based on those papers?

Mr. BOSTOCK. No, I cannot say that I have seen the papers at all.

Mr. SPROULE. Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bostock) aware that he is not allowed to read his speech?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is not my objection. What I desired to know was, whether the hon. gentleman was stating these facts as part of his speech and reducing them to writing for the sake of brevity, or whether they were facts gathered from the documents in the case.

Mr. BOSTOCK. I merely wish to draw the attention of the House to the way in which Dr. Cameron was brought from British Columbia to this end of the country at great expense to himself, and in a way that, I think, deserves the attention of the country.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman's statement of the facts, I suppose, is based upon the information supplied by Dr. Cameron?

Mr. BOSTOCK. Yes. Resuming, I may say, that Dr. Cameron was told that he was liable to be arrested for libel, and advised to leave the country, but knowing the statements he was making to be true, he declined to take the advice and told the party that he would be only too willing to meet the parties in court and have the whole matter gone into; and at the same time gave his address in Ottawa where he could be found. As no action was taken, Dr. Cameron returned to British Columbia. On the 2nd September, following, Mr. Hogg went before the police magistrate in Montreal and swore out an information against the Doctor for criminal libel, and a warrant was issued and placed in the hands of a detective in Montreal, who left for Granite Creek, and, on the morning of 16th September, having ascertained that the Doctor was at the Driard Hotel, at Nicola Lake, B.C., he woke the Doctor up out of his bed in the early morning and told him he would have to go with him down to the province of Quebec. At the time this man appeared in Dr. Cameron's room, it was 5.40 o'clock in the morning. The detective arrested him on the charge of criminal libel, and announced that he was well armed and would make the arrest at all hazards. He ordered the Doctor to dress himself and accompany him on the stage coach, which left in fifteen minutes; and, without any overcoat, he was forced to drive to Kamloops, although suffering from an aggravated cold. Though he asked to be allowed to remain one day and arrange his business affairs, this courtesy was denied him, and he was compelled to go on by the train which left Kamloops at midnight, and come right through to Montreal. When in Kamloops, the Doctor asked to be allowed to consult a solicitor, but this man who was sent down from the east to take him in charge, refused to allow him to do anything of the kind, and he was unable to consult with any friends to find out what his position was. On his arrival he was placed in the police station, and the following morning he appeared before the police magistrate. As he was a stranger, and without friends in Montreal, he had to pay a detective to keep watch over him in a hotel until such time as he could communicate with friends in Ottawa to furnish bail. His preliminary investigation took place on the 8th October, 1896, when he was committed to stand his trial at the Court of Queen's Bench. In November, he attended the court and asked to be put on trial, but without success, as the private prosecutors did not place any bill of indictment before the grand jury. The next term came on, and, though the grand jury had two distinct sessions, no bill was laid before them. Although it was the duty of the private prosecutor, Mr. Hogg, to be on hand on the March term, to prefer the bill of indictment, he not only failed to appear, but actually left for British Columbia. Upon the facts being laid before Judge Wurtele on a motion to discharge the bail bond, he made the necessary order and declared that Dr. Cameron was discharged from all custody. However, there is now hanging over Dr. Cameron the commitment by the police magistrate, and, from the way in which this case has been handled, it would certainly appear that this action was taken against him for the purpose, if possible, of stopping him from saying anything more against the way the affairs of this company had been conducted and to prevent further comment or further statement being made against the way its affairs had been carried on. I desire to bring this matter before the attention of the House, because this gentleman was brought down here in a most disagreeable way, to say the least of it, being taken out of his bed in the early hours of the morning and brought down with this private detective, who, from accounts the Doctor has given of him—which I do not think it necessary to go into before this House—was certainly a most objectionable companion to be compelled to travel with for at least seven days. I think it is a serious matter that a gentleman should be subjected to such treatment, when he was doing what he considered his duty, in placing before the shareholders of this country, a large number of whom resided in Ottawa and the east, the serious condition of things in the management of the company. I would draw the attention of the Government to this matter, and suggest that something should be done, if possible, to prevent such cases in future.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I see the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) in his place. I followed the observations of the hon. gentleman who has placed this motion in your hands, and I would hope that some expression of a opinion might be obtained from the Treasury benches in the line of what I believe to be the practice that has generally obtained in past Parliaments of discouraging any attempts, wittingly or unwittingly, as in this case, to turn this Parliament into a court of appeal in criminal or other matters, which are better disposed of outside of this House, where forms of procedure obtain, so that both parties can have their differences fairly heard and fairly adjudicated.

I know nothing at all about the facts of this case, except that Dr. Cameron was, according to his version of the story, very unfairly and unjustly dealt with. But it seems significant that, with relief open to him in the courts, he apparently has stopped short of that avenue, and instead of following up his rights and of proceeding against those parties who, according to his ex parte statement, have been entirely governed by malice and improper feelings, have put him to a great deal of annoyance in attempting to use the criminal administration and criminal procedure for their own private and selfish purposes—instead, I say, of taking the course of pursuing these men in the courts, it occurs to me, from the statement of the hon. gentleman, that Dr. Cameron has preferred to put his case here ex parte without notice to any of the parties, and there leave the matter. If the hon. gentleman who has charge of the motion thinks that the criminal laws or any other laws of Canada or of any province are not sufficient to give redress to a man so shamefully used, it seems to me that there is a proper way of obtaining a remedy, and that is by suggesting a change in the law. But without knowing anything more than what the hon. gentleman has stated about this case, and in view of the statements that have been made to the hon. gentleman, I would hope that the Treasury benches would rather discourage than encourage any practice of this kind in the House in the future.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I agree with most that has fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman. While it seems to me that the administration of criminal justice should be very properly left in the hands of the local authorities and the local legislatures, at the same time one cannot possibly overlook the cruel abuse of legal process such as has taken place in this instance. While I cannot entirely agree with all that has fallen from the lips of my hon. and learned friend, I may agree with his conclusion, but while we agree upon the conclusion to which he has come, I think there may be some difference as to the process to adopt to bring about the end that he seems to suggest. My learned friend admits that if the facts are true, there has been an abuse of legal process in this case. Now, that abuse of legal process may have been made possible not only because of the administration of criminal justice, which is entirely under the control of the local legislature, but it may also have become possible because of the defects in the law which is under our control, and which we may have a right to amend. If this abuse of a legal process has been the result of a law which is under our control, that is to say, of the law affecting libel, it seems to me that it is quite within the right of any one, and within the right of my hon. friend from Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock), and quite within his duty, to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that this injustice to this man had been made possible because of a defect in the law, for which we are responsible. If that be the case, it seems to me that he has taken a very proper course indeed in the circumstances. I was not in the House when my hon. and learned friend began his remarks, but from what I know of this matter it would appear that for some things that were written or said by Dr. Cameron, written from British Columbia to Montreal in connection with the mismanagement, as he pretends, of a company, a writ was issued in Montreal under which he was arrested in British Columbia, and forcibly taken to Montreal, a place where he was practically unknown, and without having an opportunity to give bail, he was brought to Montreal and kept there practically in custody until such time as he could communicate with friends in Ottawa, who could furnish bail. It does seem to me a most extraordinary case. If such a case as this is possible under the law of libel as it exists, there ought to be some remedy for it. I do not think it is quite fair that for an offence committed in British Columbia, he should be brought down to Montreal to be tried for it. I admit that it is an extraordinary proceeding that a man could be taken from British Columbia on this warrant without an opportunity being given to him to give bail there; but still, if such were the case, and if that fact of his being brought from British Columbia to Montreal was made possible under our law, I think it was quite proper for my hon. friend to draw the attention of this House to it, with a view to provide a remedy.

Motion agreed to.

STATION AGENT AT PORT MULGRAVE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for:

Copies of all papers, reports or correspondence referring to or connected with the dismissal of D. Bain, Esq., station agent at Port Mulgrave, Intercolonial Railway.

He said: It would be impossible in connection with this case, which is a very extraordinary case, so far as my information goes, to discuss the dismissal of this officer on the Intercolonial Railway in the absence of the full record.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Does the hon. gentleman wish to discuss them to-night on this motion?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, I said it would be impossible.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would like to refresh my memory with regard to the facts.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then I would not like to waste the time of the House, because I propose that when the House is in possession of the records, to discuss this question, and I would not desire now to put my views before the House, though they were only preliminary, seeing that the Minister of Railways and Canals has not got the facts fresh in his mind. But I will move for these papers so that we may obtain them preliminary to a full and final discussion, and I would press upon the hon. gentleman's attention the request to have the papers prepared as soon as possible.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF WILLIAM SUTHERLAND.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for :

Copies of all papers, reports or correspondence respecting the dismissal of Mr. William Sutherland, car inspector, Stellarton, Nova Scotia, and also all correspondence touching an inquiry into the facts of the case.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I do not suppose the hon. gentleman considers it desirable to have a prolonged discussion on this case to-night. If he will allow the motion to stand, we may have some consultation on the subject.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There will be some discussion.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have no objection to the motion being carried.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I want to discuss it, because I desire to prove to the hon. gentleman, perhaps with more success than previously, that Mr. Sutherland is innocent of the very serious charge now hanging over his head, and that there is not a vestige of evidence in support of it. If the hon. gentleman prefers that the motion should stand, I will allow it to stand and bring it up when Notices of Motion are next called.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would prefer that the motion should stand.

Motion allowed to stand.

DISMISSAL OF S. R. GRIFFIN.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for :

Return of all papers, correspondence and reports connected with the dismissal of S. R. Griffin, Isaac's Harbour, Nova Scotia, from his position of postmaster, including a petition signed by seven-eighths (more or less) of the electors of said district, in favour of the retention in the service of an officer who had served for twenty-two years and a half.

He said : The motion as it reads contains all the information I have in connection with the subject, but the postmaster himself is my informant. He is desirous, and I think the Postmaster General will concede that much to an old servant, of ascertaining why his services were dispensed with. He states that he held the office for twenty and a half years, and he was not at the time he put this information in my hands, July, 1897, in receipt of any information as to the reason for the course adopted. I hope that if the motion is carried he will ascertain the reason.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). There is no objection whatever to the motion being carried. I observe it alleges that there is a petition in the department. I cannot say from memory whether there is such a petition or not ; at all events, I have no objection to the petition being included in the papers. There is also a reference to a report, I suppose by the commissioner or inspector. I have no recollection whatever of the transaction, and I do not wish to strike out the word "report," but of course the hon. gentleman will not press for the report if it is of a private character. If it is of a private character, I will leave it to the hon. gentleman to say whether it should be produced or not.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF PETER S. ARCHIBALD.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) moved for :

Copies of Orders in Council, papers, depositions, reports, evidence, correspondence and documents in relation or reference to any charges made against Peter S. Archibald, lately chief engineer of the Intercolonial Railway, or to the dismissal of the said Peter S. Archibald from his position or office as such chief engineer, or the grounds or reasons for such dismissal, or in relation or reference to any claim of the said Peter S. Archibald for superannuation allowance or otherwise in relation or reference to the retirement or dismissal of the said Peter S. Archibald from the service of the Intercolonial Railway.

He said : It will probably be necessary to have some discussion on this matter after the papers have been brought down, and no doubt it will be more convenient to the Minister of Railways if the discussion took place when the papers are on the Table. I will adopt whichever course the hon. gentleman prefers, and I am quite willing to discuss it now, with the materials at hand.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have no objection to the adoption of the motion. I agree that it would be better to have any discussion which may be desired after the papers have been brought down.

Motion agreed to.

SURVEY OF TIDES AND CURRENTS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for :

Copies of all reports respecting the survey of tides and currents in Canada.

He said : I am prepared to go on with the discussion of this motion, which refers to a matter of very great importance, but I should have liked to have had the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. In asking the right hon. First Minister to allow the motion to stand, I venture to express the hope that the right hon. gentleman will be good enough to bear the subject in mind. I want to complain somewhat that the importance of this has apparently been overlooked, and I hope that before the estimates are prepared this session it will be very fully considered in Council. If the expert navigators and the better class of merchant marine navigating the St. Lawrence are consulted, they will say there is no aid to navigation more important in connection with these deep draught vessels than the question of carrying on effectively the surveys of the tides and currents which were begun when I was head of the department. I trust the Government will consider that in a generous spirit before bringing the estimates down.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Will my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) particularize a little so that I can draw the attention of my colleague, the Minister of Marine, to particular facts ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Some years ago, we appropriated $10,000 for a year, and appointed a very eminent man, the son of Principal Dawson of McGill University to the permanent staff of the Marine and Fisheries Department, and gave him a staff of officers for the special purpose of taking observations of the tides and currents. It required a good deal of scientific work, great exactness, and most competent men to handle it. After the observations had been taken with Imperial assistance at Halifax and on the Pacific, I think we gave Mr. Dawson the "Lansdowne" to continue the operations in the Straits of Belle Isle and off Cape Breton for one season. The work was making good progress, when for reasons not fully explained yet to the House, that assistance was stopped and last session the necessary appropriation was not made for this work. In consequence there must now be some delay in obtaining all these mathematical data upon which calculations can be made, so that expert navigators may be able to know not merely the direction and force of the currents but the rise and fall of the tides as you come to the Atlantic and Pacific coasts or the Gulf of St. Lawrence. This information is now in the hands of these fast steamships as they approach the British Isles, and a great deal of this work has been done and well done in India, and in the waters approaching the leading United States harbours. The United States authorities have had the work done by their hydrographic survey staff, half military and half civil, I think. Among the better informed navigators there is a consensus of opinion upon this subject. The Prime Minister will remember when I mention it, that Prof. Johnston, of McGill, was put forward by a body of leading men in Montreal and afterwards by the Royal Society in Canada to press this subject upon the attention of the Government. When I was in the department he was very energetic in the matter, and I have no reason to believe that any of his energy has abated in the slightest degree since. I observed in the Montreal "Witness," a few days ago, a very interesting editorial again pressing the importance of this subject upon the Government. I urge upon the Government that if they are serious and desirous of pressing on the Fast Atlantic service and putting Canada abreast in maritime matters with the great nations of the globe, they will make a generous appropriation so as to continue the work effectively this season.

Motion agreed to

UNITED STATES STEAMSHIP "YANTIC."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for :

Copies of all entries and clearances of Canadian ports by United States steamship "Yantic" on her voyage up the River St. Lawrence in 1897 ; also a copy of any papers or correspondence respecting her passage through the said river or St. Lawrence canals.

He said :—This subject has been once or twice before the House and the Minister of Customs has answered a question in regard to it. I understood him to say in reply to me, that there was no entry made, but the first part of the question relates to entry and clearance. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) referred to some report, made by a collector of customs at one of the ports apparently in lieu of an entry. The second part of my motion is to settle the point as to whether as a matter of fact any permission was requested or obtained ; it is intended to make history in a sense.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Return of the number of acres seeded, the nature of the seed sown, the amount of crops grown in each Indian reserve in the North-west Territories.—(Mr. Davin.)

Return showing: (a.) What works or repairs have been executed on the drill shed at Montreal since the 1st of September, 1896; (b.) The estimated cost of said works; (c.) The names of those who executed said works, and the amounts paid to each by the Government; (d.) The mode of calling for tenders in reference to the execution of said works.—(Mr. Monk.)

Return showing: (1.) All contracts for military clothing entered into by the Government of Canada since the 1st of September, 1896; (2.) The name of each contractor and the amount of his contract ; (3.) The mode of calling for tenders in each case, and the names and amounts mentioned by each tenderer.—(Mr. Monk.)

Return showing : (a.) What contracts for military harness or saddlery have been given by the Government of Canada since the 1st of September, 1896 ; (b.) To whom such contracts were awarded and where they were executed ; (c.) What amounts were paid for the execution of such contracts ; (d.) For which of the said contracts tenders were called publicly, and the amount of tender in each case ; and all correspondence had by the Department of Militia in reference to the execution of said contracts.—(Mr. Monk.)

Copies of all letters, telegrams, papers, recommendations, correspondence, documents and papers relating to the appointment of Byron Nickerson as keeper of the Cape Negro Island light station, or to the application of any other person or persons for that office or position since the 1st day of August, 1896.—(Mr. Borden, Halifax.)

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 9.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 15th March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved :

That as the time for the presentation of private Bills will expire on Thursday next, 17th instant, the same be extended to Thursday, 24th instant, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the seventh report of the Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 77) to incorporate the Toronto and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Clarke, by Mr. Maclean.)

Bill (No. 78) respecting St. John Bridge and Railway Extension Company.—(Mr. Ellis.)

Bill (No. 79) to incorporate the Windsor and Detroit Union Bridge Company.—(Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (No. 80) respecting the Ottawa and New York Railway Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 81) respecting the Montreal and Southern Counties Railway Company.—(Mr. Guay.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That precedence be given on the Orders of each day after questions on Monday, Wednesday and Thursday, and after introduction of Bills on Tuesday and Friday to the Order for the reception of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the resolution granting twenty-five thousand acres of land for each mile of railway from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, and also to the Order of the House to go into Committee on Bill (No. 6) to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company, and that a similar precedence be given to all subsequent stages of the said resolution and Bill until both are finally disposed of by the action of this House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of making any objection to this motion. The House has already had an opportunity of discussing these questions at very considerable length, and as the session is somewhat advanced, and considering what small progress has been made, I think it is the disposition of members on both sides of the House to do everything that is possible to facilitate business, and to avoid any unnecessary delay in reaching important public questions which have not yet received the consideration which this measure has.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

ONTARIO LUMBER CUT.

Mr. BRITTON. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the indulgence of the House for a minute or two, and I suppose I will have to make a motion to adjourn, although in doing that I am rather going against the advice of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair). It was my intention on Friday afternoon to have made a statement, but the preliminary proceedings were so lengthened that I was unable to do so. I am induced to take this course by reason of a paragraph which appeared in the Ottawa "Free Press" of the 11th inst. It is headed "Brisk Sawing Ahead," and it says :

The Georgian Bay Lumber Company are at present preparing plans for a new mill to be erected at Canoe Lake. This mill will be of large capacity and will be erected in the heart of a first-class limit. The mill at Georgian Bay will cut as much this year as ever. Only the smaller firms are negotiating with the Michigan people for the sale of their logs.

On the 21st of February the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) put a question to the Government which will be found on pages 859 and 860 of "Hansard." It is as follows:—

Is the Government aware of the enormous output of logs cut in the Georgian Bay district the present season, to be sawed in Michigan mills, of which the following is a statement from Saginaw, Michigan, February 14th, 1898?

Then the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kaulbach) appended a statement which appeared in many newspapers in Ontario purporting to be the amount of logs that were going to be cut during the present season, and all of which it was said would be sawed in Michigan. I was out of the House when the question was put and did not notice it until a day or two before Friday last. Had it been called to my attention sooner I would have drawn the attention of the House to it before. This statement put on the records of the House by the hon. member (Mr. Kaulbach), was a campaign document issued in connection with the Ontario elections, and it appeared in many of the Conservative newspapers with comments more or less unfavourable to the policy of the Ontario Government. That campaign document appeared first in a fly sheet, and as I, with a good many others, was interested in the question, I took the pains to make inquiry with regard to the truthfulness of it, and after the most careful investigation that could be made by a person competent to make it, I found that instead of that statement being true, these are the facts, which I will now give to the House:

The article quoted contains three sentences. One, that the Georgian Bay district will furnish the Michigan mills with a large quantity of logs the coming season.

Mr. KAULBACH. What paper is the hon. gentleman quoting from?

Mr. BRITTON. Do you mean the paper I have in my hand?

Mr. KAULBACH. Yes.

Mr. BRITTON. This paper I prepared myself from information obtained.

Mr. KAULBACH. Where did you get the information?

Mr. BRITTON. This information was got by an officer of the Crown Lands Department of the Ontario Government, and the information was obtained from persons whom I will now mention.

Mr. BENNETT. We did not catch the name or the date of the newspaper from which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) first quoted.

Mr. BRITTON. It appeared in a good many of the Conservative newspapers. The paper I saw it in myself was the Kingston "News" of the 17th of February, and also the London "Free Press" of about that date.

The second point in this statement is that a gentleman who has come from there states that the loggers are experiencing trouble with the deep snow, it being three feet on the level, and slow progress is being made. The third point is that he furnishes the following approximate estimate of the quantity of logs being put in this winter by the several firms operating this winter in the Georgian Bay district.

Then follows the statement which appeared in the different newspapers and which also appeared in the question put by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kaulbach) to the Government. It will be observed that the approximate estimate is not the quantity which will be exported to the Michigan mills, but of what will be put in by the firms operating on the Georgian Bay, part of which will be exported, of course, and part sawn in Ontario. Instead of the statement contained in these newspaper articles being correct, the following are the facts:— Many of the firms named have their mills in Ontario and never exported a log and are not likely to. The approximate estimate is 328 millions. Included in it are the following firms who will not export:—

	Feet.
Holland & Emery Lumber Co., who have just erected two large mills on the Maganetewan River, in order to saw their logs in Ontario.....	20,000,000
Ontario Lumber Company, mills at French River	8,000,000
Arthur Hill & Co., being under contract to saw at Midland.....	15,000,000
Tanner Bros., mills near Waubausheue	4,000,000
Cutler-Savidge Co., mills at Cutler, Ont.....	4,000,000
Victoria Harbour Lumber Company, mills at Victoria Harbour.....	15,000,000
Georgian Bay Lumber Company, mills at Waubausne	20,000,000
Total.....	86,000,000

The following firms named are not cutting any logs this winter:—

Pitts & Co.....	20,000,000
Total.....	106,000,000

The following are over-estimated:

Loveland, Roys & White will get out about 10,000,000, estimated at 16,000,000	6,000,000
Wm. Peters, going to saw in Ontario 8,000,000 out of 15,000,000.....	8,000,000
Hale & Booth expect to get out 20,000,000 instead of 30,000,000, over-estimated	10,000,000
Total	130,000,000

The following Canadian lumbermen have not yet decided whether they will saw here or sell for export:—

Conger Lumber Company..	20,000,000
Alex. Barnet.....	10,000,000
Carswell & Francis.....	4,000,000
Total.....	34,000,000

Grand total over-estimated.... 164,000,000

Total.....	328,000,000
Over-estimated.	164,000,000

164,000,000 ft. b.m. to be exported.

Mr. BENNETT. Is the statement which the hon. gentleman is reading the statement to which he refers as having been prepared by one of the Ontario Government officials, of the quantity of logs to be cut in Ontario this year ?

Mr. BRITTON. Yes. That is to say, the statement shows the quantity that is to be cut in Ontario, and the quantity over-estimated to be cut in Michigan. There is an over-estimate of 164,000,000 feet, board measure, of the quantity that will be cut in Michigan. In other words, the quantity given in the statement referred to in the question put by the hon. member for Lunenburg is exactly double the actual quantity. I ask permission to make this statement because "Hansard" descends to history, and history is made up from the statements that appear in "Hansard." The statement given by the hon. member for Lunenburg appears there, and if it were not contradicted in any way, it would go forth that this year there would be 328,000,000 feet, board measure, cut in Michigan from logs taken from the timber limits of Ontario. That is a wrong statement, and I consider it right to make this correction. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the estimate, according to the hon. gentleman's information, of the quantity to be taken out this winter ?

Mr. BRITTON. 164,000,000 feet, board measure.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, after the great anxiety of hon. gentlemen opposite, last week, to press the Yukon Bill to a rapid conclusion, one is rather amused at the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) dragging this question before the House to-day, because it cannot possibly have any effect on the Ontario elections, which the hon. gentleman was of course very solicitous about. However, I think the hon. gentleman has a motive in this, that he is gently and quietly breaking the ground for the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton); for I have no doubt that before the session closes hon. gentlemen opposite will be pressed, and pressed very hard, to give a yes or no answer to the question of the imposition of an export duty on logs. We all know how much the hon. member for North Norfolk is interested in that question; and his patient silence on the Yukon Bill for many days, and the longing looks that were cast in his direction by the First Minister and the other Ministers, betokened the fact that that hon. gentleman was loath to rise and make the speech he did in favour of the Bill, until he received, as I have no doubt he did receive, the assurance from hon. gentlemen opposite that there will be no export duty placed on logs this year—an assurance which will, I have no doubt, bring consolation and comfort to the hon. member for North Norfolk. Now, what is the complaint of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton)? He says in the outset, as I understand him, that a grave wrong and injustice was done the Ontario Government in this, that prior to the Ontario elections certain Liberal-Conservative papers had published a statement showing that during the coming summer there would be a large export of logs from Canada to the United States; and now at last he has received the assurance from some representative of the Ontario Government—one of their servants—that the statement was incorrect and that the quantity of logs to be sent to the United States during the coming summer will be much less. The hon. gentleman did not state who the representative of the Ontario Government was. I have no doubt, however, from the recklessness of the statement, that it was probably Mr. D. F. Macdonald, the gentleman who succeeded in assisting in swindling the Ontario Government out of $15,000 of dues, and in perpetrating the infamous outrage of assenting to the statement that only 15,000,000 feet of logs had been cut by the Moore Lumber Company, when he well knew that 30,000,000 feet had been cut. That gentleman, by reason of his skill and cunning and connivance, and by reason of his assistance to the Moore Lumber Company, a friend of the Ontario Government, instead of being displaced from his position, was placed in a better position, where he may be better able to do the work of the party. The hon. gentleman has not stated who gave him the assurance as to the estimates for the coming year, and one can hardly realize who could have been so reckless as to have made such a statement. I am not sure whether the statement he gave refers to the quantity of logs that has been cut this season, or to the quantity that is to be cut in the mills during the coming season. If it refers to the quantity cut during the present winter, I can only say that it will be utterly impossible to arrive at a correct knowledge of that until the officers have first made their returns, as Mr. Macdonald did; and then, after a careful scrutiny, to see how much swindling has been perpetrated, we may ascertain the quantity that has been cut. But the hon. gentleman must remember that prior to the elections, the Ontario Government sent out a circular, asking all lumber concerns to be very careful to keep the estimate down, and if the statement which the hon. gentleman has quoted is the result of that effort of the Ontario Government to lessen the quantity that would be reported, no regard can be paid to it. If the statement of the hon. gentleman refers to the quantity to be sawn this year, then all I can say is that if all the statements in it are as true as some that I know of, the hon. gentleman should blush to give credence to them. He stated that Tanner Bros. were going to cut 4,000,000 feet of logs near Waubashene. All I can say is that the hon. gentleman may know more about Tanner Bros.' business than Tanner Bros. do themselves. Mr. Tanner's statement to me was that his 4,000,000 feet of logs had been sold and were going to the other side. Then, the hon. gentleman says that the Peters people are going to cut 8,000,000 feet at the town of Parry Sound. I can only tell him that that will be a most joyful surprise to the people of Parry Sound, who have looked upon it as a certainty, that in the coming summer the mill of Peters & Co. would be shut down. The hon. gentleman ventured no statement as to what the hon. member for North Norfolk would do. I suppose he assumed that that hon. gentleman need not be quoted, as beyond any possibility of doubt, the hon. member for North Norfolk would be true to American interests, and would see that everything he owned and possessed would be shipped to Michigan for cutting. So far as Arthur Hill & Co. at Midland are concerned, they do not own a single log which is to be cut on the Georgian Bay this year, they having sold their cut. So that the hon. gentleman is utterly at sea as to his facts. He has been made the victim of some Ontario Government official and has been persuaded to make this statement in the House, just as the Minister of Customs (Mr. Pater-son) was put up in Toronto by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) to announce his two-cent rate on letters. I think this confidence game is going too far. First, we have the confidence game played on the Minister of Customs. Then we have the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), steered, too, by a confidence man, reading this report in the House, and last, but not least, we have this Yukon business, steered by confidence men on the outside. The only reason the hon. gentleman can possibly have for bringing this statement before the House to-day must be that the Ministers want to mark time on the Yukon deal, and are not in a hurry to go on with the Bill. No doubt, they see breakers ahead. The statement, so industriously circulated through the Government press, that the Senate will, without a shadow of doubt, pass the Bill, evidently has not the truthfulness which they would desire it to have. Perhaps, too, it may be, that since the break the other night by some of the independent supporters of the Government, the Ministers fear that others may follow, and that, if the House goes into committee, there may be still more breakers ahead when amendments come to be proposed. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) should be the last man in this House to rise to mark time for the Government. People who live in glass houses should not throw stones, and be very careful about giving slavish support to the Government. It is now a notorious fact, that the hon. member for Kingston left a highly lucrative position to take his chances of becoming a member of this House, and the hon. gentleman must know that, in legal circles in the city of Toronto his name is more closely associated with the vacancy in the Court of Appeals in Ontario than that of any other member of the Ontario bar. Not only is his name mentioned in connection with this vacancy, but with two or three other prospective vacancies on the bench, and I am surprised, therefore, that he should have lent himself to this scheme, which, on its very face, is nothing more than a device to kill time for the Government. Why did he not let some of his other colleagues, whose rewards are more distant, do this work? This is a matter which does not at all concern the constituency of Kingston, and there are other hon. gentlemen, prospective senators, waiting for vacancies—why did not some of these take their feet? The whole point is plain. My hon. friend from Kingston rose for one reason alone, and that was to endeavour to spring upon the House a discussion which the House does not at all desire at present. This question of the export duty on logs has not been discussed, in one form or another, so far this session. There were some other matters which the hon. gentleman might bring before the House with some shadow of excuse, but in this he stands before the people of Kingston to-day in—I will not say, discreditable—but rather a compromising position. If I mistake not, he was on the public platform in the recent local election campaign, when an effort was made to boom the Liberal candidate in Kingston by reading a telegram purporting to come—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is getting very far away from the subject.

Mr. BENNETT. I am endeavouring to justify the conduct of the hon. member for Kingston in bringing this matter before the House, and, moreover, to show why the House should adjourn. If the hon. member for Kingston had brought up the question of this telegram which purported to come from the Minister of Railways and Canals, and which assured the people of Kingston that two locomotives would be constructed, but which telegram the Minister of Railways and Canals afterwards declared to be untrue—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is really proceeding to discuss a matter which has no earthly connection, so far as I can see, with that before the House. I desire to say, further, that I do not think the House has any disposition to encourage continual motions to adjourn, and that being the case, I think that the members should confine themselves closely to the subjects brought before the House.

Mr. BENNETT. I quite agree with you, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that my hon. friend from Kingston, after your admonition, will not venture to transgress again. I trust that, when this question of the export duty of logs, in which my hon. friend from Kingston takes so deep an interest, comes on, his loyal and patriotic voice will be heard, urging on the Government, of which he is so strong a supporter, the imposition of an export duty on logs.

Mr. SPROULE. I apprehend, that the object of the information given to the House is to influence the situation in the county of Russell, where an election is going on. I saw, in a western paper, an item said to be copied from the "Western Lumberman," stating that in order to supply twenty-five mills on the American side this year, American mill-owners have contracted to bring over from Canada to the United States over 300,000,000 feet of Canadian pine timber, board measure. I take it for granted, that that information, coming from that source, is in all probability likely to be correct, because it was obtained from American lumbermen who are interested in keeping their mills going, and who gave it to the press in that country. At that time it did not seem at all unreasonable to me that that quantity should be taken over, especially in view of the fact that a Bill had then been introduced and passed by the Ontario legislature to prevent the future export of these logs. That being the case, it was not at all unnatural to expect that the American owners of Canadian limits should try to get out as much as possible before the operation of that law began to take effect. About the same time, or a little earlier, the statement was made in the Ontario legislative assembly, by the Crown Lands Department, to the effect that there had been taken out in Canada, from 1880 to 1896, inclusive, no less a quantity than 768,000,000 feet of lumber in the logs to be sawn in the United States. If you look over that statement, you will find that, from year to year, the quantities increased, until the evil became so oppressive during the last few years that public indignation forced the Government to announce that business would be stopped. It was announced by one of the western papers that 328,000,000 feet would be taken out this year. And it was not unreasonable to expect that that amount would be taken out at present, in view of the Bill before the Ontario House.

I happen to have in my hand a letter sent me by a friend of mine who lives at Spanish River, and to whom I had written for correct information as to how much was taken out from this district in one month, so as to give us an idea of what has been done and the places to which this lumber is sent. He sent me the following figures, which are as follows:—

May 4th, 1894, by Hale & Booth to Bay City, Mich., 31,844 rough pine saw-logs, 3,500,000 feet.

May 9th, 1894, by Spanish River Lumber Company for Bay City, 30,000 rough pine saw-logs, 3,000,000 feet board measure.

May 9th, 1894, by Albert Pack for Alpena, 30,000 rough pine saw-logs, 3,000,000 feet board measure.

Mr. BENNETT.

May 15th, 1894, by Edmund Hall for Bay City, Mich., 47,000 rough pine saw-logs, 3,500,000 feet.

May 17th, 1894, by Hale & Booth for Bay City, 29,083 rough pine saw-logs, 3,635,000 feet.

May 19th, 1894, by Saginaw Lumber and Salt Company, Bay City, Mich., 38,000 rough pine saw-logs, 3,500,000 feet.

May 25th, 1894, by James T. Hurst, Bay City, 32,000 rough pine saw-logs, 3,000,000 feet.

June 1st, 1894, by Spanish River Lumber Company, 34,000 rough pine saw-logs, 3,313,240 feet.

June 2nd, 1894, by Edmond Hall for Bay City, 44,000 rough pine saw-logs, 3,000,000 feet.

June 6th, 1894, by Spanish River Lumber Company, 32,000 rough pine saw-logs, 3,200,000 feet.

June 7th, 1894, by Saginaw Lumber and Salt Company, Bay City, 36,000 rough pine saw-logs, 2,500,000 feet.

June 11th, 1894, by Alger, Smith & Co. for Cheboygan, 25,000 rough pine saw-logs, 2,500,000 feet.

June 12th, 1894, by Hale & Booth for Bay City, 23,241 rough pine saw-logs, 2,887,884 feet.

And in addition to that there is 10,000,000 feet more for the Spanish River Lumber Company, which will go this month to Bay City. So we see here that, for a little more than a month, a month and about fifteen days, I have given the names of the parties to whom the logs are sent, the number of logs and the quantity of lumber, and it totals 50,000,000 feet in that time. That was before there was any talk of a regulation by the Crown Lands Department of Ontario compelling the cutting of this lumber in the province. If this is an average of a fair winter's cut, it is reasonable to suppose that fully 300,000,000 feet will be taken out this winter. We are using this to-day and using it, I think, successfully, against the provincial government, because they did not do what in our judgment they ought to have done years ago in the interest of the people of Ontario. Look at the amount taken out up to 1891—678,000,000 feet, even according to their own statement—taken across the water in vast fields to a foreign country. Several sessions ago I gave a statement in this House on the basis of information furnished me by an Ottawa lumberman who has had thirty years experience in the business. I asked him what this export of logs would mean to the people of Ontario—what would it mean to the labouring people if these logs, instead of being shipped away, were brought to the mills on our own side, cut, sorted, carted to the yard, piled, measured and then taken out in boats or cars or in whatever way might be found best? According to his experience, he told me, it would mean about $6.50 per thousand feet. If that be the case—and I assume that this gentleman knew what he was talking about—what number of men does this employ in the United States, with a similar number of men denied this means of work here? What would it mean in wages? It would mean $4,992,000 spent in the United States largely in wages which ought to have been spent here in Ontario. And during all this time the Government had it in their power by passing an Order in Council at any time to stop this loss of money to Canadians and secure this employment for the labourers of Ontario. Is that no consideration for the workingman here who has to support his family, who is not allowed to go across to the American side and even there get a share of this labour, because of their alien labour law, though he would only be following the raw material that was taken out of his own country? It is a shame and a disgrace, and discreditable to the Government that allowed it to be done, to the Government that could have stopped and did not. What would it mean further? This gentleman told me that every 100,000,000 feet taken out would employ in handling, cutting, carting, piling and shipping 2,000 men for six months in the year. If that be the case—and this gentleman was in a position to know, having been in the business for many years—we might have had employed in Canada 5,000 men for six months in the year for three years, or 1,000 men employed for six months in the year for fifteen years. Set down anywhere in Ontario 1,000 workmen, representing with their wives and families, a population of 5,000, and give them their cash once a month or oftener, and see what a difference their employment for six months will make to the surrounding country. See the demand it will create for farm products, the business it will bring to storekeepers in every line, the improvement it will mean to business generally. And yet the raw material which properly belongs to the labouring class of Ontario is taken away and the labouring people are deprived of the opportunity to work by reason of the insane policy carried out by the Ontario legislature since that system was commenced years ago. Is it to be wondered at that we tried to have a stop put to it? In view of the figures I have given, it is reasonable to say that at least 300,000,000 feet will be taken out this year across the Georgian Bay to give employment to United States labour.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him, since he has made this statement, to say that according to the official statement the quantity will be 186,000,000 feet, or 62,000,000 less than last year.

Mr. SPROULE. The returns are not all in yet, and it is utterly impossible for the hon. gentleman to know what is being got out. It is a mere guess on his part, if he relies upon official figures. It must not be forgotten that a large quantity of what goes out is jobbing stuff, and there is no report made to the Ontario Government where it is cut. My informant tells me that millions of feet are taken out that the Ontario Government knows nothing about. We know very well that the Moore Lumber Company actually took 15,000,000 feet that the Ontario Government did not know anything about. I think the House does not need any further facts to convince it on that point. I am told by a gentleman whom I believe to be a reliable authority that no person can say what the amount is. I gave the figures for a little over a month. But the same thing goes on through the whole season, even when no embargo was threatened. Now that the embargo has been decided upon, it is reasonable to suppose that the amount that will go to the United States is a very serious matter for the people of Ontario.

If you take out 400 million feet this year, what would it employ? It would employ 8,000 men in Canada for six months. If you take out 300 million feet, which I think is below what will be taken out, it would employ 6,000 men in Canada for six months. Is that nothing to the Canadian labourer? I saw a short time ago that in the city of Toronto over 500 people surrounded the city hall and begged the mayor to give them some work so that they could earn money enough to keep their families from starvation. When that condition exists in the city of Toronto, and when we know that thousands of our own Canadians are out of employment, and that they are denied that remunerative employment which they could get by virtue of a changed policy, is it any wonder that we bring this matter to the attention of Parliament and of the country? We believe that the mismanagement of the property belonging to the whole people of Ontario is such that we are depriving the Canadian labourers in Ontario, 8,000 of them this coming year, of the employment that they ought to get at home for at least six months in the year, by virtue of that insane policy of letting this lumber go out to employ men in Michigan, to build up their towns and cities, while impoverishing ourselves to enrich them.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY.

The Resolution adopted in Committee of the Whole on Friday, the 11th March instant (p. 1772), respecting the granting of lands to a line of railway from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, was reported, read the second time, and agreed to.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved that the said resolution be referred to the committee on Bill (No. 6) to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). During the discussion which took place on the motion for the second reading of this Bill, two or three intimations were given that when the Bill reached committee amendments would be suggested to meet some criticisms that had been made upon the Bill, and some objections that had been taken to it in two or three particulars. The first clause now read is the substantial clause, and confirms the contract; and I might perhaps now with advantage explain to the committee the scope and character of the changes which have been made in these particulars. The first relates to the selection of blocks of land. It will be remembered that a great deal of stress was laid by hon. members who criticised this contract upon the fact that there was permission given by the contract to the contractors to select lots on either sides of the main blocks without being subject to the conditions which attach to the selection of other blocks, as to their being of alternate character, and as to the Government being entitled to each alternate area. That question seemed to be considered as one of great importance by some hon. gentlemen, and it was noted a good deal in the press. Some were under the impression that the effect of that clause would be to enable the contractors to possess themselves of unrestricted and unlimited areas of valuable placer lands or gold lands, and that it would, in consequence of the possibilities which were involved give to the contractors undue advantages that the Government ought not to give them. Now, Sir, I may say here that the Government did not attach the importance to this selection of blocks which was attached by hon. gentlemen opposite, nor, in point of fact, did the contractors themselves. I think it was mentioned in course of the discussion on the Bill that the reason why the Government consented to incorporate this in the contract, was that it seemed not to be unreasonable that if the contractors, in their search for quartz veins, should find that they were carried over mountains and over stretches of country that would not in themselves be productive all through their course, it would not be unreasonable to allow them to take lot after lot for a certain distance in order that they could get a reasonably sufficient amount of area, so that they could work their quartz mine to advantage. The clause I refer to is the last subsection of section 12 of the contract:

The contractors may also at their option select additional blocks lying on either end of any odd-numbered blocks along a base line, but any such additional blocks must be three miles square each, and they shall not exceed three in number on each end of each said odd-numbered block.

The Minister of Agriculture, in the course of his remarks on the second reading of the Bill, stated that there would be no objection to amending that clause. Neither the Government nor the contractors regarded that as very important; the contractors did not regard it at all as a vital feature of their contract, nor did the Government consider that there was any serious objection to it. But since it was objected to, on communication with the contractors and the matter being put before them, they consented to yield the point since the Minister stated that the clause would be amended. On consideration, the Government felt that it would be better to incorporate any amendment that might be made with respect to this into the original contract, or, what would amount to the same thing, in a supplemental contract; and a supplementary contract therefore, was agreed to by the contractors, this feature of it being omitted. I shall move this amendment as an addition to the schedule in the Bill, and I shall move a supplementary contract, after having read it, of course, to the committee, when we reach that portion of the Bill in due course. The clause which has been accepted in amendment to the latter clause of section 12 of the contract has been disposed of in this way. It has been settled that the right to make such optional selections of additional blocks shall be entirely abrogated, and under the altered or amended contract the contractors shall have no right to make a selection of land other than in the usual way, as prescribed by the contract. A clause has been incorporated in the supplementary contract, which I shall read in a few minutes, which provides that the option in the latter part of clause 12 of said contract, by which the contractor shall be able to select additional blocks on either end of the base line shall be entirely and utterly abrogated. Thus we will eliminate from the contract what some hon. gentlemen, without much reason, I think, considered to be a feature of very objectionable character. There is another clause in this amending contract.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman is going to read a supplementary contract, I would ask him, if convenient, to lay it on the Table.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Unquestionably. I intend to move it, and if the leader of the Opposition wishes to look it over I will immediately place it in his hands. The supplemental contract is dated 28th February, 1898, and is made between the parties to the original contract. It provides first for the abrogation of clause 12, and it subsequently provides:

(1.) It is agreed that the option given by the latter part of clause 12 of said contract to the contractors to select additional blocks lying on either end of any odd-numbered block along a base line shall be and is hereby abrogated.

It further provides :

(2.) After the said railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake has been accepted by the Government as complete, it shall be and continue to be duly and reasonably maintained and operated for the conveyance of passengers and freight, and during five years from such completion the contractors shall not select more than four-fifths of the total quantity of land to be selected by them under said contract, the remaining one-fifth is to be held by the Government as security for the said maintenance and operation of such railway during such five years, provided that the Government may allow the contractors to substitute other approved security in lieu of said one-fifth.

At the end of the said five years, if no substantial default (avoidable by the company) in the said maintenance and operation during said period shall have occurred, the contractors may select and shall be entitled to grants of said remaining one-fifth ; but if such substantial default shall occur, the right of the selection of the one-fifth shall lapse, and shall cease and be forfeited, and in the event that any other security has been substituted in lieu of the said one-fifth, it shall become and be forfeited.

These are the two material clauses in the supplementary contract. There is another clause which the statute provides relating to the independence of Parliament, and it is embodied in all contracts, and appears here as section No. 3 :

(3.) No member of the House of Commons shall be admitted to any share or part of said contract, or any benefit to arise therefrom.

This clause is a similar one to that contained in the Bill, but as we were having a supplemental contract entered into, it was thought desirable that this clause should also be incorporated into it. The fourth clause provides :

(4.) The lands referred to in the said contract out of which selection may be made, shall be such lands only as are at the disposal of the Government at the time of selection.

The supplemental contract, in full, is as follows :—

Agreement made the 28th day of February, 1898, between Her Majesty the Queen, herein represented by the Honourable the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Honourable the Minister of the Interior, Canada, of the first part, and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, of the second part, supplementary to and as part of the contract between the said parties dated 25th January, A.D. 1898 :

(1.) It is agreed that the option given by the latter part of clause 12 of said contract to the contractors to select additional blocks lying on either end of any odd-numbered block along a base line shall be and is hereby abrogated.

(2.) After the said railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake has been accepted by the Government as complete, it shall be and continue to be duly and reasonably maintained and operated for the conveyance of passengers and freight, and during five years from such completion the contractors shall not select more than four-fifths of the total quantity of land to be selected by them under said contract, the remaining one-fifth is to be held by the Government as security for the said maintenance and operation of such railway during such five years, provided that the Government may allow the contractors to substitute other approved security in lieu of said one-fifth.

At the end of the said five years, if no substantial default (avoidable by the company) in the said maintenance and operation during said period shall have occurred, the contractors may select and shall be entitled to grants of said remaining one-fifth ; but if such substantial default shall occur, the right of selection of such one-fifth shall lapse, and the right of the contractors to receive grants of such one-fifth shall cease and be forfeited, and in case any other security has been substituted in lieu of said one-fifth, such substituted security shall become and be forfeited.

(3.) No member of the House of Commons of Canada shall be admitted to any share of or part of said contract, or to any benefit to arise therefrom.

(4.) The lands referred to in the said contract out of which selection may be made shall be such lands only as are at the disposal of the Government at the time of selection.

(5.) This agreement shall form part of and be read with the said contract of 25th January, 1898, as if the same had originally formed part thereof.

In witness whereof this agreement has been duly executed by the parties.

WM. MACKENZIE.

D. D. MANN.

AND. G. BLAIR,

Minister of Railways and Canals.

CLIFFORD SIFTON,

In the presence of Minister of the Interior.

Z. A. LASH.

JOHN J. MAGEE.

I move to amend clause 1 by inserting after the word "which" the following words :—"Comprising several agreements respectively, being dated 25th January, 1898, and 28th February, 1898."

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 5,

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I beg to amend this section by adding the following :—

But the majority consisting of said board, of whom the president shall be one, shall be at all times British subjects.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 8,

Mr. QUINN. Before this clause is adopted, I would like to draw the attention of the Government to a scheme which I proposed, in my speech on the second reading of this Bill, relating to the issue of this stock to Canadians. I suggested that the capital should be $10,000,000, but the shares, instead of being $100 each, should be $1 each, and should be issued for subscription to the Canadian public first. If not all subscribed before the 1st of September, then, the balance of the stock might be taken by Mackenzie & Mann, but I think the opportunity ought to be given to the Canadian people to benefit by the construction of this road and by the existence of such a rich country in Canada. I, of course, do not wish to move an amendment here. I realize that the Government is sufficiently strong to carry the proposition which they have made, but I think the Government should hesitate before excluding the Canadian public generally from the benefits to be derived by this particular firm of contractors and company, and from the opening up of communication with this rich gold country which we have within the limits of our Dominion.

On section 15,

Mr. HAGGART. I suppose, it is intended that this clause with reference to the expropriation of land should apply solely to the railway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. It is not confined to that. Under this clause they might expropriate away down in Vancouver or Victoria.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think it has been quite a customary thing to allow the same procedure to be adopted for this purpose.

Mr. HAGGART. The words "along the line of railway" are omitted here, and the omission makes quite a difference.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Better let the clause stand for the present.

On section 16,

Mr. HAGGART. Is the Minister aware of any grant in aid of this road from any Government or municipality besides that from this Government?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not aware of any.

On section 18,

Mr. HAGGART. Does the Minister think that this section gives the company power to borrow more than the $10,000,000 which they are authorized to borrow under the Act?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the only limitation to which they would be subject would be the provisions of the Railway Act.

Mr. HAGGART. The Railway Act does not apply to this.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The Railway Act is generally applicable, except where it is inconsistent with the provisions of this Act. I do not think there would be any limitation to their borrowing powers, except their ability to persuade people to let them have money.

Mr. QUINN.

On section 20,

Mr. HAGGART. What is section 57 of the Railway Act?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Section 57 relates to the qualifications of directors, I think. It was thought that if the 20th section were not introduced here, there might be a question as to whether Mann & Mackenzie could be directors of the company to be organized, they having a contract with the Crown.

Mr. BRITTON. Is it understood that under section 19 the company may raise as much money as they like over and above the $25,000 per mile provided by section 17?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes. Hon. members should bear in mind that this company is not simply a railway company; it is not simply a railway and mining company; but it is a railway company, a mining company, a shipping and transportation company, a company which could carry on a smelting business, and which would probably be able to engage in a variety of businesses, such as will be done by companies under charters which have already been granted. Section 17 of the Bill regulates and limits the amount of the debenture or bonded debt which can be incurred in respect of the railway; section 19 has reference to the bonded debt which can be incurred by the company by a mortgage on its mineral lands; section 18 authorizes it to contract debt in respect of its other undertakings, which we take it would be a very proper power to confer on the company. The three sections, 17, 18 and 19, would cover the three distinct classes of business, and the three distinct powers which are conferred upon the company.

On section 23,

Mr. HAGGART. Have the Government the power of scheduling lands, that is, withdrawing them from settlement or from mining entry, for the purpose of securing to these parties the lands to which they are entitled? My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior will know that a great many companies, especially in the North-west Territories and Manitoba, who have not earned their lands, have the lands what is called "scheduled" to them. They are withdrawn from settlement or occupation, and I should like to know whether the Government have the power to do that with reference to this company.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The contract provides that the selection may be made in a certain way. I suppose, that, under the Dominion Lands Act, the Government have the power to reserve lands for the company to make selection from later on, but I have no hesitation in saying, that the hon. gentleman must have gathered from the discussion which has taken place, that the Government have no intention of reserving lands for the company to make selection from until the time comes when, under the contract, they are permitted to make selection.

On section 25,

Mr. BENNETT. In the event of the contractors being unable to secure possession of any lands that they might desire, will an action lie against the Government on behalf of the contractors? If any person is in possession of any lands which the contractors may desire to secure, but which the possessor seeks, by force, to prevent their securing, will an action lie on the part of the contractors against the Dominion?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I should have very little hesitation in saying, no.

Mr. BENNETT. If the Minister lays that down as law, then, there is an invitation extended to all parties to come in and take up land on this understanding, that the Government will not, by force of arms or otherwise, seek to dispossess these parties.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is not a legitimate inference to be drawn from my answer.

Mr. BENNETT. Do I understand the hon. Minister to hold, that, if any persons should take possession, say, of an area half a mile in extent, and the contractors wish to displace them, and these persons resist, no action will lie against the Government on the part of the contractors?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My answer is, that no action will lie against the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the Government allow the internecine strife to continue?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is one thing for the Government to allow an improper interference or any disorder, and another thing to make the Government liable because somebody is creating a disorder.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman is confusing the idea of the liability which would arise under the contract, and the liability which would arise by reason of the obligation of the Government to maintain order.

On section 15,

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. Minister will see, that this is a company carrying on business all over the North-west Territories and British Columbia, and that they have the right to expropriate for anything in reference to their business in British Columbia and the North-west Territories.

Mr. BRITTON. It ought to be made plain. At the same time, there have been decisions on that point, and they are to the effect that a railway company must, bona fide, require the lands for its business, and not simply for the purpose of speculating.

Mr. HAGGART. But this is not a railway company. It is a private company for many purposes.

Mr. BRITTON. I agree that it is, but, at the same time, for this purpose it is a railway company.

On section 4,

Mr. HAGGART. Am I to understand then, that if this railroad is not worked continuously for five years, the only forfeiture is one-fifth of the land we are giving to this company?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is all.

On section 15,

Mr. QUINN. Section 15 is carried, I understood you to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad to see the Minister of Railways economical, but I think it would have been well, seeing it would not have cost much, to have had a few copies of these important amendments distributed among intelligent members of the committee who really wish to discuss them.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I felt that it would be a little awkward to discriminate. I would move to insert the following words after the word "elevators," in the second line, "along the line of any of the railways hereby authorized to be constructed, or at any of the termini thereof." The section will then read:

Should the company require land for wharfs, docks or elevators along the line of any of the railways hereby authorized to be constructed, or at any of the termini thereof—

And so on.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I ask the hon. Minister of Railways what he proposes to elevate along this line of railway and in the Canadian Yukon?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I presume the hon. gentleman is aware that there will not be any elevating material, as we hope that there will be no whisky there.

Mr. FOSTER. That is provided by another company, the head or manager of which I do not see present. I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) if he has taken due precautions in the interest of the farmers. He is giving these grasping monopolists the power to build elevators wherever elevators can be put down, or put up, whichever he prefers. In the interest of the farming community, he has retained wheat lands, corn lands and barley lands in the interests of the agriculturists. Has he put a clause in to prevent these monopolists from overcharging the farmers, who are to take up these arable lands and raise quantities of grain, for the use of elevators? The hon. gentleman, above all, must be consistent. If he is going to be good to the farmers by keeping back these arable lands for them, he should see to it that they are not overcharged for elevators.

Mr. HAGGART. I notice that the hon. gentleman does not confine the power of expropriation to the railroad actually being constructed, but gives a company power to expropriate on any of the lines or at the termini of any of the lines authorized to be constructed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). That is the effect of the amendment.

Mr. HAGGART. This will give them nearly as large powers as they had before. I suggest that it be limited to the road actually being constructed.

Mr. DAVIN. Is the hon. Minister making provision that farmers or anybody else shall be allowed to load freight without passing it through the elevators? That is a controversy we have on now in the North-west Territories. This ought to be guarded so that if a farmer or anybody else brings freight which he wants to put on the car, the railway company shall not have the power to say: We will not take it unless it is passed through our elevators. Has the hon. Minister had regard to that question?

Mr. FOSTER. No, never thought of that.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall I report the Bill?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would like to add one clause providing that this work shall be a work for the general advantage of Canada. The section will be drafted in a moment.

Mr. POPE. I think that in view of the national importance of the by-election in Russell, the House had better adjourn, and give the Government an opportunity to draft this Bill.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I ask the committee to add the following as part of section 26:

The railways hereby authorized to be constructed are declared to be works in the general advantage of Canada.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill, as amended, reported, and amendments agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER.

CERTIFICATES TO MASTERS AND MATES OF SHIPS.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved second reading of Bill (No. 37) further to amend the Act respecting certificates to masters and mates of ships.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is a very small change made in that clause. Under the Wrecks and Salvage Act the Governor in Council formerly authorized an investigation into wrecks. In 1893 that Act was amended, vesting in the Minister the power formerly exercised by the Governor in Council. But the amendment did not extend to the present Act, as it should have done, and the only alteration here is made to incorporate that amendment giving power to the Minister to order investigations, which is at present exercised by the Governor in Council.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think last year there was some collision, as I recollect from the newspapers, between the Board of Trade and the Minister in connection with the exercise of his jurisdiction in these matters. Is the hon. gentleman able to explain shortly what point was brought up?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. As near as I can recollect, there was an investigation held into the wreck of a steamer at St. John, N.B. The investigation was held by Capt. Smith, assisted by two assessors whose names I forget at the moment. However, the point the hon. gentleman wishes to ascertain arose from the disagreement between Capt. Smith and the assessors. Capt. Smith thought that the officer in charge—I think it was the second officer—was not to blame for the collision. The assessors held to the contrary, they held that under the evidence this officer was to blame, and they recommended the suspension of his certificate for a limited time. I do not recollect all the facts, as I had not the slightest idea that the hon. gentleman would have sought information with regard to that circumstance.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It was only with regard to the supervision of the Board of Trade over the decision of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I was leading up to that. When the matter came before me, I went thoroughly into the evidence taken before the commissioner, and I sided with the assessors in holding that the officer was clearly to blame, and against Commissioner Smith, and I so ruled on the appeal. Then it went to the Board of Trade, and the Board of Trade held that there did not lie an appeal from the commissioner, that the Minister here had no power; but they went no further.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I was under the impression that it was under some legislation of this character that the Board of Trade is seized with the matter at all. Is the Minister able, at the moment, to explain how they assumed or undertook to overrule the decision of the Minister of Marine in connection with an adjudication where he was acting under the authority of a statute of Canada, in connection with an accident that took place in Canadian waters?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The officers were officers holding certificates from the British Board of Trade. The order made by the assessors was that their certificate should be suspended, and I confirmed that. The Board of Trade said: You have no power to confirm, because the commissioner does not agree with them, you have no power to alter or to amend his findings.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Practically they denied the right of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, under our legislation, to deal with a certificate granted by the Board of Trade.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They did.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is to say, they eschewed our own statute.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

On section 2,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This clause is introduced at the solicitation of a large number of owners of steamships and others who desired that young men should be enabled to acquire the service necessary to obtain a permanent certificate. It has been applied with reference to engineers under the other Act, and it is now desired to apply the same principle to masters and mates. It enables the Minister to grant a temporary certificate to men qualified to take charge of a steamboat of not more than ten tons gross tonnage. And that certificate may be issued for not more than one year, or it may be recalled.

Mr. CARSCALLEN. Is not the capacity of a 10-ton boat more than ten passengers?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was not considered desirable by the officers of the department that we should grant a temporary certificate to captains of large steamers carrying many passengers. It was thought desirable to try the experiment with small boats, and perhaps subsequently continue it and extend to large boats. At the outset the experiment will be limited to boats of 10 tons and carrying not more than ten passengers.

Mr. CARSCALLEN. Why limit it to ten passengers?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is the class of boats which is contemplated by the Bill, in regard to which these temporary certificates will be given.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Why limit it to ten passengers for a 10-ton boat?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As I understand it, the Government propose to wreck ten passengers before they go into the business more extensively.

Mr. BENNETT. What length of service will an engineer require before he obtains his certificate to act on a vessel of that kind?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This Bill does not extend to engineers, but simply to masters and mates.

Mr. BENNETT. As regards masters, what length of service is required now?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This Bill is to enable me as Minister of Marine to grant a master's certificate to a man to take charge of one of these vessels for a year, although he may not be entitled to receive a permanent certificate.

Mr. BENNETT. How many years must a man have been employed on a vessel to enable him to receive a certificate?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He has to pass a regular examination and must have served a specific term.

Mr. BENNETT. I think it must be shown by a mate before he receives a certificate that he has served a certain period. How many years must a man have served to receive a certificate?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not recollect exactly the time.

Mr. BENNETT. This Bill will press rather harshly on men who have served a number of years, because the Minister of Marine may of his own will recommend certain persons for certificates, and they will compete with men who have been compelled to serve a number of years prior to receiving certificates. Political pressure will be brought to secure this advantage, and recommendations will rest with political friends to receive this much desired compliment, because it will be a compliment, for certain men will receive these certificates and other men will be refused. The Bill does not provide any special time of service but it simply states that upon passing a certain examination a certificate will be granted.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. So far as I am aware, there never have been politics imported into this branch of the service, at all events. It is not upon the application of any politician that I could grant this certificate, but upon the report of a duly appointed officer.

Mr. ELLIS. The difficulty experienced has been to secure competent men with certificates to fill these subordinate positions, and the object of the hon. Minister is to fill these positions with men holding temporary certificates, provided their inspector reports in their favour.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

GOVERNMENT HARBOURS, PIERS AND BREAKWATERS.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved second reading of Bill (No. 38) further to amend the Act respecting Government harbours, piers and breakwaters.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The meaning of this Bill is simply, that the Auditor General has determined that the practice which has existed for many years whereby wharfingers pay themselves by deducting from the receipts the 25 per cent which the law authorizes them to get as salary, was not legal. He has decided that they should return the whole wharfage dues received into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and then that a special payment for their remuneration should be made back to them. This Bill is to enable us to continue the practice heretofore prevailing by which the wharfingers deduct their fees from the amount collected, and forward the balance. The addition to the Act is :

Such remuneration shall be retained from the tolls and dues collected.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I quite agree with the Minister of Marine as to the necessity for making this practice regular by legislation. The supervision of these wharfage dues is a matter that gives an immense amount of work to the staff of the hon. gentleman's department. He has been long enough at the head of the department to know that there is no toll which is more unfairly administered, in a sense, than these wharf dues. There are any number of public wharfs in the different provinces, and there is a tariff of tolls, and wharfingers are appointed, but, if any one takes the trouble to look through the returns, he will find that, in some localities—and they are very few indeed—a comparatively large amount is paid; whereas, in the great majority of cases, no tolls of this kind are paid at all. The public use the wharf in these places: Parliament votes the money to repair these wharfs, regardless of whether tolls are paid or not, and, in view of the fact that, after long experience, it has been found impossible to collect these tolls fairly and equitably, the wharfs ought to be made free all round. It is hardly fair that a few communities should be made to pay tolls, while the majority are allowed to go scot free. In some places, the people of a particular locality have defied the department to collect the wharfage tolls, and, after considerable trouble, it has been found that it was impossible to carry out the law. From 1867 down, the annals of the department will show, that the administration of this toll tariff, which applies all over Canada, is a nullity and a farce in most cases. In one locality the law is enforced, while in another the people have the benefit of paying no wharf tolls. It would be better to abolish the toll altogether.

Mr. COCHRANE. I cannot see why the law is enforced in some communities and not in others, and I, for one, would object to voting money to maintaining these wharfs where the people do not pay toll. I know that, in my section of the country, a very excellent wharf is owned by a private individual, and the people of that community have to pay wharfage. Why should not that be the case all round? It is the duty of the Minister of Marine to see that tolls are collected at the Government wharfs throughout Canada.

Mr. GILLIES. I fully endorse the statement of my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). It is to my personal knowledge, that many of the wharfs in the lower provinces do not pay a single cent into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, while others, within a few miles, are paying the tolls fixed by the department. The collection of these dues rests largely, if not entirely, upon the energy of the person in charge of the wharf, and, while in some cases communities pay no tolls, others are charged to the fullest extent. To secure uniformity of charges would require a staff of particularly vigilant officers, and would lead to a great deal of expense. I believe the best plan would be to make these wharfs entirely free. The revenue derived from this source last year has been very small, and what revenue there is has been taken from communities that can ill afford to pay. In my opinion, the Minister would do a wise thing, if he made those wharfs free.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) This question has to be looked at from the point of view of the property of private individuals, as well as from the point of view of the property belonging to the Government. In many sections of the country the Government may own a wharf, and a private individual may own another wharf immediately alongside of it. If you make the Government wharf free of toll, you depreciate the property of the man who has a wharf adjoining, and in that case you will inflict a hardship upon him. The tax is not a very onerous one, the tolls are not very high, and, so far as I know, there is no one who has a serious objection to them, as they exist at the present time. If these tolls are properly looked after, as they are in my section of the country, they would turn in a substantial revenue which would help to maintain these Government wharfs.

Mr. McALISTER. I agree with the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Gillies) that these public wharfs should be made free. In the town of Campbellton, where I live, the shippers have to pay those wharfage tolls, and there is a great deal of complaint from time to time. The revenue derived from these wharfs in the different parts of the Dominion, after the expenses of collecting it are deducted, amounts to a very small sum, and I believe it would be wise to make the wharfs free of toll throughout Canada.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It would be a very popular thing, no doubt, in certain localities to abolish the wharfage on the Government wharfs, and make them what my hon. friend terms free; but if he stops to think for a moment, he will see that it is not so very easy, and would not be so very just. Last year, for instance, the net amount received, after paying all the wharfingers' fees, was about $9,000. This amount goes very far towards keeping these wharfs in repair. Hon. gentlemen know that where wharfs are used, as ours are, for shipping and other purposes, it is necessary every year to lay out certain sums of money to keep them in decent repair.

Mr. McALISTER. This $9,000 was paid by one or two districts.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think hon. gentlemen opposite are largely exaggerating the cases where wharfage is not paid. During the past two years the department has been looking very closely after this wharfage matter, and wherever information has been given to the officials that the wharfage tolls were being evaded, steps are being taken to bring them under the general rule. I know that an attempt has been made, by not appointing a wharfinger, or by appointing one who declines to act, to evade the tolls; but the department generally overcomes that attempt by appointing one of its own men, who will act and collect the tolls. The $9,000 collected last year was, I think, pretty fairly divided over the Dominion. Besides this, an amount was collected sufficient to pay the salaries of all the wharfingers. Suppose you make the wharfs free—

Mr. GILLIES. You would not require a wharfinger.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Does the hon. gentleman know what the effect would be? It would be that the big man of the town would take possession of the wharf, and put all his tar-bark or other materials there. The wharf would quickly become practically the property of the leading merchant of the locality, and other people would be deprived of its use. That has been the effect in many cases, and it would not be fair to the people who build wharfs at their own expense. Every session numerous applications are made by members for wharfs to be provided for their constituents at the public expense; but I do not think it would be fair or just that wharfs should be constructed to give accommodation to individuals in different localities, and impose no tolls upon them. The present system has worked pretty well, though it has defects which it is our duty to try to overcome, and which we have pretty fairly overcome wherever our attention has been called to them. We have endeavoured to see that the tolls were collected as the law provides.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There are four wharfs which pay the bulk of the revenues collected all over Canada. Of all the wharfs of Ontario, there are only eight which pay any tolls whatever, one of them paying $1,439. In Nova Scotia there is a large number of wharfs along the coast, and not more than a couple of dozen of them return any tolls whatever. In Quebec, with its long stretch of river and gulf where wharfs are necessary and are supplied, a little over a dozen pay tolls. In New Brunswick only eight pay tolls. Of these one pays $700 and another $426, the others paying very little. I do not suppose that this is the time when this matter can be fully considered; but I feel positive that my statement did not exaggerate the case. Of the hundreds of wharfs built and maintained by the Government, and supposed to be in charge of officers, but a mere handful, comparatively, pay these exactions; and it is not fair, I submit, under these circumstances, that the few should be oppressed when the many escape altogether.

Mr. BRITTON. It will be seen that section 3 of the General Act is not touched or proposed to be touched by this Bill. Under that section the Minister of Marine and Fisheries can, and I suppose ought to and does, deal with the ports according to circumstances. Some of them, it is reasonable to believe, he would not put tolls upon at all, or at all events, not to the same extent as upon others. He would be governed by the amount of competition, the demands of the port where the wharf is situated, and so on. The great majority of the wharfs in Ontario belong to private individuals, as the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) has said, and this Act does not apply to them at all. I quite agree with what has been said on the other side, that if there is any unfair discrimination against persons in reference to certain wharves, section 3 ought to be amended; but at present there is nothing before the House except simply the question of collecting tolls on wharfs, and allowing the wharfingers to deduct from the amount collected their remuneration according to what has been fixed.

Mr. FLINT. The argument of the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) seems to be to tend rather in the direction of increased energy on the part of the Minister and his officials in seeing that the dues are properly collected. We have the assurance of the Minister that the department is paying attention to that matter. There is one point which appears to have been overlooked in the discussion, that is, the importance of having a wharfinger to see that the property is looked after and does not fall into decay, and to notify the proper authorities as to the state of the property. The wharfinger also performs an important office in looking after the conflicting claims and rights of individuals using the property. This work of course has to be paid for. Were the wharfs made free, it would not, of course be possible to find gentlemen in the neighbourhood who would be willing to act as wharfingers without pay, and there would be a great deal of difficulty in keeping track of the condition of the property, and avoiding difficulties and squabbles between individuals in regard to their different rights in respect of the wharfs. In the province of Nova Scotia some of these properties pay very handsomely towards the interest of the fund for regulating them and keeping them in repair. I think the facts stated by my hon. friend from Pictou should, and no doubt do, incline the department to see that the tolls are most strictly collected. There are cases where no private wharfs exist, and yet where the tolls collected are practically insignificant. In the main, the position taken by the Minister of Marine ought to be upheld.

Mr. BENNETT. Is it intended that this Act shall apply to so-called harbour masters or officers at points where there are no Government docks at all? Take the town of Midland, where there is no Government dock, and yet where there is a Government official whose business it is to collect fees from vessels. He gets $200 per year, and when he collects that amount all further interest in his work ceases. There is no return from him because he keeps the amount of $200 that he collects, and has no interest in collecting any more. Is it intended that this Bill shall apply to such officials?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I never heard of this before, and I thank the hon. gentleman for the information. I shall have the matter looked into. This Bill does not introduce any new principle, but simply authorizes the practice which always has prevailed, of allowing wharfingers appointed by the Government to retain out of the fees they receive the amount allowed them, instead of sending the whole sum to Ottawa and getting back what is due them.

Mr. BENNETT. Is this clause applicable to persons who collect fees and dues, as in the port of Midland?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If he is a wharfinger, it would apply.

Mr. BENNETT. There is no wharf there for him to be wharfinger of.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He is harbour master and comes under another statute altogether.

Mr. BRITTON. Section 1 of the Act now proposed to be amended defines distinctly to what this applies. It applies simply to Government harbours, piers, wharfs and breakwaters, constructed or completed at the expense of Canada.

Mr. GILLIES. I think that the fee demanded by the department is very reasonable, but the hon. Minister should adopt some system of seeing that it is universally imposed. In some cases, the fees are collected, and in others, within a few miles, they are not. In some cases, the person in charge of the public wharf belongs to the community, the people doing business on the public wharf are his neighbours, and he lets them go free; whereas in others, the collector is more exacting, and makes every one pay. One community suffers, therefore, while another goes entirely free.

I do not think there is anything in the point raised by the hon. member for King's, P.E.I., as regards public wharfs coming into competition with private wharfs, because the policy of the Government has always been to construct wharfs only in districts where there are no private wharfs, and where, owing to physical difficulties or other causes, the construction would be too great a burden on the community.

Mr. McALISTER. There is a great deal of force in the argument of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that if wharfingers were dispensed with altogether, one or two persons would take possession of each wharf and monopolize its use. I would suggest that the wharfinger should have the power to collect the tolls, to be regulated by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, from all persons indiscriminately who make use of the wharf for business purposes, and that these tolls should be smaller than at present and should go entirely towards paying himself. Under present conditions, the irregularity in collecting is a great cause of complaint. In the town of Campbellton, where I live, the wharfage accommodation is very limited, and besides navigation is closed during four or five months of the year, and yet the returns from the wharf there amounts to over $400, whereas the returns from the whole Dominion are only about $9,000. That shows that the number of wharfs paying tolls is very small, and that if they are not made free, some provision should be made by which every wharf would be subjected to toll. That is to say, if I am right, the provision here simply affects the payment of remuneration, and would not cover anything like an allowance for expenses out of the tolls. That still remains as before.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved second reading of Bill (No. 39) respecting the inspection of steamboats and the examination and licensing of engineers employed thereon.

Motion agreed to. Bill read the second time and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is a rather bulky Bill.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Rather bulky, but the amendments are few and almost altogether those recommended by the departmental officers. I do not think there will be any dispute as to the principle. I will explain each section as we go along.

On section 2—interpretation,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman will follow me, I will point out the changes that are made in this section. Subsection A remains as it was, except that the words, "and includes steam dredges and floating elevators," are added. These words were found necessary in order to bring steam dredges and floating elevators under the operation of the Act. In subsection C, it was found that the expression "yearly" and "every year" were not definite enough, and we substitute for the previous clause the one in the Bill now before the committee:

(c.) For the purpose of collecting the yearly rate of duty hereinafter imposed, the expression "year" means the calendar year, commencing the first day of January and ending on the thirty-first day of December, and for the purpose of the inspection hereinafter rendered imperative the expression "year" means twelve calendar months from the date of the certificate of inspection.

In subsection B, we provide:

The expression "owner" means the registered owner only.

Under the old Act the term "owner" included also the lessee and charterer. That was found not to work well. In practice it was found that ten or more people could charter a tug and claim that they were privileged as owners, and so evaded the Act. To meet that palpable evasion, we limit the interpretation of "owner" to the registered owner. Subsections D, E, F, G, H, I, J, K, are as they were before. The subsections from L to P, inclusive, are new, as follows:—

(l.) The expression "passenger steamboat" means any steamboat carrying any person other than the master and crew, the owner, his family and the servants connected with his household; except steam yachts used exclusively for pleasure or private use without hire of any kind;

(m.) The expression "minister" means the Minister of Marine and Fisheries;

(n.) The expression "vessel" means any barge, bateau, boat, scow or vessel carrying passengers, other than a steamboat;

(o.) The expression "voyage" includes "passage" or "trip," and the expression "remuneration" includes fuel and ship's stores of any kind or any other kind of payment or compensation;

(p.) The expression "tug-boat" means a steamboat used exclusively for towing purposes.

Mr. BRITTON. I must oppose as strongly as I can the inclusion of dredges and floating elevators under the provisions of this Act. The use of floating elevators has been going on for twenty-five or thirty years. They have been used very extensively, and, so far as I know, without any accident occurring and without injury to trade. There is no reason that I know of for having this Act made applicable to them. If any inspection of them is required, it seems to me it ought to be only such inspection as is made necessary in case of stationary engines. They are stationary engines to all intents and purposes. An engine is put upon a floating elevator instead of being put upon a dock, but it is used simply for hoisting. It floats alongside the dock and moves about nowhere except to adjust its position to the vessel that is being unloaded. Why a higher class of engineer should be required, or why a different inspection should be necessary than that which has existed for many years,

I cannot see. I speak only as the matter strikes me at first blush; I have not considered this Bill carefully. I did not know it was coming up this afternoon. But the Bill hits particularly the trade of Kingston and that of Montreal, so far as floating elevators are used in Montreal. It is a most important matter, and I should like to get some facts concerning it before this Bill is passed. It seems to me that if inspection is necessary, the inspection that is provided for stationary engines would be quite sufficient.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We have nothing to do with stationary engines.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no very great principle involved; but I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) will see that it is for him to give reasons why steam dredges and floating elevators should not be included under this Act.

Mr. BRITTON. They have not been included hitherto.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But they ought to be. Why should they not be made liable to inspection the same as any other steamboats? What is the difference?

Mr. BRITTON. They are not steamboats in that sense.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But they have boilers which ought to be inspected.

Mr. BRITTON. So has a hoist on a wharf.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But a hoist on a wharf is not within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. But I may tell the hon. gentleman that the Department of Marine and Fisheries is flooded with petitions praying for legislation to have stationary boilers inspected. But we have no jurisdiction over them; the provincial legislatures must pass laws on that subject.

Mr. BRITTON. Then let the provincial legislatures look after these.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But they have no power to legislate with regard to steam dredges. That is within the jurisdiction of this province. But I do not wish to press the matter upon the hon. gentleman, seeing that he has not given it consideration. The officers of the department report in favour of having such a Bill as this. If any men work upon these dredges, and if they are to be deprived of the protection which Parliament thinks it desirable to throw around other steamboats. I should like to hear some reason given for it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is all for protection.

Mr. BRITTON.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. All for the protection of life, and it is not an improper exaction upon shipping at all, it is a proper thing that the boilers of those dredges should be inspected from time to time in order that the employees may know that they are not going to be blown up.

On section 4,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We leave out of that section a provision under which the Governor in Council had power under the law as it stands to-day, to appoint at such places as he deems advisable in Canada, a skilled person competent to inspect boilers. Before we had to define in his appointment the district over which he would have jurisdiction, and we propose to leave out that limitation.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They would all have jurisdiction over Canada.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I had special reference to British Columbia in proposing to leave out the limitation. Subsection two is a new clause. No inspector so appointed should be engaged in any business or act as valuator of any damage to the goods or cargo, and should not act in any other capacity than his official capacity as steamboat inspector. Complaints have been made that these men were sometimes mixed up in some business with which they ought to have nothing to do.

On section 5,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There has been a change proposed by the chairman, Mr. Adams, and by Mr. McGee, who has special charge of this business. Under the old Act any three practical shipbuilders formed a board. The new Act provides that the chairman and two hull inspectors shall form a board to examine applicants for the position of inspector. It was thought best that the chairman and two inspectors should constitute the commission.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What do you do in case of the sickness of the chairman?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no provision made for that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It seems to me that under the old system there will be no delay for the candidates. If you make the chairman an indispensable member, his absence through illness might mean serious delay. I do not understand why they wish to have the chairman on all occasions. It seems to me that as we have to look after the safety of life, we must take every precaution in this Act not to have machinery that will interfere with the business of the commission. I do not see at the moment why the chairman should be required. It seems to me that three inspectors, as under the old system, would be quite sufficient.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Take the case of British Columbia to-day. I have sent the chairman out there because there will be a large amount of work there for the inspectors to do. Now, there are two inspectors in that province, and when he goes there he, with these two inspectors, will constitute a board, and they can examine, and perhaps it will be necessary for them to do so, those who come forward as candidates for the post of inspector.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman does not appreciate my point. Now that he is away you cannot arrange this board until he comes back; whereas, if the chairman were not always required, you have three inspectors, and you could get them together more easily than you could get the chairman with two inspectors. The case the hon. gentleman put seems to be an illustration of the inconvenience of this arrangement. The chairman can not be in British Columbia, for instance, and in Ontario at the same time.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The only difference between this provision and the old Act is that the latter provided that any three practical shipbuilders could form a board. That was found not to work well, because in many places they could not get three men competent to form a board of inspectors, and we think that a chairman and two hull inspectors will be an improvement.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not object to an improvement of the board, if it is to be such; but I think the hon. gentleman is making an unworkable arrangement by requiring that the chairman of the board of inspectors should always be one of the board.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will consider that point.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before Six o'clock is called, I would like to ask my right hon. friend what he proposes to take up this evening, after getting through with this Bill?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We will take up the Franchise Bill this evening.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The previous Act, to which the hon. gentleman referred, might be rendered nugatory by the absence of the chairman, is the contention of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). I call attention to section 9 of the present Bill, referring to the Board of Steamboat Inspectors, and subsection 3, which provides that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries may appoint one of the inspectors deputy chairman, to act in the absence of the chairman, and he shall have all the functions of the chairman.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I doubt whether the word "chairman," in section 5, even with this amendment, would include the deputy chairman. The clause says "chairman," and not acting chairman or deputy chairman.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I move to insert, after the word "chairman," the words "deputy chairman."

Amendment agreed to.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I should like a fuller explanation in regard to the change proposed. Under the present law there is a board for the examination of inspectors of hulls, and there is a handy provision under which, in some cases, no inspectors will be required. Practical shipbuilders are selected by the Minister, who shall constitute at any time or place the examining board, and, so far as my recollection goes, instead of any objection being taken to this arrangement, it is considered a convenient system. Inspectors themselves have been chosen from that class of men, and practical shipbuilders were able to examine the qualifications of a candidate, and, in any event, report the result of their examination, and the matter comes before the Minister before an appointment is made. While I have always been very much inclined to give great weight to the advice of the chairman and a board of this kind in regard to technical subjects, I should like to know, before this change is made, whether in the hon. gentleman's experience, there has been any difficulty whatever in the board of practical shipbuilders, as regards testing the qualifications of inspectors of hulls. The reason I press this matter upon the hon. gentleman is, that I can understand the necessity, in remote parts of Canada, of the speedy examination of an inspector of hulls, and, moreover, there is great expense involved in sending these particular men to any special part of the Dominion for the purpose. The Steamboat Inspection Act has been so administered that the dues collected paid for the expense of the inspection, so that, while the benefits to the public were many, in regard to the safety of lives in this connection, there was not felt, outside of the shipping interest, any expense of regulating these matters. If we are to depart from a system that has worked well in connection with ascertaining the fitness of commissioners, and enabling the board of officers, consisting of no less than three, to visit different parts of Canada, it will take a very short time to run up the expenses pretty heavily, and it is also possible that this change will be attended by considerable inconvenience and great delay in remote sections, where new officers are required. On these grounds, I should like a fuller statement, in order to ascertain the necessity for making such a radical change. On the face of the Bill, it looks well. A trained officer, with two other regular officers, would, no doubt, secure greater regularity in the examinations, and greater satisfaction, possibly, in the result, and also in the body of men who became inspectors. While that is, on its face, a good result, there is, at the same time, a possibility of incurring expense, inconvenience and delay, and, therefore, a case ought to be made out, founded on experience, to show that the present system, cheaper, undoubtedly, and more expeditious, has not worked well in the public interest.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I admit this is a question on which there may fairly be a difference of opinion. I have been guided entirely by the officers of my department. The chairman believes that, in the public interest, he should be present at the examinations, because charges have been made that inspectors have been appointed who had not been competent to fulfil the duties of their office. My predecessor had issued a commission, and had incurred an enormous expense in examining charges made against an inspector in British Columbia, Mr. Collister. There was a great deal of contradictory evidence gathered; but I have never taken action, one way or the other. I thought the evidence was inconclusive against his ability to discharge his functions properly, and I let the matter go: but the chairman of the board is under the impression, that uniformity could be obtained, in a degree at least, under the present amendment, that had not obtained under the old Act. You might send down to Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia and obtain three shipwrights there whose opinion as to the competency of a man to be appointed inspector would be entirely different from that of three shipwrights in Quebec, and it was thought that, if the chairman were present at these examinations, there would be a guarantee to the public that a certain amount of uniformity and efficiency would be obtained, which otherwise would not be secured. I frankly admit that was the only ground on which the change was made, and it is made on the very urgent representation of the present chairman of the board who believes that his presence at the different examinations would ensure an efficiency and uniformity, which the present system does not. The opinion of three shipwrights in the maritime provinces as to the ability of a man may be all right or all wrong, but it might not coincide with the opinion of three men in Ontario or Quebec or British Columbia. The chairman, Mr. Adams, thoroughly understands from long experience what the qualifications of an inspector should be, and his presence at an examination must have a good effect.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Suppose the office of inspector of hulls in British Columbia is vacant, where would the candidates be examined under this Bill?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not necessarily in British Columbia.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not possibly in British Columbia, unless the Minister sends out there two inspectors of hulls and the chairman or acting chairman of the board. As I understand it, there is only one inspector there now for the inland waters and the salt waters of that vast province, and the hon. gentleman sees that his duties would take him great distances apart.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think there are two inspectors of hulls there now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not of hulls.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Collister is inspector of hulls, and while Mr. Thompson is primarily inspector of boilers, he is also inspector of hulls on the inland waters. Mr. Adams has now gone out there, and the board would be properly constituted under this Act. I suppose there is no other part of the Dominion which the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) can point to as a similar example. The increasing trade of that province, however, will necessitate the immediate appointment of an additional inspector.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Three practical shipbuilders could certify to the ability of a candidate much more cheaply and quickly than could the board constituted under this Bill. If a vacancy in the office occurs it would be necessary to send Mr. Adams or some other officer all the way from the east out there and that would entail considerable cost, if this amendment is adopted. You have two inspectors for the three maritime provinces, and even if they could leave their work you would have to convene them at a particular place and send one of your officers from another province to constitute this board. This suggestion has been made by the board from the very best motives no doubt, but they probably do not think as much as hon. gentlemen here have to think of the convenience of the public and the expense on the treasury. While I would be the last man to treat their suggestions lightly, yet I would say, that unless the present more speedy and economical system has been found fault with—and there is no pretense of that—it would be much better to allow it to remain in force. Surely two inspectors of hulls cannot be any more competent to pronounce on a man's qualifications than are two practical shipbuilders.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am disposed to pay great deference and respect to the opinion of my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), for he was much longer in the department than I. Very strong objections have been taken to the fact that the three shipwrights appointed to examine a man, as it would be in their own interest, might select one whom they desired to appoint, but who might not otherwise be competent. My object was to divorce the public interest from the private interest, and that is why I yielded to the representations of my officers. It may be said: Here you have three shipwrights, they will appoint their foreman or some other friend, and he will do whatever they want him. There is that difficulty in the way. If my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) feels strongly upon the point, I will yield to him, because I recognize he has had large experience in the matter. I would make the clause to read:

Two inspectors of hulls—

And taking these words in the alternative:

—or two experienced shipwrights.

This would enable the Minister to appoint the chairman or deputy chairman and two inspectors in any particular case where it was thought necessary.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The chairman or deputy chairman of the board would still have to travel about.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think I should have at least one officer who has had experience, who knows what the qualifications of an inspector should be, and upon whose judgment I could rely.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The suggestion made by the hon. Minister is, I believe, an improvement.

Mr. HENDERSON. This clause states that no person shall be appointed an inspector of the hulls and equipment of such vessels unless he has passed a satisfactory examination as to his competency for the office. I would like to know if the Minister intends that the department should prescribe what competency shall consist of. A few years ago an examination took place in Toronto, and from my recollection, it turned chiefly upon the technical knowledge of the candidates, and not upon their practical knowledge of hulls; so that the man who stood highest was a person who had rarely seen the hull of a vessel, while others who were thoroughly posted in ship-building and knew every part of a ship, were excluded because they were unable to solve problems in quadratic equations or demonstrate propositions in the sixth book of Euclid. It seems to me that what is really wanted is practical knowledge, and if so, there should be some better definition of competency by the department. I know that good men have been excluded because they had forgotten some of their early training at school, while younger men who knew very little practically about ship-building, were accepted. In that way, I do not think the most efficient officer was secured.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is to overcome the difficulty my hon. friend suggests that I am adopting this new method. I want to get one experienced man on the board, so that the examinations throughout the Dominion shall be uniform, and shall be made on reasonable grounds. The same qualifications will be required from a candidate in British Columbia as from one in Nova Scotia. I do not want a hap-hazard examination, which would suit three ship-builders in Nova Scotia, while three in Ontario would require an altogether different examination; and I think I ensure that by requiring that the chairman of the board of inspectors shall be the chairman of the board of examiners; and, with the suggestion of my hon. friend from Pictou, which I accept, that it shall not be absolutely essential that the other two members of the board of examiners shall be inspectors, but that one or both may be practical ship-builders. I think the whole question will be solved.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is well as far as it goes, but I think the Minister should take care that in the instructions given to the chairman, the examination prescribed shall be of a practical character rather than simply of a technical character.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think my hon. friend is right, and I am sure my hon. friend from Pictou will acknowledge that we have in the department, in the person of Mr. Adams, a very practical man—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. A man who has had a large experience, and whose whole soul is devoted to his business. I would, therefore, move that after the word "equipment," in the 5th clause, there be inserted the words, "or one or more experienced practical ship-builders."

Mr. BENNETT. How many inspectors are there now in Ontario?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Two hull inspectors and three boiler and engine inspectors.

Mr. BENNETT. Is it intended to increase the number in the province of Ontario?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A question arises out of section 4, which I think has not been considered. It is a very good clause on the whole, except for a little exception:

And no inspector so appointed shall, except by permission of the Minister, be engaged in any business.

Will not that put the Minister in a very awkward position? The object of course is to get rid of persons who would be in the pay of some boiler-maker or drawing plans for him, and have thoroughly impartial officers; but while the principle is sound, this is a dangerous exception to it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am sure the committee will agree that a certain amount of discretion may fairly be left in the hands of the Minister. The case came before me, within the last few months, of a person perfectly competent to act, but who happened to be the mayor of some small town, and we had to give special permission to him to act. There was no reason why he should not fairly act as inspector, although mayor of a locality. It is just to meet similar contingencies that this discretion is left in the hands of the Minister.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It seems to me that the Minister could go on doing as he did in the case mentioned, without this clause.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I could not. In that case we went against the law.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Minister could lay down a rule that no officer should be engaged in any business that would subject him to the slightest suspicion. By this exception, the hon. Minister will subject himself to tremendous pressure. The pressure from any particular locality will be such, where the applicant has local influence, that he would be more than human if, under some circumstances, he be able to hold out. In his own interest and that of the service he should drop that section, which destroys the whole clause, or else drop the clause and let the Minister himself be held responsible as now.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would ask my hon. friend not to press his objection. Without this clause, it would not be open for the Minister to say to those who have the patronage of a district and are recommending a man for his position, that the man is unfit because he is engaged in business. But there will be cases constantly arising, where a man is engaged in some sort of business not at all connected with the inspection of steamboats, and unless there is some discretion vested in the Minister we would have to provide a salary for an inspector which would enable him to live without following any other business. The officers of the department concur in this exception, and my experience has been that such a discretion would be advisable, but that the main principle should be declared that engaging in business other than the one to which he is appointed would be disqualification.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I shall look into the subject before the Bill gets its third reading, but I would point out to the hon. gentleman that, under the general law, an officer in receipt of $900 or upwards in the service of Canada is debarred from being employed in any outside business of any kind. I think that is the general law, under the Civil Service Act, not applicable merely to employees connected with the inner service, but the outer service as well. I think this is a departure in the wrong direction.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Is subsection 2 of section 4 new?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, I was applied to a short time ago, by a gentleman, who had received an appointment, to know whether he could hold a certain office. It seemed to me rather inconsistent with his appointment, but there was no law against it. Now we have introduced a clause providing that he shall not engage in any other business unless with the consent of the Minister. It is the same principle that applies in the Inland Revenue and Customs Department.

Mr. HUGHES. Does that apply to civil servants, such as stenographers, accountants, &c.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). Any civil servant.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Passing to clause 5, the hon. Minister is carrying forward, with perhaps some little changes, an old clause relating to the inspectors of hulls and equipments and dispensing with them in certain parts of Canada. That clause, I think, was adopted in 1882, for the purpose of dealing with the then remote parts of Canada—Manitoba, British Columbia and the district of Keewatin. The hon. Minister will see that a clause which was good enough for those times, and which was out of harmony with the general inspection Act altogether and an exceptional piece of legislation, of necessity justifiable then, is wholly out of place now.

He will not say that we are not able to adjust these matters now on a general system for the whole of Canada, and there is no reason why that clause should be there at all. The clause is as follows :—

In the provinces of Manitoba, British Columbia and the North-west Territories and the district of Keewatin, the Minister may, when he sees fit, dispense with the appointment of an inspector of hulls and equipment; and in such case, or in a case of vacancy in the office of inspector in the said provinces, territories or district, the Minister may assign the duties of such inspector to the inspector of boilers and machinery, or such other person as he temporarily employs, who shall then, and so long as such order remains in force, have all the power and perform all the duties hereby assigned to the inspector of hulls and equipment, under the like obligations and like penalties in case of default, and such person shall be called an acting inspector of hulls and equipment.

That was necessary owing to the exigency of the time and the impossibility of anything like system that could be managed and controlled as in the older provinces. The railway facilities of British Columbia did not then exist. The steamers were limited in number. But now we have that province opening up and enormous shipping developing suddenly. And so, as strong a case as can be made out for any part of Canada for the system in its best possible form exists for it there; and that is what the people, I am sure, expect and what they ought to have. It means nothing extraordinary to provide an efficient staff to carry out there the law which is considered wholesome in the east. One of the best things about this law is that the administration of it is so far separated from the political department, so to speak. You have technical officers with large power, and you destroy, as far as public convenience will allow, the possibility of the improper exercise of discretion on the part of the political head of the department. Therefore, the law commends itself, as a whole, to the public in the eastern part of Canada. And it was a wholesome principle, though ignored in the clause which was brought into existence in 1882. But I suggest to the hon. Minister that now is the time to drop that and allow the general sections of the Act to apply, and I think it will be found sufficient.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is a good deal in what the hon. gentleman says. But I would call his attention to the fact that the clause to which he refers merely provides that the inspector of boilers, in the discretion of the Minister, if circumstances demand its exercise, may be appointed inspector of hulls. Take the case of Mr. Thompson in British Columbia. He is inspector of boilers, and under this section he was appointed inspector of hulls for the new steamers to be built on the inland waters of British Columbia going down the Kootenay River. We could not well do otherwise. It was impossible for Mr. Collister to go into the interior and inspect the hulls there. But the inspector of boilers, being on the spot, could make that inspection. It is found that in some cases this portion of the Act works well. In Manitoba a similar appointment is made. To do otherwise would duplicate appointments and expense to accomplish what, for the present at least, I think is better accomplished under this system. I would therefore ask that matters remain for a few years as they are. I am aware that we are emerging from the condition of affairs existing when this clause was introduced, but I think we have not got far enough yet to have qualified men to act, one as inspector of hulls and one as inspector of boilers. In many cases the same man can discharge both duties. I have given the hon. gentleman the instances, one in Manitoba and one in British Columbia, in both of which the Acts have worked well.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. Minister be correct—and I doubt it—and our officers can be interchanged to advantage, it must not be forgotten that that is not the principle of the Bill.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, it is an exception.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The inspector of boilers may be quite unfit to undertake the inspection of hulls.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Quite true.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This law does not stop, as the hon. Minister seems to think, at the power of the Minister to allow the inspector of boilers to act temporarily as inspector of hulls, but allows him to choose any person, inspector or not inspector—"the Minister may assign the duties of such inspector to the inspector of boilers and machinery, or such other person as he temporarily employs."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That will relate to distant parts of the country.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It gives a wide and dangerous discretion. The Minister himself would admit that he should not take such powers for the older provinces; it would create alarm among those identified with the shipping interests. I venture to suggest—without desire to reiterate my views or take up time—that the position is a dangerous one for the province of British Columbia, because it means that, for the sake of convenience and to put off dealing with affairs as they are, they leave the province of British Columbia in the same position as they have been in since 1882. The hon. Minister has mentioned the subject of distances. When you have to take an inspector from the Island of Vancouver to send him into the great inland waters of British Columbia, it seems manifest that the time has come when there should be two officers there, just as there are in Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island. Even in that territory two are required. But British Columbia is much larger in extent, more difficult of access. The argument of the Minister would be to postpone the proper administration there and the proper increase of the staff so as to gain inefficiency of administration. I do not put myself forward—I should not be warranted in doing so—as representing that part of the country, but speak simply from having held an official position that gives me grounds for believing, as I now argue, that the time for the cheap system in that district has passed. There is no reason why a province like British Columbia should be exempted from the general principle of the Bill and governed by rule of some or at the discretion of departmental officers wholly.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have no desire to postpone the making of proper appointments in British Columbia, and the best instance I can give is that I have already sent out the chairman of the board to make a proper division. I hope to do that. But the hon. gentleman must remember that British Columbia is a very large territory. It is not confined simply to the Island of Vancouver and New Westminster, but extends from the Kootenay up past the Skeena River northward. It may be necessary for me to make a provisional appointment for Skeena River at the north of British Columbia. This is a discretion that it would be well to retain for a time at least. I hope the hon. gentleman will not press his suggestion at this time. My officers all agree that it is desirable. It is not intended to retain the section unduly longer, or to postpone the responsibility of making the necessary appointment in British Columbia.

On section 6,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no change made here, excepting in subsection 2, which provides that any rules and regulations made under either of these sections shall, after publication in the "Canada Gazette," have like force and effect as if herein enacted. No. 1A was passed in 1889; B in 1890; C in 1892; D in 1892, and E in 1890. The present law does not provide that they shall have any effect by publication in the "Gazette;" but hereafter they will have.

On section 9,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The main section is as it was in the old Act; but subsection 3 has been added. The Minister may appoint one of the inspectors deputy chairman to act in the absence of the chairman, and such deputy shall exercise all the functions of the chairman.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How often is this board convened?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are no regular times for convening it, but Mr. Adams is trying to bring about some uniformity. It meets wherever the chairman calls it. For instance, he has gone to British Columbia now and he will have a meeting there. When he comes back, he may be sent to the maritime provinces and have a meeting there.

On section 10,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The following clause, that was in the old Act, has been left out:—

The chairman of the board of steamboat inspection, who shall also be the supervising inspector.

We did not know what that meant, and so we leave it out.

On section 11,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is only one change made here. Under the old Act, the penalty was arbitrarily fixed at $400. Every hon. gentleman knows that the degree of guilt attached to a breach of the law is variable. Sometimes a man is, perhaps, not absolutely innocent, but he commits a breach of the law which is not very serious. At other times, he acts in direct, and wilful, and wicked violation of the Act; the same penalty ought not to be attached to the different offences. Instead of fixing the penalty arbitrarily at $400 in every case of breach of the law, I propose to ask the committee to agree to a sliding scale, not exceeding $500, and not less than $100, depending upon the gravity of the offence. The whole object of the alteration is to give a discretion to the court in the matter of a penalty, making the minimum $100 and the maximum $500.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not altogether agree with the wisdom of that change. It is a difficult thing to obtain the penalty above the minimum in these cases, at the hands of the court. There is not a very general appreciation, over the country of the necessity of a severe administration of that section. I venture to believe, the result of this change will be, that the minimum penalty will be imposed, and then the same pressure and the same appeals that have heretofore been made in these cases, will continue to be made. If my recollection serves me right, where the Minister entertains a view that there should be a remission, it has been found necessary to come to this House and obtain a vote for the remission of the fine.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, the Governor in Council has power.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Under the general Act.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is being constantly exercised, very unfortunately; a constant pressure is being brought upon the Minister every month of his life to reduce a penalty, on grounds which commend themselves to his good sense. The magistrate says: I am sorry; I would not have inflicted $400; I do not think the case justifies $400. But the man broke the law, and I think perhaps he ought to pay $100, but $400 is too much. So I have to go to the Council with a report to get the penalty reduced from $400 to $100. I think some discretion ought to be left to the court, and I submit that, between $100 and $500 is giving a fair discretion for the court to exercise. Then, the Minister will be relieved from the necessity of hearing constant appeals to exercise his own discretion for a reduction of the fine.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I suppose the hon. gentleman refers to the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, clause 78. That would not apply, as the hon. gentleman will see on reading it. I do not recollect the provision under which the Governor in Council could remit these penalties, certainly not under that as I read it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I may say to my hon. friend, that it is not under that statute. A case came up, the Anglin case, and it was referred to the Department of Justice—I do not know who was Minister at the time—and they gave a written and reasoned opinion, that the Governor in Council had power to remit these penalties.

Mr. POWELL. As to this discretion of which the Minister speaks, it seems to me, that a tribunal of two justices of the peace is a very imperfect tribunal to hold such discretionary power as it is proposed to clothe it with under this section. There will be no uniformity. Two justices in one court would be guided by considerations that would not weigh with justices in another court, and this action would simply bring the law into disrepute.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. My recollection is that these prosecutions could not be heard before two justices of the peace.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will look into the matter. I have not had a case before me adjudicated upon by two justices of the peace.

Mr. MILLS. Why should it be made compulsory to have the certificate on board the vessel?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is necessary. Every steamboat carries her certificate; it is framed and hung up.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the Act, of 1886, this certificate was to be delivered to the chief officer of customs at the port where such inspection was made. Why have the words "at the port where such inspection was made" been dropped? I can understand cases arising where parties might want to take action respecting the vessel and it might be important to know where to find the certificate.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am informed that this clause was amended with a view to simplify the matter. Instead of making it compulsory that the certificate should be delivered to the chief officer of customs at the port where the inspection was made, it has been amended so as to read that the certificate may be delivered to any chief officer of customs.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Anywhere.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is not a wise change to make. Under the old law there was something definite and certain. If you believed the vessel was violating the law, you could look for her certificate at the port where the inspection was made. Under the law as amended the officers would not have the support of the community in enforcing the law, because it would not follow that the certificate was filed in that port but at any customs port. Who is a chief officer of customs?

Mr. POWELL. A chief officer of customs at a port we all understand to be the collector. The chief officer for the Dominion, however, is, I suppose, the Minister. The language of the amended clause as proposed is very indefinite. Why not provide that the certificate should be filed where the vessel was registered, so that any one could find it in case of action being taken concerning a ship. Under the proposed clause it would be necessary, in order to institute proceedings, to search every custom-house in the Dominion. The amendment is perfectly absurd, trifling and picayune.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The idea was to make it more general.

Mr. POWELL. You are trifling with purely technical ritual which is absolutely unnecessary and will interfere with shipping. If the hon. gentleman departs from the practice that the certificate should be filed in the port of registry, he is making a regulation that will serve no purpose and will put people to considerable trouble, if it is of any significance at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The deliverance of the certificate is not the main thing. The inspection of the ship is the main object.

Mr. POWELL. It is a useless change.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The great object is to have the inspection made and to have the certificate filed in some official way. But there is no necessity to have it filed in any special place. Very frequently inspections are made on Saturday afternoon after the office of the port where the vessel was inspected had closed. If it was necessary to file the certificate in that port, the vessel would have to remain over until Monday. The great thing is to have the inspection made and to have the certificate given. The filing of it is merely an official act which is not of one-fiftieth part the importance of the main act itself. Mr. Magee tells me that every month cases come up where vessels are inspected on the afternoon of Saturday and the papers cannot be filed unless the vessel waits over Sunday and until Monday morning.

Mr. POWELL. I agree that the main thing is the inspection, and so far as the certificate is concerned, the only object in filing it is to place it somewhere where people can see it. Why not have it filed in some convenient place?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If it is filed in the office of the chief inspector of customs it is proper.

Mr. POWELL. The owner or captain of the vessel is directly interested, and outside of him the public generally. So far as the owner and master of the vessel is concerned the copy in the possession of one of them is ample. But so far as the public is concerned they want to know where to get the certificate or otherwise they may go hunting all over Canada. What sense is there in filing it when people cannot know where it is. Under this Bill they might file it in British Columbia.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. After all, the old Act was well considered and it met the objections which seem to occur to both hon. gentlemen who have last spoken. Under the old Act, if a person wanted to know whether the vessel was inspected or not, all he had to do was to find the officer, and if the vessel was inspected on Saturday night there was nothing requiring the inspector to go back to the office. As long as you had the officer you had the information as to whether the vessel was inspected or not.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Curiously enough my attention had not been called to this change and that is the reason why I did not mention it to the committee. If my hon. friend thinks it better I have no objection to maintain the law as at present in that regard.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It tends to certainty anyway.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Very well, I will move to amend the section so that the law shall remain as it was before on this point.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the old Act, the words were inserted "and such people shall be liable for the same and chargeable therewith." Would it not be as well to retain those words as I see they are omitted in the Bill?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I myself went through the Act very carefully and I found about twenty places in which a similar phrase was used. I introduced one general section to cover that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Very well.

On section 11, subsection 2,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In that case, I think there ought to be something more than the language of the draft. The party offending ought to have something more than the mere visit of an officer. I think the direction ought to be in writing—something in the nature of a warrant.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Of course, the Minister would not direct personally. He would naturally direct in writing.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Exactly; and to avoid any uncertainty, and let masters understand what the authority of the officer is, I think the words "in writing" should be inserted. I think it is dangerous to leave the matter in this form, and I know of no case like it where the same thing is done.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have no objection to inserting the words "in writing," only it looks curious that the collector of customs may make the seizure without a certificate, while the Minister must do it in writing.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I assure the hon. gentleman, that I do not make the suggestion merely for the sake of suggesting. I know of no case in which a Government officer, or any other person, can act without having to show some written authority from a Minister or a court. The officer ought to have something to show before he makes a seizure or stops the running of a boat. If not from the Minister, let it be from the Deputy Minister.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If a steamboat is running in violation of the law, any chief officer of customs may go on board and seize it without a certificate. If there is no chief officer at the place, the Minister may direct any other person to make the seizure. If the hon. gentleman makes a point of it, that that direction should be in writing, I have no objection. I move that after the word "Minister," the words "in writing" be inserted.

Mr. POWELL. I would suggest the use of the term "collector of customs," instead of "chief officer of customs."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The term "chief officer" is used all through the Act.

Mr. POWELL. I do not think it is recognized as a legal term. If it is used, had you not better have a definition of the term?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I thank the hon. gentleman for his suggestion, and I will consider it.

On subsection 3,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This is new, and it is caused by the fact, that excuses are constantly made by the owners of steamboats that their boats are not ready, and the inspectors have to go back and forwards, time and again, to inspect them, at a very heavy cost to the department. We do not know how to meet such cases otherwise than in the way suggested here.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I sympathize with what the hon. gentleman has stated, in one sense, and I do not wish to change the position which I occupied departmentally in that regard. I know the inconvenience of it, and the expense that fell upon the general fund by very careless conduct on the part of some steamship owners. But here is a case where, perhaps, the language goes a little too far in attempting a remedy. It seems to me, that some notice should be given to the owner before he is to be fined—for practically this is a fine. If the inspector happens to be about, and drops in upon the steamship owner, and he is not ready for the inspector, the inspector may go away until some other time that suits him, and the expense is levied on the steamship owner. I do not know how far it would be possible for the inspector to have some system in connection with his perigrations, or whether a steamboat owner could not fairly claim notice of the fixing of a certain time in which he must submit his boat to inspection. A steamboat owner may have complied with the law and have his boat ready for inspection, and yet there is no certainty that the inspector may not come when the owner is absent and every one away. It seems to me a great hardship that in such a case the owner should be punished.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The clause is arbitrary but I see no escape. It should be read in view of the facts known to exist. The inspectors always agree with the owner to proceed with the inspection at a certain time, but when they get to the place, it frequently happens that the owner has an excuse for not being ready, and the inspector has to kick his heels about a week or two at the hotel or travel back some hundreds of miles and return again, and he may have to do this two or three times. It is a choice between a little arbitrary section and a laxity which gives the steamboat owners power to evade inspection altogether. I frankly confess that I am guided in this matter by the advice of my permanent officials. If the hon. gentleman objects very much, I shall let the clause stand, but cannot consent to strike it out in the face of the strong representations made to me by the officers of the department.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Better let it stand. There seems cause for strong complaint, and the innocent are apt to be punished.

On section 12,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The old Act was very rigorous. It proved that in case of an omission to give the notice required, the owner of the steamboat would incur a penalty of $200 per day. That was considered very outrageous, and I substituted this provision that the penalty shall not exceed $500 and be not less than $50.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where the master, owner or engineer of a steamboat neglects to give at the earliest opportunity a report of the occurrences of any event whereby the hull or machinery or other portion of the vessel is materially injured or weakened, the old penalty was not too high.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The owner might be ruined by the engineer's neglect, and we have to consider what is a reasonable penalty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the case of a passenger boat, it was not a bit too high.

Mr. QUINN. No doubt the intention in making a maximum and minimum penalty is to levy it according to circumstances. In the case of a passenger boat, the minimum penalty would be imposed but not in the case of a trade boat.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly

On section 14,

Mr. QUINN. According to this section the owner of a steamboat must produce the certificate of the master, mate or engineer before his boat can be inspected. But he may not have appointed a master or mate at the time. Is not that a little hard?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There must be the certificate of the master, mate or engineer to suit the requirements of the law.

Mr. QUINN. That is the certificate of registry of the steamboats, but not the certificate of the master, or the certificate of the mate or the certificate of the engineer. The master, the mate and the engineer, as I understand, must each have a certificate in order to run the steamboat.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. QUINN. But that is not the certificate required to be produced here.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. QUINN. Then this section is rather arbitrary. These inspections are very often made in the early spring before the master has been employed, or before the mate is employed, and sometimes even before the engineer is employed. Yet you require the owner of the steamboat to produce the certificate of his master or his mate, or if he cannot do so he cannot have his steamboat inspected.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He certainly cannot have it inspected if he has not a certified master and engineer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is the hon. Minister quite sure of that? There are some steamers, I think, that do not require to have a certified master or engineer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They would not be required to produce certificates.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Let us see how far we are going. This section provides that the inspector shall demand a certificate of registry and may demand these others. There seems danger that you will go further than you desire. Under this section it would be no excuse to say the steamboat to be inspected was one that did not require these certificates. The Act demands that the inspector may demand them, and if they are not produced, then the penalty follows.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The first part is imperative he "shall" demand the certificate of registry. But, as to the production of the other certificates he "may" demand them. Surely you must leave some discretion with the officer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would not assume that. I do not think that is a right spirit in which to legislate in dealing with penalties. This is a case in which a man may be put to any amount of trouble regarding a matter that he cannot control. The hon. Minister says that part of this is permissive. The officer may demand the certificate, but when he does demand them they must be produced, or the party is liable to a penalty. The hon. Minister said that they would not be asked for in the case of a steamboat in which they were not required. But I submit that this is a dangerous way to legislate.

Mr. QUINN. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the penalty, which is not exceeding $100 and not less than $50, "and any chief officer of customs or any inspector may detain any steamboat in respect of which the provisions of this Act (or any Order in Council made under it) have not been fully complied with." I think the object of the hon. Minister would be obtained by holding back the certificate from the steamer until the certificate of the master or mate or engineer has been filed in the department. To deprive him of the use of his steamboat, to put it in the power of the inspector to retain the steamboat altogether is a very severe penalty.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman, I think, does not understand the object of the section. It makes a very slight change in the law as it exists. When the inspector goes to make the inspection of the steamboat, he calls first upon the certificate of register.

Mr. QUINN. No objection to that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the owner wants to go to sea, the inspector asks him for the certificate of the captain, and mate and engineer. He may require the production of these. If the owner does not produce the certificates, he does not get the certificate of inspection.

Mr. QUINN. It is not only when the owner wishes the steamer to go to sea. It is clear that at the time of the inspection the inspector may demand the certificate of master, mate and engineer. This must be for a purpose.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no penalty if these are not produced.

Mr. QUINN. Yes, there is. Section 50 covers the penalty.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly, no man expects to get a certificate unless he complies with the demands of the inspector. They are not liable to penalty, but unless the certificates are produced, you cannot get your certificate or go to sea.

Mr. POWELL. One criticism I have to make. I have had a good deal of experience in shipping, and it is the first time I ever heard it suggested that the master is the custodian of the certificate of either mate or engineer. I think the Minister will travel over the world a great deal before he finds that a master has his engineer's certificate, or his mate's certificate; these certificates are in the keeping of the officers themselves, and to call upon the master to produce these certificates would be an absurdity. I would suggest that only the master, the mate or the engineer shall produce or exhibit the certificates to the inspector. Here the master is held responsible in a very large penalty if his engineer, over whom he has no control, does not do a certain thing which he has no power to compel him to do.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend has misconceived the object of the section altogether.

Mr. POWELL. But I do not misconceive the result.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no penalty attached to it. The inspector must deal with the steamboat. He must not go running around for the mate, the cook, the engineer and all the others; he goes to the master and he says: You want an inspector's certificate? Yes. Have you got your certificate of register? Yes. Produce it. He produces it.

Mr. POWELL. That is not exactly what it says.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is only an authority given to the inspector to demand these things. If they are not given, there is no penalty, only the inspector does not grant the certificate until they are produced. He must not grant the certificate until he sees that they have a certificated engineer on board.

Mr. POWELL. I call the Minister's attention to section 50:

Except when otherwise specially provided, the owner or master of any steamboat in Canada shall, for any violation in respect of such steamboat, on any one voyage or trip thereof, of any of the provisions of this Act, or of any Order in Council made under it, be liable to a penalty.

Now you require that the master shall produce that certificate. The master cannot produce it because it is not under his control.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I want to give the inspector power to require the production of the certificate of the engineer, the certificate of the master, and the certificate of the mate before he grants his final certificate to that boat.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where is the provision that if a refusal takes place, the certificate of inspection shall not be given?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The law says that he may require it. Every inspector shall demand the production of the certificate of registry of the owner or master of every steamboat. Now, if the owner does not produce that, he cannot get a certificate.

Mr. QUINN. I think the Minister ought to add, "on default of the owner or master to produce such certificate, the certificate of inspection shall not be granted."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend will see that that is clearly implied. We have had the first part of the section there for 20 years. If he does not produce his certificate of registry he will not get his certificate of inspection. Then we add that if he does not produce the certificates of the master, the mate, and the engineer, as being duly qualified, he shall not get his certificate of inspection.

Mr. QUINN. I fear that under section 50 the owner will be liable to a penalty, and his vessel will be detained.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am quite clear about that, the section does not apply to it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The old section was a little different.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, that read: "Every inspector of steamboats shall demand that the owner—"

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, "may demand of the owner or master of any steamboat which he is inspecting, the production of the certificate of registry of such steamboat." The hon. gentleman stops there, but the old Act says "such owner and master shall thereupon produce and exhibit the same to such inspector."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is not so much to exact a penalty, it is to give a right to the inspector to have these necessary documents produced to him before he grants the certificate to enable that boat to go on her voyage. I think every one will agree that she must have her proper certificate of registry, and she must satisfy the inspector that she has a certificated captain, a certificated mate, and a certificated engineer.

Mr. QUINN. Quite right, but I think the penalty comes under section 50.

Mr. POWELL. Any one who has practical knowledge of the working of the law, knows that all these details were covered by the law. The officer would not grant the vessel her discharge and would not give her a clearance.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What, then, is the harm of putting this in?

Mr. POWELL. Suppose you call for a mate's certificate to-day, and to-morrow a new mate comes on. Then you have a useless provision calling for a mate's certificate for one day, and no provision for having a duly certificated mate for the next 12 months, unless she has to apply for inspection again. Why not leave the matter as it was? When a master wanted to clear his steamer, if he did not comply with the law, he could not get his clearance. Whether a man has a duly authenticated engineer, or mate, or boatswain—what has that to do with the machinery and hull of a steamer? We can see no good reason for calling for the certificate of registry, these are things that the collector of customs has to attend to before he grants a clearance. But you are introducing here foreign matters that have nothing to do with steamboat inspection, matters of detail that are worked out on each individual trip.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend does not understand the working of the Act, although I admit he has had great experience. But there are many steamboats that do not clear at all, as ferry boats running from one point to another. The inspector goes to inspect one, and the owner says to him: I want to get an inspector's certificate for 12 months. Very well, where is your certificate of registry? Produce it. Have you got a certificated captain? Yes. Produce it. Have you got a certificated mate? Yes. Produce it. Have you got a certificated engineer? Yes. Produce it. Unless these requirements are complied with, he gets no certificate. Now, no man would wish that the inspector should be compelled to give that certificate unless all these necessary requirements have been complied with, and this is merely power given to the inspector to demand them so that there shall be no question raised. The hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Quinn) raised the point that failure to comply would mean a penalty. It is only if the owner sails without these certificates that he incurs the penalty.

Mr. QUINN. I am sorry I cannot agree with the Minister on that point. Section 50 clearly says: "Any chief officer of customs or any inspector may detain any steamboat in respect of which the provisions of this Act have not been fully complied with." When that provision has not been complied with, the steamboat can be detained.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is not that right?

Mr. QUINN. But he is furthermore liable to penalty for a mere temporary loss or absence of the certificate. The mate, engineer and master of the steamboat may be certificated men, but the certificate may not be in the hands of the owner at the moment his steamboat is being inspected. Now, if the Minister will put here that the penalty incurred by the neglect to produce these certificates at that time, will be that the certificate of inspection shall not be granted to the owner, then I think there is some reason in it; but if he leaves it open in this way, there must be some penalty for not complying with the law, and it only can fall under the penalty described in section 50.

Mr. POWELL. Take the case of a ferry-boat running from St. John to Carleton. If there is no duly certificated engineer on that boat, all they have to do is to hire one for one day, because he is not an articulated seaman at all; he is not an articulated officer of the boat. The owner can put any person on there one day, and turn him out the following day. That is a very laudable end to be accomplished, and the proper way to do it is by some other Act for the protection of passengers, where it provides a penalty in case the boat is without a proper certificate, but it does not come within the purview of a Bill for the inspection of hulls and machinery, and is entirely foreign to such a Bill.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot do more than repeat the arguments I have already advanced. This section is to enable the inspector, before he gives the certificate, to see that the vessel is seaworthy within the meaning of this Act; that the boat has a certificate of registry, that the captain and the mate have certificates.

Mr. POWELL. A certificated captain is not necessary.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, by the Act. If the vessel sails the next day and discharges her certificated officer and takes on board one not certificated, she thereby incurs another penalty under the Act. The object of this section is, however, to enable the inspector to see that the vessel is seaworthy.

Mr. POWELL. That is once in twelve months.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Section 50 only provides for a violation of the law, such as inability to produce a mate's certificate, which would simply prevent the owner or master from getting a proper certificate of inspection.

Mr. QUINN. The terms of the Act are very broad, and it provides that any steamer may be detained in case the provisions of this Act shall not have been complied with.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The collector of customs may detain a vessel.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Minister may have no doubt that these parties would go scot free in the event of being sued for penalties, but the courts may take a different view. It is proposed to have some one named to prosecute for these penalties; informers are contemplated, who will be allowed a share of the penalties. The Bill contains a provision that the officers of the vessel shall produce certain certificates.

But the Minister says that, in certain cases, they would not have those certificates, and yet there would be no liability. The Bill says that, when a provision of this Act is violated, a penalty shall attach. Another provision contemplates the putting of the Bill into force by officers or others authorized by the Minister. It would be desirable, as the Minister does not desire to have these men placed in that position, to amend this section. I cannot understand why these additional provisions are required in connection with the administration of an Act in relation to the inspection of hulls, boilers and machinery, when we have another measure in regard to the safety of passenger boats, and another requiring that boats shall have certain certificates.

Mr. POWELL. I call the attention of the Minister, as a lawyer, to section 50. No doubt, the idea was, that the penalty in this particular case should not be a money penalty, but that the steamboat should be placed in such a condition that it could not obtain the certificate necessary to clear. I will concede, that that is the object of the Bill, and I call attention to the fact that this section does not carry out that idea. If this particular infringement of the section does not come within the first part, namely, that he shall not be liable to a penalty not exceeding $200, it does not come within the section that the steamboats shall not have the certificate. The same conditions are necessary to bring the vessel within the first clause as within the second; so the inspector cannot refuse the certificate. This is a serious matter. The hon. gentleman will see that, when the Bill deals with the matter in regard to which there is a former statute, and attempts to make new regulations, these are substitutionary, and directly or impliedly repeal the old Act. Our statute-book contains a number of regulations safeguarding steamboats. If this section has the significance which the Minister says it possesses, it is a direct or indirect repeal of the old provisions, and these new provisions are substitutionary, and the result may be more far-reaching than the hon. gentleman imagines. The latter part of the section has no right there, and it does not belong to the subject matter, and could only tend to secure bad results to our shipping law.

Mr. QUINN. In the division I represent, there are 500 or 600 steamers, all of which might be tied up under this Act. This is a serious matter, and I am not convinced by what the hon. Minister has said, that the owners of the steamers would not be liable to penalties. The nature of the Act would not be changed, but the objects sought to be attained by the Minister might be secured, if he added the words "until a certificate has been produced, such certificate shall not be granted to the steamboat."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman had better let that clause stand.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not think I have been arbitrary in the matter, and I have tried to meet the views of hon. gentlemen. I have no objection to let it stand.

On section 17, subsection 3,

Mr. POWELL. I have a little quarrel with this section which relates back to subsection 1. Under the old Act of which this is simply a transcript, there was some inconvenience. I was interested in a small steamboat myself, and we were detained three weeks in getting a certificate, owing to the fact that the Department of Marine would not grant the certificate we required.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. When was that?

Mr. POWELL. That was under the regime of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). It was not in your time.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am glad of that.

Mr. POWELL. I know we lost several hundred dollars on account of it. If you look at the form of certificate you will see that it says:

I further certify that the said steamboat is permitted to run on the waters from..... to.....from this day.....to..... day of....., and that she is adapted and fit to carry passengers, &c.

The Department of Marine at that time put this construction upon these words: That they could only grant a certificate from special ports to special ports and that they could not grant a roving certificate wherever a vessel wanted to go, and which is the kind of certificate we needed. A British steamer can come across to Canada with a British certificate and go wherever she pleases, but if one of our steamers is going on a special voyage she has to get a special certificate. That certainly requires amendment so that the inspector can grant a Canadian steamer a roving certificate to go wherever she pleases. Our shipping should not be under more severe restrictions than British and American shipping. In the case I refer to I saw that the department officials were bound by the form of the certificate, but I had to come to Ottawa and I succeeded in getting them to do something approximating common sense. This question will arise particularly when we come to the schedule; but in the meantime I would call the attention of the Minister to the fact that there should be no such restrictions on a steamer, except in the case of passenger line steamers that are on a special route. In respect to our freight boats they should be allowed to travel the world over without limitation whatever wherever trade calls them. This should be amended so as to put Canadian steamers on a par with British and American steamers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This will come up particularly on the schedule later on, and in the meantime I will consult with the officers of the department to see what amendment can be made in the line of the suggestion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell).

On section 17, subsection 5,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This subsection was framed to meet cases where captains lent their equipment to other captains to evade the law.

Mr. QUINN. I think it is too broad, in speaking of equipment alone. I think it ought to say the material portion of the equipment.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The penalty is variable from $50.

Mr. QUINN. But it is a severe penalty for the loan of a spike, or something of that kind.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Suppose a man lends some life preservers?

On section 20,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The change made here, at the instigation of the inspector, is to provide that when the engine of any steamboat is stopped for any purpose for five minutes, the safety valve should be opened.

Mr. QUINN. That would only apply to cases where the steam went up to or above the inspection point. For instance, suppose a steamer is inspected up to 150 pounds pressure, and is running with only 90 or 100 pounds, would it be necessary, if it stopped for five minutes, to open the safety valve and blow off steam, probably reducing the pressure down to eighty pounds?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly not. As long as it is below the point of inspection, it is all right.

On section 27,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This clause provides a protection which the department think desirable. In the old Act the words "some incombustible material" are open to difficulty, and the chief inspector suggested that the description should be made more definite by using the words: "tin be nailed on it in such a manner as approved by the inspector." These words were thought necessary to effectually protect wood work exposed to ignition on board steamboats.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How far will this interfere with the arrangements which ship owners make at present?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The chief inspector did not make any of these arrangements without full consultation. Many of these technical matters I have no personal knowledge of, but I have gone over the Bill carefully with Mr. Magee and Mr. Adams, the chairman of the board, and this change was recommended unanimously by the entire board of inspectors.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is very good technical advice, but the question is how far is it going to be practicable?

Mr. QUINN. The objection I see is necessitating a space of four inches between the wood and the funnel. That may cause large expense to vessel owners, as it will necessitate the opening up of larger spaces around these funnels. I do not think it is necessary in all cases as the funnel is not a very dangerous spot.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Four inches is not much.

Mr. QUINN. That is not allowed at present. If you make it four inches by law you will necessitate enlargement of the space and inflict expense on the steamboat owners. That fact that this is recommended by Mr. Adams would be almost sufficient guarantee to me to let it pass without reserve, but as it may involve a radical change in the expenditure of a large amount by steamboat men, I would take it as a favour if the hon. Minister would allow it to stand until I can communicate with some people, and if there is no objection, the matter will then pass.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have no objection at all to allowing the clause to stand.

Section allowed to stand.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is the same as the old Act of 1886?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is there any reason for the change?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. All the boards recommend it.

On section 32,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This is new.

Mr. QUINN. I would like to ask if this is supported by the whole board.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, I am informed by the officer that this is according to the unanimous report of the board.

Mr. QUINN. I need not draw attention to the fact that it is a very radical change. Fancy the enormous expense of the signaling and repeating apparatus.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) regards this as a radical change, I am willing to allow it to stand.

Mr. QUINN. I would like it.

Section allowed to stand.

On section 33,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The latter part of this, from the word "qualified" in line 39 is new, in the sense of being an amendment to the old Act, but it was passed in 1890. There is no change in the subsection.

On section 35,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Subsection 2 is new, as follows:—

2. Any person keeping watch or in charge of the engine-room of any steamboat mentioned in this section shall be deemed to be serving and employed as engineer while keeping such watch, or while so in charge.

That was found necessary, after a good deal of consideration, to prevent the law being evaded. They used to put an uncertificated man in charge, but, if their action was questioned, they would say he was not the engineer.

Mr. QUINN. This applies only while the steamer is running.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is to meet the case I have suggested.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Quinn) suggests a good idea. This is intended to cover the case of a steamer running and not one at the dock.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This has reference to another section concerning persons in charge of steamboats that are running. They are not required to have a certificated engineer when not running.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But suppose a man did part of his watch duty at the dock and afterwards put in some service at sea as watchman, he would not be allowed, even when at the dock, to keep watch in the engine-room.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think there is no chance of any such construction.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think it goes further than the hon. Minister intends.

Mr. QUINN. The objection I take to it is this: that under this section a man could not employ an uncertificated man as watchman even when the steamer is at the dock.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This does not compel them to keep certificated men, but simply provides that persons employed and in charge of the engine-room shall be certificated engineers.

Mr. QUINN. Suppose a boat is at the dock and the engineer wants to leave, he would naturally leave his fireman in charge. But, under this clause, the fireman could not legally take charge.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What do you suggest?

Mr. QUINN. I suggest these words, "or any steamboat while in motion."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I accept that.

On section 39, subsection 3,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is the old law, taken from half a dozen different sections, and consolidated into one.

Mr. QUINN. I must raise my voice against the imposition of all these penalties. I would like to say to the Minister, that, unless the reports of his department show that such a law is absolutely necessary, it is too bad that it should appear on the Statute-book. We have what I consider a perfect iniquity on the statutes, in the customs law. Why should we be obliged to introduce here such severe penalties as are introduced in the customs law, when we are dealing with the leading business men of the country? It seems extraordinary that we should do so. I think it is an awful reflection upon the honesty of our people, if such laws are necessary. I would ask the Minister, unless there is some pressure brought to bear by the officers of his department, not to put such a law as this upon the Statute-book. The idea of a law imposing a penalty of not less than $50 or not more than $500, or imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, upon any person who prevents or interferes with any officer of the customs or an inspector in the performance of any duty under any of the provisions of this Act, is certainly an extraordinary provision. I speak from my experience of the customs law, when I say that the effect is to make our officers in the different departments purely and simply Jacks-in-office, who, clothed with the authority which this Act gives them, become insulting, offensive, intolerable characters in society, in many instances. I do not wish this to be construed as a reflection, at all, upon the chief officers of the different departments; but I do say, that is the case in the administration of the customs law, and I fear it will be so in the administration of this law. We are simply creating a number of Jacks-in-office, who will make the existence of the people with whom they come in contact, unbearable, and who will ride rough-shod over the merchants and people occupying respectable positions in society. I say that, unless it is called for by the officers of his department, I do not like to see a penalty of this kind on the Statute-book.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is nothing new in this at all. We are conforming to the law which has been in force, and which has been found to be necessary for many years past.

Mr. QUINN. If it is necessary, why, all right.

On section 48,

Mr. BRITTON. There is no protection to the owner of a boat who has chartered it to a lessee. The proceedings appear to be rather severe and no redress is provided.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We must be able to take proceedings in rem against the boat. If the owner can lease his boat to the cabin boy and so escape payment and confiscation, there will be no protection whatever.

Mr. BRITTON. The Minister will see there is no protection whatever to the mortgagee in case of a mortgage and no protection given to the owner.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The same course is followed in customs cases. The Government look to the ship.

Mr. QUINN. I agree with the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) that some protection should be afforded to the mortgagee of a vessel. I could imagine a case where a vessel might be chartered for a very short voyage, and by collusion between the charterer and an officer of the customs, she might be sold without the knowledge of the owner or the mortgagee, and the charterer and the officer divide the profits.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. Before such proceeding could take place, there must have been a proper prosecution and conviction obtained. This could not be done in a week or a month. This Bill does not change the severity of the old law, which provided that the vessel should be sold and confiscated. I have suggested a certain mode of making the confiscation and forfeiture practicable, by selling the vessel.

Mr. QUINN.

Mr. QUINN. The term confiscated and forfeited is a very uncertain one. In this case the machinery appears so well oiled and greased that these people might be able to take advantage of it to the injury of the mortgagee.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). This provision is simply following the principle adopted in all proceedings in rem.

Mr. QUINN. No doubt the vessel would be in the same position as if she was seized for smuggling; but in such a case there would be long proceedings necessary to libel her.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In all these cases proceedings are taken in rem without any reference whatever to the owner. This section is simply applying the principle which applies in all such cases.

On section 58,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Instead of bringing this Act into force in the middle of the shipping season the hon. gentleman might consider the advisability of bringing it into force at the end of the year.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will let the clause stand and consider that.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 16th March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE SAN JOSE SCALE.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. S2) to protect Canada against the introduction of the insect pest known as the San José scale.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I propose to ask Parliament to adopt a somewhat unusual course in connection with this Bill, and I therefore feel that I should explain the nature of the measure. To those who have followed the agricultural literature of Canada during the last two or three years, and the agricultural literature of the United States for the last eight or ten years, the name of this insect pest, the San José scale, is well known, and the great ravages it has made amongst fruit of all deciduous trees wherever it has been introduced, is thoroughly understood. It may however be that some hon. members have not made themselves familiar with it, and therefore I feel that I must give an explanation of the course I propose to take. During the closing days of last session, I had a very earnest request made me that I should then immediately introduce legislation to prohibit the importation of all nursery stock from the United States, on the ground that the San José scale is now thoroughly established in most parts of the union and that consequently the introduction of nursery stock from these states would be most dangerous to our Canadian orchards. With the information that was then at my command, and knowing, as I did, that in the United States they were preparing legislation of the most drastic kind to protect themselves against this insect, I did not feel justified to introduce such a measure in the last hours of the session. Since that time I have been obtaining all the information possible. I have been examining the legislation which has been passed by the various provinces of Canada to protect themselves (as far as the provinces within their provincial rights are able to protect themselves), and I have come to the conclusion that it is absolutely necessary in the interests of our fruit-growers, in the interests of our forest trees, and in the interests generally of all deciduous vegetation that Canada should be protected against this dangerous pest. The San José scale is a very small insect which reproduces itself with marvellous rapidity; to such an extent indeed that if all the young insects which are produced by a single scale in the course of a season were to live, they would reach the number of several hundred of millions. The spread of the San José scale has been extremely rapid in the United States. It is believed that originally it came from Japan or the East into California, and about twelve years ago it was first noticed and its ravages first understood in the state of California. Since that time it has spread over the whole union and it is stated by entomologists that probably the state of Maine and vicinity is the only state in which this insect does not exist. The United States Congress at the present time is considering a Bill for the rigid inspection of nursery stock and rigid regulations as to the passage of nursery stock from one state to the other. Unfortunately, this Bill does not come into effect until late in the season, the 1st of July next; and unfortunately it has been found, and those who are the most expert in the matter themselves declare, even in the United States that any system of inspection must necessarily be defective, and that it is impossible by inspection to detect the insect. We know also that any system of inspection of nursery stock at the frontier would be practically inoperative. The nursery stock which is sent by mail or by express is very tender and requires expeditious transportation, so that it would be practically fatal to it to have it stopped at the frontier, the packages opened and separated, and the delay incurred which a proper inspection would necessitate. Such delay would cause a great deal of nursery stock to die, and were the Government to undertake such inspection as has been suggested, the blame of all this destruction and loss of nursery stock would be laid at our doors, and we would be held responsible for it. I may say, further, that the entomologists who understand this insect, inform me that it is very difficult of detection, being so minute that a magnifying glass is necessary to see it, and being in appearance very like other insects which are neither dangerous nor widespread. Therefore, if we were to adopt any system of inspection, it would be necessary for us to have experts to carry it out, and it would be an expensive and difficult proceeding, which I do not feel justified in asking the Government or Parliament to undertake.

The Bill proposes a distinct and clear prohibition of all nursery stock coming into this country from any country in which this insect has obtained a large foothold. At the present moment the United States is the most largely affected of any country I know; Japan and the Island of Hawaii and Australia are also somewhat affected; and if this Bill passes, I propose to ask that an Order in Council be passed declaring these four countries to be those to which the prohibition shall be first applied. The Bill, as hon. gentlemen will see from the copies of it placed on their desks, provides simply for the prohibition of importation. The other clauses simply provide the machinery for bringing this prohibition into force. I ask that the Government may be authorized by Order in Council to say from what countries this stock should be prohibited. That class of plants which entomologists and botanists tell us are not liable to attacks from this insect, are to be allowed to come in notwithstanding anything in this Bill; and if at any time a country which is scheduled is declared to be free from the pest, then the Government may allow plants to come in from that country. There is also a clause allowing plants for scientific purposes to be brought in by special Order in Council. The Bill is very simple. I think it will serve the purpose in view, and I think it is necessary in the interest of our orchardists that it should pass. In support of that contention I will only say that I have received representations from the fruit-growers of the country in favour of legislation of this kind. The fruit-growers' associations of the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and British Columbia have all memorialized me, asking for prohibition; and I have had letters from a large number of the fruit-growers best known in the provinces of Ontario, Nova Scotia and Quebec. One large fruit-grower from the province of Quebec told me the other day, on the occasion of a personal visit to me on this question, that for years he has been in the habit of importing from the United States the stock on which he makes his grafts for the purpose of producing nursery stock, to the extent of several thousand stocks a year, but that last year and this year he has felt the dangers from the introduction of this insect to be so great that he has decided not to import any at all from the United States, even though he did not then know or expect that I was going to introduce this Bill. The fruit interests urged the measure so strongly upon me during the whole of last season, that I felt it to be my duty to inquire most carefully into the matter, with the view of ascertaining what had best be done; and this Bill is the result of that investigation. I think that those who have turned their attention at all to this question will agree with me as to the importance of this legislation; and therefore, after having placed the matter thus shortly before the House, I propose to ask that the rules be suspended so that the Bill may pass without delay.

Mr. SPROULE. This is as bad as the Yukon Bill.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I ask this simply on behalf of the interests I desire to protect. My hon. friends can understand that once it is known in the country that a Bill of this kind is likely to pass through the Parliament of Canada, a large number of those nurserymen in the United States, who have been in the habit of sending in large quantities of nursery stock into Canada, will immediately ship their goods into this country, to evade the provisions of this Bill; and if it were delayed for two or three weeks, as it would likely be if it were subject to the ordinary course of procedure in the House, the object of the Bill would be defeated; because the present or within the next two or three weeks is the time when the importations of nursery stock from the United States usually take place. They would be able to send in carload after carload, and we might feel assured that in that stock there would be a large quantity of this scale insect introduced into this country. The only way by which, so far as I can see, we may be able to prevent that procedure, is to pass this Bill as quickly as possible.

Mr. SPROULE. Why did you not introduce the Bill a month ago, if there was that urgency, before there was any importation of stock?

Mr. FISHER.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If I had introduced the Bill a month ago, the same thing would have occurred then that I am pointing out as likely to occur now. The nurserymen would have been rushing in their stock the moment it became known that Parliament was considering the advisability of passing a Bill of this nature.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The only way in which I can see it possible to accomplish the object we have in view, of protecting our fruit-growers, our tree-growers and our nurserymen is by being in a position to carry the law into effect the moment the announcement is made that we are going to protect ourselves in this way. If the notification to our customs officials that they are not to receive entries of stock from the United States, were delayed for two or three weeks, there would undoubtedly be a number of carloads of nursery stock sent into this country; and I have no hesitation in saying that in it there would be a large quantity of this San José scale introduced into Canada. I have therefore determined to ask this indulgence of the House. I may say that I spoke yesterday to the hon. leader of the Opposition, showing him the danger that existed; and, with that spirit and that grasp of public questions for which he is well known, the hon. gentleman said that he would be glad to facilitate the passage of this Bill when I introduced it. I have not had an opportunity of speaking to other members of the Opposition, although I may say to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) who has just asked a question, that I tried yesterday twice to find him, for the purpose of explaining this measure to him as an old chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, and knowing the interest he takes in such matters. Had I been able to find him, he would have understood the situation before I explained it on the floor of this House. I do not know that I can give any further explanation of the actual facts; but if any hon. gentleman wishes to ask any further questions, I shall be only too glad to answer them to the best of my ability. In asking that the rule be suspended and that the Bill be passed through this House as quickly as possible, so as to accomplish the object aimed at, I trust that I shall receive the co-operation and support of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the hon. Minister how far he ascertained in his inquiry that the ravages of this insect have taken place in Canada.

Mr. MACLEAN. I desire to compliment the Minister of Agriculture and his Government on the adoption of a national policy. It is true, they are adopting it in an indirect way. They are adopting the same kind of national policy which the mother country has adopted in her quarantine regulations, and the same kind that Germany has adopted. But it is an effective way of carrying out a national policy. We have nurseries in Canada able to supply all the stock required in the country, and I can only say that so far as I am concerned I will be pleased to assist the hon. gentleman in carrying the Bill into effect. But I would also like to know whether he intends to end here, or whether he relies altogether on the acts of the provincial government for the stamping out of this pest in these districts where it has invaded our country. I believe it has broken out in the Niagara peninsula, and that we need not only to prohibit the importation of stock but to take measures to stamp the disease out in our own country. If it does exist in the Niagara peninsula, I hope the hon. Minister will take some further steps in the direction of wiping it out altogether.

Mr. CHARLTON. Although I sympathize very fully with the motives of the hon. Minister of Agriculture in desiring to protect the fruit-growing interest of Canada, it seems to me that this Bill is one of a very drastic character. It prohibits the importation of nursery stock from all parts of the United States. From what knowledge I have, and I have made some inquiries, the sources in the United States from which our nursery stocks are supplied chiefly are those in the neighbourhood of Rochester, and they are exempt from this pest, and the most careful measures are taken to prevent its introduction into these localities. I doubt whether the necessity exists for the absolute prohibition of the importation of nursery stock from all parts of the United States. From the best information I can obtain, the only locality where the San José scale has obtained a footing and where the nursery stocks are affected in this locality, is the Niagara peninsula of the province of Ontario; and if this policy of the total prohibition of American nursery stock is adopted, without taking pains to ascertain whether the pest has obtained a footing in the localities in the United States from which we import nursery stock, grievous injustice will be done to parties in this country who desire to import fruit trees of various kinds. It would prevent the fulfilment of all contracts entered into this year, and I do not believe the measure is one called for in the public interest. Some measure, no doubt, is necessary for more careful supervision, but we should first ascertain whether the nursery stocks in the localities in the states from which we import are affected. I do not believe that absolute non-intercourse is a step rendered necessary by the exigencies of the case. I could understand quite well that the nursery men of this Dominion should be strongly in favour of the Bill. It would act very effectively in their interest, much more so than a high duty, because it would throw the trade entirely into their own hands, but I doubt whether it would be in the interest of the fruit-growers of the country. If it passes, the logical sequence will be the prohibition of the importation of fruit from the United States altogether.

Mr. MACLEAN. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. Of course my hon. friend would be in favour of that, but that would be another step which would be very arbitrary and sweeping in its character. That also would be beneficial to certain interests, but not to the great mass of the people; and I must confess that I look upon this measure with some apprehension as not in the public interest, if it be in the interest of a special class. I do not believe the necessity exists for it. The nurseries of the state of New York are as exempt from the pest as those of Ontario, and I fear my hon. friend has been misled by representations from interested parties who desire to monopolize the markets of this country. I should favour the Bill if I felt that the necessity for it existed, but I do not and therefore I deprecate the hasty movement proposed. There was force in what the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) said, that this measure ought to have been introduced some time ago so as to give us some time to consider it. The hon. Minister of Agriculture said that in that case the result he fears now, would have followed, namely, a rush into this country of American nursery stock. Well, we are not in the habit of getting in nursery stock when there is frost on the ground. I do not believe there is necessity for this drastic measure of non-intercourse in nursery stock, which will be followed perhaps by non-intercourse in fruit. It is not called for, it will produce irritation and bad results, and I think my hon. friend had better consider the measure a little more maturely before pressing it, and perhaps he will arrive at the conclusion that strict investigation as to the sources from which nursery stock comes will answer the object. I was visited by a representative of one of the largest nurseries in the United States—the New England nurseries—last autumn. He said he was anxious that a most searching investigation should be made, and that such an investigation would show that all the nurseries in Rochester were free of this pest. The nurserymen there were alive to its danger, and had taken most careful measures to prevent its introduction, and the result was that their stock was free of all taint, as they could prove to the satisfaction of any investigator. He therefore deprecated the destruction of their business through a mere suspicion which could be set aside.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I quite concur in the statement which has just fallen from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that this is a very drastic measure, but I believe that this is an occasion requiring a very drastic measure if the object of the Bill is to be attained. The hon. Minister of Agriculture was good enough to communicate with me upon this subject, and he satisfied me certainly that the interest of Canada demanded that not only that this Bill should pass, but that the ordinary rules of this House should be suspended so as to enable it to pass without any delay. I am quite certain that my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture did not decide on this measure until he had availed himself of all the information that the very able department over which he presides is able to furnish, and that it was with the greatest reluctance he arrived at the conclusion that the interests of fruit-growers in the Dominion made it absolutely indispensable, not only that this measure should pass, but that it should pass without such delay as would practically defeat its operation. The parties interested will certainly avail themselves of any delay in passing this Bill to rush in their nursery stocks before the Bill becomes law. I trust that my hon. friend from North Norfolk and every other hon. gentleman in this House will feel that this measure having come from the Minister of Agriculture after the most careful consideration of the subject, we may confidently rely upon his opinion and give him that support which the exigency of the case requires. It may be quite true that portions of the United States may be free from this unfortunate pest, but as the hon. Minister of Agriculture has pointed out, it would be practically impossible to discriminate. Even if you were to adopt all the means in your power of careful investigation and inspection, you could not effectively guard this country against the introduction of this pest which is calculated to have a most injurious effect on our fruit-growing industry. I hope that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) will therefore, under the circumstances, not interpose any objection which would prevent the suspension of the rules of the House and the passage of this measure with the promptness which is shown to be absolutely necessary in order to make it effective. The care that has been given to the consideration of this subject warrants us in believing that if any less drastic measure could accomplish the object, the hon. Minister of Agriculture would have been only too glad to have availed himself of it, but my hon. friend knows perfectly well that if there are certain sections in the United States free from this pest, there would be no difficulty in any quantity of nursery stock being sent from other portions of the United States which are infected to the uninfected districts, and it would be actually impossible for the Department of Agriculture to effectively keep the diseased stock out of the country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. CHARLTON. Can my hon. friend designate the localities in the United States where the San José scale is prevalent among nursery stock?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say that it is the duty of the Minister of Agriculture to consider that matter. He satisfied me he had given the subject most careful consideration, and had caused the most scientific men in his department to examine into it most critically, and, as a result, he had arrived at the conclusion that this pest existed in the United States, and that this measure and this measure alone, would effectually protect the country.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not rise to oppose the Bill, for I am strongly in favour of it and always was. I think there is a very urgent need for it. But I asked what was to my mind a pertinent question, and that is why this Bill was not introduced a month ago, before the sending in of the nursery stock for the spring had begun. Had this Bill been introduced a month ago and passed under suspension of the rules of the House, it would have prevented the importation of any stock this year. To-day a good deal of it has already crossed the line. In our county notice has been given that the stock will be distributed in a few days, and that means that it must now be in the country or expected in immediately. I asked the Minister if he had any knowledge as to the localities in which this pest existed in Canada already. I knew that inquiries had been made by parties interested. But the hon. Minister did not answer. With regard to the other statement of the Minister that he has introduced this Bill without giving any previous intimation of his intentions, I can only say that his intention to introduce it was announced in the press three months ago. I read the statement myself. I said then that it was the right thing to do, and I say so still. It is the only protection we can offer which will prevent serious loss to our fruit-growing industry. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says that the only place where this pest exists is in the Niagara peninsula. It is to the Niagara peninsula that stock is brought from Rochester, just across the line. I have been in their nurseries and have been told that it is from Rochester they bring stock when necessary. The fact that the pest is in the Niagara peninsula is the very strongest proof that the necessity exists for this Bill to prevent the pest being brought into other parts of the country. If the hon. gentleman's argument is right in saying that the Minister ought to be clothed with power which would enable him to prevent stock being brought from any particular locality, it is most urgent against the locality to which he refers. I am strongly in favour of the Bill, and I will give the Minister all the support I can in pressing it through the various stages.

Mr. HENDERSON. Like other hon. members, I express myself as very much pleased indeed that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has introduced this Bill. The hon. Minister spoke of it as a drastic measure, but it does not appear to me to be drastic enough. I think it ought to go further and apply not only to nursery stock, but to fruit as well. I believe the scale will be brought in on the apple, pear, peach, and possibly other fruits. This would make it advisable that the Minister should take power to include fruit as well as nursery stock within the operation of the Bill.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not know where my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) got his information as to the designs of the Minister of Agriculture to bring down this Bill six months ago. I had several communications from fruit-growers in the county of Lincoln complaining against the importation of nursery stock from the other side of the line. I waited on the Minister of Agriculture and he intimated to me then that in the course of a very few days, his intention was to bring in a measure such as he proposed this afternoon. His idea, as I got it from him, was that secrecy should be observed in this matter. I was not even left at liberty by him to reply to my constituents further than to say that the Government had this matter in hand and the Minister of Agriculture would deal with it. The Minister was satisfied that the announcement of this Bill would have the effect of increasing the importations from the United States before the Bill became law. If the members of this House have the interest of the fruit-growers at heart, as I believe they have, this Bill will receive unanimous consent of Parliament and will be sent through Parliament as speedily as possible in order to prevent the importation of diseased fruit from the other side of the line. The Minister of Agriculture has taken a step in the right direction in preventing the importation of diseased nursery stock.

Mr. McCLEARY. I am sorry the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has seen fit to oppose this Bill. Somehow or other, his inclination seems to be in the direction of protecting the Americans rather than our fruit-growers in their industry. It should be within the recollection of the Minister of Agriculture, as of the hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Bain), the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) and the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), that before this House rose last session, we had telegrams from fruit-growers in our district asking us to have the Minister of Agriculture inquire into the subject of this pest coming into Canada. Of course, it was only a minor evil at that time, and very little was known of it. But in the Niagara district it has since become a great pest. Whatever may be said in reference to other parts of Canada not having it, we know that the fruit trees in our district have it, to the great loss of the fruit-growers. The hon. member for North Norfolk says that some system of inspection might be sufficient. I am satisfied that no system of inspection would adequately meet this case. The insect is so minute that it would be impossible to exclude it by a system of inspection, except one that would be immensely costly. It is only a drastic measure of this kind that can possibly do what our fruit-growers require. I sincerely hope the Bill will pass at once. It matters not if a few Americans who have made contracts in this country to sell their fruit trees are prevented from making their sales this year, if we can avoid loss to our fruit-growers of thousands upon thousands of dollars. Our duty, in my opinion, is to protect the interest of the fruit-growers and farmers of our own country rather than of the outsiders who are trying to make a living out of us.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I think that it is unfortunate that my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) should have intimated that the object of this Bill was the protection of the growers of nursery stock. My understanding of the object of the Bill is to protect the fruit-growers of Canada against the attacks of a microscopic enemy that is destroying the trees in the nurseries and orchards to the south. That is the object that my hon. friend had in view, and that alone. If, incidentally, the Bill has the effect of doing any immediate good to the growers of nursery stock in Canada, I am sure no one will object. And I am sure we are all very glad to know that, in this respect, we in Canada are now practically independent of our neighbours to the south of us, and that, even though we exclude nursery stock from the provinces, we are able to find in Canada sufficient nursery stock to answer the demands within our own country. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) found fault with the Minister because he did not introduce this measure a month ago. Now, I think it is scarcely fair to do that. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture felt that it was such an important step that he should not take it until after he had satisfied himself by every possible means that it was absolutely necessary to do so. There is plenty of opportunity yet to bring about what he desires, if this House takes the advice which he has given it, supported by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and passes this measure at once. With reference to the remarks of my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), I would say, in addition to what I have already said, that I can assure him, as coming from a large fruit-growing district in Nova Scotia, that the fruit-growers want this Bill passed, that the fruit-growers of that section of the country, I think absolutely without exception, as voiced by a resolution passed by the Fruit-growers' Association in Nova Scotia, one of the oldest and most important associations of that kind in Canada, have asked this Parliament to interfere in behalf of that industry. I had the honour, three or four years ago, when the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) occupied the position of Minister of Agriculture, to bring this matter up in this House. I was urged to do so then by a resolution of the fruit-growers of the province of Nova Scotia, and I called that hon. gentleman's attention, by a question, to the fact that this pest was now to be found in the state of New York, and he answered that the Government were then carefully considering the question. It seems to me, therefore, that there cannot be any doubt at all that this law is urgently necessary, and I trust that the proposal which is made by the Minister will be agreed to, and that the Bill will be expedited in its passage through the House.

Mr. McMILLAN. Coming from a large fruit-growing district in western Ontario, I may say, that the fruit-growers of that section have been watching very carefully the action of the Government with respect to prohibiting, or at least keeping down, the spread of the San José scale. Large sums of money have been spent in that section of the country lately by farmers in enlarging their orchards and in planting new orchards; and in their interests it is of the utmost necessity that some steps should be taken to stop the spread of this insidious insect. We hardly yet know, in the province of Ontario, how far it has spread, we hardly know what localities are entirely free from it and what localities are affected, notwithstanding all the vigilance of both the Ontario and the Dominion Governments. I, therefore, hold that it is of the utmost importance that the rules of the House should be suspended, and that this Bill should be put through as rapidly as possible, in order to protect our fruit trees from the ravages of this insect, and in order that the disease may not be any further spread. As a farmer, I hope that there will be no opposition to this Bill in its passage through the House. I must say, that I was very much pleased that the leader of the Opposition gave his entire consent to the suspension of the rules in order that we might pass this Bill through the House as rapidly as possible.

Mr. CHAUVIN. (Translation.) The object of the Bill now under consideration is to protect the farming community, and I may say I am in favour of every measure the object of which is to protect the agricultural interests in general, and particularly those of the province of Quebec.

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

If the ravages of this pest are as widespread as has been pointed out by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), then I hold that this is a case of urgency, and the House ought to give the Minister free scope, in order to have his measure carried through the House without any delay. Salus populi, suprema lex esto. As the interests of an important class of our community are at stake, the House ought to adopt this Bill.

As I am counsel for a fruit growers' company, the Trappist Order of Notre Dame, of the Lake of Two Mountains, in the county bordering on the constituency I represent in this House, I deem it my duty to support the motion made by the Minister of Agriculture. In order that the operation of this Bill be not defeated, it should be passed into law without any delay, so as to protect the particular interests of my clients and those of the fruit-growers of the province of Quebec in general.

Let the hon. Minister allow me to remind him that, if the object of this Bill is to be attained, it ought to apply also to those localities, in Canada, where that pest is already thoroughly established. I think the words in the Bill, "country or place," ought to cover any locality, either in the United States or in Canada that has already been invaded by the San José Scale; and, under the circumstances, the Minister ought to be given full scope to prohibit the sale or even to order the destruction of the stock or fruit trees in Canada that are already contaminated. If such a provision is not contained in the Bill, I think the hon. Minister ought to insert it now.

Mr. HUGHES. There seems to be no provision in the Bill for protecting those districts in Canada where the pest has not yet made its appearance. I take the liberty of drawing the attention of the Minister to that phase of the Bill, hoping that it may be amended in that direction.

Mr. ERB. I fully agree with the spirit of this Bill that is now before the House. I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture, whether it is his intention to supplement this Bill with any legislation, or to take any steps to find out what localities in Canada have already been visited by this pest, and what localities are as yet exempt from it; and whether he proposes to take any steps to prevent infected stock from being taken from those localities in which it is found to exist, to those districts which are as yet exempt. Unless that is done, the desirable results that we wish to obtain from this Bill will, to some extent, I fear, not be realized.

Mr. BAIN. The members of the Agriculture Committee of last session will realize that a good many members of this House are not as familiar with this question as the members of the committee unfortunately are. There was a strong pressure brought on the Government last season for the purpose of securing some such action as is now proposed by the Minister of Agriculture. I need not remind the House that, in the province of British Columbia, for four or five years, there has been legislation in existence so far as that province had power to pass it, to prevent the introduction of this pest, and members from Ontario will recollect that, after a discussion of the matter, last summer, by the officials both of the Dominion and of the province of Ontario, the Minister of Agriculture at Toronto introduced legislation to cover the very ground referred to by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes), and by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. In several counties inspectors have been appointed and preparations made with the view to ascertaining how far it was distributed, and for the purpose of suppressing it locally. From my personal observation and contact with the fruit-growers in my county, I am bound to say, that it is somewhat more widely spread than I expected to find it. In common with some others, I had the impression that there was more cry made about it than was necessary on the part of some of those who brought the matter up a year ago. We were in hopes then that, as the scale was a pest that belonged to milder climates, we were situated in a region where it would not successfully multiply. But, unfortunately, our experience last year in the Niagara peninsula, and also in the Essex district, goes to show that the conditions there are perhaps more favourable than we were heretofore willing to admit, for its propagation and extension. I know, from contact with the fruit men in my county, that in some of the colder districts, north of the lake, it does not spread as freely as it does on the Niagara side of the lake, indicating that, in some places, there are conditions more favourable to it than exist in other quarters. I think, if my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had come in contact with the growers of many of the small fruits in this country, he would never have delivered the speech he has made in the House to-day. According to our observation, a good deal of nursery stock comes into Canada from points further south than New York. I think, if my hon. friend was to extend his observation, he would find that considerable stock, in bygone years, has found its way into Canada from New Jersey; he would also find that, in some of the nurseries of that state, this pest has caused a serious loss to the nurserymen where it had found its way into their nurseries. I am not in favour, as a rule, of the application of a drastic measure, such as we have before us to-day. But I am free to say, that if a measure, such as we have now, had been placed on the Statute-book two years ago, it would have been in many cases a serious inconvenience to our fruit-growers, who were then planting freely.

I must say this, that the reduced prices of the large output of fruit last year have gone a long way to check the planting that was going on so freely for the two previous years, and I feel that an Act of this kind brought into operation now would not be followed by the serious derangement of our commercial relations with the business men to the south of us that would have been produced two years ago. Further, I think there are some points in the details of the Bill that will commend themselves to the House, and one of these is the power that is left to exempt places and districts that may be found in the future to be exempt from the operation of this pest. It will enable the Minister of Agriculture and the customs authorities to withdraw from the operation of this Bill points on the American side as soon as satisfied that the danger is over. I do not sympathize with the view of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that the passage of this Act would necessarily exclude American fruit. It is true that this scale is carried on the fruit, contrary to the habit of other scales with which we have been familiar on our fruit trees from time immemorial; but it is equally true that incidents of the distribution from the fruit are so much smaller than from the tree that I think the necessity of having to resort to such an extreme measure as that is exceedingly unlikely. Upon the whole, while the Minister of Agriculture has been naturally slow to ask the House to take this extreme step in prohibiting the introduction of fruit trees, it is to his credit that he only did so at the last moment, feeling that under the circumstances it was the only efficient mode of putting a stop to what is a serious danger to the fruit-growing district of this country; and that if the time should return—any time within two or three years—when we could safely dispense with the operations of the Act, I can safely promise for the Minister that no one will be found more ready than he to withdraw an Act that can by any means be considered as interfering with ordinary trade relations with our American cousins to the south of us or as disturbing those business relations that ought to exist between us on friendly terms; but I feel, and it has been urged upon me very strongly by the fruit-growers and not by the nurserymen of my own district, that this was a matter in which the fruit-growers were more deeply interested than the nurserymen.

Mr. BOSTOCK. The fruit-growers of British Columbia would have been only too glad to have seen an Act of this kind introduced into the House last year, if not previously. They had done as much as they could in the province to protect themselves from pests of this kind, and especially from this particular pest, as California is one of the states of the United States which has been most troubled with this particular pest. But of course a province has not very much power in a matter of this kind. British Columbia passed an Act some years ago by which it was made compulsory to have all fruit and fruit trees coming into the province inspected before being distributed to the people to whom they were consigned, and to some extent we have been able to protect ourselves in that way; but the measure adopted has not been found so satisfactory as we could wish, and I think the fruit-growers all through the province of British Columbia are only too anxious to see a measure of this kind passed into law. I hope that everything will be done by this House to place this measure on the Statute-book as soon as possible.

Mr. ELLIS. No doubt this is an insidious insect, but it is not quite so insidious as the spirit of protection. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) has truly indicated what underlies this action, although I do not consider that affected the mind of the Minister. We constantly hear of pests against which our farmers are fighting, and of the struggles which must necessarily be made in order to carry on their industry. This is a very extreme measure to adopt for the purpose of arresting the progress of one insect, when there are other insects, just as dangerous and difficult to overcome, against which our agriculturists must struggle. No doubt the fruit-growers are in favour of this measure, and I observe that almost all the hon. members who have spoken on the subject represent fruit-growing districts. The Minister of Militia has told the House that the fruit-growers of Nova Scotia are in favour of this measure. Of course they are, because they cannot ask for protection until the trees are first protected; but the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that the spirit of protection is in the fruit-growers of Nova Scotia and they are seeking to pave the way for the protection of their fruit against American fruit. I regret very much indeed that this measure is so drastic, that the Minister of Agriculture holds the opinion that it is desirable to put it through the House; and the hon. gentleman having made up his mind, no opportunity is to be given to other hon. gentlemen to ascertain whether it is necessary, or not. I agree further with my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Erb) that an enemy in the rear is just as dangerous as an enemy in front, and if it is necessary to pass such extreme legislation, we should take measures to close the Niagara district, in which this pest prevails, and prevent the fruit-growers sending trees to Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces, which may suffer thereby just as much as other portions of the Dominion. I regret to be obliged to oppose the Bill, but I do so on the principles of free trade, which I am sent here to express.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It must be apparent to the House that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Ellis) has wandered somewhat from the subject when he suggested to the House that a measure such as this means the entry of the thin edge of protection for our fruit industry. The incidental measure of protection which may be given, if we accept the phrase of the Minister of Militia, might be so regarded if it applied to the nurserymen, but not to fruit-growers. There is no measure of protection in this Bill to secure our home market against American fruit.

Mr. ELLIS. Why?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Because it does not deal with the importation of fruit.

Mr. ELLIS. I did not say that. I said it was an advance movement in that direction; but I did not mean to say that this measure affected fruit at all.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will suggest to my hon. friend that in regard to the question of free trade he might find weaker points in the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite than that covered by this small Bill for the banishment of the San José scale. I shall not pursue that subject with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ellis), but he will find a very great field in which his arduous and sincere labours may result better to the theory of free trade, than his opposition to this measure on that score; because I cannot think that even the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ellis) from down by the sea regards this Government as free trade Government in everything except the San José scale.

But, Sir, leaving that subject, it appears to me that this measure should be passed through the House with the very greatest speed. The subject was brought to the attention of the Department of Agriculture two or three years ago, but the department then hesitated, in view of the little knowledge that was in our possession in regard to the subject, to take hold of the matter and pass such a drastic measure as is now considered necessary. Looking at it now as the facts are before the public, there is no question about it that the Minister of Agriculture has pursued the proper course, and I, for one, though opposed to the general policy of the Government will give this a very hearty support. The idea has been suggested that this is largely for the protection of the Niagara peninsula, and the hon. gentleman who recently spoke said that attention should be turned to the clearing of that peninsula from the pest rather than to the introduction of this general Bill. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) had answered that in advance when he declared, that steps had been taken in the province of Ontario to rid the districts of that pest where it now existed. But, Sir, the chief feature in attempting to keep a country free from a pest like this is to prevent its introduction into an unaffected district and even into districts which are now infested with it, and the hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Ellis) knows perfectly well that the provincial governments have no power to prevent the importation of diseased nursery stock.

And, Sir, if it were only to protect the Niagara district, the hon. gentleman should know that the Niagara district is a most important district; that thousands upon thousands of dollars worth of fruit are annually exported from there; and that from that district and other districts such as are represented by my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden), has gone forth and extended knowledge of fruit raising which has made that industry of very great importance for the whole Dominion. Why is it said that this measure is drastic? To my mind there is nothing drastic in it at all. We say to the people of a country: If you have an infected plant you cannot send that plant to us and up to the time when you rid yourself of that plant disease, we will not allow the importation of nursery stock from your country, or from any district in which this disease exists. If they have a feeling of what is just and right there would be no desire on the part of any nurseryman in the United States to send diseased stock to Canada, and if there is such a desire on their part it is the duty of this Parliament to look after the interests of our own people, whether or not it suits the tastes and the business interests of the nurserymen of the United States. I did not hear the argument of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), but I trust that after the expression of the very nearly unanimous feeling that has been given voice to from both sides of the House, no technicality will be resorted to to prevent the passage of this Bill and to the making of it into law at the very earliest possible moment.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I wish to draw attention to one or two points which have come up in this discussion. In the first place I beg to thank members on both sides of the House who have accepted the principle of this Bill in such a friendly manner. I have been asked why it was necessary to prohibit, because measures less drastic in their nature might accomplish the end in view. There are two reasons for the prohibition, each of which I think is quite sufficient. One is: That it seems to me to be the only effective way to shut this pest out, and any measure of examination or inspection would be so ineffective that I consider it would be waste of time and of energy to undertake it. I do not say this on my own authority, but I say it after having carefully consulted those entomologists and botanists who have studied this matter for years and who are competent to speak on such a question. In the next place, any measure of examination or investigation or detention of the importations for the purpose of seeing that they were not affected, would be extremely unsatisfactory, and as a matter of fact almost impossible to carry out in this country so as to be of any use. Under these circumstances, and appreciating and knowing the danger which exists from the introduction of this pest, I felt it was necessary to adopt even such a drastic measure as this might be characterized. My hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) has complimented me on the protective character of the Bill. My own well-known views as to protection and as to free trade, perhaps may be sufficient to defend me from any such accusation; but I want to tell the hon. member and to tell everybody else, that while I do not believe in unnecessary and interested restrictions being put upon trade, yet, when it is necessary for the proper protection of industries in this country from outside, I am quite ready to adopt protective measures.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. You are converted, too.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Quite ready to adopt protective measures with the explanation which I have given.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Try and convert the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis).

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) when he has studied this measure as much as I have will perhaps appreciate what I have done. I wish to cast no reflection upon the hon. member for St. John, for I quite understand what he has expressed. I may say frankly that when this measure was first drawn to my attention last year it seemed to savour of a certain kind of interested protection to a certain class of people in this country, which is the kind of protection I object to and which I will not in any way endorse. But, when I found as I did, that the demand for this law was supported not by the nurserymen who possibly may be able to profit a little from this Bill—I think it is likely they will to a certain extent profit, but I cannot help that even if I wished to—when I found that this Bill was supported not by the nurserymen but by the very men who were obliged to buy that stock, the men who are the consumers and not the producers of that stock, when I found that these men passed resolutions unanimously, not only in the province of Ontario where the first demand came from, but also in the province of Quebec and in the province of Nova Scotia asking that this law should be passed, I felt I was quite safe in introducing it. My hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) asks, why I did not introduce this Bill a month ago. I may tell him that it is only a few weeks since I received the resolutions from the horticulturists of Nova Scotia and Quebec. Since that time, this House has been occupied de die in diem with a particular measure, and had it not been so engrossed in that measure I would have introduced this Bill two weeks ago at latest. But I could not interrupt the course of the work of the House, and I therefore had to put it off until that measure was disposed of. As a matter of fact, the present time is quite soon enough, because up to the present no stock has been or would be likely to be imported from the United States.

The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has said that there are large sections of the United States which are not affected by this scale. I have under my hand a memorandum from Mr. Fletcher, the entomologist and botanist of the Experimental Farm, who went to Washington a little while ago at my request, to attend a meeting of the entomologists and botanists of the United States who were then appearing before Congress asking for legislation. On his return, Mr. Fletcher reported to me in these words :

It has been in the eastern states for ten years, and has already caused thousands of dollars of injury in those states. All the fruit-growing states of the Union to the south of Canada, with perhaps the exception of Maine, are infested with this pest.

The hon. gentleman said that around Rochester there was not much of this scale. I am not prepared to say how much there is, but I would like to tell him and this House that the few cases of this pest which have been found in Canada have nearly all been traced directly to a nursery in the neighbourhood of Rochester. I want to put the House in possession of as much information on this matter as I have myself. At present the existence of this pest in Canada is very limited. I do not wish to alarm anybody, and I can say that as a matter of fact there are only, as far as known, a few instances of it in Canada—one or two in the Niagara peninsula, one or two in the country to the north of Lake Erie, and two or three in the province of British Columbia; and those who have studied the question, and who are to-day engaged in the suppression of this pest in Canada assure me that if we can prevent its further introduction, we can in a short space of time absolutely free our country from the danger. I therefore think it is well worth our while to pass such a drastic measure as this for such an enormous gain.

I may say that a week or two ago I received a message from Lord Strathcona, our High Commissioner in London, asking me if Canada was taking any steps in this direction. I have since found out that that message was prompted by the inquiry in Great Britain as to the introduction of this pest from abroad, and that it was suggested to the High Commissioner that if the people of England could be satisfied that Canada had none of this pest within its boundaries, it would be a great advantage to the seller of our fruits in Great Britain. I may say that Lord Strathcona has just gone to Berlin to see what can be done in the way of developing trade between Canada and Germany, and I have information in my office to-day that there is abundant opportunity for the creation of a large fruit trade with Germany which would be entirely prevented if this insect were to become general in Canada.

Mr. FISHER.

I have been asked to explain why I did not provide against the spread of this scale in Canada. That work is being, and I think effectually, provided for by the local legislatures. Several years ago the legislature of British Columbia passed an Act providing for the appointment of inspectors to examine all fruit trees and nursery stock which were sent from one point to another in the province, or which came from outside of the province. That Act has worked under some difficulties, but has perhaps done some good. In the province of Ontario, as has been explained by my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Bain), the legislature, at its last session, passed a very complete Act providing for the efficient inspection of nurseries and orchards, and for the destruction of trees found affected by this pest. The legislature of Nova Scotia passed a similar Act the other day; and I have reason to believe that the legislature of Quebec, at its next session, will also pass an Act dealing with this subject in a local way. It seems to me well that the Parliament of Canada should deal with the importation of the stock from abroad and that we can safely and properly leave the local work to the legislatures and executives of the provinces. It is not necessary, even if it were advisable or possible, for us to prohibit the passage of nursery stock from one part of the Dominion to another.

I did not decide upon this legislation until I found that it was the fruit-growers, and not simply the producers of nursery stock, who were asking for it; and it was because I wished to assure myself of this, and that this was not simply an agitation got up by certain interested parties, that I did not last session yield to the demand that was made, but took the interval between then and now to inquire into the subject. I am satisfied that to-day, with the exception perhaps of two or three agents of American nursery houses, whose business will no doubt be somewhat interfered with in Canada if this Bill passes, the whole community is at the back of this legislation, and will feel relieved and satisfied if the House adopts the measure as laid before it. I therefore ask that the Bill be read a first time, and that the House accede to my request, to enable me to put it through at one sitting, suspending the rules for that purpose.

Mr. McNEILL. I only wish to say that I am delighted to find that my hon. friend has introduced a measure of this kind; and I think that any hon. member of this House who attempts to stand between the fruit-growers who are really the farmers of this country, and the protection which is being extended to them by the measure which the hon. Minister has introduced, is doing something which he will not be much thanked for by those people in this country who are interested in the growth of fruit. I want to ask my hon. friend whether this measure goes as far as he thinks he can safely go in this direction. It only covers fruit trees. Is the information which my hon. friend has from the experts whom he has consulted such as would lead him to believe that there is little or no danger from the importation of the fruit itself? Because I take it that it is almost impossible to have any inspection of the fruit that would be in the least degree a safeguard from this pest; and if there be any real reason to fear that the importation of the fruit itself will be likely to conduce to the spread of this most dangerous disease, it might perhaps be well for my hon. friend to go a little further even than he has done.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have examined that point very thoroughly. This insect is one which can travel only a very slight distance, not more than a few inches. It is not a flying insect, but a scale insect, which cannot pass from one part to another.

Mr. MILLS. Does it travel on Sundays?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It travels all the year round, except in climates where the frost stops it. It is spread largely by being attached to the feet of birds and flying insects, which light on trees or twigs affected by it, and carry it to other trees. The insect does appear on the skins of apples and other fruits. It cannot, however, live more than a few minutes after the part of the tree or fruit on which it is ceases to be alive. It can only live while the bark of the tree or the skin of the fruit is succulent and juicy. It is possible, no doubt, for such a combination of circumstances to arise that, when the insect is attached to the skin of an apple, or a peach, or pear, the fruit might be put into such a place that the insect would attach itself afterwards to the twig of a tree. It cannot multiply on the fruit, but it can exist there; but those who have studied the matter inform me, that such a combination of circumstances is so unlikely to occur, under which it would be possible for the insect to spread in that way, that it is not necessary to provide against the importation of fruit, and I need not point out that the prohibition of the importation of fruit would be a very much more drastic measure and would create a very extraordinary and, I believe, unnecessary interference with our ordinary trade. My information leads me to believe that there is no necessity to do this.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Although this is irregular, I would ask permission to put the question to the hon. Minister, whether he has taken any steps to give instruction or encouragement to tobacco-growers in Canada. There is the opening of a large industry in this plant, and I should like to know whether, by experts or pamphlets, he proposes to give instruction to farmers in the various sections of the country.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Although that question is not germane to the subject of this Bill, I have no hesitation in replying and in informing my hon. friend that I have not done any more than continue the experiments in the culture and curing of tobacco on the experimental farm which were in operation when my hon. friend was Minister of Agriculture. I propose to try and issue a special bulletin on the subject for next season before operations begin.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would suggest to my hon. friend, that he should not only include the result of the experiments on the farm in his pamphlet, but get an article from the pen of some expert and publish it at the same time.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE moved the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not rise to offer further opposition to this Bill, because the sentiment expressed by the House is very unmistakable. Of course, my own opinion remains, that it is unnecessary, and that we could reach the object aimed at to better advantage in some other way. As a fruit-grower, I do not consider the measure in my interest, and I would sooner to-day buy nursery stock in nurseries in Rochester, which I know to be free of the pest, than in the Niagara district. But I do not wish to press that now. What I rise to suggest is, whether, under all the circumstances, it is advisable to rush the Bill through all its stages to-day. I shall not avail myself of the privilege of objecting, but I would suggest that it would be proper, perhaps, to allow the House to sleep on the matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not considering the necessity for the Bill itself, for the House has formed its opinion upon that point, but I would ask the House to consider what may possibly be the consequences which may grow out of this action. There is the possibility of restriction in other matters beside the San José scale, and we may have some action on the other side that may lead us to regret that we did not approach this matter in some other way. I would suggest that we take time to deal with this matter in a broad and prudent manner, with the necessary delay for consideration. I do not think it is necessary to put this Bill through all its stages to-day. No nursery stock will be imported the next two weeks at least, and by laying the Bill over a day, we will show a little less precipitancy, a little more dignity, and will attain the same object, if the House does not arrive at another conclusion with regard to the matter.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The allusions which my hon. friend from North Norfolk has made are sufficiently clear for every one of us to understand; but everybody realizes here—and I hope it is well understood by every one on both sides—that this is not a measure of hostility to the United States. We are desirous of preserving the most friendly intercourse with our neighbours; and, if the conditions were reversed, if it so happened that this pest were within our borders, none of us would find fault if our American neighbours took precautions to protect themselves against the possible invasion of their territory by that pest. The Americans are aware of this, and therefore they cannot construe this action of ours as in any sense implying, as was suggested by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), a moment ago, anything in the way of protection. That is not our intention, and I would not have this Bill, for my part, if it were. It is purely a matter of the health of the fruit trees of this country, and it is simply in this view that it is to be considered. The House should therefore not hesitate to carry out the advice expressed by my hon. colleague the Minister of Agriculture, and shared by everybody, that immediate steps should be taken in order to prevent the possibility of the introduction of this pest among us.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. In addition to what has fallen from the lips of my right hon. leader, let me say, that in the United States Congress to-day there is a Bill for the protection of the various states of the union against each other, exactly as we are proceeding to protect ourselves against them. I would have been disposed to consider, perhaps, the provisions of that Bill almost sufficient to protect us, but, unfortunately, it does not come into force until the first of July, and between now and then the whole injury this season could be done. Therefore, I feel it necessary to proceed thus with the despatch. The hon. gentleman need be in no fear that the Americans will consider this in any sense hostile legislation. I certainly would be very averse to introducing any such legislation.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to be understood as not objecting to the Bill, in the face of the strong opinion expressed by the House, but as urging that we should not press it through with this haste.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the majority of the House is of the opinion that this is a case of urgency, we can carry the Bill through all its stages to-day. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion for the second reading of the Bill?

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, and read the third time, and passed.

SLEIGH ROAD, STIKINE RIVER TO TESLIN LAKE.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

Have Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie constructed and finished a practical sleigh road from the mouth of the Stikine River to Teslin Lake? If so, when was it completed and what is its length? Have they provided suitable shelters for travellers at intervals of twenty-five miles along this route, and is this road and are these shelters now available for travellers?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that the Government have no official report on the subject referred to in the question. Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie have been applied to for information, and they say they believe that they sent forward a sufficient outfit of men and material and plenty of time to carry out the provisions of the contract in reference to the construction of the sleigh road and the erection of shelters. They have no doubt that the work was done. But they report that, owing to the great storm that took place a short time ago, the first fifteen or twenty miles of the road was obstructed. They have a large force of men working, and they hope in a short time that the road will be open for use.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not sure that I understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton). Did he say that Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie had had the road constructed, but that since then it had probably filled up?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The storm had obstructed the first fifteen or twenty miles.

Mr. FOSTER. But it had been completed through the 200 miles?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. That is what they report to me.

C. M. DAUNAIS.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Whether C. M. Daunais occupies a position in the public service, and if so, what that position is?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that there is in the service of the Department of Indian Affairs, as Indian agent at Battleford, a man named C. M. Daunais.

BYRON NICKERSON.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) asked,

1. When was Byron Nickerson appointed keeper of the Cape Negro Island light station?
2. Was he appointed upon the recommendation of any and what persons resident in the county of Shelburne?
3. What steps did the Government take to ascertain his fitness for the position?
4. What information has the Government as to his fitness for the position?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Byron Nickerson was appointed keeper of Cape Negro Island light station on the 26th July, 1897. He was recommended by a number of the residents of the county by a petition received through the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). No special inquiries were made, as the representative of the county was deemed sufficient. The department has no reason to believe that Mr. Nickerson is unfit for the position; from letters received from him, he appears to be performing his duties satisfactorily.

THE LIGHT AT KING'S HEAD.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

1. Did the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries receive a petition from the pilots of the port of Pictou and the resident captains asking to have the light at King's Head turned on?
2. If so, when was it received?
3. What action, if any, will be taken upon this petition?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:—1. Yes. 2. 11th September, 1897. 3. It is not proposed to take any action at present.

DIVERSION OF INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY THROUGH SPRING HILL.

Mr. POWELL asked,

1. Did the Department of Railways and Canals employ C. E. Croasdale, C.E., to make a report on a proposed diversion from its present route to a route leading through the town of Spring Hill, Nova Scotia, of a portion of the Intercolonial Railway lying between Athol, Nova Scotia, and River Philip, Nova Scotia, and if Mr. Croasdale was so employed, has he made any report on the proposed diversion?
2. If Mr. Croasdale has made any such report, has the Government had the report under consideration?
3. Has the Government had under consideration the advisability of making such diversion in the route of the Intercolonial Railway?
4. Does the Government intend to make the above mentioned diversion in the location of the line of the Intercolonial Railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:—1. Mr. Croasdale, C.E., was employed to make a survey of a proposed diversion from its present route to one leading through the town of Spring Hill of a portion of the Intercolonial Railway lying between Athol, N.S., and Salt Springs, N.S. Mr. Croasdale found that on account of the severe grades the road could not be built from Spring Hill to Salt Springs without exceeding the maximum allowable on the Intercolonial Railway. After consultation with Mr. Logan, M.P., Mr. Croasdale was instructed to proceed with surveys to such point on the Intercolonial as could be reached without exceeding the maximum grade. He surveyed to River Philip. Mr. Croasdale then made his report accordingly. 2. Yes. 3. Yes. 4. The fact that the road could not be built from Athol via Spring Hill to Salt Springs has increased the difficulties of the proposed diversion very much, and to build to River Philip would lengthen the main line, according to Mr. Croasdale's report, about three miles. It would also necessitate the building of heavy trestle and other expensive construction work, entailing a much larger expenditure than was in contemplation when Mr. Croasdale was instructed to make his survey. In view of the fact that a proper line could not be found to Salt Springs and an extension to River Philip would materially lengthen the line and greatly increase the cost, I have been unable favourably to recommend the project to my colleagues.

GRAIN LIENS IN MANITOBA AND THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Whether it was the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill dealing with seed grain liens in the North-west Territories and Manitoba?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to the hon. gentleman's question, I beg to say that I have no present intention of recommending the introduction of such legislation as that referred to.

DEAF MUTES, NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Whether the Minister of the Interior is taking steps to enable the North-west Government to make provision for caring for the deaf mutes of the Territories?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that the question of making provision for caring for the deaf mutes of the Territories has received some consideration, but up to the present time, I have not been able to make any recommendation to my colleagues in connection with the matter.

REGISTRY AND LANDS OFFICE, REGINA.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Whether the Minister of the Interior is providing for the erection of a building on the site of the old court house, Regina, to afford suitable accommodation for the Registry Office and the Dominion Lands Office?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that the matter referred to is now under consideration, but the Government is not in a position to make a positive statement at present as to what will be done.

PROVISIONS FOR GOVERNMENT YUKON PARTY.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Who were the persons who during December, 1897, superintended the buying of provisions for the mounted police and Government parties bound for the Yukon?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The persons who, during December, 1897, superintended the buying of provisions for the mounted police and Government parties bound for the Yukon were the Comptroller at Ottawa, the Commissioner in the Territories and British Columbia, and Inspector Wood at Skagway, Alaska.

WILLIAM McNAUGHTON.

Mr. McLNERNEY asked,

Is there a detective or officer of the Inland Revenue Department by the name of William McNaughton in Nova Scotia? Has a man of that name been in the employ of such department? Is he so employed now?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that William McNaughton has never been in the employ of the Inland Revenue Department.

DOUBLE HILL POST OFFICE.

Mr. MARTIN asked,

1. Has the Double Hill post office, in the province of Prince Edward Island, been closed?

2. If so, when, and for what reason?

3. Is it intended to reopen it, or open any other post office in the neighbourhood of Double Hill?

4. What was the amount of salary paid to the postmaster at Double Hill, and to what extent, if any, has his salary been increased, and if increased, when, and for what reason?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The replies to the hon. gentleman's Mr. SIFTON.

questions are as follows:—1. Yes. 2. It was closed on the 1st of March, 1898, because, in the opinion of the inspector, it was not considered necessary. 3. It is not at present in contemplation to reopen it or to establish another office in the neighbourhood. 4. The salary was $10 a year up to the 1st July, 1897, and was from that date increased to $12 a year because of a slight increase in the business of the office.

THE LIGHT AT KING'S HEAD.

On the question by Mr. Bell,

1. Has a petition from the pilots and seafaring men of Pictou, Nova Scotia, and vicinity, asking that the light at King's Head, Nova Scotia, be turned on again, reached the Department of Marine and Fisheries?

2. What action has been taken in the matter?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Similar questions were put by the hon. senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), and I have just answered them.

LIGHTHOUSE ON THESSALON POINT.

Mr. McDOUGALL (for Mr. Sproule) asked,

What was the total cost of the lighthouse on Thessalon Point, erected in 1897? Specifying, 1st, cost of timber and lumber; 2nd, other material.

From whom were these purchased? Was the work done by tender? If not, why not? By whom was the work done, and under whose supervision?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The total cost of the lighthouse on Thessalon Point, erected in 1897, was $1,219.36. The cost of timber and lumber was $309.60, and the cost of other material $209.41. The material was purchased from the following:—Lumber from J. T. Wallace, Thessalon; hardware from F. R. Bennett, Thessalon; plate glass from A. McPherson & Son, Montreal; lime and cement from F. Leighfield, Thessalon; iron work from J. C. McKay, Thessalon; tinsmithing from James McAlpine & Company, Thessalon; blacksmithing from J. V. Matson, Thessalon. The work was not done by tender. It was considered by the engineers of the department that a better building could be put up by day's labour than by contract. The work was done by local labourers, under the supervision of Mr. Joseph Magee, of Ottawa, who had previously superintended work for the department satisfactorily.

DISMISSAL OF A. POWLIE.

Mr. POWELL asked,

1. Has A. Powlie, within the last six months, been dismissed from the position of car inspector on the Intercolonial Railway at Spring Hill, Nova Scotia? If so, why was he dismissed?

2. Has any person been appointed to fill the said position of car inspector since the dismissal of Powlie? If any person has been so appointed, what was the occupation of such person previous to such appointment?

3. Was said Powlie employed at the time of his dismissal by the day or on a salary?

4. How long had Powlie, previous to his dismissal, been in the employ of the Intercolonial Railway, and had he not during the course of his employment with the Intercolonial Railway, been a faithful and efficient servant? Had any charges been preferred against him on which he was dismissed? If so, what were they, and by whom were they made? Were the said charges, if any, investigated, and if so, by whom, and had Powlie any notice of such investigation or opportunity to make any defence thereat?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The services of A. Powlie, car inspector at Springhill Junction, were dispensed with in October, 1897. His services were dispensed with on the ground of political partisanship. 2. No person has been appointed to fill the said position of car inspector since the services of Mr. Powlie were dispensed with, but Moses Legère is acting as car inspector. Moses Legère was employed as assistant to the car inspector at Spring Hill Junction before that time. 3. Powlie was employed at a monthly salary previous to his dismissal. 4. Powlie had been in the employ of the railway since 1873. He was a satisfactory employee. He was dismissed for political partisanship on the representations of Mr. Logan, M.P. There was no investigation.

DISMISSAL OF A. STEWART.

Mr. POWELL asked,

1. Was A. Stewart dismissed from the position of tankman on the Intercolonial Railway at Spring Hill, Nova Scotia? If so, why was he dismissed, and who made the charges, if any, against him?

2. How long had Stewart been in the service of the Intercolonial Railway previous to his dismissal? Who has been appointed to fill the position of tankman at Spring Hill in the room of Stewart?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The services of A. Stewart, tankman on the Intercolonial Railway at Spring Hill Junction, N.S., were dispensed with. They were dispensed with because he was an offensive partisan in the last Dominion election. 2. Mr. Stewart had been in the service of the Intercolonial Railway twenty-four years and upwards. Mr. H. A. McKenzie was appointed in his place, but I understand has resigned.

Mr. POWELL. Who made the charges?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The information is not furnished me; I suppose it was not noticed in the preparation of the answer. I will answer the question to-morrow.

COMMANDER WAKEHAM'S REPORT.

Mr. DAVIS (by Mr. McMillan), asked,

Is it the intention of the Government to furnish the members of this House with copies of Commander Wakeham's report on the navigability of Hudson Straits?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Such is the intention of the Government just as soon as the Printing Bureau have the report printed. It has been in their hands for some time past, but delay has been caused, partially by the fact that a large number of photographs taken by the officers at the time, are to be incorporated in the report.

THE MANITOBA AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.

Mr. DAVIS (by Mr. McMillan) asked,

How many miles of the Manitoba and North-western Railway have been constructed? How many miles, per annum, is the company supposed to construct under the terms of their charter? How many miles have they constructed in the years 1894, 1895, 1896 and 1897? Have the Government received any memorials from the Government of the North-west Territories respecting this road? If so, has any action been taken on the same?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Two hundred and thirty-four and a half miles of the Manitoba and North-western Railway have been constructed up to the 30th June, 1897. The company is supposed to complete not less than 20 miles of their railway, as defined by their Act of incorporation, each calendar year. There has not been any mileage constructed during the years 1894, 1895, 1896 and 1897. Yes, the Government have received a certified copy of a resolution adopted by the Legislative Assembly of the North-west Territories, praying that the charter of the above railway be amended and that cash assistance be granted towards extension of its line into Prince Albert. No action has yet been taken in the matter, but it is under consideration.

LEASES FOR DREDGING.

Mr. MAXWELL (by Mr. Gibson) asked,

How many miles of river has been leased for dredging purposes to J. A. Mercier?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Twenty-five miles have been leased to J. A. Mercier for dredging purposes.

Mr. FOSTER. If I wish for information with respect to leases given to individuals in this same way, and if I put a question on the paper, will I be given the answer, or be asked to put it in the form of a motion for a return?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Certainly the hon. gentleman will be answered if he puts a simple question that can be answered in this way. I presume the hon. gentleman is referring to the fact that when he asked a question before, it involved practically my reading a departmental return. I do not want to delay the hon. gentleman at all. If he will simply say what he wants and specify the particulars, I will bring down the return without a motion.

Mr. FOSTER. I will ask twenty questions instead of putting it all in one.

ESTIMATES AND BUDGET SPEECH

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance when we may expect the Estimates and the Budget speech?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The Estimates are in a very advanced state, and will be brought down at an early day. I am unable to make any more definite statement, but they will not be delayed many days. The Budget speech usually follows in due course. I hope my hon. friend will not ask me to depart from the custom and fix a day at present.

DUTY ON SPADES AND SHOVELS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to bring to the notice of the Government a question which I consider of grave importance, and I will conclude with a motion. In the Tariff Bill introduced last session occurs the following clause:—

Whenever the Governor in Council has reason to believe that with regard to any article of commerce there exists any trust, combination, association or agreement of any kind among manufacturers of such articles or dealers therein, to unduly enhance the price of such article, or in any other way to unduly promote the advantage of the manufacturers or dealers at the expense of the consumers, the Governor in Council may commission or empower any judge of the Supreme Court or Exchequer Court of Canada, or of any superior court of any province in Canada, to inquire in a summary way into and report to the Governor in Council whether such trust, combination, association or agreement exists.

The judge may compel the attendance of witnesses and examine them under oath, and require the production of books and of papers, and shall have such other necessary powers as are conferred upon him by the Governor in Council for the purposes of such inquiry.

If the judge reports that such trust, combination, association or agreement exists, and if it appears to the Governor in Council that such disadvantage to the consumers is facilitated by the duties of customs imposed on a like article, when imported, then the Governor in Council shall place such article on the free list, or so reduce the duty on it as to give to the public the benefit of reasonable competition in such article.

Mr. FOSTER.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand four letters from prominent manufacturers of spades and shovels in the United States. I will read only one of these letters to the House, but I will be glad to show them all to any member of the House, or to any member of the Government who desires to see them. The letter I will read is from a prominent manufacturing firm in Pennsylvania, and is in response to an inquiry from a well known manufacturing firm in Canada asking for quotations for spades and shovels. This is the letter:

Gentlemen,—Yours of the 23rd instant at hand, and in reply we would say that according to our agreement with the Canadian shovel manufacturers, we are not in a position to quote you prices at present.

The other letters are practically of the same character, they decline to give any quotations of prices of shovels and spades. It is quite evident therefore that a combination has been formed in regard to these articles. The duty on spades and shovels is 35 per cent, a duty which, I think, is entirely too high; notwithstanding that fact, I have in my hand evidence that a combination exists, and that by virtue of this combination consumers are compelled to pay infinitely too much for these articles. The price of spades and shovels, in the States particularly, is very low and these manufacturers in the States accept the shilling from our Canadian manufacturers and keep out of the market. I desire to call the attention of the Government officially to this question with the view of having them suspend the duty on these articles as provided in the tariff clause which I have read, until such time as the combination is broken. I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I may state that certainly, so far as my own knowledge is concerned, and I think I am correct in stating the same for my colleagues, this is the first time this matter has been brought to our notice; therefore we are not in a position to take any action or even to consider the matter at all. I will not say that I have not heard something in relation to a combine in respect to this particular industry, for I recollect at an early stage of the investigation into the trade question representations were made to us—I cannot recollect the particular place—that gentlemen engaged in that line of industry had something in the nature of a combine, and something like the state of facts presented by the hon. gentleman to-day in support of his motion. However, since the passage of the clause in the Tariff Act to which the hon. gentleman has referred, it has never been brought to my attention, nor so far as I am aware to the notice of the Minister of Customs or any Minister whose department might be supposed to be particularly connected with that branch of administration. I call attention to the fact that when we presented to the House our original tariff the Government itself took power to deal with such cases; but on discussion it was suggested that it would be a very great and perhaps a very dangerous power to confer on a Ministry; and before the Act was carried through the House it will be remembered that we agreed that the Government would not on its own motion take this power to itself, but if called on to deal with the question of combines, the matter would be in the first instance presented to one of the judicial tribunals of the country. If therefore the hon. gentleman thinks he will be able, as perhaps he may be able—and we must look into that point—to establish the existence of a combine, the Government is not in a position to take action except to call the attention of the courts to the question in order to obtain a proper decision. Inasmuch as this subject is brought to our attention for the first time since the passage of the Act, I can only say that the Government will give the matter careful consideration.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY BILL.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved third reading of Bill (No. 6) to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company.

Mr. KAULBACH. I cannot refrain from trespassing upon the indulgence of this House for a few moments, owing to the subject matter of this Bill being of such vital importance to the people of Canada. This proposed railway, to be known as the Canadian Yukon Railway, will be entailing such an immense expenditure for so small a return to Canada, and the legislation which we are called upon to enact so comparatively new, nothing having been mooted with regard to it, till within a few weeks ago, the engagement so great, the grant of lands so enormously large, to say nothing of its richness in mineral wealth and forest, that I feel it is really a duty I owe to the electorate of the county I represent, to give my views on the subject, and, were I to remain silent, I might be interpreted as simply following the dictates of party and indifferent to the essential element of honour and just principle, which should characterize every member of this House, be he Liberal or Conservative—hence my reason for claiming the indulgence of this House for a few moments. It was very amusing to listen to hon. members disputing on the merits of this Bill, the character of the work required of the contractors, Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, the consideration these two contractors are to receive for the performance of the work, and the beneficial results as a convenience accruing to Canada on its completion; but I must say that to all their utterances I take exception, as I cannot think they are sincere. At all events, it is not the opinion of hon. members on this side of the House, and I feel very certain it will not voice the sentiment of the great majority of the people of this country, when they understand it.

I must state, that I, as a member of this House, object to this Bill on the grounds, first, that it is not in the interest of Canada, inasmuch as it is not an all-Canadian route—that by the Stikine River international disputes, as well as dissatisfaction in the administration of the customs laws between the United States and Canada, at the mouth of the Stikine in Alaska, at Fort Wrangel, may arise, which may lead to serious complications and difficulties, which we now, having warning by the action taken in the American Congress, can avert; that the many transfers of passengers and freight—said to be seven—would be inconvenient, expensive, and dangerous to life and property; that a more convenient and all-Canadian route can be had from Fort Simpson and Portland Channel to Glenora or Telegraph Creek, and thus avoid the tortuous and dangerous waters of the Stikine; that any route from the Pacific Ocean available over Canadian territory to the Yukon, is better than the proposed one; that any route passing from the Pacific Ocean to the Yukon is an injury to Canadian merchants and traders, and building up the United States, to the injury of Canada, inasmuch as it would be giving a market for the agricultural and industrial products of Washington, Montana, Oregon, Idaho, Nevada and California, in the United States, they being in such close proximity as to be able to supply nine-tenths of everything required for the entire gold region lying between the Pacific and Arctic Ocean, cheaper even when paying the duty, than we of the North-west Territory or central Canada, owing to our long freight rates on the Canadian Pacific; that the water stretches between Vancouver and Morely Island, a distance of 160 miles, and Dixon Entrance between Prince of Wales Island and Graham Island, a distance of 60 miles, are dangerous to navigate, owing to strong winds and the roughness of the waters. Hence my reasons for objecting to this route, and I feel that it would be wisdom on the part of the Government to abandon the project altogether, thereby saving money, and allow adventurers, they being mainly foreigners, to find their way to the gold region in the Yukon as best they can. My advice, under the circumstances, is, to open up a good wagon road into this country, as was done some years ago, when the rich Caribou gold-bearing region was first discovered, which road has been used up to the present, and nothing better has been asked for. But I believe a still better project can be advanced, at all events infinitely better than the extravagant deal provided by this Bill, that is, to start from Edmonton, in Alberta, via the Peace River, Halfway River, Black River and Francis River, till it strikes the Pelly River, and utilize the waters of the Pelly and Yukon rivers to Dawson. By this means you have an all-Canadian route; you open up that beautiful Peace River district, valuable for its climate and richness of soil; you offer advantages to settlers, with the certainty that the goods going into the Klondike region would all come from Canada, while the goods that would be going into the Yukon district by the proposed Stikine and Teslin Lake Railway, would be of American origin. This Edmonton route, I claim, is the shortest, safest and best for Canadians. It opens up a rich mining country, has no need of bonding goods, ex-warehouse, as is threatened at Fort Wrangel; neither is there any need of seven transfers, as is required on the route provided by this Bill.

Some would object to the Edmonton route via Peace River, owing to the distance being about 1,400 miles. As an answer, I would say, to build a permanent railway into the Peace River district, and from that a wagon road to the waters of the Pelly, utilizing the waters of the Pelly and Yukon, to get to the Klondike region.

By adopting this Edmonton route we avoid all complications with our neighbours to the south of us, as respects the bonding privileges at Fort Wrangel, who really want everything in sight and disposed to take steps to secure it. It is very humiliating to have Congress, by the 13th clause of the Bill as passed in the Senate at Washington, on the 5th instant, dictate terms to us, and ask, among other privileges:

That fishing vessels of the United States having authority under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places in the British dominions of North America, shall have the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places for the purposes of purchasing bait and all other supplies and outfits in the same manner, and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most-favoured nations and of transshipping their catch to be transported in bond through said Dominion without paying of duty, in the same manner as other merchandise destined for the United States may be there transported.

May I ask, what prompted this section of 13th clause, as referred to, to be embodied in that Bill? Is it not truthfully stated by Mr. Hansbrough (North Dakota), who said in debate in words like these:

That the Committee on Public Lands was in possession of information that Canada would accept the conditions imposed by the section. He was firmly of the opinion that the Dominion Government would yield to the fisheries question in view of the concessions made to it by the Bill.

Mr. KAULBACH.

I would here ask the right hon. the leader of the Government, if he would consider it fair and in the interest of the fishermen of the maritime provinces, with the knowledge of a high American tariff wall ruling against us, by which we are excluded from entering their markets, that we should allow them the like privileges with ourselves on our shores? It would be unreasonable to entertain such a thought for a single moment.

Let me inform the hon. gentleman, that we are suffering very greatly at present in the maritime provinces, owing to the bounty-fed French catch of fish being allowed to be sold in our markets, whilst our fish products are excluded from theirs, and coming into competition with our Canadian catch in foreign markets, thereby reducing the price of the article so greatly as to cripple our Canadian industry, and in some cases to drive parties out of the fish business entirely.

But to give this valuable concession, as referred to, to our American neighbours in barter for rights which we contend are our own fishermen's rights, and upon which rights there should be no infringement, in order to pass goods or get the bonding privilege, ex-warehouse, at Fort Wrangel, at the mouth of the Stikine River, and carry out the conditions of this doubtful Bill, for a paltry tramway, would be dealing a death-blow to our North Atlantic fisheries, and fishermen, who are struggling for an existence, and in many cases are in dire need of the necessaries of life, owing to the manner in which their interests have been handicapped and their appeals rejected. I am here as their friend and advocate to speak for their rights and to sound the note of warning, and, if hon. gentlemen opposite are indifferent to this reminder and regardless of results, they take the consequences.

Now, I desire to say a few words with regard to the contract given to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. This contract, be it remembered, was given to these contractors without tender and without consultation, with any other parties accustomed to take contracts, only about ten days before our assembling here in Parliament, which looks, to say the least of it, very suspicious, there being no urgent necessity for it, neither any haste, as no work could be proceeded with till the opening of spring, and to build a tramway commencing at a point inaccessible or that cannot be reached at all times, and ending nowhere, 160 miles, with 28-pound rails, narrow gauge, for the enormous consideration of 25,000 acres per mile, which gives the contractors the immense area of 4,000,000 of acres, or 6,250 square miles of country, equal to the acreage of all the arable land in Nova Scotia, and nearly three times the area of the island known as Prince Edward Island, so familiar to our fishermen visiting the Gulf of St. Lawrence, is monstrous, and will give an idea as to how our rights are being attempted to be bartertramway, which the Government's own engineer, Mr. Jennings, says, in his report, can be built for $2,850,000, meaning by these figures the construction of a first-class road with proper rails.

Now let me place a moderate estimate on the value of each acre these contractors are to receive, taking the estimate from the report of the Government's own engineer, Mr. Jennings, where on page 2 he says as follows:—

From the Naplin River northward for forty-eight miles the general valley contracts from twenty to eight miles in width, and has in the central section a continuous stretch of rounded hills, all heavily timbered with spruce and pine, while on either side, in the low grounds, are many lakes and marshes, the valley to the eastward being the widest and best.

Say each acre has an average of twenty-five thousand feet of inch lumber, value each thousand at $2—I am placing a very low estimate upon it when you consider the demand for the article for home consumption, house building, mineral uses, &c., and you have for each acre for timber purposes alone $50—say we take only 1,000,000 acres as timber tract, and there are 3,000,000 acres left—we find as the value for the 1,000,000 acres for the timber alone $50,000,000. But this is not the least part of the contract, as respects the lands to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, for both Mr. Jennings and Mr. Ogilvie, the Government's own engineers, in their official reports, refer to the valleys of the rivers as very rich in gold and other minerals, so you see the contractors have the crop of forest, and beneath in the soil, there is supposed to be in these valleys the rich deposits of gold—the value of which is beyond the estimate of man, but I will quote from Mr. Ogilvie's official report just issued to have you draw your own conclusions, in which he says:

A specimen of gold-bearing quartz was picked up some years ago high up on the side of the banks of the Yukon River, opposite the mouth of the White River. It was sent to San Francisco and assayed, showing the enormous value of $20,000 to the ton.

On page 92 of the same report Mr. Ogilvie stated as follows:—

Attention may be directed to the fact that the whole of that vast district owes its now world-wide reputation to the richness of 140 claims in the Klondike division. One hundred of these are on Bonanza Creek, and about 40 on Eldorado. To use a mining term, many of these claims are "world-beaters," and if the indications now known are worth anything at all they are worth from sixty to seventy millions of dollars in these two creeks.

Taking this division as a whole, including the three creeks named, affluent to Indian Creek, a distance some thirty-five miles in length, and twenty-five or more miles in width, if the indications can be relied on, there are one hundred million dollars ($100,000,000) in sight in that area. No one can guarantee this amount, but the prospects so far developed point to that sum pretty clearly or conclusively. This district is exceptionally rich. Nothing has ever been found like it heretofore in that country, in fact, in very few countries has anything been found like it, and while we cannot confidently assert that other finds as valuable as it will be made, it is altogether improbable that gold is scattered over such a vast extent, and only rich at a point which is less than the 140th part of the total area.

Now both these Government engineers report that there is to be found silver, copper and coal, which if taken with the richness of the gold as referred to will prove beyond anything that man can estimate, the wealth that is attempted to be bestowed upon these two contractors in consideration of their building 150 miles of a tramway, improperly called a railway, running from Glenora or Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake. These two contractors get a deed in fee simple, a perfect title of all these lands, 4,000,000 of acres, with all the minerals they contain, without tax, save one per cent royalty on gold. Is not this a monstrous piece of monopoly, brought about by those who only a short time ago were shouting, "down with combines and monopolies?" The poor miner has to pay to the Government a rental of $15 per year, whilst these contractors pay nothing. The poor miner has to pay $10 for a miner's license, while these contractors pay nothing. The poor miner has to pay a royalty of 10 per cent, while these contractors pay only 1 per cent. If the poor miner happens to lose his license, he has to pay $2 additional to get a new one.

I hold that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann can select, as was truly said by the hon. member for Alberta, a supporter of the Government, the best of the gold claims of that country, and he can locate 92,160 acres as quickly as the first ten miles are completed, and a similar quantity for the next ten miles of the road, and so continue taking and selecting lands until the whole road is built. The contractors can, owing to the careless contract that was made by the Government with them, make a deal with the miner himself by offering him a less license fee, a less rental fee, and a less percentage as royalty than the Government would exact, thereby giving the miners an advantage, and placing themselves at an advantage over the Government and still further placing the revenue that should go to the Government in their own pockets and leaving the Government in the humiliating position to tax the people of this country for this extravagant "Mackenzie & Mann" deal, and the further expenses incurred in this Yukon region. Another objection I make to this deal is, that the contractors are not limited as to the rates or tolls they are to charge on this road, at least there is no provision in the Bill, but can charge what they please. We will say there are 50,000 people passing over this road this year—the hon. Minister of Railways says there probably will be 250,000—and say we place a profit on each passenger at $10—that will give $500,000, and say there are 50,000 tons of freight, that will give $500,000 more, or equal to $1,000,000—nearly half the cost of the entire road. But the contractors will charge what they please in the way of tolls and in one year out of profits alone will in all probability pay for the entire road, and have from this single source, a fortune, besides all the rest of the values referred to. In addition to the profits and benefits to these contractors, as referred to, it is understood the British Columbia Government are to aid them with a subsidy of $3,200 per mile.

In conclusion I would say that I sincerely trust the Government will see that this proposed road is an injury to Canada, is a serious expense to Canada without any return, as foreigners can land from all parts of the world from the waters of the Pacific, be fed and clothed by our American neighbours to the south of us, pocket all the gold they find, and laugh at this impolitic Government in giving them the conveniences of getting into this region, and getting out, without paying one cent as a return to the treasury—whereas by the Edmonton route they would get all their supplies as the product of Canada, leave a portion at least of their money in Canada, see a beautiful country as regards climate, and soil, and mining resources, and probably be induced to settle in the Peace River district.

It is anticipated that if Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann by this suspicious and extravagant contract receive only half the profits that I have estimated, they will have a colossal fortune, and be "monarchs of all they survey," but they can't say "their right there is none to dispute," for it has been disputed by us on this side the House most ably, and reasonably, on honest and logical grounds, as was pointed out without the shadow of a doubt by the speeches delivered and the proofs given, that had the work been submitted to tender, instead of granting this gigantic monopoly to these contractors, the work would have been accepted by other parties as contractors, Mr. Hamilton Smith having expressed himself ready to submit his offer, for one-fourth the present land grant, and the conditions carried out in a speedy and satisfactory manner.

I hope my friends will accord me the credit of showing no disposition throughout my remarks to misrepresent, but only to give facts and to offer just and fair criticism as respects this Bill, which I think I have done.

I may say in closing that there is one advantage the contractors have gained by this deal, which they will thank the Government for, and it is this, that they have by this contract learned from the Minister of Railways, as by magic, how to run a railway without a "tender."

Mr. QUINN. Although the Government has seen fit to adopt several suggestions made by the Opposition as regards the operation of the road, the system of selecting lands, the securing of a British directorate, and to provide for the road being a work in the general interest of Canada, yet it has not seen fit to place this matter in such a way before the public that the people of the Dominion generally may benefit by the existence in Canada of such a rich region. In the course of my remarks on the second reading, I suggested that a company should be organized with a capital of $10,000,000, to be divided into shares of $1 each. I suggested the same thing in committee yesterday, but no notice was taken of the suggestion, and I consider it my imperative duty to move an amendment now to that effect, and to ask that it be incorporated in the Bill in the place of section 8. I beg, therefore, Mr. Speaker, to move :

The capital stock of the company shall be ten millions of dollars, divided into shares of one dollar each, the whole of which shall be first issued for subscription to the Canadian public and left open for subscription until the first day of September, 1898. On the first allotment of shares no individual shall be allotted more than one thousand shares, but should the whole sum of ten millions of dollars be not then subscribed any person who shall have applied for shares shall be allowed to take up any portion of the balance remaining unsubscribed. In the event of applications for stock in excess of the ten millions of dollars being received, shares shall be allotted pro rata to each subscriber. The ownership of the railway and the contractors' interest in their contract with the Government shall be acquired by the company by paying to the contractors, out of the capital stock of the company, the amount expended by such contractors for the construction of such railway, together with a profit of twenty-five per centum on the gross expenditure so made by them.

The object of my amendment is very easily understood. As I take it, the desire of the Government in granting 25,000 acres of land per mile for the construction of this railway was to secure the contractors against the possibility of loss. In the country generally, there is a difference of opinion as regards the possibility of loss by the contractors, and the opinion generally prevailing is not only that this railway is bound to be successful but that there will be millions of money in it for the persons who are fortunate enough to have the contract for building the road and to have shares in the company that may afterwards be organized to carry it on. In fact there seems to be no doubt, except in the minds of the Government and the Government supporters, at all as to the ultimate success of this undertaking. In view of these circumstances and knowing well, from my intercourse with the public, as every other hon. gentleman must know, that the poorer classes of the country are prepared to risk an investment in this scheme, my desire is to give every man, woman and child in Canada the opportunity of benefiting by the existence and development of such a rich region as the Klondike. If my amendment be adopted and these shares be issued at a dollar each, I have no hesitation in saying that before the first of May, not only $10,000,000 but possibly $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 will be subscribed. It will then be the duty of the directors, or the provisional directors, to allot proportionately the shares at their disposal up to $10,000,000. Should there be any deficiency, should for example only five million or six million dollars be subscribed, then the contractors will have the advantage, if the subscribers are not willing to take the difference between what is subscribed and the $10,000,000 capital, of taking up the balance of the capital themselves or of floating it in England or the United States or anywhere else they may see fit. I think that the first opportunity should be given the public in general of the Dominion to benefit by the advantages of this Yukon district, and that only can be done by issuing the stock at such a price that every one may be able to subscribe without any great strain on his finances.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read the third time, on division.

DUTY ON PETROLEUM.

Mr. MOORE moved :

That in the opinion of the House it would be in the interests of the farmers, labourers and the country generally, to reduce the customs duty upon imported refined petroleum for illuminating purposes to three cents per Imperial gallon, and also to further extend the right of importing such oil in tank cars.

He said: I desire to call the attention of hon. members of this House to this motion, which is similar to one I submitted last session. I do not make it for the purpose of embarrassing the Government in any way or to injure an industry which is also of much importance in this country. My whole object has been and is to make the oil cheaper and of better quality. There are two ways, as I look at it, in which this may be done—first, by reducing the duty, and, second, by cheapening the transportation and handling of the oil in Canada. If the duty were reduced to three cents a gallon, I believe, and I have pretty good testimony on the part of members on the other side of the House to support me, that the protection would be ample for any industry. I do not wish to press unduly my own opinion with regard to the excessiveness of the duty, but I beg leave to offer the testimony of some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. In the first place, the present hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, speaking in 1894, said that in 1877 coal oil was worth 20 cents per gallon, that seven and one-fifth cents per gallon upon that was only 30 per cent ad valorem. Now the same quality is sold at 3½ cents—which is nearly 200 per cent ad valorem. He characterized the duty paid in his locality as atrociously unjust, and an intolerable tax upon every poor family. There was no industry in this country, he said, which could possibly justify such an enormous robbery under the shape of protection. Further, that the oil (Canadian) was not fit to use. The oil offered for sale in the maritime provinces was of a very inferior quality. There are other gentlemen who have given their testimony in this House upon this same point. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), speaking in 1894, claimed that reduction to 6 cents per gallon was not sufficient, and that the protection was too high. He said that five gallons were imported into the maritime provinces from abroad upon which duty is paid to one gallon of Canadian. He said the fact that a large majority of the consuming population, who represent people of moderate means, deliberately used five times as much imported as they used of oil of home production was irrefutable proof that the imported oil was intrinsically the better for all illuminating purposes. I have also the testimony of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) who said that the duty struck the poorer classes and the farming community particularly. There were 1,000,000 families in Canada who used about 20 gallons each. The consumption would thus be about 20,000,000 gallons, on which a duty of 7½ cents would amount to $1,400,000. The duty collected was $430,000, leaving a balance of $989,494 that went into the pockets of and was divided amongst the refiners of coal oil, or very near $1,000,000 paid by the people last year (1893) to refiners in Petrolia. We have now Casey at the bat. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) said the tax was outrageously high. If we take the price of oil at 6 cents per gallon, a duty of 2 cents would be equal to 33½ per cent protection which would be a fair duty on the same lines as those given to great manufacturing industries of this country. It was going too far to ask Parliament to give this industry special protection for the benefit of the oil refiners, or even for the benefit of those who produce the crude oil. I shall say no more with regard to the excessiveness of the duty. I think I have shown by the opinions expressed by the leading gentlemen on the other side of the House what their opinion was a few years ago. They may say that the duty has been somewhat reduced since that time. But if, as the present hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated, it was 200 per cent ad valorem, when the duty was seven and one-fifth cents per gallon, the reduction to 5 cents per gallon, would leave it to 149 per cent ad valorem at the present time. There is another point, the quality of the oil. The present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, speaking on this subject in 1894, said :

The hon. gentlemen, whose olfactory organs do not have to submit to the stench from this oil, gentlemen who can afford to use electric lights or gas, are astonished that anybody should hesitate to burn stinking oil. I do not think the poor people should be insulted in this way. Their olfactories are as good as the hon. gentleman's, and while they have not the privilege of using gas and electric lights as he has, neither have they the fine salary which enables him to enjoy these luxuries. No man would buy it who can avoid it.

Those hon. gentlemen to-day are occupying the position that he mentioned in this respect, and the same objection may be now raised against them that they made at that time with regard to the use of poor oil. Now, since the responsibility rests upon them, what are they going to do about it? I need not read all the testimony I have in my possession, which is very voluminous. Hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House have stated that the oil is not what it should be. I have read the statement made by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) and one or two others. I will now read the testimony of the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor):

The Lord has evidently made a mistake in giving the people coal oil in Canada—because for twenty years we have been taxing it. Taxing oils is one of the worst ways in the world to raise a revenue. The hon. gentleman need not think that this duty will compel the people to use Canadian oil. I never had more than one or two gallons of it in my house, and it smelt so badly that I thought there must be a dozen polecats about my yard. I don't want any more of it.

All this is testimony that has been given in this House, and as some hon. gentlemen may say that there is not a word of truth in it, I will make this statement here without fear of successful refutation, that there has not been one gallon of Canadian oil, until very recently, ever used in this country that will compare with the oil of the United States. I state that without fear of contradiction, for I have dealt in oil myself for over twenty-five years, and I have never seen, until within a short time, any oil refined in this country that would compare in quality with the oil imported from the United States. But I am happy to say that within a few weeks I have seen some oil claimed to be made in refineries in Sarnia, which does come somewhere near the oil manufactured in the United States. If we are able to secure that quality of oil in Canada, I would not so strongly object to the duty being retained, seeing that good oil can be furnished to the consumers in Canada. Now, if the Government desire to retain the duty in order to produce a revenue, if they desire to retain the duty as it stands to-day in order to protect an industry which I believe deserves protection, to protect an industry in which is invested a large amount of money in this country, I can point out a way, a very easy way, by which the price of oil may be reduced to some extent, and at the same time be made to produce a revenue without taking protection away from the industry. We have only to follow the example of the people of the United States, who are transporting oil throughout the length and breadth of their country in tank cars, and from tank cars the oil is taken in tank wagons and other vehicles and distributed to the retail dealers and consumers. In this way they save the price of the barrel, the price of the inspection of the barrel, and the price of the duty on the barrel, all of which amounts to 3 cents per gallon. In that way, if the Government would make such regulations as would enable the oil to be transported from the refineries in Petrolea and Sarnia through this country in tank cars, and from them to be distributed in tank wagons to the dealers, we can save the cost of barrelling, and thus reduce the cost of the oil by 3 cents a gallon without injury to the revenue in any manner whatever, and without injuring the industry, but rather helping it. If you go to Montreal to the dealers in oil, you will find that they are prepared to-day to lay down oil in Montreal in tank cars at 3 cents a gallon less than in barrels. There is no difficulty that I can see why the Government should not make such regulations regarding the inspection of oil as will result in giving the people of this country oil 3 cents a gallon less than they are paying for it now, and without touching the revenue in any manner whatever. Therefore, I feel that the consumers in this country have a strong claim upon the Government in this respect. If they do not see fit to reduce the duty on account of the revenue or for fear of injuring the industry, they can help the industry and help the consumers to get good oil, and get it at 3 cents a gallon less than they are paying to-day. Now, having called the attention of the Government to this matter, I trust they will look into it and make such regulations as will enable this oil to be distributed throughout the country in tank wagons and in tank vehicles the same as it is in the United States, by which the people of that country get their oil 3 or 4 cents a gallon less than they would in the ordinary way. That is all I have to say upon this important question, which I now leave before the Government and before the House. As I said in first place, I have no desire to injure this industry nor to embarrass the Government, nor do I desire to appear inconsistent before this House, who well know my opinions in regard to the tariff and in regard to the principle of protection. I do not think that I am abandoning anything of my principles in regard to protection when I favour a reduction of the duty on an article which I think is excessive. I am in favour of placing a duty on everything that comes into this country to compete with the manufacturers of this country, in a way that will give the control of our Canadian markets to the Canadian producers, and at the same time reduce the cost of the article to the consumer. I believe we can find that happy mean in regard to this matter by giving fair and reasonable protection to this industry and at the same time reducing the cost of the oil to the consumer, by making the regulations which I have suggested. I would like, however, to amend this motion by adding the words, "and distributing the oil in tank wagons and other vehicles."

Mr. BEATTIE. It is already distributed in tank cars.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has no right to amend his own motion.

Mr. MOORE. In reply to the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie), I admit they have a right to distribute it in tank cars, but they cannot do it in tank wagons.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I think it is not desirable that the House should take up a separate and distinct item of the tariff in the manner proposed by the hon. gentleman. The tariff has to be considered in a general way, and to select a particular item and to challenge a vote upon it, I think is not expedient. I move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

MOTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I expected a debate to come on on agricultural implements, and was not in the House when the motions standing in my name were called. If the House does not object, I would like to make my motions now. They are motions upon which I am not going to speak, one refers to the Dominion Veterinary Inspector and the other to employees on the Welland Canal. They are motions for returns.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). They can be moved on Monday.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 77) to incorporate the Toronto and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Clarke.)

Bill (No. 79) to incorporate the Windsor and Detroit Union Bridge Company.—(Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (No. 80) respecting the Ottawa and New York Railway Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 81) respecting the Montreal and Southern Counties Railway Company.—(Mr. Préfontaine.)

ST. JOHN BRIDGE AND RAILWAY EXTENSION COMPANY.

Mr. ELLIS moved second reading of Bill (No. 78) respecting the St. John Bridge and Railway Extension Company.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I observe the Bill is not printed in French, and I ask that it be allowed to stand, according to the rules of the House.

Mr. ELLIS. I trust no such objection will be taken by my hon. friend, because all the other private Bills on the Order paper occupy the same position. The hon. gentleman can understand it in English.

Mr. DOMVILLE. This Bill requires consideration, and I do not wish it to be proceeded with now. The hon. member for St. John has charge of it, and no doubt the Bill will recommend itself eventually to the favour of the House. Meanwhile, hon. members should have an opportunity to consider it. There are certain facts that, in my opinion, should be presented in connection with it.

Mr. SPROULE. The custom followed has been, that when private Bills are printed in English, they are allowed to receive their second readings, and are then sent to committee. It is very unfortunate that the hon. gentleman should raise this technical objection, when all he seeks can be accomplished in committee, and especially is it unfortunate when objection has not been taken by any hon. member who does not understand the language in which the Bill is printed.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I have raised the point, and I ask your ruling on it, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. ELLIS. I trust the hon. member will not press his objection. This is purely a formal stage, and the Bill can be discussed fully in committee.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I will withdraw my objection, in order to meet the desire of the hon. member for St. John.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

BETTER OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 2) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday, as a day of rest. He said: I suppose, Mr. Speaker, there are members in this House who would deem it proper for me to offer an apology for having so often taken up the time of the House in presenting this measure, and it will no doubt be made the subject of cheap witticisms, and the promoter will be treated with the usual characteristic terms, as a crank, a seeker after notoriety, and so forth. Those, however, who have followed the discussion of this Bill, and who are familiar with the treatment that it and kindred measures have received at the hands of this House, will hardly accuse the promoter of being a notoriety hunter or seeker after popularity; and I always feel, when rising to advocate this measure, that I am doing so under discouraging and depressing circumstances, and that I am presenting a measure to an unsympathetic House. I have continued to press the measure because I consider the presentation of this case and the urging of the propriety of the passage of this legislation as a public duty. In doing this, I always feel as did a certain teacher of old, when he was presenting a certain doctrine to which he was firmly attached and in which he firmly believed, that it is a "stumbling block to the Jews and foolishness to the Greeks." But nevertheless, I feel it my duty to continue to press this measure, believing no measure is brought before this House, no measure is seeking the consideration of the people, that is more important to the well-being of Canada than the measure I rise to advocate to-night; and I am glad I have not been deterred by the circumstances, which are so depressing and unfavourable, from continuing to discharge what I believe to be a duty.

The interest of this House would be easily aroused, Mr. Speaker, if we were considering a grant of a few thousand dollars, if we were considering the imposition of a tax of one or two cents on tea, or if we were considering an increased tax on petroleum, or some matter of that kind. The House would see that it was a question that deserved its consideration, and it would arouse on each side of the House warm discussion and elicit warm expressions of opinion as to the propriety of the proposed measure; but when we come to the discussion of a measure which involves the deepest of all moral influences, a measure which has to do with the future of this country, a measure which may to some extent, even to a large extent, shape the destinies of this country, not for the present alone, but for future generations, that measure, far-reaching in its scope, great in its influence, is a measure which has heretofore received scanty consideration at the hands of the Canadian House of Commons. We are building in this country a nation. We have vast resources; Providence has given us all natural resources necessary for a mighty power. We have a broad area of arable lands, great natural resources of all kinds, a vigorous people; we have a good constitution and good laws, and it certainly is a matter of great importance, what shape shall be given to the future of this young country which promises to be inhabited by a great people. It is in that view of the case that I present this matter to-night. I present it asking: what the foundations of the future of this country shall be, asking whether we shall consider it worth our while to make provisions that shall secure the highest interests of the state; that shall give to us such a promise, as we alone can derive from respect of moral obligations and the better foundations of human life; whether we shall consider a question of that kind of sufficient importance to engage our attention, and whether we shall be able to dismiss this spirit of levity and this spirit of carping and caviling, and attributing to the promoters of such a measure the motives that are attributed to them in dealing with this great question.

The state, of course, has nothing to do with the establishment of religion; with regulations as to what form of religion the people shall observe, as to what religious opinion shall be, as to whether the people shall be religious or the reverse. That does not come within the scope of the functions of the state; nevertheless, those who are charged with the duty of framing the laws and administering the laws of the country cannot close their minds to the fact that the moral and religious character of the people has very much indeed to do with the interests of the state, and that whatever may indirectly, or directly for that matter, promote a high moral standard of respect for Christianity and respect for the truth, is something that is of importance in laying the foundation of the state, something that is of more importance than the ordinary political issues of the day. Irreligion, vice, disregard of moral obligations; all these are forces that militate directly and powerfully against the interests of the state; all these are influences that it is the duty of the Government to discountenance, that it is the duty of the Government to minimize the influence of so far as it may be possible for it to do so. The kind of a nation that we naturally desire to establish here on the northern half of the American continent, is a nation whose institutions shall be founded in truth and in justice; and a nation whose institutions shall be of a character that shall promise to be enduring. Such institutions can only be secured by attention to the immutable principles of truth, to the immutable principles of justice; such institutions can only be perpetuated, and conserved, and preserved by a citizenship that is not capable of being swayed by base and mercenary and corrupt motives. To perpetuate such institutions, if they are once established, requires a citizenship of a high order, a citizenship where the citizens respect their obligations and are virtuous, and such citizenship can be secured only by a proper attention to the influences that legislation may bring to bear upon the people of the country.

Now, in a general sense—although I am not dealing particularly to-night with this question of Sunday rest—in a general sense, Sir, the Government is entitled to deal with the question of Sunday rest, not because it is a religious observance—although of course I would yield to no man in my devotion to a principle, because it was a religious principle—the Government is entitled to deal with it, I say, not because it is a religious observance or is inculcated by religious precepts, but because it is in the highest sense a civil right. The labourer is entitled to his weekly day of rest. I believe it is one of the highest of the privileges that devolve upon him, and it is his by natural and by Divine right; and any measure, any usage, any influence that is calculated to deprive the labourer of the exercise of this civil right is one which attacks the foundation of liberty in one sense, one which deprives a very large class of our population of the exercise of a right which in many cases can only be secured to them by the operation of civil law.

The Bill, Mr. Speaker, which I present tonight, contains one of the four clauses which was embodied in a similar Bill presented on previous occasions to the House of Commons. The Bill last session, and for two or three sessions previously, embodied four principles. First, it required the closing of the canals upon the Lord's Day; second, it prohibited the publication of Sunday newspapers; third, it sought so far as was practical to minimize the amount of railway traffic on that day, and fourth, it prohibited excursions by rail on Sunday. One of these clauses of the Bill was accepted by this House and passed on one occasion. It received the endorsement of the late Premier of the Dominion (Sir John Thompson); it received the endorsement of the present Premier of this Dominion (the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). And, Sir, in deciding what the character of the Bill should be which was to be presented this session, I arrived at the conclusion that it was better to take that portion of the Bill which was accepted and which would likely be accepted, than to fight the battle again with the doubtful prospect of securing the other objects of the measure. In regard to the closing of canals on the Lord's Day, I am happy to say that there is no room at present; there has been no room in the past for complaint on that score. The Government has voluntarily done what the Bill required, and perhaps it is unnecessary to ask for legal enactment upon a point where no present necessity exists for its operation. The third section is with regard to railway traffic—and perhaps that was a matter of less importance than the section under consideration, because I believe that the managers of our great railway corporations in Canada, so far as they are able to do, avoid Sunday labour. There is a class of traffic which they are incapable of controlling, a class of traffic which the previous Bill did not attempt to control; that is through traffic.

These companies receive freight traffic from the American lines and in order to compete with other American through lines they must do as other American through lines do. The same applies to through passenger traffic and the Bill did not propose, and it would not be practical to attempt to restrict these roads in their freight operations and their passenger operations that are made in connection with continental lines. The Bill only proposed before to operate in the line of restricting local business, with the proviso that when the United States passed enactments with regard to their through business, our laws should be made to correspond with that legislation. This feature has been dropped, as well as the provision with regard to excursions by rail; and the Bill now contains just the one clause with regard to Sunday newspapers. This clause was re-cast last year by the Minister of Justice, and it received the sanction of the Solicitor General of this Dominion, and I believe, was satisfactory to the Premier. As it is brief, I shall read it; it is as follows:

Every one is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding fifty dollars and costs for the first offence, and not exceeding one hundred dollars and costs for each subsequent offence, and in default of payment to one month's imprisonment, who,—

(a.) Being the proprietor, publisher or manager of any newspaper, publishes or issues, or prepares for publication or issue, any copy or number of such newspaper for sale on Sunday, or with the intent that such copy or number shall be sold on Sunday; or

(b.) Sells or employs or procures any person to sell any newspaper on Sunday;

Provided that the publishing or issuing or preparing for publication or issue of any copy or number of a religious newspaper for distribution on Sunday, or with the intent that it shall be distributed on Sunday, shall not be an offence under this section.

2. The word "newspaper" in this section has the same meaning as it has under paragraph (p1) of section 3, in the sections relating to defamatory libel.

3. No prosecution for an offence against this section shall be commenced after the expiration of one month from the commission of such offence.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the provision that is submitted in this Bill to the consideration of this House—a provision against the publication of Sunday newspapers. Now, Sir, the Sunday newspaper so far as we have practical knowledge of it, is not a crying evil in Canada. Such Sunday newspapers as have been published in this country are not of an objectionable character, further than lies in the fact that they have been issued on Sunday. But the time was in the United States when the Sunday newspaper there, in the character of the paper itself, was as little liable to objection as it is in Canada, in the few instances in which we have Sunday papers published at the present time. But in the United States it has proved to be a growing evil, and it has become after the lapse of a few years an evil of enormous magnitude. The Sunday newspaper in the United States furnishes us with a practical example of what it is likely to become here, and furnishes us, if we will examine into the question, with all the reasons we require for taking action against the establishment in Canada of this curse—for in the United States it has proved to be nothing less. The Sunday newspaper in the United States was at first a very decorous kind of journal. It gave one or two columns of religious homily and religious reading matter; but it gradually degenerated, it soon become most objectionable in its character, and it was very properly designated by Horace Greeley, the great American editor, as a social demon. To-day, after the evolution of this evil to its present dimensions, we find that there are nearly a thousand Sunday newspapers published in the United States, that perhaps ninety per cent of these papers are the reverse of respectable, that more than half of them are positively vile, that they exercise a most pernicious influence upon public taste and public morals, that they are the natural parent of that sensational "yellow journalism" which is the disgrace of that country, that they lead gradually to a depraved and vitiated taste on the part of the reading public—a trivial, immoral, superficial taste—and that they are sworn enemies and potent foes of solid literature as well as of religious truth. Their effect upon the public taste is most disastrous, and their effect upon the national life is to degrade it. The national life of the United States is being rapidly degraded. Those who are familiar with the condition of society in the United States to-day, and who contrast it with the condition of society in that country thirty years ago, must be struck, and painfully struck, with the lamentable change that has taken place in that country. The influences that are at work, largely attributable to the Sunday newspaper, are degrading and demoralizing that nation, and rapidly dragging it down. The character of the press is something which, in itself gives an unerring indication of the character of the public taste. Of the majority of American newspapers, no man would dream of asserting that they occupy a respectable standing or that they are respectable literary journals, and their effect upon literary taste is shown in the character of the literature of the country. The great authors of the United States have passed away with the introduction of the Sunday newspaper. We have no longer Longfellow, or Whittier, or Bryant, or Holland as poets; no longer historians of the rank of Motley, Bancroft or Prescott, no longer writers of the rank of Washington Irving. These were men who lived and wrote before the debasing and demoralizing influence of the Sunday newspaper curse had been introduced into the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Now, this is a question having a practical bearing upon the national life of a country. The Sunday newspaper curse in the United States is bearing most disastrous fruits, and scarcely the first crop has yet been reaped. It is a curse which degrades even the religious life of a country. Those who are familiar with the operations of this evil, who are familiar with the character of this literature, must necessarily take the most pessimistic view of the future of that country; and, Sir, if we wish to build up in Canada a great healthy, virile, virtuous state, there is no precaution that can be taken, that is so urgently demanded by the danger that threatens, as the necessary precaution of prohibiting the introduction of this literary and moral curse into this country.

This matter, Mr. Speaker, is a proper subject for adverse legislation, because the Sunday newspaper is the foe of all religious restraint. The Sunday newspaper is itself a violation of God's law, an impious defiance of God's law; and a newspaper with such an inspiration, must necessarily, and does, denounce and defame everything that has a divine nature or a divine sanction. It belittles it; it casts ridicule upon it; it opposes every influence in the country that is of a religious character, or that calls for religious restraint, and any law that tends to promote moral objects and secure the observance of moral obligations. It is, I repeat, the foe of religious restraint. It weakens and destroys in a great measure moral purpose on the part of those who are the habitual readers of the objectionable kinds of Sunday newspapers. It is an attack upon the moral law comprehended in the Ten Commandments, one of which is, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." The Sunday newspaper is an attack upon the moral law from beginning to end—a direct attack upon the Fourth Commandment, and an inferential attack upon all the others. It lowers the status of religious life in the nation; it begets disregard of all moral principle and obligation; and it flouts its influence in the face of divine restraint and the divine commands. It poisons the literature of the nation. Not only does it degrade the character of the newspaper press, not only is its legitimate child the yellow journal, but it degrades the literary taste of the nation from top to bottom, from the spring to the mouth of the stream. As I said a few moments ago, the day of great authors in the United States seems to be passed. The day of poets, historians and writers who gave character to American literature has waned, and in their place has come the Sunday newspaper and the yellow journal and sensational literature, and everything calculated to debase the taste of the people and make them frivolous, immoral, sensational and superficial in the tastes they possess and the pursuits they follow. It begets contempt for the requirements of the higher law, and any nation the mass of whose people pay no attention to the higher law, who disregard and belittle its requirements, is a nation which stands in danger of meeting with serious disasters and of entering upon its decadence. This influence that leads directly and naturally to contempt for moral restraint, that laughs to scorn the precept that righteousness exalts a nation, that tramples upon everything which is true and religious and elevating in the national life, is certainly an influence that we do not, if we know our interests, wish to introduce into this country. For all these reasons, entertaining, as I do, the belief that if we are to establish in Canada a healthy, sound, progressive nationality, if we are to create and foster sentiments and habits of thought and moral action that will make this a great and vigorous and flourishing people, we must avoid the mistakes that are occurring under our eyes, we must realize the enormous injury that has been inflicted upon the United States by the Sunday newspaper curse; and if we are wise we will in good time, now and at once, apply the ounce of prevention, knowing very well that it will be impossible, in our case, as it is in theirs to-day, to apply the pound of cure. The best minds in the United States lament the existence of the Sunday newspaper, recognize fully the evils it has brought to pass, and express the desire to be rid of it, but the question is how. With the depraved tastes engendered by the publication of these newspapers, with the influence exerted by this Satanic press, with the downfall of moral sentiment, with the gradual breaking down of the national and moral perceptions of the country, the evil is one which cannot be grappled with; and if we wish to avoid falling ourselves into the same condition that exists in the United States to-day, now is the time to put on our Statute-book a law which shall prohibit the introduction of this curse into the country. I know there are newspaper men who do not take the view of the matter that I do, who may think that this will be a law calculated to injure their business, which will interfere with what is, in their assumption, their just rights, but if there are such—and my words can reach such gentlemen—I ask them to look at the question from a patriotic standpoint, to dismiss for the time being individual and personal interest, and to realize that the publishing of the Sunday newspaper is an influence the effect of which will be disastrous to the country. And acting from patriotic impulse, with the desire to secure the future good of Canada and avoid what will inevitably prove, to a greater or less extent, damaging to the country, I ask them to withdraw their opposition to this Bill, and ask the House to give its support to this Bill, which, I believe, is conceived in the best interests of Canada.

Mr. CRAIG. I think the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is hardly just to this House in the remarks he made at the opening, when he talked about introducing this measure or bringing it to the attention of a non-sympathetic House.

Mr. CHARLTON. I hope so.

Mr. CRAIG. And that he is looked on as a crank for bringing this matter up over and over again, and that the circumstances are very depressing when he does bring it to the notice of the House, and that the Bill has received scant consideration. I wish to say that if the hon. gentleman is considered by any members of this House or people in this country as a crank for bringing this measure before the House, it is not on account of the measure itself, but it might be on account of the manner in which he introduces it, because I think sometimes that the speeches which the hon. gentleman has made in support of his Bill were not calculated to promote it as much as a very simple statement would be. No doubt, a great many speeches are made in this House for the benefit of the country; and as I listened to the hon. gentleman to-night and on previous occasions in introducing this Bill, I thought he was not talking to the members at all, but to the country.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I have never been so fortunate as to get a good report for the presenting of my remarks to the country.

Mr. CRAIG. I may say that while apparently a Bill of this nature does not excite the interest that a debate on such a measure as the Yukon Railway would, it is not because the members of this House, on either side, do not take an interest in this question. I would not do any member of this House the injustice of saying that he has not as much interest in the observance of the Sabbath as I have. As regards the hon. gentleman's complaint of scant consideration, over and over again a great deal of time has been spent in considering, not this Bill, but a longer Bill brought to the attention of the House, and I have always found, as no doubt we will now, that the great trouble about a Bill of this kind is to make it workable. It is more easy to have a desire that the Lord's Day shall be observed by everybody as a day of rest than to devise a law which shall apply to every part of this Dominion, without doing some injustice to some one. I agree with the hon. gentleman that this is an important question, though I cannot say that I concur in what he has said about the present condition of literature—that all the great poets have departed and none are living to-day, and that we shall have no more historians because of the Sunday newspapers. As the hon. gentleman was talking about poets, I was congrtulating myself that in this country at least we have a poet in the person of the Hon. George W. Ross, who has made himself illustrious by some poems, and I hope the Sunday newspaper will not come into this country and have the effect of depriving us of some of his outpourings.

I have talked with some authorities in this House on this question, and have been told that this is a matter especially for the provincial parliaments, and I was thinking it might not be out of the way for the hon. member for North Norfolk to have an interview with the Premier of Ontario (Mr. Hardy), and try his persuasive powers on that gentleman.

We remember that not long ago Mr. Hardy introduced a Bill in the provincial legislature at the request of those who, like the hon. member for North Norfolk himself, are strongly in favour of Sunday observance; but for some reason, on account of some pressure, this Bill was withdrawn at the last moment. I think if the hon. member for North Norfolk would stop talking to the country or to the members of this House and would just go to Toronto and talk with Mr. Hardy and use his influence with that gentleman, he would do more good than he is doing here. I believe from what I have learned that this matter is entirely a matter for the provincial legislatures. I do not pretend to be an authority on constitutional law, but I am sure if I gave my authority the hon. gentleman himself would say it was a good one. A gentleman who stands very high in the country, who used to be a member of this House, but is now a member of the Senate, told me on one occasion when I asked his opinion on these Bills, that they were matters for the provincial legislatures and not for this Parliament. I have noticed in the discussions on this Bill on previous sessions that while we may make a Bill that would work well in Ontario, it seemed to be impossible to make one that would work in Ontario and in British Columbia and in Quebec as well. If that is the case, why should we in this House not leave these matters to the provincial parliaments? They are representatives of the people quite as much as we are, and the matter is one that concerns them more directly than it concerns us, and is within their jurisdiction. If we find it so difficult to make a law here, I think the hon. gentleman should resign the position he has taken upon himself of advocating this measure every session and bring the matter before the attention of his friends in the Ontario legislature, and as to the other provinces, leave it to the governments of those several provinces. Before I sit down, I wish to remark upon one peculiar thing in this Bill. I notice that beginning at line 18, it says:

Provided that the publishing or issuing or preparing for publication or issue of any copy or number of a religious newspaper for distribution on Sunday, or with the intent that it shall be distributed on Sunday, shall not be an offence under this section.

I would not be in favour of making an exception of parties who prepare for publication or issue a religious newspaper on Sunday. I do not think that would be promoting Sabbath observance. I am opposed to printing newspapers on the Sabbath, whether religious or not, or whether to be given away or not. It might be an easy matter to make a newspaper a religious paper within the meaning of this section by printing a sermon of Talmage, which we find in many papers, and as to giving away papers, that can easily be done, where the receipts from advertising are sufficient. That clause, to my mind, is a very imperfect clause. I believe in the principle of this Bill; I believe Sunday newspapers are unnecessary; and if a workable Bill can be framed here and if we have the jurisdiction, I would be in favour of the measure. But I wish to say again that the hon. member for North Norfolk does great injustice to the entire membership of this House by trying to give the impression to the country that he, almost alone, stands in this House advocating Sunday observance measures, while all the other members are opposed to such measures or have no interest in the observance of the Lord's Day. While a great many members of this House say nothing on the question, I believe they take as much interest in it as the hon. member for North Norfolk. I am satisfied that if we have jurisdiction and if a workable Bill can be framed, hon. members will support it. I know that the hon. member for North Norfolk has sometimes been laughed at on account of the kind of speeches he has made, as they add little relevancy to the measure. They were essays on Sabbath observance and morals, but did not particularly relate to the subject before the House. I myself can bear testimony to the fact that any measure of this kind or any measure which is in the interest of the people always receives the attention, and the sympathetic attention, not of one or two members only but of all the members of the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I must say I have been disappointed at the introductory remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Craig) who has just resumed his seat. I do not think he has shown the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) the courtesy he has deserved at the hands of every well meaning man in the House who desires to see brought about reforms that we know are necessary, who desires to see the sacredness of the Lord's Day observed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) I have been informed, occupies now and then, a sacred desk, and lectures the people on their way of living; and yet, instead of encouraging the hon. member for North Norfolk in the course he has taken, for purely party purposes and to meet party exigencies, he rises and tells the hon. member—

Mr. CRAIG. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether it is right for the hon. member to impute motives to me.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am afraid that the hon. member (Mr. McMullen) is going a little too far.

Mr. CRAIG. I just want to say that I have no thought of party in the matter—not the least.

Mr. McMULLEN. Though I felt justified by the course the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) has taken in making the remark I did, as it is not in accordance with parliamentary rule, I shall not persist along this line.

Mr. CRAIG. Judge not.

Mr. McMULLEN. No ; I think the hon. member (Mr. Craig) would have gained the respect of the people outside the House—and that is what he says the hon. member for North Norfolk is seeking—had he not attempted to belittle the praiseworthy efforts the hon. member for North Norfolk has made, session after session, in this House on behalf of this Bill. We all know that we are living alongside a populous nation that is unquestionably suffering because of the open desecration of the Lord's Day. And as the hon. member for North Norfolk has said the condition of things in the United States grows worse rather than better. Sunday newspapers are sold at the church doors giving a record of the transactions of the week, the markets, sports, amusements of all kinds, causing great demoralization throughout the country. I do think that it is our duty to benefit from the lesson that their experience teaches ; and I give the hon. member for North Norfolk praise for the noble efforts he has made, session after session, to preserve this country from the same influences that are causing so much injury in the neighbouring nation. Now my hon. friend (Mr. Craig) says that he thinks the local legislature is the proper place to introduce a Bill of this kind. It may be. I do not know whether the jurisdiction of two parliaments has been so clearly and well defined as to show whether a Bill of this kind comes within the duty of the local legislature or within the duty of this Parliament. Certainly the power must rest somewhere, and if this House can legislate, it is quite right that it should be called upon to do so, and the hon. member for North Norfolk is quite in his place in introducing this Bill and pressing it upon the consideration of the House from session to session. When we approach the consideration of a great moral question of this kind, I did hope to see on both sides of the House a spirit of true patriotism and an honest desire to safeguard and improve the morals and the general condition and Christian standing of our people. I think we should not permit ourselves to get into a petty spirit of partyism in discussing these questions ; we should do it on broad lines and in the best interests of the people. I did not intend to say anything on this question ; I have spoken on it before. I want simply to say now that I am in hearty accord with the hon. member for North Norfolk in the course he has taken, and I was exceedingly sorry to hear the remarks of the hon. gentleman who last took his seat. I thought, indeed, they were in very bad taste on his part.

Mr. MACLEAN. I think I can say that I am as much in favour of the moral code as the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill. I think I am as much in favour of upholding the teachings of Christianity generally as the hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill ; but, Mr. Speaker, I think we can enforce those principles much better than by using the Criminal Code to enforce them in this country. You do not promote Christianity, you do not promote morality, by putting in the Criminal Code any trifling violation of the moral law. My hon. friend ought rather to adopt sunny methods, if he wishes to promote things of that kind. But simply to cover them with the Criminal Code, and to bring every one within the scope of that code, is, to my mind, the least effectual way of promoting the morals of the people. The hon. gentleman's speech has been—why ? Nothing but a mass of false reasons. He has mixed up his major and minor premises, and in every case his conclusion was wrong. He says, that the production of a Sunday newspaper is an evil, and he proposes to interfere with the production of Sunday newspapers and to make that a crime. Sir, to my mind, it is the reading of Sunday newspapers that is a crime, if anything in that connection is a crime. It is the people who read the Sunday newspapers and who are becoming demoralized by that reading, who ought to be corrected and who ought to be brought within the scope of the Criminal Code. If it is bad to read a newspaper on Sunday, or a newspaper produced on Sunday, a fortiori, it is bad to read these newspapers produced through six days of the week. Surely, if a newspaper is bad one day, it must be bad all days. When the Sunday car battle was fought out in Toronto, the argument finally resolved itself into that shape. A man who denied people their Sunday cars, who said it was immoral, that it led people to beer gardens and all that kind of thing, when he was asked to prove it, could not prove it, because, if its true of the Sunday car or the Sunday newspaper, it is also true of the week-day car and of the week-day newspaper. The newspapers are the production of the people. The press does not make the people, but I contend that the people make the press ; and if the people of the United States are demoralized to-day, it is not because of their newspapers, but the newspapers are demoralized by the people who read them. Now, I am not going to question the good faith of the hon. gentleman in this matter, but it is a very peculiar thing that he is constantly championing American institutions and of people who have American interests of one kind or another. I can appeal to the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary), I can appeal to all the hon. gentlemen who represent constituencies anywhere between the Niagara frontiers and Detroit, and the city of Toronto, if it is not a fact that there is a growing increase in the circulation of American Sunday papers in all Ontario, west of Toronto. They come in there on Sunday by the Sunday trains, and they are distributed at all the stations, and the people are reading them. I do not wish to misconstrue the hon. gentleman's intention in this matter, but judging by his past, I believe that this is an argument of his to advance the sale of American Sunday newspapers in the province of Ontario.

Mr. CHARLTON. Would not this law put an end to that evil?

Mr. MACLEAN. No, law will not reach that evil, and I do not see how he can frame any law that will reach the evil. Now, speaking of law, what are the facts? I believe the Minister of Justice, in the other House, will tell the hon. gentleman, he will tell the Senate, if it ever reaches that body, that this Parliament is not the place to deal with this question, but that the provincial legislatures are the proper places to deal with this question. But the provincial legislatures have found that they have gone too far on this Sunday question. Even in Puritan Ontario, if I must so characterize my native province, they have found they have gone too far. When Mr. Hardy attempted to make a more stringent Sunday law, some months ago, he was waited upon by the most representative delegation that ever came to the parliament building at Toronto, to protest against a too stringent Sunday law. I can appeal to my hon. friends who come from the province of Quebec, to say whether they want this legislature to dictate to them what should be their Sabbath observance in that province. I believe the members from Quebec, and the people of Quebec, think that they are in every sense competent to deal with this question in their own province. I can also appeal to my hon. friends from British Columbia, if it is not a fact that they would prefer to deal with this question in that province themselves. Now, in British Columbia they do have Sunday newspapers, they have papers there printed on Sunday morning to avoid printing them on Monday morning, and I give the people of that province credit for really observing the moral law in that respect; because it is the Monday paper that violates the Sunday law. A Sunday paper is produced on Saturday by Saturday night work, the only Sunday connection with it is the distribution on Sunday morning, and if there is any evil in connection with it, it is in reading the paper during Sunday. It is the people that the hon. gentleman ought to try and reach, and not the party who distributes the paper. But the Monday morning paper is produced by Sunday labour, by the labour of writers, by the labour of reporters, by the labour of printers and pressmen, on Sunday; and if you really wish to uphold the moral law, if you really wish to give every man his Sunday day of rest, you ought to prohibit the publication of Monday morning papers. In that way alone can you reach the object the hon. gentleman has in view. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to say much more on this subject. It is rather painful to have to stand up here and to vindicate the civil rights and civil liberties of the people of this country, because my action in this matter may be entirely misconstrued. The hon. gentleman says he is trying to protect the civil rights of the people. I say I am standing up for the civil liberties of the people of this country in resisting the endeavour of the hon. gentleman. I give the hon. gentleman credit for being honest in the desire to bring the people of this country within the scope of the Criminal Code, but I say he is going about it in the wrong way. If he really desires to effect a reform in this way, if he desires to respect the constitution of this country, if he desires to respect the opinion of the people in their capacity as citizens of a province, he will not attempt to override what are really their constitutional privileges, but he will go to the province of Ontario, for instance, where he can succeed, if anywhere. But I tell him, that the attempt was made a few weeks ago to introduce an over-stringent law in the province of Ontario, and it failed ignominiously. I shall have no hesitation in voting against the Bill of the hon. gentleman, because I believe it is wrong in principle, it is a violation of our constitutional privileges, and it will not effect any good purpose, by reason of the fact that it makes something a crime which ought never to be constituted a crime.

The PRIME MINISTER. Whatever may be the merit of the Bill, my hon. friend who introduced it will be the first to admit that it has certainly not the merit of novelty. My hon. friend has been most persistent during the last ten years or so in bringing a similar measure to the attention of the House session after session. The Bill has been constantly amended from year to year, and now it is very different from what it was when the hon. gentleman first introduced it. My hon. friend has been charged not exactly with playing to the gallery, but with speaking to the country. I do not know that this is a crime on the floor of Parliament; and perhaps if I were to put a question to the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) himself, I would ask him if he would be the first man to cast the stone at my hon. friend for speaking to the country. I presume he will admit he would not be the only hon. member, for I suppose we all would admit that when we rise in this House we are, more or less, talking to the country, and when the benches are empty, as they are at the present time, if we did not talk to the country it would be scarcely worth while talking at all. My hon. friend will admit, I am sure, that the Bill, such as it is now, is one which is not all devoid of merit, let whatever may be the views hon. gentlemen hold, whether peculiar views or not, as to Sunday observance. The Bill is restricted to a single feature, and one alone, and it is, as now presented to the House, simply to prevent the selling of newspapers on the Lord's day—that is to say, to prevent little boys going about the streets of a city and peddling their newspapers as they do on week days. That is the only question now dealt with by the hon. gentleman in introducing this Bill. It is not a question whether Sunday newspapers are good or bad. If I were to speak my own mind I would say there are newspapers that are not good to read on week days, not to speak of Sunday—and I do not mean to be personal in making that statement; but every day of my life I read newspapers which I think I would have been just as well off not to have read, nevertheless it is part of my business to read them. The question is not whether or not the papers issued on Sunday are of the class styled "yellow papers" or not. The question is simply whether the sale of newspapers on Sunday should be allowed any more than the sale of anything else on Sunday. According to the laws which prevail in all Christian nations, and among others in this nation, the sale of anything is prohibited on the Lord's Day. The same feature is introduced into this Bill, and the sale of newspapers is made an offence the same as the sale of anything else on the Lord's Day. It may be said, and said with some truth, that this is hardly a question which comes within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. For my part I think there is great force in this contention, and if I were to express my own personal view I would not hesitate to say that this is a question that had better be relegated to the provinces, there to be dealt with. But a year or so ago this question was brought before the House. Since I have taken the position I now occupy, I have thought it advisable on a question of this kind to follow the precedent laid down by Sir John Thompson. Sir John Thompson was an eminent authority, as eminent an authority as we ever had on these matters, and he thought it advisable when a similar measure was introduced to adopt the principle of the Bill; and he adopted the principle, that the criminal code could be amended so as to bring the selling of newspapers on Sunday within the provisions of the criminal law. I thought the House should act on the doctrine laid down by this eminent authority, and that is the reason why I am prepared to adopt this measure, otherwise not. But the House having decided three or four years ago, on the suggestion of Sir John Thompson, to adopt the principle of the Bill, I do not see why we should go back on the record we have established in regard to this Bill. That is the only reason why I support it. I wish to call the attention of the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) to the fact that he objects to the very provision which I think makes this Bill acceptable. My hon. friend, if I understood him correctly, took objection to this provision:

Provided that the publishing or issuing or preparing for publication, or issue of any copy or number of a religious newspaper for distribution on Sunday, or with the intent that it shall be distributed on Sunday, shall not be an offence under this section.

I think this provision should be in any such legislation as is proposed, because we know, whatever may be the views we entertain in regard to the observance of the Lord's Day, that in our age and under the conditions of our present civilization, every one expects to have his newspaper on his breakfast table on Monday morning, and he cannot have his newspaper on Monday morning unless work is done some time during the Sabbath. All newspapers published in the civilized world are obliged to open their doors some time during the evening of the Lord's Day; and this provision is introduced to protect them and to prevent this act being made an offence.

Mr. HUGHES. No.

The PRIME MINISTER. If not framed in this way, the section ought to be so framed. I do not conceive that this Bill is to restrict the sale of the Sunday newspaper, I do not know any definition of the Sunday newspaper; but I would take out the word "Sunday," and make it applicable to all newspapers sold on Sunday. Surely the hon. gentleman does not pretend that the fact that the newspaper publisher is obliged to open his workshop on Sunday evening in order to issue his paper on Monday, should constitute an offence.

Mr. HUGHES. I believe in the greatest freedom in this matter.

The PRIME MINISTER. For my part I agree with the principle of the Bill, that freedom should not involve the sale of newspapers on Sunday. I think the sale should be restricted as is provided in the Bill, but the preparation of the newspaper for Monday morning should not be prohibited. This is the view I take of this legislation, and if it is not so, the Bill should be amended in committee so as to make it possible that newspapers could be issued on Monday, but prohibit the sale of newspapers on Sunday. If the Bill goes into committee, I hold it should be amended in that way. This is a measure on which the Government have no opinion, and I simply express my own view of the matter.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I do not desire to present anything in the nature of an argument in favour of the Bill, but I rise simply for the purpose of stating that I am entirely in accord with my hon. friend who has presented this measure to the House. The arguments in its favour I apprehend have been fully and ably presented by my hon. friend. The question of what may or may not be done on Sunday, such as the running of street cars and similar occurrences, has given rise in the Dominion and elsewhere to very lengthy discussions, and having followed these discussions pretty carefully from time to time, whatever arguments may have been presented in favour of other things. I have never seen any reasonable argument advanced in favour of the publishing of Sunday newspapers; and because I think the press of Canada at the present time, with all its faults, is a press of which Canadians have reason to be proud. I hold we should do whatever is possible to preserve and improve its high status, I have much pleasure in giving my support to the Bill. So far as regards the legal aspect, I have no doubt the provisions of the Bill are substantially within the power of Parliament to pass. Whether we should exercise the power is entirely a different question from the question whether we possess the power. No doubt we possess the power in this Parliament to declare that the publishing of Sunday newspapers shall be considered an offence against the criminal code. For my part I am in favour of that declaration being made. I therefore have very much pleasure in expressing my support of the Bill.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I am not quite as confident as is my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) in regard to the existence of a law which justifies the sale of newspapers on Sunday. If, as a matter of fact, it is a violation of the law to sell any of the articles mentioned by the First Minister—and undoubtedly it is a violation of the law to do that—then it is a violation of the law to sell a newspaper. Does any member of this House, whether he be a lawyer or a layman pretend, that you cannot sell a bushel of potatoes or a bushel of corn on Sunday, but you can sell any number of newspapers. Why amend the law at all and why not leave the vendor of newspapers in the same category as others who violate the Lord's Day. I am not justifying any one who undertakes to sell newspapers on Sunday, but on the contrary I say that the vendor of newspapers on Sunday should be punished just as well as the vendor of any other commodity. I do not see why newspaper publishers or newspaper vendors should have the right to violate the Lord's Day Act any more than any other class of people.

Mr. MACLEAN. They are always fined in Ontario if they violate the law. In that province we have a sufficient law to cover the case, and they have never violated the Lord's Day Act by selling newspapers on Sunday without their being punished for it. They were punished and they gave it up.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The First Minister is quite right when he says there should be no difference made between the preparation for the issue of the Sunday secular newspaper and any other newspaper. There is no definition in the law which would point out a distinction between a religious newspaper and a secular newspaper. To my mind this whole legislation is unnecessary. I believe the law as it is now provides amply for every remedy that is required in every possible respect, and with regard to the question of jurisdiction, I am not so confident as the Minister of the Interior, as to the jurisdiction of this Parliament to go one step in this direction. We have the right to declare here what shall be a crime; we have the right to say that something heretofore considered not a crime shall be considered as a crime for the future; but I say that this legislation is not necessary, because the object of the promoter of the Bill has in view, viz., to punish vendors of newspapers, is now an offence. Hence it is that whilst I have no objection whatever to any amendment of the law which would make that position any clearer, I really do not see where the necessity for any legislation comes in upon this subject.

Mr. HUGHES. I was not in the House when the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) moved the first reading of this Bill, but I have heard his speech on other occasions and I presume his arguments to-night were nearly the same. I have failed to hear from him, and I have failed to hear from the lips of any one in the Dominion of Canada, that there is any demand for such a law as this. I have travelled over this country a great deal on Sundays, and I presume that newspapers and books will always be sold in book stalls and hotels just the same as chewing gum and candies. No law which the hon. gentleman may enact will prevent that going on. As the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) has pointed out, there has been no violation of this law proved to the House. In every city in the Dominion of Canada, fruit and cigar stores are open on Sundays and there is no attempt to punish these people because it is looked upon as an ordinary custom and as something that is not immoral. In many places even provision stores are open, and yet my worthy friend (Mr. Charlton) does not seek to enforce the law which I presume is on the Statute-book against the selling of candies and groceries on Sunday. The sale of newspapers on Sunday is amply covered by the provincial laws as they stand at the present time. The hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) pointed out one most important matter, and that is, that under the Bill as it now stands, the sale of Yankee newspapers on the railways and in hotels is not proscribed. It reaches only Canadian newspapers. There is another respect in which I consider the Bill is misleading. If it is wrong to set type for the Toronto "World," or the "Globe," or the "Mail" on Sunday, it is equally wrong to set type for the "Christian Guardian." It does not make one particle of difference to the man who sets the type whether it is a religious newspaper or not, and if it is an immoral act in one instance it is equally an immoral act in the other. This Bill is an attempt to legislate people into being moral, and the history of the world has shown that that is an absolute impossibility.

Mr. SPROULE. If there is no law at present which accomplishes the object of this Bill, I cannot see any reason in the world why we should not put one on the Statute-book. It has been said over and over again in this House that the law already reaches the offence of selling newspapers on Sunday and provides a punishment therefor, and if that be the case I can see no necessity for duplicating the enactment because that only results in confusion. If it be not the case, then so far as my judgment goes this Bill is unobjectionable. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) has introduced his measure for a great many years, and he has narrowed it down from year to year until it is confined solely to one subject to-day. It is very plain and very simple. It may be that some other law specifies penalties for the same offence, and if it does so conflict there is no object in the Bill, but if there is no other law for this purpose then there can be no objection to its passing. I thought last year and the year before, that since we were honoured by the presence of two reverend gentlemen in this House we would have some expression of opinion from them on this subject. I have patiently waited to hear their views but up to the present time they have not given us an opportunity of listening to them. We ought to hear from these reverend members, because if there is one subject more than another upon which they ought to speak with some degree of responsibility and authority it would be upon a moral question of this nature. We would like to know where these reverend gentlemen stand upon this question, and I think the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and the public would like to know what are their opinions. We would like to know whether their introduction into the political arena has been sufficient to silence them on the great and highly moral questions which arise in this country.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As the seconder of this Bill, I would like to say a word with regard to it. It seems to me that the argument of the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) is not absolutely sound. If there is any doubt with regard to the law on this subject, then I think the Bill introduced by my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is an eminently proper one. The law should be clearly defined. With respect to the sale of American Sunday newspapers throughout Canada, I think such legislation as is here proposed would be right in line. If the prohibition of the sale of these newspapers throughout the Dominion could be secured, I think it would be an excellent thing, because hon. gentlemen who read these papers know they are very sensational indeed, and not such literature as should be distributed among the people generally. In the Canadian Saturday papers care is taken by the publishers to insert a quantity of matter fit for Sunday reading, so that those who choose to purchase these papers can have their Sunday reading. But Sunday newspapers should not be allowed to be sold by boys running about the streets and calling out their sale. With regard to manual labour on the Sabbath, apart from moral grounds, I think it is an excellent thing physically that every man should rest one day out of seven; and in the name of those compositors and others who make the newspapers, I would enter a plea that they should receive at least one day's rest in seven. It is on these grounds briefly stated, that I second the motion for the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. BRITTON. I give credit to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), not only for his perseverance in presenting this Bill or a similar Bill to the House, but also for the able manner in which he has presented it. I am as much opposed as any man in the House to the selling of Sunday newspapers; but I must confess that being now somewhat advanced, at all events in years, and having had considerable to do with trying to interpret the statutes during a large part of my life, I do not feel as clear as some hon. gentlemen do on this question of jurisdiction. It has been already settled by the highest court of the realm that the Dominion Parliament may exercise jurisdiction over certain subjects over which there is perhaps jurisdiction on the part of provincial legislatures, in cases in which the provinces have not exercised that jurisdiction. It may be that this is one of those cases as to some of the provinces and that it is quite within the province of the Dominion Parliament to amend the Criminal Code and make it applicable. But I have found it difficult to know what is the law which only one Parliament has attempted to deal with; and if the two Parliaments, both the provincial and the Dominion, propose to legislate on the same lines, the difficulty will be doubly increased. In the province of Ontario—and I suppose that if that province has the right to legislate in such matters the other provinces have the same right—we have the Act, chapter 203 of the Revised Statutes, which seems to me to apply to this case. A very clever lawyer might possibly find some difficulty in applying the first section of that Act to the publication of a Sunday newspaper. Still, it comes within the meaning of the words of that section, and also of a subsequent section. Section 1 provides :

It is not lawful for any merchant, tradesman, artificer, mechanic, workman, labourer, or other person whatsoever on the Lord's Day, to sell, or publicly show forth, or expose, or offer for sale, or to purchase, any goods, chattels, or other personal property.

The first point in the interpretation of this section that has arisen refers to the class of persons who are offering things for sale. It has been decided that as only certain trades or classes of persons have been mentioned, therefore the words, "or other person" whatsoever applies only to persons of the same character. The rule of ejusdem generis is claimed to be applicable to such cases, and it may be difficult to apply this section to the sale of newspapers on Sunday. However, it is because of the assumed jurisdiction of the province to deal with this subject that it seems to me objectionable on the part of the Dominion to attempt to do so also; because if any difficulty has arisen from what I have mentioned, the way to correct that difficulty is to amend the statute. The province, having dealt with the subject in so far as it has by the words I have read, can deal with it in the larger way to cover a case of the kind in question. If the courts have acted, as the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) has said—if they have dealt with cases involving the sale of newspapers on Sunday, there is the more point to what I have said with regard to the interpretation of section 1. As I have said before, I am in sympathy with the purpose of the hon. mover of this Bill; but my difficulty as to whether this is the right way of accomplishing it makes me hesitate about supporting the Bill. There will certainly be a difficulty in enforcing this Bill. There is a great deal of force in what hon. members who have preceded me have said with reference to work on Sunday. The provincial statute is very clear in prohibiting any person from engaging in his ordinary work on that day. With regard to the work that is engaged in every Sunday in the preparation of the papers for Monday, suppose this Bill passes, does it after all meet the difficulty, except in the narrowest sense of prohibiting the sale on the streets, in hotels, at railway stations or in the cars? Will it stop the reading of newspapers on Sunday? Will it stop the reading of newspapers prepared on Saturday specially for

Mr. BRITTON.

Sunday reading? That cannot be prevented, and if not, we are going to have the evil without the remedy. Again, the Bill makes an exception of religious newspapers. I think there ought to be an interpretation clause defining what religious newspapers are. I could understand that denominational papers, which are presumed to be religious, might be excepted; but any paper might, in the view of the person who issued it, and in the view of many other persons, be called a religious newspaper for the purpose of evading this law. I do not know who would interpret that term, to say whether a person was guilty of a criminal offence or not. To summarize my objections, if we pass this law to amend the Criminal Code, we place it side by side with the Ontario statute dealing with similar offences, and we have a possible conflict of two statutes in regard to one particular thing.

That is a difficulty that we ought not, with our eyes open at all events, to get into. We ought to hesitate before passing a law the enforcement of which will be so full of difficulty. I say this without any fear of being challenged as to the honest desire, not only of myself, but, I believe, of the gentlemen who have spoken on the other side, and of a great many people in the community who have expressed their opinions on this subject.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I thoroughly endorse the principle that we should have in this country one day of rest in the week, and there is no doubt that the publishing of Sunday newspapers interferes considerably with the enjoyment of that day of rest. For this reason I am quite disposed to support the provisions of this Bill, but there are one or two points in which I would like to see it changed somewhat before it becomes law. In the first place, I do not think that this Bill is necessary in the province of Quebec. It may be necessary in Ontario, the province from which my hon. friend comes, it may be that that province is not so Sabbath-keeping as the province of Quebec; but in the province of Quebec we have a law in our revised statutes which absolutely prohibits any storekeeper, hawker, or anybody else, from selling any goods, wares or merchandise on the Sunday under a penalty not exceeding $20 for the first offence, and not less than $20 or more than $40 for each subsequent offence. Therefore, I don't think that my hon. friend's Bill is necessary, so far as the province of Quebec is concerned. But if it be necessary for any other parts of the Dominion, I shall be very glad to see that the law of Sabbath observance is rendered as strict as possible. But I would point out that paragraph A of the Bill, which reads as follows:—

Being the proprietor, publisher or manager of any newspaper, publishes or issues, or prepares for publication or issue, any copy or number of such newspaper for sale on Sunday, or with the intent that such copy or number shall be sold on Sunday, or sells or employs or procures any person to sell any newspaper on Sunday—does not prohibit the sale in Canada of Sunday newspapers published elsewhere on Sunday. I listened with great attention to the graphic description of the hon. member for North Norfolk—the correctness of which description I can fully endorse—of the low and debasing character of the Sunday newspapers published in the United States; and if any law is to be passed dealing with this matter, I would like to see incorporated in it a provision to prohibit the sale of such newspapers here. By that means we would protect our people from many of the evils my hon. friend so graphically depicts.

I would further point out that the provision exempting religious newspapers from the operation of this Act will interfere with the observance of the Sunday as a day of rest. Certainly, if we are to have a day of rest for those employed in the publishing of newspapers, it ought to apply to all newspapers, both of religious and secular character, and I cannot, therefore, endorse this section. The chief object to be attained is the prevention of any public disturbance of the Sabbath as a day of rest, and that is done by preventing the publishing and selling of newspapers on that day. We also want to obtain twenty-four hours' rest in the week for every employee and labourer. It is true, that a paper issued on Monday morning requires a certain amount of work to be done between midnight on Saturday and midnight on Sunday, and to that extent infringes on the Sabbath Day. But you must remember that if those employees have to work on Sunday evening for a few hours, preparing their Monday morning issue, they are not employed on Saturday in preparing for a Sunday morning issue; and consequently, if they do not have all the Sunday, they have their full twenty-four hours of rest in the course of the week. The contention that a Monday morning paper really involves as much Sunday work as a Sunday morning issue, or more, is not pertinent to the question. Although it is true, that during a few hours of the Sabbath the men employed on a newspaper are at work, they have a compensating rest on the Saturday evening, and their labour of the Sunday is not public and does not in any way interfere with the strict observance of the Sabbath Day by the public generally. I think therefore, it is not necessary that we should discuss the publishing of a newspaper on a Monday morning. With the two changes I have pointed out, I fairly endorse the principle of the Bill.

Mr. CLANCY. Before we legislate in this House, there ought to be some great public need for legislation. I had not the pleasure of listening to the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill, but I have learned since that he did not point out that immoral literature was being sold and published in the Dominion, and therefore I am at a loss to understand the object of his measure. Unless some object of that kind is to be attained, will it not be idle to load up our statutes with legislation which properly comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces? We had rather a strange spectacle, a moment ago, when we had the First Minister saying he had no opinion on the subject, and then the Minister of Agriculture stated that such a Bill was not required for the province of Quebec, though it might be for the province of Ontario. But in Ontario we are fully empowered to deal with matters of this kind, and therefore I see no reason why they should be dragged into this House simply to give an hon. gentleman a cheap advertisement from one end of the country to the other. I am not going to charge the hon. gentleman with being unduly anxious to appear before the public as an apostle of light, but I do object to his taking charge of the morals of the House and assuming the attitude that he alone is anxious to purify and protect the morals of the people. The role has been played with much less success than the hon. gentleman's efforts deserve, but unless he is prepared to show that the province of Ontario has not the authority to deal with such matters, or that that province has overlooked, by design or otherwise, this great public want, I do not see how he can ask us, even admitting we have concurrent powers, to place such legislation on our statutes. I do not agree with the right hon. First Minister, that because a very eminent authority in this House, a few years ago, was prepared to admit the principle of such legislation, we are bound to pass it when there is no necessity. Suppose we should place an Act on the statutes which the hon. gentleman desires, if it were a question affecting the rights of the provinces, we would at once find them disputing our right to pass such legislation; and since it is a kind of legislation which neither the Dominion nor any province may be disposed to urge very strongly, it does seem to me that we ought not to pass it. We will simply be creating a crime where none exists. There are many crimes that are only such because created by statute, and if we load our statutes with crimes that are in themselves not moral offences, we are simply making laws which the people will not observe.

People may be very much better employed than in reading newspapers on Sunday; but I would ask the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill if he would go so far as to prohibit the people from reading anything but religious newspapers on Sunday. I venture to say that for such a law as this you must wait for the advance of public opinion; and if you put upon the Statute-book legislation that is not sanctioned by that advance in public opinion, you have no means of enforcing such law. Legislation of that kind, I contend is most harmful. Unless the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) is prepared to point out that there is a public demand for this law and that there is a class of newspapers being distributed that should not be distributed Sunday or Monday, that would justify the restraint on the part of the province—a power that has been used in Ontario, as pointed out by the hon. member for Kingston—this Bill should not receive the sanction of the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. If I may be permitted, I should like to say a few words before the House is called upon to act upon this measure. With regard to the objections raised by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), I freely concede the force of those objections, providing that the Bill is as the hon. gentleman supposes. I think, however, that so far as concerns the sale of public newspapers in Canada on Sunday, the Bill would prevent that. Sub-section B makes liable any person who :

(b.) Sells or employs or procures any person to sell any newspaper on Sunday.

This section is universal and applies to foreign newspapers.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It prohibits the sale on Sunday, but not the sale of newspapers published elsewhere on Sunday.

Mr. CHARLTON. But it prevents the sale of these newspapers anywhere in Canada on Sunday.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Does not the present law meet that case ?

Mr. CHARLTON. Not all over the Dominion. With regard to the circulation of religious newspapers, the objection was raised on one occasion when this Bill was under discussion that in Sunday schools and churches, Sunday journals and religious reading for children were distributed gratuitously, and the Bill as it previously stood which would render that contrary to the provisions of the law. This Bill, when it is referred to committee, if it reaches that stage, can be amended, and defects of that kind, if any are found can be treated by the House in the proper way, and the Bill put in proper shape if it is found not to be so. With regard to the questions of jurisdiction, that matter has been discussed frequently on the floor of the House. As the right hon. the Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) stated, one of the highest judicial authorities in Canada, the late Sir John Thompson, pronounced this Bill intra vires, and also pronounced it a proper Bill to pass—gave it his sanction and support—on the ground that, although there might be enactments in some of the provinces that would partially or wholly deal with the evil, it was a measure of a character that made it desirable to have it universal in its application in the Dominion. The Dominion Government has jurisdiction in the matter of the importation of literature in the matter of copyright, in the matter of the transmission of literature through the mails; and for various reasons it was felt to be a proper exercise of what was unquestionably constitutional power, to deal with this matter in this House. Of course it is a matter for the judgment of the House whether it is proper to exercise that power or not, but the existence of the power is beyond question. The highest judicial authorities in the Dominion have declared this House quite competent to pronounce any act whatever a criminal act and make a criminal act of it. While I am on my feet, I wish to say a word with regard to a remark made by the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig). I certainly was not desirous of doing or conscious of having done injustice to any of my fellow members. Nothing was further from my intention. If I have been guilty of anything that was not perfectly fair and proper in the statements I have made with regard to the attitude of the House toward this measure as manifested at various times, I regret it. There have been occasions when this Bill was slaughtered without any record of votes, and afterwards restored to the Order paper when a record of the votes were kept. I suppose these things have unconsciously to myself left an impression on my mind that the actual bottom attitude of the House with regard to this measure was not one of unqualified approbation. I am willing to believe that the great majority of this House—for this is a new House—are favourable to the Bill; and I am willing, if the result of the vote on this measure shows that my hon. friend (Mr. Craig) is correct, to concede that I was wrong and make all proper acknowledgments. My hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) talks of this matter as a trivial offence. It would be beneath the dignity of this House to make a great deal of trouble over a trivial offence. But that which saps the foundation of a country's virtue, demoralizes its populations, debases its literature and brings about a condition of things such as we see in the United States to-day is not a trivial offence, but a gigantic crime against the present and against the future. My anxiety with regard to this thing was not to inflict some injury upon some gentlemen who wanted to publish a Sunday newspaper, nor to seek notoriety by warring against some trivial offence, but to avert from this country an impending calamity, which, if it does fall upon the country, will produce consequences of the most serious character. I hold that in this matter it is not only proper but it is in the highest degree desirable that we should have a uniform rule of practice and a uniform law throughout the Dominion. We have to-day no law on our Statute-book as a Dominion Parliament with reference to this question of the sanctity of the Sabbath. In passing this law we will give our sanction to the propriety of this class of legislation and will proceed to deal as a whole country with a question that affects the whole country, and we shall have a uniform system of procedure and usage with regard to this trouble the introduction of which into this country we seek to avert. I have listened very carefully to the questions raised on the account of jurisdiction. They have been raised before and have been set aside by the highest authorities. Beyond all question the power to deal with this matter is vested in this Parliament, and it is merely a question of expediency and propriety that we have to deal with and we need not trouble ourselves as to the questions of authority.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I move that after paragraph b, there shall be inserted a new heading as paragraph c, with these words: "sells, or employs or procures any person to sell any newspaper issued or published on Sunday."

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Would that imply that it was an offence to sell a newspaper that was published on Sunday?

Mr. CHARLTON. No.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That is the plain English of it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The intention is to provide against the sale of a paper which is published on Sunday.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The inference is that a paper that was published on any other day than Sunday might be sold on Sunday.

Mr. CHARLTON. It cannot be sold on Sunday, and a paper published on Sunday cannot be sold on Monday.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Section b, which I do not interfere with, provides that any person who sells a paper on Sunday is subject to this Act. Then I propose to go on and say that any person who on Sunday sells a newspaper which is published on Sunday, our object being to prevent the issue of a newspaper on Sunday.

Mr. HENDERSON. It seems to me that possibly the Minister is going a little further than he intends. It strikes me that would prohibit the sale of the "Globe" or "Mall" in Toronto, or the Montreal papers, as a part of these papers are made up on Sunday.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is not the intent.

Mr. HENDERSON. I may say with regard to the provisions of the Bill as a whole, that I am in sympathy with it. I desire to say this in answer to some remarks thrown across the House some time ago. It seemed that when an hon. member on this side of the House rose to say anything at all on this Bill, it was almost inferred that he was offering opposition to it.

Mr. CHARLTON. No, no.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think it is scarcely a fair inference. I am quite in sympathy with the provisions of the Bill so long as they are workable, and I intend to support it, whether it comes within the scope of this House to pass this legislation or not. I understand that the Minister of Justice in another House, whilst occupying a seat in this Chamber, said that this House had not jurisdiction to deal with a matter of this kind. As the matter will come before him, no doubt he will give his judgment, and the Senate will be guided by what he says in the matter, and if we are going wrong by passing legislation here which we ought not to pass, no doubt he will stop it in that Chamber, so that there can be no harm on our part in passing the Bill. I intended on the second reading of the Bill to refer to one or two remarks made by the hon. member for North Wellington with regard to some previous remarks of my hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig). I scarcely thought the remarks of the hon. member for North Wellington were called for. I listened carefully to the speech of my hon. friend from East Durham and I am sure he did not throw into the discussion anything of a partisan character. I think it was scarcely fair, in a question of this kind, to attribute to my hon. friend for East Durham a desire to mix up with this question any party spirit. If we are to pass legislation in the matter of morals I think it should be done as much as possible with the sympathy of the whole House, and that nothing should be thrown into the discussion that would tend to alienate support from the measure in any way. I certainly thought that the strictures applied to the hon. member for East Durham were entirely uncalled for. Now, coming back to the amendment of the Minister of Agriculture, I think when he looks carefully at those words, he will discover that he is going so far as to prohibit the sale of a newspaper on any day that is published on Sunday. Perhaps I do not attach the same meaning that he does to the publication of a newspaper on Sunday, but I take it for granted that if a portion of the work, the type setting or any other part of the work of a Monday morning paper is done on Sunday, that may be called publishing the paper.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
No.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, what do you mean by publishing a paper?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
Issuing it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, suppose the press starts at half past eleven o'clock. The boy who sells the newspapers does not know what time the press starts, and the result would be that he might be liable to a penalty because he had sold a newspaper, a portion of which was issued or published on Sunday. We should guard those who are handling the paper who might be taken advantage of innocently, we should be very particular in the legislation we pass that no one should become subject to a penalty innocently.

Mr. MACLEAN. I wish again to raise the constitutional issue. I say this House has no jurisdiction in this matter. Furthermore, we have here a Solicitor General who ought to advise us in these things. We have a Solicitor General who comes from the province of Quebec, and I hope he will be able to tell this House, not only as Solicitor General, but as a citizen of Quebec, whether he thinks the law is necessary, and whether there is such a crime existing in that province which ought to be put down—this crime that exists only in the imagination of the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill. The Minister of Agriculture says it does not exist in the province of Quebec, because they have a law there which punishes the offence if it does exist. In the province of Ontario we already have a law sufficient for the offence. I believe that the offence does not exist in any province in this Dominion, if it exists at all it is only in connection with two newspapers in the province of British Columbia. If that is the case, British Columbia will cure that offence by a law that is suited to the crime, namely, a provincial law.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What about the Sunday "World"?

Mr. MACLEAN. The "Sunday World" does not violate the law of the province of Ontario. I again urge the constitutional issue. I do not believe, as suggested just now, that we should first pass a law and then find out if it is constitutional. Let the Solicitor General demonstrate his usefulness to this country, let him show some value for the large salary he draws, by advising this House, and let us not have to go to the Senate for advice.

An hon. MEMBER. Are you opposed to the Bill?

Mr. MACLEAN. I am opposed to the Bill because it is unconstitutional. I hope we shall have the question settled, and I trust members from the different provinces will express their views; and I challenge the hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill to say whether this offence exists which he wishes to put down. If it does not exist, if the present laws are sufficient to meet the offence, why waste the time of the House when there are much more important measures to occupy its attention. If he wishes to confer some benefits on the people, to improve their status and morality, let him take up some question such as the housing of the poor or the promotion of hygiene, and he will then advance morality and do public good. But at the present time the hon. gentleman is running a tilt against a windmill, and the windmill is of very little importance to the people. There is no such crime existing to-day as the publication of Sunday newspapers, none such as the sale of Sunday newspapers, and therefore hon. members are wasting the time of the people in considering this measure, and I suspect somebody is taking up our attention in order to keep his name before the public as the guardian of the morals of the people of Canada.

Mr. HUGHES. I beg to move:

That all the words after "who" in the 10th line be struck out to "defamatory libel," line 25, and the following be substituted:—"Sells or employs or procures any person to sell any article or commodity on Sunday."

Mr. CHRISTIE. I desire in a word or two to express my hearty approval of the principle of the Bill before the House. I should have been very glad if it had gone very much further, and dealt with the Sabbath desecration that we see existing in other parts of the public service. It is true this evil is not very widespread. I think it has been stated that it has not obtained a foothold; it has obtained a foothold, for even in my own province Sunday newspapers are sold every Lord's Day. Prevention is better than cure, and I hold this Bill is a step in the right direction, and we should endeavour to prevent the spread of this evil. We are all aware that this practice has exercised most baneful and deleterious influence in the United States. The very best minds of the people there have attempted to root out that evil, but have so far failed. I have great sympathy with the Bill, and the only trouble in regard to it is that it does not go far enough; but inasmuch as it is a step in the right direction, I have pleasure in casting my vote for it.

Mr. BEATTIE. While I do not desire the sale of any newspaper published on Sunday, I do not see any reason to prevent the sale of Sunday newspapers on Monday.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
New York papers published on Sunday are sold here on Monday.

Mr. BEATTIE. In the section in which I live we are very much troubled with the sale of American newspapers. They come in over the different lines of railways and are sold in very large quantities on the station platforms at London. That is a practice I should like to stop. The sale of these newspapers is not creating a healthy Canadian feeling, but the reverse.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That evil will be stopped by the Bill. My object in moving the amendment was to stop the sale of newspapers which are issued on Sunday, but which do not come into this country until Monday and are then sold. These papers are of such a character that all hon. members appear to agree that we should prohibit their sale here.

Mr. MACLEAN. Would the hon. gentleman stop the New York "Tribune," published on Sunday from being sold here on Monday.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think I would.

Mr. MACLEAN. Would the hon. gentleman prevent the sale of respectable English or French newspapers that might be published on Sunday?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No doubt there are some respectable newspapers published in the United States or in France, but as the object of this Bill is to prevent the sale of newspapers published on Sunday in this country, it should prevent newspapers containing these objectionable features being introduced in our country from abroad.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would not like to go as far as the Minister of Agriculture, and prevent the sale on Monday of all newspapers printed on Sunday. That would be a very serious matter, and it would lead to enormous difficulties.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I referred to newspapers published on Sunday.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A newspaper might be published in England on Sunday and reach here one or two weeks after, and according to the amendment proposed, a dealer selling such a newspaper would be guilty of an offence. I look at the question in this way. I conceive that the Bill is introduced to prevent the issue and sale in Canada of newspapers published on Sunday, or American newspapers published on Sunday and brought in and sold here on the Sabbath. We do not want to have the sale of newspapers on the Sabbath in this Dominion. There need not be any difficulty in arriving at what a Sunday newspaper is. The Sunday "World," of Toronto, or the Sunday "Sun," of Montreal, in my opinion, would come under the category, and their sale should be stopped.

The paper itself states in its heading whether it is a Sunday paper or not.

Mr. MACLEAN. What about the religious weekly called the "Sunday Observer"?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would not allow the sale of any religious or secular paper on the Sabbath. I understood the object was to prevent the publishing of newspapers on Sunday, so as to ensure to every workman connected with a newspaper one day of rest in seven.

Mr. HUGHES. In speaking to the amendment, the Minister of Agriculture omitted to recognize the fact that there are very many Sunday newspapers in the United States that are essentially first-class newspapers of high moral standing and are even catering to the fantastic tastes in this matter of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I should be very sorry to see those papers shut out on Sunday as well as on Monday. The public should have an opportunity of purchasing on Sunday or Monday such newspapers if they come here and are permitted for sale. The point I wish the committee to consider is this: do we want to sell articles on Sunday? It is not a question of printing a newspaper and selling it, no matter whether it is published on Saturday or Sunday, or whether it is religious or so-called irreligious paper, as some political newspapers are supposed to be, but it is a question as to whether newspapers should be sold here on Sunday.

I would go further. If there is a law on the Statute-book at the present time which prohibits the sale of a bushel of potatoes on Sunday and does not prohibit the sale of a newspaper on Sunday, then the law should be amended so as to prohibit the sale of a newspaper, as well as the bushel of potatoes.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have no law of the kind at all.

Mr. HUGHES. Do you say, we have no law of that kind in Ontario?

Mr. CHARLTON. Not in the Dominion.

Mr. HUGHES. There is such a law in Ontario.

The PRIME MINISTER. We have such a law in the province of Quebec.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not in the Dominion.

Mr. MACLEAN. The Ontario law is against Sunday vending.

Mr. HUGHES. I move the amendment, because I do not wish to see a poor little boy who is trying to earn 5 cents on the streets in catering to the public demands, arrested and punished for selling a newspaper on Sunday, when some gentleman, around the corner, is selling cigars and making his dollars. If it is wrong for the little boy, it is wrong for the cigar-seller and for the seller of everything else.

Mr. MACLEAN. Hear, hear. Railway companies the same.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, just the same with railway companies. If a newspaper cannot be sold on Sunday, it will not be published on Sunday. A traveller coming to Windsor or Sarnia on Sunday from the United States, buys the Toronto papers of Saturday, and whether that paper be published on Saturday or Sunday, if there is any crime at all in the matter, the crime lies in its being sold on Sunday. The Saturday Toronto paper should be prevented being sold on Sunday, just the same as if it were a Sunday paper sold at Sarnia or Windsor. If it is wrong to sell a newspaper on Sunday, it is wrong to sell any other article, and, as my amendment provides against the selling of any article on Sunday, I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) will agree to it.

Mr. FLINT. It seems to me that the promoter of the Bill, as well as other members of the committee, are trying to kill two birds with the one stone in a way that is not very easy to accomplish. There are two objects mixed up in the efforts of the committee to reach a reasonable conclusion. One object, with which I heartily sympathize, is to prevent business transactions with newspapers on the Sabbath Day, and I think the general sense of the committee is in favour of any legislation which will prevent the sale of any journal on Sunday. Another object of the committee, which appears to be generally favoured, with certain exceptions, is, to legislate, if possible, to prevent any work being done upon newspapers on Sunday. With regard to these two objects, the sense of the committee appears to be favourable. It has been pointed out that, on the majority of Monday newspapers, some of the work has to be done late on Sunday night, and with a proviso that such work should not be carried on to too great an extent, it appears to be the general feeling that legislation going that far would be desirable.

My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) has introduced an entirely new question, and one with which I think the committee will feel it difficult to sympathize; because, no matter what may be the denunciation of the hon. member from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) as regards Sunday newspapers in general, yet we must discriminate. There are Sunday newspapers so-called which are bad as literature, and which it might possibly be desirable to discourage by legislation; yet, on the other hand, there are papers issued as Sunday newspapers in the neighbouring republic which are not at all open to that line of criticism. I would be sorry to have the community in which I live deprived of the privilege of buying on Tuesday the editions of the Boston Sunday "Herald" and Boston Sunday "Globe," papers of high literary merit, papers containing articles of the most distinguished writers in the world, and papers to which no objection can be taken because of their moral or literary tone.

Mr. CRAIG. Are they published on Sunday?

Mr. FLINT. They are published in the United States on Sunday, but the probability is, that the work is done on Saturday, because they are issued in the city of publication at a very early hour on Sunday morning or late hour on Saturday night. I would not go as far as my hon. friend (Mr. Fisher), and prohibit the sale of papers of this kind on Tuesday, or any week day, throughout the Dominion of Canada. If we do that, we are opening the door to what I believe the people of this country will not submit to, namely, constituting some official censor to prescribe what the people shall read and purchase on week days. I will support, and I think the committee will support, any legislation which will prevent the publication and sale of newspapers in this country on the Sabbath Day.

Mr. MACLEAN. You can see now, Mr. Chairman, that we are getting into a labyrinth of difficulties, and we are still waiting for information from the Solicitor General. If we cannot get him to speak, I will have to appeal to my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) as to whether it is a fact, that such a crime exists in the province of Quebec, and as to whether it is a fact, that they have a law there which prohibits the vending of anything on Sunday. We have this law against vending on Sundays in all the provinces, and if this Parliament are going to make the vending of Sunday newspapers criminal, then let us apply the rule to everything else. As the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes) pointed out, we should apply this law to the running of trains on Sunday, and keeping pharmacies open on Sundays, and a hundred different things. When you come to that, you disturb the whole social condition of this country. As a Canadian who happens to live in a city, I object to those who live in rural communities trying to regulate our social life in the cities. We are able to do that for ourselves. Especially do I resent that members from the wild and woolly west, like the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) and the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Richardson), who come here with all these professions of interest for the public morals, should try to regulate the social life of the large cities of Canada. The people of the cities resent this rural interference. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) and those who support him are really in earnest, let them put it in the Criminal Code that it is a crime to read a paper on Sunday. If they apply such an amendment as that equally to all the people, then I will support it.

Mr. HUGHES. No, you won't.

Mr. MACLEAN. If they who call themselves Liberals, say it is a crime to read a newspaper on Sunday, if they who say they are the friends of the people, declare that, then they are at least logical, but in their present position they are both illogical and illegal, and I want the Solicitor General to give his opinion as to whether this law is constitutional, and as to whether there is not a sufficient law in the province of Quebec at the present time.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am quite prepared to endorse the proposition made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture. I admit that there are some papers published in the United States that do not come within the category of those that should be rejected; but while there are a few of those, there are hundreds that are decidedly objectionable. I know myself of papers which are simply a review of the horse-racing, sports and amusements of the previous week, and these papers are brought into Canada and sold here. For my part, I am quite willing to take the course suggested by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, to shut out all these papers in order to shut out the undesirable ones. With regard to my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean), I would like to see collected together in one city or community all those who are disposed to advocate the same principles of a free and open and unrestricted Sunday. I would be quite willing to legislate that they should have a little Utah of their own in order to see how it would be conducted. I fancy that it would be a pretty rum city.

Mr. MACLEAN. There would be no hypocrites in it.

Mr. McMULLEN. We would then see what use they would make of the command, which says: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy."

Mr. MACLEAN. And do not charge more than 6 per cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think this House is perfectly justified in legislating to prevent the publishing of Sunday newspapers, if it is possible to do it.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I would like to draw the attention of the Solicitor General, who has not been here during the greater part of this discussion, to what appears to be a matter of some doubt with regard to the question of jurisdiction on this subject. It has been pointed out by myself and by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) that there already exists in the statutes of Ontario a complete law prohibiting the selling of any articles on Sunday, and that there is no distinction between a newspaper and any other chattel or article which is there prohibited from sale. The simple question at issue is whether we should encumber our statutes with a law exactly similar to a law that exists in the province of Ontario and also similar to a law which I am informed by the Minister of Agriculture exists in the province of Quebec. Would it not be more proper to amend the Act of the province of Ontario, if it is imperfect, which I think it is not. The rule of "jus generis" referred to by the hon. member for Kingston, does not apply to it at all. I would like to point out to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that the question of jurisdiction cannot be decided unless a test question is made of it; and I think that if I were as zealous as he is for this legislation, which he has brought before this House for several years, I, or the association with which he is acting, would endeavour to see that some test case was made so as to ascertain whether the provincial statute was sufficient, or whether the provincial Parliament had jurisdiction or not. If the provinces have jurisdiction in a local matter of this kind, then this Parliament ought not to interfere. In saying that, I am expressing the Liberal doctrine which has been enunciated by hon. gentlemen opposite ever since I have been in this House—that in matters of local concern this Parliament should not interfere if the local legislature has jurisdiction. I am not certain that the eminent authority who has been referred to to-night by two or three gentlemen had any such simple clause as this in his mind when he said that this Parliament had jurisdiction. I think the hon. member for North Norfolk will bear me out that at the time Sir John Thompson expressed his opinion on his measure, it contained many clauses which are not found in this Bill, such as those relating to the running of cars and steamboats, the keeping of canals open on Sunday, and so on. If the Bill had been whittled down to a simple provision to prohibit Sunday newspapers—to amend the Lord's Day Act of the provinces—I think he would have said that the provinces had jurisdiction, and that we should not meddle in the matter.

Mr. McCLURE. I heartily agree with the sentiment expressed by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), but I have very great doubts whether any such legislation is necessary.

Mr. HUGHES. I agree with that, too.

Mr. McCLURE. I think the law of the province of Nova Scotia prohibits the selling of anything on Sunday, and applies to newspapers as well as to anything else. There may be doubts as to the constitutionality of that law; but I think that question should be settled before we legislate here. As to the amendment moved by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, it is calculated to do great injustice. You allow people to sell newspapers ostensibly published on Monday, the greater part of the work on which is done on Sunday; but the hon. Minister's amendment proposes not to allow newspapers to be ostensibly published on Sunday all the work of which is done on Saturday.

Mr. HUGHES. Before the hon. member for North Norfolk speaks again, I have strong hopes that he will accept my amendment. He will notice that an additional amendment is moved to this, so that it reads as follows :—

Sells or employs or procures any person to sell any article or commodity on Sundays, except drugs or medicines or articles for surgical and medical use.

I am sure my hon. friend will accept this.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). One does not like to express opinions off-hand on great constitutional questions. The present question is one of great importance, and I think it gathers importance from the fact that eminent authorities have expressed opinions upon it. If I ventured to give an opinion, it would be, that this is merely a matter of municipal and local regulation entirely. However, I am indebted to the right hon. First Minister for the opinion expressed by the late Sir John Thompson on this subject; and in view of that opinion, I feel a very great deal of hesitation in upholding the one I expressed a moment ago, and which I personally entertain. Sir John Thompson said :

The hon. member for North Norfolk is quite right in saying that I expressed the opinion that this Parliament has jurisdiction to enact the provisions which are found here. Although the opinion is not entertained by some members of the House of eminence in their profession, I have no doubt that we have the power to deal so amply with all matters relating to the criminal law, that when we undertake to make a thing criminal we have jurisdiction to do so.

That is where we differ. I do not think we have the right to declare anything a crime. That is out of the question.

When the House was considering the matter last year, the first clause of the Bill, relating to the publication of Sunday newspapers, was one which we might, with great propriety and safety, we thought, leave to the local legislatures to adopt if they saw fit.

Then he went on to say :

It is a matter relating particularly to the convenience of the inhabitants of the provinces themselves, and the legislatures, no doubt, will adopt restrictive laws whenever they think the time has arrived for doing so.

That was the view which was entertained by Sir John Thompson, when this Bill was introduced in 1892. In so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, as my hon. colleague the Minister of Agriculture said a moment ago, we have legislation there on this subject, and it is legislation of a character to prevent the abuse which the hon. member for North Norfolk points out. It will be found in article 3498 of our revised statutes of the province of Quebec, which prohibits the barter and sale of anything whatever on a Sunday. That section is quite sufficient to prevent the doing of that which, to some extent, in our province is a scandal. For instance, to my knowledge, papers published on Saturday are peddled about through the streets in Quebec and sold at the church doors on Sunday morning, contrary to statute; but there is the remedy I have pointed out, and I think we ought to apply that remedy and as far as possible avoid encroaching on the attributes of the local legislatures, especially with regard to anything which may come within the regulations of local municipalities.

The Bill before us does not reach its object, as far as I can see, looking over it very cursorily. The object, I apprehend, is to prohibit the sale of Sunday newspapers, that is to say, those newspapers that are published on Sunday and distributed through the streets. But that is not what you are going to accomplish. The section reads :

Any one who, being the proprietor, publisher or manager of any newspaper, publishes, or issues or prepares for publication or issue any copy or number of such newspaper for sale on Sunday, or with the intent that such copy or number shall be sold on Sunday.

That is to say, if the newspaper is published on a Saturday, as is the case now, and is sold on a Sunday at any of those depots or places where newspapers are put on Saturday night, quite harmlessly, the publisher would be liable to be fined. The consequences of this Bill are much more serious than they appear in the minds of those who drew it up. After all, we have got to understand the meaning of terms. If any one issues his paper on a Saturday, and it is sold on the Sunday afterwards, he is to be called to account under this Act.

Mr. MACLEAN. Will that reach the Saturday Toronto "Globe" ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It would require a very ordinary construction of this statute to reach it, if that paper is sold on Sunday.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Or even subscribed for or received on Sunday.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would not go so far as to say that, but that might be the case.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In Vancouver and Victoria, B.C., no paper is distributed on Monday at all, and consequently no Sunday work is done on any newspaper. That, I presume, is a condition of things which the hon. gentleman who moves this Bill desires to encourage. There is a Sunday newspaper published there, but the work is done before Sunday begins, and yet under this Bill the publishers of these papers will come within the meaning of this clause and be liable to punishment. I should think that they should rather be entitled to commendation for taking a course that does away with the necessity for any Sunday work; but nevertheless, those people would come under this Bill and be considered criminal. I think that this legislation is a great deal in advance of the time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I should like to quote the opinion of an hon. gentleman whose opinion, by reason of his eminence in Parliament and his official position at present, ought to have a great deal of weight. I refer to the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills), who was formerly member for Bothwell in this House. Having in view the fact that he is now Minister of Justice and responsible for the legislation which goes through this, as well as the other House, his opinion on legal and constitutional questions should, so far as the members of the Government are concerned, be conclusive. In the session of 1892 he spoke as follows ("Hansard," page 394):

I think the question is one of civil rights, regulated by the provincial law, and I do not think that by simply declaring it a misdemeanour, and thus trying to bring it within the purview of a department of law in which it has not been previously placed, you can prevent its being a matter of civil rights.

Then, he threw out a word of warning, at the conclusion of his speech, which I think the House might well accept at present:

I think there are matters here that ought to be seriously considered by us, and we ought to meet the public wishes and expectations as far as we can; but with regard to those matters that are in other hands, surely we ought to let them alone, and let them remain in the hands in which the constitution has placed them.

That is the very strong opinion of the Minister of Justice, who is responsible for the constitutional action of the Government. He also took the ground to discuss the question, that in Ontario the case had been provided for, and the legislation proposed seemed to be altogether unnecessary.

Mr. CHARLTON. In reply to the statement made by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) as to the attitude of Sir John Thompson on this Bill, that hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) tells us that Sir John Thompson did not give his sanction to this particular section of the Bill, but to the general principle and to the Bill as a whole. Now the truth is that Sir John Thompson gave his sanction to this particular section of the Bill, singled it out from others, and decided, that while he could not see the propriety at that moment of legislation with regard to railway traffic or railway excursions, he did see the propriety of legislation with regard to the Sunday newspaper evil to prevent that evil in this country. It was to that feature of the Bill he distinctly gave endorsement, and it was in consequence largely of that support that the first two sections, one relating to the closing of the canals on the Lord's Day and the other with regard to the publishing of newspapers passed this House. But for the action of Sir John Thompson that favourable action on the part of the House could not have been secured. He took the ground that, although this matter might be dealt with by the provincial legislatures although it was competent for the province to make laws with regard to it, the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament was paramount to that of the provincial legislatures and it was desirable to secure uniformity of the law with regard to this matter. He thought it desirable to have uniformity because of the extreme importance of taking precautionary measures to prevent the introduction of this great evil into the Dominion. He based his approval of the measure upon this provision alone, and this provision has been selected from the others and placed before the House because of Sir John Thompson's approval and because it had passed the House and been accepted by the present Premier. The history of the Bill, to which my hon. friend from Brockville alluded is this: The Bill as first introduced covered a large number of infractions of Sabbath observance. It went over nearly the whole field. That Bill on the motion of Sir John Thompson was referred to a special committee composed of thirteen members. It was considered by that committee and every portion of it upon which it could be held that the provincial legislature had exclusive jurisdiction was eliminated from the Bill. It was held that the provincial legislatures had nothing to do with the opening of the canals on Sunday, these being Dominion works; or with the traffic of our railroads that had been declared works for the general advantage of Canada; and it was held that the publication of Sunday newspapers was a national matter, a question of national importance, and that, as the Dominion Parliament controlled the copyright law, the transmission of literature through the mails, the libel law and the matter of prohibiting the importation of obscene or objectionable literature, this matter could best be dealt with by the Dominion Parliament. It was also felt that there should be a general law on the subject for the Dominion, rather than to have one law in one province, a different law in another province and no law at all in another, as is at present the case. The question of the jurisdiction of this Parliament is raised. This Parliament has jurisdiction on all matters of criminal law. This Parliament can declare criminal any act which it believes to be contrary to the general interest and the welfare of the country. It has been objected that the evil has not been developed here. But it exists here in an incipient state. There is one newspaper published in Toronto and sold on Sunday, and one in Montreal. This gigantic evil in the United States had its inception in much the same way. One or two of the leading newspapers in New York commenced issuing Sunday editions during the War of the Rebellion. From this small beginning, the evil has acquired such magnitude and power that no newspaper can exist that seeks to stand against it. Every newspaper is forced into an infraction of the Divine law, and to assisting in the demoralization of the country. This evil is sapping the religious and moral life of the country. If there is anything calculated to bring the United States down to the dust to subvert and upset its institutions, it is the Sunday newspaper. This national evil should be dealt with in a national way by this national legislature, an evil that would affect this whole Dominion and that can be effectively handled and dealt with only by the Parliament sitting at Ottawa. Sometimes I lament most deeply those gentlemen who talk about their sympathy with the Bill, their desire to see the evil suppressed, of the sorrow it gives them to see this evil going on, carping at this and that feature of the Bill, the practical result of their criticism being hostility to the Bill, and to stifle and defeat it. I say: gentlemen, if you believe this Sunday newspaper growth to be an evil, why object to grapple with that evil by the supreme legislative authority of this country? Why do you wish to refer it to be dealt with by municipal and city councils, making it a mere municipal matter? This is a national matter. There is nothing that confronts us that is fraught with greater consequences for the future of the country than the evil I ask this House to deal with by applying the ounce of prevention, when we know very well that we can never effectively apply the pound of cure.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is the difference between a bad paper published on Sunday and a bad paper published on Monday?

Mr. CHARLTON. There is no material difference. I was coming to that. Great stress is laid upon the publication of the paper on Saturday, of there being a certain amount of work to be done on Sunday in order to be ready for publication on Monday. The evil of the Sunday newspaper is not decided by the question whether the newspaper is published on Saturday or Sunday, but by the fact that the Sabbath is secularized by the crying of newsboys in the streets and by the running of special trains and special messengers. Each of the larger newspapers in New York sends a lightning express train to Buffalo on Sunday with its pernicious freight to debase and demoralize the people.

Mr. CLANCY. Is that the case in Canada?

Mr. CHARLTON. No, but it is the case in the United States, and I do not want to have it in Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite often accuse me of sympathizing with everything American. I denounce this evil that has grown up in the United States; I oppose everything that is calculated to sap moral character and moral life. The matter is important enough to warrant truthful, candid treatment, the kind of treatment it has not been receiving to-night, I fear, I am obliged to say.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, candid treatment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Unless the hon. gentleman refers to himself, he is out of order.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will allow the hon. gentleman to say who I refer to. But I say that the attitude of certain members of this House with regard to this Bill, is thoroughly disingenuous. Now, the matter we have got to decide upon is not whether it is sinful to publish a newspaper on Saturday that may be sold on Sunday, there is nothing in this Bill that will bear that application. The Bill says: "The proprietor, publisher or manager are liable to penalties." My hon. friend from Victoria talked about the hardship of fining a little newsboy. The penalties of this Bill are applicable to those persons named, the proprietor, publisher or manager of a newspaper, who publishes or issues, or prepares for publication or issue, any copy or number of such newspaper for sale on Sunday, or with the intent that such copy or number should be sold on Sunday.

These are the men who are liable:

Or sells, or employs, or procures any person to sell any newspaper on Sunday.

Mr. HUGHES. Does that not cover a newsboy?

Mr. CHARLTON. No, it is intended to cover the person who procures the services of a newsboy to sell the paper that he has published or issued.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman does not read the clause correctly. He says it does not apply to a newsboy who sells, but the Bill does say that anybody who sells a newspaper on Sunday, or who employs anybody, or procures anybody to sell a newspaper on Sunday, is liable.

Mr. CHARLTON. The word "or" connects clause "a" with clause "b" and carries on to "b" the penalties that apply to individuals referred to in clause "a," that is to say, the proprietor or publisher or manager of a newspaper.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. member for North Norfolk is right.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I say any newsboy who sells that paper is a publisher within the meaning of subsection "a."

Mr. CHARLTON. The intention of this Bill is to make liable to its penalties the proprietor, publisher or manager, who is primarily responsible for the infraction of the law. Now, it is said that the publisher of a paper published on Saturday may be liable to the penalties. Sir, in this age papers published on Saturday are not liable to be sold very extensively on Sunday, they are not issued with the intent of being sold on Sunday. Saturday editions of Canadian papers are sold on Saturday, they are issued to be sold on Saturday, they are not reserved for sale on Sunday. It is not the purpose of the publisher of that paper that it should be distributed on Sunday or sold on Sunday. But the object of this Bill is to reach that evil which exists in the publication and hawking about of a paper, sending it by express wagons throughout the city, the selling by newsboys of a paper on Sunday. The criticisms here with regard to the want of jurisdiction fail utterly. We are possessed of jurisdiction, there is no question about it. The question of the evil almost every body who has spoken admits, the desirability of avoiding that evil there can be no question about. The proper method of coping with this evil efficiently there can be no question about. You do not cope with it by employing subordinate powers, but by employing the paramount powers existing in this central body. It is a proper exercise of the legislative prerogative for the Dominion Parliament to deal with this question, it is the most effective way of dealing with it, and if we are governed by our desire to promote the interest of the country, to avoid the introduction into this country of an evil which will speedily grow beyond our power to check it, we want to take the very course I am asking the committee to take to-night. I do not know that I would insist upon the amendment of the Minister of Agriculture. That, perhaps, is unnecessary.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman want to stop the distribution of a paper that is made up on Saturday night? Does he want to prevent the distribution of that paper on the Lord's Day?

Mr. CHARLTON. Certainly, that is the very evil I want to stop. I daresay that nine-tenths of the Sunday newspapers in America are largely made up on Saturday night and published at three or four o'clock on Sunday morning. But the evil is that these papers are hawked about and sold on Sunday. They are got up for the class of readers that read them on Sunday, they furnish a quality of reading matter that is deleterious to public interests, that debases the morals of the people, and they are just as worthy of suppression as a brothel or a gambling den.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman wish to stop the reading on the Sabbath of a paper published on Wednesday, for instance?

Mr. CHARLTON. That question does not enter into the consideration of this measure at all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman wants to stop the distribution of a paper on the Lord's Day that is made up on Saturday, he is bound to go so far as to object to the distribution on the Sabbath of a paper published on Wednesday. The real harm is the reading of it.

Mr. CHARLTON. The paper made up on Saturday is read on Sunday, it is made up for the purpose of being read on Sunday, it is not designed for circulation except on Sunday, it is to all intents and purposes a Sunday paper. The mere incident of the small amount of labour employed on Saturday in preparing that paper for Sunday circulation has nothing to do with the question. The evil complained of is the character of the paper and its influence upon the moral status of the community, the influence of that paper in dragging down the moral life of the nation.

Mr. HUGHES. Would the hon. gentleman object to the sale, for instance, on Sunday of the "Mail and Empire" and the "Globe," published on Saturday?

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not dealing with that question at all. I would object to the sale of them on Sunday, as I would object to the sale of any other commodity. These are not properly Sunday papers, they were not issued with the design of being circulated on Sunday, they are Saturday papers. But we are dealing with the question of Sunday newspapers, the Sunday newspaper evil that is the curse of the United States, that is one that we want to avoid having introduced into this country; and all this cavilling and carping of hon. gentlemen opposite is begging the question.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman says that his intention is to prohibit altogether the distribution and sale of Sunday newspapers. Now, the hon. gentleman has stated that there are two Sunday newspapers in Canada, and this Act, if it goes into force will prevent the issuing of only these two Sunday newspapers. Now, I happen to live near the border, as the hon. member for North Norfolk knows. We are not bothered with any Sunday newspapers that are published in Canada, but we are bothered with Sunday newspapers which are published in the United States, and very pernicious newspapers they are. They come over on Saturday night and they are sold on Saturday night to the people of the towns and villages adjoining—a class of reading that ought not to go into any home, Christian or otherwise, in the Dominion of Canada. Now, these newspapers are a thousand times more pernicious than any newspaper, Sunday or otherwise, that the hon. gentleman or myself will ever live to see published in Canada.

Under this Bill the hon. gentleman says that the boy is not punishable if he sells the newspaper on Sunday. If you cannot get at the boy whom can you get at, because the hon. gentleman will agree that there is no power in this Parliament to punish the publisher of a newspaper residing in New York, Buffalo and Utica and who sends over newspapers to be distributed in Canada on Sunday. The real evil in Canada to-day is the distribution and sale of pernicious newspapers published in the United States, some of which I am very glad have been shut out by the Minister of Agriculture. That is an evil which Parliament should grapple with.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is the object of my amendment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not hear the hon. gentleman's amendment; but the Bill as submitted is very lame and halting.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman has unconsciously given an argument in favour of the amendment offered to the committee.

Mr. MACLEAN. No; the amendment is quite the opposite. The papers referred to are printed during the week and sent in here on Saturday night.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not referring to the date of publication, but to the contents.

Mr. CHARLTON. It does not militate against the propriety of seeking to prevent one evil by presenting another evil to the attention of the committee; and if the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) has any grievance to place before the House or desires legislation to remove an evil, let him offer an amendment. This Bill has reference to Sunday newspapers. The hon. gentleman has been talking about Friday newspapers.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No; I rise to a question of personal explanation. What I said was that there were papers published as Sunday newspapers that are not printed on Sunday. They are dated on Sunday. They are sent out probably on Friday or Saturday, and I sometimes buy them on the train Friday or Saturday.

Mr. CHARLTON. You should not buy them.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Some of these newspapers are of a very good class. For example the 'Buffalo Express' is a very high class paper, and contains very useful matter. Although printed on Thursday and Friday these are often called Sunday papers.

Mr. CHARLTON. They are not the Sunday newspapers we are talking about.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is a Sunday newspaper?

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is one published on Sunday and sold on Sunday. We are dealing in this Bill with Sunday newspapers—not with papers published on Friday or Saturday and called Sunday newspapers and which may be sold before that date. That may be an evil—it would depend on the character of the newspaper. There is, however, a law that will meet the case of papers of an obscene and an objectionable character, and if such newspapers are published in Canada there is a remedy provided to-day. The hon. gentleman is importing into this discussion a question foreign to the case under consideration, and his course is calculated to draw the attention of the House from the consideration of the question with which we are dealing.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman say what newspapers he is now really aiming at?

Mr. CHARLTON. I am aiming at newspapers published and sold on Sunday.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have in the course of my remarks pointed out the character of the evil prevailing in the United States and have stated that there are a thousand Sunday newspapers there. This evil has grown up and has been allowed to acquire such magnitude and influence as to place it beyond the reach of Christian sentiment and the abolition of the nuisance by law. That is an evil I explicitly stated I had in view in preparing this Bill; that it was the object of the Bill to prevent this evil being introduced into this country, and that the Bill was designed not as a corrector of an evil existing, but, on the principle of using an ounce of cure, to prevent an evil that was sure to come. I ask from the House fair treatment of this measure. I deprecate drawing a red herring across the track, as has been done by the hon. member for Haldimand; I object to hon. members raising side issues, and questioning the jurisdiction of this Parliament when the point has been decided and there is not the slightest doubt in regard to it. The question before the House is this: is the Sunday newspaper an evil; is it desirable to prevent the introduction into Canada of this evil; have we the power to do it? These are the questions the House has to decide. If hon. members believe that it is not an evil to introduce these Sunday newspapers from the United States into Canada let them vote against the Bill. If they believe that this Parliament has the power to make criminal an act which will be in the highest degree detrimental to our people, if they believe that this great evil should be suppressed, that this House has power in the premises to deal with the question, that it is desirable it should be dealt with, they will support the Bill. Let us deal with this question in an honest way, and let

hon. members vote one way or the other without raising pettifogging objections, or drawing herrings across the track, or raising side issues, perplexing and bewildering the House by the tactics that have been resorted to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. To my mind the hon. gentleman's argument altogether depends upon the character of the paper exposed for sale or distributed on Sunday. When I spoke of American newspapers, the hon. gentleman said the matter depended entirely on the character of the paper. I submit that the Bill will have a very serious effect in some directions in which this Parliament does not desire any restriction to be imposed. Supposing a publication is started in Toronto or Montreal the object of which is to the promotion of home culture and the extension of knowledge among the masses, and suppose that this paper is dated on Sunday and delivered on that day, would there be found in this Parliament members prepared to fine the publisher or the boys distributing these papers. Yet in no sense could this be called a religious newspaper. But what is a religious newspaper? To one man a religious newspaper would mean one thing and to another a publication entirely different. So it comes back to the nature of the newspaper, and unless the hon. gentleman is prepared to draw up a schedule and make a list of the various classes of newspapers, he should not ask this House to pass the Bill, for he has already admitted that the present law adequately provides as regards the sale of obscene papers. And if the law does not apply against all papers in which stuff is published which is obscene and immoral and impure, then the law can be invoked now just as well as under the Bill of the hon. member. If the law can be invoked against the immoral and the bad and the impure, then the hon. gentleman's Bill is only giving authority to those who have that power, to invoke the law against that which is not bad and not immoral and not impure. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) is entirely illogical. So far as his insinuation goes, that we are not sincere and honest, I may tell him that there are those of us who have not his pretensions in this regard, but who believe we are just as honest, when we express our opinions in this House, as is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) or anybody else. Surely, in this Parliament we can differ on these questions as we can differ on political questions, without being told we are trifling, without being told we are raising side issues, without being told we are drawing a red herring across the scent, by the hon. member for North Norfolk. The fact is, this Bill has been before this Parliament ever since I have been a member. It has been riddled from stem to stern in every direction, and I am bound to say, out of credit for the hon.

gentleman (Mr. Charlton), that nothing but the perseverance of a saint would have brought him through all these trials and tribulations to revive his Bill during each session of this legislature and ask us to adopt it. I tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), that he is making a mountain out of a mole-hill. The sentiment in the country on this Bill, so far as present necessity goes, hardly stirs a ripple in public opinion in the province from which I come, and I believe I speak for just as good a class of the community as does my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton). It is true, that agitation here at this meeting, and agitation there at that meeting, may excite a passing interest, but I challenge members on the other side of the House who are supporting the Bill, and I challenge members on this side who are supporting it, to state whether or not I am correct, when I said, that there is no rousing public sentiment on that question, that there is no agitation as regards the introduction or carrying of this Bill, and that if my hon. friend dropped it in this House, we would fail to hear from it again, unless indeed a condition of affairs should arise in the future which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) pictures in his imagination is likely to arise, and for the termination of which he is trying to carry this Bill. I am strongly in favour of the observance of the Sabbath as a day of rest and Christian worship, but I do not see that this Bill will make it more so in this country.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Montague) has just paid a highly deserving compliment to my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), when he said that nothing but the perseverance of a saint would induce him to persevere in this Bill from year to year. But we are not all so constituted as is my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton), and after four hours of discussion, might I not suggest, that if we have not made up our minds on this Bill, we will not make up our minds by further discussion. Mr. Chairman, I would call question.

Mr. CRAIG. I think, Mr. Chairman, I should make a few remarks.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. CRAIG. I do not intend to detain the House, but it is due to myself, because, as I happened to speak first after the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), I have no doubt that probably he included me when he spoke about persons who sympathized with the Bill, but who are, nevertheless, trying to kill it. The hon. member for North Norfolk talks about not receiving sympathy. Well, I do not wonder at that, because he abuses his own friends. He talks about the Bill not receiving candid treatment, but as for myself I might say that I am perfectly candid and perfectly sincere in everything I say, and while I have no doubt that the hon. member for North Norfolk is quite sincere and candid, yet I must admit that a great many people outside of the House do not think he is. I have no sympathy at all with remarks of that kind made concerning members of this House. I am not called to defend my hon. friends, but I do say that we have a right to differ on these matters without being called pettifoggers and told we are trifling. I can tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), that I take as strong a stand on the observance of the Lord's Day as any member in this House, not excepting the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton.) I express my candid opinions in this House. If I were not candid, I might pretend to something I did not believe, and I might try to gain some outside applause or sympathy from a certain class of the people. We are here to-night considering a Bill presented by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), and, as the Solicitor General has pointed out, the consequences of this Bill may be more far-reaching than we think. I said nothing that could be construed to be offensive in any way; and what I did say has been amply justified by this debate. I said I was in favour of the principle of the Bill, but I objected to it for two reasons, the first of which is the question of jurisdiction. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says there is no doubt we have jurisdiction; but we have heard quoted against that the opinion of the present Minister of Justice when he was a member of this House, and he (Mr. Mills) told us that there was grave doubt about our jurisdiction, and that in his opinion this question belongs to the provinces. The Solicitor General expresses to-night the same opinion, and I am therefore perfectly justified in taking the ground that the question of jurisdiction should be settled before we legislate in this direction. I have objected to this Bill because I believe it would be found impossible to make a workable law out of it. I have listened to this discussion year after year, I have seconded this Bill more than once, and I would be quite willing to second it to-night if we could make out of it a law which would accomplish what we desire. The Solicitor General tells us now that this Bill will not accomplish the end we seek, and on the legal point I am disposed to be guided by his opinion more than by that of the hon. member for North Norfolk.

After all, the question comes to this: Have we confidence in the provincial legislatures. All of us admit—I do not know that the hon. member for North Norfolk does—that this is a question for the provincial parliaments. The hon. member for North Norfolk states, that he has no confidence in the provincial parliaments doing their duty, and so he says: I will insure here that they shall do their duty, and I am going to ridicule almost any man who does not support me in this measure, and I am going to contend that he is opposed to Sunday observance. Well, Sir, I have confidence in the provincial legislatures in this matter. They are in some ways nearer to the people than we are, and this is a matter that comes directly within their powers. If they do not attend to this matter let the hon. member for North Norfolk agitate so that the Government of Ontario will be bound to attend to it, and there are members from the other provinces who are sincere on the question of Sabbath observance who will agitate in their own sphere. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) has been asked to point out one case in Canada which called for the intervention of this law, and I heard him say that there was one case in Toronto. I am prepared to state that there is no case of a Sunday newspaper published and sold in Toronto. There is a paper called the "Sunday World," but that paper is printed on Saturday night and sold on Saturday night. Will the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) contradict that?

Mr. CHARLTON. I referred to a paper in Montreal.

Mr. CRAIG. I do not know anything about Montreal, but you referred to Toronto, and I know there is no such case in Toronto. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) tells us that he was moved to introduce this Bill because of the great evil in the United States, and as a preventive measure he wants to have this law in Canada. It will be well to wait until that evil arises here, and until the people of this country ask for this measure, which they do not at the present time. In order not to be misrepresented, I wish to say that I am strongly in favour of a measure to prevent Sunday newspapers, if we have jurisdiction in the matter, and if a workable Bill can be framed and presented to this House.

Mr. MACLEAN. In order that we may get a workable Bill, I beg to move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

QUARTZ MINING IN THE YUKON.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Before the House adjourns, I would like to ask the hon. the Minister of the Interior whether the regulations governing quartz mining in the Yukon are issued yet?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I cannot tell the hon. gentleman. I will let him know to-morrow.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I can tell the hon. Minister that there is just as much need for them as there is for the railway in the Yukon country.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

SPECULATION IN BUTTER AND CHEESE.

Mr. PARMALEE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 83) to prohibit improper speculation in the sale of butter and cheese. He said: Mr. Speaker, in brief explanation of this Bill, I may say that it proposes to deal not with an imaginary evil, but with an actual evil which has grown up of late years in connection with the produce export trade—a trade which amounts altogether to about $20,000,000 a year. As everybody knows, that trade is in a few hands, giving a few men an opportunity of controlling the trade, and doing with it pretty much as they please. Within the last three or four years the practice has grown up of selling butter and cheese in England long in advance of their being made in this country. This is an evil which is deprecated not only by the legitimate traders, but by the dairymen themselves. In support of this statement I need only quote from a report of the annual meeting, held in Montreal, of the Butter and Cheese Association, the members of which do nine-tenths of the export trade in butter and cheese of this country. At that meeting this evil was discussed, and in reporting it, the Montreal "Trade Bulletin," an authority on the produce trade, said:

The short selling of cheese was also discussed, and it was stated that over 50 per cent of the business during the past season was done on this basis. This, if correct, shows that the speculative spirit in the cheese trade has increased enormously, and the opinion prevails among a large section of the trade that some measures should be adopted to check it. But it is difficult to see how this can be done, as long as parties on the other side are prepared to buy and take their chances on the future of the market. The buying and selling of goods ahead before they are made is a practice that should be deprecated, but how can it be stopped if buyers and sellers choose to agree on terms we cannot say, unless a Government measure is passed prohibiting such trading.

The object of this Bill is to prohibit that sort of trading. This Bill, which I introduced last session, was discussed more or less during the recess in the press of the country, and during last fall and winter was discussed before the different dairy conventions; and the dairymen are almost unanimous in support of the passage of some such legislation as this.

So far as this quotation which I have read shows that a large portion of the trade is in favour of legislation of this nature. It may be urged that this Bill will interfere with trade. I want to remove the impression that there is any intention to interfere by this Bill with legitimate trade and legitimate speculation. There is a vast difference between legitimate speculation and the gambling of the sort we propose to prohibit, namely, offering to sell something which does not exist, in the hope that at the time of delivery prices will go down. In the case of such transactions, there is not only the evil of selling in advance and thus creating an influence calculated to depress the market on this side, but there is this other evil. Take, for instance, a Montreal man who wishes to speculate in this way. He cables over to fifteen or twenty houses in Great Britain, offering them large blocks of cheese—offering in June to sell August cheese at, say, 8 cents per pound, which is below the market value. He does not make these offers always with the expectation that any of them, or any considerable number of them, will be accepted, but in order to make importers timid, in order to put the English market in a waiting condition, in order to do all he possibly can to create stagnation in it, and thus be enabled to purchase butter and cheese on this side at prices below the market value. By this Bill I propose to prohibit, not only the selling of futures, but the offering to sell them.

Professor Robertson, speaking at the Western Dairymen's Association, a few weeks ago, gave his cordial support to this Bill, and discussed the question very fully before the large number of dairymen at that meeting. He drew a sharp distinction between legitimate speculation and the gambling which it is the object of this measure to prohibit; and I do not think I can better inform the House than by reading an extract from Professor Robertson's remarks on that occasion:

Speculation is a legitimate and necessary part of commerce. When a man buys cheese in June and does not intend to sell it until September, he buys it in the hope of a rise in the market; he is speculating, that is, hoping for a profit. That is legitimate speculating, wholesome business. Such a buyer gets possession of something, and every pound of butter or cheese which he owns as a speculation makes him so much the more a factor, doing all he can to keep the price up. Cheese may be selling at 9 cents, or any other figure per pound at that time. A man may not buy any cheese in June at all, but he may say to himself: "I see a good chance to make some money without doing anything, a chance of getting something for nothing. I will offer to sell August cheese for delivery in September at 8½ cents." Forthwith he makes an offer to sell August cheese for delivery for 8½ cents, and telegraphs that offer to a score of houses in Great Britain. He has not put a cent of money into cheese; he does not own a box of cheese; he does not render an iota of service in the development of the cheese trade. He has merely offered to sell August cheese for delivery in September at ½ cent under the current price. It may be that nobody in England accepts his offer; but the firms to whom he cables will be led to say: "We have bought June cheese at 9 cents, and here we are offered August cheese at 8½ cents. Humph! we will not buy any more cheese just now." When anybody sends a cablegram or any other communication offering to sell "futures," or to sell "options," if they are accepted, his whole power and influence are used to weaken the market. He is merely betting that the price will be lower, and then he uses every means, fair and unfair, to make it lower. He is not a necessary middleman in commerce any more than the highwayman is in travel, and civilized nations having abolished the one are now confronted with the duty of preventing the other.

That puts the case very clearly, and removes any objection that might be raised on the ground of interference in any way with legitimate trade. I know how sensitive this House is with regard to any proposal which appears in the slightest degree to affect the perfect liberty of bargain-making by our people, but I contend that this Bill, if passed, will not in the slightest degree interfere with, but on the contrary will promote, legitimate trade. I submit that the interests of a few private individuals should not prevail against those of 200,000 or 300,000 dairymen in this country. I also submit that an industry like the dairy industry in this country—the largest single industry, perhaps, which we have—should not be jeopardized by allowing the continued existence of an evil of this kind. I have the authority of the trade for saying that legitimate traders themselves are in favour of our passing legislation of the kind I propose. I think I am warranted in saying that legislation of this kind will also be welcomed by the British boards of trade, as calculated to put the trade between this country and England upon a steadier and more straightforward basis. Taking all these things into consideration, I think that the Bill I have introduced is well worthy of the careful and serious consideration of this House.

My intention, in speaking on the first reading, was to remove the impression that this Bill is calculated, or intended, in any way to interfere with legitimate trade and commerce. Its intention is to put down a practice which does injury to legitimate trade and commerce, and, more than that, causes very distinct injury to the dairy producers of this country. I hold that this Bill, if it becomes law, will not in any way injuriously affect trade, but on the contrary will help it; but if this Bill should be opposed by a section of the trade—by, perhaps, the parties guilty of the practices I desire to prohibit—then we shall have to make our choice between half a dozen speculators in Montreal and 200,000 or 300,000 dairymen, who are the backbone of the country, and, for my part, I have no hesitation in doing so.

I think that the House will find that this Bill proposes to do something quite in our power to accomplish; and, under the circumstances, considering the extent of the evil and the reasons for removing it, I hope that we will find it our duty to support and pass the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INSOLVENCY.

Mr. FORTIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 84) respecting insolvency. He said: I may say, at the outset, that I would have preferred that a measure of this importance had been confided to a more experienced member of this Parliament. I have for a certain time entertained the hope that possibly a measure of this kind would be presented to this House by a member of the Government. Some few days before Parliament met, a delegation of the Montreal Board of Trade, which I had the honour to accompany, waited upon the members of the Government, and urged upon them the necessity of introducing an Insolvency Bill during the present session. After having had a very cordial and sympathetic reception, we were assured that the question would receive the careful consideration of the members of the Government. Most of us were non-politicians, and consequently, were not very familiar with the exact meaning of "careful consideration." So, we went away with the idea that possibly we might see at the opening of Parliament a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne announcing to Parliament and the country that an insolvency Bill would be introduced by the Government. But alas, there was no such thing in the Speech. This was naturally a matter of great regret to us. At best a mention in the speech from His Excellency would perhaps not have been a very reliable assurance, for on two former occasions we have known the Speech from the Throne to say explicitly that insolvency legislation would be introduced and passed, while, as a matter of fact, though introduced it was never passed. As it was not in the Speech from the Throne this session, and as we have not heard anything since about the decision of the Government upon this subject, I am unfortunately in this position to-day—that at the request of very important commercial bodies, such as the Montreal Board of Trade, for instance, I have to present to this House a Bill entitled "An Act respecting insolvency."

I feel that in doing this I am acting in the best interests of the commercial community. I feel that the Bill now proposed is one the want of which has long been felt in the country, the want of which is more imperative to-day than it has ever been. Immediately after the repeal of the insolvent law of 1875, the boards of trade of the country began to agitate and urge upon the Government the necessity of adopting a new insolvency law. In 1883 a Bill was submitted to this House by one of the members of that time, Mr. Beatty. In 1884 a Bill was presented to this House by the then member for Montreal Centre, now one of the eminent judges of the Superior Court of Quebec—Mr. Curran. Neither of these Bills was a complete insolvency law. They provided for the equitable distribution of the assets of the insolvent, but contained no clause by which insolvent debtors could be discharged and allowed to start in business again. In 1885, Mr. Curran re-introduced his Bill, and Mr. Beatty also introduced his. After that year, I find that a committee of the House, which received the support of the Montreal and other boards of trade, prepared a Bill, which was introduced in 1892, but which did not pass. Another Bill was prepared by the Toronto, Hamilton and Montreal boards of trade, and this measure was urged upon the Government. In 1893 these efforts were renewed, and in 1894, the Bill was introduced in the Senate by the then Minister of Trade and Commerce, Sir Mackenzie Bowell. That Bill was fully discussed before a committee of the Senate and was afterwards passed in that Chamber. The Bill reached this House at the end of the session, but unfortunately it did not get beyond its first reading. In 1895 the same Bill was again introduced in the Senate, it having been announced that year, as in 1894, in the Speech from the Throne. But the Bill died after passing its second reading in the Senate, and never reached this House. Another Bill was introduced in this House in February, 1896, by the then hon. member for Winnipeg, Mr. Martin, but, as every one knows, no legislation was passed in that session, the time being wholly occupied with one very important measure, which also did not pass.

Now, with this very sad history of attempts to pass insolvency legislation before me, I must say that I do not feel much encouraged. But, if I feel that something might be done in this way, it is on account of the very important fact that there was such a day as the 23rd June, 1896, on which this Parliament was renewed to the extent of nearly one-half, and on which also a new Government came into power. I am fully aware that among the members of this Parliament there are still members of former Parliaments who have expressed their views upon Bills of this kind. I know that some of these hon. members may feel bound by past utterances upon the subject. But when I reflect that there are now possibly half the members of this House who have had no previous experience in Parliament and no past utterances upon the subject of insolvency legislation, I feel that my task may be successfully accomplished, although attempted, as I have already said, by a member of the House who has very limited means of convincing his fellow-members.

The necessity for such legislation as this, is sufficiently proved, I think, by the repeated declaration of former Governments upon the subject, and by the persistent demands from the trade. This necessity has not disappeared by any means. I believe, on the contrary, it is to-day more necessary to have a good insolvency law applicable to the whole Dominion than it ever was before. It is well-known that business is improving in all directions. Signs of prosperity are visible on every side, and the increase of business is wonderful. The moment the business dealings between traders increase, the moment the volume of our commerce grows greater, the need for a good, equitable and generally applied insolvent law begins to grow more urgent.

It may be said that some of the provinces have adopted measures which render such a Bill as this almost unnecessary. I know that in most provinces laws providing for the equitable distribution of the assets of insolvents have been passed. The first province to adopt such enactments was the province of Quebec. In that province the common law contained the germ at least of a law of this kind. There was in the code of civil procedure provisions for the abandonment of property, but it was limited to the case of capias and the case of an unpaid judgment founded upon a debt of a commercial nature exceeding $80, after all the apparent property of the debtor had been discussed. An Act was passed in 1885 in that province to extend as much as possible the code of civil procedure so as to make it applicable to traders becoming insolvent. An Act was passed during the same year in Ontario providing as far as possible for the equitable distribution of the assets of insolvents. An Act was passed in 1888 in British Columbia not dealing expressly with the subject involved in this Bill, but entitled, "The Trustees and Executors Act." In that Act a section is found by which the property of a man who made an assignment is divided for the benefit of the creditors, and it also provides for the proper distribution of the assets realized. In 1896 a statute was passed in New Brunswick generally on the lines of the Ontario statute. I may also mention that in 1886 a statute was passed in Manitoba much resembling that of the province of Ontario. Now, Sir, allow me to state that although there exist provincial laws on the subject, those laws do not cover all the ground that an insolvency law ought to cover. No blame can be attached, however, to the provincial law-makers, because it is well known that the question of bankruptcy and insolvency is especially allotted by the constitution to the Parliament of the Dominion. Consequently all those laws which have been passed in the various provinces can only make provisions for the distribution of assets. Many doubts have been expressed as to whether any compulsory provisions in those provincial laws would be valid, and the point has been raised, although I believe it has not yet been decided by the courts.

Now I hold that an insolvency law properly so-called, while protecting the creditors must, at the same time, assist the debtor to a certain extent, when no fraud or bad faith can be proved against him. Any law concerning the distribution of assets which takes no account of the debtor cannot strictly be called an insolvency law.

Moreover, even if the provinces had passed legislation dealing with the whole subject of insolvency, I submit that even then a general Act by the Dominion Parliament would be necessary, for the reason that no one can suppose, in view of the diversity of conditions existing in the various provinces, that an insolvency law could be the same in all those provinces. Although I am not in a general way in favour of a uniform law when there is no uniformity of conditions, I hold that upon a question of this kind there ought to be a uniform law applicable to all the provinces. It seems to me that a merchant who sells his goods in Montreal, in his own office, to a merchant living in Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Halifax or Pictou, ought to be able to know under what law he will be able to get redress in case the purchaser of his goods becomes insolvent. If there is any one subject, I repeat, upon which uniformity of legislation is necessary, it is the subject of insolvency.

Now, Sir, there are provinces where there is no law, or practically no law, dealing with the distribution of assets, and even in those provinces where there are such laws, they have been found to be totally inadequate to cope with this difficulty. I may be allowed to quote from the interview which some members of the board of trade had with the Government, in which occurs some instances showing how the law works in the different provinces. I take this from what Mr. E. B. Greenshields, one of the eminent members of the Montreal Board of Trade said on that occasion :

As an instance of the laws of Nova Scotia, I have with me the notice of assignment of R. A. Logan & Co., of Bridgewater. The firm assigns and instructs the assignee to pay first the attached list of preferred creditors, which takes all the assets. This is a type of nearly all the assignments in this province.

In Ontario, the commonest forms are by giving transfers of book debts, and by sales en bloc of the stocks in trade. The former is a simple document that may remain in a creditor's possession for years. When the debtor assigns it becomes a preference on all the book debts made before and after the transfer was given.

In this interview Mr. Greenshields mentioned the following case :—

Mr. FORTIN.

As an instance of the latter, I might mention the case of C. S. Herbert, of Toronto. He started a large business there, and after a short time sold his stock for cash, paid one or two local creditors and went to the United States. The other creditors got nothing. Another plan was adopted by Thorne & Co., of Hamilton. They dissolved the partnership and borrowed money on a chattel mortgage to pay out one of the partners. He left the country and the other partner assigned. The assets of the estate were used first to pay off the mortgage. Thus, one partner in a firm in difficulties got paid a large sum which belongs to his creditors.

Similar instances might be multiplied. Now let me give an interesting case which I find in the "Shareholder," of the 25th of February last. It is the dividend sheet of the proceeds of the assets of A. C. Baillie, of Pictou, N.S. The assets realized $14,480. Of this sum, $10,873 was swallowed up by preferred creditors, and $2,897 by the expenses, leaving only the sum of $909, out of nearly $15,000, to go to the ordinary creditors. All the rest was swallowed up by the expenses of liquidation and by the payment of preferred creditors. Now, this case shows better than anything else that can be said, the actual necessity of an insolvent law of the kind I now introduce into this House. Let me remark that, although, as I have said, in introducing this Bill, I am acting at the request of the Montreal Board of Trades, at the same time there is nothing in it contrary to my own convictions. I have had some experience in dealing with insolvency matters, and this Bill is entirely in accord with my convictions upon the necessity of such a law. I might be allowed to read a letter which I have just received from Mr. George Hadrill, the well-known secretary of the Montreal Board of Trade upon this subject, expressing the views of that very important commercial body. The letter is dated Montreal, March 15th, 1898, and reads as follows :—

Dear Sir,—I am directed by the council of this board to express most emphatically its satisfaction that you have, as requested by the council's Insolvency Committee, prepared a Bill respecting insolvency, and that you are about to introduce that Bill into the House of Commons.

The council, like all bodies in close touch with the business interests of the Dominion, is convinced of the urgent need for legislation whereunder the assets of insolvent debtors shall be equitably divided; a need emphasized by the fact that the system of preferential assignments prevalent in some provinces has rendered England and other European countries unwilling to give credit to Canadian houses.

While slight differences of opinion may arise in discussing the details of your Bill, you may rest assured that not only the Montreal Board of Trade, but all other influential boards of trade throughout the country will support you in this effort to provide for the equitable distribution of insolvent estates, and I am further to say that the council of this board is anxious to assist you in any way that you may suggest towards procuring the adoption of insolvency legislation at this session of Parliament.

I have received a similar letter from "La Chambre de Commerce," which is well known to be the French Board of Trade of Montreal. It is dated March 16th, and is written in French. It says :

La Chambre de Commerce attend avec une certaine anxiété la faveur promise d'une copie imprimée de votre projet de loi de liquidation de faillites.

Son but est de vous appuyer dans la mesure de ses forces.

S. COTE, Secrétaire.

I am told by one of the members of the board of trade, Mr. A. W. Stevenson, that all the boards of trade of the Dominion, numbering sixty-nine, are a unit in favour of the desirability and necessity of enacting an insolvency law. Mr. Stevenson writes to me under date 15th March, and says :

You need not hesitate to say that every board of trade in the Dominion, some sixty-nine in number, endorse your action.

It may now be asked, what is the Bill I propose to this House under the title of an Act respecting insolvency? I may say before entering into the details, that the Bill has been prepared under the direction of the Montreal Board of Trade, and with the assistance of perhaps the most able men connected with this matter, at all events the most eminent men in Montreal, Mr. A. L. Kent, and A. W. Stevenson, both accountants of wide experience and knowledge and who have no superiors in Montreal. The Bill is very largely the one which was introduced by Sir Mackenzie Bowell in the Senate and passed by that Chamber in 1894, and re-introduced in 1895. Several changes have been made, which I shall enumerate and notice as I explain the provisions of the Bill. As far as I am concerned I have endeavoured to apply the following principle with respect to this Bill. A well-known author, Mr. Robson, on bankruptcy laws, says :

The law of bankruptcy is founded on the principle that when a man becomes insolvent, the property then remaining to him rightfully belongs to his creditors and ought to be distributed rateably amongst them towards satisfaction of their claims, the debtor himself being released from future liability in respect of his debts, upon giving all the aid in his power towards the realization and distribution of his estate for the benefit of his creditors, and fulfilling the other conditions prescribed by the law for his discharge.

I think it will be found that in the provisions of the Bill, especially in the new provisions, this principle has not been departed from.

The Bill I propose contains a preliminary title declaratory of the most important terms used in it, and it is afterwards divided into seven parts with several subdivisions.

Part 1 determines the application of the Act. I may say that the Act is intended to apply only to those who make trade their main occupation. In former Acts, especially in the Act of 1864, this was not the case. In that Act, in the province of Quebec, then Lower Canada, traders only come under this law; while in Ontario, then Upper Canada, the Insolvency Act applied to every person who might become insolvent. This general application of the Insolvency Act was limited to traders in the Act of 1869. As it is well known, the Act of 1864 was adopted before confederation. After confederation two more provinces formed part of the country, and it was then found necessary to re-enact the Act of 1864. I am aware that some hon. members and some business men and others would prefer to see such a law apply to all sorts of people, to farmers and non-traders, mechanics, and so forth. For my part I am not in favour of such a measure. I think an insolvency law should be considered, as an exceptional law, for the benefit of traders. The farmers and professional men run no risk, take no chances such as is necessary with business men, and only traders assume large risks from day to day. There is an express provision that the Act should only apply to those persons who as a means of livelihood, "manufacture, buy or otherwise acquire, goods, wares, merchandise or commodities, ordinarily the subject of trade and commerce, and sell or otherwise dispose of the same to others, including commission merchants, whether they sell by auction or otherwise."

This Bill differs, as already said, on many important points from the one introduced by Sir Mackenzie Bowell. The former Act was made applicable to all joint stock companies which now come under the provisions of the Winding-up Act. We have omitted all those provisions from the present Bill. The Winding-up Act has been in operation since 1882. It has worked in a very satisfactory manner and I never heard of any fault being found with its application, and it seems useless to re-enact its provisions and introduce them into a new law, the discussion or passage of which might occupy considerable time. No useful purpose would have been served in re-enacting the Winding-up Act, which applies to joint stock, insurance and finance companies. Hence these changes in the Bill from the measure passed by the Senate in 1894.

Part 2 of the Act deals with "Proceedings from act of insolvency to discharge of debtor."

Section 4 defines what is an act of insolvency, the most common of which acts, it is very well known, is the ceasing on the part of the debtor to meet his liabilities generally. Section 5 commences another sub-title, under the heading of "Receiving order." This requires some explanation. In former Acts there was a voluntary assignment and a compulsory assignment. I have omitted in this Bill, as was also the case with Sir Mackenzie Bowell's Bill, the provisions concerning a voluntary assignment. It has been found by experience that that feature of an insolvency law was very objectionable to the merchants throughout the country; and those who remember the operation of former insolvency Acts are most decidedly opposed to any such thing as a voluntary assignment. Therefore the main feature of this Bill is that all assignments are compulsory. In the case of compulsory assignment under former insolvency Acts the procedure was somewhat different from that proposed under this Act. Under the Act of 1875, for instance, there was a demand of assignment and there was also a writ of attachment, which would issue without any previous demand of assignment. These have been omitted from this Bill and the procedure now proposed is as follows:—

The moment a trader has committed an act of insolvency, a creditor to the minimum amount of $200 applies to the court by petition and obtains a receiving order. That receiving order is addressed to the sheriff of the district or county, and upon the receipt of it the sheriff either by himself or by his officers, proceeds to take possession of all the property of the insolvent. The order may be had with or without notice. It is optional. If it is obtained after notice, of course the parties may be heard on the application and then the court would determine whether or not the order should be granted. If it is obtained without notice, immediately after the order is granted it must be served upon the debtor with copy of the affidavits in support of it, and the debtor has three days within which he may apply to a judge to have this receiving order cancelled. In the meanwhile there is nothing done until such time as it is adjudicated by the court whether or not the receiving order is to hold or be cancelled. I may say, that in most cases the receiving order will always be issued after previous notice of the application upon the debtor, because generally, although there is no voluntary assignment, yet when the debtor finds himself insolvent he is willing that his creditors should take possession of his assets.

There is also in connection with this subject a very important difference between this Bill and the Bill introduced by Sir Mackenzie Bowell. As is well known, in the Bankruptcy Acts of 1864, 1869 and 1875, there was a class of persons known under the name of official assignees. By the Acts of 1864 and 1869, those official assignees were appointed by the boards of trade of the different cities throughout the Dominion, but by the Act of 1875 the law was changed and the official assignees were appointed by the Governor in Council.

Now, I know of no institution that brought more discredit upon the insolvency law of 1875 than the official assignee. It created a class of persons whose sole object was to obtain by all means the assignment of persons in trade or otherwise. I remember perfectly well when I began the practice of law, a case where a man, worth several thousand dollars consisting of real estate, and happening to owe a very small sum of money, was persuaded by an official assignee to make an abandonment of his property. The next thing that occurred was an application to the court, to send that man to jail, and it cost him many hundreds of dollars to resume possession of his estate and to escape imprisonment. I do not say that all these official assignees were to be complained of, because some of them were very respectable men, but as a rule the institution of official assignees proved to be most disastrous, and there is probably nothing that brought so much discredit upon the law and which contributed so largely to the repeal of the Act of 1875, as this institution. After all, if we eliminate some of the details of the Act of 1875, it would be found to be good law.

In the Act introduced by Sir Mackenzie Bowell there is no mention of the official assignee, but another class of officials was proposed to be created under the name of "official receivers." I know that the official receiver is known to the English bankruptcy law, and its origin is probably to be found in that law. The official receiver under the Bill of Sir Mackenzie Bowell was nothing but a guardian and his duties were very limited. He was merely to receive the assignment; he had no right to vote; and he had no right to be appointed subsequently as assignee to liquidate the affairs of the insolvent. But we know, and experience proves, that when the thin end of the wedge is introduced, it is always difficult to prevent it going further than was anticipated. We fear that this official receiver—under the amendments to the Act which may be made at every session of Parliament—would turn out to be nothing else than an official assignee under another name. Therefore that provision has been left out of this Bill, and it is replaced by a clause whereby the receiving order is addressed to the sheriff, and executed by him or his officers, and he becomes a mere guardian of the estate, without making an inventory and without incurring any expense save those that might be strictly necessary in order to conserve the property of the debtor. There is no danger in addressing this order to the sheriff, for the reason that the sheriff is an official who lives by his official position as a rule. Some of the sheriffs occupy very high positions. It is well known that the sheriff of the city of Montreal is also an hon. member of the Senate of Canada, and it is well known, too, that the sheriff of the city of Quebec is an ex-Minister of the Crown in that province. I may say, that the gentlemen appointed to that position are educated and honourable men, who have the means of living well ; so that they have not, as a rule, any interest in increasing their fees or revenue. Moreover, the duty imposed on them is so limited that they would have no interest to act otherwise than in a perfectly fair manner, since they are only called upon to take possession of the assets of the debtor and to act as guardian of the estate until the appointment of a liquidator. Besides, it is proposed that, whenever the court is satisfied by affidavit or otherwise that the majority in value of the creditors approve of a person to be appointed liquidator, then, such person may be appointed guardian of the estate, and will thereupon take possession of the assets, even from the sheriff's hands. But such person only acts as guardian until the liquidator has been appointed in the ordinary way by the creditors.

Another sub-title of the Bill deals with the proceedings consequent upon the receiving order. The first thing to be done after the receiving order has been executed, and possession has been taken by the sheriff of the assets of the insolvent, is to call a meeting of the creditors, to be held either at the sheriff's office or at any other convenient place. The sheriff is bound, of course, to give notice to all the creditors ; and at such meeting of the creditors a liquidator is appointed. At the same time, one or more inspectors may also be appointed. The duties of inspectors are to control and superintend the administration of the liquidator, and to see that the affairs of the estate are generally managed in the best interest of the creditors. The inspectors are not to be paid, unless at a general meeting of the creditors, or at a special meeting called for that purpose, the creditors should decide otherwise.

Another sub-title of this part of the Bill is under the heading, "Control of the person and property of the insolvent." Under this sub-title will be found provisions by which the insolvent is bound to give all possible information and assistance to the liquidator. Provisions will also be found here concerning the examination of the insolvent, with the view of ascertaining the way in which he managed his affairs. There are also provisions concerning the arrest of the insolvent, whenever that becomes necessary—for instance, in case he is about to abscond.

Another sub-title is under the heading, "Discharge of the insolvent." The only discharge which is provided for by the Bill is a discharge with the consent of a majority in number, and three-fourths in value, of all the creditors. There is no provision for a discharge being obtained against the will of the creditors. There is no provision, such as existed in former Acts, by which, after a certain lapse of time, the debtor could apply, ex parte to the court and obtain his discharge. When the express consent of a majority in number, and three-fourth in value, of the creditors is obtained, a deed of composition is made and deposited in the hands of the liquidator, who thereupon calls a meeting of the creditors, and subsequently, if nothing is shown which would be sufficient to prevent the insolvent getting his discharge, the deed of composition is agreed to by resolution; and with that deed of composition the debtor may go before the court and obtain his discharge. There are provisions to the effect that no deed of composition can be obtained, or shall be valid, unless, in the first place, all the costs of the liquidation are paid in cash into the hands of the liquidator, and unless all the privileged claims are also paid into the hands of the liquidator, and unless at least one-half of the amount of the composition shall be payable within twelve months after the granting of such discharge. This discharge being confirmed by the court, the liquidator reconveys to the debtor all his estate ; but should the insolvent fail to carry out the conditions of the deed of composition, the liquidator is entitled to resume possession of all the assets of the debtor, with due regard, of course, to the rights of new creditors, which may have arisen in the interval.

Then we come to the effect of the discharge. On this subject, there is something new in this Bill. In former Acts, and in former Bills on insolvency, the discharge had the effect of liberating the debtor from all his debts existing at the time of the insolvency. I know that this has always been a very objectionable feature of any insolvency law. I remember very well how the farmers complained, that insolvency laws were a kind of class legislation in favour of merchants. The farmers who used to sell their produce to merchants, complained that these traders had the opportunity of going into insolvency, paying a small dividend, and obtaining their discharge, when the producers had not the same opportunity. In order to meet these objections, we have introduced a provision in this Bill declaring that the discharge shall not apply, without the express consent of the creditor, to any claim of a non-commercial nature due to a non-trader. This is intended to restrict, as much as possible, the effect of the discharge of an insolvent trader to his fellow traders.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Would he be entitled to any portion of the distribution ?

Mr. FORTIN. He would, but the giving of the discharge would not affect him. He can take his dividend as an ordinary creditor, but then his claim will not be affected by the discharge. He will keep his claim for the balance, and unless it be prescribed, he will be entitled to claim from the debtor, notwithstanding any discharge. This is a very commendable feature of an insolvency Act, especially in a country like ours. It will remove, it seems to me, in the minds of those opposed to insolvency legislation, the very serious and important objection that was made to any insolvency law before this was presented.

There are also other claims not affected by the discharge. Those are for damages for seduction, libel, slander, malicious arrest, also for the maintenance of parent, wife or child, or penalties for any offence, or debts due by the insolvent as assignee, curator, executor, administrator, &c. All these different claims have always been exempted in all the insolvent Acts I have seen, from the operation of the discharge.

The Bill also determines the effect of the discharge with regard to persons secondarily liable, such as endorsers upon negotiable instruments. Those are not discharged. There was also in Mackenzie Bowell's Bill transitory provisions making it applicable with regard to the discharge to all those who have become insolvent since the repeal of the Insolvent Act of 1875. We have left out those provisions as likely to be the subject of much discussion and criticism, but there would be, in my opinion, no objection, if it were thought advisable to insert a clause of that kind, which would be available to all the honest traders who have become insolvent since the repeal of the Insolvent Act of 1875.

The subject next dealt with is the administration of the property of the insolvent. A sub-title deals with debts provable against the estate. The principle laid down is, of course, that all claims, direct or indirect, contingent or conditional, are provable against the estate. We know that limitations, however, are necessary, and these are made with regard to some debts. For instance, no costs of suits made subsequently to the issuing of the receiving order can rank against the estate. This is intended to prevent useless legal expenses after the receiving order is issued.

In the second place, the privilege of the unpaid vendor in the province of Quebec, when the goods are delivered in the store of the insolvent, is done away with. As the law now stands in the province of Quebec, an unpaid vendor can revendicate his goods within 30 days from the date of the delivery. This has been found to lead to abuse. There arises disputes of all kinds, the date of delivery is sometimes very difficult to establish, and in order to put an end to those difficulties, it is provided that the privilege will only last so long as the goods are not found in the store of the insolvent.

I may say that this is in accord with article 577 of the Code of Commerce in France, which also limits the privilege of revendication to goods which may be found in transit and before delivery into the store of the insolvent.

There are also changes in the law of privileges. Those who have furnished provisions to the insolvent, have, under our law in the province of Quebec, a privileged claim, but under this Bill they will be treated as ordinary creditors.

There is also a limitation in the privilege of the employees of an insolvent. They will only be allowed arrears of wages not exceeding three months, and for any balance that may be due they will rank as ordinary creditors.

There is also a limitation to the privilege of the landlord. His privilege for rent is limited to six months' arrears and three months in advance, if the liquidator should give notice to put an end to the lease, and there is a provision by which the liquidator may be authorized to sell the lease for the unexpired term. It is found, in some cases, that the right to the lease is a most valuable asset of the debtor. Take, for instance, the case of hotelkeepers. They have usually long leases, covering sometimes five to ten years, and these leases are sometimes the most valuable part of their property. In such cases, the liquidator may be authorized to sell the right to such lease for the benefit of the creditors.

There are provisions regarding the manner of proving claims. The Bill provides that they are proved by affidavit, accompanied with vouchers when there are any.

There are also provisions with respect to the liquidation of the private property of the individual partners, when the partners have individual creditors of their own. The principle laid down in article 1899 of the Civil Code of Quebec, is incorporated in this Bill, namely, that the creditors of the partnership are to be preferred upon the assets of the partnership for what is due to them, to the individual creditors of the partners; and the individual creditors of the partners are given a like preference on the private estates of the partners, over the creditors of the partnership.

There are also special provisions regarding secured creditors. These will be bound to value their security. The liquidator then will have the right to take up the security by paying a sum of money corresponding to the value put upon it by the creditor; or if he does not choose to do so, the amount of the value of the security is deducted from the total amount of the claim, and the creditor is allowed to rank for the balance. Conditional and contingent claims are also to be valued, and in case of difference, the dispute is to be settled by the court.

Then the Bill deals with the effect of insolvency on antecedent transactions.

In the first place, the guardian or the liquidator is entitled to take possession of all the property of the debtor, whether it be found in the hands of the bailiff, the sheriff or any other officer of the court. After notice, they can take possession of these assets for the benefit of the creditors. Then provisions follow by which fraud and fraudulent preferences which may have been made by the debtor before insolvency, are declared null and voidable. In the first place, as regards gratuitous contracts, it is provided that these contracts are to be deemed fraudulent and the result of fraud, if made within three months of the insolvency. Onerous contracts or contracts for a consideration made within thirty days are voidable if it is proved that they were made to prevent and avoid the payment of debtors or to give preference to any creditor of the insolvent.

Then follow provisions for the realization of the property. It is provided that the property may be sold in any manner which may be advised by the creditors or the inspectors. As regards the sale of real estate, there are special provisions applicable to the province of Quebec. It is provided that immovables are to be sold by public auction, and the proceeds of the sale are to be distributed by the liquidator in the usual way. Now, there is a provision under which sales made by the liquidator shall have the effect of sales by the sheriff. This was found necessary under the Winding-up Act, and so it was introduced here. It was found necessary to have a special statute passed in Quebec by which all the effects of the sheriff's sale were given to sales made by the liquidator under the Winding-up Act.

This provision has been found useful, and therefore it has been introduced here. With regard to sales in other provinces, they are made according to the manner decided by the creditors or inspectors. In Quebec the sales may be made subject to any charge that may be imposed upon the property when sold by the sheriff. This is to provide for cases where the immovables are leased or affected by other charges. It has been held, for instance, that a lease of an immovable constitutes a charge which is not annulled by the sheriff's sale. It is provided also for the case of immovables on which there are charges of life rents annuities, and so on. In all these cases, upon the demand of the creditor, the immovables may be sold subject to such charges.

There is a special section in connection with this subject. By section 64, upon the demand of a privileged or hypothecary creditor, the liquidator may be ordered by the court to sell the immovables without delay. This is to obviate the delays that may otherwise take place in the liquidation of that part of the estate.

Another sub-title deals with the distribution of the property. This is made in the ordinary way by dividend sheets, after due notice to all parties interested. Provisions are enacted for the contestation of the different claims. In connection with this part of the subject, there is a very important difference as compared with the former Insolvency Acts. These provisions are taken altogether from Sir Mackenzie Bowell's Bill. As is well known in insolvency matters, there are often found a certain number of persons who file bogus claims, claims that have no existence in law, and that are generally filed by persons having no means whatever. It becomes the duty of the liquidator to contest these claims; and more than once it has proved that the contestation of these claims was more costly than profitable to the creditors. To prevent these things, the provisions under this Bill are these: Whenever a claim is to be contested, the liquidator serves notice upon the claimant setting forth all the grounds of contestation. From that moment the claim is deemed to be contested, and is not to be put upon any list or dividend sheets that may be prepared. It is then open to the claimant, within a certain time, to serve a writ upon the liquidator to establish his claim. In ordinary cases, where the claim is a bona fide one, it is not imposing too much upon the creditor to make it necessary for him to establish it in this way. I dare say these provisions will do away with the necessity of wasting a good part of the assets of the debtor in contesting bogus claims made by insolvent parties.

Claims may also be contested either by the insolvent or by creditors. It is sufficient for the insolvent or the creditor to serve notice upon the liquidator with an order from the court, allowing the contestation, and from that moment the issue is joined, by the service of the answers and replications in the ordinary way and then the record is transmitted to the court by the liquidator and the parties are heard upon the merits of the claim.

There are provisions concerning unpaid dividends. These are to be paid over to the Minister of Finance, and whenever claimed by the parties entitled to them they are supposed to be paid to them. I do not think that this provision will have any practical results. It is so probable that all dividends allowed will be claimed that this section will not often be called into use. Provision is made for the ordinary 1 per cent duty upon the sales of immovables in Quebec for the building and jury fund.

Another section deals with benefit of proceedings. This provision is similar to that of the Act of 1875, whereby when the liquidator does not choose to act himself, a creditor may obtain an order by which he is allowed to use the name of the liquidator in suing for the recovery of any property belonging to the debtor. The benefit of such suit belongs to the party suing.

Another section deals with small estates. Whenever the proceeds from an estate do not exceed $5,000, then the estate can be dealt with by the liquidator in a much more simple and summary way. I need not dilate upon this feature, for it will be fully discussed when the details of the Bill come up for consideration.

Part 5 deals generally with the liquidators and the duties imposed upon them. A subsection determines the remuneration to be allowed to the liquidator. This point is left entirely to the creditors or the inspectors. When the creditors do not act, the inspectors are at liberty to fix the remuneration of the liquidator. There is an appeal to the court upon this point.

Part 6 deals with the ordinary offences and penalties, as when the debtor has been guilty of fraud, or refuses to give information to the liquidator, absconds or conceals his property.

Part 7 deals with procedure generally: how the meetings of creditors are to be called, who is to act as chairman, how resolutions are to be made binding upon creditors, &c. A subsection deals with the jurisdiction of the court.

The last section is one of considerable importance. It has been placed last because it was only proposed after the other parts of the Bill had been prepared. It refers to banks. As is well known, the bankers have sent a deputation to the Government, requesting that, in any legislation which might be introduced, their rights and privileges should be properly safeguarded. This section enacts that nothing in the provisions of this Act shall interfere with, or restrict, the rights and privileges conferred upon banks and banking corporations by the Bank Act.

Such are the main features of the Bill I have the honour to introduce. I do not contend that this measure is a perfect one; a perfect law is something rarely seen. In a country like this, of such great extent, and where conditions are so different in various portions, it cannot be expected that an insolvency law can be made so perfect as to give universal satisfaction; although it might be made nearly perfect when applicable to a more limited extent of territory, or to a population more homogeneous. Doubtless, many features of the Bill will provoke discussion, and will be liable to be changed. There are many details which, no doubt, after full consideration, will be found faulty, and these can be replaced by others. But I submit that the Bill, as a whole, is one that will commend itself to all the members of this House. The fact that it has been indorsed by all the boards of trade of the Dominion is sufficient to entitle it to our most serious consideration, and, indeed, to our support and adoption. The passage of the Bill, in my opinion, will prevent designing and fraudulent debtors from imposing upon legitimate business firms. I think it will protect honest merchants, and will promote honesty in business transactions. The passage of this Bill will also, in my opinion, be in the interests of both creditors and debtors; it would benefit the buyer, as well as the seller. Let me also add, that the passage of this Bill, in my opinion, would greatly promote our credit in foreign countries; it would largely contribute to the growth of confidence on the part of those from whom we might desire to ask credit. In a word, it will protect the honest as against the dishonest. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will only say, in conclusion, that any legislation that promotes credit and confidence, cannot fail to promote industrial and national prosperity. We are all proud to be able to say, since a recent period, that Canada has become a nation. We find expressions of that sort in speeches of many of our most eminent public men. Now, if Canada has become a nation—as I am quite ready to acknowledge—it seems to me, she should act as a nation, and a civilized nation, at this time of the nineteenth century, ought to have a law of this kind on its Statute-book. There is no European nation which has not in its legislation provisions of the kind I am now advocating. In France, they have a Code of Commerce, enacted in 1808, and which has remained in force ever since. In England, they have also legislation of a similar character. Among our neighbours to the south, on the 19th February last, an insolvency law was passed through Congress at Washington very much on the same lines as this one. I feel sure, that the adoption of this law, or an insolvency law on similar lines, will greatly contribute to our commercial prosperity. I am not so wedded to this Bill that I would not be willing to withdraw it at once, if I were assured by the Government, or by some members better qualified than myself, that another Bill, more perfect, would be introduced at this session. If a better Bill is introduced, or if this Bill is so modified and amended as to make it more nearly perfect, I shall not be sorry. My sole desire is, that we should now, or as soon as possible, adopt a sound and equitable insolvency law applicable to the whole Dominion.

Mr. BOURASSA. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to participate at any great length in the debate now going on in connection with the Bill before the House, as I shall not be able to add very much to the exceedingly able and exhaustive effort which the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) has just delivered. But I thought it my duty to rise on this occasion and voice the general opinion prevailing among business men, and those who are in close touch with the wants of the mercantile community, concerning the urgent and imperative necessity of having an insolvency law carried through Parliament at the earliest possible moment. I know that the old Bankruptcy Act did not meet with general favour in the country, and the reason of its being so very unpopular was the way it was applied, even without taking into account the undesirable provisions of that law. But from the fact that a law contains objectionable features or that it is not enforced in a satisfactory manner, it does not follow that it should not be replaced by another one, dealing with the same subject.

One of the difficulties incident to our social condition in Canada, and which is not met with in other countries, is that when an insolvency Act is enacted for the benefit of the trade and other interests of the country, such legislation, coming within the purview of the local legislatures which have within their own jurisdiction all that concerns civil rights, it is enforced in a different way throughout the different parts of Canada. Such is the reason why I am led to believe that a good, equitable Dominion insolvent law could be enacted by this Parliament, as would greatly benefit the trade interests of the country at large.

It is not my intention to enter into any exhaustive review of this matter in all its details as, before going through this House, this Bill must be thoroughly considered and debated, at its various stages; but all I wish to do is to review it, from the standpoint of the best interests of the country at large, and of our trade relations with foreign countries. As I do not wish to make any lengthened remarks on this question, let me say, Sir, that if we want to develop our trade intercourse with foreign nations, it is absolutely necessary for this House to enact such legislation as may provide for the general interests that are affected. We have a general law on the Customs duties, we have an Act concerning insurance matters; we have also an Act respecting banks and banking; we further have an Act concerning steamboat and railway companies. Now, these several Acts are administered by the Dominion Parliament, and offer a uniformity which, unfortunately, does not exist in the case of our insolvency laws. From the standpoint of foreign trade, our actual position is still more objectionable. The outside trader who deals in Canada finds himself face to face with a uniform Customs legislation. There is not a different law for the province of Quebec, another for the province of Ontario, and another for British Columbia. No, the tariff is the same everywhere, and is applied throughout the whole Dominion in the same way and by the same Government. So it is also with our railway and steamboat companies, and should he find himself obliged to resort to law, the foreign dealer finds a uniform law applicable to the whole country. The legislation is everywhere the same, and the courts to which he appeals are clothed with the same jurisdiction and follow the same jurisprudence. But in the matter of trade relations, our position is altogether anomalous. Traders from Great Britain, from France, from Belgium and Germany, representing individually, with the exception of Belgium, a population of about forty million people, find themselves face to face with insolvent laws enacted by the various provinces of the Dominion which do not possess that uniformity which is so desirable in such matters. It is of the utmost importance that we should have a uniform legislation applicable to the whole Dominion, in order that outside traders in their dealings with us may not find themselves face to face with a country of four million inhabitants, divided, from a legislative standpoint, into four or five provinces, in matters of such considerable importance. I would urge the Government to take this measure under their special protection, and to place upon the Statute-book a legislation on the lines of the Bill now before the House, presenting such uniformity as a law of that kind should possess, in trade matters.

I do not intend to deal at considerable length with this subject, as other hon. gentlemen who will participate in the debate will no doubt be able to throw much more light on it than I can, but let me say this, that it is in the general interests of the country to enact such a law as is calculated to remedy the grievances and remove the difficulties now prevailing. In my judgment, Parliament ought to adopt an insolvency law making provision for a simple and inexpensive machinery, a law the provisions of which in regard to creditors and debtors could be easily interpreted; in short, a general and uniform law such as we have in our Statute-book relating to railway and steamboat companies and to the customs. The Bill introduced this afternoon by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) who has treated the subject-matter of it in such an able and exhaustive manner, includes some enactments which, while securing this much-desired uniformity, also command my approval on other grounds. I refer to that portion of the Bill which makes provision for the protection of the interests of the farming community; and let me say here, Sir, that such an equitable and just provision cannot fail to commend itself to the approval of the people of this country. The Bill provides that when a trader is compelled to make an assignment of his property for the benefit of his creditors, and when there is apparently no intention to defraud his creditors on the part of the insolvent, he may obtain a general discharge from his creditors; but that discharge is not to apply under this provision to the debts he may owe to non-traders, that is to say, those creditors who have not run the common risks of trade. Under that section the unhappy but honest trader is free to resume his operations; but the provision is inserted that the debts of farmers who do not run the risks of trade, are not to be affected by this Bill. This provision of the Bill is a very fair and equitable one, and I have no doubt such as will be eagerly endorsed by all the hon. gentlemen who represent rural constituencies in this House. Under that provision of this Bill, those farmers who have sold their produce to traders will not be called upon to grant a discharge to the insolvent, because, as they have not had the chance of realizing any benefit from the trade, it is but fair that they should not be called upon to share the risks of the same.

The interests of the country at large, as also those of private citizens will therefore find ample protection under this legislation, and I trust it will go through its different stages and be placed on the Statute-book before this session is over. This Bill is well calculated to foster the general interests of trade, and to further develop our trade relations with foreign countries, a policy which was auspiciously inaugurated by the present Government from the very moment they came into power.

Mr. MONK. As one of the representatives of the district of Montreal I deem it my duty to say a few words on this Bill in order to show the urgent necessity that exists for the passage of a law on insolvency. The commercial community of the city of Montreal has taken up the subject and expressed its opinion on the same. In fact, having in view the fate which has been meted out in past years to measures of this kind, I had myself, before the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) gave notice of this Bill, given notice of a motion to the effect that it was desirable that legislation of this kind should be passed by the Dominion Parliament. At the request of the right hon. First Minister I suspended action on that motion. The reason why I proceeded in this way was, that I was desirous of testing the opinion of the House first of all, and had the opinion of the House been favourable to the passage of such a measure, then it would have seemed to me to have constituted an urgent intimation to the Government that the Government should take charge of legislation of this kind.

Sir, I have listened with a great deal of attention and pleasure to the explanations given by the hon. member for Laval of the principal parts of the Bill, which I have not yet been able to read, and I am aware that many of the provisions he has pointed out are calculated to remove some of the difficulties which existed in the working of previous insolvency laws. But I think in a matter of this kind it is impossible for any lawyer in any of the provinces, unassisted or even assisted as my hon. friend has been, to prepare a measure which will meet with the approval of every province of the Dominion; and I believe that the task being insuperable, it devolves on the Government to take charge of such a measure. However satisfactory the law which my hon. friend has prepared may be to hon. members who will be brought in the way of carrying out its provisions daily in Montreal, it is almost safe to say that some of those provisions will not meet the wants of other provinces. It seems to me, therefore, that the task which my hon. friend has taken upon himself is one in which at all events he should be assisted by the Government; and the reason for that is obvious. The Government is better able in every respect to give a finished measure which would inspire confidence and satisfy the wants of every part of this Dominion, in which there are so many provinces having different systems of law. The Government is in a position to weigh the representations which for a certain time past have been made from all sources setting forth the grievances of all classes, commercial and others; and the Government also possesses the facilities for obtaining reliable information from all the provinces, through commercial bodies, judges, lawyers, bankers and accountants, and is in that way able to prepare legislation which will meet the requirements of every province and not clash in any way with the systems of legislation so diverse one from the other which exist in the different provinces.

At the time of confederation the underlying principle actuating the framers of our constitution was that all matters of general interest should be confided to our legislative power here, and surely there is no matter of such general interest as the subject of legislation in respect to insolvency. Year after year our interprovincial commerce is increasing in a remarkable degree, and there is an obvious necessity in consequence of that for obtaining a uniform law throughout the Dominion on the subject of insolvency. It is also equally essential, as was pointed out by the last speaker, that parties from outside dealing commercially with the Dominion should not find themselves face to face with a varied system of legislation in regard to a matter of this kind, but they should find a general system of law equally applicable throughout the entire Dominion. In my own province we have not been able to deal with the subject of insolvency, but we have a law, as I think was pointed out by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin), in regard to the abandonment of property, which possesses many good features. It provides for the punishment of frauds and fraudulent debtors, it provides for the distribution equitably of all assets of traders who are unable to meet their liabilities as they fall due. There is, as I have said, many good features in that law. It is simple in its operation, and provides for an even distribution, subject, of course, to privileged claims, which exist under the civil law, largely French in its origin. But it is not properly an insolvent law, and there is not that particularity in its operation which would be so valuable if we had a Dominion insolvent law whose operation would be controlled by the Dominion authorities. Moreover, many of the privileges existing under the law in regard to the abandonment of property are open to objection, and have been severely criticised by our commercial community. There is also another very serious defect to which my hon. friend has adverted in the course of his remarks, and that is the lack of provision for the discharge of honest debtors. The result of these defects is, that there have been numberless complaints from bankers and the commercial community generally, and there is a manifest desire throughout our province, at least in the large cities, for the passage of an insolvency law. To give an instance of the anomaly which the administration of our law of abandonment sometimes presents, I may read to the House a statement which appeared in one of the Montreal newspapers, the "Star," a short time ago. The writer, who is a member of the bar, says :

The interest you take in the question of an insolvency law induces me to ask you to place before your readers the official report of the curator in the case of a man who, a very short time before his failure showed considerable surplus. The figures are remarkable. The man also is not "contraignable par corps," as he was doing business in his wife's name. He could only be reached through his wife, and in our time nobody would think of imprisoning a woman in a matter of this kind when her name is in most cases made use of without her knowledge. The names, for obvious reasons, are suppressed.

This possibly occurred because of the absence of that provision which would have permitted the insolvent to obtain a discharge under favourable circumstances and continue business in his own name. It is therefore, so far as we in the province of Quebec are concerned, and more particularly in the city of Montreal, and I believe the same condition of things exists throughout all the commercial centres of the Dominion, most important that we should have an insolvency law. I hope the Government, if I may use the expression, will not shirk its responsibility in regard to the satisfying of that want, but will take this measure under its protection so that before the end of this session we shall have an insolvency law which will as far as possible meet the requirements of our commercial community.

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Speaker, the able speech of the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) in introducing this Bill, as well as the able speeches made by the other hon. gentlemen (Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Monk) leaves very little for me to say on this important question. It has been clearly demonstrated, Sir, by these hon. gentlemen, that it is imperative we should have a uniform insolvency law for the whole Dominion of Canada. I may say that I came to Ottawa to interview the Government on the same deputation from the Montreal Board of Trade as did the hon. member for Laval, and we then put our case strongly before the Government. I am more convinced to-day than ever, that we should have a Dominion Bankruptcy Act, because I am certain that the merchants of Canada are suffering from the want of one, and more particularly do the merchants of Montreal experience great hardship because of the existing state of things. The merchants of the province of Québec, especially of Montreal, have found that in dealing with other provinces they have been at a great disadvantage, and I sincerely hope that the Government will take this insolvency measure under their special protection, and will assist in its passage during this session of Parliament.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to participate at any length in the debate that is now in progress in connection with the Bill just introduced by my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Fortin). For my part, I must confess that I would have liked the Government to have made it a ministerial measure. The importance of this Bill is such, and the influence of the Government is so great that if they were to use it to push this Bill through, it would undoubtedly be adopted by both branches of Parliament. Since the insolvency law of 1875 was repealed, several attempts have been made in this House to pass new insolvent laws. For some reason or other, these attempts at legislation all proved abortive, either on account of the deficiencies incident to the Bills introduced in Parliament, or because the House was not favourably disposed towards enacting legislation of this kind, after the law of 1875 had been repealed in 1880. But unless the Bill is taken charge of by the Government and made a ministerial measure, I am afraid it will meet the fate which has been meted out in past years to previous insolvency Bills. The necessity for such legislation as this is admittedly more imperative to-day than it has ever been. The experience of the country, since the repeal of the law in 1880, has satisfied everybody that there is an urgent necessity for an insolvency legislation. If the Insolvent Act of 1875 became unpopular it was not, as stated by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin), owing to the fact that the official assignees who were appointed and acted under this Act, abused their position, but because the law was held responsible for the commercial depression which prevailed throughout the country, from 1875 to 1880. But it is a well-known fact that all the disasters experienced by the trade of the country, for which that Act was held responsible, resulted neither from the law itself nor from its general application, but from the sad condition of affairs which was the outcome of the commercial crisis which took place in the United States in 1876, the injurious effects of which were felt all over Canada.

In 1880 the Government, in order to make political capital, deemed it proper to repeal the Act of 1875. But, I ask, have failures since then been less numerous? Have frauds been curtailed? Did trade benefit by the repeal of that law? Decidedly no, and no better evidence could be adduced than the fact that, since the bankruptcy law was repealed, four or five attempts at reviving it have been made in this House. Still, the country is more prosperous than ever, business is improving in all directions, and in spite of all that, the trade of the country demands the protection of an insolvency law. In order to be operative, that law should be made uniform and applicable to the whole Dominion.

As stated a little while ago, in an eloquent manner, by an hon. gentleman, tradesmen in England and on the continent have asked for the passage of such a law, as the goods shipped into this country come under as many different laws as there are different provinces, and they are at a loss whether the goods shipped by them will not be assigned to other creditors, under the form of chattel mortgage, or whether they will remain in the possession of those to whom they are sold. But, Sir, foreigners and merchants in England and other European countries are not the only ones who clamour for an Insolvency Act; our wholesale merchants are not less pressing in their demand, as their trade relations extend over the whole Dominion, and as the difficulties experienced by French and English exporters are intensified in the case of our wholesale merchants who carry on dealings with a larger number of traders scattered all over the Dominion. As to the retail trade, it also needs the protection of such a legislation. It often happens that an honest but unfortunate trader, who has lost his fortune and all his capital, needs the protection of the law in order to be enabled to obtain his discharge, after his estate has been wound up for the benefit of his creditors. Therefore, all the different classes of the community need the protection of an insolvent law, and it would be an egregious mistake to believe that a well-devised law could prove detrimental to any class of the community.

It is not my intention now to criticise the statement made by the hon. member for Laval, in introducing his Bill, only let me tell him this, that notwithstanding his strictures on the operation of the law of 1875, his Bill is about a copy of the same Act. But, if the gentleman has introduced but few new features into his Bill I must say that he has imported into it some fresh complications. For instance, under the hon. gentleman's Bill the receiving order is to be addressed to the sheriff, and that officer is only called upon to take possession of the assets of the insolvent and to act as guardian of the estate, without his having to make an inventory of the estate. That officer, therefore, under this Bill, is only a man having an order of the court to take possession of the assets of the insolvent. My hon. friend wants also the majority in value of the creditors to appoint a guardian, who will be appointed by the court upon a petition to that effect. That guardian may make an inventory, call a new meeting of the creditors, and the latter may then appoint a liquidator who will take possession of the estate and wind up the same for their benefit. Well, Sir, under the operation of the Act of 1875, matters were less complicated. Under that Act, the winding-up order was to be sent to an official assignee, who forthwith took possession of the insolvent's estate, made the inventory and called a meeting of the creditors. Why should the sheriff and the guardian interfere here? If the sheriff is only appointed in order to take possession of the insolvent's estate, he does not require two officers nor a meeting of the creditors to ascertain the opinion of the majority, as to who ought to be appointed guardian. Why not give to one single officer the power to attend to those proceedings? The operation of the law of 1875 was much less complicated and its machinery much less expensive than that provided by the present Bill. Under the plea that the Act of 1875 was unsatisfactory, it was deemed necessary to modify its provisions; but instead of innovating in the right direction, you are only providing a much more complicated and expensive machinery.

These are, in a nut-shell, all the provisions of the Bill now under consideration, concerning the appointment of a liquidator. But with respect to the discharge of the insolvent, I did not quite understand whether the hon. gentleman meant to make provision purely and simply for a discharge or for a composition and discharge. I know that under the operation of the law of 1875, it often occurred that, after the insolvent's estate had been wound up and the dividends paid, when the debtor could not secure the consent of his creditors, he applied to the court to obtain his discharge. Is this case covered by the hon. gentleman's Bill? From what he told us, there is provision made for a composition; but, I ask him, how can the debtor obtain his discharge from his creditors, once the estate has been wound up? If such a provision is not included in the Bill, it ought to be inserted.

This is the policy of an insolvency law: To provide the creditors with an expeditious and economical means of placing the insolvent's estate at their disposal. Such a law ought, therefore, to provide for an easy means of realizing the assets, and also of punishing any fraud whatsoever, and further to protect the honest debtor who is a victim to unfortunate circumstances, instead of delivering him over to the tender mercies of his creditors. What should happen, were the Bill not to make such a provision in order to protect the debtor? Small creditors would take advantage of circumstances to prevent an unfortunate debtor from obtaining his discharge, from becoming a free man and being set on his feet again. That unfortunate trader would, perhaps, be compelled to expatriate himself, owing to certain creditors refusing to give him his discharge. The court should, therefore, be empowered to protect unfortunate debtors from the ill-will of certain creditors. I am glad to say that in the outline of the Bill presented by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin), there are many provisions which undoubtedly reach the object which a legislation of this kind ought to aim at.

I trust that the Government, should they take this Bill under their charge, or should they deem it proper to introduce another one, will see to it that such provisions are inserted as are calculated to render the operation of the law as efficacious and fair as possible.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sure the House fully appreciates the able and exhaustive manner in which my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Fortin) has treated the important question which he has brought to the attention of Parliament, and in so far as I have been able to follow the outline he has given of the provisions of this Bill, I think we may all agree, that if we are to have an insolvency law it would be difficult to prepare a better measure than the one which my hon. friend (Mr. Fortin) submitted to the House. Of course, it may not be absolutely perfect in all its details. I cannot for my part, reluctantly as I have to say it, accept the compliment which was paid us a moment ago by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), when he said that the Government would be better able to devise a law of this nature than would a private member. Much as I value such a compliment coming from an hon. gentleman who as a rule is not overburdened with confidence in the Government, still I cannot accept it altogether. I must say with all due humiliation that I do not think the Government could have devised any such Bill better than the hon. member (Mr. Fortin) or better than could the hon. gentleman from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) himself. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) has stated, and the same remark has been made by other members, that this is a measure which should have been introduced by the Government. The Government have had this subject under their consideration for some months. Indeed it is not new, for the late Government considered it also and prepared a measure on this subject. In so far as the present Government is concerned, we have been reluctant to make this a Government measure, for the reason that it is to be apprehended that the moment the Government did so, it might be treated as a political measure, and above all things such a Bill should be treated not as a political one, but simply from a commercial point of view, and from no other. I would recall to the memory of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), and to other members who expressed the same opinion, that our most important insolvency law, that of 1864 which lasted from that year down to 1875 and was then reconstructed upon the same lines; I would recall to their memory that that law was introduced and carried through the House, not by the Government of Sir John Macdonald then in power, but by Sir John Abbott, who at that time was a prominent supporter of the Administration but was not in the Cabinet. That measure introduced by Sir John Abbott, was carried through as we know with the assistance of the Government, but not as a ministerial measure. In consequence the party contests which perhaps might have assailed that Bill did not arise; the Bill was treated simply as a commercial one, and I believe the country did not suffer from such a proceeding. In 1875 the Government of Mr. Mackenzie undertook to recast that law and they proposed the new Bill as a ministerial measure. From that moment, as we well remember—without looking into the motives which dictated what took place—from that moment the insolvency law of Mr. Mackenzie was treated as a political question, and it was made one of the grounds of attack against the Administration in the elections of 1878. I therefore think it is far preferable that this question should be approached as it has been approached now, and the Bill introduced by a private member so that members on both sides of the House may approach it with a view of obtaining the very best results possible.

There is a division of opinion as to whether or not there should be an insolvency law applying to the whole of Canada. One strong reason why a general insolvency law has been formerly attacked, is to some extent obviated by this Bill. What must be a prominent feature in every insolvency Act, namely, the discharge of the debtor from his liability, is of course included in this Bill, but the provision is inserted that the debts of non-traders—that is to say of farmers and mechanics, and so on, are not to be affected by this law. If as a result of the insolvency law, a trader can obtain a discharge from his liability, that discharge is not to apply under this Bill to the debts he may owe to non-traders such as farmers, mechanics and professional men. Perhaps this will remove a feature from the insolvency law which up to this time to my certain knowledge has been held to be an almost insuperable difficulty in passing such a measure. It may perhaps be held by many that such a law ought to come within the purview of the local legislatures which have within their own jurisdiction all that concerns civil rights. It is always an invidious thing to deprive any man of his assets, or what ought to be his assets. The laws of the province of Quebec in that respect are, I believe, superior to the laws of any other province; and if the principles that prevail in that province were accepted by all the other provinces, there would perhaps be the less necessity for such a measure as this. Under the provisions of the French civil law everything that pertains to a debtor is pledged to his creditors, and he cannot divest himself of it. If he is, I will not say in an actual state of insolvency, but in such a state that his assets are not sufficient to meet his liabilities, he cannot make any contract whereby he would deprive any one of his creditors of the right of sharing in his estate, share and share alike, with all the other creditors. That is the main reason why an insolvency law is so much desired in some quarters, that is to say, among the merchants. As the law is at present in some of the other provinces, a man can make an assignment and give a preference to some of his creditors whom he chooses to favour, or he may make contracts which will practically make him insolvent, which will deprive him of all the assets that he has, and leave nothing to the other creditors, who are not on the premises, or who are not so fortunate as to have his favour. This is what makes the desire for an insolvency law so universal as it is at the present time. The principles of the French civil law which prevail in the province of Quebec have been gradually extended to other provinces; and I am informed that at this moment there is before the legislature of Nova Scotia a Bill which provides for the distribution of the assets among the creditors. How far it goes I do not know at the present time? If it be the wish of Parliament to approach this subject, the Government will be only too willing to give every possible assistance, so as to carry out the absolute desire and opinion of the members on both sides of the House. For my part, I would deprecate such a measure as this being made a party measure. If it be possible to approach the question simply in a commercial spirit, with a view to devising the best possible law for the trade of the country, the Government will be glad to assist my hon. friend in carrying his measure; but before the Government undertakes to facilitate the passage of the measure, I think we have a right to have an expression of opinion on both sides of the House on the question, whether such a law is desirable or is not desirable.

Mr. ANGERS. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I have but a few words to add to the able and eloquent statements made by the hon. gentlemen who have taken part in the discussion now going on on the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin). I may say that an insolvency law is an absolute necessity. It is an uncontroverted fact about which we are all agreed. I am aware, however, that the passage of such a law is attended with considerable difficulty. But, from the fact that a remedy is not administered without difficulty, it does not follow that those who are called upon to administer it, in order to root out a disease, ought to shrink from applying it when necessary.

Our home trade, as well as our foreign trade, which are improving in all directions, demand that Canada, like all other countries, should have an insolvency law. Now, if it is imperative that we should have such a law, let us enact it and make it as efficient as possible. There are several reasons why the adoption of an insolvent law has been adjourned from year to year, since the repeal of the Act of 1875; and, I may mention among other causes, the abuses which had crept in under the previous acts, and several other causes, foreign to these Acts, which made them less efficient. It is not my intention now to lay the blame or the responsibility for such a state of things on anybody. I am aware that the previous Acts were not as perfect as could be; and I know also that some official assignees did abuse their position and bring discredit upon the law itself. If there were assignees to be complained of, there were also found respectable men among them. In my opinion, it would be a wise course, when enacting a law of this kind, to so frame it as not to place the responsible officers in such a position as to give them an option between their duty and their personal interests. I believe that even an honest assignee is always human and that it is always dangerous to give a man such powers as would put him in the situation of having to choose between his duty and his interests. I do not wish to enter into a detailed review of the Bill under consideration. For my part, I think the Bill in its main lines is equitable and well devised. The outline given of it by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fortin) was clear and forcible, and, as everybody could see, it produced a marked impression upon the House. This Bill, to my mind, includes provisions which are a decided improvement over the previous laws and which will prove most beneficial in practice.

I was happy to hear the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) state that, far from treating this Bill with indifference, the Government would be glad to facilitate its passage. I also heard with pleasure the hon. Prime Minister deprecating such measure being made a party measure, and expressing the wish that both sides of the House would see their way to assist in having inscribed upon the Statute-book as perfect a law as possible. As we are threatened with a long session, there will be plenty of time for this Bill being put through. I make bold to say, Sir, that before this session is brought to a close, a notable portion of our sittings will be taken up in debating more or less idle questions. If, when the session is over, all the hon. gentlemen could call each other to witness that they have striven, to the utmost of their power, to secure the passage of such an insolvency law as would meet the wants of the country, it would prove most consoling to those who are liable to trespass upon the forbearance of the House, while, at the same time, it would be a compensation for those who had to listen to their utterances.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the remarks of the Premier will not be very acceptable to the mercantile community of Canada, or to the mercantile community of Great Britain. We have been told that one result of the preferential tariff is that the trade of Great Britain has largely increased and will continue largely to increase. There is no doubt that the merchants of Great Britain are very anxious that an efficient insolvent Act should be passed by this Parliament; but I have myself very little hope that such an Act will be passed unless the Government assume responsibility for it. If any measure is important, this is most important; and if the Government should frame other important measures, I see no reason why they should seek to escape responsibility for a measure of this kind. I think there is no reason to fear, as the Premier intimated there might be, that the Opposition would indulge in any factious opposition to a measure of this kind. It is not a measure which ought to be made a party question. I am not advocating that at all. I think it is a measure which should receive fair and full consideration by the members of this House without reference to party. It is purely a business measure. At the same time, I agree with the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) that it is a measure of such importance that it should be taken charge of by the Government, and they should see that it is made as good as it can possibly be made. While I have the greatest respect for the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin), still I think one man cannot frame as good a measure as the Government, who have a great many resources at their command which no individual has. Another reason why the Government should take charge of this Bill is this, that if they did take charge of it, they would urge it on and see that it was pushed through this House. But if it is left in the hands of a private member, I am afraid there will be very little possibility of its going through the House this session. We have not heard the opinion of the Government at all on this measure. I do not know whether the Government have an opinion upon it. The Prime Minister did not say whether the Government were in favour of an insolvent Bill of any kind. He did say that if Parliament showed itself favourable to a measure such as has been introduced by the hon. member for Laval, the Government would facilitate its passage. That is not expressing any opinion of the Government on the subject at all. I think the House and the country are entitled to know whether the Government are or are not in favour of an insolvent Bill. I think the country is waiting to know that. There is no doubt that some people have great objections to an insolvent Act. Under the former insolvent Act there were a great many abuses, and in the minds of many people there is a great prejudice against any such law. At the same time, there is no doubt that the merchants of our large cities who are dealing all over the Dominion, feel that a Dominion insolvent law is an absolute necessity. While the laws of Ontario and Quebec on this subject may be satisfactory, the laws in the other provinces, so I am informed, are not satisfactory. What is wanted is a Dominion insolvent Act. I only rose to say that I think the Government should let us know whether or not they are in favour of an insolvent Bill—I do not say this Bill which has been introduced, because they may give us a better one. We want a Bill which is simple and inexpensive, and which will yet provide for the winding-up of an estate expeditiously. One objection to the previous insolvent Act was that it was too expensive. Under it we found the assignees getting rich, while the creditors did not get much out of the estate. That was my experience—I was in business then—and that was one reason why it was repealed. But that defect can no doubt be remedied; it should be remedied. I would urge the Government to let us know now whether they are in favour of an insolvent law for the whole Dominion or are opposed to such a law. If they are in favour of one, then we will know what we may expect. If they are opposed to it, we may as well know that we shall have no insolvent law at all. Unless the Government take charge of this Bill and make it a Government measure, I am afraid we shall have no insolvent Act passed this session, and if not there will be great disappointment among the mercantile community both of Great Britain and of Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, there is to-day an urgent necessity for an insolvent law. I do not know what the provisions of this law are, but some of them, it appears to me, are such as the commercial community require, and as would also suit non-traders. I agree with the right hon. leader of the Government, that one of the strong objections to the old law was, that non-traders were brought under the operations of that law to the extent that they were deprived of what was coming to them when an insolvency took place, while at the same time they were compelled to pay all that they owed to an insolvent. I understood the right hon. First Minister to say, that in this proposed law there is a provision which prevents that injustice. That, I think, will be in the right direction, and will be accepted by the great farming community as satisfactory. I only regret that the Government has not seen fit to introduce the Bill. They should take the responsibility of it, and then it would be more likely to get through. The commercial community have been asking for an insolvency law for a long time, and it is time that Parliament woke up and gave them what they desire.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT.

Mr. PENNY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 85) to amend chapter 99 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, being the General Inspection Act. He said: The only explanation I have to give is, that the grocers of Montreal have asked me to introduce this Bill, which is intended to remedy a grievance from which they suffer at present. At present, a great deal of the fruit brought to Montreal arrives in an unsalable condition, and the trade desire the appointment of an inspector.

Mr. CRAIG.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BREAKWATER AT BELLE RIVER, P.E.I.

Mr. MARTIN asked,

1. Does the Government intend to assume control of the breakwater at Belle River, in Prince Edward Island?

2. Has the Government engineer reported as to the importance of this work?

3. If so, what is the nature of the report, and does it refer to the condition of the breakwater or the amount required for its extension?

4. Does the Government intend to extend and improve it, and if so, when?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I have already answered these questions.

CROW'S NEST PASS RAILWAY AGREEMENT.

Mr. McINNES asked,

Has the Government received the grant of 50,000 acres of coal-bearing lands from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or any other company, as contemplated by section "I" of the agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway? If so, from what company, and when? If not, what steps are being taken to select the said 50,000 acres, and to secure the performance by the company of its obligations as specified in the said section?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Government has not yet received the grant of 50,000 acres, or any other number of acres of coal-bearing lands, as contemplated by section I. of the agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The lands cannot be conveyed by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Government until they are earned from the British Columbia Government by the construction of that portion of the railway to which the British Columbia land subsidy applies. I understand, the lands have not yet been earned or received from the British Columbia Government.

YUKON MINING REGULATIONS.

Mr. DOMVILLE (by Mr. Ellis) asked.

If under the mining regulations in the Yukon district the words "The certificate shall also grant to the holder thereof, &c., also the privilege of cutting timber: for actual necessities, for building houses, boats, and for general mining operations," apply to timber leases granted by the Government, or is it to be construed to apply to ungranted timber districts?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: The mining regulations further provide, that the privilege referred to "shall not extend to timber which may have been heretofore, or which may hereafter be granted to other persons or corporations."

The words quoted by the hon. gentleman do not, therefore, apply to timber licenses granted by the Government, and they are to be construed to apply to territory not covered by timber licenses.

THE YUKON RAILWAY LAND GRANT.

Mr. DAVIN (by Mr. Monk) asked,

What ground had the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce for saying: "I have not the slightest doubt that Mackenzie & Mann would be very ready to exchange, for a very moderate subsidy in hard cash, their large land grant; in fact, we have excellent reason to know that they would"?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I beg to state, that the words used here are not quite correctly reported. What I did say was, that I had not the slightest doubt Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann would have been very ready to have exchanged a large portion of their land grant for a very moderate subsidy in hard cash, for which statement I have quite sufficient reason.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to raise a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker, I am credibly informed, and believe I can establish, that Arthur Aimé Bruneau, Esquire, then member for the electoral district of Richelieu in this House did, during the present session of Parliament declare, according to the form of statute in such case made and provided, his intention to resign his seat;

That Joseph Godbout, Esquire, the member for the electoral district of Beauce, and John McMillan, Esquire, the member for the electoral district of the South Riding of Huron, were witnesses to the said declaration;

That the said declaration is, as I believe can be established, the document referred to in the following statement of His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons, addressed to the House of Commons, on March 14th, 1898.

I move as follows:—

François Arthur Marcotte, member of the House of Commons for the county of Champlain, having stated in his place that he was credibly informed and believed he could establish that Arthur Aimé Bruneau, Esquire, then member for the Electoral District of Richelieu in this House, did during the present session of Parliament declare, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, his intention to resign his seat.

That Joseph Godbout, Esquire, the member for the Electoral District of Beauce, and John

McMillan, Esquire, the member for the Electoral District of the South Riding of Huron, were witnesses to the said declaration.

That the said declaration is, he believed he could establish, the document referred to in the following statement of His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed to the House of Commons on March 14th, 1898:

"Before calling the Orders of the Day I would like to mention to the House a matter which is of the nature of privilege, and which I see has been connected by the press with the seat of an honourable member—the member for Richelieu. It is stated that I have received his resignation. If I had received his resignation I should have issued my warrant for a new election before now. The only occasion when I have had any communication from or with Mr. Bruneau this session was on Friday morning. I had just come into my office when Mr. Bruneau came in. He asked me if I had received a letter from him. I told him I had not. He said he had called to get a letter back which he had written to me. I told him to wait and I would look among my mail, for I had not yet opened any letters. I turned the unopened letters over in his presence and he pointed to one with his frank upon it. I asked him if it was his writing on the address and frank. He assured me it was. He told me nothing of its contents and I asked him nothing, but handed him the letter unopened and he took it away with him. So far as I know it had come to my office through the post office, for I had not seen it before. I mention this to avoid any mistake as to facts as far as I am concerned."

That this declaration was tendered within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 5 of Chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and yet the said Arthur Aimé Bruneau, Esquire, continues to sit in the House of Commons.

Resolved, That this statement, including the statement of the Honourable the Speaker be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Election to inquire into the facts, to examine into the legal questions arising in the case, and to search for Parliamentary precedents applicable thereto, and to report to this House the result of their inquiry and whether any and if so what further proceedings should be taken by this House in the premises.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I must express my regret that my hon. friend did not deem it advisable to give any notice of this motion. As he has not done so, I would ask that this matter be deferred until to-morrow. We will take it up to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER. The paper read by the hon. member is partly in English and partly in French. I suppose we will take it to be read.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is not all in French, Mr. Speaker; the resolution is in French and the statement is in English. I should like to say in justice for the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) that he told him that he informed the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) that he would mention this matter to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER. It stands as a notice, then?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
Yes, the first thing to-morrow.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to put myself straight before the country. I have here an extract from the "Gazette," of Montreal, which places me in a very false position. It is probably based on a mistake in "Hansard" which I should have corrected if I had seen it, but did not know of it until my attention was called to it.

It came out in debate in the House of Commons on Thursday night that Mr. Domville, M.P., was financially interested in the shipment of whisky into the far North-west. Mr. Domville is a Liberal supporter of the Laurier Government. It would take a good many—

—I am looking at my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) now—

—a good many W.C.T.U.—

—whatever that may mean—

—delegations to offset his pull and prevent the issue of permits for the transport of stuff parliamentarians may make money out of.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I beg to state here that I am not interested, directly or indirectly, in any liquor going into the North-west Territories, nor in any permits. I think, perhaps, our company may have been mixed up with some companies that are shipping whisky in. I wish to have corrected now in the "Hansard" the following few lines:—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Surely you are not all so prejudiced that you will not hear a word from me. I speak most emphatically on that subject, and I say that when Sir Louis Davies wrote that letter, he had no idea—

Now it goes on to say:

—that I was going to transport whisky into the Yukon country.

That is what I said. There was much disturbance made on the other side of the House. I do not know why they should do it. But I see at times, in the evening especially, they make quite a little disturbance. What I said was this: in writing his letter Sir Louis Davies would feel satisfied from those surrounding me that we were not going to trade in liquor in that country—not that we were going to trade. The House was discussing the Stikine-Teslin Railway, and I threw the remark across the floor that it must be a good road to get $500 per man from their passengers and they walk part of the way, or something of that kind. It had been said that was what each man would pay. Further I said it was a good road without whisky. I should like to have that set right in "Hansard." Whatever other companies may be doing—a company has a right to trade as it likes—I disclaim most emphatically for myself and for the company that we are connected with or have anything to do with the liquor traffic in that country.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am sure that the member of "Hansard" now at the table will take down accurately what the hon. member (Mr. Domville) has said.

BREAKWATER AT BELLE RIVER.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to call the attention of the House to the question to which I have already referred. I have turned up the "Hansard" for last Monday, and I fail to find any reply by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) to the question. If my memory serves me well, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was not in his place when the question was called. I think also that the hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) asked that the question be allowed to stand. At any rate, I have here the "Hansard" of last Monday and I do not see that the question was replied to. I would like to get an answer to the question and not be put off any longer. I want a straight answer, yes or no.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I am sure I answered the question. If my hon. friend (Mr. Martin) will look at page 1838 of the "Hansard," he will find the question asked and answered.

Mr. SPEAKER. As the hon. member was out of the House at the time the question was called, it was asked for him by another hon. member.

Mr. MARTIN. I beg to withdraw what I said. But I may explain that the question on the Order paper was just before one standing in the name of the hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Yeo), and it does not appear in the same order in "Hansard."

THE VACANCY IN WEST PRINCE.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask whether the returning officer for West Prince has been named for the election to be held?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The returning officer has not yet been appointed.

Mr. MONTAGUE. To-morrow?

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, to-morrow.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Or afterwards.

BETTER OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 2) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday, as a day of rest.

(In the Committee.)

It being Six o'clock, the committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Committee resumed consideration of Bill No. 2) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day.

On section 1,

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thought there was an amendment to that clause moved by the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. A sub-amendment has been moved to that clause which I will read :

That all the words in the Bill after the word "who" in the 10th line, down to the words "defamatory libel" in the 25th line, be struck out, and that the following be substituted therefor :—"Sells, or employs, or procures any person to sell any article or commodity on Sunday, except drugs or medicines, or articles for surgical and medical use."

Mr. McCLEARY. Will that meet the case of prohibiting the sale of American newspapers? because if the interpretation that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) put upon subsection "b" last night, is correct, it certainly does not meet the needs of the case, because if there is anything we have to complain of at all in this country, it is the selling of American newspapers on Sunday.

Mr. CHARLTON. Subsection "b" meets the case of selling American newspapers on Sunday in Canada.

Mr. McCLEARY. I think the hon. member took the ground last night that it referred to publishers and proprietors only.

Mr. CHARLTON. It prohibits the selling, and in the absence of the publisher or proprietor or manager, the person responsible for having the paper sold would be liable to action.

Sub-amendment negatived.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question is now on the amendment to add, after subsection "b," these words : "sells, or employs, or procures any person to sell any newspaper issued or published on Sunday."

Mr. McCLEARY. I am satisfied that the interpretation put upon this section last night by the hon. member for North Norfolk and by the Solicitor General that these words "sells or employs," particularly the first one, would not prohibit the newsboys selling American newspapers in Canada on Sunday, but that it only bears upon the proprietor and publisher. I say if that is the case, we cannot get at the publishers or proprietors of American newspapers.

Mr. CHARLTON. When this Bill was first introduced last session, the provision relating to the matter we now have under consideration was as follows :—

Whoever shall, upon the Lord's Day, in the capacity of a proprietor, publisher or manager, engage in the publication and issuing of any newspaper, journal or periodical, for the purpose of sale, either by carrier or newsboy, at any news stand or store upon that day, and whosoever shall engage in the sale of any newspaper on that day, shall be deemed guilty of an indictable offence; but nothing in this section shall be held to prevent the gratuitous distribution of religious publications upon the Lord's Day.

This Bill was referred to the then Minister of Justice, Sir Oliver Mowat, and he suggested a change in the phraseology of this section, and drafted one. That draft which emanated from the Minister of Justice, was considered and reported by the Committee of the Whole House as it is introduced to-day, considered by the Solicitor General, and he preferred it to the original draft, and it was therefore adopted. The House has already acted on the very section we are considering to-night, and it acted favourably; but the Bill did not receive its final action last session, owing to the fact that the leader of the Government was called to England to attend the Jubilee proceedings there, and in consequence of his departure, all private legislation was dropped, this Bill among others. But this Bill received the sanction of the House last year in Committee, for which the Minister of Justice last year was responsible; this section he drafted, and I believe it merits all the requirements of the case. Let us go briefly over the Bill. The first section states :

(a.) Being the proprietor, publisher or manager of any newspaper, publishes or issues, or prepares for publication or issue, any copy or number of such newspaper for sale on Sunday, or with the intent that such copy or number shall be sold on Sunday; or

(b.) Sells or employs or procures any person to sell any newspaper on Sunday.

As a matter of course, if the newspaper was a foreign paper, and was brought here and sold by newsboys, the publisher, manager or proprietor by whom the paper was issued might not be within the reach of the law here; but these papers are sent here to agents, and I hold that, under this clause, in the absence of the publisher or manager, the agents, as the representatives, would be amenable to the penalties of the law. I think that is a sound position, and I give it as my opinion, that this would be the case. If not, and this law went into operation, we would soon have demonstration as to whether this was the fact or not. If the law proved to be defective on this point, it could be remedied. The next provision is as follows :—

Provided that the publishing or issuing, or preparing for publication or issue of any copy or number of a religious newspaper for distribution on Sunday, or with the intent that it shall be distributed on Sunday, shall not be an offence under this section.

I believe the Bill fully covers the ground, and that we cannot improve it. I ask my hon. friends to accept the Bill, which has received the careful consideration of the highest legal authorities, of Sir Oliver Mowat and of the Solicitor General, and has received full and due consideration from the friends of the Bill, who desire to secure efficient legislation against Sunday newspapers. Let us allow the Bill to pass, and if it goes into operation, I think it will prove to be a law that will be found efficient for the purpose intended; and if it does not meet the purpose, the House can subsequently remedy any defect ascertained during its actual working. We are liable, by submitting hastily considered amendments and sub-amendments, to practically destroy the Bill, so far as efficiency is concerned, and I ask my fellow-members, as this is a matter to which I have given great attention, and I am exceedingly anxious to secure a proper Bill, to allow the Bill to be reported by the committee.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman has made the statement, that the Bill is supported by the highest legal authorities. I submit, that the Minister of Justice is the highest legal authority.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Minister of Justice at the time this Bill was drafted was the authority to whom I referred.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister of Justice in the present Cabinet, as I showed, by a quotation from the record, last night, declared that this Bill, while within our power, trespassed on ground which the constitution gave to the provinces, and not only so, but that this was a Bill which might cause trouble.

Mr. CHARLTON. I call attention to the fact, that the present Minister of Justice has never had this Bill under consideration, that he has never made any remarks on this Bill, that his remarks were offered on the general principle as to the matter of jurisdiction; that is, not something which pertains to the character of the Bill in detail, but to the general principle of the Bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is quite true. The hon. gentleman says, that the Bill, in its present form, was not before the present Minister of Justice when he made the speech which I quoted last night, and, as the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) reminds me, neither was the Bill in its present shape before Sir John Thompson when he gave his opinion; and, therefore, one counterbalances the other. I submit, that if the hon. member who introduced this Bill will read the argument of the Hon. Mr. Mills, then member for Bothwell, and the present Minister of Justice, he will find that the hon. gentleman declared there were certain clauses in that Bill which properly came within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. No doubt, he referred to the clauses relating to the running of trains and steamboats on the Sabbath. He will also find the hon. gentleman stated, that, as regards certain other provisions of the Bill, those covered by the present Bill, were matters relating to civil rights and municipal control, with which the provinces have a right to deal, and which he properly and correctly declared the province of Ontario had already dealt with. While I have no personal interest in the matter, I think the committee ought to have the opinion of the Government on the Bill, more particularly as their own Minister of Justice declared, that the Bill is not a proper Bill to pass in this Parliament. It is useless to pass a Bill that is superfluous and meddling, as the present Minister of Justice declared this portion of the Bill to be, while he was a member of this House. The opinion then held by the present Minister of Justice, I have no hesitation in saying, he holds still; and for this House to pass a Bill which the Minister of Justice must criticise adversely in the other Chamber, speaking as the representative of the Government, would be an act of folly.

Mr. CHARLTON. Does the hon. gentleman think it could not be passed over his opinion in the other Chamber?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I think the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) was not in the House when the Prime Minister gave his opinion in respect to this Bill, and, although he did not give it as the opinion of the Government, he gave it as the expression of his opinion as the leader of the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I was not present.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Therefore, the contention put forward by the hon. gentleman falls to the ground. I rise to say, that the amendment which I moved in committee last night, believing that it was carrying out the principle to its legitimate conclusion, was one which I considered would be a necessary corollary to the Bill. At the same time, I feel that the promoter of this Bill has made an appeal to members of the House not to load the Bill with any extraneous matter which might give rise to difficulty, or might endanger in any way or sense the passage of the Bill through the House. While I considered the amendment to be quite in line with the Bill, and would be a necessary corollary to the Bill. However, if the Bill passed into law, some such amendment could easily be enacted in the future, if the necessity should occur. I, therefore, at the request of my hon. friend, ask leave to withdraw the amendment and not press it to a vote.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. MACLEAN. Last night the committee reached a conclusion with regard to this Bill; and it is only through an omission of mine in making the motion that we are troubled with it again to-night. Last night the majority of members in the House expressed the opinion that this was a crude measure, an unnecessary measure and an unconstitutional measure, and therefore that we required more time and information to get an effective law. I am sure that is the sense of the House to-night, and I therefore beg to move that this committee rise.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before you call for a standing vote on that question, Mr. Chairman, I beg to say that this Bill will be by no means shunted or got rid of by a resort to this expedient, for I shall move for it to be put on the Order paper again, and I shall only fight it the harder and more persistently if this mode of assassination is resorted to.

Committee divided : Yeas, 23 ; nays, 25.

Motion (Mr. Maclean) that Committee rise, negatived.

Mr. McCLEARY. Before I vote for this Bill, I would like to be satisfied that it meets the necessities of the case. The only thing we have to legislate against in the province of Ontario, anyway, is the sale of American newspapers, which I believe are detrimental to the best interest and well-being and morals of our people. These American newspapers of a certain class ought to be excluded. I am as much in sympathy with this Bill as the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) who introduced it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Why did you oppose it ?

Mr. McCLEARY. Excuse me, I did not vote against it. I want to have this Bill put in such condition that it will be of some use to us when it is passed into law. We cannot get at the publisher or the agent even of an American paper, because they throw them off the trains to the boys when they cross the line. How can we exclude them then ?

Mr. CHARLTON. Will my hon. friend suggest what he thinks is necessary ? I believe the Bill is quite sufficient as it stands.

Mr. HENDERSON. It seems to me that the Bill as it stands meets the point the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary) desires it should meet. The difficulty is that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) puts a different interpretation upon the words to that which I and a good many other hon. members believe they will bear. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) insists that the words "being the proprietor, publisher or manager of any newspaper" should also be read in before the letter "b" in the second subsection. I fail to see that that construction can be put upon the words. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) would allow it to be understood that the Bill just expresses what the words here imply I think the case is met. But owing to the fact that he put a different construction upon these words he is certainly misleading the House, and driving us to a conclusion as to the effect of a Bill which I do not think will be borne out.

Mr. CHARLTON. Since last night I have carefully considered this matter, and I believe that subsection "b" will meet the case in the sense my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) desires. If these Sunday newspapers are sold and the proprietor could be reached, it would be proper to proceed against him ; but whoever is guilty of the offence of selling these newspapers, if they are foreign newspapers, is in my mind amenable to subsection "b."

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I do not think we want this Bill in Quebec, and therefore I move, seconded by Mr. Rinfret, the following amendment to subsection "b."

The provisions of this Act shall not apply to the province of Quebec.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Why, it is the province of Quebec this Bill is intended for.

Mr. MONK. I hope the committee will give its support to that amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Choquette). I do not know that there are any Sunday papers published elsewhere in the Dominion than in the city of Montreal, and we have there two papers, one in the English language and one in the French language. They are good papers, and for my part I buy them and have no scruple about it whatever. I know there is a very large section of the population of Montreal who also buy these papers. I consider it an undue interference with the rights of conscience to endeavour to apply this law to the province of Quebec. I respect the convictions of the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) who introduced this Bill ; I believe he is sincere, and he may be endeavouring to remedy an evil state of things that exists elsewhere, but in the province of Quebec the manner in which we observe the Sunday is, I think, a good one, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) wishes us to be sincere, I can tell him that our population in Quebec will compare favourably with the population of any other province. I hope this amendment will carry.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sorry to hear from my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) that he buys newspapers on Sunday, for if he does he violates the laws of the province of Quebec and subjects himself to a penalty of $20 every time he does it.

Mr. MONK. There are many other good citizens who do the same thing.

Mr. MACLEAN. I propose as an amendment to the amendment that the words be added

And also the province of Ontario.

Mr. POWELL. I would ask the mover of the amendment to please incorporate the words :

And also the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. FOSTER. As the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is not present, and as I have such an interest in his province, I would like to see Prince Edward Island added.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I wish to see Nova Scotia added.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I would like to see the North-west Territories included in that amendment.

Mr. CHARLTON. We are reaching the 'reductio ad absurdum.' We see what the meaning of any attempt to weaken this law by the exemption of a province amounts to. I do not suppose that the rights of conscience in Quebec differ materially from the rights of conscience in Ontario, or Patagonia for that matter. The necessity of this law rests upon the broad ground of national good and national interest. The presentation of the arguments in favour of this Bill last night showed up very fully the consequences of the introduction and the maintenance of this Sunday newspaper evil in the neighbouring country. That country was cited as an example of the evil consequences that would follow the introduction of what at the present time is a very small evil in Canada. The Bill aims to prevent a national evil and demoralization through an agency which has produced the most lamentable results in the United States, and is gradually destroying the moral and Christian tone of that country. If members cannot realize the broad grounds on which this Bill rests, if they cannot realize that this country has a future, and that that future is largely placed in our hands, and that upon us rests the duty of shaping the destinies of half of this continent—if they cannot realize that this Bill has something more in it than the petty features they allude to, we may as well drop the Bill, and let it be lost. I would rather submit to the loss of the Bill than have it mutilated by having its application limited to any part of this Dominion. The object of the Bill is to have a national regulation in regard to this matter—to lay the foundations of this country broadly and firmly on principles of justice and truth. The Bill is not an attempt to interfere with the rights of any man's conscience or to force any religious observance upon any man. Its purpose is to shut out of this country a great evil that exists in the neighbouring country and the consequence of which we are fully aware of. If we cannot treat the matter from that standpoint, we are not approaching this Bill in a proper spirit, and I hope it will be either rejected in its entirety, or passed without reference to the province of Quebec, the province of New Brunswick, the province of Prince Edward Island or any other separate province or collection of provinces in this Dominion.

Mr. MACLEAN. The hon. gentleman says he is looking for something on behalf of the nation. I say that of more importance than that is that this Parliament should respect the rights of the provinces. That should be especially the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite, who have, for many years, made a stand for provincial rights, and claimed that the jurisdiction of the provinces should be maintained. The Solicitor General has told us, the opinion of the present Minister of Justice has been quoted, and the opinion of all the legal gentlemen in this House is, that this Bill is an interference with the rights of the provinces ; that in each province there is at present a Sunday law and that the sin the hon. gentleman refers to is only imaginary ; and if all these things are true, what is the use of our trifling any further with the Bill. Let us vote as we think, and vote against it.

Mr. CLARKE. If the object of the Bill is to keep out of this country the Sunday newspapers printed in the United States, I think it is a most commendable and worthy object, and I shall most gladly support it. But there is at present no newspaper printed in the province of Ontario that comes under the operation of this Bill ; and so far as I am advised, the law at present on the provincial Statute-book covers all possible cases. I do not know how far this Bill would militate against any of the papers which are called Sunday newspapers in this province, but which are printed on Saturday. If it would interfere with those papers, I think it would go too far. So far as it aims at keeping out of Canada those yellow journals which are degrading the morals of the people of the United States, I think it is a movement in the right direction, and I shall most gladly support it ; but the regulation of the publication of newspapers in our own country might reasonably and fairly be left to the provincial authorities.

Mr. CHARLTON. I may say in one word that the object of the Bill is not only to keep out the yellow journals of the United States, but to prevent the growth of the same brood of vipers in Canada.

Mr. MACLEAN. As an evidence of the efficacy of the Ontario law, there is in today's "Globe," on the seventh page, the decision of the magistrate at Merritton in the case against the Carbide Company for operating on Sunday, after a fourteen days' trial in which the best counsel of the province have been engaged. The magistrate upholds the Sunday law and vindicates the position of the hon. member for North Norfolk; so that we in Ontario require no other law than we have already on the Statute-book.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It appears to me that this Bill meets what is not wanted, and does not meet what is wanted. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) said he had bought newspapers on Sunday in Montreal, and the Prime Minister immediately said that that was illegal in the province of Quebec.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If it is illegal to buy a newspaper in the province of Quebec on Sunday, it is illegal to sell one on Sunday, and therefore in so far as Quebec is concerned, this Bill is absolutely unnecessary and uncalled for. We have also the most undoubted evidence that it is unnecessary and uncalled for in the province of Ontario; and I have no doubt that the same is the case with respect to the other provinces. As for this Bill meeting the case suggested by my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), the hon. member for North Norfolk cannot think, I am sure, that it does meet that case.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, it does.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The case put by the hon. member for West Toronto was this, that pernicious literature was coming in from the United States in the shape of Sunday newspapers, which were sold, not on Sunday, but on Friday or Saturday, by irresponsible boys, who, as the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary) says, receive them at the hands of brakemen on the various trains. Does the hon. member for North Norfolk mean to tell me that this Bill would prevent the sale of those papers on Friday or Saturday?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not at all. There is not a man in this House believes it can. I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture withdrew his amendment. I will very heartily support this Bill if it will do that.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am quite willing to accept an amendment that will cover the ground.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then let the hon. Minister of Agriculture leave his amendment in place. I have no hesitation in saying, so far as this side of the House is concerned, that we will carry the Bill if the hon. member will leave that in. The Bill is not only no good without it, but it is pernicious. If that amendment is made in the Bill, I will very heartily support it.

Mr. CHARLTON. Very good, I move that the committee reconsider its action on the amendment moved by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There are two amendments which must be disposed of first.

Mr. MACLEAN. I wish to say that there is a law now which enables the Postmaster General to keep the papers which have been referred to out of the country.

Sub-amendment negatived: Yeas, 21; nays, 29.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 15; nays, 35.

Mr. CHARLTON. To suit the scruples of the hon. member for Haldimand and other hon. members opposite, I am free to express my perfect approval of the motion offered yesterday by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, and my views will be fully met by having that motion incorporated in the Bill; and as we have the promise of the support of the hon. member for Haldimand and others to this motion, I move that it be incorporated in the Bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is this to be considered a defeat of the Government? The Minister of Agriculture withdrew his motion, and now the hon. gentleman moves that it be restored.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the hon. gentleman willing to add that amendment himself? What is it he is against? Is it the mere fact that a certain transaction takes place on a Sunday, or that a bad thing is being sold? If he is merely against the first—that is if he does not want a newspaper on Sunday, irrespective of the kind of literature it contains—he gets it by this Bill; but if he wants to keep out that kind of literature as being bad, he ought to make the selling of a Sunday newspaper on any day of the week against the law. It is simply the doing of a thing on a certain day which the hon. gentleman meets, but all the filth and vileness and everything else objectionable in this yellow journalism, which is published somewhere on Sunday, may be distributed elsewhere on any other day, and his Bill will not prevent its being sold on any other day.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend, I presume, was not in the House last night when I dealt with this question. I consider the class of newspaper literature to which he alludes, the natural progeny of the Sunday newspaper. Those who look over the history of the Sunday newspaper in the United States, are aware that when Sunday journals first issued they did not have the distinctive characteristics they now possess, but the process of deterioration and debasement was rapid, and the Sunday editions cater now to the most degraded tastes of the nation. The vitiated public taste that has been engendered by the Sunday newspaper curse, is the taste that calls for yellow journalism on the week day. While we cannot have a censorship of the press, while we cannot decide what newspaper is worthy of being circulated and what can be suppressed, yet if we cannot cut off the source of this demoralization or prevent its introduction by prohibiting the publishing of Sunday newspapers, all that which has been so fatal in the United States will extend to Canada. It is for that reason the case is partially met by the prohibition of the publication and sale of Sunday newspaper editions on a Sunday. It is that which secularizes the day in the United States, it is that which menaces and warps all religious influences in that country, and leads to the most shocking and glaring demoralization and profanation of the day. If we adopt the law in this country, with our eyes open to the consequences of the evil in that country, we adopt it for the purpose of preventing the introduction and growth of the evil of the Sunday newspaper and its circulation on Sunday. We cannot deal with the characters of the papers published on other days, but we know that the taste created by the Sunday newspaper in the United States is that which demands that sort of pabulum on week days. This Bill goes as far as possible to prevent the introduction of the evil into this country. It is not practical to go further than to prevent the introduction of the Sunday newspaper, a thousand different editions of which are published in the United States every Sunday, and fall like autumn leaves over the country, carrying their demoralizing influence from Portland to San Francisco, and from Lake Erie to the Gulf of Mexico. My object in urging this Bill is because I conscientiously believe that there is no measure that can be adopted by this House which will have more far-reaching influence in giving us sound, healthy, national life than this very provision I am urging on the House to-day. I ask the House to accept this Bill, which was drawn by the Minister of Justice last session, which was approved by this committee last session, and reported just as it is submitted now, and give it a fair trial. It is my belief it will produce the effects that hon. members say they desire. If it fails in any particular, it can be easily amended. It can be put to the test of experience, and my belief is that that test will show the Bill is what we desire, and if not, it can be amended.

Mr. MACLEAN. If the right hon. leader of the Government is the Liberal he professes to be, if he has any regard for freedom of opinion and the freedom of the press in this country, if, as he says, he takes Cobden and Bright for his model, he will stand up and repudiate the attack made by a bogus libel on the freedom of the press and on free thought in this country. I have never heard a Liberal go so far back on the traditions of his party. I do hope the right hon. gentleman will repudiate it, and stand up for Liberalism, and not leave it to us who are Conservative, whom he calls reactionaries, to put in a word for the freedom of the press, freedom of opinion and religious liberty. There is such a thing as liberty, and it is a sad thing to see men who call themselves Liberals, remain silent while one who claims to be of their number, attacks a free speech and a free press.

Mr. POWELL. I would like to ask the hon. member (Mr. Charlton), what he means by "religious newspaper." The word is very ambiguous. Take any religious newspaper, the "Churchman," the "Evangelical Churchman," the "Wesleyan," published in the maritime provinces, or the "Christian Guardian," published in Ontario. I have seen copies of the last-named of these newspapers, containing most violent political articles. They are scarcely to be called religious reading. What proportion of religious reading makes a paper a religious paper? If there is any reading not of a religious character, does that make the paper containing it a secular journal? I might almost challenge the hon. gentleman to produce a so-called religious newspaper in which are not to be found columns devoted to secular topics. Would that prevent the reading of these newspapers on Sunday? If this country is going to be destroyed by the dissemination of knowledge among the people, whether on Sunday or any other day, it speaks very ill indeed for civilization. Now, as to liberty of opinion, so far as the Roman Catholic branch of the Church is concerned, there is the greatest freedom on the question of the Sabbath. I do not think the leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) would be representing fairly the great historic church, were he to attempt to curtail religious liberty in this respect. As to the Protestant branch of the Church, there is no early father of Protestantism but expressly repudiated this narrow view of the Sabbath that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) is attempting to foist upon the people. Take a theologian for whom, I am sure, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) has a great deal of respect—Calvin. Now, Calvin, in his "Commentary on Hebrews," speaks of the observance of Sunday as one of the errors of false teachers, and, in the French version he goes so far as to say, it is one of the lies of false teachers. Take Tyndall, also. He expressly stated—it is some time since I read these matters, and I may be in error in some minor particulars, but I think my recollection is fairly accurate—We are lords of the Sabbath; we can have none, or we can have one in six days, or one in ten days, as we please. And Milton actually wrote a book, directed to the Protestant world, against the curtailing of human liberty in this respect. I am with the hon. gentleman so far as substantial observance of the Sabbath is concerned, apart altogether from any idea that there is any sanctity attaching to the day itself, an idea which I expressly repudiate. I recognize that its observance does lie at the base of social, and political, and religious, and moral advancement in this world. But I do not think that this Bill goes far enough to do much good. If the hon. gentleman is going to grapple with a great evil, let him grapple with those things that constitute the evil: but let him allow people to get information from any source they can, whether on Sunday or week day. The individual conscience must be the test in respect to what is fit reading for Sunday or any other day.

The PRIME MINISTER. As my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) appealed to me, a moment ago, to rebuke my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), I cannot allow his appeal to pass without a word of answer from me. The only fault that can be found with me, I think, is that, for once in my life, I accepted Conservative doctrine in the case of this Bill. I had occasion to say, yesterday, that if I assented to this Bill, it was because, on a former occasion, the very proposal which is involved in this Bill, had received the sanction and authority of the late Sir John Thompson. Sir John Thompson, on two or three occasions, supported the Bill of my hon. friend from North Norfolk, and gave it the benefit of his influence. When we came into office, the same question was presented to us. We thought it was not proper to depart from what had been accepted on this question—I may say, by both sides of the House. After all, the question is not a very large one, for there are other modes of attaining the end that my hon. friend has in view. But, as Sir John Thompson had taken a certain position in the matter, I thought I would abide by it. Otherwise, I should have said to my hon. friend, that his Bill was absolutely useless, because there is in the Statute-book of every province ample means to deal with the evil that the hon. gentleman seeks to meet. But Sir John Thompson thought that, although there was provincial legislation on this subject, there might also be federal legislation. I would appeal to those hon. gentlemen who are his followers to accept his views on this question, on which we have already spent so much time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I hope my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will accept the dictum of Sir John Thompson on many other things—

The PRIME MINISTER. I am afraid I have made a mistake in doing it once.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I was going to say, that there are matters of much greater importance on which he might accept the opinion of Sir John Thompson than on this Bill. He will make no mistake of accepting Sir John Thompson's view with regard to those. I desire to propose the following amendment in the form of subsection "c," making parties therein indicated liable to the penalties proposed:—

Sells or employs or procures any person to sell upon any day of the week any paper, whether published in Canada or elsewhere, issued or purporting to be issued on Sunday.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). This, practically, is the amendment I proposed, but which I withdrew because it seemed as if to insist upon it, would be to hamper the passing of the Bill, which I desired to avoid. I need scarcely say, that I am in favour of the amendment, and will support it, and will support the Bill, if it is added.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am pleased to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague).

Mr. MACLEAN. It was pointed out, that if such a clause were carried, it would keep out papers like the New York "Tribune," the Sunday "Herald," many prominent papers in the old country, papers from France that are now on our files, important Boston publications, as pointed out by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), and so on. I do not believe the people of Canada wish such literature to be kept out.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill, as amended, reported.

SAFETY OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES AND PASSENGERS.

Mr. CASEY moved the second reading of Bill (No. 4) further to secure the safety of railway employees and passengers. He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill, I have merely to say that the Bill as it stands is the outcome of the fullest consideration before a committee of the House last session, which committee not only took the evidence of railway employers and employees, but examined the Act of the Imperial Parliament passed during the last session of Parliament in regard to the compensation of workmen in hazardous employments, and they made this Bill conform very largely to the provisions of that Imperial Act. Under these circumstances I have no hesitation in asking the House to read this Bill a second time. It provides, briefly, for one or two improvements in the fitting up of cars, and for the compensation of workmen injured while in the performance of their duties on railways. I do not think any further explanation is required.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. MONTAGUE. Of course, we consider that the Minister of Railways and Canals is, to a very large extent, the leader of the House in regard to these Bills affecting the railway interests of the country. I do not myself understand the details of the Bill, but I take it for granted that as the House is allowing it to go through without discussion, the Minister of Railways and Canals, and through him the Government, quite concur in the nature of the legislation.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I must say that there is some misapprehension on the part of my hon. friend the mover of the Bill. We had an understanding to the effect that there was no objection to the Bill going to a second reading, but I ask him if he would defer reference to the Committee of the Whole until I had had an opportunity of going into it.

Mr. CASEY. Quite so. I did not wish to urge it, but when the question was put from the Chair, as the Minister of Railways and Canals did not object, I thought perhaps he had reconsidered his suggestion. Under the circumstances, I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

DRAINAGE ACROSS RAILWAY LANDS.

Mr. CASEY moved second reading of Bill (No. 5) respecting drainage on and across the lands of railway companies. He said: This is the Bill I introduced last year, and which got as far as the Railway Committee and was allowed to rest there, for the purpose of allowing the Cabinet and the House to get better acquainted with it. I now propose to ask the House to read it a second time and to refer it to a select committee, to which I hope another Bill, to be subsequently moved, will be referred, in order that the whole question of municipal and private drainage across railways may be fully considered, and a consolidated Bill reported to this House which will meet with the approval of the Government and the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. member has suggested a special committee, I think it has always gone to the Railway Committee, which has taken these matters up very fully.

I do not see any reason why we should depart from that practice.

Mr. CASEY. I beg leave to urge, in support of the reference which I intend to move to a select committee, that the Railway Committee, as my hon. friend knows, is amply occupied by private Bills, and it is quite impossible to have that Bill considered clause by clause in a large and busy committee such as that is. The best they could do would be to appoint a sub-committee to consider this Bill and report to them, as was done last year, such committee having never reported. Everything the Railway Committee can do could be done by the select committee, before which parties opposed to the Bill and in favour of it could be heard.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I wish to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that this Bill is one of all others that should go to the Railway Committee. It proposes a radical and fundamental change in the legislation with respect to railways, and that being the case, it appears to me that it is necessary this Bill should be considered in the fullest and most complete manner by that committee. The hon. gentleman will see that if he is able to satisfy the Railway Committee, which is a small parliament of itself, that this is a wise and judicious Bill and should be passed, it will save an immense amount of the time of the House, whereas if the hon. gentleman sends it to a special committee and gets it reported, the fact will amount to very little. I trust the hon. gentleman, under the circumstances, will feel that this Bill is especially one that should be considered by the Railway Committee, and it would be a mistake, from his own point of view, and cause a great loss of time to the House, if it were sent to a special committee, and it would have to run the gauntlet to a far greater degree afterwards than if it had been referred to the Railway Committee. On consideration, I hope the hon. gentleman will adopt this course.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. CASEY. I beg to move:

That Bill (No. 4) be referred to a select committee composed of Messrs. Baine, Campbell, Casey, Fortin, Henderson, Monk, McGregor and Tolmie, with power to send for persons and papers and report from time to time.

While giving all possible weight to the considerations urged by the leader of the Opposition, I am sure his experience, as well as mine, will bear out the statement that a small body really supervises the railway legislation, and they are especially capable of judging, but the Railway Committee as a whole is the last body which is in a position to give special attention to a Bill, if it should involve new principles of legislation. This Bill does not involve anything new or radical in legislation, but it proposes to refer to arbitration claims for damages of those who assert the right of drainage across railway lines and substitute arbitration in the place of appeal to the Privy Council. That is the drift of the Bill. I am sure that such a Bill can be much better considered before a special committee than before the Railway Committee. We have had proof of that fact in the case of the railway employees Bill, which has just received its second reading. Before the special committee appointed to consider that Bill counsel appeared for the railway companies and for the employees; the subject was given full consideration, evidence was taken and comparisons made with other legislation of a similar kind, and I am satisfied the railway companies could not have arrived at so mature and full a consideration of the case as did that special committee. In this case there is another Bill on a similar subject, which might properly go to the same committee, and the two Bills must be considered together and consolidated into one. All the Railway Committee could do would be to appoint a sub-committee to consider the present Bill, and it would occupy some hours during several sittings in arriving at a conclusion. The full committee could not take evidence, as might be done by this special committee, which could proceed with the consideration of this Bill while the Railway Committee continued to transact its legitimate work.

Mr. CHAUVIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the Bill now under discussion is of special concern to the lawyers of the province of Quebec, as it conflicts with the provisions of our municipal code. This Bill will affect the rural properties, in the province of Quebec, crossed by railways.

Under articles 21 and 22 of our municipal code, it is provided that the road inspector is to supervise the works in connection with ditches on the property of a railway company. The Bill now under consideration proposes to set aside the road inspector and to replace him by an engineer appointed by the railway companies. Let me remind the House that, in such matters, it is but fair that the members of the Bar of the different provinces, who sit in this House, should be members of the committee. I draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that there is but one lawyer from the province of Quebec on that committee, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk).

As to the legislation, it particularly concerns the province of Quebec in so far as it effects its municipal code. I would suggest to add the names of Mr. Fortin and Mr. Casgrain to the committee to which this Bill is referred.

Mr. LISTER. I ask that the name of Mr. Cowan be added.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 11) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, with respect to cruelty to animals.—(Mr. Penny.)

Bill (No. 14) respecting the attachment of salaries out of moneys in the hands of the Government of the Dominion of Canada.—(Mr. Richardson.)

MOUNTED POLICE PENSION ACT.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) moved second reading of Bill (No. 13) to amend the Mounted Police Pension Act.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. POWELL. Please explain what this Bill is.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The object of this Bill is to allow the members of the Mounted Police Force to be pensioned after twenty years' service, instead of after twenty-five years, as at present.

Bill reported, and read the third time, and passed.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved second reading of Bill (No. 18) further to amend the Railway Act. He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill I wish to say a word or two as to its nature. This Bill provides against three things which have been found to be very injurious to the interests of the people in the western part of the province of Ontario especially. The first clause provides for regulating railways, and says that they will not permit the running on any of their railway tracks of any locomotive or engine in emitting sparks; and a subsequent clause provides that in case they do allow these engines to be run and a fire occurs in any farm buildings along the line of railway, then, if the fire is discovered within a certain time and no other cause can be assigned for it, it is to be taken for granted that the fire was caused by the railway engines.

The next clause amends the Railway Act, chapter 25, section 91, and a reference to that Act will show that this section has been drawn very much against the interests of the people. The fourth clause is in reference to the use of farm crossings. The Railway Act compels the railway company to put up farm crossings for the convenence of the people through whose lands it runs, but the section in the Act is very indefinite. This Bill provides that the gates shall be provided by the railway company as under the Railway Act, namely, swing gates. It further provides that if the gates are left open, not through the negligence of the person for whose benefit they were put up, or if from any unknown cause the gates are open and cattle lawfully pasturing on the lands along the line of railway, get on the tracks and are killed; then, unless it can be shown that the farmer was negligent in leaving the gates open, the damage shall be borne equally by the railway company and the person who owned the cattle. I think it is a very proper and wise provision and without going into any further details, I would move the second reading of the Bill.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There is no objection to the second reading of the Bill, if my hon. friend will agree to refer it to the committee to which was referred Bill No. 4.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Very well.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved that Bill (No. 18) further to amend the Railway Act be referred to the same special committee to which was referred Bill No. 4.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSIT OF GRAIN IN MANITOBA AND THE NORTH-WEST TERRI- TORIES.

Mr. DOUGLAS moved second reading of Bill (No. 19) to regulate the transit of grain in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving the second reading of this Bill I desire to make some explanation to the House. The importance of the subject may be realized by the members of this House from eastern Canada, when they remember that Manitoba and the Territories is from year to year making progress and increasing as a great producing country. Certain difficulties have arisen during the last grain season that have called forth a great deal of criticism in the country, a great deal of writing in the newspapers, and a great deal of discussion generally. The producers have met together and have passed resolutions condemning the state of things that exists in Manitoba and the Territories in connection with the transshipment of grain. It should be understood that from the time of the opening of the Canadian Pacific Railway certain privileges have been enjoyed by grain dealers. Prior to the time when elevators were built men engaged in the purchasing and shipping of grain through flat warehouses; but there are now in the country a number of elevators in full operation, and an understanding has been reached between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the elevator syndicate that all such flat warehouses must pass out of existence; so that in the province of Manitoba and a portion of the North-west Territories, the business has been wholly absorbed by the elevator syndicate, and men who have been engaged for years in purchasing grain and shipping it through flat warehouses have been obliged to go out of business. This is felt to be a hardship, not only on the part of these men, but on the part of the producers themselves. The importance of the question will be seen by the fact that the Premier of Manitoba has estimated that the loss to the province from this arrangement between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the elevator syndicate amounts to no less than about $1,000,000 for the past season; and I could very easily show that in the riding which I have the honour to represent, which produced last year 3,000,000 bushels of first quality grain for export, the loss in this respect could not have been less than from $50,000 to $60,000. This indicates the importance of the Bill for which I ask the consideration of the House. In the first place; it only asks for the continuation of the privileges which have been enjoyed by the producers since the opening of the railway. The railway companies are forced, in places where there are no elevators, to continue the use of the flat warehouses, and to allow the farmers to load the cars from their vehicles. This is felt to be a privilege that we ought to protect on behalf of the people. They claim it as their right, as British subjects and as true Canadians, that when they go to the railway company with their produce, the railway company should receive that produce and carry it forward when they are willing to pay the usual rates required by the company. The reason alleged against these flat warehouses is that frequently a glut occurs in the market, in which case time is required to clear away the grain, and the railway companies hold that they can clear away the grain from the elevators in less time and with less rolling stock than they can from flat warehouses. The men who have been engaged in the flat warehouse business, however, are prepared to give evidence to show that they can load a car with horse-power in one hour; and the usual time given to any one shipping goods is twenty-four hours. The farmers do not ask for any extension of that time. If they cannot load on the cars within the time required by the Railway Act, they are disposed to abide by the consequences. All that the Bill contemplates is a continuation of the privileges which the farmers have enjoyed for the past fourteen years. It is only during the past season that this arrangement has been made between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the owners of the elevators. I do not wish to speak against the elevator system. I do not think any of the farmers would speak against that system as such. On the contrary, where there are five, they would like to see ten. We have no desire to overthrow that system or cripple it in any way. We believe that if the Bill passes every honest dealer in grain will be able, through the elevators, to do an honest business. But we desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that under this agreement the producer is absolutely in the hands of this combine which is known to exist. It is, I may say, a syndicate of syndicates which has formed an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The agreement, so far as I can learn, appears to be this, that where an individual proposes to put his capital into the building of an elevator at any shipping point, the Canadian Pacific Railway will protect that capital from being affected by the building of another warehouse at that particular point. We claim that while it may be the duty of the railway company to protect the capital of the elevator, it is equally their duty as a common carrier, having been endowed by public funds, to protect the capital of the producer, which is infinitely larger than the capital of the elevator. So that there is no force in that argument. Further, I hold that this agreement is a direct violation of the Railway Act as expressed in subsection 1 of section 246 of the Revised Statutes of 1888. Then, there are other objections to be urged against the elevator system. I speak now from the experience of my own constituency. We have at one point, Fleming, on the Canadian Pacific Railway, three men engaged in buying from the farmers and shipping through flat warehouses. They were engaged in the business for years, but last year they were told distinctly that they could do no more business on these lines, that they must either build an elevator up to the normal standard and ship from the elevator, or go out of business. This has entailed a personal loss to these parties to the value of the building they were using in their business. This is a wrong inflicted on these men. Further west, at Wappella, the very same thing occurred, and further west again at other points. These points were regarded by our farmers as their best market, and to show the House the importance of this, I will call attention to this fact, that the business men of towns where there were no flat warehouses found they were losing their business, they found that the wheat was being carried to those points where there were flat warehouses, and that the prices at these points were higher than elsewhere. These facts forced themselves so much on the attention of the business men of certain towns, for example, Moosomin, that the town council and board of trade of Moosomin examined a large number of farmers under oath as to the difference in price between the points where there were flat warehouses and those where there were elevators. It was shown under oath by a number of individuals that the prices ranged from 3 to 15 cents a bushel in favour of a flat warehouse and against the elevator system. This meant a serious loss, not simply to the farmers, but to the business men at points where the elevator system is followed.

Then there are still further difficulties connected with the elevator system. This year there has been very little difficulty because the grain has nearly all been No. 1 hard, and when put into the elevators, it was not subject to the same amount of mixing as in other years. But the farmers complain on another ground, that the elevator men will not guarantee the grade of grain deposited in the elevators. Suppose a farmer deposits a certain number of bushels of No. 1 hard, it goes into the bin and may be mixed with the wheat of half a dozen other men, so that when it reaches its destination, he does not realize the wheat he put in, but a mixture of grain, and has often to suffer loss on that account.

Then, another complaint is that the elevator system shuts down about the end of March. There are men in that country in easy circumstances who perhaps may hold back 2,000 to 5,000 bushels of wheat in the expectation of a rise in the market, but when the elevator system closes down, there is no market for them until the coming season.

There is an additional evil which I may point out to this House. In certain seasons, when the grain is struck by frost, there is a great variety in the grades. It is well known that our milling companies want our best grain and have little use for frosted grain, so that they do not call for it in the market and the sale of that grain has been largely done in years past from the flat warehouses. Hon. gentlemen know that a large amount found its way into Ontario for feeding purposes. Should the combine between the elevator companies and the railways be allowed to continue, there will be no market or very little market, for these frosted varieties of wheat that may be produced in some seasons. This is a further reason why the market should remain open. We should hold to it, as a principle, that every Canadian producer has the right to approach the market in his own way and sell his own products, and we ought to see that our people enjoy that right in every province. This is one point that is contended for. The farmers object also to the method of weighing the grain in the elevators. When the grain is put in a flat warehouse, it is weighed in the presence of the seller, so that he has an opportunity of seeing whether he gets just weight or not. But when he brings it to an elevator, it is all emptied into the hopper and then lowered to a lower storey and weighed. The owner of the grain is not present to see it weighed, and perhaps could not understand the weighing if he were. The consequence is he gets a certificate for so many bushels without having any guarantee of its correctness. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction on that account, and I would also take this opportunity of informing the Government that the weights are only examined once in two years. We believe that in consequence there is a great deal of fraud practiced in the country through false weights or perhaps arising out of this state of things I have indicated. It may be well that the House should see that a more thorough and more frequent inspection is made of these weights, and it might be well for the Government to appoint an inspector, who would move about during the season and examine these scales and weights.

I have outlined the chief difficulties which beset the farmer on account of the combinations between the railway companies and the elevator owners. But there is a further difficulty that reveals itself, and concerning which the Millers' Association of Toronto sent a deputation to Ottawa, which was here yesterday and to-day, to confer with the authorities. What they complain of is that if they want grain as it is grown by the farmers in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, they cannot at present, under this arrangement, secure it. They can only get it from the elevator system. One of the members of this delegation told me yesterday that he desired to get three carloads of grain for seeding in Ontario. He communicated with people in Manitoba, but he found out in every case that the chief difficulty was his agents could not get cars to ship the grain to him in Ontario. He consequently had to give up the idea, and had to purchase the mixed grain from the elevators, and must sow that for seed instead of the quality he desired. This again is another and very serious difficulty. Farmers in Ontario would be glad to get pure Red Fife hard wheat, which is to be had in Manitoba and the Territories, but owing to this combine between the railway company and the elevators they are unable to do so.

I do not know that I need occupy the time of the House very much further. We hold, in the first place, that this combination for the purpose of preventing the shipping of grain from flat elevators in Manitoba and a portion of the Territories is a violation of the Railway Act as it now stands. We hold further that it is doing away with the rights and liberties we ought to enjoy and which this Government ought to secure to every producer in the Dominion. We desire by this Bill to secure for our people an open market. We are not opposing the elevator system, but we want this privilege, so that our farmers may be able to present their own grain at the railway station and there ship it directly into the cars or sell it to some one who is engaged in shipping through flat warehouses, so that our farmers may present their own grain on the eastern markets and test its weight and qualities and price. You will observe that, so far as shipping from flat warehouses and from platforms is concerned, the Bill provided also for the same. In regard to supply of cars, when a glut occurs in the market, under the existing system, it is within the power of the railway company to cause the men who own the elevators to hold the market. In this case the price is put down, and the purchasers remain at home, thus the railway companies get time to clear the elevators and so overtake the work with less rolling stock. Thus they play into the hands of the elevator owners and the elevator owners play into the hands of the company for these reasons. This Act provides for the distribution of cars. It also provides that certificates be given for the receipt of grain. It has sometimes occurred that papers could not be obtained, because the company did not wish to ship for individuals. Provision is made for the enforcement of the Act. There is a departure in this Bill from what has been usual in cases where difficulties have sprung up in the past between producers and the railway company. It is a hopeless task for any producer to enter on a process of litigation against the company. Hence we have thrown the responsibility upon the Dominion. We ask that all cases of prosecution under this Act should be carried on in the name of Her Majesty and under the direction of the Attorney General of Canada. At a future stage of the Bill, I shall move that the first and second clauses be amalgamated, opening the alternative for the railway companies either to provide the facilities for handling the grain, or to allow others to build flat warehouses on their lines and switches, to meet the necessities of the case. Further, I propose to make the penalty attached to the Bill cover No. 1. On the whole, the sections of the Bill will be increased in number by one.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I greatly regret, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a larger attendance of members to-night to listen to what the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) has said, and to what I am about to say—not because we are the speakers, but because the subject is one of very great importance indeed to the people of the portion of the country we represent. I have a Bill before the House designed to cover much the same ground as the Bill the hon. member has just moved. It has occurred to me, that probably my hon. friend from East Assiniboia would accept a suggestion, that his Bill and mine be referred to a special committee, to be composed of himself, myself, and a few others, to go over the two Bills and amalgamate them, and present to the House a Bill that will cover the ground most completely.

On the main question, I wish to go over the ground in some little detail, giving the facts. In the province of Manitoba and the North-west, we have not had such serious trouble in years gone by in handling our grain as we have had the past season, because we have had competition at nearly all the important market points, active competition, there being from one to five or six buyers at these various points. But a new condition of things has arisen. The elevator system has been enlarged, and to-day is a fairly complete system throughout Manitoba and the North-west Territories. These elevators are controlled largely by syndicates—the Northern Elevator Company, the Manitoba Elevator Company, and others. In addition to these, there are the elevators owned by the Ogilvie Milling Company and the Lake of the Woods Milling Company. So long as there was no combination, there was real competition in the buying of wheat. But these various syndicates put their heads together last season, and, seeing that the price of wheat has considerably advanced, they decided to corral a larger share of the profit than was their legitimate due. So they formed what is popularly known in that country as a “syndicate of syndicates.” Instead of each syndicate sending out a bulletin to their buyers at the various points throughout the province and the territories, stating the price at which they wanted them to buy, the “syndicate of syndicates” meets in its little room in Winnipeg, each morning, and decides what price they propose, in their majesty, to allow the farmer for his wheat. Instead of various telegrams being sent out, the “syndicate of syndicates” sends out one telegram to each important point, and the buyer who receives it goes to the others, and the result is, that no one buyer at any station will pay more than the price which has been decided upon by this clique in Winnipeg.

Now, it is this state of affairs that we seek to remedy, and I feel that we have such a strong case that it is not necessary to go further than to place the facts before the House to secure unanimous endorsement for this Bill. It might be asked: Why does not the Canadian Pacific Railway, which, after all, is the great railway corporation in that country, check this “syndicate of syndicates?” It would be supposed that the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway would be the interest of the settler in that country. The answer is, that while, doubtless, the Canadian Pacific Railway desires to see the farmers of that country succeed, like most other corporations, it is selfish and desires to secure for its own benefit the entire trade of that country and at the same time prevent any agitation being raised regarding its arrangement with the “syndicate of syndicates.” When there is a glut of wheat, and the railway company is unable to carry all that is offered with due expedition, the railway company will arrange with the “syndicate of syndicates” to stop buying at the various points until the overplus is relieved and carried out of the country.

In that way the Canadian Pacific Railway secures the entire carrying trade. But the farmers, what of them, Mr. Speaker? They are absolutely unable to sell a bushel of wheat at certain periods of the year, they must forsooth wait upon the good pleasure of the “syndicate of syndicates” and the Canadian Pacific Railway. That is the one point that we should remedy.

Now, like my hon. friend from East Assiniboia, I am not here to decry the elevator system; the elevator system is an excellent thing in its way, but I am here to ask this legislature to put it in the power of the farmer to sell his wheat direct from his vehicles or direct from the flat warehouse, or load his wheat direct from the flat warehouse and from his vehicles into the cars there. The result of that will not be, I apprehend, to destroy the elevator system, but the menace to the farmers will be removed. If that is done you will find that these elevator owners will be quite ready, indeed quite anxious, to accommodate the farmers all along the line, and to assist them in handling their grain; and it will also ensure to the farmers competition at the various points. Now, as my hon. friend has said, the farmers suffered to the extent, I think I am within the mark in saying, of a million dollars in the crop of 1897; and I think I will be able to submit figures to the House which will satisfy hon. members that that is a moderate statement. The Hon. Mr. Greenway, who is a man very moderate in his estimates, and a man very conservative in his views, has declared that at least a million dollars has been lost to the farmers of Manitoba on this account. But when we remember that in addition to this, the farmers of the West have to pay some 17½ cents a hundred pounds to take their wheat from Winnipeg to Lake Superior, you will see that when wheat is worth, as it used to be in some years prior to the last, only about 43 cents a bushel, and when they have to pay such an enormous toll as that, it is essential that we should protect their interests in connection with the handling of their grain. Now, we may not be able to regulate combinesters, but this House is able to regulate the railway companies, and while it is contended by some that under the General Railway Act the railway companies could be forced to provide cars as common carriers at various points, still there is some doubt on the question, and up to the present time they do not do it. The Act which I introduced is an amendment to the General Railway Act, which would compel the companies to provide cars at the various points. It might be contended by some that this would be a very inconvenient system, and that there would be great delay in loading these cars. But I may point out to the House that it will be provided in this legislation that any detention of cars will be paid for in the ordinary way, so that the risk will be with the farmer and not with the company. An important point to bear in mind is the fact that no farmer in that country—a great many farmers there raise sometimes as high as 4,000 or 5,000 bushels of wheat—and no farmer under the present system is able to ship his wheat direct, or sell his wheat to dealers outside of this grain combine. So that if a miller in the East, or any dealer who desires wheat, wants to purchase from any particular farmer, say for seeding purposes, and wants to get a special grade of wheat, he is absolutely unable to procure it, because the farmer cannot sell unless the wheat goes through an elevator. In going through an elevator it sometimes gets mixed with impure wheat, sometimes with smutted wheat, and there are various disabilities which prevent dealers from securing the class of wheat that they want. That we desire to remedy. Now, let us assume that the crop of wheat in the North-west will amount to twenty million bushels per year, and I think my hon. friend will agree with me that this is a moderate estimate. The elevator charge on that wheat is a cent and a half a bushel.

An hon. MEMBER. A cent and three-quarters.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is probably in the Territories. My information is that in Manitoba it is a cent and a half. There will also be an insurance on that of a cent and a half. Now, if the farmer was permitted to load direct from his vehicle, or direct from a flat warehouse, and thereby save a cent and a half a bushel elevator charges, there would be saved to the farmer enough money in actual cash to build 100 elevators a year with a capacity of 4,000 bushels; and in three years alone we would have in Manitoba and the Territories 300 elevators, giving sufficient accommodation for the entire country. I think that is a statement which will appeal to every member of the House. In addition to the elevator charges, the dealers in that country have had the habit of so mixing the grades as to steal from the farmer, on an average, two or three, and sometimes four cents a bushel. I will explain to the House how that is done. There is not after all such a great difference between No. 1 hard and No. 2 hard. There may be a difference of two or three pounds in the weight and probably a slight difference in the shading or the colour. Dealers have been in the habit of purchasing three, four or five cars of No. 2 hard wheat, which they secure at a price of two, three and four cents below that of No. 1; they take a carload of No. 1 hard, and by skilfully mixing it in the elevators, they are able to raise the grade of these four or five cars of No. 2 hard, up to No. 1 hard, and so secure an immense profit in that way. If we allow the farmer to load his wheat directly into the cars from his vehicle or from his flat warehouse, we enable him to sell to any dealer on sample, and he secures the benefit of his own work. I would like to ask the members of this House if it is not their desire to place the farmer, who earns his bread with such hard toll in that country—if it is not their desire to protect him in preference to protecting this ring, this combine in Winnipeg, which is able to make its hundreds of thousands of dollars at the expense of the hard working farmers of that country.

Mr. RICHARDSON.

Now, in this connection, Mr. Speaker, I want to say one word in vindication of the Ogilvie Milling Company in its operations in that country during the past season. At first the company was criticised, but I am rather disposed to think that it was unfairly criticised. When it was established that this combine existed, the Ogilvie Milling Company went into the market actively and raised the price of wheat all along the line, paying 3, 4 and 5 cents a bushel more than was being offered by this "syndicate of syndicates," the result of which was that the farmers were saved an enormous amount of money in that manner. With the permission of the House, I will read a brief interview had with the manager of the Ogilvie Milling Company in the city of Winnipeg, on 27th November, 1897, and I do so in order to emphasize my vindication:

Mr. F. W. Thompson, manager of the Ogilvie Milling Company, was seen by a reporter of the "Tribune" on the relation of the company to the elevator monopoly. It was pointed out to Mr. Thompson that in spite of the published denial of Mr. Ogilvie, statements are being made that the Ogilvie Milling Company are connected with the combine.

"I wish," said Mr. Thompson, "to state most emphatically that we are not, either directly or indirectly, connected with any combine and will prosecute any person associating or connecting our name with any such organization."

"Are you in favour of the continuance of the elevator monopoly?"

"Our position on that question has been clearly defined. We exact no special favours. A farmer is privileged to load on cars at any point where we have an elevator. The so-called elevator monopoly has no meaning to us whatever."

I mention this in order to do justice to the company. Before I pass from this point, I should like to say that it is desirable, in view of the fact that there is a considerable duty remaining on agricultural implements in Canada, to place the farmers here on as good a footing as possible. It has been intimated to me, within the last two or three days, that Russia and Argentina, which are our great competitors for supplying wheat to the world, are now admitting agricultural implements free of duty ; so that this fact will strengthen my argument that the Government should deal as liberally as possible with our farmers, in protecting them in the sale of their wheat, to make up for the disability under which they labour by virtue of the agricultural implement duty.

I desire to offer a little evidence with respect to the loss sustained by the farmers. I have stated that, according to my view, our farmers have lost $1,000,000 at least through this grain combine or elevator monopoly. In the Brandon "Sun," of October 14, appeared a statement that the farmers there up to that date, which was not very late in the season, had lost $3,400, and if the operations were continued, and they were continued, the farmers would lose $5,000 more as the result of this combine. I will read an interview which was published in the Winnipeg "Tribune" with Dr. McCoanell, of Morden, a man very well known in southern Manitoba, a shrewd man and one who raises a large quantity of wheat himself and is well qualified to speak on this question. This interview took place on 3rd November, 1897, and is reported as follows :—

To a "Tribune" reporter the doctor said that Morden's wheat situation was not what it should be. It is owned almost exclusively by the combine. There is only one outside buyer against fourteen or fifteen combine men. At the present time prices are not bad, but it is only because two large milling firms are badly in need of wheat, and have forced the price up. While the quotations are high, though only one firm in the combine is staying with the milling companies and paying their prices. The others buy an occasional load, but that is all. It looks as though there was an arrangement between the firms composing the combine to let only one of their number buck the milling companies. But even at the present prices in Morden they do not represent the value of the wheat. Yesterday the street price was 79 cents, while at Pilot Mound it was 85 cents, a difference of 6 cents between the two places.

Let hon. members mark these figures, because Pilot Mound is a station away beyond Morden, and the wheat rate to the head waters of Lake Superior would be higher.

It is not only in the prices that Morden has a kick, though. The dockage claimed is excessive. One firm will charge a man three pounds a bushel for dirt, and he will be told by another buyer that only one and a half pounds should be taken. He disposes of the next load to this buyer, and true enough, only the one and a half pounds are docked, but the load following is docked five or six pounds to balance matters. It is almost impossible also for a farmer to secure a one hard grade for his wheat in Morden, and the consequence is that a large number of farmers instead of drawing their wheat to Morden, prefer to travel farther and go to Rosebank, Winkler, or Thornhill, chiefly the two former places, however, where they can obtain the grade the quality of their wheat is entitled to—one hard. Thus trade is being lost to Morden daily.

Mr. McConnell quoted the instance of a farmer who stored 1,000 bushels in a combine company's elevator before the grades were issued, and received a ticket from the elevator man grading the wheat as one hard ; underneath the one hard, however, in very small print, which, unless a man looked carefully at it, he would not notice, were the words "not official" in brackets. When the farmer in question went to the elevator to sell his wheat, what was he offered ? The market quotation for No. 2. And so, while farmers cannot get one hard for their wheat in Morden, buyers saying it is not entitled to that grade, the same wheat can be taken to either Rosebank or Winkler, and at those places it will grade one hard.

Morden people generally were greatly surprised at the motion of Mr. McLennon, who proposed at a recent meeting of the Grain Exchange, that farmers be allowed to load on cars at elevator points, being voted down. It showed very clearly the hand of the combine. "This elevator monopoly has got to be broken, however," said the doctor, "and farmers must be allowed to load on cars if they desire to do so. If the C. P. R. will not allow it, then the Government should step in, and they cannot do so too quickly. The combine in force this year has meant a loss of $750,000 to the farmers of the province."

If the elevator monopoly were of no value to the grain dealers in Winnipeg, it would be natural to assume that they would offer no opposition to its abolition ; and in order to demonstrate their opposition and to show the milk in the cocoon in connection with their action, I will read a resolution offered to the Grain Exchange of Winnipeg. On the 20th October last, at a special general meeting held to consider the question, it was moved :

That whereas, an impression obtains in certain quarters, that an elevator monopoly and grain combine exists in North-western Canada, to the prejudice of the best interests of the people at large, the same having recently been the subject of considerable newspaper controversy here and in eastern Canada ; we, the members of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, having the well-being of our city and province at heart, and feeling the importance of taking prompt action in connection with this vital question, in order to indicate to the farmers, upon whose efforts largely depends the general prosperity of our country, the fact that our organization, as a body, is opposed to monopoly and combines in any form ; therefore, we hereby request, as a simple and effective solution of the whole difficulty, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company abrogate forthwith their present regulations, which prohibit farmers and others loading direct on cars at elevator points ; and that the secretary of the exchange be instructed to send a copy of this resolution to W. Whyte, Esq., manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to the boards of trade at Hamilton, Toronto and Montreal, and to the various city papers for publication.

That motion was defeated by a vote of 30 to 9, so that hon. members will see the exact position of the grain combine of Winnipeg on this question. It seems to me that it proves to a demonstration that these grain dealers want this monopoly continued, and if so, it must be of some benefit to them. I have had information laid before me during the last few days that the grain combine proposes to send a deputation here to intimidate the Government and lobby members with the object of defeating the Bill which I have introduced to protect the farmer. I hope the Government will give them the cold shoulder, and that every hon. member who is applied to by any member of that deputation will reject their overtures and give a vote substantially in the interests of the farmer who deserves every cent that is in it for him after his hard toil.

I want to present a few facts with regard to the price obtained for wheat and as to how it was manipulated by the combine, in order to prove to some extent at least that the estimate I gave of the loss to the farmers by virtue of the operation of this combine, was correct. Let us take a sample case. On Wednesday, 22nd September, 1897, Carberry and Douglas, two points on the Canadian Pacific Railway west of Winnipeg, were receiving 78 cents for No. 1 hard, while Austin and Sydney, points much nearer to Fort William on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, were receiving 75 cents. When I said much nearer to Fort William, I will qualify that by saying that although these places are nearer, the same freight to Fort William would rule, namely, 19 cents per 100. The difference of 3 cents in the price between the points named is accounted for by the fact that there was competition at Carberry and Douglas, one of the milling companies at least having a buyer in the field.

Here is a stronger case. On the same date, 22nd September, 1897, at Morris and Rosenfeld, in Southern Manitoba, about sixty or seventy to eighty miles southwest of Winnipeg, they received 76 cents for No. 1 hard on an 18-cent freight rate basis—18 cents from the point named to Fort William; while at Boissevain, nearly 150 miles further away with a 20 cents per 100 freight rate basis, they were getting 80 cents for the same grade. This will demonstrate how the operations of the combine affected the farmer. There was a difference of 4 cents a bushel, although it would even appear worse than that, because one is on an 18-cent rate and the other a 20-cent rate and that would make a difference of 6 cents, which is accounted for by the fact that there was competition at one place and not at the other. The average price on the 22nd of September, in Manitoba, on Brandon rates which are 19 cents per hundred to Fort William, was 75 cents, adding elevator charges 1½ cents, freight to and elevator charges at Fort William 12½ cents a bushel therefore at Fort William the wheat cost the buyer 89 cents. On that day the grain firms not in the syndicate—that would probably be the Ogilvie's and possibly the Lake of the Woods, and probably one or two small buyers—were paying 92½ cents a bushel afloat at Fort William, which would give a clear gain of 3½ cents a bushel, notwithstanding that there is a further good profit in selling the same in New York. In order to demonstrate this better, I will ask the House to give me its attention while I buy a bushel of wheat at certain points and follow it to its destination, to see what it cost, at say, Buffalo, that being the point at which most sales are made. If hon. gentlemen give me their attention they will see the enormous profits made. I have selected at random for this comparison three different average points in Manitoba. I take Griswold, first: On the 30th October last, the combines price at that point was 77 cents for No. 1 hard; add 1½ cents elevator charges and 13½ cents freight to Fort William and elevator charges there, and you have a total cost of 92 cents a bushel. The average freight charged in bottoms from Fort William to Buffalo, according to the best available information at my disposal, was 2 cents a bushel. This makes the cost to the combine 94 cents at Buffalo. Now, I have in my possession here a telegram showing that the price offered at Buffalo on that date was 98 cents a bushel. That would be a very handsome profit as you will see for the combine, and as I have already informed the House, it has been their practice usually to steal a grade on much of this wheat. Let us take the town of Treherne on the Glenboro' branch. The price paid on the date I have mentioned was 79 cents. Add freight to Fort William and elevator charges there 14 cents a bushel, which would give a total of 93 cents. Add 2 cents freight to Buffalo, and remembering that the price offered in Buffalo that date was 98 cents, you have a profit left to the combine of 3 cents, and you must recollect that they probably stole a grade in connection with most of that wheat. Hon. gentlemen will see the enormous profit they must make on these large quantities at 3 cents per bushel. I am informed that if wheat dealers make a quarter or half cent a bushel they do very well, but here I have demonstrated that they make 3 and 4 cents a bushel straight, to say nothing of what they make by stealing a grade. Let us take Manitou, a market point in my own constituency. The price paid by the combine on the day above mentioned was 78 cents at Manitou; add elevator charges and freight to Fort William 14 cents, and you have 92 cents; add 2 cents to Buffalo which would make 94 cents, and then they had a profit of 4 cents a bushel with possibly a grade stolen. Let us take the same three points on another date and I have selected the 22nd of September, because I hold in my hand telegrams from large firms in Buffalo offering the price named for the wheat delivered there that day. At Griswold the combine paid 74 cents for No. 1 hard that day; add to this 1½ cents elevator, 13½ cents freight to Fort William and elevator there, making 15 cents in all, and you have 89 cents. Add 2 cents for bottoms to Buffalo and you have 91 cents.

The quotation that day at Buffalo was 97 cents, and this leaves the combine a clear profit of 6 cents a bushel with possibly a stolen grade. At Treherne, on that date the combine price was 77 cents; add 14 cents elevator charges and freight to Fort William and 2 cents to Buffalo, and you have 93 cents a bushel laid down at Buffalo. The price paid at Buffalo on that day was 97 cents, which gives the combine a clear profit of 4 cents a bushel. At Manitou the price of the combine on the date mentioned was 75 cents a bushel for No. 1 hard; add 14 cents elevator and freight charges and 2 cents to Buffalo, and that makes 91 cents a bushel in Buffalo, giving a profit to the combine of 3 cents per bushel. I think the House will agree with my statement that a quarter or half a cent a bushel would be a very good profit, and yet they are enabled to make these enormous profits which I have pointed out.

Now, I want to say a word or two with regard to the grading at Fort William. My hon. friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) dealt with that subject and I want to emphasize the point he made. I very greatly regret that the Minister of Inland Revenue is not present to hear what I have got to say on this question. I want to see the grading of wheat conducted in such a manner at Fort William that there will be no mixing of grades, and that there will be no stealing of grades from the farmers. We want the inspector to be a man, not paid by fees as he is at present, but paid a salary so that he will be in the position of a judge and be able to give an impartial judgment on the grading of wheat. If the mixing of wheat were stopped at Port Arthur and stopped at the elevators throughout the country, the great advantage would accrue that we would secure a better sample of wheat and a better character for our wheat. The reputation of our wheat would rise rapidly if the present system were stopped. I believe I am within the mark in saying that the wheat grown in Manitoba and the North-west Territories is the best wheat produced in the world, but owing to the system by which it is graded and the practice of mixing wheat at these elevators, the result is that the people of England and other foreign countries who buy our wheat do not secure the best samples and labour under a delusion with regard to its quality. By mixing good wheat with poor wheat, thriftless farmers receive just as much advantage as thrifty farmers, the grade of the entire lot being lowered.

I want to submit to the House a few figures in connection with the grading of wheat, and I would bespeak the earnest attention of the members who are present to these figures, which I think are rather startling. One of the first things I did after reaching Ottawa was to place a motion on the Order paper for a return showing the number of bushels of wheat graded into the elevators at Fort William from the 15th September, 1897, to the 15th January, 1898, and the grades of the same, and the number of bushels graded out at the same place during the same period. My object in seeking for that information was this. For years it has been charged that although large quantities of wheat were sent into these elevators which graded No. 2 hard and No. 3 hard, and even lower grades, yet by skilfully mixing the wheat in these elevators, and sometimes putting in scoured wheat, a great deal of this wheat was raised to a higher grade; and what I was anxious to get at was how much was graded in, and the grades, and how much was graded out and the grades in order to show that the prevailing belief that grades were raised, was correct. I have before me the figures, which I was able to procure to-day from the Department of Inland Revenue. There was inspected in during the period above mentioned of Extra wheat 19,800 bushels. That Extra would be a grade much higher than No. 1 hard—the very cream of the wheat of the North-west. Although that quantity was graded into the elevator, I find that not a single bushel was graded out. That proves to a demonstration, I think, my contention that these high grades of wheat are used to raise the grades of the lower classes. If not used for this purpose what became of it? Of No. 1 hard there was graded in 7,816,200 bushels, and graded out 8,059,248 bushels; showing that there was 243,048 bushels more of No. 1 hard graded out than was graded in. It is quite evident, therefore, that the grades of wheat were raised by mixing. Of No. 2 hard there was graded in within the same period 1,682,100 bushels, and graded out only 130,153 bushels showing that 1,551,947 bushels of No. 2 hard has to be accounted for. This, I take it, proves to a demonstration that this was raised and graded out as No. 1 hard. Of No. 3 hard 41,300 bushels was graded in and 53,649 bushels graded out, a difference of 12,349 bushels. Of No. 1 Northern there was graded in 13,300 bushels, and graded out 19,206 bushels, a difference of 5,906 bushels. Of No. 2 Northern, there was graded in 23,800 bushels, and graded out nil. Of No. 1 White Fife, there was graded in 10,500 bushels, and graded out nil. Of No Grade there was graded in 7,000 bushels and graded out nil. Of Condemned, there was graded in 4,200 bushels and graded out nil. Of Rejected, there was graded in 347,900 bushels, and graded out nil. Of No 2 frosted, there was graded in 1,200 bushels, and graded out 14,666 bushels. Of No. 2 frosted, there was graded in 4,200 bushels, and graded out nil. Now what became of all these low grade wheats? Where have they gone?

It occurred to me that there was a discrepancy in these figures, and that there must have been a larger amount in the elevator than appears. So I induced Mr. Watts, the secretary, I think, of the Grain Exchange of Toronto, to telegraph his people in Toronto for the official return to the Board of Trade of wheat at Fort William the dates above mentioned, and I will lay the result before the House. The stock of wheat at Port Arthur, per official returns to the Toronto Board of Trade on September 15th, 1897, was 1,474,000 bushels. The statement from the inspector, which I have just read, shows that from September 15th, 1897, to January 15th, 1898, he inspected in 9,972,200 bushels. So that at the latter date there should be in the elevator a total of 11,446,200 bushels. During the same period, according to the statement of the inspector which I have read, there was inspected out 8,538,951 bushels, leaving apparently on January 15th, 1898, 2,907,249 bushels; whereas the returns from the official report to the Toronto Board of Trade show that there was on hand at that date only 44,000 bushels; so that we have 2,163,249 bushels to be accounted for. I would like to know where that wheat is. The inference would be that a larger quantity was graded out than would appear from the report of the inspector at Fort William is not correct, but designed to mislead. During the period from September 15th, 1897, to January 15th, 1898, the inspector's return shows less out than in of 1,433,249 bushels. The Board of Trade returns show a reduction in stocks during the same period of 730,000 bushels, leaving 2,163,249 bushels. The inspector reports: Extra wheat graded in, 19,800 bushels; graded out, nil; No. 1 hard wheat, 243,000 bushels more graded out than graded in; and No. 2 hard, more inspected in than out by 1,551,974 bushels.

Now, it might be fair to ask me what is done in the United States with regard to this question? It is important that we should take a leaf out of the book of our neighbours on this question, because we find that the Americans, no matter what our opinion of them may be politically, are a progressive people, who succeed in doing business on business lines. They used to have an elevator monopoly in the United States, and I am told that it was a serious injury to the country; but, like a business people, they dealt with the question in a business way. They appointed a railway commission, and the result has been that they have been able to get rid of the elevator monopoly and to see that the grain is handled in the interest of the farmers. A few days ago, when the question of establishing a railway commission for Canada was discussed here, I took the opportunity of saying a few words upon it.

It was not officially intimated, although it seemed to be understood that the Government, while considering the question, was not prepared to announce its policy, so that we may take it for granted that we shall not have a railway commission appointed this session. If we do not have a railway commission appointed which would regulate this question of the elevator monopoly, so much the more desirable is it that my Bill should become law.

In order to place before the House the best information procurable, I wrote to the Secretaries of State of the Dakotas and Minnesota, and received in reply many books showing what the laws of these several states are in this connection. In these states the farmers have the privilege of shipping their grain directly from flat warehouses or their own vehicles. Let me read briefly from the warehouse and grain laws of the state of Minnesota:

Sec. 35. In case any owner or consignee of grain shall be dissatisfied with the inspection of any lot of grain, or shall from any cause, desire to receive his property without its passing into store, he shall be at liberty to have the same withheld from going into any public warehouse (whether the property may have previously been consigned to such warehouse or not) by giving notice to the person or corporation in whose possession it may be at the time of giving such notice; and such grain shall be withheld from going into store, and delivered to him, subject only to such proper charges as may be a lien upon it prior to such notice—the grain, in railroad cars, to be removed therefrom by such owner or consignee within twenty-four (24) hours after such notice has been given to the railroad company having it in possession; provided, such railroad company place the same in a proper and convenient place for unloading; and any person or corporation refusing to allow such owner or consignee to receive his grain shall be deemed guilty of conversion, and shall be liable to pay such owner or consignee double the value of the property so converted. Notice that such grain is not to be delivered into store may also be given to the proprietor or manager of any warehouse into which it would otherwise have been delivered; and if, after such notice, it be taken into store in such warehouse, the proprietor or manager of such warehouse shall be liable to the owner of such grain for double its market value.

I do not want to detain the House too long on this point. I could quote at length from the laws of Minnesota and these regulations which have been sent me, but in order to present to the House, in a concrete form, the exact position of affairs with regard to the grading of wheat in that country, let me read a couple of letters which I received from the department of railroad and warehouse commissioners of Minnesota. It will be found that they cover the ground very accurately:

St. Paul, Minn., 26th Jan., 1898.

R. L. Richardson, Esq.,
Editor "Tribune," Winnipeg, Man.

Dear Sir,—Replying to your favour of 23rd inst., will say that chap. 144, General Laws of 1835, was the first legislation enacted in this state looking toward a remedy for alleged evils in the business of grain buying and handling. Previous to this, the inspection of grain was in the control of the Chambers of Commerce of Minneapolis and Duluth, and the standards fixed by them was the basis for grades given at country points to farmers. The system was unsatisfactory to the producer, he regarding the grades as arbitrary, unjust and wholly in the interest of the large elevator companies and the millers of Minneapolis, of which two elements of the trade the membership of the Chambers of Commerce was then largely composed.

Placing the control of grain inspection in the hands of state officers was regarded as likely to result in more uniform grading and in disinterested and impartial work.

This law applied only to the inspection at terminal points, and as but few of the farmers were able to load their own wheat into cars and secure the advantage of terminal inspection, the elevator companies operating in the country continued to exact rigid grades as before. This called for supplementary legislation, which was secured in the passage of chap. 64, G. L. 1893.

Let me read that section. It is a short one and will be interesting :

Sec. 1. Any person, firm, or corporation desirous of erecting and operating at or contiguous to any railway station or siding a warehouse or elevator for the purchase, sale, shipment or storage of grain for the public for hire, may make application in writing containing a description of that portion of the right of way of said railroad on which said person, firm or corporation desires to erect a warehouse or elevator, and the size and capacity of the warehouse or elevator proposed to be erected, and the time for which it is desired to maintain said warehouse or elevator to the person, firm or corporation owning, leasing or operating the railway at such station or siding for the right, privilege and easement of erecting and maintaining for the time stated in such application and for the reasonable compensation such warehouse or elevator as aforesaid upon the right of way appertaining to such railway at such siding or station, and within and between the outside switches of the yard of such railway station or siding, and upon paying or securing in the manner hereinafter prescribed reasonable compensation for the right, privilege and easement aforesaid shall absolutely and unconditionally be entitled to the same.

The letter then proceeds :

—providing a means whereby farmers, either individually or collectively, could erect their own warehouses on the right of way of railroad companies in the state, and thus be enabled to ship their wheat to terminal points and secure full grades and prices. In case there is lack of room at any station for elevator sites when demanded, parties can secure sites, by purchase, on lands adjacent to railroad right of way and are assured of rail connection under provisions of chap. 65, G. L. 1893.

Let me read that passage :

Sec. 1. The owner or owners of any elevator, warehouse or mill of not less than five thousand bushels capacity, located on lands adjacent to the right of way of any railroad company in this state, at or in the immediate vicinity of any regular way station of any railroad, shall have the right to demand of such railroad company the construction of a side track over its right of way from such elevator, warehouse, mill or manufactory, which side track shall connect with a switch with the main or other side track of such railroad, at a point within a reasonable distance from such way station, and the railroad company shall build such side track and make such connection at its own expense. And in case no suitable place for the erection of such elevator, warehouse and mill can be had, for any cause, within the distance occupied by the switches, then the railroad and warehouse commission shall have the right upon application of either party in interest, to designate a place for the erection of the same, not more than one-quarter of a mile beyond the end of such switch ; provided, however, that no such owner or owners shall have the right to demand, nor shall any railroad company be required to construct any such side track under the provisions of this Act which shall connect with the main track of such railroad outside of the outside switches of the yard of such station or siding as the same, may be established at the date of such demand.

Then the letter proceeds :

These three measures have resulted in opening up the interior markets to competition, where previously they were practically monopolized by half a dozen large companies. In addition to this, the railroad companies have shown a disposition in the past three or four years to furnish cars to individuals who desired to load their own grain on side tracks, and thus avoid the cost of having it handled through the local elevators.

While the line elevator companies still operate at nearly every station in the state, it is rare to find a station where there are not from one to three or four small houses operated by private individuals, or farmers' co-operative associations. This, taken in connection with the privilege of shipping from side track, gives the farmer practically everything he has contended for, as it enables him to reach the large markets, when grades or prices are not upon a just basis at the local point. There is no dissatisfaction with present conditions in this state.

You will observe that under chap. 148, G. L. 1895, all elevators and warehouses on railroad right of way are required to procure a license and are operated under the supervision of the Railroad and Warehouse Commissioners. There is a marked improvement in the character of the grading at country elevators under the operation of this law, and a general disposition shown to conform to terminal standards. The sharp competition now existing compels interior buyers to give the farmer "all there is in it," to use a common expression, as he knows to a moral certainty that the farmer will send his grain to the larger markets unless proper treatment is accorded.

If the farmers of Minnesota and Dakota are receiving "all there is in it," I think I am safe in appealing to this House to see that the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west are also placed in a position to receive "all there is in it."

I wrote the gentlemen who sent me the above letter, to ascertain if elevator owners dealt in wheat, and to see if any difficulty was experienced by farmers in procuring cars, and received the following reply :—

St. Paul, Minn., 1st Feb., 1898.

R. L. Richardson,
Editor "Tribune" Winnipeg.

Sir,—In reply to yours of 27th ult., with farther reference to the subject of grain handling at country points in Minnesota under existing laws and conditions, will state that the large line companies do not look for profit to accrue in these times from the mere handling and shipping of wheat, but rather from the "storage" feature of the business.

Formerly, when these companies operated and exclusively controlled the country warehouse business, the charge for handling and shipping with other incidental charges amounted to three and one-half cents per bushel. As they were doing all the business and transferring large quantities this charge yielded a handsome revenue. The advent of competition in the field has resulted not only in a division of the business but in a very material reduction of charges, the present rate for handling being but two cents per bushel. This charge, in view of largely reduced receipts, yields only sufficient revenue to the larger houses to meet the expenses of operating. The profit now is made by filling up their houses in the fall and selling the May option against these purchases; under normal market conditions there is generally a premium of 4½ to 5 cents per bushel for May over October and November. When May arrives, they ship in the grain to fill in the contracts. This has hardly held good during the present crop year, owing to the relatively higher price for cash wheat as against the futures. The elevator companies are complaining of the unprofitable business the present year, but under ordinary conditions the business is, as far as I know, profitable and satisfactory.

Under existing conditions, with the increased number of warehouses and storage capacity, grain is handled more expeditiously than ever before, and it is rare to have a blockade even in the busiest portion of the year, where formerly it was a matter of daily occurrence.

I regret having been obliged to detain the House at such length. My only excuse is, that this is a question of the very deepest importance to the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. The settlers there have had a long and a hard struggle. People who live east in their comfortable homes, with abundance of fuel, have little idea of the hardships to which these people are subjected. The fuel is scarce, and often the farmer is obliged to drive 15 or 20 miles in the severe cold to procure a very small load of very poor wood. There are also other disabilities under which they labour. I think I shall not appeal in vain, when I ask hon. members of this House to join with the hon. member for East Assinibola and myself in pressing this Bill to a conclusion. I appeal to the members of this House to render justice to their fellow-men in the west, to support the representatives of the west in their effort to so amend the law that a ring or combine in Winnipeg shall not be able to fitch from the hard-working settlers of that country a clear million of dollars in the handling of the season's crop.

Mr. DAVIN. The subject of this Bill is one of the most important, as affecting the North-west Territories, that can occupy the attention of the House. On previous occasions, I have brought before the House the necessity, in the interests of justice to the farmers, of dealing with the question of grading wheat. The facts that have been placed before us to-night, illustrates the propositions I laid down at previous sessions, as to the injury done the farmers in the mixing of wheat, and of the whole system of buying grain. This Bill, however, deals with a matter that has come up within a twelvemonth. Up to last year, at various points, like Moose Jaw, Lumsden and other places, we had not only elevators, but warehouses whence the railway took the grain of the farmer. However, the combine of which we have not heard too much or too strongly this evening, was formed last year. There was a feeling that men were about to reap a great harvest at the expense of the farmers. We found that at places where men had been accustomed to ship their grain, from warehouses with perfect efficiency and satisfaction to everybody, these warehouses had to disappear, and these men who, from one end of the country to the other, were putting up elevators, looked as though they felt themselves masters of the situation. I believe that if the farmers had not readily assumed that this was the case, things would not have been carried with a high hand. I knew nothing of the matter in my own constituency until they told me they had to take away the warehouses, that an elevator was being erected. If they had asked my advice before, I certainly would have advised them that the warehouse need not be taken away. It is my opinion, that, under the law as it stands, no common carrier can refuse to take the grain of the farmer, if he presents it in portable fashion. But if there be any doubt about it, it is not desirable that the farmer should have the responsibility thrown upon him of initiating litigation. I think that nothing is more desirable than that we should have a Bill such as that introduced by my hon. friend (Mr. Douglas). I shall not at this late hour occupy the time of this House by going further into this matter. Without committing myself in matters of detail, I concur in most of what has been said. This Bill shall have for its second reading and its subsequent stages my entire support.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I would suggest to my hon. friend in charge of this Bill (Mr. Douglas) that, as it is an important Bill, and some of its provisions require a good deal of consideration, the best course would be to read the Bill a second time and refer it to the Committee on Railways and Canals, where it can be thoroughly discussed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What about my suggestion with regard to the Bill which I have on the Order Paper one or two lines down, and which is designed to cover much the same ground? I suggest that both be referred to a special committee and amalgamated.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think these are Bills of such importance that they require to be considered by the Railway Committee. My hon. friend when his Bill comes up, might refer that to the Railway Committee too. But I do not think it is a case for a special committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have prepared the two Bills carefully, and really the Bill which we are now discussing covers the whole ground, the first clause in the Bill covers the ground that is proposed in the Bill of the hon. member for Lisgar. Though I have no objection that the two Bills should go before the committee and should be amalgamated, but I would prefer that my Bill should stand upon its own merits.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman had better send it to the Railway Committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS moved that the said Bill be referred to the Railway Committee.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. After the very able manner in which this Bill has been introduced, and its various points brought before the House, it would be entirely out of place for me to take up any time in further discussing it this evening. I will not therefore trespass upon the time of the House further than to say that the remarks of the hon. gentlemen who have discussed this Bill meet with my hearty approval and endorsement. There is no doubt whatever that a very grave and serious grievance exists in the whole grain business of the North-west. As the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has said, from the time the grain leaves the farmer's hands, the business is badly conducted. I believe, however, that the establishment of a railway commission, which would deal with these matters, would remove this grievance almost entirely, and I regretted to hear the other day from the Minister of Railways that there was not much probability of a railway commission being appointed this session. However, it gives me very great pleasure to endorse, as a meantime expedient, the principle of this Bill. I may say that while the elevator owners throughout Manitoba and the North-west are making some outcry in regard to this matter, I for one do not think that any honest elevator owner or manager has anything to fear. On the Manitoba and the North-Western Railway, and on the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company's Road, no elevator monopoly exists. The farmers there can load their cars from wagons or in any other way that suits them best. The elevator owners on these roads have no trouble, and no honest man need be at all afraid of allowing the farmers the privilege of loading their own cars. Of course, the dishonest elevator owner and the unprincipled elevator manager will object; but people who are anxious to do business in an honest and straightforward way, have nothing whatever to fear in the passage of legislation such as this. There is no doubt that it is the duty of this House to protect the farmer. The grain man, as far as my experience goes, and I fancy that is the experience of every other hon. gentleman in this House, is quite able to look after his own interests and to protect himself; but in the case of the farmer it is our duty to pass such legislation as will guard his interests, and protect him from the rapacity of his fellow men.

Mr. DAVIS. I merely wish to say a few words on this question, and to express my hearty sympathy with the Bill moved by the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas). I think it is a step in the right direction. We know that the farmers in the West have been labouring under great difficulties for several years, and this is one of them. Now, I consider that this elevator combine is a dangerous institution for the reason that it does away with competition, and competition is a thing that is good for the farmers, it is the only way they can get a fair price for their grain. Several companies of this kind form a combine, and they have the power of fixing the price in their own hands, so that the farmer has no chance at all, and has to give them the grain for whatever they may offer for it. Another matter which was alluded to by the hon. gentleman, the manner in which the grain is weighed, I do not consider is fair at all. This grain is poured into the hopper, it disappears from the view of the farmer, in fact he never sees the grain, and he has got to take whatever weight is given to him by the man who has charge of the elevator, and he has nothing more to say. Now, with reference to there being a combine, some persons might say there is no combine, but I have taken the trouble to find out, and I know there is. All the elevator companies in the North-west Territories have one agent in the city of Toronto, that agent does business for all the elevator companies in the North-west Territories and Manitoba. So I think that goes to prove that there is a combine. Another grievance is that not only can these grain men fix the price of grain for the farmers, because there is no competition, but it appears to me they can also force the millers to pay very nearly what they please for the grain, that is to say, they can force them to pay at least 8 to 10 cents a bushel more than it is actually worth. They do that in this way: They have 15 cents a bushel protection, and they are thus enabled to raise the prices. They get it into the elevator and hold it, and as I was informed by a miller to-day, they are asking them now $1.12½ a bushel for that wheat. Another thing is that it does away with the encouragement the farmers have had heretofore to raise good wheat, because no matter how good the quality of the wheat the farmer raises, after it passes through this elevator and is mixed, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), the farmer does not get credit for the actual quality of his wheat. I do not think I need to say anything more on this question. I think the hon. member for Assiniboia deserves a great deal of credit in bringing this matter before the House, and I intend to vote for his Bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As this Bill has now passed the second reading, personally I would very much prefer, as it is a public matter, that the Government should take charge of it and make it a Government measure.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I do not think that the Government can take charge of the hon. gentleman's measure, it must go before the Railway Committee on its merits and be discussed there. The Government are not in the habit of taking charge of measures unless they have introduced them and considered them themselves.

Motion agreed to, and Bill referred to the Committee on Railways, &c.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 18th March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

RESIGNATION OF MR. BRUNEAU.

Mr. MARCOTTE rose to move the motion of which he gave notice yesterday.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I suppose my hon. friend is rising to bring up again the question of privilege of which he gave notice yesterday. I would ask him to allow the motion to stand over until Monday. We have consulted the law officers of the Crown, but have not received their report, and are not in a position to advise the House what will be the decision of the Government on the question.

Motion allowed to stand.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 86) respecting the Brockville and St. Lawrence Bridge Company.—(Mr. Wood, Brockville).

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 39) respecting the inspection of steamboats and the examination and licensing of engineers employed thereon.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). When we were in committee on this Bill before we passed most of the sections, but some were reserved. My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton) desired to have the line in the second section which brings steam dredges and floating elevators within the operation of the Bill, reserved. Though this section was not formally reserved, I told my hon. friend from Kingston that it would be considered reserved in order that further opportunity for discussion might be afforded. I would suggest that it be taken up now.

Mr. BRITTON. Since the matter was before the committee on the last occasion, I have made inquiry and have found that there is strong objection on the part of the owners of these floating elevators to have them brought within the scope of this Bill. These are not, in any sense, steamboats. They are not propelled by steam power, but are simply barges with an engine upon them. There is no more reason why the engine and boiler on one of these should be inspected than there is why the engine and boiler on a wharf should be inspected; and I certainly take objection to the jurisdiction of this House to deal with it unless they also intend to claim jurisdiction in reference to stationary engines. Though they have been in use a long time, no accident has happened. I am aware that that is not an argument that has very great force, but it is to some extent a reason why these floating elevators should not be brought within the operation of the Act. There is no demand for such a law. The Bill, I fancy, has been prepared at the instance of the Minister, by the men in his office, and they have thought to get hold of anything that had a steam engine upon it and that was afloat. This law is designed to apply to steamboats, to vessels that are propelled by steam. It is not, it seems to me, intended to apply, nor ought it to apply to a case where, instead of having a floating dock—for we have such, docks that rise and fall with the tide, with an engine upon it—the engine is upon a barge or floater which lies beside the dock. I withdraw the objection that I had to dredges being included under the Bill, because these are moved about from place to place in the harbour and even from harbour to harbour. But it is not the case with floating elevators; they are simply an adjunct of the dock and not a vessel, except in the very narrowest sense—that they are afloat.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I submit to my hon. friend (Mr. Britton) that his arguments are not by any means conclusive. We claim to exercise authority over all steamboats and vessels which are within our jurisdiction; but, with regard to stationary engines, there is a very grave question whether we have any jurisdiction over them. My own personal opinion is that we have not. But we have jurisdiction over steam barges and floating elevators. I understand my hon. friend to waive his objections to the inclusion of steam barges and so the committee is confined to the request made by him that floating elevators shall not be included. But there are already a large number of men employed upon these floating elevators, and it is reasonable to suppose, with the increasing trade anticipated after the canals are dredged that there will be a large number of these floating elevators at Montreal, at Kingston, and at other places along the St. Lawrence. The proposition is that the boilers upon this class of vessels, upon which there must, from time to time, be a large number of men employed, shall be absolutely exempt from inspection. No Minister could justify the application of the Act to steam barges and steamboats, and yet say: Here is a class of vessels that we will leave out of consideration altogether, and leave the workmen upon them at the mercy of the owners.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). They have a number of floating elevators in Montreal now.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes; and what would the workmen of this country say to me if I calmly consented to withdraw the operation of this class of vessels from the Act? I should feel that I had been faithless in the matter. Unless the committee, by a very strong vote overpower me, I shall have to ask that this clause be passed as it is.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I quite agree with the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries upon this question. What has been said on the other side involves an attack upon the system of inspection generally. It has taken a long time to induce the shipping community to accept any of the other features of the law. A great many owners of this kind of property prefer to manage their property as they think best, and much dislike that interference which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) refers to in connection with cover floating elevators. But to any person who supports the general principle of the Bill, I think the position taken by the hon. Minister of Marine must seem unassailable. To exempt these floating elevators because the owners prefer to be left alone, would weaken the hon. Minister's position with regard to all the other shipping interests. This Bill is for the protection of life. The mere fact that there are no passengers on these floating elevators does not affect the case, for the Bill applies to a number of kinds of craft on which no passengers are carried. The object is not merely to protect the lives of a certain class of individuals, but to protect life generally. I hope the hon. member for Kingston will take a broader view, and will endeavour to reconcile the opinions of those who are behind him with advanced opinion upon this question. The shipping community themselves stand in a very different attitude towards the general principle of the Bill from that they occupied when it was first introduced. I think that, as a whole, they favour these precautions which are thrown around the lives of our citizens.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, whether it is intended that the Bill shall apply to stationary engines that are used in the loading of vessels—for instance, a hoisting engine used for hoisting cargoes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I should be very glad, indeed, if I thought the constitution permitted, to add to the Bill so as to include the stationary engines to which the hon. gentleman refers. But I cannot see under what possible clause of the constitution this Parliament has power to legislate with regard to stationary engines on the land.

Mr. McDOUGALL. There is great pressure for some such legislation. Of course, I do not know if this Parliament has power to pass it or not. If it is possible to see any way to include these engines and boilers within the operation of the present measure, I think it would be a very proper amendment.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). With regard to what has been said by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall), I am sure there is a very strong feeling among the members of the Association of Stationary Engineers that some action should be taken by this Parliament to give them a proper status and place them on the same footing as engineers who are required to pass examination.

I myself have been approached by a deputation from the district in which I live, asking me to urge upon the Government to take steps in that direction. I notice on the Order paper that the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) has a Bill aiming at that object. I asked him some days ago whether he was going to proceed with his Bill this session, and he said then that the Government had some doubt as to the jurisdiction of this Parliament to legislate in that direction. Now, I would ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in view of the very widespread feeling among that class of engineers who wish to be placed upon a status equal in importance to that of the marine engineers, whether he has fully satisfied himself that this Parliament has jurisdiction in that matter. I deem it my duty to make this request on behalf of those who are deeply interested in this matter. I shall be satisfied with his assurance upon that subject.

Mr. BRITTON. I do not want to be misunderstood, and I see that I have been by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood). I do not object to inspection for stationary engines, and I should be very glad if the Bill of the hon. member for North Oxford should become law, or some similar Bill. But my objection is that a steam elevator, a floating elevator, is called a steamboat, and by the interpretation clause of this Bill, all the clauses of this Bill that are applicable to steamboats, except in so far as they refer to passenger steamboats, are made applicable to the floating elevator. That is not a steamboat in the proper sense of the term. What we understand by steamboat is a boat that is propelled by steam and goes from place to place. In this case it is nothing more or less than an engine placed upon a floater in a harbour, such as the hon. member for Cape Breton refers to as an engine on a dock to assist in loading and in unloading cargoes. If the hon. Minister will make inspection necessary for floating elevators, I have no objection to that; but I do object to calling them steamboats, and wherever any one of the many clauses in this long Bill refers to a steamboat, to make them apply to a floating elevator. That is my objection. It is not against inspection, not against having every safeguard possible thrown around those who work upon floating elevators. But I say that when you call a floating elevator a steamboat, it is a misnomer: they are not steamboats at all. To say that a floating elevator is a steamboat, and to make these clauses applicable to it, is legislating entirely in the wrong direction, I submit. Of course if the committee is against me, and if the hon. Minister is not willing to modify the Bill, I can only protest and sit down.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In answer to my hon. friend from Brockville, I say that I had considered that question, and have come to the conclusion that this Parliament had no jurisdiction to legislate in respect to stationary engines.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville).

On section 11,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This is to provide for cases where a steamboat inspector is called from time to time to inspect a steamboat, and the master or owner suddenly says to him, Oh, I am not ready, and the man has to go back home. As the section is drawn, it is a little arbitrary, but I did not know how to reach the point otherwise. They ought only to be punished when they are in actual default, and I would suggest to the committee that after the word "boat" in the 30th line, these words should be inserted: "If the Minister determines that such expenses were incurred through the fault or default of the owner or manager of such steamboat." Then the Minister may be relied upon in these cases to give fair consideration to the facts, and if he determines that it was the fault or default of the owner or manager of the boat, then he should pay the expenses, and only then.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BRITTON. How will that agree with section 4?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend thinks that the words "without such permission" should be repeated, so as to cover the 1st clause, which he thought might be read as disqualifying any man from holding any civil office, whether he had permission or not. I do not agree with him in his construction, but to meet the matter and put it beyond doubt, we will insert these words.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am opposed to that clause altogether. I do not wish to say any more, however, than I said on the last occasion. I think the inspector in this position ought not to be allowed to engage in any business of any kind whatsoever outside the business of the department. Officers in the service who receive salaries and those men who hold positions like theirs, are not allowed to engage in outside business, it makes them open to suspicion. Take the case of the mayor that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries gave us the other night, a case which he thought would be an extreme one; if the rule were applied and the inspector was not permitted to hold this office, I think it puts the inspector in a very awkward position, and the department also. The mayor, as we know in that district, has to compete for public favour, and has his supporters, and this must be considered in connection with this business. How can he hold to a rigid observance of the law those steamboat owners on whom, perhaps, his very election depends, and to whom he must come under obligations? Other officers in the Customs Department, the Inland Revenue service, and all other departments, are debarred from holding these positions. I do not think there is an officer receiving $1,000 a year in the Inland Revenue or the Customs allowed to hold office outside of the department. If there be so, the reason for applying the law is stronger as regards an ordinary Customs or Inland Revenue officer, because he occupies a impartial position, and if he does not occupy such a position his office is of no use whatever. The feeling has been constantly aroused in regard to our officers that we should prohibit them engaging in other business. The Minister of Marine spoke of a case that had occurred within his time. I remember a case within my time where an inspector was complained of because he had drawn plans for engines and boilers of certain firms. It is admitted that these officers should be entirely above suspicion, and we should recognize the importance of that point. This is a most dangerous clause, because it gives direct authority to the Minister of Marine to permit these men to hold offices which the public will feel are inconsistent with the position of inspector of steamboats.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Bill only enables the Minister to carry out effectively that which is done now ineffectively. If an inspector of steamboats is engaged in a business that I think incompatible with his position, I would ask him to resign the office at once, or I would take the responsibility of advising his resignation. He would then say that the law did not prohibit what was complained of and the Minister had no right to act in such a cruel and arbitrary way. I am trying to introduce the principle into the law that they should not be permitted to hold office outside, but inasmuch as it is necessary to appoint men in the North-west Territories at very small salaries, it was suggested, and I agreed with the suggestion, that the power to permit or prevent the supplementary employment should be conferred on the Minister.

ROYAL ASSENT TO BILL.

A Message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:—

Mr. Speaker,

His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of your Honourable House in the Chamber of the Honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, with the House went up to the Senate Chamber;

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that the Governor General had been pleased to give in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bill:—

An Act to protect Canada against the introduction of the insect pest known as the San José Scale.

The House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 39).

(In the Committee.)

Mr. FOSTER. If my recommendation would be of any avail in this matter so far as the Minister's own comfort is concerned, I would advise him most strongly not to put this invitation into the statute. That is a minor matter, however, because a Minister is paid his salary and is supposed to do the work, and if he is pestered he has to take the amount of pestering given to him. It will not add to his comfort a great deal to have his petition put on the Statute-book, and the invitation for pressure from all over the country wherever these officers are distributed, and pressure which will be necessarily partisan in its nature, and where the power cannot help but be administered in a partisan manner. I know the hon. gentleman strives to the best of his ability to be non-partisan and perfectly unprejudiced; but I know too that he has a large lump of human nature in him and that, strive as he may, he even now finds it very difficult not to get off the straight line once in a while. That, however, I say is a matter of minor importance, and relates to the Minister's personal comfort, and he must take it into consideration. Outside of that point there are many objections to this clause. It opens a door to pressure from outside, which will be exercised in party interests, given in some cases and withheld in others and which will not work for the benefit of the public service. It is a true principle to lay down that Government gives a salary to a man to do certain work, and his time should be devoted to that work. That is the general rule which governs civil servants who do not perform other than the statutory work, so to speak, for which they are paid their salary. It does happen that we have a class of officers who are allowed to occupy two or three offices instead of one office. The collectors of customs occasionally are allowed to act as collectors of inland revenue as well, but these cases are exceptions to the rule, but I recollect very distinctly that from year to year the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) attacked the Government for even allowing such officers to do extra outside work, even although it was shown that it resulted in convenience and economy. With respect to the inspectors of steamboats, I think it is an office which should be outside of this partisan influence. Suppose, for instance, an inspector occupied another office. It may be that the office was one in the gift of the municipality or city. If he obtained it, he did so as a result of a party canvass, he having been named by the party and elected by the party. Great pressure is brought to bear and sufficient reasons are advanced upon which the Minister acts. The moment that is done, you have a partisan inspector. Suppose there is a case in which one of the parties is a friend and the other an opponent, there is ground for suspicion as to the independent action of the officer, and suspicion that actually injustice has been done. The Minister had of the two evils better choose the least. The Government should pay the inspectors a sufficient sum of money to give them a proper salary, and if in one or two cases they paid a little more than they would otherwise have had to pay, there would be the great advantage of having an officer free entirely from partisan pressure. I speak on this subject without any feeling. This is a direct invitation to bring in politics, of which we have enough, and this will at the same time mean the use of political pressure. I advise that the statute be left as at present. If overwhelming reasons are given why a different course should be taken towards the officers, then they can be treated as before, or if the Minister of his knowledge is able to state that in the North-west or some other portions of the Dominion it is found impossible to get men and pay them a sufficient salary for the small amount of work required, then an exception might be made in certain cases, although even in regard to them I would take the ground that it is better to pay a little more and leave the statute free from the objection.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I appreciate that my hon. friend has no feeling whatever in this matter except to get the legislation in as perfect shape as possible. I am leaving the law as it has been departmentally administered.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, pardon me ; not as to permission.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. As it has been departmentally administered ; there has not been a prohibition against these officers.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There has been a departmental prohibition.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is in the discretion of the Minister. There is no law prohibiting these men from engaging in other business. I am trying to prohibit them by law, but I say that under peculiar circumstances the discretion might be invested with the Minister. It has never been used by a Minister for political purposes ; I have never had a hint of such a thing, and I am quite sure from what I know of the working of the department, there never will be, for those things go on in a mechanical way. The inspectors remain there until they are worn out in the service or until they resign. I have never changed any inspector of boilers nor of hulls ; I kept on the same men that were there before, and I propose to keep them on so far as I know, unless they are inefficient or unfit for the office.

Mr. CLANCY. Or partisans.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If they are "O.P.'s" I suppose they would share the fate which usually follows that class of people. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will see that I for the first time introduce a prohibition against their holding other offices, and I include a proviso in that prohibition that in certain cases the Minister may, if he thinks fit, give that permission. I do so, not from my own suggestion, but by the suggestion of the officers.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Very naturally.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I mean the suggestion of the officers of the department here, not of the inspectors.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Oh.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes ; Mr. Magee and Mr. Adams suggested this, because they say that in certain outlying localities you cannot pay a man sufficient to give his whole time to the work, as there is not enough work to justify it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where is the case of the man who is a mayor ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think it was at Kingston.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That surely was a case where there was no ground for it at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He applied to me to know if he could become mayor or alderman, I forget which.

Mr. BRITTON. Alderman ; he is going to run for mayor next year.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If you allow an inspector to be mayor of Kingston, surely you will allow an inspector to run for mayor or alderman in any other city.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The law did not prohibit him ; it was just a departmental order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is a very strong case against this. I believe it is against the efficiency of this Act to allow an inspector of steamboats to be mayor of a city like Kingston. I thought it was some small place where there were some exceptional reasons for it. A man like that cannot be regarded as absolutely independent, having regard to the duties of his office, when he has such ambitions to gratify and serve. When I was in the department the rule was that no officer of this kind should engage in outside work, and the question came before me when an officer was attacked upon the ground of impartiality, it being said that he could not be independent when he was working for people whose work he afterwards inspected. The rule was made general then, and I do not know a case where the rule should be more strictly adhered to than that of a steamboat inspector.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would not ask this at all if I had not pointed out the exceptional position of inspectors in the outlying districts.

Mr. McMULLEN. The ex-Minister of Finance made some reference to my taking exception in past years to more than their ordinary salaries being paid to civil servants. That course was introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite when in power, and over a million of the money of the people of this country has been given to civil servants over and above their ordinary salaries.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Do not let us get into that question.

Mr. McMULLEN. I simply wish to say that in order to carry out the principle which I have advocated in the past, I have a Bill now on the Order paper which if I receive the support of hon. gentlemen opposite, will put a stop to that kind of thing.

Mr. BRITTON. The objection I raised at first was that the clause as it is drafted in the Bill made it prohibitory as to holding any civil office whatever, while it made it permissive so far as the engaging in other business like the valuing of damaged goods. The Minister has now made the permission applicable to clause 2. That removes the objection I had, but I certainly think there is a great deal of force in what has been said by the opposite side about making it prohibitory that they should engage in any outside work or hold any civil office. I know that steamboat inspectors have been permitted to do a good deal of outside work in reference to valuing for insurance companies and for steamboat owners, and for which they have been paid. I suppose so long as that does not interfere with their business there is no objection to it. I also know that some of these inspectors do hold a civil office, and I do know that it is objectionable in some cases, and objection has been raised to it. The answer was: There is no prohibition in the statute, and why should persons raise the objection so long as the holding of this civil office does not interfere with their business. As to my objection, I am quite willing to make it prohibitory.

Mr. FOSTER. It is quite fair to say: Why should not they do this so long as it does not interfere with their duty, but everybody knows that where you allow a man to take outside work and get paid for it, he wants to get as much of that outside work as possible, and the tendency will always be for him to infringe upon his other duties. The other objection is the natural desire that comes to any man who holds an office in the gift of the voters to be friendly to those men who are friendly to him, and that introduces a sort of an inclination to favour one side and not favour the other, with the certainty of a chance for a grievance anyway. Why should we be more lenient to this class of officers than is the Postmaster General to his officers? I know a particular instance in which the Postmaster General is acting very stringently with reference to a postmaster who, before he took office, was a lawyer, and had certain cases on hand and certain business to finish. The strings were drawn there very tightly, even as to the finishing up of a little estate business and the like of that. The order is now peremptory, you have your duties, attend to these and attend to nothing else. I am not disposed to quarrel with that, as a public officer who gets a fair salary should make it his first and chief and only duty to attend to the requirements of the office during office hours. If my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) passes this law, I believe he will be holding out a statutory invitation to everybody to press for this favour.

Mr. DAVIN. Are there any Government inspectors of boilers or steamboats in the North-west Territories?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask the Minister what is the smallest salary given to any of these men?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no statutory salary. The chief inspectors, such as the man at St. John, get $1,000 a year each. The smaller ones, such as those in the North-west, do not get that or anything like it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). With regard to the officers receiving that amount of compensation, does the hon. Minister propose to apply this provision?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, certainly. The hon. gentleman perhaps did not hear my explanation. I am only seeking the authority by statute to do what we do every day, departmentally.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). It seems to me that there is a difference between a statutory enactment giving the Minister power to do that, and a departmental practice. Suppose the hon. Minister asked to be given authority to allow any officer in his employ to run for a public position. I do not suppose the House would grant that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, but there are some officials at outlying places who receive only small salaries, and it would be improper to require these men not to engage in any other business, as the salaries they receive are not enough to enable them to live.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think it is well enough to take authority to prohibit them from engaging in any other business, but I think that proviso, "except by the permission of the Minister," should be dropped out. If you cannot give these officers enough to keep them free from suspicion, the whole thing is a farce, and most unfair to the shipping community. All these officers get what are considered fair salaries, good enough at any rate to secure for the department the advice of a splendid lot of men. In British Columbia, on the Atlantic coast and in Ontario, the minimum salary is $1,000, running up to something like $1,800; so that there is no reason for doing in this case what is not done in any other branch of the service. If the Minister will drop this exception, the clause is a first-rate, healthy clause, simply embodying what I think has been for some time the rule in the department—to give these officers to understand that it is against discipline and against the rules of the service for them to sell their time to any one whatsoever, because that cannot be done without raising a suspicion against them.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if he has found in the administration of his department that the present system has worked badly. I understand that he bases his case on the fact that he is now doing what he seeks authority from the House to do. If these inspectors have acted without permission, under the law as it now stands, I would like to ask him if he has found any harm coming to the service from that action, and wishes to restrain it. If no harm has arisen, it seems to me hardly worth while to place any man, even one with a small salary, at the mercy of the Minister. I do not mean to say that he would deal with them harshly or unfairly, but it is unfair to put them in that position, unless it can be shown that the service is injured by the present state of things; but so far I have not heard that the hon. gentleman makes any complaint of that kind. I am sure my hon. friend can see the difference between these officers being in some cases permitted to act on their own motion, without the authority of the Minister, and, on the other hand, limiting their action by the will of the Minister.

Mr. FOSTER. There is just one additional remark I would like to make. Although I think the whole clause is bad, I think the last few words are simply abominable; that is, the permission which may be given to an inspector to hold any civil office whatever. Take the city of St. John, the city of Halifax, or any other city, what may very easily take place is this. The men who are most active and most successful in ward politics are the men who are looking for the rewards of office from the Government in power. It might easily occur that one of your ward politicians, who is successful as such, because he commands the votes of the ward, and is able to hold them, wants to get a party reward in the shape of an appointment as inspector of steamboats. I ask the hon. gentleman to put the question to himself, what would be the administration of the office in the hands of such a man? Would it be the best kind of administration? This man who has handled the majority of his ward, and who holds them by whatever arts he can command, who has to give favours as well as accept favours, when he comes to perform his duty, is at the mercy of the political element, and not always the best element of the ward. When he comes to conduct the inspection, he is a fair shot for all the influences that can be brought to bear on him in the spirit of: "Don't hurt our party." That is an extreme case, but it is a case that might occur. Although there might not be so much objection to such a man acting as valuator of a vessel in case of damage, this last paragraph which would admit of his holding office as inspector is bad and worse than bad, and I hope my hon. friend will leave that part out.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This is a just punishment upon me for my sins. I had the Bill at first all right, but my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton) asked me to amend it so as to qualify the latter part and give me this permission. I did so, and then my hon. friend turns round and joins the opposition, and says I should not do it. In the older parts of Canada, I would make the rule an arbitrary one that no inspector should hold any other office, but my officers tell me, and I know from my own knowledge that I shall have to appoint a number of inspectors in outlying parts of the Dominion—in the Yukon district and in different parts of British Columbia and the Northwest—at small salaries.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Why?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Because I cannot afford to give a salary of $1,000 to inspect these steamboats.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What would be the good of the inspection?

The PRIME MINISTER. It will be all right. They will only have to inspect two or three boats. I am merely asking to be allowed to appoint inspectors at outside places at small salaries, and permit them to engage in other business as well. I am not introducing any new practice. There is no law prohibiting these men from engaging in business now, and I am seeking to introduce a law that will prohibit them, unless they get special permission from the Minister. No Minister would think of granting such permission to inspectors in the older localities, because they get sufficient to devote their whole time to the business; but in an outlying section it is reasonable that the Minister should have discretion to allow them to do other work as well.

Mr. ELLIS. The objection appears to be this, that members representing these districts will be called on to ask the Minister to grant such permission in places where it is not granted now.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is the law now.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, but the permission does not appear in print now. It is an order of the Minister. There is a great sensitiveness among the people everywhere against the employment of these persons in other offices. I agree with the hon. Minister in the general principle he lays down, but whether it is wise for him to take the exception, I do not know. I do not think it is. I would prefer to see a cast-iron rule, so that no pressure could be brought on him by members or by anybody else.

Mr. FOSTER. I would not have so much objection, so long as my hon. friend is Minister, because he is so notably non-partisan; but I am afraid that, some day or other, the present Minister of Public Works may become Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and in the city of Montreal "business would be business." you know.

Mr. BRITTON. I want to put myself right. If the hon. gentlemen will look at subsection 2, they will see that I was of opinion that the permission did not apply to the last clause of that subsection, and so I thought it was an unfair discrimination to legislate against the officers of the Marine Department, when there was no such legislation against the officers of any other department. I know, as a fact, that some steamboat inspectors do other work to-day, and, I believe, have permission to do it, and as this legislation was to allow the Minister to give such permission, I thought it would be unfair discrimination to say that, in no case, should the inspector hold any civil office. But I would prefer to have it prohibitive, rather than permissive, because I can see the difficulties that have been suggested.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment, namely, to add after the word "or." in the last line of the section, the words "without such permission." The clause will then read:

And no inspector so appointed shall, except by permission of the Minister, be engaged in any business, or act as valuator of any damaged goods or cargo, or inspect or survey any machinery, steamboat, barge or vessel of any kind in any capacity, other than in his official capacity as steamboat inspector, or without such permission hold any civil office whatsoever.

Mr. FOSTER. The amendment is not necessary.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not think it was, but I consented to it so as to leave the question beyond doubt and meet the view of the hon. member for Kingston.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question is now on the section, as amended.

Mr. FOSTER. I move an amendment, to strike out the words in the 38th line, "except by permission of the Minister."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would rather drop the clause altogether. That would put the Minister in this awkward position, that he could not appoint a man to inspect a steamboat in any part of the Dominion at $100 salary, without requiring him to abstain from doing any other business. That is carrying the thing to extremes.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I agree with the hon. Minister. In the North-west Territories, where I live, we have five steamers on the river. No one would think it right to employ an inspector by the year and pay him a salary. A man can be employed at $100, and less, for the year, and I think the clause should stand as it is.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I suggest to the hon. Minister, that the discretion should be made to apply only in the cases of those having less than a certain salary. That would be quite in accord with what the hon. Minister says.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will carry that out in the sense the hon. gentleman mentions, but it would be foolish to fix an arbitrary salary, and make a hard and fast line. Allow me the discretion, and see how it works for a year.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. Minister brings forward the case of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Why not make an exception in favour of these sections of country?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman knows very well that there are some parts of British Columbia to which this must apply, just as much as the North-west Territories.

Mr. FOSTER. There will be some parts of Quebec, too.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The plan the hon. gentleman suggests, of engaging $100 men, has never been adopted in British Columbia. We have ample officers there to do the work, and when new officers are required, they are engaged at a good salary. A proper officer for that work cannot be got at $100 or anything like it. He has to be paid a regular salary to keep him independent, and the minimum is $1,000. Take the class of engineers; an engineer may be willing to go into the Government service at nearly that at which he can earn outside the Government. I do not believe in the plan of employing men at hap-hazard. When the Minister is confronted by some new development, he does what has always been done, he increases the regular staff, because the district requires it, and those appointed do not come on for this temporary purpose, but as regular officers, and are given permanent appointment at a fair salary. In outlying districts, if you had that class of men, who are not regular inspectors, you would have any amount of trouble, and the community would not have any satisfaction. It is not to be presumed that you can take a man out of the steamboat business, and yet have him administer the law with absolute impartiality, in connection with interests out of which he is, at the same time, earning a living himself. It is not to be presumed that you could take a man actually engaged in the steamboat business and get him to administer fairly and with absolute impartiality the law in connection with interests out of which he is getting a living. But the hon. gentleman will see that he must be partial, when he comes in collision with interests which give him his livelihood, I think the Minister would be wise if he made this rule obligatory. It is obligatory in practice. The cases the hon. Minister referred to were cases that involved abuses; and, when these were brought to the attention of the department, the officer was, very properly, told that if he wished to remain in the service, he had to attend to the business of the department, and no other person's business. I mentioned that the general law provided that any officer in the receipt of $900, or over, shall not be employed in outside work. I think, perhaps, I was wrong, so far as the statute is concerned, for I cannot find the section; but I still think it is the rule, that probably there is an Order in Council to that effect. The ex-Minister of Customs (Mr. Wallace) tells me that that is his recollection of the law, as it now stands. So this is really a departure from the existing law, if that is correct.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). In the section I come from, a man can be had, a competent man, to inspect all the steamers we have there for less than $100 a year. If you have a permanent official go there from Winnipeg, the travelling expenses alone will be twice that amount.

Amendment (Mr. Foster) negatived.

On section 14,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know why that stood over. The latter part of it is new, but I think everybody agreed with it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I thought the hon. Minister was to reconsider and redraft the section, dropping out some words in the last part.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Objection was raised; but I cannot see anything in the objection. This section provides:

Every inspector of steamboats shall demand of the owner or master of every steamboat which he inspects the production of the certificate of registry of such steamboat,—

That is the old law. Then it proceeds:

—and may require the production of the certificate of the master, mate or engineer, as the case may be, and such owner or master shall thereupon produce and exhibit the same to such inspector.

It is quite clear that the inspector ought to have power to require a production of these certificates.

Mr. BRITTON. I hope that this section does not mean that a floating elevator is to have a certificated master.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The law does not require that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the demand is made for the certificates, and they are not produced, there is a violation of the Act.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Besides, it seems to me a monstrous thing to require the master, or owner, to produce documents which they have not in their possession, which they are not allowed to have—as, for instance, the engineer's certificate. The engineer and mate keep their own certificates. But if this demand is made on the owner, or master, they are required to produce documents that are under the sole control of these other officers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The law does not require the owner of a steam dredge to have a certificated captain or a certificated mate, and there can be no obligation to produce certificates that the law does not require them to have. This relates only to such vessels as are required under the law to have certificated officers of the classes named.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, but this is an extraordinary provision, that, while the law does not require them to have it, if the inspector demands their production and they are not produced, then the person upon whom the demand is made violates the law.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It does not say so.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am arguing, that they do violate the law.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The law says, the inspector "may" require the production of these documents. I ask my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), as a lawyer, to say where he must, or whether he may, require it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am speaking as a lawyer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. May he require it in the case of a vessel that is not required to have certificated officers?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes. I say that as a lawyer. It is a most absurd provision. The Minister seems to think it would be absurd to have it, and I say it is there, and just as absurd as the Minister seems to think it would be. Suppose the inspector is dealing with the case of a ship in which inspection is required, but certificated officers are not required. The committee is asked to make this provision: First, that the inspectors shall demand the production of the said certificate of registry—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is the law now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, but see the reason of it. Every vessel has to have this certificate of registry under the law; and that being the case, it is reasonable to ask the production of it. But now the section goes on: "and may require the production of the certificates of the master, mate or engineer," and so on, and this although, as the Minister himself says, many of these vessels, though having certificates of registry, are not required to have certificated masters or certificated mates. But in another respect the language of this draft is most extraordinary. I do not think the Minister could have heard me, or he would not have asked me the question. After having made it necessary, on demand, to produce the certificate of the master, or mate or engineer, we are face to face with the fact that these documents belong to the individuals named, and they have the exclusive right to hold them. And if these certificates are not produced, who violates the law? Not the men themselves, who have the right to hold these documents, but the owner or master. Even if there is on a ship in whose case such is necessary, a certificated mate and a certificated engineer, the master and the owner have not the slightest control over the certificates of those officers—they belong to the individuals named. Here would be a violation of the section, whatever may be the consequence. We have already discussed that question of penalties. Hon. gentlemen who criticised the Bill said that the violation of the section would subject those violating it to the provisions of the general penalty clause. The hon. Minister said this was not the case, and so there was a difference of opinion. But it is quite clear that these few lines were hastily drafted; and the object of holding it over the other night, as I recollect it, was to give the hon. Minister an opportunity to look into it, and even if he proposes to add to the law as it was, to change the language which imposes upon the owner, or the master, the duty and responsibility of producing the mate's or the engineer's certificate.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) sees that there is a broad distinction between the first part of the section and the second part. The first imposes a peremptory duty upon the inspector—he "shall" demand the certificate of registry. The second part of the section says that he may demand a certificate of the master. Surely that applies to those steamboats that the law says shall have a master; it cannot apply by any legal construction or ingenuity to steamboats that are not required to have a master, and do not have a master, and there is no penalty in the section. Any hon. gentleman who has ever been engaged in the administration of this law knows that it is more necessary for the inspector to require a certificate of the master, and a certificate of the mate, and a certificate of the engineer, than it is to have a certificate of the registry itself. The certificate of the Inspector is posted up and can be seen by almost anybody. But the great evil which arises is that they will try to evade the law by putting uncertificated masters, and uncertificated mates and engineers on board these vessels, and it is to prohibit and prevent, so far as we can, that evasion of the law, that we are giving power to the inspector to ask that these officials shall produce their certificates. If the vessel is not required to have a captain, these officers are not required to produce their certificates.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not yet quite understand why you should require the owner or master to produce the certificates of the master, mate or engineer. Why does not the hon. gentleman, in the latter part of the clause, provide that the inspector "may" require the production of the certificates, and such master, mate or engineer shall thereupon produce the certificates to such inspector?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That would not do at all. That would enable them to evade the law, as they do now. I want to make it compulsory on the owner of the vessel to get his certificate from the inspector. If the inspector says to him, I want the certificate of your captain to satisfy me that you have a certificated captain, I want you to satisfy me that you have a certificated engineer, and I ask you to produce your certificate—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Suppose they cannot.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then he cannot get his certificate to run his steamer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then an inspector animated by ill-will can run him out of the business.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He gets his certificate the moment he has a certificated engineer. Do you want him to run his vessel without a certificated engineer? The whole object of the law is to prevent that being done.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You make the certificate of inspection dependent upon the act, not of the owner, but of the employee of the owner, who may be on bad terms with him.

Mr. MCGREGOR. If the owner and captain disagree, then the owner must get another captain.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Take the case of an engineer for instance, who has his own certificate, and who has control of it when this inspector comes. We are told that the inspectors are not everywhere, and when he comes the owner may not have full control of the engineer at the time. The hon. gentleman talks about getting another engineer, as if that was a very easy matter. It is a most difficult matter during the busy season. You are putting it in the power of these men who have a right to the documents and to the exclusive control of them, apart from the owner, to embarrass, if not to injure financially, the owners of the vessel. We are dealing with the inspection of the steamer, not with the conditions under which she is going to sea, so far as the certificates of the master, mate and engineer are concerned. In this Bill we are dealing with another subject altogether. In this respect I say this is an inconvenient and awkward clause, and tends to embarrass every steamboat owner in Canada. I say that worked out, and in the hands of any inspector, you are going to bring into collision these officers and the owners of steamboats in a manner that can only be attended with great injury and inconvenience to the owner.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is there any penalty under this Act, or any Act, where the owner employs persons who do not hold the necessary certificate?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes. If they sail a vessel with an uncertificated engineer, there is a penalty.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). And this is a provision to prevent the violation of that Act?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Would it not be better to provide, in case a certificate might be lost, that the owner or master should then satisfy the inspector that these persons have the necessary certificate.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, because if the certificate is lost, he can in five minutes get a telegram from the head office satisfying him whether the man has got it or not.

Mr. McNEILL. Is it not a fact that some of these officers are not obliged to have these certificates?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. McNEILL. Some of them, I believe, are not obliged to have any.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. State any such case.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Barges and steamers under certain colours.

Mr. McNEILL. Suppose a case where they are not obliged to have certificates and this inspector may call for them. I do not say he shall call for them, but he may call for them, and if he does, he may put the master of the vessel to any amount of inconvenience. It is all very well to say that the master may not be liable legally to any penalty, but all the same, he may have his vessel tied up and not be able to get to sea.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am afraid the inspector would have a bad time, if it came to the notice of the Minister.

Mr. CLANCY. I sympathize with the position taken by the Minister that all these men should have certificates; but I think the hon. gentleman should see that he is not proceeding in the safest way to obtain his end. If the position of one of these officers of the vessel depends solely upon his having a certificate, then why not make him produce that certificate himself rather than call upon the owner to do so. The Minister will see that he places the owner at the mercy of those men who may wish to exact greater salaries, or for any other reason. If he makes these men directly responsible, he will have attained the object he is now aiming at. I fully sympathize with the views he has stated, but I see where he shifts the burden upon a person who cannot carry it out rather than upon the person who should be demanded to produce the certificates. If he will compel these officers to produce the certificates when they are demanded, he may not imperil the rights of the owners or put him to inconvenience.

Section agreed to.

On section 32,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. member for Montreal asked that this section be allowed to stand until he had consulted some authorities in Montreal. No representation has, however, been made to me by the hon. gentleman. There is nothing in the old Act requiring wire tiller ropes.

Mr. FOSTER. Why is this provision put in the present Bill?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. On the recommendation of Mr. Adams and the unanimous report of the steamboat inspectors.

On section 58,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The changes in this Act, although not very serious, are very numerous, and I would suggest to the hon. Minister that, under the circumstances, it should come into force on the first of next year instead of on August 1st, as provided in the Bill. It would be inconvenient to introduce it in the middle of the season when the vessels are already equipped, and they should be allowed to run the balance of the year under the present law.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is a good deal of force in the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman. I therefore propose to insert January 1st, 1899, instead of August 1st, 1898.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. I call the attention of the committee to the schedules, and I contend that a steamboat should be able to obtain a certificate enabling it to sail all over the world, if the vessel is fit for the service.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The certificate entitles a steamboat to run, but only in certain waters. In Ontario a vessel might be fitted for running on a river and not on a lake.

Mr. POWELL. Owing to officialism in this regard I have myself suffered financial loss. In the particular case to which I refer, we wished the steamboat to run anywhere. A British vessel comes into our harbours and has that privilege, while our vessels perhaps are restricted to running between certain points on the St. Lawrence. The words should be sufficiently broad to give a roaming commission to a vessel to go all over the world, if it is fit, as an ocean-going vessel. Why should all the trade be placed in the hands of the English and Yankees, and Canadians not allowed to have roving commissions for their vessels. Owing to the formality observed by the late Deputy Minister of Marine the steamer in which I was interested was tied up during four weeks, and in order to get a certificate I had to come to Ottawa, and it was only by the action of the former Minister of Marine, who took the bull by the horns, and really acted against the law, that the vessel was given a roving commission.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I see no objection to allowing the section to stand as it is now, and at the same time giving the inspector alternative powers to give a certificate to a vessel to run in any of the waters of Canada.

Mr. POWELL. That is my objection.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We cannot give a certificate to go outside of Canada.

Mr. POWELL. Why should our steamboats be restricted from going all over the world?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We cannot legislate to go over the world.

Mr. POWELL. That is humbug. Take an English steamer; it has a certificate to go anywhere.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is perfect nonsense.

Mr. POWELL. I know what I am talking about.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not make any remark to the hon. member or about him. He proposes to give certificates to vessels to sail beyond the waters of Canada, and that is a proposition to which I do not accede.

Mr. POWELL. I say we have the right to give certificates to go anywhere, and in doing so we are not extending our parliamentary jurisdiction beyond the domain of Canada. All we are doing is simply placing our ship-owners on the same basis as the ship-owners of other countries. We give a ship-master a certificate to enable him to sail over the world, and if such certificate is good, why is not a certificate to the boat which he will sail good. German, English and French vessels sail everywhere, but Canadian steamboats have this restriction placed upon them, that they are confined to the interior waters of Canada.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What distinction would the hon. Minister draw in connection with this subject between the master obtaining a sea-going certificate and an unlimited certificate under the Inspection Act being given to a vessel?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not understand that the certificate is unlimited. I have always understood, and I never knew any legal gentleman here to take exception to this view, that our legislation applied within Canadian territorial jurisdiction. We do not profess to go outside of that, and all our legislation must be along those lines. I should not like to introduce a Bill in this Parliament giving an inspector power to give a certificate to run a steamer all over the world, because we have not authority to do it. If the English or American Governments choose to recognize our certificates, that is their business; if we choose to recognize the American certificate, that is our business. But our powers are limited by our territorial jurisdiction, and I do not think we could give certificates to go beyond that. This Parliament has no right to extend its jurisdiction all over the world. We simply give a certificate of character to the vessel that she is sufficient to sail wherever there is an ocean, but we do not give her a right to go into foreign ports. It is just exactly the same as when we certify that a master is possessed of sufficient knowledge to enable him to navigate around the globe. The certificate does not enable the steamboat to go anywhere, but it merely says the steamboat is qualified to go. It is a certificate of the ship's competency as to her seaworthiness in respect of machinery and hull.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). For example, a ship is built in Halifax and she is capable of going anywhere in the world. As to her capability she must get a certificate from some Government. I do not understand where she would get that certificate if not from the proper officers in this country, unless we are restricted in some way by Imperial legislation which I am not aware of. I can see, of course, that if there is Imperial legislation it might override our powers in that respect.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Which there is clearly.

Mr. POWELL. Oh, no; there is not.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) is speaking without knowledge.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If there is any such Imperial law I should like to know what it is. Outside of that we have just as much right to send a ship all over the world as the Government of Great Britain or the United States or France or any other country.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No one doubts our right to do that, but when a ship comes into British territorial waters she will be governed by the regulations of the British Board of Trade, and if she goes into American waters she will be governed by the regulations of the United States. We have no power to give her a certificate which would overrule these regulations. The objection of my hon. friend (Mr. Powell) was that the form of certificate which has been in force for the past twenty years was not broad enough, and he held that it should not be made more elastic and that it should not necessarily be confined to giving a certificate to a vessel to sail between any certain specified ports. I say now by this amendment, that I will accept that, and will give a certificate to a steamboat to run in any of the waters of Canada. I conceded, as I thought, all the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) asked, but he will not accept it. He wants us to give her a certificate to run all over the world, and I say we have not the power to do that.

Mr. BRITTON. It seems to me we are all agreed as to what is desirable in this matter.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You saw my amendment; it says: "Or in the alternative to run in any of the waters of Canada." There is no limitation in that at all.

Mr. BRITTON. If you turn to section 17 which provides for the granting of this certificate we will see how we stand, and we will see if there is not something further required in the certificate than merely to say: "in any of the waters of Canada."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I propose we shall give a certificate for all the waters we have power to give a certificate over, viz., within the limits of Canada.

Mr. BRITTON. The question is: If a vessel makes a voyage beyond the limits of Canada, how can she do so?

Mr. POWELL. Hear, hear; that is the question.

Mr. DAVIN. I can easily understand that some steamboats might not be fit for ocean voyages, and it might be well to restrict them; but surely in the case of a vessel capable of going around the world it would be a very improper thing to give a certificate that would limit her in any way. Why not have two forms of certificate, one for the seaworthiness of a boat that can go anywhere, and then let foreign parties raise the question as to whether or not she has the right to do so.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I did not hear from the Minister the character of the Imperial legislation which I understood him to refer to.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No steamboat can sail in British waters unless she conforms to the requirements and regulations of the British Board of Trade, and no certificate we can give her can alter that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is equally true of France and the United States, but there is no Imperial legislation, I presume, in the sense I refer to. For example, there is a company in the city of Halifax which operates steamers between Halifax and England. They must have a certificate for running these boats, but under this law they apparently cannot get it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They do not require a certificate on the ocean.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If we have ocean steamers owned by persons in Canada, why should we not control the certificates of these steamers?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have not altered the law in that regard.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It might be desirable to alter it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman can show any one case since this Act came into operation in which a steamboat was ever prevented travelling between this country and a foreign country, I would be willing to amend the Act to any extent we can. But this is all imaginative.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) has mentioned one case, and there may be others.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) mentioned a case in which the form of the certificate as it then existed, and as it would exist now unless amended by me, limited the inspector to certify between two specified ports. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) wanted a broader certificate. I propose to give the certificate as broad as we can within our territorial waters, and beyond that he can roam the sea wherever he likes.

Mr. POWELL. The case I mentioned was this. A steamboat was under charter to go to a port in the United States, and she was going to take a load from there to the West Indies. It was not known what particular port she was going to, and we wanted this roving commission which we could not get at once as we should have got, and which we did not get for three or four weeks after great delay and expense. I ask the Minister: How can the law giving a steamboat a certificate of character be unconstitutional when the law giving seamen a certificate of character is perfectly constitutional? Both are perfectly the same in principle and there is nothing extra territorial in one that is not in the other. This Parliament has the power, because so far as Canada is concerned, it is not necessary to have steamboat inspection at all; you could wipe the statute off our books and then the steamboats would go as they pleased. The Act is not an enabling but a restrictive Act. But we know that the Steamboat Inspection Act is not confined to the inland waters of Canada; and under that form, if a vessel wanted to go to England, and then to the Mediterranean, and then to South America, she would have to obtain from the inspector before she left Canada a certificate mentioning all these ports; and when she got to the other side she would not be able to take advantage of any good freight that offered for any other ports. I make this suggestion as a result of practical knowledge of shipping matters, and I regret that the Minister has not a practical knowledge of shipping matters. If he had a practical knowledge of shipping he would not suggest that the certificate of register should be posted on the ship. A sailor would laugh at a suggestion of that kind.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I referred to the certificate of inspection, which is always posted up.

Mr. POWELL. The shipping industry in the maritime provinces is a great industry. The sailing vessels are gradually being discarded, and steamboats taking their place; and if we are going to retain that industry, we must make such provisions as will promote instead of preventing the extension of that industry, by giving the inspectors power where necessary to grant these roving commissions.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. Minister has one of his expert officers in attendance, and I would like to be corrected if I am wrong; but my recollection is that the practice has been entirely different from what the hon. gentleman's argument would lead us to suppose. For instance, there are vessels going from Halifax to Boston, others from Yarmouth to Boston, and others from different ports in Nova Scotia to Newfoundland, and in the certificate of inspection granted to any of these vessels, the particular route she takes is mentioned. There is not much dispute on either side of the House as to where our jurisdiction begins and ends; but I do not see that there can be the slightest objection, technical or otherwise, to acting upon the suggestion of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), not to limit to certain prescribed waters the vessels which are competing with foreign vessels, or even with English vessels, all over the world.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend from Westmoreland thinks that because he lives in Westmoreland he has a great deal of practical knowledge of shipping. I think I probably know as much about shipping as he does, and have more money invested in it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think that is the way to answer the important question raised by my hon. friend from Westmoreland. I understood that his suggestion was met by the hon. Minister saying that there were difficulties in regard to jurisdiction, and that we must be careful not to go beyond our jurisdiction. But I think that we have a right to start our ship on her voyage properly certificated, just as much as England. Our certificates are recognized in the United States the same as American certificates are recognized in Canada, the fact being that we require American vessels coming to our ports to submit to a certain inspection, and to come up to a certain standard, and they do the same. We are just as able to start our ships fairly on ventures over the world as any other country; and we come down to this question, whether there is any objection to giving the certificates the scope suggested by the hon. member for Westmoreland; and I point out that in the certificates granted to the vessels sailing to Boston from Yarmouth or Halifax it is expressly stated that the vessel is a safe vessel to ply on that route.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If that is the case, there ought to be no difficulty at all, because you can grant such a certificate to-day; but it is not one that can have any legal effect outside of the waters of Canada. A certificate to run between Halifax and Boston can be granted by the form you have now. I do not propose to limit that or take it away. You ask me to give you greater powers within Canada. I say, all right, take the amplest power; give the vessel the right to ply in any of the waters of Canada. I thought that in doing that I had met every possible objection. I do not think we have power to legislate outside the waters of Canada. We all agree as to that. The penalties which we impose can only be recovered when the vessel does some act contrary to our legislation in the waters of Canada. If she does it outside of the waters of Canada, we have no right to punish her.

Mr. POWELL. I think British law would follow her.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. British law would follow her, of course—the Merchants' Shipping Act; and it is not shown how far we have to follow that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Let me put this case. A ship-owner of Nova Scotia purchases in the United States a steamer which is to be used as a tramp freight steamer. She does not run between any two points in particular, but secures freight all over the world. She has not been subjected to inspection by the Board of Trade of England, but was purchased in the United States. What I desire the hon. gentleman to do is to take the power, if he has not got it now, to license that steamship to carry freight anywhere in the world, because she is not designed to run on any particular route. I think the hon. gentleman would be perfectly right in taking that power. I am trying to extend his power.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I should not think that was necessary.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It may be. A good many ship-building firms in Nova Scotia at present are going into the building of steamships as freight carriers, and they may require a license of this kind. That business is very likely to increase, and it is in all seriousness I make the suggestion that the schedule or any other portion of the Act should be so extended as to deal with these steamers. If the hon. gentleman does not deal with this suggestion now, I venture to suggest that he should take it into consideration in order to deal with it at this session or some future session.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. Minister of Marine has come to take the ground I stated in the first place. My point was that under the form of licenses issued by the inspector, a freight vessel is tied to a particular route. That is all right enough, so long as her owners intend to keep her on that route, so long as she carries freight between a particular point in Nova Scotia, for instance, and another in the United States, but only a few steamers are liners, the great bulk are not liners at all, but are known as "tramps." These tramps would require, wherever they freight anew, a new certificate for the particular voyage. Say a Nova Scotia tramp or a New Brunswick tramp—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is the case of a New Brunswick tramp.

Mr. POWELL. Say a New Brunswick tramp reaches the other side. Let us suppose she is freighted to Bordeaux, and at Bordeaux she gets freight back to the United States. Unless she has this general roaming commission as a seaworthy vessel, her owners have to bring her back to Canada and have a special examination and inspection, in order to get a certificate to go from Bordeaux to a point in the United States. That is all right enough in the case of liners, but not in the case of tramps, who are not on any specific route but take freight wherever they can get it. You are going to destroy the shipping industry so far as that class of vessel is concerned. All that is required is to carry out the principle which the hon. Minister of Marine has now recognized, and which does not extend our territorial jurisdiction but simply means giving a certificate of the competency and sea-worthiness of a vessel. The inspectors certify that she is seaworthy so far as any ocean is concerned, and not merely as respects any particular route. I appeal to the Minister in this matter, because I am interested, and I would ask him, if he is not satisfied to adopt it now, to consider my suggestion, because I have had the case practically arise and we were delayed four or five weeks before we could get a certificate. Finally I induced the then Minister of Marine (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) to give me the certificate and grant that roving commission, so far as that steamboat was concerned, but in so doing he went beyond the terms of the statute. This tramp freight business is a very large business. And why should we prevent our shipping men from engaging in it? While English and German steamboats all have roving certificates, it is criminally stupid for Parliament not to give ours an equal privilege.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not want to restrict their engaging in it.

Mr. POWELL. That form of certificate will.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They have never been restrained before. I am part owner of a steamer which has been running for years back in all parts of the world.

Mr. POWELL. Where does she register?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Here.

Mr. POWELL. If the hon. gentleman is right in respect of the steamer he has mentioned, he is giving away his whole case. She has been running contrary to the terms of the statute. If that is the case, why not let all ship-owners violate the law?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where did she get that roaming certificate?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. She did not get any other certificate than the one the law requires.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported as amended.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT.

Bill (No. 71) further to amend the Weights and Measures Act was read the second time, the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 6,

Mr. MONK. I desire to move an amendment, or add a proviso to this section. It is to meet the difficulty which was mentioned the other day in connection with the sale of potatoes in the city of Montreal. As the House is aware, there is a by-law of the corporation to the effect that when potatoes are offered for sale by the bag in the city, the bag must contain ninety pounds of potatoes. This is extremely detrimental to the farmers who do business on the markets of the city, and involves injustice to them. A farmer violating this by-law is liable to have his bags of potatoes confiscated. They are not in a position, before they leave their homes to weigh the potatoes; and when they arrive in the city, as everybody knows who lives there, the marketplaces are so crowded that it is difficult for them to move about, and so they cannot weigh their bags. As a rule, they use for the conveyance of their potatoes old flour bags; and it is difficult to place in these bags, as I am informed, ninety pounds of potatoes. The other day we were invited by the Minister of Inland Revenue to follow some interesting experiments that were made in his department with regard to weighing potatoes; and, as a result, I have arrived at the conclusion that it would be proper to define in this statute, if the hon. Minister thinks it could be done, the weight of a bag of potatoes. I question very much whether the corporation of the city of Montreal can, without proceeding ultra vires, define what shall be the weight of a bag of potatoes as they have assumed to do. The by-law does not state that potatoes shall be offered for sale in the city of Montreal only in bags equivalent to a bushel and a half standard weight, but it says, if I mistake not, that the weight of a bag of potatoes shall be ninety pounds. I think that wording of the by-law is unconstitutional, or at least open to grave doubt as to its constitutionality. The other day a farmer from the county of my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Fortin)—and that hon. member I think feels as I do upon this subject—saw his bags of potatoes confiscated. I have read the report of the judgment rendered by the Recorder of the city of Montreal in which he states that this by-law is open to the reproach of being full of confusion in its wording. I believe that the aldermen of the city of Montreal would be only too pleased to see this grievance remedied by the Parliament of the Dominion. Therefore I desire to propose an amendment. I limit it to the province of Quebec, in case the amendment should not be acceptable to the other provinces. I move:

That the section be amended by adding these words: "Provided that in the province of Quebec, whenever potatoes are offered for sale not by the measure or by the weight, but by the bag, said bag must contain at least one bushel and one-sixth of potatoes according to the standard weight decided by this Act."

That would be seventy pounds. I do not wish to take up further time. This has been spoken of as a potato debate, but I can assure hon. members that this grievance is a very serious one for our farmers. And I believe, as I have said, that the city of Montreal would be only too pleased to be relieved of the responsibility by this short amendment. I trust the hon. Minister will allow the amendment to go through.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) a couple of days ago introduced a Bill very much to the same purpose as the amendment now submitted, except that in the Bill the weight of a bag of potatoes was fixed at eighty pounds. The difference between eighty pounds and ninety pounds which is now the measure fixed by the by-law of the city of Montreal is not so great, but to change it to seventy pounds would make a very considerable difference. I believe it would be better to leave it as proposed by so many of the hon. gentlemen who took part in the debate when the Bill was discussed the other day. If the committee decides to make that amendment, it would be well to come as near as possible to the present practice and leave it at eighty pounds instead of seventy pounds, which I think is too little. I fear this would not be in conformity with the purpose of the law of weights and measures. It is evident that the tendency in that law is to uniformity and simplification, in the direction of measuring everything by weight instead of by measure.

One can readily understand how difficult it is suddenly to change the habits of people, practiced for so many years. There are so many things in our present law of weights and measures that will have to be remodelled before we can consider it satisfactory in every respect, and before the principle of uniformity is secured, that for my part I would not stand in the way of an amendment limiting it to the province of Quebec—if it is found that it will be a real relief to the farmers. My hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Fortin) read the other day an article from the Montreal "Witness," which forcibly brought out the inconvenience and loss suffered by the farmers from a rigid execution of the Montreal by-law, the officials going in some cases so far as to confiscate whole loads of potatoes. Under the circumstances, I will not oppose the amendment, although I do not admit that it is a step in the right direction. But in order to avoid this inconvenience from which the farmers suffer so much in Montreal, and because there are so many other things that will have to be remodelled in order to reach that unity of weight until we are ready to carry that out. I will not object to the amendment.

Mr. SPROULE. Would it not be much better for the corporation of the city of Montreal to change their by-law and let us have uniformity all over? Because people readily move from one province to another, and when they find one law applying to one province and another to another, they become confused. There is no reason why the corporation of Montreal should not change their by-law, if the farmers trading in that city are suffering so much hardship from it. It seems to me entirely out of place for us to destroy uniformity in our law here simply for the purpose of meeting the requirements of one city. Winnipeg might put up another request, Toronto another, and Vancouver another, and it would be absurd for us to attempt to satisfy each one of them.

Mr. MONK. The hon. gentleman is not aware how difficult it is for us to get the city of Montreal to do any act of wisdom. When we have endeavoured to get the city of Montreal to change one of their by-laws in this respect, the answer we have received is: Get your law in respect to weights and measures amended, and we will be only too glad. Now, there is no other city where such a by-law as this exists, and therefore the farmers in that locality are the only ones who suffer. There is one disposition in this by-law which I will quote to the committee, referred to by His Honour the Recorder of Montreal, in rendering judgment in this case referred to a moment ago:

In rendering judgment this morning, the Recorder stated that it had been proved that the potatoes had been offered for sale by the bag, and that the bag did not weigh the amount required by the city by-laws. Under sections 5, 22 and 23 of by-law 223 the farmers had the right of selling goods by weight or by measure, but section 23 also provided that if the produce was offered for sale in bags, each bag had to weigh 90 pounds. The by-law, added the Recorder, was in this respect according to Federal law, which placed the weight of a bushel at 60 pounds. If potatoes were sold by the measure in bags, each bag had to contain a bushel and a half, or 90 pounds. The defendant had failed to comply with the terms of the by-law, but as there was a certain amount of confusion in it, he (the Recorder) would suspend sentence in the present case.

Now, there is only the city of Montreal in the whole Dominion which has such a by-law, and that is made to suit a certain class of purchasers who, as the committee will readily imagine, do not want to take the trouble to conform to the ordinary rule, 'caveat emptor,' to take the ordinary precautions when buying. There is only the city of Montreal which has seen fit to pass this by-law, the constitutionality of which is very questionable. I think this is a case where, for the reasons stated by the Minister of Inland Revenue, we ought to get at least temporary relief, and I hope the Minister will see fit to allow that amendment to be added to the Bill. I believe that eighty pounds would be satisfactory—I mentioned seventy, but from what fell from the lips of the hon. member for Laval

(Mr. Fortin) and the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier), I understand that eighty pounds would place the farmer out of the way of these continuous vexations and annoyances caused by the city of Montreal.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I put this question to my hon. friend: Would the passing of this amendment relieve the people of Montreal, on whose behalf he complains? It is very questionable whether that by-law is constitutional. But if you pass this amendment, you will have two laws in the city of Montreal instead of one; you will have the by-law of the city, and you will have this amendment which will permit a man to sell a bag of potatoes containing seventy pounds, while the city by-law prohibits him from selling a bag of potatoes containing less than ninety pounds. If a farmer goes on to the market with a bag of potatoes containing less than ninety pounds, his potatoes will be seized by the officials of Montreal. We shall only add to the confusion until it has been determined whether the by-law of the city of Montreal is legal and constitutional. If the city is acting within its rights, then they have a right to pass that by-law, and they will seize a bag of potatoes which contains only seventy pounds or less than ninety. It seems to me questionable whether this amendment will afford any remedy. I think it will simply add to the confusion.

Mr. MONK. Since the right hon. member asks my opinion, I think the remedy will prove effective. It seems to me the subject of weights and measures is one exclusively assigned to the jurisdiction of this Parliament, and I think the city of Montreal has gone beyond its rights in defining what shall be the weight of a bag of potatoes. I think an amendment in this Bill, stating that in the province of Quebec the weight of a bag of potatoes need not exceed eighty pounds, will enable the farmer to set at defiance this disposition contained in the by-law of Montreal. I believe the sentiment of the council—I am not a member of the council—but I believe that some intimation has been given here that the council would be prepared to abide by legislation of that kind. Under these circumstances, and for the reasons I have just stated, I reiterate my request that for the present, at least, this amendment should be added to the Bill.

Mr. WILSON. I do not see why we should have this applied to the province of Quebec alone. If we are making a standard for a bag of potatoes, why should it not be applied to the whole Dominion? If a farmer sells a bag of potatoes weighing only eighty pounds, he will only be paid for eighty pounds. I think legislation of this kind is out of place. We should make one law for the whole country instead of making a different law for each province.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not see how you can regulate by law the standard weight of a bag of potatoes. Every one who is accustomed to handling potatoes knows very well that when they are taken off the ground in the fall they will weigh much more than they do when taken out of a cellar in the summer or spring; so that to make a standard by weight, in my opinion, is impossible, that is, to do it equitably. For instance, potatoes that are in a pit all winter will weigh much more than potatoes that are in a cellar. Now, to compel a man that has kept his potatoes well in the cellar to give ninety pounds weight, while another man who has kept them in a pit where they will weigh much more, is compelled to give only the same weight, is hardly fair to the man who has kept his potatoes in the cellar. If we are regulating the standard by measure, I could understand that. Potatoes will measure less in the spring than in the fall, and they will not weigh the same. If we are to regulate the standard of potatoes at all, I think to do it equitably so that all parties will be treated the same, you had better do it by measure instead of by weight.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It seems to me that you cannot separate the two principles of weight and measure. The law declares now that a bushel of potatoes shall weigh sixty pounds, and I think you are right in that. The reason why this legislation is desired is that the farmers find that they cannot put in the ordinary sacks a bushel and a half, which, according to the standard should weigh ninety pounds. Perhaps the standard of the measured bushel, 60 pounds, is too high; then it should be made lower. If the standard is sixty pounds to the bushel, and a bushel and a half would weigh 90 pounds, an argument that a bag ordinarily called a two-bushel oat sack, for example, would not contain a bushel and a half, is not a very strong argument, because, from practical knowledge, I think I can prove that a flour bag or oat sack that contains 2 bushels of measured oats will contain a bushel and a half of potatoes. Therefore, if you declare to-day, as I think it is proposed to do, that a bag of potatoes, so considered to be a bushel and a half, need only weigh 80 pounds, you are going to put the farmers to more inconvenience, unless the House agrees to ignore the standard weight of the bushel and sell by the bag. At present, when farmers prepare bags of potatoes for the market, I suppose, not one-tenth of them weigh the potatoes; they put a bushel and a half into a bag, and they know that that bushel and a half by measure will equal in weight 90 pounds. If you reduce the bag which has always been accepted as containing a bushel and a half, you must reduce the standard fixing 60 pounds to the bushel. You must establish that fact first, and if you do so, you have a perfect right to reduce the bushel to 45 or 50 pounds, and if you reduce it to 50 pounds, then, consistently, you must reduce the weight of the bag to 75 pounds, for you must maintain the relations between the weight of the bag and the measure of the bushel. With respect to the other point discussed, that a bushel of potatoes in the fall is not the same weight as a bushel in the spring, because the bushel, when taken from the ground fresh, has a certain amount of moisture in the potatoes which evaporates before the spring, when kept in the cellar. In my opinion it is true that the moisture evaporates from the potatoes, but I am not sure there is any difference in a bushel of potatoes. I think it is admitted there is less moisture in the potatoes in the spring than when harvested in the fall, but if that moisture has escaped, the potatoes have shrunk in size, you must put more potatoes in the bushel. The hon. Minister shakes his head; but the fact remains that the bushel of potatoes in the fall contains more moisture than the same bushel if kept by itself until the spring; but if you take the same bushel which weighs 60 pounds in the fall, it will not give that weight in the spring—but you will have to fill up the bushel. So there is not, after all, so much difference between potatoes in the fall and in the spring. The principal point, however, I wish to make is, that, first, in order to show the necessity of the Bill, the fact must be established that 60 pounds per bushel is not the proper weight. If so, then reduce the standard of the bushel and reduce the bags sold on the market in proportion.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon. gentleman's contention is, that a two-bushel bag will hold a bushel and a half of potatoes, it will hold a bushel and a half when they are taken up in the fall. But if you fill the bag out of the cellar, where they have been lying for five or six months, you cannot put a bushel and a half in the bag. It is impossible to establish a standard bushel of potatoes that will deal equitably at all seasons. We can establish a standard by measure, but not by weight. My hon. friend says potatoes will shrink. I was rather surprised at the statement, as I think he should know what a potato is, for he is from the Green Isle, as I am, where potatoes form the staple article of food. But the hon. gentleman never saw a shrunken potato that was a sound one. Potatoes do not shrink in size, but they shrink in weight; and they will fill the same measure six months afterwards as they did when taken out of the ground. If the House wishes to establish a standard for potatoes that will do justice to buyer and seller at all seasons of the year, we must do it by measure, for we cannot do it by weight.

Mr. HAGGART. The important question at issue is, where does the jurisdiction lie? If the municipality of Montreal can pass a by-law declaring that a bag of potatoes shall not weigh less than 90 pounds, I do not see what is the use of this Parliament passing legislation fixing the weight of a bushel of potatoes. The simple question is, whether the municipality possesses that power or not. If it can pass a by-law declaring that no potatoes shall be sold unless the bag contains 90 pounds, what effect legislation here could have, if, for example, we declare that a bag shall not weigh less than 80 pounds, I do not understand.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not agree with my hon. friend, the hon. member for Lanark, that the law of this Parliament would have no effect in such a case. It would have the effect of making valid a penalty imposed on a man for offering for sale a bag of potatoes of less weight than 90 pounds. It would have effect as regards the collection of the penalty, for the law of this Parliament could not be overridden by a by-law passed by the city of Montreal. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has contended that the shrinkage in the weight of potatoes would interfere with the standard of weight. That argument may also be used as to hay and grain of all kinds, but I cannot see the force of it in this case. If it is contended that the bags available to the farmers for sending potatoes to market are generally the bags used for a half barrel of meal and flour, why not change the bushel and a half to the bag and make the standard 75 pounds, instead of 90 pounds?

Mr. McNEILL. The argument that we cannot pass this law because potatoes shrink in weight will not hold. Wheat will shrink in weight and oats will shrink in weight very much indeed, and if you cannot deal with this matter because potatoes will shrink in weight, neither can you deal with it in regard to grain. My hon. friend (Mr. Costigan) has put the thing on a logical basis, namely, that you have to adhere to your principle of measurement, and you have to deal with a standard of measure, and if the standard of measure be by the bushel you have to assign what the weight of the bushel shall be. Then, when you define the weight of the bushel, you will find what the weight of a bushel and a half will be. This Parliament has always assumed that it had the right to deal with this matter, and I think it has. My hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) thinks the city of Montreal would have the right through a by-law to override the law we lay down here. I fail to follow that argument, for it seems to me that if we legislate here that a bushel of potatoes shall weigh a certain amount, that law will hold in spite of any by-law the city of Montreal may pass.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) has misunderstood me. I said that this House has the power to fix the weight of the bushel, but I also said that it is purely a municipal regulation in the city of Montreal as to what quantity ought to be sold there, and the city may say that no potatoes shall be sold in Montreal unless in bags containing ninety pounds. Can any regulation of this Parliament fixing the weight of the measure of a bushel affect that power which the city of Montreal has?

Mr. McNEILL. Any law passed by this House declaring that a bag of potatoes shall weigh a certain amount, cannot be set aside by the city of Montreal, and any man bringing into the city a bag of potatoes weighing that amount has a right to sell that bag. Any attempt of the municipal authorities of Montreal to override the decision of this House in that respect would be ultra vires.

Mr. TALBOT. From what I have heard of this discussion to-day, as well as the discussion which took place a few days ago, I think it is altogether a mistake for this House to give to a bag of potatoes a standard weight of any kind. If to-day it is provided that a bag of potatoes shall weigh ninety pounds, it is because it is supposed to contain a bushel and a half. I contend that the error is in the bushel measure itself, which does not weigh sixty pounds. I have handled a good many bushels of potatoes, both in selling and buying, and unless the potatoes were particularly chosen and selected, and placed in the measure in such a way that there would be no waste space, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred I did not find a bushel of potatoes to weigh over 56 pounds. It is my opinion that if the bushel was altered to 56 pounds, it would meet any city by-law to that effect. If a by-law of the city of Montreal requires a farmer to put 90 pounds of potatoes in his bag, it is because it is supposed to contain a bushel and a half. I maintain that any ordinary grain bag holding two bushels of grain will hold a bushel and a half of potatoes, but at the same time it will not hold 90 pounds, for the very good reason that a bushel does not weigh 60 pounds. It is because of that that the Montreal by-law says that a bag shall weigh 90 pounds. Even if Parliament here passes a law stipulating that a bag of potatoes shall weigh only 80 pounds, there is no security that the farmer will not come to the market with a bag containing less weight. He may choose the smallest bags in his possession and put only 65 pounds or 70 pounds or 75 pounds in them. I hold that our experience in the past shows that if the weight of the bushel is brought down from 60 pounds to 56 pounds, it will meet the requirements of the farmers, and be satisfactory in commercial transactions.

Mr. MONK. This matter is of so much importance to the farmers in the neighbourhood of Montreal that I must insist a little. The right hon. the Premier has called my attention to the constitutional question. Now what are the facts? I have not here the charter of the city of Montreal, but there is no doubt that the Quebec legislature, in that charter has authorized the city of Montreal to make regulations to govern its own markets. What did the city of Montreal do? Acting upon that authorization, it passed a by-law which states that potatoes may be offered for sale by the measure, or by the weight, and then it goes on to decree—according to me—contrary to the constitution—that bags of potatoes brought into the city of Montreal for sale will have to contain 90 pounds. If the city of Montreal can decree that, the city of Montreal can decree equally well that bags of wheat shall contain 50 pounds, 60 pounds or 70 pounds; in other words, the city of Montreal could act entirely at variance with subsection 2, and entirely at variance with what is now about to be passed into law by the Dominion Parliament. Under these circumstances it seems to me that the municipal authorities of Montreal have gone beyond the limits of the power given them by the local legislature, and it is for us to come to the relief of these people and to enact directly contrary legislation, and say, that a bag of potatoes shall not contain more than such a quantity. I believe we have jurisdiction. I believe the city of Montreal has no jurisdiction, and if we have jurisdiction it is not only our right but our duty to remedy this grievance of the farmers.

The PRIME MINISTER. Therefore, if the city of Montreal has no jurisdiction the parties sued under the by-law should not pay the fine. †

Mr. MONK. They should not, but if the farmer defends himself he will have to undertake lawsuits with the city of Montreal which a farmer is not prepared to do with such a wealthy corporation. It is our right to come to the relief of these farmers here.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 24) to amend the charter of the Union Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 43) respecting the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto.—(Mr. Osler.)

Bill (No. 22) respecting the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Oliver.)

ONTARIO AND RAINY RIVER RAILWAY.

On the Order,

House in committee on Bill (No. 32) an Act respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company.—(Mr. Tisdale).

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I understood that by an arrangement of the promoters of this Bill with the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), it was to stand over until Monday.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood that the hon. member for East York had arranged with the hon. Minister of Railways that this Bill should stand till Monday, because he had notice of an amendment to it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr Blair). As far as we could affect the disposition of the Bill, that is a correct statement of the understanding.

Order allowed to stand.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 71) to amend the Weights and Measures Act.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). I think it would be desirable not to spend the whole night among the potatoes. I have been thinking of the remarks that have been made by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, and the question really presents more difficulties than one would at first think. In Ontario people sell by weight, and I think they are perfectly right, for that is the only way to reach a fair conclusion.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to say to the hon. Minister that in my section of country potatoes are generally sold by the bag.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. What is the weight of the bag?

Mr. WILSON. According to law it is 90 pounds. In my town the people are not so particular; but in Kingston, I have heard of people being fined for selling potatoes by the bag that weighed less than 90 pounds. I presume that they have a by-law there the same as that in Montreal.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There is really a difficulty in establishing what the weight of a bushel of potatoes is. The law as it now stands provides that 60 pounds shall be the weight of a bushel. There is no doubt that when a potato comes out of the ground damp and covered with more or less soil, it may weigh 60 pounds to the bushel; but only two days ago

Mr. MONK.

I took the opportunity, with some members of this House, of making experiments with two different kinds of potatoes. After the most careful measuring, and heaping the measure, as is usually done, the result was that the Early Rose weighed 55½ pounds, and the Dominion Pride, which appears to be the standard potato in Ottawa, weighed 56½ pounds. In both of these cases the potatoes were pretty far from the standard of 60 pounds. Some hon. members propose to change the weight of a bushel of potatoes; but that might still give rise to great inconvenience, as I am told that in many cases in Ontario, especially in those counties which have daily communication with our neighbours on the other side of the line, potatoes are always sold at 60 pounds to the bushel. Under these circumstances, I think the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) might perhaps be adopted as an amendment, instead of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). His amendment is to this effect, that if potatoes are sold or offered for sale by the bag, each bag shall contain at least 80 pounds. That does not do away with the principle that everything ought to be weighed, which is the most preferable of dealing with that commodity. We have a precedent in the matter of salt. The law provides that a barrel of salt shall contain 280 pounds. I do not see why we should not follow that precedent, and provide that each bag of potatoes shall contain at least 80 pounds. That would relieve a large proportion of the farmers of the province of Quebec from the difficulty under which they labour. We have, however, first to dispose of the amendment offered by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), who wants to fix the weight of the bag at 70 pounds, which is, I think, less than what it ought to be.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) As this is a matter that concerns the people of my province very much, I am much pleased to see that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue has no idea of changing the number of pounds that constitute a bushel of potatoes. I think that so long as he leaves the bushel at 60 pounds, as it is in every section of the country, it makes very little difference to any particular portion what other changes he makes. As long as 60 pounds is the standard bushel, it is a matter of very little difference whether he makes a bag of potatoes any other capacity. In our province, we utilize a measure containing two and a half bushels, at 60 pounds to the bushel. That is found useful to the trade in handling potatoes, much more than would be the purchase or sale by bags. In fact we could not begin to handle our large stocks of potatoes in bags. Farmers bring them in from the fields, as they dig them out in the fall of the year, and you will find a dozen or so of ships or schooners, from 1,500 to 4,000 or 5,000 bushels capacity, loading at the same time. Hundreds of carts come in with the potatoes in bulk, and they are measured out very readily in those cylindrical measures, each containing two and half bushels. I would strongly recommend the hon. Minister not to change the number of pounds to the bushel.

Mr. HEYD. It strikes me that there has not been sufficient reason advanced for making a change of such great importance as is involved in this Bill. Customs that have obtained for the last forty years cannot be changed so readily as proposed through the medium of that Bill. There must be other reasons than those assigned before we ought to change a custom that extends from the east to the west, and has existed for this long period of time. One of the principal reasons why a bag contains 90 pounds is that it holds a bushel and a half, and a bushel by law is 60 pounds. It may be asked: Why not sell at 70 or 80 pounds, and call that a bag? That may be true, but in that case, better make it 100 pounds at once. The moment you establish 80 pounds as the weight of a bag, you establish a new trade regulation, and you will disturb our trade with the United States. We, in Ontario, are in the habit of buying by the bag, and each bag must weigh 90 pounds or a bushel and a half. Take a bag of 70 pounds, and a person without much education will not be able to go readily through the mental process of calculation to find out what he is paying by the bushel. The only reason assigned for the change is that the people in Montreal can buy cheap bags and these bags will not hold 90 pounds. For that reason they want the weight of the bag reduced to 70 pounds, but that is no reason. In Ontario we use the ordinary two-bushel bag, and that holds a bushel and a half. The hon. Minister said that he has weighed potatoes which only gave 50 to 54 pounds to the bushel, but he must remember that these potatoes had been stored away for eight months, and during that long period the process of evaporation was going on, the juices in them were evaporating and the potatoes constantly getting less in weight. But for a month or so after they were dug out of ordinary soil, the bushel will weigh 60 pounds, and a bag containing a bushel and a half will weigh 90 pounds. It is much easier to figure out the cost at this rate, and if a change is made it will interfere with the trade regulations of the country. The argument advanced that because the bags in Montreal are small is no reason for doing away with customs that have established and entrenched themselves in the trade during the experience of forty years.

Mr. MONK. I do not know what the hon. member means by customs of forty years extending from ocean to ocean. In the counties around Montreal, which are claiming a remedy, the custom is quite different, and existed more than forty years, and until this by-law was passed by the city of Montreal, we never heard that it was necessary that a bag of potatoes, in order to be offered for sale legally, should weigh 90 pounds.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I hope my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier understands that my intention is not to interfere in any way with the weight of the bushel, though I really think that 60 pounds is more than the average weight of a bushel, especially if you keep them a few months.

I do not propose to interfere with the weight of the bushel; in fact, when this Bill was presented, there was no idea that this question would arise. But the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) introduced the subject, and gave such good arguments to show why, if possible, relief should be given to the very considerable population about Montreal, that I promised, as was my duty, to give him an opportunity to bring this question before the committee.

Mr. MONK. If the hon. Minister will pardon me, I may remind him that, when the hon. member for Laval introduced this Bill, the hon. Minister, if I understood him, promised to provide a remedy for this grievance in his own Bill. Otherwise, I should not have proposed this amendment.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That is what we are doing now. The hon. member for Laval asked if we would bring the matter before the House, and I promised him I would; and I am bringing it before the House, and in the same line as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) desires, except that I ask him to change one word in his amendment, to change it to 80 pounds, instead of 70 pounds—that is, to make it a bushel and a quarter.

Mr. MONK. I believe that would meet the difficulty.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Does the hon. member (Mr. Monk) propose, with the consent of the committee, to insert "eighty pounds" instead of "seventy pounds" in his amendment?

Mr. MONK. I would be satisfied with that.

Mr. SEMPLE. I can see no good reason why the change should be made. Sixty pounds is the recognized weight of a bushel of potatoes. I think that would be about the weight of potatoes that are middling fresh, with the measure heaped up with as many potatoes as would lie on it. It has been the custom of the country for a very long time to have 60 pounds the weight of a bushel of potatoes. Of course, if a person sells 70 pounds, or 80 pounds, as a bag of potatoes, instead of 90 pounds, he will not expect so much for it. A bag of 90 pounds is a bushel and a half, which is easily calculated, and, taking the ordinary two-bushel grain bag, I think it holds a bushel and a half of potatoes very nicely. We have been accustomed to selling in this way in Ontario, and so it makes little difference whether we sell by the bushel or by the bag. It might appear, at first sight, as though there would be a little advantage to the seller in having 70 or 80 pounds fixed as the weight of a bag of potatoes. But, when it becomes known, there will be a corresponding reduction in price. Supposing an individual in Montreal went to purchase a load of potatoes in the bag, and was told: You can take these potatoes at so much per bag, just as they are, without weight, would that stand law or not? That is a question for the lawyers.

Mr. MONK. But the moment a bag of potatoes is brought into Montreal for sale, it is liable to be confiscated, unless it weighs 90 pounds. Farmers have no way of weighing them before they leave home, and the moment they enter the gates they are liable to confiscation.

Mr. CLARKE. Have petitions been received from chambers of commerce and boards of trade, or from people who deal largely in potatoes, for this legislation?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is a question for farmers, and I am not aware that there have been any petitions from the boards of trade.

Mr. CLARKE. Has there been request from the Ontario farmers for this legislation?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The Ontario farmers sell by weight, and I acknowledge that they are perfectly right in so doing. But in the province of Quebec it appears customary to sell by the bag, and, as that is an optional matter, I do not see that relations of buyer and seller are affected. We do not change the weight of the bushel, and I do not see why we should not recognize a bushel and a quarter, as well as a bushel and a half. We do not infringe at all on the constitutional habits of the people in any part of the Dominion. We do not say, that a bag must be just 80 pounds, and not more, but that where potatoes are offered for sale by the bag, each bag must contain "at least" 80 pounds. Wherever it is customary to have the weight 80 pounds, it is allowed to remain at 80 pounds, but this will not interfere with those who count a bushel and a half as a bag. Hon. members must have heard the complaints by so many hon. members who have spoken, of the difficulties under which farmers in the great district of Montreal are placed by having to deliver 90 pounds for a bag of potatoes. The proposed weight may not be a very logical one, but there is something greater than logic—facts. We must meet the facts, and, if possible, grant relief to these people, particularly when we can do it without affecting others.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think we should remember that Montreal, though a large city, does not constitute the whole Dominion, and that it would be more proper to bring Montreal into conformity with the Dominion as a whole than to change the rest of the Dominion to bring it into conformity with Montreal. If this amendment were passed, it might easily cause difficulties between buyer and seller by changing the old standard of 60 pounds for a bushel of potatoes. Suppose a Montreal buyer were going through the province of Ontario to buy potatoes for shipment to Montreal, which would not be a very unlikely thing, he might show quotations in the Montreal papers, that potatoes are sold at a certain price per bag. The farmer might easily not be aware that a bag of potatoes in Montreal was 80 pounds, instead of 90 pounds, and so might sell for less than he was fairly entitled to. These established customs should not be interfered with, if it can fairly be avoided. Farmers are not lawyers, and have not access to the statutes at all times. I think it would be better to leave this matter as it is.

Mr. WALLACE. I am sorry to say, I cannot agree with the proposal made by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue. I am quite sure that he will take note of what the members for Ontario and other provinces have said, and that he will not proceed too hastily in this matter. Here is a custom that has prevailed throughout the country, with, perhaps, one slight exception, ever since long before confederation; and the Minister of Inland Revenue proposed to alter it without a petition from a single board of trade, without a petition, as I understand it, from a single farmers' institute or a gathering of farmers in this country. Am I not right in that?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. Not a single delegation in this Dominion has asked that this change be made. It will upset the whole basis of the trade, as the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) and the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Heyd) have pointed out. The Minister tells us that in the city of Montreal they have established there that the bags of potatoes shall weigh 90 pounds, but previous to that they were using a smaller bag. The business men of Montreal, recognizing the fact that Montreal is becoming a great centre for the potato trade, and in order to have business done properly, their bag of potatoes should be the same as in all the other large towns in this Dominion.

The Minister of Inland Revenue tells us that this is a convenient measure, because it is a bushel and a quarter. In that he has made a mistake. It is a bushel and one-third, for which there is no measure to correspond. To fill a bag of potatoes, you take a half bushel measure and fill it with three half bushels to make the bag. But how are you going to do it with this bushel and one-third?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I made a mistake when I said a bushel and a quarter.

Mr. WALLACE. Every bushel of wheat does not weigh sixty pounds. Sometimes a bushel will weigh sixty-two or sixty-three pounds; it has weighed as high as sixty-five. The weight this year is not so heavy, it has been from fifty-seven to sixty pounds. The whole argument of the Minister of Inland Revenue was in favour of changing the bushel of potatoes and not the bag.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not want to change the weight. I want to say that wherever potatoes are sold by the bag, they can be sold for no less than eighty pounds. But I did not even mention the word bushel.

Mr. WALLACE. That is what I said, that the whole statement of facts made by the hon. gentleman was in favour of changing the bushel, but he says he does not propose to change the weight of the bushel at all. But his argument was in favour of changing the bushel, because he said he went down to-day and measured some half bushels of potatoes, one weighed fifty pounds, the Early Rose, and the other fifty-six pounds, the White potatoes. The hon. gentleman tells us that he did not just make it level, but that he put it a little over level. But that is not the way to do it. The way is to heap it up. I venture to say he had not the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Semple) with him when he made that measurement, or the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), or any other farmer in this House, who know that the rule is to heap it up and pile on as many as the half bushel will hold. If he had done that, I venture to say he would have had sixty full pounds to the bushel. But then he says this bag cannot weigh less than eighty pounds, he says it may be more, it may be ninety or 100. Why, that would demoralize the whole business of the country. If you fix anything, you must fix a definite amount. Custom, which is stronger than any law, has fixed a bushel and a half at ninety pounds almost universally throughout this Dominion. The city of Montreal have passed a by-law requiring the weight to be ninety pounds. They recognize the justice of that measure, and the necessity of adopting business methods. The board of trade or whatever authority was instrumental in fixing that standard, did not do it without reason. They recognized the fact that this was the rule. When potatoes are sold by measurement, men experienced in measuring potatoes know that they can be put ninety pounds into every two-bushel grain bag. That is the custom from the Atlantic to the Pacific to-day, almost without exception. Yet the Minister of Inland Revenue proposes, without a petition from a board of trade, or from a commercial body, or from a farmers' organization anywhere in this country, to upset this whole arrangement. It gives them no warning. If this is passed into law the farmer goes to bed to-night, and to-morrow morning he finds that his business has been disarranged. It will lead to confusion without a particle of benefit to anybody. The statement was made that they have got a small bag in Montreal that won't hold a bushel and a half. I do not know where they get the bags. If they get the bags made specially for potatoes, they can get it made two inches longer or wider, and it will hold a bushel and a half without costing half a cent more. It has been stated in this House over and over again that a two-bushel grain bag, a bag that will hold two bushels of oats, will hold a bushel and a half of potatoes weighing ninety pounds. That has been proved by experience, and every farmer, every dealer, knows that to be a fact. These men say they can buy a smaller bag, but a bag that is universally used for all other farming purposes will hold ninety pounds. Then why confine it to eighty pounds? That is the objectionable feature. He does not say it shall be eighty pounds, but it must be not less than eighty pounds. In the United States the rule is ninety pounds, our own rule is ninety pounds. You break up all the business arrangements, you disturb trade, you disturb the farmers' convenience, as I contend, for no purpose. Therefore, I would ask the Minister of Inland Revenue to proceed no further, but to let this stand so as to obtain the opinion of the people, of the farmers' institutes, and other organizations. Let them examine this proposal, and leave this over until later in the session, or until next session. No interest will suffer. If the farmers want it they will make their wishes known, but I am sure he will find a string of protests against this proposal. I am anxious to have a measure that will meet with the approval of the business community and of the farming community, and that can only be done by leaving this matter as it is. An hon. member from Prince Edward Island said they did not care so long as it did not touch the bushel. But he also stated that they do not use a bag there at all, therefore, it is of no interest to them. They put their potatoes in barrels holding two and a half bushels, so it is of no interest to them what quantity the bag may contain. But in Ontario, and in all the other provinces where the rule is to sell by the bag of ninety pounds, this would be a great inconvenience. The present custom suits every purpose of the farmers and of the dealers; therefore, I strongly urge upon the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue to let this stand for the present.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I see no objection to letting this stand, the more so as the hon. member who introduced a Bill that I promised to incorporate in this Bill of mine, and which I never saw until it was placed in my hands. He would like to have been here to discuss this matter, as he has some ideas on this subject, as well as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). I see no objection to letting this amendment stand until the hon. member who introduced that Bill and some others who have taken an interest in it, are present. But as for the measurement of the potatoes that we made as an experiment, I must say that I had with me such practical and experienced farmers as the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary), and several other members who were kind enough to examine the measure, and I was glad to see them undertake the task. I think they did it very fairly.

Mr. McMILLAN. I was present and saw these potatoes measured and weighed. They were potatoes that had been for some time out of the ground, or out of a damp cellar, because they were very dry, and when potatoes get dry they get a little soft. I am under the impression myself that a bushel of potatoes taken fresh from out of the ground will weigh sixty pounds. It will depend a good deal upon the quality of the soil. If you take a bushel of potatoes from a black, mucky land, they will not weigh as much as if taken from heavy clay land. But I am under the impression that if you take a bushel of potatoes from good, heavy clay, or clay loam, it will weigh sixty pounds. I am also under the impression that the weight of the bushel should remain at that, for more reasons than one. In western Ontario we have been selling large quantities of potatoes for some years to the Americans. Their bushel is sixty pounds, and this proposal would disarrange the trade between the two countries. Living alongside of our neighbours, our weights and measures should correspond with theirs just as nearly as we can possibly make them. If the bushel was changed, it would disarrange the whole trade of the country, it would disarrange the trade of the west so far as selling in bags is concerned. However, my experience is that our bags up west will all hold more than a bushel and a half. The farmers use grain bags. I went to the market in Ottawa the other day and took two bags and had them weighed. These two bags weighed 95 and 96 pounds respectively. No change should be made either in the weight of the bag or in the bushel. It would prove a very disturbing Act all over the country, and as has been suggested by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), we should not change the whole trade for the sake of the city of Montreal; let that city's arrangements come into conformity with those of the rest of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There is not a province that has not trade with the United States, and we should not disarrange not only our local trade but trade with our neighbours; and no change should be made unless urgency could be shown, and no urgency had been shown in the present case.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the weight of a bushel of onions. The old law provided that they must weigh 60 pounds. This Bill reduces the weight to 50 pounds. It should be reduced to 45 pounds, but the average weight does not come up to that standard. I saw bushels of choice onions recently that weighed 46 pounds. I hope the hon. Minister will take this matter into consideration and will reduce the standard still further. The bushel by weight and measure should be as nearly as possible, the same.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to intimate to the hon. Minister that when this clause comes up again, I shall move an amendment providing that 70 pounds be the standard for a bushel of lime, which is not fixed at the present time. I trust that in the meantime the hon. gentleman will make inquiries and satisfy himself that this is a proper weight for a bushel of lime.

Mr. McMILLAN. There is another change which I shall propose when the measure is again considered, and it is a matter of great importance as it relates to the sale of eggs. The proper system in selling eggs is by weight. I went on the street the other day and got seven fair sized eggs and had them put in the scales, and they weighed one pound less one ounce. I got a dozen on the market and they weighed a pound and a half and one ounce. I afterwards got a dozen small eggs, which look like chicken's eggs, and put them in the scale and the dozen weighed 1½ pounds. In England eggs are largely sold by weight and a dozen should weigh 1½ pounds. I would not make the rule so strict that a farmer's wife or daughter could not come into town and sell eggs by the dozen, if the parties agreed; but we should have a standard, particularly at the present time when eggs are classified as Nos. 1, 2 and 3, and all No. 1 should go over 1½ pounds to the dozen, and No. 2 nearly 1½ pounds. We can thus improve our eggs and raise their character in the English market. I wrote to one of the large egg dealers on this subject to ascertain what change should be made, and when the Bill comes up again I shall move an amendment that eggs be sold by the weight and that a standard be fixed establishing that a dozen eggs shall weigh $1\frac{1}{2}$ pounds.

Section allowed to stand.

On section 3,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This section is to abolish section No. 44 of the Weights and Measures Act, which makes it incumbent on the inspector to notify beforehand the people whose weights and scales he is going to inspect, of the date when he will make the inspection. We think it was a great mistake to notify them beforehand, and it would be much better for the inspector to call when he is least expected.

On section 4,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This section is to provide for the more frequent inspection of scales that have to bear very heavy weights, such as scales at collieries, elevators and railway scales. It is easy to understand that an interval of two years is too long a period to elapse between such inspections. It is also proposed to ask the owners of these large establishments to provide proper shelter for the weights required to be taken to make the inspection. The importance of this amendment becomes clear when it is considered that 80 weights of 50 pounds each are required to test a 2-ton scale, and great expense is incurred for the carriage of the weights. Spring balances and scales are admitted into use in the United States and England, but their use has been hitherto refused in this country. The advantages of the employment of these scales are great, and we have decided to recommend their inspection on conditions which will afford security to the public. It can readily be understood that spring scales, in which the springs are hidden, are much less reliable than the ordinary beam scales that we can easily watch. It is provided that before recommending the spring scale it shall be subject to a most severe trial by the officers of the department. We believe this inspection will be in the interests of the retail dealers.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am very glad to know that the Minister is making provision for a more frequent inspection of scales in connection with the development of the coal industry. Some weeks ago I presented a number of petitions from the miners in my constituency, asking for this change in the law, and I would like to know a little more with regard to the intention of the Minister as to the departmental regulations under which he proposes to hold this more frequent inspection of scales. I would like to suggest to the Minister, as I have already done when this Bill was introduced, that he should give the use of these weights to the miners themselves. As I understand, it is not the intention of the Minister to provide a salaried official at the mines for this inspection, and in that case I would like the Minister to give the miners power to select a man to represent them at any time there was a dispute between them and the mine owners as to the condition of the scales, and which representative of the workmen would act in concert with the mine manager in testing the scales. This would be a great convenience. In case of a difference of opinion between the mine owner and the miners, I would like the Minister to provide authority for the nearest paid official to go to the mines and adjudicate. That is a privilege which I think the miners should have. It would be impossible for them to get the satisfaction they desire if they are obliged to appeal to an official who may be located at a distance from them, or who in a large district like Cape Breton may be a hundred miles away attending to his duties when this difference arises. It is therefore important, more convenient and inexpensive to have a local official to attend to the inspection for the time being. The hon. Minister may not be aware of the custom of weighing in coal mines. The coal as it is produced by the coal cutters is weighed in order to arrive at the amount of pay to which the miner is entitled, and a further weighing takes place when the coal is being shipped at the wharf into the vessel. The weight on which the miner is paid is the weight that the measure contains under ground or at the mouth of the pit, and consequently the miner is specially interested in having proper weights at the time the product of his day's work is being weighed. Under the present system the scales are only tested once in two years, and we all know they are liable to get out of order in a much shorter time than that.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Of course regulations will have to be made to carry out the provisions of this Bill. It will be seen at once that when we provide each mine and each elevator with the number of weights required to make the test, we can economize a considerable expenditure by not having to carry these heavy weights around from one place to another. As I explained the other day, I hope we will find it to be the case that the mine owner on the one hand and the miners on the other, can agree at any time they think necessary to have the scales tested. I expect that the miners can choose amongst themselves a workman to represent them on the one hand, while the mine owner will be represented on the other. In case they should not agree our inspector of weights will be called upon to decide between the two. I hope that by this arrangement you will foster a good feeling between the mine owners and the workmen by creating mutual confidence between them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
Hear, hear.

Section agreed to.

On section 5,

Mr. WALLACE. When this Bill was up on a previous occasion, the member for East York (Mr. Maclean), the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin), as well as myself, called the attention of the Minister to the necessity for having milk cans measured and having their capacity stamped upon them. The Minister promised that he would consider that matter carefully and that he would see if something could not be done in this direction when the Bill came again before the House.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We will come to that question later on. This clause refers specially to the owners of second-hand stores who have in their possession scales which are absolutely worthless, and which no amount of adjustment can render perfect. It is only for the purpose of reaching that class of men that we have introduced this clause. Up to this time these scales have been used in junk shops, and they are so completely worthless that they can never be adjusted so as to be accurate. This section is not connected in any way with the question to which my hon. friend has referred.

On section 6,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This is to meet an abuse that happens very often. When a scale is inspected, it is guaranteed for a certain weight, and in order to give satisfaction, it must not be used for a greater weight than the weight for which it has been inspected and proved. But persons who buy scales guaranteed for two tons, will sometimes try to load them with three or four tons, when they will cease to weigh accurately. This clause is to meet cases of that kind.

Mr. CLANCY. I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister to a device which is now used for the purpose of weighing grain, that it, to determine the test weight of grain. It is in a sense a false measure, for the reason that it substitutes an ounce for a pound in the scale.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Will my hon. friend excuse me if I interrupt him for one moment. If my hon. friend will allow this clause and the next clause to pass, what he refers to will more properly come up afterwards.

Mr. CLANCY. I will of course be glad to accede to the request of the hon. gentleman, and I will send over for his consideration a subsection which I propose to move later on.

Mr. WALLACE. I think this is an arbitrary section, and that it will fail of its purpose. I quite recognize the evil of using a scale to weigh three tons when it is only guaranteed to weigh two tons. That should be made a punishable offence in some way; but suppose a dealer has a scale to weigh two tons with four weights of one thousand pounds each, and he loses one, and then gets another, and afterwards finds the one that was lost, the mere fact of his having the extra weight in his possession would subject him to a penalty of $10.

Sir HENRI JOLY DE LOTBINIERE.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Taking the same example which the hon. gentleman has cited, it is not likely that a man would lose a weight so heavy. By this clause we only want to reach him in case he abuses the strength allowed to his scale by adding that additional weight, thereby straining the scale and making it untrue. We do not mean to prevent his substituting one weight for another, provided both have the same weight.

Mr. WALLACE. Take the scales used all over the country for weighing wagon loads of various kinds. A man comes along with a load, and drives on to the scale. Neither the man with the scale nor the man with the load knows how much it weighs, but it happens to go one hundred pounds or two hundred pounds over the guaranteed capacity of the scale. If the owner of the scale should use an additional weight to ascertain the weight of the load, he is liable to a penalty of $10. That is, I think, a little too arbitrary.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Our object is to protect the public by trying to keep as long as possible those scales in a satisfactory condition, so as to render justice to all parties.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman will recognize the fact that the owner of scales is not anxious to destroy them and render them useless by overloading them, any more than a man who owns a wagon is anxious to break it down by putting on too heavy a load. People can be trusted to the instinct of self-preservation in that regard. But a man may unwittingly put a load on his scales which will be a few pounds or 100 pounds more than their capacity, and in that case he is liable to a penalty of $10.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Men are apt to overload—even the owner of a buggy or a wagon is apt to overload it. Men in every walk of life overtax their strength for the purpose of gain. If the scales were not inspected and inspectors not answerable to anybody, we might say: If you want to break your scales, do so. But without breaking the scale, they can weaken it by overloading, and it will be impossible for that scale to continue true as long as it should.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before leaving this Bill, I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Minister to a matter that came up in discussing a Bill of a similar character a year or two ago. I refer to the change that is usually made by the inspector for the conveyance of the standards required to inspect the scales. There is a good deal of opposition in the country at times to this inspection, but I am quite sure that much of the friction would be removed if this charge were done away with. It seems to me a rather unfair charge in many instances.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This can be regulated by Order in Council. I have received communications on the subject, and all I can do for the present is to promise to investigate it. I may say that we are very strict about the charges made for the transportation of those weights of scales, and that the officer who makes the charge is obliged to account for every cent. I shall look into the matter.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. WALLACE. Might I ask the hon. Minister if he proposes to do anything with regard to the matter I brought to his attention the other day—the advisability of having milk cans measured and their capacity stamped upon them?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I shall be very glad to confer with my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) before this matter comes up for further consideration. I have the "Hansard" of 1893, in which a long discussion is reported on the subject of milk cans and of dealers substituting cans of nine and nine and a half gallons for cans containing eight gallons. I have read the discussion with attention, but I have not found that any practical remedy is proposed. I shall carefully consider what should be done, and, in the meantime, if my hon. friend can suggest anything, I shall receive it very gratefully.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD.

On the order for Bill (No. 72) to amend the Adulteration Act,

Mr. FOSTER. I notice that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue has several other Bills on the Order paper. As the former Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Wood) is absent, and as he is very anxious to be here when this Bill is discussed, I would ask the hon. Minister, if it would not inconvenience him, to let this stand over.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). Very well.

GAS INSPECTION.

Bill (No. 73) to amend the Gas Inspection Act was read the second time and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). I desire to explain the purport of these amendments. The classification and grading of the gas companies has heretofore been based on the number of purchasers or customers. It is desired to base it on the number of metres, because in many cases customers have more than one metre, especially in the case of incorporated companies. The classification is necessary in order to determine the proportionate fee each company should contribute in respect of the periodical test for purity and candle power of gas supplied. The fee for the inspection is the same to all companies, of whatever grade they may be.

Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

PETROLEUM INSPECTION.

Bill (No. 74) to amend the Petroleum Inspection Act was read the second time and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister, not in connection with this Bill alone, whether he has considered the advisability of adopting a different style of drafting. For instance, in the Marine and Fisheries Bills and some others, instead of this style of changing one word in a certain line and substituting another, which makes it necessary to refer back to the existing statutes, the whole section to be amended is repealed and re-enacted as amended. This method is more convenient to all concerned.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I must admit that it is more convenient and we have followed that method in the Bill to amend the Adulteration Act. But the meaning in the case before us is so clear—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Of course, I am not objecting to the Bill.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Quite so. I admit that it is more desirable generally to draft Bills in the form the hon. gentleman suggests. But I can explain in a few words the meaning of this amendment. The law as it now stands provides penalties for keeping or offering for sale for use in Canada petroleum in unmarked packages. The committee will understand that the only security we have against the use of dangerous oil, oils that would explode at a lower degree than 85, which is the degree fixed upon, is that under the law it must be taken out of a barrel which bears the mark of inspection. Otherwise, one can understand that there would be danger, especially in some parts of the country where there is so much smuggling from the other side.

If the department's officers cannot prove that it is actually kept or offered for sale, we cannot make out a case, although satisfied that the petroleum has been smuggled. By adding the words "or has in his possession," the simple fact of finding it in unmarked packages or not in conformity with the law, makes our case clear. It is difficult to show what the intention of the person is, when you speak of offering it for sale, it leaves the question open. As in the case of illicit distillation, where we punish the person in whose possession the illicit still is found, we are not obliged to go into the motives which have prompted him to place himself in possession of that still.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENTS.

Bill (No. 75) further to amend the Inland Revenue Act, was read the second time, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This is a new clause, and it is simply a definition of the words "beer," "wash" or "wort," as applied to distilleries. The definition of these terms is necessary in the interests of the revenue, and in order that there may be no doubt as to what constitutes beer, wash, or wort.

Mr. FOSTER. What will the whole clause be now, as amended? We want to get the sense of it.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is merely to make clear the exact meaning of beer, wash and wort. The expression "beer, wash or wort," as applied to distilleries, means and includes all liquor, fermented or unfermented, made in whole or in part from grain, malt or any saccharine matter.

On section 2,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This is merely to remove the inconvenience of having to handle barrels of 25 gallons, which is the minimum content now required by law. It is merely to facilitate transactions by making the package smaller and reducing it to 10 gallons.

On section 3,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We have found that the sense of the law, the spirit of the law, is perfectly clear, but the way in which it is drawn up is defective. We have met with several failures in suits instituted in enforcement of the law, and have found that it is defective in several points, which we now try to amend by meeting the legal objections that have been raised. The purpose is to secure an easier enforcement of the law. In subsection "e." my hon. friend will see in the first line, "has in his possession in any place, any such still." We had a suit dismissed because the law, as it now stands, stated that any person who was found in possession of an illicit still, on his premises or on his land—I do not remember the exact words—was punishable. But the case was dismissed because the illicit still was found on a neighbour's land; and, therefore, we add the words, "in any place." I have inserted the words "suffers to be concealed" in section 30. When we find an illicit still in a man's cellar and seek to secure his punishment, he pleads that the liquor was put there by some one whom he did not know, or that a man rented the cellar from him. By this section we endeavour to compel him to answer the charge and bring the guilty party to justice.

Sir HENRI JOLY DE LOTBINIERE.

Section 4 is framed to meet the change in the tariff when the extra charge of 10 cents was placed on all tobacco. Dealers in tobacco who sell packages containing one-tenth of a pound put a stamp on it representing the value of the duty. When the extra tax was imposed they asked the Government to be allowed to change the packages and denominations, because for convenience they have been in the habit of selling by multiples of 5 cents, and hon. members can easily understand how awkward it would be to sell packages formerly 10 cents now for 11 cents.

Mr. FOSTER. What has been done in the meantime?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We have been obliged to strike new stamps in the meantime to meet the requirements.

Mr. FOSTER. But you have no authority.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I am afraid to a certain degree we have been guilty of using a few of those stamps without having been authorized to do so. We were obliged, of course, to meet the requirements of the trade. The trade was taken by surprise by the changes in the tariff made last session; in fact, the manufacturers imported several millions of pounds of tobacco with the idea that the increase in the tariff would not be applied as it was applied. Of course they appealed to the department for relief, and we felt it to be our duty as much as possible to relieve them. We thought we were not doing wrong under the circumstances under which the change was made in changing the denominations of the stamps in order to prevent great difficulty.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman may not have been doing anything very wrong, but he has clearly been doing something illegal. The hon. gentleman is coming to Parliament now a year after the fair, asking it to pass law, and naively confessing a violation of the existing law. The hon. gentleman is a year behind the Finance Minister, and he should have been able to have kept pace with that hon. gentleman. I am afraid the condition of things cannot be condoned by Parliament.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. All I can do is to throw myself on the mercy of the court, and I hope the hon. gentleman will never be able to reproach me with anything of a more serious character.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman acts so gracefully that I withdraw my protest. He never seems to have thought of the poor chewers and smokers, but he only wanted to place the monopolists, so to speak, in a good position.

Bill reported, and read the third time, and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the order for second reading of Bill (No. 76) to provide for the abolition of the Civil Service Superannuation Act and for the retirement of members of the civil service.—(Mr. Mulock.)

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the right hon. Prime Minister will not go on with this Bill at this hour of the night. It is a very important measure.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We have not done very much to-day. We have not made any great advancement so far, and I do not see any sign of prorogation.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think the House is ready really; I am serious in that. If there is any other Bill not involving so serious a matter; the Franchise Act, for instance.

The PRIME MINISTER. I understand that my hon. friends opposite are not ready to take the Franchise Act either. I agree that the House shall adjourn now but it must be understood that we shall sit late next week.

Mr. FOSTER. We must not sit too late; it is bad for our health.

VACANCY IN WEST PRINCE, (P.E.I.).

Mr. FOSTER. My right hon. friend might take up a moment or two before the House adjourns, by informing us whether the returning office for Prince, P.E.I., has yet been appointed.

The PRIME MINISTER. That can be answered in a moment; he is not yet appointed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You only have up to 12 o'clock to-night to do it.

The PRIME MINISTER. How is that?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You said yesterday you would do it to-morrow.

The PRIME MINISTER. Oh, I think not; to-morrow, or afterwards.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10 o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 21st March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ALASKA AND NORTH-WEST RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BELCOURT moved:

That the petition of James A. Gillies and others, presented this day, praying to be permitted to present their petition praying for the incorporation of a company under the name of the Alaska and North-west Railway Company, notwithstanding the expiry of the time for receiving petitions for private Bills, be read and received forthwith, and be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Mr. BERGERON. Mr. Speaker, I think this is very irregular. I do not want to make any objection, of course; but as this is the second motion of this kind we have had to-day, I desire to say that it is evident we are establishing a very bad precedent in allowing companies to come before us in this way, notwithstanding that the rules of the House are known or ought to be known.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It is not a precedent; it is a practice.

Mr. BERGERON. It is a very bad practice; it is an abuse.

PRIVILEGE—THE QUESTION OF MR. BRUNEAU'S RESIGNATION.

Mr. MARCOTTE moved the following resolution:—

François Arthur Marcotte, member of the House of Commons for the county of Champlain, having stated in his place that he was credibly informed and believed he could establish that Arthur Aimé Bruneau, Esquire, then member for the electoral district of Richelieu, in this House, did during the present session of Parliament declare, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, his intention to resign his seat.

That Joseph Godbout, Esquire, the member for the electoral district of Beauce, and John Mc-Millan, Esquire, the member for the electoral district of the South Riding of Huron, were witnesses to the said declaration.

That the said declaration is, he believed he could establish, the document referred to in the following statement of His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed to the House of Commons on 14th March, 1898 :—

“Before calling the Orders of the Day, I would like to mention to the House a matter which is of the nature of privilege, and which I see has been connected by the press with the seat of an hon. member—the member for Richelieu. It is stated that I have received his resignation. If I had received his resignation I should have issued my warrant for a new election before now. The only occasion when I have had any communication from or with Mr. Bruneau this session was on Friday morning. I had just come into my office when Mr. Bruneau came in. He asked me if I had received a letter from him. I told him I had not. He said he had called to get a letter back which he had written to me. I told him to wait and I would look among my mail, for I had not yet opened any letters. I turned the unopened letters over in his presence, and he pointed to one with his frank upon it. I asked him if it was his writing on the address and frank. He assured me it was. He told me nothing of its contents and I asked him nothing, but handed him the letter unopened and he took it away with him. So far as I know, it had come to my office through the post office, for I had not seen it before. I mention this to avoid any mistake as to facts as far as I am concerned.”

That this declaration was tendered within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 5 of chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and yet the said Arthur Aimé Bruneau, Esquire, continues to sit in the House of Commons.

Resolved, That this statement, including the statement of the Honourable the Speaker, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to inquire into the facts, to examine into the legal questions arising in the case, and to search for parliamentary precedents applicable thereto, and to report to this House the result of their inquiry and whether any and if so what further proceedings should be taken by this House in the premises.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. May I ask if my name may be substituted for that of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) as seconder of this motion?

Mr. SPEAKER. I understood that Mr. Wallace seconded the motion.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) is particularly anxious for the honour of having his name associated with this motion, I see no objection why it should be denied him. The object of this motion is to refer this statement which has been made by the hon. gentleman from Champlain (Mr. Marcotte), and the declaration he has made to-day with that which he made previously, to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to inquire into the facts, to examine into the legal questions arising in the case, to search for parliamentary precedents applicable thereto, and to report to this House the result of their inquiry, and whether any and if so what further proceedings should be taken by this House in the premises. The only object of an inquiry by the Committee of Privileges and Elections into the law, and into the facts as disclosed by the declaration of the hon. gentleman, could be to determine whether, upon the facts so disclosed, the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) has resigned his seat, or whether he is still a member of this House. Before proceeding any further, it may be advisable, at this early moment, to look at the law in the matter, and to see in what form a member of the House can resign his seat. The law is found in chapter 13 Consolidated Statutes of Canada, section 5, and subsection 2. Section 5 begins by reciting that a member of the House can resign his seat from his place in the House. Then subsection 2 points out another mode by which a member may resign his seat :

Such member may address and cause to be delivered to the Speaker a declaration of his intention to resign his seat, made in writing under his hand and seal before two witnesses, which declaration may be so made and delivered either during a session of Parliament, or in the interval between two sessions ; and the Speaker shall, upon receiving such declaration, forthwith address his warrant, under his hand and seal, to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, for the issue of a writ for the election of a new member in the place of the member so resigning, and a writ shall issue accordingly ; and an entry of the declaration so delivered to the Speaker shall be thereafter made in the Journals of the House.

The question to which I first desire to call the attention of the House, is whether the facts as here set forth, supposing them to be all absolutely true and substantiated by evidence, would constitute a resignation of his seat by the hon. member for Richelieu ; or, in other words, whether he has not only signified his intention of resigning his seat, but also has caused his intention, so declared, to be delivered to the Speaker of the House. If these two facts clearly appear from the declaration made here, there may be cause for a further inquiry. But if it be apparent from the facts here declared that the hon. gentleman has not conformed to the two conditions which are here set out, that is to say, if he has not both declared his intention of resigning his seat, and caused his intentions so declared to be delivered to Mr. Speaker, I submit under such condition of things no case for inquiry exists. It is manifest by the declaration here made that if the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) had any intention at any time of resigning his seat, he did not cause his intention, so declared, to be delivered to Mr. Speaker. Let me make this clear, I again call the attention of the House to the facts in the declaration by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Marcotte). He said :

That he was credibly informed and believed he could establish that Arthur Aimé Bruneau, Esquire, then member for the electoral district of Richelieu in this House, did during the present session of Parliament declare, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, his intention to resign his seat.

That Joseph Godbout, Esquire, the member for the electoral district of Beauce, and John McMillan, Esquire, the member for the electoral district of the South Riding of Huron, were witnesses to the said declaration.

That the said declaration is, he believed he could establish, the document referred to in the following statement of His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed to the House of Commons on 14th March, 1898 :—

"Before calling the Orders of the Day, I would like to mention to the House a matter which is of the nature of privilege, and which I see has been connected by the press with the seat of an hon. member—the member for Richelieu. It is stated that I have received his resignation. If I had received his resignation I should have issued my warrant for a new election before now. The only occasion when I have had any communication from or with Mr. Bruneau this session was on Friday morning. I had just come into my office when Mr. Bruneau came in. He asked me if I had received a letter from him. I told him I had not. He said he had called to get a letter back which he had written to me. I told him to wait and I would look among my mail, for I had not opened any letters. I turned the unopened letters over in his presence, and he pointed to the one with his frank upon it. I asked him if it was his writing upon the address and frank. He assured me it was. He told me nothing of its contents and I asked him nothing, but handed him the letter unopened and he took it away with him. So far as I know it had come to my office through the post office, for I had not seen it before. I mention this to avoid any mistake as to facts as far as I am concerned."

In the declaration of the hon. gentleman both facts are alleged. I assume everything therein contained is literally true without requiring investigation, and I assume these facts are as much proved as they would be before a committee. Four allegations are made : first, that the hon. member for Richelieu wrote his resignation as a member of this House ; second, that he so wrote it before two members of this House, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Godbout) and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) ; third, that after he wrote his intention to resign his seat and it was witnessed by two members of Parliament, he put the document in an envelope and mailed it to Mr. Speaker ; four, that the member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) called at the office of Mr. Speaker and asked that his letter be returned and it was returned to him without having been opened. Under such circumstances this fact would be proved, that Mr. Bruneau had not the intention of resigning his seat, that having declared his intention according to statute he had the document witnessed by two of his colleagues, that he caused the letter then to be mailed to Mr. Speaker, but he himself prevented its delivery to Mr. Speaker. So that the last requirement of the law, which would make the resignation complete, did not take place, namely, his written intention of resigning his seat was never delivered to Mr. Speaker according to the term of the law. The law says a member may resign :

By addressing and delivering to the Speaker a declaration of his intention made under his hand and seal before two witnesses, either during the session or in the interval between two sessions.

The facts shows that whatever may have been the intention of Mr. Bruneau he changed his mind subsequently and caused the letter which he had written expressing his intention of resigning not to be delivered to Mr. Speaker, but actually prevented it being delivered to Mr. Speaker. Under such circumstances the declaration of the hon. member never came into the hands of Mr. Speaker. It may be said, and no doubt it will be said, that Mr. Bruneau had no right to recall his letter. I do not admit that proposition. Until Mr. Speaker was in possession of his written communication to resign his seat it was open to the hon. member to change his mind, and recall his act, so long as it was not complete. It is to be noticed that the letter of resignation never came into the possession of Mr. Speaker, so that Mr. Speaker could take any action on it. Let me again call the attention of the House to the last paragraph of the section I have just read :

Which declaration must also be duly entered on the Journals.

It is quite manifest that an entry in the Journals could not have been made because the letter of resignation never was in the hands of Mr. Speaker. Suppose Mr. Bruneau, instead of sending his resignation by mail, had taken upon himself to deliver it to Mr. Speaker with his own hands, as he might have done, and he delivered it and at the very moment the letter was in the hands of Mr. Speaker, the hon. member changed his mind and wanted to recall it, he was within his right and power to do so. Under these circumstances it would be taking the most narrow, the most unjudicial of all constructions to pretend that before Mr. Speaker had power to act on this resignation, the member who sent it had not the power to recall it. This resignation in order to be complete must follow the chain of operations set out in the law, and so long as the last link in the chain of these operations is wanting, then the member who intended to resign might change his mind. I submit that when a member has placed himself beyond the possibility of recalling his resignation he can no longer hold it; but until Mr. Speaker can testify that he has received the letter of resignation, the member can recall his resignation, and so I fail to see there is anything to investigate in this matter. We assume all the facts here stated to have taken place just as they are set out: that Mr. Bruneau intended to resign, that he drew up his resignation in writing, that he had it witnessed by two members of the House, that afterwards he mailed it to Mr. Speaker, and that after it had been mailed, and before Mr. Speaker could act he asked for the letter to be delivered to him, which letter had not been opened and on which Mr. Speaker had not taken any action; and under such circumstances the hon. member did not complete his intention of resigning his seat and he is still a member of this House. This is a matter which in my estimation should be construed not in a narrow, carping spirit, but in a broad spirit; and if a member of the House claims to be still a member, until it is apparent and manifest that he is no longer a member of the House, his intention should be respected. His intention, whatever it may have been at the time, had been changed before Mr. Speaker could take any action to report to the House, or make an entry in the Journals. Mr. Bruneau went and recalled the document, thereby fairly showing his intention of not resigning but of continuing to hold his seat in the House. Under these circumstances I contend there is nothing to investigate, and that it would lead to no good whatever to have any further proceedings taken in this matter.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I venture to think that the statement of the Prime Minister cannot be considered as wholly satisfactory to the House, and certainly not to those members who are inclined to reserve thoroughly impartial minds for their ultimate conclusion, as to what the facts submitted to you, Sir, really involve in connection with the construction of this statute. As a reason for my not thinking the statement of the Prime Minister to be entirely satisfactory, I venture to call to the attention of the House the almost invariable practice of this Parliament, and the Parliament of the mother country, which is to refer—what I was going to call the simplest kind of statement in regard to the right of any hon. gentleman to occupy a seat in the House—to the proper committee for inquiry. That is based on the well-understood principle that a representative of the people in a Parliament constituted as ours is, must be at all times ready to answer any challenge as to his right to occupy his seat. Indeed, Sir, I have in my mind a case (which I shall later on submit to the consideration of this House) where in connection with facts challenging the right of a Speaker of this House to occupy his seat, the Liberal party took the strongest ground, and without inquiry, voted down the arguments and the resolutions which involved the denial of the right of that gentleman to sit in this House; and yet, after these gentlemen had taken in debate the strongest possible ground and used language even more emphatic than the Prime Minister used to-day, the present hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) rose in his place, though on the Liberal side of the House, and he moved for a reference of that very case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That is to say: the Liberal party at that time referred facts, which they voted did not constitute a case against the Speaker, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections in order that all the circumstances surrounding the case should be thoroughly investigated and ventilated, and that there should not be an idea prevailing that Mr. Speaker or any member of the House was holding his seat under any circumstances which might be considered as rendering that seat void. That is an illustration of how easy it is, if one likes to put it that way, to make a prima facie case in a matter of this kind. But, the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in his argument to-day has overlooked entirely one of the strongest paragraphs of the resolution which has been put in your hands, Sir. The right hon. gentleman discussed the paragraphs of the resolution of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte), but he wholly omitted any reference to or any discussion of the clause which contains the prima facie case and which if true, renders, without any act on the part of the Speaker, without the necessity of any entry in the Journal, without any action whatever being taken, which renders, as I say, the seat of the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) absolutely void. The right hon. gentleman made no reference to this paragraph in the motion, which a look at the statute will show was of the greater importance:

That this declaration was tendered within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 5 of chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and yet the said Arthur Aimé Bruneau, Esquire, continues to sit in the House.

Let me show the House what that means. The statute which the right hon. gentleman quoted says:

The member so tendering his resignation shall be held to have vacated his seat, and shall cease to be a member of the House.

The right hon. gentleman in dealing with that section, dealt wholly with the statement of Mr. Speaker, and with all respect to you, Sir, and without harbouring the slightest desire to insinuate anything against the character and honour and integrity of the Speaker, I have to point out that this reference to the statement of Mr. Speaker made from the Chair, cannot have the slightest possible weight in regard to the settling of facts which it is desired to send to the committee. There is no question that that committee, on a reference of this matter, would not be bound by that statement, but would be bound to discuss with Mr. Speaker the very statement of his which is there recited, and which the Prime Minister now quotes, to bar and prevent any further inquiry. The object of a reference to the committee is to ascertain, what perhaps, Mr. Speaker, with the best possible intention considered of no importance, but which coming from the Speaker's own mouth before that committee might put an entirely different phase upon that construction of the statute. Therefore, without saying anything that is not necessary—nor do I know of any reason for insinuating anything against the Speaker—no one knows better than Mr. Speaker himself that that statement recited in the resolution is only a ground for further inquiry into the very facts that Mr. Speaker himself mentions, and can in no sense preclude or embarrass the hon. member who has moved this motion from bringing evidence to prove that this declaration was tendered within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 5 of chapter 13. If that be so, there is in my opinion no doubt whatever that the committee would report, and that this House would consider that the law required a declaration from the House that the seat of the hon. member for Richelieu was absolutely void. The right hon. gentleman having discussed, therefore, only part of the motion of the hon. member (Mr. Marcotte), went on to say that your statement, Mr. Speaker, finally disposes of the facts, that there was nothing further to contend for, and that no prima facie case had been made out. He does not deny that this resignation was made out in proper form as stated; but the right hon. gentleman went on to contend that the declaration that was made out to be delivered to the Speaker did not take effect according to the statute. Whatever our ultimate decision may be, I think the law advisers of the Government, as well as those hon. gentlemen who approach this matter with a full understanding of this word "delivery," will not say—even though the right hon. gentleman should be found in the end to be correct—that it is absolutely clear that these facts as stated by Mr. Speaker, do not constitute a complete "delivery" within the meaning of that section. At least (not to put the case in an extreme manner), I think it will be admitted by fair-minded men, looking into that question, that there is a great deal to show that there has been, even on the statement of Mr. Speaker, a "delivery" within the meaning of the statute. I think

I will be able to show before I sit down that there is a very strong argument in favour of that contention. But before dealing with that, I would like the House, or those hon. gentlemen who care to follow my argument, to understand that I am just now only attempting to meet the argument of the right hon. gentleman as based upon a portion of the resolution, and in view of his omitting wholly any reference to that distinct clause which says that this declaration of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bruneau) was tendered within the meaning of the Act. Putting that aside, and pointing out that a declaration had been properly made before two witnesses, who were members of the House of Commons; that that declaration was signed and sealed by the hon. member for Richelieu; that the statement of the Speaker, coupled with the statement of the hon. member for Richelieu, has reference to that very document, and is to the effect that the resignation of the hon. member was posted by him and reached the hands of the Speaker and was in the possession and under the control of the Speaker, and that it became necessary for the hon. member for Richelieu not to demand, but to request as a favour, which was granted to him, the return of that letter, which was at the time under the absolute and exclusive control of the Speaker—I submit that there is ground for showing that an extremely strong case is made out. So far as I can gather from the authorities and from a careful reading of this section, if these facts are not qualified by explanation or further evidence before the Privileges and Elections Committee, it would become the duty of that committee to report in favour of the conclusion which runs through this resolution, that is, that the seat of the hon. gentleman had become void by his declaration being tendered, or being delivered within the meaning of the statute. Before coming to the points which I wish to submit in order, in connection with that clause, I wish to join issue with the right hon. gentleman in the view he takes of the spirit of that clause. Mr. Speaker, it would place you, or any member occupying your high position, in a most difficult and embarrassing situation, if the right hon. gentleman's construction of that section be correct. If, for instance, there remains, after these solemn acts take place, a locus penitentiæ, so to speak, or if, by the good-will of the Speaker, any arrangement should be made to which a Speaker might be a party—for all sorts of things would be possible, if the right hon. gentleman's construction be correct—any gentleman in your position would be placed in a most awkward and unenviable position. When any member of this House desires to resign, unlike the difficulties that would meet him in England, the minute he takes these formal steps, as I believe Parliament intended, that minute he ceases to be a member and it is not in the power of the Speaker, nor is it possible for influence to be used on the Speaker or on others, to prevent the intention of Parliament being carried out. I need not pursue that further than to show the great amount of suspicion that might surround all parties concerned, if, after these solemn steps had been taken, and after the document had passed from the possession of the member into the possession of the Speaker, it was possible for any plan to prevent the consequences which Parliament seems to have indicated, by such means as the right hon. gentleman has himself suggested. In other words, as I understand the right hon. gentleman, though all these steps may have been taken, though the resignation may have gone from the hands of the member into the hands of the Speaker, until the Speaker is fully seized of the facts, until his mind is made aware that there has been something done, this paper is a mere paper, and nothing else—not a resignation, and not acted upon. It seems to me, on the contrary, even judging from the case in England, where, by the device of accepting the Chiltern Hundreds, a member may give up his seat and leave Parliament, the law does not regard the Speaker's knowledge as of the slightest importance. So here, I contend, for the safety of the Speaker, for his being able to preserve a position of strict impartiality, his knowledge of any of these steps amounts to nothing. The question is, did that resignation reach the Speaker? Did it leave the possession of the member, and go into the possession of the Speaker? Instead of the knowledge of the Speaker being necessary, look again at the last clause of the section to which the hon. gentleman referred. "The member so tendering his resignation"—no suggestion as to what the Speaker shall do with the paper—whether he shall look at it, whether he shall treat it with contempt, or whether he shall take any action on it. The mere tender of the resignation shall be held to vacate the seat, and the person so tendering shall cease to be a member of the House, irrespective wholly of the Speaker's knowledge, or interference, or neglect to interfere. Now, let us see what these words mean. First of all, I think, I may refer to the altogether irregular course that is being pursued in this case. I do not say, that the right hon. gentleman is responsible for it at all; but it was laid down with great care, in one of the cases with which the right hon. gentleman acted, the case of the member for Two Mountains in 1876, that the gentleman whose seat was involved, after the resolution was read, rose in his place, and made a statement, and retired. In this case, it will be observed, though ample notice was given to the hon. member for Richelieu, last week, that the matter was to come up on Friday, and, after a postponement, that it was to come up to-day, yet, on both these occasions, both on Friday last and to-day, it is noteworthy that the hon. member for Richelieu has not been in his seat. So that we have not even the benefit which, according to the rules of the House, the House ordinarily has, of a statement from the party affected being made at the beginning of the debate. Now, let us see how these matters are considered. What is fit for a reference to the committee? It is quite clear that a complete case has not to be made out. It is, on the face of the resolution, a matter simply for inquiry. But the authorities show that very little is sufficient to put the machinery in motion for the purpose of an inquiry into the facts; and no stronger case could be put, I submit, for an inquiry into the precedents as they exist, or into the authorities on the construction of a statute, which so far as I know, has never been construed in this Parliament, and which is peculiar to this Parliament. There is no such practice, of course, in England. This is our own particular; and it seems to me that it would be an interesting matter, not only as regards the hon. member for Richelieu, but as regards the seats of all hon. members in this House, that the practice under that statute should receive a prompt and speedy construction at the hands of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any other committee of the House to which we might see fit to refer the matter. In the case of the Speaker of a former Parliament—the Speaker in 1877—after the House had voted down a resolution declaring his seat void, the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), who had voted against the resolution, afterwards rose to a question of privilege, and moved:

That the attention of this House having been called to the reports, returns and vouchers laid upon the Table, touching the payment of public moneys to the Hon. T. W. Anglin, member for the electoral district of Gloucester, for printing and stationery for the Post Office Department, the said papers be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and they be directed to inquire into the facts, to search for precedents, and to report the result of their inquiries, and whether the said Hon. T. W. Anglin has vacated his seat.

In his argument on that motion, the hon. gentleman very properly referred to cases concerning which the English House of Commons had found it necessary to institute inquiries. He mentioned the case of one of the Rothschilds, who continued to sit in that House after he had become connected, in some way, with a Government contract. I forget the exact facts, but they are not important, but through his firm, ignorantly I believe, he had been brought into connection with one of the Government departments; and although in that case there was no expression of opinion as to what position the hon. gentleman was in, the case went to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The hon. gentleman cited this case to show on what slender material a reference to committee would be made, and he did this after arguing that no case had been made out against Mr. Anglin, on the presentation of the resolution declaring his seat void. Let me refer again to the speech of the hon. member for West Elgin on that occasion. That hon. gentleman said :

He wished merely to state that he felt convinced that this case was a proper one to be investigated by a committee of this House, because, according to May, any case in which there was a matter of doubt, should be referred to a committee.

I shall quote from our own authority, Dr. Bourinot, to show that we have been governed by the precedents which the hon. member for West Elgin cited at the time, and that a case need not be an exceedingly strong one in order that it may be referred to a committee of inquiry. On page 199 of Bourinot, I find the following :—

In the Canadian, as in the English House of Commons, whenever any question is raised affecting the seat of a member, and involving matters of doubt, either in law or fact, it is customary to refer it to the consideration of the committee.

I venture to say that the hon. member who drew up the resolution before us—and I make the statement from the language of the resolution—never pretended to suggest to this House that in the Speaker's statement we have a narrative in detail of every particular incident that occurred in the Speaker's presence, and I venture to say that no one better than Mr. Speaker himself knows that he would not say that every fact had been mentioned of which he was aware. All he would say is that all the facts which, in his opinion, were material, had been fully stated to the House of Commons, but facts which he may not have considered material and may not have stated, may have a very material bearing on the question. Bourinot proceeds to say

For example. In the case of Mr. Perry, referred to in a previous page, of Mr. J. S. Macdonald and Mr. C. Dunkin, whose seats were questioned on account of their holding offices in the Executive Councils of Ontario and Quebec ; of Mr. R. B. Cutler, who had been paymaster of a Government railway at the time of his reelection ; of Mr. DeLorme, who was charged with complicity in the Red River rebellion ; of Mr. Anglin and others, alleged to have violated the Independence of Parliament Act. In the case of Mr. Daoust, 1876, the matter was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which reported in his favour.

The case of Mr. Daoust was one in which the right hon. gentleman took a conspicuous part. In it charges were dug up, if I remember aright, from years back, with regard to proceedings that had been taken, of a criminal nature, in connection with Mr. Daoust. Unless I am entirely wrong—and it is not long ago I read the report of the right hon. gentleman's speech—he by no means took the ground that Mr.

Daoust was guilty of all that was laid to his charge, but he took very good care to keep to the line that there was matter for inquiry, that if, by any possibility, things had been done which rendered the hon. member for Two Mountains an unfit and improper person to sit in Parliament, Parliament should know it and know it quickly. This case was referred to a committee itself hostile politically to Mr. Daoust, but which reported in his favour, and the matter was set at rest. I proceed to quote from Bourinot :

But in 1880 the House refused to refer a petition making certain charges against Mr. Hooper to the same committee. In 1890, the conduct of Mr. Rykert, in connection with certain timber limits, was referred to the Committee of Privileges. In other cases, where there is evidence of crime, or of the person accused being a fugitive from justice, it has been considered sufficient to lay the papers formally before the House ;—

After two or three lines, which the right hon. gentleman will see are not important, Dr. Bourinot goes on to say :

—but whenever the seat or character of a member is affected, the House will invariably proceed with due caution and deliberation.

That is perfectly right, but Parliament is aware that all kinds of rumours are in circulation with regard to this case, the importance of which is shown by the solemn statement made to the House by you, Mr. Speaker. The leading papers in the country are giving an entirely different version of the facts ; for the sake of the Speaker, who is not in a position to take part in a debate of this kind and urge on the House any particular contention, I venture to say that the right hon. gentleman should—if he appreciated as he ought the position of the Speaker in the Chair, if he appreciated the fact that the Speaker's version is not supported by a great many people in the province of Quebec, where the county in question is situated—support this reference to a committee, so that the facts may be put before the House and the country and the position of the Speaker himself indicated in the strongest possible way.

Dr. Bourinot says further :

A reference to a committee is no doubt the proper procedure in all cases in which there are reasonable doubts as to the facts or the course that should be pursued, especially when it is necessary to examine precedents.

We have had no case like that in this House, but there are authorities—I have seen a few—that could be quoted to show the construction which a court would give to the language used in this statute and particularly the word "delivery." I may mention that in this connection I am omitting any reference to that cause, but propose to deal with it later on.

But take what the right hon. gentleman has referred to—the other paragraphs of the resolution—I submit that the authorities I have laid before the House are such that it will be well worth the committee's while to consider them in order that a proper construction may be put by this Parliament upon the statute. In 1876, for instance, I find the right hon. gentleman giving us one reason why the case of Mr. Daoust should be referred to a committee, that while there was a technicality involved, it was quite clear the circumstances should be referred to a committee.

I shall not take up the time of the House by referring further to what has happened but come down at once to discuss the construction of this statute, and I think that at least it will appear from my argument that there is a question for consideration. Now, take the primary meaning of the word "deliver," take Webster and Bouvier—Webster on the definition of the word, and Bouvier, a well-known authority, on the construction to be put upon these words in a court of law. Webster says:

Deliver—to put in another's power, to pass from one to another.

Bouvier, perhaps more technical, but giving an interpretation from the legal point of view:

An action by which all present and future dominion over the thing delivered passes from the person making the delivery.

And there is an interesting authority on this point. I have not the name of the case, but it is found in 5 Hurlston & Coltman's Reports, 518, where it was held that a notice to quit, mailed on a certain day, but not reaching the possession of the tenant until some time afterwards, was to be considered as delivered on the day of the posting; because it was notice to be sent to the person under the terms of the lease, and that notice, having been proved to have been posted, was considered to have reached the possession and control of the tenant. But let me, without going too exhaustively into the case, take such an authority as Leake on Contracts with regard to the delivery of deeds, where you have the point of knowledge dealt with. It must not be forgotten that this declaration on the part of the hon. member for Richelieu is a deed, it is a declaration, as the statute says, to be witnessed, to be signed, and to be sealed. And we know that, as to delivery, the very question has come up which the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) mentioned to-day in this connection—the importance of Mr. Speaker's knowledge in the matter. It had been argued that a deed to a grantee could not take effect without the grantee's knowledge. But this point, reaching the House of Lords, after being fully argued—and that within recent years—has been decided according to the view contrary to that which the right hon. gentleman has suggested. And, in a leading case, well known to the lawyers in the House, it has been decided that a deed of land may be effective and considered as delivered to the grantee, without the grantee having any knowledge of the existence of the deed or of the intention of the grantor to transfer any property to him. Leake, in the edition of 1892, page 114, says:

Delivery is necessary to render a deed operative. Delivery may be made by giving possession of the deed to the other party, or by authorizing the other party to take possession. A deed proved to have been signed and sealed by the one party, appearing in the possession of the other party, is presumed to have been duly delivered.

Delivery may also be made by giving possession of a deed to a stranger for the use and benefit of the other party, the intention being sufficiently expressed; a delivery to a stranger without any explanation of intention would be insufficient. Delivery may also be affected by a mere declaration thereof, though the party retains the deed in his own possession, or in the possession of his solicitor or agent, without communication to the other party. Where a policy of insurance purporting to be signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of a witness by the directors of an insurance company, was left in the company's office to be sent for by the insured, according to the usual practice, it was held to be a valid policy and binding upon the company, though they cancelled it whilst it remained in their possession. An acknowledgment by the party whose deed it is that it is valid and operative is sufficient evidence of delivery. The execution and delivery of a deed may be attested by a witness, who signs a formal statement appended to the deed to the effect that it was signed, sealed and delivered in his presence.

I have read nearly the whole of the paragraph, in order to put it as fully as possible. So, in connection with the delivery of deeds, we have, I think, good cases to govern our judgment in regard to the meaning of the word "deliver" here. It is shown to mean some act by which this declaration should pass out of the control, out of the possession, of the member signing the declaration, and into the possession and under the control of the Speaker of this House. And I submit that the facts stated by the hon. member, and not disputed, leave the House in the position that they can say nothing else than that this paper, this declaration, reached the Speaker's control, and was only got out of the Speaker's possession by Mr. Speaker's consent, and as the result of an action on his part. I need not go into the point regarding the posting of letters, that a letter, the moment it is put in the care of the Post Office Department, passes at once from the control of the person sending it, to that of the person to whom it is addressed. So, Mr. Speaker, I say again that there are any number of authorities which could well be examined by this committee, to show that delivery, under the circumstances given, was complete and effective in the case of resignation of Mr. Brunneau. I would like to know—and I hope we shall hear in the course of the debate—how this other clause of the statute is to be met.

I submit again that, instead of the case being presented, as the right hon. gentleman has suggested, containing three statements, which he read, and which are found in the paragraph before the one I shall now refer to, there are two statements here submitted for the consideration of the House, and the right hon. gentleman has dealt with only one of them. He has dealt with the effect produced by supposing the facts to be exactly as Your Honour has presented them to this House. Without further inquiry, and without intimation of the history of the case, he has dealt with your statement, Mr. Speaker, as though that statement covered everything. I have endeavoured to deal—though hurriedly, it is true—with that statement. But the right hon. gentleman has wholly overlooked this subsequent statement, which is complete in itself, which has no reference whatever to your statement, Mr. Speaker, or to any other statement in the resolution, but which is the statement of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte), and that is, that this declaration which was signed, and sealed, and properly executed, by the hon. member for Richelieu, was, as a matter of fact, tendered within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 5 of chapter 15 of the Consolidated Statutes of Canada. The right hon. gentleman says: No, and would argue that it was nothing of the kind, that the hon. member is all wrong, because, when we find what the facts are, there is no argument that there was a tender of the resignation. But where are the facts to support that contention? I would ask: Is the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) bound by the statement of Mr. Speaker? No one would argue so. It is only by reading the Speaker's statement and founding an argument on the Speaker's statement, that that charge of the hon. member for Champlain could be made. It seems idle, at any rate unfair and unreasonable, to contend that there is not a prima facie case, when a member rises in his place and says there is a tender of a resignation properly executed by a member of this House, when the law declares that, if a member tenders his resignation, he shall be held to have vacated his seat and to be no longer a member of the House.

Mr. CASEY. I am glad the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) who has just taken his seat has referred to what we may speak of as the Anglin case, as reference to that case, and the facts of it serves to emphasize most strongly the difference between the action taken then and the action which he wishes the House to take now.

I think that it may be taken for granted that we should not rashly refer everything to the Committee on Privileges and Elections that any person chooses to suggest. I think any old parliamentarian will admit that there must be a prima facie case, such a case as a grand jury would send for trial to a petty jury, such a statement of facts as raises at least a doubt as to what the action of the House should be in the matter, and as to whether an hon. member has vacated his seat. Now in the Anglin case, in which I was responsible for the action finally taken, that prima facie case existed beyond the shadow of a doubt. The hon. member who brought it up, the Hon. Mr. Bowell, now Sir Mackenzie Bowell, had taken means to bring before the House the proof that Mr. Anglin had received money in payment for printing from a department of the Government. On the face of it that payment appeared to vacate his seat. It was urged on the other hand that as Mr. Anglin had not received this money under contract, he was not therefore within the words of the statute which referred to money received then existing under contract. Now Sir, that was the point of dispute, whether a payment not made under contract to the hon. member vacated his seat. There was a doubt whether it did or not, and that doubt constituted certainly a ground for reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections prior to this House taking any action in the matter.

But what was the thing that we voted down? My hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) says that I was one of those who argued that there was no case against Mr. Anglin. I never argued anything of the kind, Mr. Speaker: I only argued that the question which was brought before the House, and which was an amendment to going into Committee of Supply, and which was a declaration that Mr. Anglin's seat was vacant—I argued that that motion should not be carried by this House until an inquiry had taken place before the Committee on Privileges and Elections to ascertain whether this doubt operated in Mr. Anglin's favour or not. There was then a prima facie case, there was a motion to deprive a member of his seat, and that motion being voted down, as a matter of fairness and equity, I made a motion to have the matter considered by the committee. The case was as different as possible from the present one. If the hon. member who makes the present motion had moved that the member for Richelieu had vacated his seat on account of what has taken place, instead of asking that the matter should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the parallel in that case would be complete. But the House can see how different the case is at the present time.

I consider that my action in moving the reference to the committee in the former case, is perfectly consistent with the opinion I now hold that there is nothing in the case to refer to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The whole question turns on whether there is a prima facie case. Now, though my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) wishes to have the Committee on Privileges and Elections inquire into the precedents in this matter, he has admitted in his speech that there are no precedents. We are therefore thrown back upon our own common sense and knowledge of parliamentary law and procedure, in which a great many of us have had quite as long an experience as the hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, I ask the common sense of this House whether any common sense parliamentary interpretation of the statute that has been read in your presence, would not take it for granted that the resignation had not been completed until the fact of that resignation being written and signed had come to the knowledge of the Speaker. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has quoted a lot of legal authorities in regard to matters of trade, matters of land, and questions of common law and chancery. I do not see that they have the slightest application to a question of parliamentary law like this. It has been laid down by the leader of this side of the House, and I think with the utmost propriety, that several things are necessary to a resignation—first, that the member should have the intention to resign; secondly, that he should put that on paper before witnesses; and thirdly, that it should come to the knowledge of the Speaker. I say that until it has come to the knowledge of the Speaker, whether his knowledge of it has been delayed by accident, or by the intentional abstraction of the document in his possession, or by his voluntarily handing it back unseen to the gentleman who had sent it in, there is no completion of the resignation; and until the Speaker is aware of the fact that this resignation has been signed in the presence of two witnesses, the resignation is not complete. I do not think any parliamentarian of any experience in this House will take a different stand on that point from the stand I take. I say therefore that if all the allegations in this motion be facts, without any equivocation or quibble at all, still there is nothing like a prima facie case to go to the committee, for it is not stated in fact, in any part of that resolution, that the Speaker ever knew of Mr. Bruneau's intention to resign, or ever saw the resignation which it is alleged Mr. Bruneau signed. There is no allegation to that effect in the whole resolution; therefore there is nothing on which to base any attack on the seat of the hon. member for Richelieu, or to call upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections to inquire into the case. I do not think that Lake on Contracts has anything to do with the matter. I do not see that any legal presumption of delivery, on account of a letter having been mailed and registered, has anything to do with the interpretation of a parliamentary practice of this kind. If there is no allegation, therefore, that the Speaker saw the contents of that letter and that it was officially brought to his knowledge as Speaker, there is nothing for the committee to inquire into. The hon. member refers to the case of the acceptance of the Chiltern Hundreds in England. He said no knowledge by the Speaker was necessary there. Certainly it is not. There is no similar statute to ours governing the resignation of a member of the British House of Commons, there is no means, in fact, by which a member of the British House of Commons can resign. The only way in which his seat can be vacated is by his acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown, and this office of Keeper of the Chiltern Hundreds is used traditionally for that purpose, and for that purpose alone. There can be no analogy drawn, and therefore no precedents, from the practice of the British House of Commons to help us in interpreting our own statutes. We must fall back upon first principles and upon our own parliamentary knowledge. I think the hon. member will find that the cases cited by myself in moving the Anglin reference, were all cases where a prima facie charge against the seat of the member in question had been made out, and that no case, either in the British House of Commons or here, has ever been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections where there was not an allegation of something either affecting the member's character or affecting his technical right to hold his seat in this House. Now, Sir, I contend that in the present case there is no allegation at all which, on a common sense interpretation of the law, affects the seat of the hon. member for Richelieu, and that therefore there is nothing to refer to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, last week treated the House to an exhibition of freedom from party thralldom, and on the present occasion I had hoped that the hon. gentleman would have continued the same freedom of last week. However, we must assume that the hon. gentleman has seen the error of his ways, for apparently it is an error to show a spirit of independence without recanting. That was the case with respect to the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau), who manifested a spirit of independence, but that spirit of independence, if hon. gentlemen opposite could have their own way, would apparently be very short-lived. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Casey) referred to a debate a number of years ago on what was known as the Anglin case, and the hon. gentleman on that occasion blew very hot and very cold at well regulated periods. The first proposition made set out that in the interest of the country and of this House it was improper and wrong for that hon. gentleman, Mr. Anglin, to have had dealings with the Government of the day, he then not only being a member of the House, but also the Speaker. On that occasion the hon. gentleman, together with the Administration, voted down that resolution of principle; but subsequently, seeing the mishap that occurred and the feeling aroused against the party in the country, introduced a motion to have the case presented before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I cannot do better than quote the words of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) on that occasion. After stating the position of the matter, he said:

He considered that the committee would do Mr. Speaker justice, notwithstanding the gentlemen opposite had tried to prevent it being done.

And further:

I do say it distinctly. The committee would also afford the country an opportunity of having the matter cleared up.

I submit that from the statement submitted to-day to the House by you, Mr. Speaker, hon. members cannot help but see, by a close reading of it, that it is a most carefully and particularly worded statement. And not only so, but it is controverted and contradicted by statements made from day to day in the public press; and surely the House is not going to decide on the ex-parte statement presented by you, Mr. Speaker, that there shall not be any investigation in this matter. There is something at stake here. We are told in this country, and we are led to believe, and I think the precedents of the past have established that when once Mr. Speaker accepts the position, he is above and beyond party politics. If that is not so, then it must cause throughout the country a feeling of distrust in our governmental institutions, especially when Mr. Speaker is alleged by newspapers to have done what was incompatible with the statement made by himself. In support of my statement let me read from the Montreal "Star." There are newspapers to which little attention is paid, but in western Ontario there is no newspaper more generally read for its independent leanings than the Montreal "Star."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT. Some hon. gentlemen opposite laugh. I tell them that such is the case, and that that newspaper is having its weight and effect felt in Ontario.

Mr. DAVIN. It is the same with regard to the North-west Territories.

Mr. BENNETT. Under date of 14th March, 1898, appears the following editorial entitled: "The Speaker and his Spectacles":—

The latest version of the Bruneau resignation episode, is that the said resignation was written, duly witnessed, and handed to "Mr. Speaker" in a sealed envelope; that Mr. Speaker, being informed what the fateful envelope contained, did not open it, but kept it until he was asked to hand it back; and that then he did so without ever having been cognizant officially of its contents.

This theory is a trifle gauzy. It is hardly to be presumed that the Speaker will officially put forth so disingenuous an explanation of the affair. Either the resignation was handed to him, or it was not. If it was—and this has not yet been denied—then Richelieu is vacant. The law does not declare that the Speaker must read the resignation—he might have mislaid his spectacles; and surely the patriotic desire of a member to relieve the country of his presence in Parliament should not be balked by so trivial a cause. It only declares that the resignation shall be "delivered to the Speaker."

This appears to have been done in the Bruneau case. More than that, it is said that the Speaker was made aware of the contents of the document delivered to him. What does it matter whether it was done by reading the document to him, or letting him read it himself, or telling him what it contained? Or could the member be made to suffer if the Speaker never opened it? Can the Speaker keep a man in his seat against his will by simply neglecting to read his written resignation? He would have as much right to be deaf when his attention was called to the matter in the House.

The whole affair is decidedly diaphanous. Mr. Edgar will not gain sufficient repute as the non-inquisitive man to make up to him for his loss in other directions. Politicians may fall into the deposit of depositing secret letters with him for safe-keeping, knowing that he will never read them; but even this will be a doubtful advantage. The glory of our Speakership is its non-partisan character; but that glory will not be increased by transactions of this description. The Speaker's office should receive the resignation of a member like an automatic machine, and run it through the ritual prescribed without reference to race, party colour, or any previous condition of party servitude.

That editorial appeared, as I have stated, on 14th March, and I have not heard of any action for libel being brought against the "Star" newspaper by you, Mr. Speaker, or anybody else. Moreover, I have never seen in the "Star" any explanation of those statements which are certainly made against the honour of this House, statements which should be thoroughly ventilated and inquired into. Not only did the "Star" take up this question, but it is also dealt with by other newspapers. I read now from the Toronto "Evening News."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT. Hon. members may say "hear, hear," over and over again, and I am glad they recognize a good newspaper and have the sense to show their recognition of it. In its issue of 15th March, it said as follows:—

Bruneau saw Blair again. He reminded that practical politician that, in the first session of the present Parliament, he, Blair, had announced that, on requisition of any Liberal member, or defeated Liberal candidate, civil servants residing in their districts would be discharged without delay. Blair told the House of his determinations eighteen months ago. The Tories protested, but what Blair said went, and the Tory office-holders went too, to the number of two thousand and more. Bruneau did not see why the Minister should make an exception in his case. Blair, who is not the most saucy man on earth, declined to listen to argument, and told Bruneau so. Thereafter, to wit, at four o'clock on Friday morning last, Bruneau told some of his friends that he would resign. The House was half asleep upstairs, and gentlemen who did not want to slumber sought the cellar, there to have something to eat and drink. Bruneau had both. He carried out his fell threat, and wrote a letter to the Speaker. He posted it, and boasted that he had showed the trebly-blinded Blair that he couldn't run him, the upright and incorruptible Bruneau. Next day was the day after. As sometimes happens on such occasions, Bruneau "was sorry for it." He remembered to have written a letter.

Yesterday, Speaker Edgar told his part of the story. Before the House had been in session ten minutes, the Honourable J. D. arose and informed the House that he had something to say to it. Sproule, who had intended to bring the Bruneau question up, looked fiercely at the First Commoner, who was cutting from under his feet the ground for an effectual attack on the Government. Edgar held in his hand a type-written page, whose lines may have been dictated by any one of several persons. He read his statement, in which he said that Mr. Bruneau had come to him on Friday morning, before he had opened his daily mail, and had asked for the return of a letter which he had posted to the Speaker some hours before. Thereupon, Mr. Edgar, the most obliging of men, went over the pile of letters that lay on his table and picked out one which Bruneau identified as bearing his writing and his frank. "I returned the letter unopened," concluded Mr. Edgar, "and did not question Mr. Bruneau as to, nor did he tell me the contents of the letter."

Foster's sarcastic smile was four feet broad when the Speaker sat down. From neither side of the House came any expression of anger or satisfaction. The Conservatives, who discussed the matter in the corridor, made no bones about their sincere conviction as to the inside history of the episode. They blamed Sir Wilfrid for having put Bruneau up to this dodge, whereby he recovered the letter in which, everybody guesses, his resignation was tendered to the Speaker. On Saturday morning Bruneau went through the corridors telling everybody that he had never resigned. Whether he did or not, none of us will ever know. His word must be accepted; at least no man is entitled openly to dispute it. It is true that Mr. Edgar said that Mr. Bruneau interviewed him on Friday morning, and it is equally true that the member for Richelieu was not feeling well on the same morning, and did not leave his room until after two o'clock. But this proves nothing. It was after six o'clock when the members and pressmen got to bed on that morning. It would be the most natural thing in the world for Mr. Edgar, who did not rise until after luncheon time, to confuse morning and afternoon. The main thing is that Bruneau is member for Richelieu, and that his would-be lock-tenders are still without the pale of Her Majesty's Service in Canada. Bruneau may consider himself in luck, for, of course, the story, as related by Mr. Edgar, is absolutely in accordance with the facts. Had Mr. Speaker opened the letter—as, of course, he did not—he must have laid the matter before the House. It is manifestly preposterous for anybody to hint that Mr. Edgar knew the contents of the letter. A gentleman of his high character would have said so in making his statement yesterday afternoon. Nobody but a partisan would have helped Mr. Bruneau to jerk back his resignation, and everybody who lays claim to possessing a brain knows that Mr. Edgar is far from being a partisan. He has said so himself, and he ought to know. It may be pardonable here to express a doubt that Honourable Peter White, the former Speaker, would have taken the course selected by Mr. Edgar. When Bob White, then member for Cardwell, wrote out his resignation under peculiar circumstances, and forwarded it to the Hon. Peter, Sir Mackenzie Bowell had an interview with the Speaker. The then Premier wanted Mr. White to permit his namesake to withdraw his resignation. It was far from convenient to the Conservatives to have any of their supporters leave Parliament at that juncture, and Sir Mackenzie used his best efforts to induce the Speaker to accord with his desire. Mr. Peter White declined to argue the question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what do we find from these two journals? We find that statements are going broadcast through the country, that the declaration as made by you, Mr. Speaker, in the House, is, to speak charitably, not a full and complete statement of every fact in relation to this matter. I have heard the matter discussed by gentlemen, not members of this House, who overheard Mr. Bruneau on the morning that the vote was taken on the Yukon Bill, and when one takes the coincidence of time and circumstance they all go to point to the fact that Mr. Bruneau certainly did place his resignation in the hands of the Speaker. It is not denied that Mr. Bruneau was about the House that morning, and it is equally plain as the division list shows, that Mr. Bruneau never recorded his vote. Now, it is within the knowledge of witnesses who can be produced before the committee, that a certain gentleman who sits on the opposite side and occupies a prominent position in this House, saw Mr. Bruneau that morning and in the presence of witnesses, expressed his opinion of what Mr. Bruneau had done and told him in plain English, that he made as ass of himself; and, that Mr. Bruneau and this party thereupon and at once commenced to discuss as to how the resignation was to be got back.

There must be one of two things in this case. There must be honesty of purpose, or there must be the treatment of the whole matter as a farce, and I say this House for its dignity cannot afford to treat the whole matter as farce. It is due to you, Mr. Speaker, as the first commoner, to insist that there should be a thorough and full inquiry so that you may be cleared fully and effectually from these statements—they are not insinuations but they are real statements—that are made in the public press. Sir, the allegations are there clearly and concisely: That you knew the contents of that letter just as well as if you had opened it yourself; and under these facts and under these allegations, it is a duty the House owes its Speaker, and owes to the position of Speaker in this country, that there should be a thorough and full inquiry into this matter. To say that there is no prima facie case made out; why, there is the admission that the resignation was written out. The two hon. gentlemen who witnessed it are both members of this House, and neither one of the two has risen in his place to deny that they saw the resignation, and that they were witnesses to it. Until they do that the House will believe and the country will believe, that the resignation did exist. No one will believe, after the statements made in the public prints, that the First Minister was not aware of the existence of that resignation. Aye, and moreover, that he himself knew, Mr. Speaker, before it parted company with your possession as handed to Mr. Bruneau, that that resignation was in your possession and had been transmitted to you either by mail or by messenger. Take your own statement, Mr. Speaker, and I do submit that to a man who is at all of an inquisitive mind there are strange coincidences and circumstances to point to this fact: that that communication or statement made by you has been made most carefully, aye, I will go further and say, most cunningly devised as a reading of the lines will show. It goes on to say first and foremost:

It is stated that I have received his resignation. If I had received his resignation I should have issued my warrant for a new election before now.

Well, Mr. Speaker, there was a time and there was a place to have given an explicit and flat denial to the receipt of the resignation by you, and yet there is no denial at all. The statement is simply made:

If I had received his resignation, then I would have issued my warrant.

But, in the statement of the Speaker before the House there is no denial at all that the resignation was by him received. Further on it says: That this communication was franked to the Speaker. Surely no man who knows the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau); who knows him and has known him as many of us have known him not only as a member of this Parliament but as a member of the last Parliament; surely none of us are going to believe the childish statement that he franked a letter to the Speaker. Surely the hon. gentleman—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I cannot allow an absolute license to the hon. member (Mr. Bennett) to personally contradict the statement of the Speaker of this House. I shall permit no member of this House to do that. I have submitted to a great deal so far, but when it comes to contradicting absolutely the statement of myself from this Chair, I cannot permit that.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, Mr. Speaker, I must submit, as I have by my argument, and by arguments contradicted what certainly is a statement of fact; because the statement of fact appears that the letter was franked. Mr. Speaker, it all points more and more strongly to what I have been urging, namely, the necessity for a thorough and close investigation of the matter in order that justice may be done to you and to the position you hold. Then, Sir, there comes this coincidence, and it is a suspicious coincidence, and it would be treated so in any case:

I had just come into my office when Mr. Bruneau came in.

Well, Sir, that suggests a pre-arrangement to my mind and it is a matter certainly which should place the House, and which should place some committee of inquiry in possession of the whole facts, and of all the statements in the case.

Now, Sir, I do not propose to deal with the legal aspect of the case; that has been gone into fully by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). But I do say this: taking the two high grounds (and they are high grounds), that this House owes a duty to itself in seeing that acts of this kind are thoroughly and fully ventilated, and I do maintain in view of that fact, that it is such a case as should go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. You, Mr. Speaker, and the House have everything to gain and nothing to lose; nothing to lose if the statements are true, and they are accepted by the House as true. But if a denial is made of an inquiry into this subject, then I can only say that the country will look with suspicion on the whole transaction, and it will demean and it will dishonour the proceedings of this Parliament not only on this occasion, but other times, as from one action all will be judged. I ask the First Minister to contrast the position taken by him to-day with the position taken by Sir John Thompson in the Turcotte case. On that occasion there was no hesitation; there was no question as to the propriety of an investigation; and it is a strange coincidence that the charge in that case was preferred by the hon. member for Richelieu against Mr. Turcotte, then the member for Montmorency. I say, as Sir John Thompson on that occasion said fairly and frankly by his action. "The position of a member should be above party politics; it should be taken out of that arena; respect should be had for the position; and I will endeavour to give it that respect by giving a full and frank and fair inquiry." Notwithstanding the statement of the First Minister that he will not permit any inquiry to be made into this case, I trust that he will even yet recall his decision, and have a full, fair and impartial investigation before the committee. The committee is the hon. gentleman's own committee. He has a majority on that committee; they can admit what evidence they like; they can suppress what evidence they like in that committee just as well as they can by a vote in this House. But if an inquiry is had, I hope the hon. gentleman will not do as was done in the Anglin case. In that case, when the report was brought down to the House, and the House was ready for the question of its adoption, the Usher of the Black Rod was announced, and the report was suppressed. It would have been far better for the Government to-day to have laid on the Table of this House the resignation of the hon. member for Richelieu, and have thrown the constituency open; for hon. gentlemen opposite must remember, as the province of Ontario lately showed, that they have no guarantee that the country is theirs. A day of reckoning must come, and they must be amenable to public opinion. These hon. gentlemen have set up for themselves a high standard of morality. They have professed to be the teachers of men, and they must support that profession a little with their actions, if they wish to become entitled to the support of moderate-minded men. I am glad to say that they learned to their cost, in the late provincial elections of Ontario, that they had not succeeded in defying public opinion in that province; and by a continuance of actions of this kind, they will find when the day of reckoning comes, that public opinion will assert itself.

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not suppose, Mr. Speaker, that there is any frenzied desire on the part of any member of this House, without fair and just cause, to have any hon. member's seat declared vacant. For my own part, I would disavow any such desire or intention. Nor am I here to champion the cause of the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) or to show that he took the proper course to vacate his seat. I think it is:

"Better like Hector in the field to die,
Than like the perfumed Paris turn and fly."

I do not think that the hon. member for Richelieu, on any question of patronage, as was rumoured in the press, had any justification for the resignation which we are told he handed in. Now, there are two ways in which under the statute a member may vacate his seat by his own free will. The first way is by an open declaration in the House, and the other is the way to which our attention has been called by the hon. First Minister. In order to fulfil the conditions of this latter mode, the member must in the first place signify his intention to resign in writing; that intention so signified must be witnessed by two members of the House; and so signed, sealed and witnessed, it must be delivered to the Speaker of the House, when, the Act says, the resignation is complete, the seat is void, and the Speaker shall forthwith issue his warrant for a new election. What have we in this case to fulfil these conditions?

Mr. BENNETT.

We have it admitted. I take for granted, that the hon. member for Richelieu did write out his resignation, did have it witnessed by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Godbout) and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), and did send it to the Speaker. I want to admit frankly to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House that, at the beginning, in the private discussion that has taken place in this matter, the stand I took was that I did not believe it was sufficient for the Speaker to have simply the actual delivery of the document, but that I thought the Speaker should have a scienter of what that document contained—that the fact of the resignation should come to the knowledge of the Speaker. That was my first judgment upon the question. My mind has since gone one step further, and it is lodged here at the present time; that a scienter is not absolutely necessary, but that if the facts of the case were sufficient to lead the Speaker, as a fair and reasonable man, to believe that the document or the envelope contained a resignation, then I do not think he should have handed it back to the hon. gentleman, for in that case the resignation would be complete. Have we any knowledge of the facts in connection with that, or as to the conclusion which you had in your mind as to that? I hold that we have not. I have read very carefully the declaration which you, Mr. Speaker, made on the 14th of March, and I wish to be within the lines of order in any remarks I make upon that declaration. Far be it from me to utter any word of disrespect to you, Mr. Speaker, in the position you hold in this House as between the two parties here, as our spokesman, and as the guardian of the rights and privileges of the members of this House on both sides of it. But, Sir, your declaration of the 14th of March does not state that you did not know that Mr. Bruneau had put his resignation in that envelope. Your statement does not go that length.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Nor does he say that he had not reason to know.

Mr. McINERNEY. No; I will read the statement:

Before calling the Orders of the Day, I would like to mention to the House a matter which is of the nature of privilege, and which I see has been connected by the press with the seat of an hon. member—the member for Richelieu. It is stated that I have received his resignation. If I had received his resignation, I should have issued my warrant for a new election before now. The only occasion when I have had any communication from or with Mr. Bruneau this session was on Friday morning. I had just come into my office when Mr. Bruneau came in. He asked me if I had received a letter from him. I told him I had not. He said that he had called to get a letter back which he had written to me. I told him to wait and I would look among my mail, for I had not yet opened any letters. I turned the unopened letters over in his presence, and he pointed to one with his frank upon it. I asked him if it was his writing on the address and frank. He assured me it was. He told me nothing of its contents, and I asked him nothing, but handed him the letter unopened, and he took it away with him. So far as I know, it had come to my office through the post office, for I had not seen it before. I mention this to avoid any mistake as to facts as far as I am concerned.

In that statement of yours, Mr. Speaker, there is not one word to the effect that you did not know that Mr. Bruneau had sent in his resignation. There is the statement that he did not tell you that he had sent in a resignation, that you did not know, perhaps, what that particular letter contained, but there is no statement—and, in justice to you, Sir, it is just as well this should be pointed out—that you did not know that Mr. Bruneau had sent in a resignation to you. You, Mr. Speaker, have not, up to this date, made that declaration. I claim that this House has the right to know—and, I think, if the opportunity be given, you, Mr. Speaker, will be only too anxious to tell the House, or any committee of this House—whether you had any such knowledge or not. My contention is, that if the Speaker had knowledge that that envelope contained the resignation of the hon. member for Richelieu, then he should not have handed him back the letter. I go one step further, and say that if the Speaker had reasonable grounds for believing that that letter contained the resignation, then he should not have handed back the letter. The only place where we can get at the facts to establish whether the Speaker had the knowledge, or should have had it, is the Committee on Privileges and Elections. There is a lot of rumour throughout the country, there are lots of statements on all hands about this resignation—as to the Speaker's knowledge, and all that sort of thing; and I, for one, as a member of this House, want to be put in a position to know, and to know absolutely, whether you, Mr. Speaker, had such knowledge at the time, or whether the facts you had before you and in your mind were such as to justify your coming to the conclusion, as a fair and reasonable man, that that envelope contained the resignation. I simply rose to call attention to the fact that the Speaker makes no declaration that he did not know the envelope contained the resignation, and to make the further point that, unless it were made plain to me, as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that the Speaker either had the knowledge that the envelope contained the resignation, or should have had such knowledge from the facts going the round of the House and the country, I would not vote to vacate the seat of the hon. member for Richelieu. But if it be shown that he had, or should have had, that knowledge—and I hold we should have an opportunity of finding out whether he had or not—I think I would be bound, under the law, to report in favour of declaring vacant the seat for Richelieu. I again wish to urge that, in my opinion, the dignity of this House, the privileges of the members of this House, the reputation of the Speaker himself—all these call upon this House to refer this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I cannot see why this motion should be opposed; I cannot see why anybody should want to hide anything in connection with this matter. Why should there be suspicion spread throughout this country on this question? Why should the newspapers be allowed to circulate rumours concerning the Speaker of this House, whose honour is dear to every member of this House and every Canadian, whose position should be above suspicion and above reproach, and whose conduct, so far as I have been able to see—and I am anxious to bear the willing testimony—has been above suspicion and reproach?

But I claim that the press and the people of this country should not be in a position to cast imputations on the honour of the Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada; and the only way by which I can see that the ground can be taken away for any such imputations is, to have this matter thoroughly investigated and reported on by the only committee that can investigate and report upon it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). No fault can be found with the manner in which my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Herbert Tupper) and my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney) have addressed themselves to the discussion of this question. I am sure it would have been acceptable to the House at large, if the question had been discussed from all standpoints on the same line, but I regret, for one—and I take this opportunity of saying so—that an attempt should have been made by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) to make a personal and bitter attack on you, Mr. Speaker, under and behind the shield of some anonymous correspondents in some one or two newspapers.

Mr. BENNETT. Will the hon. gentleman excuse me?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BENNETT. Let some of those on the back benches whose eloquence never gets beyond the cry of "Order," hold their souls in patience for a while. The hon. gentleman says that I quoted from anonymous correspondents. I did not. What I quoted was what might be called editorial matter, for which the Montreal "Star" is responsible, and not any anonymous correspondence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not see that the hon. gentleman has bettered his position at all.

If he entertained the belief that the Speaker of this House was an untruthful and dishonourable man, he should have had the manliness and courage to say so himself, and not take the unmanly course of shielding himself behind anonymous correspondence or articles in newspapers. I shall not further discuss that view of the case, but I would venture to say—and I think in that I would have the almost unanimous vote of this House—that the dignified and severely impartial manner in which you, Mr. Speaker, have discharged the duties this House has entrusted to you, has been in accordance with the best traditions of the Chair you occupy.

Let me say a word or two on the legal point my hon. friends have suggested. My hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney) felt himself in a dilemma. He could not accept, as a lawyer, the argument of his confrère from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), and was obliged to import into it a third statement. I acknowledge, he said, as a lawyer, that, in addition to the fact of the posting of the letter, and in addition to the fact of the receipt of the envelope containing it, there must be the actual knowledge brought home to the Speaker.

Mr. McINERNEY. Or a reasonable ground for the Speaker having that knowledge.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It must be brought home to the Speaker. In other words, the hon. gentleman acknowledges that the position taken by my hon. friend from Pictou is in itself untenable. There must be something else in addition. Now, I want to call his attention, as a lawyer, to the fact that this House, in deciding upon the resolution submitted to it, are bound, as the right hon. First Minister said, to assume the correctness of all the facts stated in the resolution, but are neither bound nor justified in importing into that resolution a fact not stated. And if there is an essential fact omitted in the resolution—a fact necessary to state in order to justify us in referring the matter to a committee—then, there is no ground for the reference at all.

We are here construing a statute. The statute does not say that on knowledge, however obtained, the Speaker shall act—it does not say that on knowledge gained by casual conversation in the lobbies or through letters or articles in the newspaper press, the Speaker can act. The Speaker would have no power to act upon knowledge so conveyed to him. He has the power to act upon knowledge if that knowledge is conveyed to him in a special way, which is pointed out by the statute. It says :

Such member may address and cause to be delivered to the Speaker a declaration of his intention to resign his seat, made in writing under his hand and seal, before two witnesses * * * and the Speaker shall, upon receiving such declaration, forthwith address his warrant—

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

And so on. Now, it is not a question whether A, B or C has gone to the Speaker and said : I believe that a letter has been sent to you by Mr. So and So declaring his intention to resign. He must act strictly in accordance to the law, and the law provides he shall only act as and when he receives a declaration signed by the member. To my mind, as I respectfully submit, my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney) has answered the point entirely. My hon. friend the Prime Minister has stated, and I think very correctly stated—every lawyer who has spoken on either side has agreed with him—that those who wish to refuse sending a matter of this kind to the committee must take the responsibility of assuming the correctness of every fact in the statement made. On this basis, assuming that every statement of fact be correct, I venture to submit that there is not sufficient to justify reference to the committee, because there has not been a legal resignation. The hon. gentleman for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) argues that delivery, in the legal technical sense only is necessary, and he supports and buttresses his argument by reference to the law books. He quotes a case from Leake on Contracts. But the hon. gentleman knows, as every lawyer knows, that delivery in such cases as he has referred to is a technical legal act. He knows that it is not necessary that a deed should pass out of the possession of the grantor to be legally delivered. I could declare a deed to be my act and deed and put it in my pocket, but, if my intention in the matter is established, the delivery is legally complete. But the hon. gentleman could not argue, he has estopped himself from arguing that the writing of a resignation by a member and putting it in his pocket is a delivery within the meaning of the Act. And yet, unless he adopts that, there is no point whatever to his quotation of "Leake on Contracts." But, arguing the case simply as a lawyer, the hon. gentleman has said: Look at the case of a notice to quit—I have forgotten where he quoted that case from. The lessor sent the notice to quit through the post, and it was held that this was sufficient. But why? Not because the posting was delivery, but because the terms of the lease under which the notice was sent provided not that the notice should be delivered, but that it should be sent by the lessor, and it was shown to have been posted by him. Now, let me call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact which to some extent he failed to deal with—that when the hon. member for Champlain imported into the declaration he made in this House the 'ipsisima verba' of the statement made by the Speaker, he made that statement his own. That statement of Mr. Speaker is part of the declaration on which we are asked to refer this matter to the committee. Then, every statement made by Mr. Speaker must he assumed to be true—you cannot go back of it, it being a part of the hon. member's own statement upon which we are asked to act. If the hon. member for Champlain had, as was entirely within his right, said that he believed and had reason to believe that a resignation had been properly drawn and sent and received by the Speaker and had stopped there, he would have made out a prima facie case which would justify this House in referring the case for examination to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. But he did not do that. He merely took Mr. Speaker's statement, and upon that statement he argued, as a matter of law, that the resignation was delivered and was received. My hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) saw the force of that argument when presented by the Prime Minister; he saw that there was no answering it. And how does he seek to escape from it? He says that the Prime Minister forgot to refer to a paragraph that fills up that hiatus and completes the argument, the third paragraph of the charge. But does it fill that hiatus? What is the third statement of the charge? I appeal to the hon. gentleman himself to say whether there is an allegation of fact in that paragraph at all? Or was there intended to be one? Not at all. It is simply the conclusion on the point of law which the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) draws from the facts which he had set out in the paragraphs covering the Speaker's statement.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman appeals to me. I suppose he would like a decision?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would appeal to the hon. gentleman, and, if I could divorce him from his politics, would not be at all adverse to accepting his decision. I would call his attention to this third statement:

That this declaration was tendered within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 5 of chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada.

That is the conclusion that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Marcotte) arrived at on the point of law; the facts upon which he bases it are all set out in the previous statements. And so I say that the hiatus which the Prime Minister pointed out is there still. The reception by the Speaker, on which alone he could inform himself of the contents of the document is absent. Therefore, the Speaker cannot issue his warrant. The position I take is this: There is not only no allegation of knowledge given to the Speaker, but the existence of such knowledge is disproven on the face of the charge itself. I put that to my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney). He says the knowledge must be brought home to the Speaker; now, Sir, I say that no such knowledge is alleged. The hon. member for Champlain and other members are bound by the terms of the resolution. It simply incorporates Mr. Speaker's statement—

It is said that I have received his resignation. If I had received his resignation, I should have issued my warrant for a new election before now. The legal inference from that is irresistible. There was no knowledge on the part of the Speaker and could not be. Mr. Speaker goes further and says:

The only occasion when I have had any communication from or with Mr. Bruneau this session was on Friday morning.

Now, I press my argument that he could not receive information from a third person on which he could act.

Mr. BERGERON. Why not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Because the statute distinctly declares that a member may send to the Speaker a declaration of his intention to resign and that upon receipt of this declaration, the Speaker may act. That is why not. The Speaker says, with regard to Mr. Bruneau, the only person from whom he could receive the communication:

The only occasion when I have had any communication from or with Mr. Bruneau this session was on Friday morning. I had just come into my office, when Mr. Bruneau came in. He asked me if I had received a letter from him. I told him I had not. He said he had called to get a letter back which he had written to me. I told him to wait and I would look among my mail, for I had not yet opened any letters. I turned the unopened letters over in his presence, and he pointed to one with his frank upon it. I asked him if it was his writing on the address and frank. He assured me it was. He told me nothing of its contents, and I asked him nothing.

Mr. BERGERON. Will my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) allow me to ask him a question?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes; but let me finish my argument. If I am correct in saying that the information on which Mr. Speaker is to act must come from the resigning members themselves, and if, as the resolution before us expressly states, the Speaker handed back the letter unopened, the argument seems irresistible that the Speaker had not and could not have had knowledge on which to act. Now, let us look at the section of the statute for a moment.

Mr. BERGERON. Do you want me to put that question now?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not want you to; but I am perfectly willing that you should.

Mr. BERGERON. I thought the hon. gentleman wished me to wait until he had finished his sentence. Does the hon. gentleman contend that if the Speaker knew from any member of the House, whether the Premier, or the Minister of Public Works, or the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), that the member for Richelieu had sent in his resignation, and that it was in his mail—does the hon. gentleman contend that when the Speaker upon opening his mail, found that letter there, and when the hon. member for Richelieu asked for that letter, even if he did not speak about the resignation, that the Speaker would be justified in giving back that letter containing the resignation?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Does not the hon. gentleman think it is quite enough for us now to discuss the practical questions before us, without introducing a theoretical question?

Mr. BERGERON. No, that is why we want an investigation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will give the hon. gentleman what, I think, is a complete answer, when I say that no such charge as that the Speaker was so informed by the Minister of Public Works, or by anybody else, is contained in this resolution.

Mr. BERGERON. That makes no difference.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no such allegation made. The hon. gentleman is indulging in a fanciful complaint, he has nothing to base it on at all. Now, this is what I want to lead up to for one moment, before I close the argument that I was presenting to the House. We are bound to assume—
