have placed barbed wire and binder twine on the free list. See how much cheaper farmers will be able to secure these articles because of this. And as drowning men grasp at straws so the Government imagines that this Act will square them with the farmers. Well, as far as binder twine is concerned (Manilla), sold in carload lots f.o.b., at Winnipeg, in 1897, at $6.50 per hundred pounds. It is now worth $7.15 per hundred pounds, or an increase over last year of $1.25. So, I fail to see where the benefit comes in on that article. The hon. member for South Leeds has pointed out that the Government sold the whole output of the binder twine of the Kingston Penitentiary to one of their own political friends, Mr. Hobbs, ex-M.P.P., of London, at 4 cents a pound, and that gentleman has secured the sole agency for American twine as well, thereby cornering it and raising the price to the farmers of Canada. And as for barbed wire every manufacturer of barbed wire in Canada has been compelled to close down business, and the farmers pay just as much for wire as previously. Time will not admit me, Mr. Speaker, to produce all the evidence that can be produced to show how incapable these hon. gentlemen have proved to be, but I think sufficient has been advanced to demonstrate that fact, and, in conclusion, I would commend to hon. gentlemen opposite the following words of Ian MacLaren:—

No party has ever existed in civil history without containing patriotic men, and no party has laboured for the commonwealth without doing it service. Any party that declares itself to have a monopoly of honesty; any party that declares that the other cares only for its interests, but that they alone care for the well-being of the people, is condemned there and then. It ceases to be a party of patriotism; it becomes a party of Pharisaism.

In the light of our experience of these hon. gentlemen during the last few years, after their declarations that the advent of the Liberals to power would mark the end of extravagances and corruption, and the beginning of an era of economy and sound government, the application of these words to them is most appropriate, and I commend them to their earnest consideration, and trust they will result beneficially to the party.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Motion (Mr. Fielding) That the House resolve itself into Committee on Ways and Means, agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

1. That it is expedient to repeal section six of "The Customs Tariff, 1897," and to substitute the following section therefor:—

6. The importation into Canada of any goods enumerated, described or referred to in Schedule "C" to this Act is prohibited; and any such goods imported shall thereby become forfeited to the Crown and may be destroyed or otherwise dealt with as the Minister of Customs may direct; and any person importing any such prohibited goods, or causing or permitting them to be imported, shall for each offence incur a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars.

Mr. WALLACE. In what way does that differ from the last?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The former resolution required the goods to be destroyed. This leaves it to the discretion of the Minister how to deal with it.

Mr. McDUGALL. To what goods does this clause refer?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Anything included in the prohibited list—books that violate the copyright law, &c. Such things had to be destroyed when they came into the hands of the officials, but under this clause the Minister of Customs may deal with them as he deems best.

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. DAVIN. I think we ought now to adjourn.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The understanding was that if the sugar duties were reserved, there was nothing else likely to create debate, but if any hon. gentleman prefers to have a portion left over, I have no objection.

Mr. WALLACE. This second resolution is a very good item to discuss.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I move that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 3.40 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 18th April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. TALBOT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I was very much surprised, in looking over "Hansard" of the 15th, page 3611, to read the following:—

Mr. BEATTIE. I rise to a point of order. There is liquor being drunk in the House by members, and there are members interrupting the speaker, who appear to be intoxicated. That, I say, is out of order.

Mr. FRASER (in the Chair). I am new to this position, but it seems to me that the hon. member who has raised the point of order is bound to name the person to whom he refers.

I had never imagined, Mr. Speaker, for one minute that the remarks of the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie), which I had then allowed to pass as a joke, should be recorded in "Hansard." I had every reason to believe that the hon. member, for whom I have great personal respect, should possess sufficient "gentilhomme" not to allow such a charge against the dignity of the House to go on record. But as this is a charge against the general dignity of the House, I leave the older members to take the matter up.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I quote again "Hansard":

Mr. DAVIN. There he is, Sir, on your right hand.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. DAVIN. I believe it is the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) to whom my hon. friend refers. However, I do not know whether under the influence of beer he is much worse than when in his sober senses. It will be hard to make him much worse than he naturally is.

The member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), whose presence has been inflicted upon this honourable House by the unfortunate casting vote of the returning officer, consequent upon his past record, made against me a personal charge which I should despise as him who made it, were it not that persons who do not know the member for Assiniboia might take advantage of his contemptible—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member should bear in mind that in calling attention to the incident he is referring to, he must be careful not to use unparliamentary language.

Mr. TALBOT. Very well, Mr. Speaker, I ask your protection and the withdrawal of this charge.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is certainly very desirable that any mistake occurring or any misstatement made with regard to an hon. member the other evening charging that liquor was being drunk in this Chamber, should be corrected. That, at any rate, is a matter which, I am sure, the House will be glad to see corrected, as, undoubtedly, it is not the case at all. Some bottles of ginger ale were drunk in the House, but certainly no liquor was passed around. It is quite proper, I am sure, that the statement should be corrected.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Perhaps I may explain. At one o'clock on Saturday morning, or about that hour, many of the members of the House, who had been sitting up for a long time, appeared to be very much tired, and I ordered ginger ale, I may say, all round.

I did not order anything else, and I am quite sure that nothing else was drunk, on this side of the House, at any rate.

Mr. BEATTIE. Being the member who raised the point of order, perhaps a few words from me may not be out of place. On Friday night last, or rather early on Saturday morning, while the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) was addressing this House, several members on the opposite side were making what I considered unbecoming interruptions. On several of the desks there were glasses, and on some of them bottles, and I felt that the stimulants were aiding the interruptions. But, Sir, independent of that, I do not feel that this Chamber should be made a refreshment hall. There is a restaurant in the building which can be used for such purposes, and I felt then and I feel now, that innovations of that kind should not be allowed, no matter to what hour this House should be called upon to sit. I do not wish to pose as an extreme advocate of temperance, nor as a prohibitionist, as I am neither. Had it not been for the uncalled-for interruptions made, I might not have called the attention of the Chair to the point of order. I did not do so for the purpose of making capital out of it.

Mr. DAVIN. As I have been referred to, I wish to say here that my hon. friend (Mr. Beattie) behind me, has given, I think, a historical account of what occurred. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) was sitting somewhere near where the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is sitting now, and certainly my belief then and my belief now—subject, of course, to correction—was that, while the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) and the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) and some others were drinking ginger ale or something like that, the hon. member for Bellechasse had a bottle of Carling's beer. That was my impression, I say, but subject to correction. And, as you know, Mr. Speaker, Carling's beer is a powerful stimulant, and, with certain temperaments it could not fail to be uncondusive to order. I might just mention that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser, Guysborough), who occupied the Chair then, said he could not interfere unless the name was given. I pointed to the fact, palpable to every one, that the hon. member for Bellechasse was imbibing a bottle of Carling's beer in this Chamber.

Mr. TALBOT. I entirely deny the charge, and I desire that every word that has been put on "Hansard" by the hon. gentleman be withdrawn.

Mr. DAVIN. There will be no withdrawal without an investigation. If we have an investigation, bring Mr. Barnett, who is in charge of the restaurant, and I think I will be able to prove that something stronger than ginger ale was drunk on that occasion. I would even express the hope that something stronger was drunk, for it would be an excuse for conduct that would be doubly disgraceful if it emanated from men in their sober senses.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, the question arose at a former sitting of the House, and I cannot interfere in the matter, even if it be desirable to do so. I hope that when an hon. member on the floor of the House makes a statement of fact which certainly was within his own knowledge, every other hon. gentleman will accept it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I was one of the members who was on this side that night, and I took notice of what went on. I say here positively that a bottle—I do not know what it contained—such as Carling's beer is usually put up in, was on the hon. member's desk before our eyes. I pointed it out to a number of hon. gentlemen sitting alongside of me. I do not know what was in the bottle or what was in the glasses. I may say also that there was smoking going on.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do hope, for the credit of this House, that no smoking or drinking, even ginger ale, will be carried on in this House except when an hon. member is making his speech, and he has his glass of water before him. I hope that nothing of that kind, no matter how late the House sits, will occur again.

Mr. McMULLEN. As one who sat on this side that evening and listened to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) almost the whole time he was speaking, I can testify that anything supplied here was pure ginger ale—

Mr. WALLACE. Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. member (Mr. Wallace) may laugh. I beg to tell him that neither he nor any other hon. member can prove either by those who were here or by any person downstairs, that there was a single drop of liquor used. Hon. gentlemen should be careful in making their insinuations. I would not expect anything better from the hon. member for West Assiniboia, but I certainly would from the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). The hon. member for West Assiniboia declares that he saw a bottle containing something of the colour of Carling's beer, and he went on to say that it was well known what the strength of that beer was. I presume that the hon. gentleman is unquestionably a judge of that matter. But I can tell him that there was no Carling's beer on this side of the House. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), in the kindness of his heart, and out of sympathy for members compelled to sit here by the hour and listen to the twaddle and nonsense of the hon. member—

Mr. FOSTER. Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know what reason the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) has to call "order"?

Mr. FOSTER. I may tell you that when you get through.

Mr. McMULLEN. Very well. We had to sit here during these long hours, but the ex-Finance Minister was not here. He does not realize the punishment to which we were subjected. We endured it very patiently. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), out of the goodness of his heart, furnished a little refreshment to members of this House who would take it, and that was supplied by ginger ale and nothing else. I most pointedly and positively deny that there was anything else on this side, and I defy any hon. gentleman on the other side to show that there was. I am surprised that the hon. member for West York should give his sanction to what has been said by the hon. member for West Assiniboia, of whom nothing else could be expected.

Mr. WALLACE. Of course, I am most thankful to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). But I made no remark whatever. I simply laughed when I could not help it, at the statement of the hon. member, but I made no statement myself. When the hon. member said that he sat there for long hours in his place and knew the contents of every bottle that went round that side of the Chamber, he displays a pretty wide acquaintance with other people's business.

Mr. SPEAKER. This discussion is all out of order and should stop now.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the discussion stops, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be allowed a word. I am sure, Sir, that you were not in the Chair when these goings-on took place in the House. I am equally sure that, had you been in the Chair, beer bottles of any kind would not have been sitting on these tables, nor would cigars have been smoked. The only thing I have to regret is that no senior members of the Government were here when such unseemly conduct took place; and the hon. Minister of Public Works seems to have been giving refreshments and helping on the situation. I think it would be well, Mr. Speaker, to take extra care when, owing to circumstances, you do find it impossible to be here to keep order, to leave somebody in the Chair who will.

Mr. FRASER. After the remark of the ex-Minister of Finance, it is necessary to say a word. I happened to be in the Chair at the time referred to. A member of the House came in with a cigar. My attention was called to that, and he immediately stopped, and went out, and there was nothing further. I was in the Chair when as old a parliamentarian, and one that knows as much about Parliament as any hon. gentleman here, was in his place. I mean the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and he ordered and obtained some tea and refreshments. I did not see any difference between sandwiches and ginger ale, and a piece of bread and a cup of tea, none whatever. They may have been out of order, but I did not think so. At any rate, if it was out of order for an hon. gentleman to call for tea, would it be contended for a moment that it would be out of order for an hon. gentleman to take a glass of water with a sandwich in this House, if he was weary? Certainly, I think not. But in any case, when I saw that being done by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in whom I think every hon. gentleman on both sides of the House has confidence, and he did not think it unparliamentary, the covert sneer of the ex-Minister of Finance is hardly worth while.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I happened to be present in the House as a Minister, and I must say I do think that it is unfortunate for the good name of the House that any hon. gentleman should convey the idea that there was any violation of the rules of order in the best sense—certainly that he should convey the impression that there was any intoxicating liquors of any sort used. I heard the hon. the Minister of Public Works, at a very late hour in the night, or rather an early hour in the morning, tell one of the officials to bring him some ginger ale and sandwiches. The bottles were brought up and they were opened here in the presence of the members, who drank the ginger ale and ate the sandwich. Whether that was strictly in accordance with the rules of the House is a matter upon which others better qualified than I am, may speak. But as for the impression sought to be conveyed by anything that has been said here to-day, that intoxicating liquors were brought upon the floor of the House, I have no hesitation in saying there is not a shadow of evidence for it, and I trust that, for the honour and good name of the Canadian Parliament, no member will endeavour to convey that impression.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman could not see through his poll behind him, otherwise he would have known that it was beer.

Mr. BENNETT. I happened to be that night in the Chamber, and I must say that I hardly think hon. gentlemen were acting in an exemplary manner. The fact of the matter was this, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was leading the House, had brought in for him a cup of tea, and I think nobody would have any objection to that. It was done in a decorous and in a gentlemanly manner, and no person made any complaint. However, it was a case of little ones apeing big ones, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce had to be followed. Doubtless it was in recollection of participating in lemonade at circuses.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not make the thing worse than it is by bringing in outside matters. There are no rules of the House that I know of that would prevent an hon. member from bringing into the House one or more bottles of ginger ale. But it is evident that such a practice must give rise to unpleasant scenes, and I have no doubt that it will not occur again.

NICKEL STEEL COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton) moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 96) to incorporate the Nickel Steel Company of Canada.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. At the last sitting of this House, the hon. member made a similar motion, but I objected because the Bill had been so much amended by the Private Bills Committee that it was unfair to expect members of this House to take cognizance of it without having the Bill reprinted. The Bill has since been reprinted, but we only received the copies a few minutes before the opening of the House and have not had time therefore to consider its provisions. This is a Bill to incorporate a company with very extensive powers. It is, in fact, an omnibus Bill which has been so amended by the committee it was referred to that it is almost a new Bill. The company has power to acquire mines, to build railways, establish steamship lines, and so on, with a capital of $20,000,000, and I fail to see in the Bill the clause which the hon. Minister of Railways very properly insisted upon being inserted in every Bill, namely, giving running powers to other railways who want to make use of the tracks which this company may build. I therefore would suggest that the promoter of the Bill should have it referred to the Railway Committee, so that the Railway Committee might assimilate it to the other railway Bills by inserting a provision to cover the omission I have mentioned. If the hon. gentleman would move to refer the Bill to the Committee on Railways and Canals, I think he would be taking the wisest course, and that committee could then put it in the same shape as similar Bills that have passed this House. I believe the hon. Minister of Railways will accept my suggestion.

(The hon. member resumed his seat.)

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I beg to move—

Mr. BENNETT.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has already made a speech. He resumed his seat and gave up his right to the floor, and I cannot allow him to make more than one speech.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I did not give up the floor, Sir. My intention was to move an amendment, but I suggested that the promoter of the Bill should do so himself, and I merely sat down to give him the opportunity of doing so.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman says he sat down for that purpose—

Mr. LaRIVIERE. That was my object. I only sat down to wait for an answer from the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), and not with the intention of giving up the floor or my right to put the motion in case he should not do so.

I now move that you do not now leave the Chair, but that Bill (No. 96) an Act to incorporate the Nickel Steel Company of Canada, as amended by Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways and Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Mr. SCRIVER. I wish to say, as chairman of the committee which reported this Bill, that it was very carefully considered. We held it over at the suggestion of one of the Ministers in order to consider some clauses that seemed somewhat objectionable, and I may say, with reference to the clause conferring railway privileges, that these privileges are confined exclusively to the purposes of the company and limited to furnishing connections from its mines to existing railways or railways that may be built. The clauses were very carefully considered, and it was the opinion, at all events of the majority—indeed of all the members of the committee who were present—that the Bill was, in every respect, a proper one and not likely to trespass on any existing rights whatever.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Bill, I presume, it is generally understood by the House, was not considered by the Railway Committee but the committee of which the hon. gentleman who has just spoken is chairman, and perhaps therefore that portion of it which has reference to the subject of railway construction did not receive the same consideration, and could not be expected to receive the same consideration, as it would have received in the Railway Committee. I have no doubt that the general desire of the House is to give the Bill as favourable consideration as possible.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. And only to perfect it as far as it may seem to need amendment or alteration. I have no hesitation myself in saying that I think the eighth section of the Bill is not just in the form in which it is desirable it should be before becoming law. It will be observed that the eighth clause authorizes the company to construct railways to connect its furnaces with other lines of railway. This is a very large power and is capable of very wide interpretation, and I think that in that respect it would be well to change somewhat the wording of the clause, so as to more properly define the extent to which the company might construct railways. I should think that power to construct the necessary tramways might be sufficient, though perhaps it might be a little difficult to define the difference between tramways and railways. Or if it be made to appear that lines of railway are necessary, let us know just in what direction and to what points they shall be constructed, and no doubt the House will be disposed to confer that power. But I would be decidedly adverse to our making, in a general way, the provisions of the Railway Act applicable to the undertakings of this company, because the Railway Act confers powers of expropriation and other powers which would not be at all applicable to this undertaking, and which it would not be proper for us to invest it with.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would suggest to the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) to let the Bill stand for the present and have it referred to the Railway Committee where we may give attention to the eighth section.

Mr. LARIVIERE. That is my motion.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think it would be well to act on that suggestion, because it would necessarily involve very great delay. Some hon. members conversant with these matters would probably be able to find time to give further consideration to clause 8. If this suggestion were acted upon, no doubt the hon. gentleman would withdraw his motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I made the suggestion because, as the Minister of Railways has raised the question as to whether the granting of large railway powers by this Bill was open to exception. I was under the impression that the rule of the House was, that all measures involving railway matters were referred to the Railway Committee. I think, a shorter plan would be, to refer the Bill to that committee, which would in due course report to the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think, if the Bill had railway construction as its principal object, the remarks of the hon. gentleman would apply, but such work only comes in as a collateral issue. The construction of a tramway would be only incidental to the larger undertaking, and I do not think it is necessary to refer the Bill to the Railway Committee.

Mr. WALLACE. Subsection 9 of the 2nd clause gives powers to construct tramways.

In clause 8 power is taken to construct railways. These different clauses should be made to harmonize, which they do not at the present time. It is the well-understood rule of the House, that Bills for the construction of railways should not come in through any other committee except the Railway Committee, and should not be, as it were, smuggled through another committee when a company is given powers to construct railways. In this instance the Bill, under which the company proposes to build railways or tramways, should be supervised by the Railway Committee. While I say that, so far as I am concerned, I would give the utmost latitude possible to this company, which is undertaking a new enterprise here, and the company should be given the greatest encouragement in their enterprise, because it is not only a new one, but a most important one.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I am glad to hear the statement made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). The Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee does not sometimes allow Bills to be smuggled through.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not mean in that sense; I mean that Railway Bills go through committees other than the Railway Committee.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This Bill did not even slip through; but, as the chairman of the committee explained, it came before the committee in a looser and longer form than it is now, and it was subjected to a great deal of criticism. I criticised nearly every clause, and I called special attention to subsection "f" of section 2, and section 8, which contain clauses relating to the construction of railways. The hon. gentleman has said, and said very properly, that this is a most important enterprise, in which a large amount of capital will be invested, an enterprise which deserves encouragement at the hands of Parliament. I recognized all the arguments that were submitted to the committee, and I pointed out to the promoters of the Bill, that they had better be very careful in regard to the powers asked for, as they were stretching the powers of this Parliament a little too far. The consideration of the Bill was postponed from one meeting to another; on the last occasion, I was not able to be present, not being very well, and the Bill was passed, with powers very much minimized, compared with those asked for. If thought desirable, the Bill might stand for further consideration; but its reference to the Railway Committee would be of no benefit. This Bill is for the purpose of developing mining interests; the promoters intend to invest a large amount of money, and the whole enterprise seems to be bona fide and honest, and one which should receive encouragement at the hands of Parliament. At the same time, I pointed out the great inconvenience which would arise from companies seeking incorporation for the purpose of developing mining interests acquiring power to construct railways, and I pressed on the promoters the advisability of confining their powers with respect to transportation to tramways, which I thought might not be objectionable. However, the promoters thought it essential to have power to build railways. I am the last man to throw an objection in the way, but this question arises: Has this Parliament the power to give authority to construct these lines of railways within a given province, unless this Parliament declares those lines to be constructed for the general benefit of Canada?

An hon. MEMBER. Does not the same objection arise with respect to tramways?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are precedents for granting these powers for the construction of tramways. Tramways do not carry passengers or freight.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend makes a mistake; they carry passengers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I mean, for tolls. The ordinary traffic from the mines to the point of transportation is not freight.

Mr. BERGERON. They also carry passengers. We passed, the other day, a Bill in the Railway Committee for that purpose.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not for tolls, I think. A tramway running from the mines to the place of transportation is very different from a railway as defined under the Railway Act. I call attention to the fact that section 8 asks powers only to connect the different mines by railways, so as to give power of transportation. My own idea is, that these powers ought to be acquired by the company from the province in which the railway is to be situated; but the company thought differently, and they take the risk. Unless the House sees grave objection to section 8, it might be hedged down with more restrictions; but the main point is, whether we have the power to give this right to construct railways in any province. That is the responsibility which meets the promoters at the threshold. The Bill was discussed thoroughly on these lines in the Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not intend to press the view that this Bill should go to the Railway Committee, but the discussion that has taken place shows the danger of departing from well-established rules. This very discussion shows that the Bill should properly have been sent to the Railway Committee. If it had gone through that committee, this discussion would not have taken place, because these clauses would have been considered by the committee specially appointed to consider these matters.

Mr. SCRIVER. The hon. gentleman will permit me to say that it is a Bill that could not be very properly sent to the Railway Committee, because it is not a Bill for the construction of a railway proper; the railway was subsidiary to the main objects of the company.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I understand that the principal objects of the Bill were for other purposes, for developing mines, &c.; but the Bill contains clauses and provides for powers for the construction of railways—powers almost unlimited in their scope, in the opinion of the Minister of Railways himself. We know that Bills do contain provisions for different powers, and are sent to different committees, and the clauses in this Bill that refer to railways should have been sent to the Railway Committee. I would press that view were it not for the fact that the Bill, which is admitted to be of great importance, would be endangered in its passage by any delay, and that I think would be a pity. In consenting to deal with this Bill in the manner suggested by the Minister of Railways, the House should understand that this will not be taken as a precedent, and this very discussion shows the propriety of following more closely the rules of the House in this regard.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to mention that when these Bills are referred to committees, the House has to be guided largely by the title of the Bill, and this was called "An Act to incorporate the Nickel Steel Company of Canada." Of course, prima facie, that Bill would go to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER. More than that, I have instructed the examiner of private Bills to examine every Bill (as I have in the case of several private Bills to-day), and to mark which of the committees, after studying the question, he considers the Bills ought to go to. It was not only on the title of this Bill, but on the recommendation of the examiner of private Bills that this Bill went to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Mr. WALLACE. I should think the House would consent to go into committee on this Bill.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I have no objection to allow the Bill to stand, as has been suggested by the Minister of Railways, but I do object to its going back to the Railway Committee. On account of the congested state of business before that committee at the present time, it may not get through for several weeks and this Bill is one of the utmost importance to the country. It is a Bill that when passed, and the company formed under it, and the work started, will be of immense importance to Canada. Therefore, I feel that if it is allowed to go to the Railway Committee, it will be a large waste of time, and objection may be taken to it there; for the purpose—I will not say of killing the Bill—but I would prefer it to go as the Minister of Railways wishes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The object of this Bill appears to have very general support in the House, and I have not heard yet a reason for supposing there would be any danger to the Bill by observing in its regard the regular rules of the House. If it were made apparent that by this Bill being sent to the committee to which it should have gone, there would be any danger of it not being considered this session, I would be the last to suggest any technical difficulty.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman looks at the Bill, he will see that there is no doubt but that it was referred to the proper committee.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If there is even a reasonable doubt suggested as to what the rules of the House are, that doubt should be removed. I submit that this Bill should have gone originally to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines. Rule 59 deals with these references, and rule 59 is very explicit. Hon. gentlemen have contended that the reference in this Bill to railway powers is a mere accident, but the moment such powers were asked under clause 8, authorizing almost an unlimited construction of railway lines connected with these works, then the Bill should have been submitted to the Railway Committee under the rules of the House. Rule 59 sets out that Bills relating to banks, insurance, trade and commerce, shall be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce; Bills referring to railways, canals, telegraphs and railway bridges to the Committee on Railways and Canals; and Bills not coming under these headings to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills. Under that rule, the moment a Bill asks power for the construction of railways, then it should be referred to the Committee on Railways. I find in Bourinot that in 1891, two Bills respecting a benevolent society were sent first to Private Bills Committee, and subsequently to Banking and Commerce Committee, because they contained provisions affecting insurance. I submit, Sir, that this Bill was not referred to the proper committee, no matter whose mistake it was. The course laid down in Dr. Bourinot's book is as follows:—

Sometimes, when the House discovers that a Bill has been referred to the wrong committee,—

As was the case here.

—or that it can be more conveniently considered by another committee, a motion will be made to discharge the previous order of reference and send it to the proper committee.

I cannot understand why there should be any fear with regard to this Bill. Unless there is a fear grounded on some reason not given, then we should follow the proper course and send the Bill to committee where it can be properly considered. Unless that is going to endanger the Bill going through Parliament this session, I hope the rules of the House will be observed and the Bill sent to the Committee on Railways and Canals. I do not think there is the least danger that all the Bills before that committee or that will come before it next week, will not be considered and go through both Houses this session.

Mr. FOSTER. My opinion coincides entirely with that of the last speaker (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). This Bill is acknowledged by the whole House as being an important Bill, and I have not heard an expression from either side looking towards its defeat.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. I am quite satisfied that there is no such idea on either side of the House. In the case of an important Bill like this where there is without doubt, on the face of it, almost unlimited power of railway building and railway connection asked for, it would be a mistake for us not to put such a Bill before the proper committee, even though it takes a little time. Much better do that than to attempt here in the Committee of the Whole House to do the real work of the Railway Committee. There has been a question raised by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries which is a very important one, and which ought to be discussed by the Railway Committee, and which may be gotten over by some method adopted by that committee and reported to the House. If you look at clause 8 and to the preceding subsection, you will find that there is really no limit to the railway building which may be done. The connection between the furnaces and the works of the company may be very wide; but the connections between the furnaces and the works of the company on the water front are illimitable. They may take in the Pacific Ocean or the Atlantic Ocean. Anyway, they afford an arrangement for almost unlimited railway building. I am satisfied that this Bill will make better progress if it goes to its appropriate committee, and then comes back to this House, than it will by proposing the two clauses in the Committee of the Whole. To save the principle and to expedite the Bill, I would be in favour of that. The mover of the Bill may be assured that no attempt will be made to burk the Bill in the Railway Committee. I am in favour of it, because there is a promise in it of great and important works in this country. Works of that kind will have to compete with equally great and with greater works established in other parts of the world; and I am quite willing to give the company cognate powers as far as I possibly can with those great works with which they will have to compete. But I think my hon. friend will see that the principle for which we are contending is important, and on the ground of expediting the passage of the Bill, I think it should go to the Committee on Railways and Canals, where I am sure it will not meet with any factious opposition.

Mr. SCRIVER. I have no objection to the course suggested by the hon. member who has just spoken or to the course suggested by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair); but I am not willing to admit that the Bill was not properly referred in the first place. Judging by the title of the Bill and by its contents, it was properly referred, and the features of the Bill now under discussion are incidental.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think that the cases cited by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) are at all analagous to the present case. The Bills he refers to were referred to the Private Bills Committee, I do not say by mistake, and they were returned to the House, and then referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee, to which they properly belonged. The present Bill, I think, every hon. member will admit, was referred to the proper committee when it was referred to the Committee on Private Bills; and this clause providing for the building of branch railways for the purposes of the works of the company is merely incidental. There may be an honest difference of opinion as to whether this clause gives too wide powers; but I am satisfied that the intention of the company and the intention of the committee is only that the company shall have power to construct tramways or railways for the purposes of their work. Even if this power were granted, I do not believe they could succeed in raising one dollar for any other purpose. Two or three words in this clause would, however, so limit their powers that all fears might disappear.

Mr. FOSTER. You might do away with your Railway Committee. The trouble is in letting in a precedent on so important a case.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The hon. gentleman seems to think that this Bill should have been referred to the Railway Committee. But according to the rule and practice a Bill for the purposes for which this company are to be incorporated, properly belongs to the Private Bills Committee.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The rule says that if it relates to a railway, it must go to the Railway Committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the main object of the Bill is to build a railway, there is no doubt that is so. But we have passed many Bills containing incidental clauses giving power to build wharfs and tramways to other railways, and so on. In this case, I do not think there is any intention to do anything else, and as the Bill has gone so far, I would suggest to my hon. friend, who says that he has no objection to the Bill on its merits, that it be allowed to stand till the next meeting of the House when private Bills shall be considered; and then, if the words suggested by the hon. Minister of Railways and others are not sufficient, it could again be discussed. I am satisfied that two or three words to limit the powers of the company would be sufficient to meet the views of the hon. gentleman who has moved this amendment, as he has no intention at all to place the promoters of the Bill in danger of losing the legislation they require.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would not the adoption of that suggestion be attended with greater delay? Because it is not unlikely that the result of the discussion of this matter by two or three or half a dozen hon. gentlemen would leave the question still open, and we would then be practically where we are now; whereas if the Bill goes to the committee, it will go where every point can be dealt with in a more convenient way. I think the course suggested on this side of the House is the more expeditious one.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). As a member of the Private Bills Committee, I think that the hon. member for Pictou is putting a forced construction on the rule. He must read the rule as if it meant this, that if there is any reference in a Bill to a railway, it shall go to the Railway Committee.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If it relates to a railway.

Mr. FRASER. That must mean if it is a Bill relating to a railway, and that is the primary object of it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It does not say so.

Mr. FRASER. That is the common-sense meaning; otherwise it would mean that if there is any reference at all in a Bill to a railway, it must go to that committee. Here is the difficulty: If this Bill went to the Railway Committee, and came back here, the objection might be taken that this House should not deal with it because it should have gone to the Private Bills Committee. Therefore we would have the two committees dealing with the Bill at the same time—one dealing with the part relating to railways incidentally, and the other dealing with the rest of the Bill. Now that the mover of the Bill has accepted the suggestion, I think it would be well, in the present congested state of business in the Railway Committee, to let the Bill rest where it is, and we will reach it all the sooner. When a company of this character asks this House to give them the right of having communication with their mines, I think they ought to get it. I admit that this House ought to say that they should not carry passengers; but if it is simply for the purpose of carrying their ore from the mines to the smelter, or carrying anything else they need in their business, they should be given that right. They do not interfere with any law relating to railways. Why should they be asked to go again and seek powers from the Railway Committee to do that which we can grant them now, without interfering with the general railway law?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). In view of the fact that hon. gentlemen on both sides have expressed their willingness to see that this Bill shall go through at the earliest possible moment, I have no objection to refer it to the Railway Committee, if the hon. gentleman will withdraw his resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to refer the Bill to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I understand that my hon. friend wishes me to withdraw this amendment in order that he may make the motion himself to refer it to the Railway Committee?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Hamilton cannot do that because he has put a motion in my hands that I do now leave the Chair.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. In that case then I shall persist in my amendment.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill referred to Committee on Railways, &c.

MILES CANON AND WHITE HORSE TRAMWAY COMPANY.

The House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 35) to incorporate the Miles Cañon and White Horse Tramway Company.—(Mr. Bostock.)

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bostock), who is promoting this Bill, to the fact that section 9 has been struck out. This section provides that the Railway Act shall apply to the company and its undertakings. Is there any clause provided under which the Governor in Council will have supervision of rates? If not, I should object very much to the striking out of that clause.

Mr. BOSTOCK. There is a clause, 11a, that gives power to the Governor General to regulate the tolls.

On section 11a,

Mr. FOSTER. Does that allow the Governor General in Council to vary the tolls fixed by the directors? Has the Governor General in Council any power under that clause other than simply to say whether these charges thus fixed shall be in force or not? It does not seem to me that it is a very flexible clause.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is the same in effect, I think, as the general Railway Act. It is a mere question of submitting a tariff that meets approval or not. If it does not meet approval, it cannot go into effect, and they cannot collect.

On section 11c,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Was there any particular object in omitting from this Bill the clause which was inserted in a similar Bill, No. 23, which we have just considered? Such section applies to the clauses of the Railway Act. A somewhat similar clause was struck out in this Bill, and this is hardly made up for by the amendment which deals only with the question of tolls. In this Bill 35, section 9 was struck out, which was similar to section 11 which remains in the other Bill—the usual clause making the Railway Act apply, except so far as it is changed by the Bill.

Mr. BOSTOCK. I understand, that as this company do not propose to build any branch lines, it is not necessary for the clause to be inserted. That is the reason it was struck out by the Railway Committee.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It does not relate to the construction of branch lines, but to the application of the Railway Act. Here we have two Bills providing for similar works in about the same territory, and in one case it is provided that the Railway Act shall apply except where there is an express change made by this Bill. The other strikes out that clause altogether, and thus the Railway Act is not made applicable in express terms.

Mr. BOSTOCK. But the clause was passed making the Companies' Clauses Act apply to the company, and this clause referring to the Railway Act was struck out.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, but why was it struck out in one Bill and not in the other? The Companies' Act has nothing to do with it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will notice that an amended clause was put in this Bill—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is as to tolls.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; it covers everything, I think. The whole undertaking, as I understand, was an undertaking to build a tramway, and there were no branch lines, and so on, and it was thought better that this clause should be struck out.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). There is no public reason why the Railway Act should apply.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I suppose it was left out on the ground that a tramway was not a railway.

Bill reported, and read the third time, and passed.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 46) an Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

(In the Committee.)

On subsection 4a,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On the point about the notice, it seems to me just as well that that amendment to the Bill should be dropped. I could understand if notice was given in a newspaper in the district where the railway was to be built, or this roadway and tramway was to be built, as well as in the "Gazette," as, for instance, in the case of an application to Parliament, where the notice is not confined to the "Gazette," that reaches very few. The two things have always gone together in applications of this kind, a newspaper publication as well as publication in the "Gazette." The "Gazette" is very formal, and does not amount to much, and I should think if it were deemed necessary to give notice in the locality affected, it is hardly necessary to put that notice in the "Gazette." My point is that to make that effective, there ought to be more than a "Gazette" notice.

Mr. FOSTER. Two months notice in the nearest newspaper.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the opinion of the committee was that this extension of the line should be the only thing which should affect the other companies that were operating railways in the immediate neighbourhood. There would be no popular objection, it could only be where there was some interest going to be interfered with by the construction of the additional line. Therefore the insertion of an advertisement in the local papers would not really seem to be necessary when it provided that the persons who are really interested in being heard before the Governor in Council should have notice that such an application is being made. I think that covers the ground the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) referred to. It was considered by the committee, and that was the conclusion arrived at.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then I would say that would be sufficient, but when it was suggested that notice should go in the "Gazette," it seemed to me the desire was to notify the public. The Minister says the idea was rather that the public would not be endangered and could have no objection, but some other vested interest, such as a railway company, might alone be concerned. Well, notice to that company, it seems to me, would be sufficient. My point is that if it is necessary to put a notice in the "Gazette," it has always been considered necessary also to give popular notice in the nearest newspaper.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think myself it was not necessary to strike out the clause relating to publication in the "Gazette," and I intimated to the gentlemen who were promoting the Bill that they ought to have a clause requiring such notice to be given. They drafted it with a publication in the "Gazette." Then I suggested that that might not come to the notice of the interests which were concerned, and that they had better add a requirement to give a written notice to the other railway companies who were operating lines of railway in the locality, or in the vicinity, so that it would be brought to their individual attention. I have no doubt the Governor General in Council will require evidence that these parties have had notice of this application before they deal with it, so that every interest may be adequately protected.

Bill reported, and read the third time, and passed.

NORTH SHORE OF LAKE HURON— POUND-NET LICENSES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

(a.) What application, if any, for licenses for pound-nets in waters east of an imaginary line drawn from Cape Hurd, on the Bruce Peninsula, to a point at or near Spanish River, on the north shore of Lake Huron, have been received, and whose applications, if any, have been granted for these waters?

(b.) When were such licenses first granted, if at all, in such waters?

(c.) Were any, and if so, how many, and in what years, pound-net licenses for these waters granted between 1878 and 1896?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). (a) Applications were received from Larry King and John Sullivan for pound-net licenses, east of an imaginary line from Cape Hurd to the mouth of the Spanish River, and licenses have been granted to these parties. (b) In 1897. (c) Previous to 1885, pound-net licenses were granted east of the line above referred to, but it would be impossible to supply a correct statement of these, owing to the loss of the records during the fire, last year.

WILLIAM BAXTER, LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER.

Mr. BENNETT asked,

1. Is William Baxter keeper of the Gin Rock lighthouse, Georgian Bay?

2. If said William Baxter is now keeper of said lighthouse, was he, in the year 1895 or 1896, fined by Fishery Inspector F. J. Smith $50 for illegally fishing with nets and harbouring persons in said lighthouse and engaging with them in such illegal fishing?

3. If there was such conviction of said Baxter, is it intended to retain said Baxter in his said position?

4. Was there an investigation?

5. Who is now fishery officer in charge of Charleston Lake?

6. Who recommended the dismissal of Mr. Hicks?

7. Who recommended his successor?

8. Did the Minister of Marine and Fisheries promise this House that no officer in his department would be dismissed without an investigation?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Mr. Hicks was appointed fishery overseer in January, 1890. 2. Yes. 3. Yes. The charge was inability to attend to his duties on account of old age, and alleged gross mismanagement of his district. 4. There was no investigation. 5. S. Y. Bullis, Athens, Ont. 6. PAYMENTS TO UNITED COUNTIES RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Monk) asked,

1. What is the total amount of subsidies paid to the United Counties Railway Company, under the Act 57-58 Vic., chap. 4?

2. When, to whom, and in what manner, was the last payment made?

3. Is there any amount whatsoever still due to the said company under the Act aforesaid?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The total amount of subsidies paid to the United Counties Railway, under the Act 57-58 Vic., chapter 4, is $95,680. The last payment was made on the 27th October, 1897, by cheque, in favour of the Bank of St. Hyacinthe, attorney for the United Counties Railway. There is an amount of $1,488 due, a cheque for which is about to be issued to the Bank of St.

Hyacinthe, attorney for the United Counties Railway.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—HORSE KILLED.

Mr. GAUVREAU (by Mr. McGregor) asked,

Whether the Government is aware : 1. That a horse belonging to Madame Charron, a widow, of Isle Verte, in the county of Témiscouata, was killed by a train on the Intercolonial Railway, last fall ?

2. That it was proved at the investigation that the gates, where the horse was killed, opened towards the railway, instead of opening towards the farm, which is contrary to the dictates of prudence ?

3. If so, is it the intention of the Government to pay Madame Charron's claim ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The Government believe it to be true that a horse belonging to Madame Charron, a widow, of Isle Verte, was killed by a train on the Intercolonial Railway last fall, and the matter was investigated. 2. It is believed, at the time of the accident the gates were hung so as to open towards the railway. I will have to ask the hon. gentleman to drop the last clause of question No. 2, as it would not be well to make any admission of the kind referred to. 3. Up to the present, it has not been made clear that the accident was due to negligence on the part of the railway employees, and the Government has not, therefore, decided to pay the claim

SALE OF GOVERNMENT BINDER TWINE.

Mr. TAYLOR (by Mr. Mills) asked,

Has the Government sold, or agreed to sell, the binder twine manufactured and to be manufactured in the Kingston Penitentiary for this season ? If sold, to whom, and at what prices for the different brands ? Was it sold by tender ? Were tenders called by public advertisement ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). No arrangement has yet been completed for the disposal of the output for the current year, but tenders have been called for by circulars and are now under consideration of the department.

IMPORTATION OF CORN.

Mr. TAYLOR (by Mr. Mills) asked,

What quantity of corn has been imported into Canada for home consumption since the 1st of July, 1897, to the 1st of April, 1898 ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The information required under this inquiry cannot be furnished for at least a month without communicating specially with the customs ports. The quarterly returns of imports for the quarter ending 31st
Mr. BLAIR.

March, 1898, have yet to be received from sixty-six ports and it is not expected that they will all be received before a month from now.

INSPECTION OF ASHES.

Mr. PREFONTAINE asked,

Has the Government the intention to render compulsory the inspection of ashes as the only means of assuring to the purchaser reliable and uniform grades thereof, which assurance the Board of Trade of Montreal has declared to be absolutely necessary to the continued existence of the trade in pot and pearls ashes by resolution dated the 13th February, 1896 ?

Mr. SPEAKER. This question and question No. 14, under the name of Mr. Marcotte, contain statements of fact, which may or may not be disputed.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). I have the answer to this question : The Government appreciates the importance of the question, which is now under consideration.

IMPORTATION OF CORN INTO MANI- TOBA.

Mr. ROCHE asked,

What number of bushels of foreign corn were imported into the province of Manitoba between 1st July and 31st December, 1897 ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 183,175 bushels.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Monk) asked,

1. Whether in pursuance of the promise made by the hon. the Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Public Works to the members for Berthier and Champlain, in the fall session of 1896, the Government have provided for the adoption of means to prevent inundations on the St. Lawrence River caused by the damming of the ice ?

2. Have surveys been made ?

3. What has been the result of such surveys ?

4. Have the Government come to any decision in the matter ?

5. If nothing has been done, what is the reason ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The department is now having made a complete survey of the River St. Lawrence and, when that survey will have been completed, the Minister will be in a better position to answer the question of the hon. gentleman.

VALUATOR OF ROCKLIFFE RIFLE RANGES.

Mr. BENNETT asked,

What are the special qualifications of Mr. E. Wallace, who has been appointed to value lands to be purchased for Rockliffe rifle ranges, to fit him for such duty ?

What is or has been Mr. Wallace's occupation up to the present time ?

Has he ever been employed by the Government for purposes of valuing lands or otherwise heretofore ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Mr. E. Wallace is an ex-alderman of this city. He was alderman for several years. He is an owner of real estate in Ottawa and vicinity. He is agent for a loan company, and has been valuator for two or three years for two building societies. His occupation is real estate dealer. As Mr. Wallace is a Liberal in politics, he has never before been employed by the Government.

CLAIM OF J. P. O. ALLAIRE.

Mr. LaRIVIERE asked,

Is it the intention of the Government to put into the Supplementary Estimates a sum of $296 to pay the claim of J. P. O. Allaire, of St. Boniface, ex-chief inspector of licenses appointed under the provisions of the Act commonly known as the "McCarthy Act," as the same appears in a return dated 24th February, 1896, Sessional Paper No. 52 of the session of that year ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). The matter is under consideration.

GOVERNMENT BLACKSMITH AT GRAND NARROWS, C.B.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked,

1. What was the reason for dismissing the blacksmith employed in the Government forge and railway bridge at Grand Narrows, Cape Breton ?

2. Who asked the dismissal ?

3. Was there an investigation ; if so, before whom ?

4. Who gave evidence against the dismissed man ?

5. Who was appointed in place of the dismissed man ?

6. By whom recommended ?

7. Is he doing the same work as the man who was dismissed was, and is he capable of so doing ?

He said : I find that one of my questions is omitted : Is he a blacksmith ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I may say that I have not information on that point ; but I presume he is. My answer to the other parts of the question is : R. McNeil, bridge-tender and blacksmith at Grand Narrows, C.B., was dismissed for political interference. There was an investigation held by Mr. John T. Ross. J. J. McKinnon was appointed in his place. He was recommended by persons in whom the department has entire confidence. He is doing satisfactorily the same work as McNeil was doing.

HARBOUR MASTER AT MIDLAND, ONT.

Mr. BENNETT asked,

1. Is John White harbour master at Midland, Ont. ?

2. When was he appointed ?

3. What are his duties ?

4. What is his salary ?

5. What amount of harbour dues has he returned to the department, if any, collected by him ?

6. Is it intended to continue the office ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Yes. 2. By Order in Council of the 13th July, 1897. 3. To carry out provisions of Harbour Masters' Act. 4. $200 per annum, payable out of fees collected. 5. $93.50. 6. Yes.

TOUSSAINT BOYER, LOCKMASTER ON BEAUHARNOIS CANAL.

Mr. BERGERON asked,

1. Has Toussaint Boyer, lockmaster on the Beauharnois Canal, been discharged ?

2. If so, for what reason ?

3. Has a successor been appointed ?

4. Who is to act in his place ?

5. By whom has Boyer's successor been recommended ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Toussaint Boyer, lockmaster on the Beauharnois Canal, was dismissed, because he took an active and offensive part in the recent elections. Sévère Leduc, of St. Timothée, has been appointed in Toussaint Boyer's place. He was recommended by persons in whom the department has confidence.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT BERTHIER.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL (by Mr. McGregor) asked,

1. Has the Government acquired any real estate in the town of Berthier for the purpose of establishing thereon a post office or other public offices ?

2. If so, when was it acquired ? From whom ? What price has been paid or agreed upon ?

3. Is the real estate acquired provided with the necessary buildings for establishing a post office, and in such case what amount would require to be expended for repairs and the establishing of the office ?

4. Is the real estate acquired under lease or otherwise ; if under lease, how many years has it to run ? What is the annual rent or interest, and what is the amount of the capital which it represents ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). To the first question the answer is no, but steps are now being taken for such acquisition. The other questions I cannot answer just now.

B. C. ALIEN LABOUR ACT.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Allen Labour Act, 1897, passed by the legislature of British Columbia, but in regard to which the Royal assent was reserved by the Lieutenant-Governor of the province?

2. Is the opinion of the law officers in favour of or against the right of the legislature to pass said Act?

3. Has any communication been sent to the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia in regard to this Act? If so, what is the tenor of such communication?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. The Governor in Council has decided not to take any action in the matter. 2. This is not a question which it is incumbent upon the law officers to answer. 3. The Lieutenant-Governor has been informed that His Excellency the Governor General does not propose to take any action with respect to the said legislation.

IMPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. MILLS asked,

1. What is the value of dutiable articles entered for consumption into Canada from the United States, in the nine months ending 31st March, 1897; also, for the nine months ending 31st March, 1898?

2. What value of free goods was entered from the United States in the above-mentioned respective periods?

3. What is the value of goods entered duty free from Great Britain in the above two periods?

4. What is the value of dutiable goods entered from Great Britain in the above two periods?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Inasmuch as the quarterly returns of imports for the quarter ending 31st March, 1898, have not all been received from the ports yet, the information required under this inquiry cannot be furnished at present. Such quarterly returns have yet to be received from sixty-six ports and it is not expected that they will all be in before at least a month from now. The monthly returns do not show the imports by countries.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE HOLY SEE.

Mr. McDOUGALL moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, letters, memorials, documents, &c., forwarded to the Holy See, Signed by the Hon. Israel Tarte, a member of the Government, or by any member of the Government, and forty-four or any other number of members of the Senate and House of Commons, and referred to on several occasions by the hon. the Minister of Public Works in the House of Commons during the session of 1897, and of all answers thereto received, directly or indirectly, by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, the hon. Minister of Public Works, the hon. Solicitor General, or any other member of the Government.—(Mr. McDougall.)

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Stand.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not propose to discuss this motion. Do I understand a member of the Government to say that he wishes it to stand?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman could not have misunderstood.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Of course we have stated on more than one occasion, that hon. gentlemen must recollect in regard to all motions of this class that confidential correspondence and communications cannot be brought down.

Mr. McLENNAN. In any case I would wish to make a few observations with regard to this question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion stands.

DISMISSAL OF ALBERT GODBOUT.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) moved for:

Copies of all Orders in Council, complaints, instructions, depositions of witnesses, reports, petitions, correspondence and documents in relation to the dismissal of Albert Godbout as postmaster at Ste. Anne de Beaupré, county of Montmorency.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) requested me to ask that all these notices regarding his department be allowed to stand.

Mr. BERGERON. Why?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know why.

Mr. BERGERON. This is only a motion for papers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. Postmaster General requested me that he would like to have these notices stand.

Mr. BERGERON. I move that this notice be dropped. We can bring the matter up in Supply.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion stands.

OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL.

Mr. BELCOURT moved:

That a select committee of the House be appointed to act conjointly with the select committee appointed by the Senate of Canada to investigate and report upon the feasibility of, and the advantages which would accrue to the Dominion from the construction of a canal uniting the waters of Lake Huron with those of the St. Lawrence via the Ottawa River, said committee to consist of Messieurs Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, R. Préfontaine, R. W. Jameson, J. A. Macdonell, T. B. Flint, W. J. Poupore, Geo. McInerney, Angus McLennan, H. A. Powell, J. V. Ellis, John Yeo, A. Martin, G. E. Casey, W. Hutchison, W. T. Hodgins, A. McNeill, T.

H. MacPherson, A. E. Dymont, Thos. Mackie, B. Rosamond, J. G. H. Bergeron, R. Lemieux, M. J. F. Quinn, T. G. Roddick, N. F. Davin, J. A. C. Madore, A. Malouin, P. A. Choquette, W. C. Edwards, G. R. Maxwell, A. C. LaRivière, J. H. N. Bourassa, L. N. Champagne, Thos. Fortin, and the mover; with power to send for papers, persons and records and to employ such persons as the committee may deem necessary for the purposes of the investigation, and to report from time to time.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Mr. BELCOURT. Inasmuch as the rule of the House is that only fifteen members are allowed to be appointed on such a committee as this, I would ask to amend the order by adding the words in the fifth line: "Notwithstanding any rule of this House to the contrary."

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I would like to adopt my hon. friend (Mr. Belcourt's) amendment, but I am afraid this notice of motion must be allowed to stand.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion stands.

(a.) The appointment or reinstatement since the first day of August, 1896, to any office or position in the service of Her Majesty, in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, of all persons who previously to that date had been dismissed for alleged incapacity or for alleged neglect of duty, disobedience of orders or regulations, breach of discipline or other alleged misconduct, from the service of Her Majesty in connection with the Intercolonial Railway;

(b.) The previous dismissal as aforesaid of any such person or persons or the cause of said dismissal;

(c.) The grounds or cause of said subsequent appointment or reinstatement as aforesaid. Also, a list of all persons so reappointed or reinstated as aforesaid, after having been so previously dismissed.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion stands.

Mr. BELCOURT moved for:

Return giving: (a.) The names and offices or employment of all persons employed temporarily or permanently in the various departments in and about the Parliamentary and all Governmental buildings at the city of Ottawa, relieved from duty by the Government, by dismissal or otherwise, from the 17th day of October, 1878, to the 1st day of November, 1879; (b.) The cause of dismissal, if any; (c.) The names of all new employees appointed, whether permanently or temporarily, between the same dates.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Mr. POWELL. I wish to discuss that.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion stands.

DISMISSAL OF RODERICK FERGUSON.

Mr. GILLIES (by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, inspectors' reports and all documents respecting the dismissal of Roderick Ferguson, late postmaster at Lower L'Ardoise, Richmond county, and the removal of the post office to the store of Joseph Matheson, late M.P.P. for the said county of Richmond; also, copies of all letters recommending Daniel K. Matheson as successor to Mr. Ferguson; also, copy of the writ of summons issued out of the Supreme Court of the province of Nova Scotia against the said Daniel K. Matheson for corrupt practices in the general local election of the year 1894; also, copy of the judgment of Mr. Justice Henry, dated 3rd July, 1895, condemning the said Daniel K. Matheson, the present postmaster at Lower L'Ardoise, in a penalty of $400 and costs for corrupt acts committed by him in said election, and of which he was found guilty by the judgment of the said Mr. Justice Henry, one of the Supreme Court judges for the province of Nova Scotia.—(Mr. Gillies.)

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I must ask my hon. friend to allow that to stand, as my hon. friend the Postmaster General expressly asked me.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think he meant that one.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He did not make any exception. He asked me as a favour to see that none of those was moved.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion stands.

DEATH OF EMPLOYEES ON CROW'S NEST PASS RAILWAY.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) moved for:

Return of all correspondence, letters, telegrams or reports in possession of the Government in connection with the death from diphtheria of Macdonald and Fraser, who contracted the disease when employed on the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway; also, with the holding of an inquest on bodies of said Macdonald and Fraser, and the adjournment of said inquest, and issuing of an injunction to prevent Coroner Mead, of Pincher Creek, from proceeding with such adjourned inquest.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I am afraid the hon. gentleman will hardly get that by an order of the House. An inquest was not held, if I understand aright—I am speaking with some misgivings on the point—by order of any Government official, but by local officials. That would have to be obtained.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As a matter of fact, they are in the Department of Justice now.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. All right.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF A. H. HARRIS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for :

Copies of Order in Council, commission, appointment and instructions relating to A. H. Harris, Esq., traffic manager of the Intercolonial Railway.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that no commission was issued in that case, and there was no Order in Council. He was just appointed in the usual way, by a letter of instructions.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The order could go in that way.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. As long as that is understood.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF JOHN F. TENNANT.

Mr. QUINN. Mr Speaker, it is now ten minutes to 6 o'clock, and ten minutes will hardly be sufficient for me to speak on the motion in my name on the Order paper.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) A good deal can be said in ten minutes.

Mr. QUINN. I beg to move, Mr. Speaker, for :

Copies of all papers in connection with the dismissal of John F. Tennant, late collector of customs at Gretna, Manitoba.

I wish to draw the attention of the House to the circumstances surrounding the dismissal of Mr. Tennant, and to draw the attention of the Government in the most formal manner possible to what I consider the great injustice ; nay, the outrage, that has been committed in this case, in the name of the Department of Customs of Canada. In an article in the "Nor'Wester," a paper published in Winnipeg, the career of Mr. Tennant is placed before the public, and under the heading, "A victim of spite," that paper says :

A VICTIM OF SPITE.

The axe is still falling on the necks of the civil servants. One of the recent dismissals is of a particularly scandalous character. That is the dismissal of Mr. Tennant, of Gretna, from his position of customs officer at that port. Mr. Tennant has held that position for nine years, during which period he has earned the highest commendation from his superior officers for the manner in which he has performed his duties. He has been in the Government service some twenty years altogether, having been employed in the international boundary survey, in the Dominion land guide service, and on the frontier in the customs service. He is an "old timer" in Manitoba, having come here in the Wolseley expedition of 1870. Mr. Tennant has been dismissed without even the farce of a commission of investigation. The reason for his dismissal is "partisanship," but Mr. Tennant is able to show that he did not take any part at all in the Dominion campaign. The real reason of his dismissal is that he attended a meeting during the provincial elections, and being appealed to as to the correctness of certain charges by Attorney General Cameron against the Roman Catholics, demonstrated the Attorney General to have been guilty of a falsehood. For this, the Attorney General has been seeking vengeance against Mr. Tennant, and he has now secured the gratification of his animosity. It is indecent that old and faithful public servants should be thrown out of employment on such pretexts. The dismissal has aroused the indignation of a number of prominent Grits who are Mr. Tennant's personal friends ; and if Mr. Laurier is wise he will require the Controller of Customs to reconsider the case.

My object in reading this paragraph is to draw the attention of the House to the creditable record of Mr. Tennant. He went to the North-west with the Wolseley expedition in 1870 and he has been honourably serving his country in different capacities since that time. Mr. Tennant has established a character for bravery and courage unequalled by any man in the North-west Territories. After a number of years he obtained a small position in the Government service and eventually was appointed deputy collector at the port of entry at Gretna. Mr. Tennant is the son of a British soldier ; he himself has fought for his country, and in his old age he certainly deserved something better than that his official head should be chopped off on the report of some irresponsible person who never occupied any position in this House, and whose recommendation should not have any weight with the head of the Customs Department. Mr. Tennant was first notified of his dismissal in the following bald letter from the Customs Department, dated the 6th May, 1897 :—

Ottawa, 6th May, 1897.

Joseph Tennant, Esq.,
Gretna, Man.

Sir,—I have it in command to acquaint you that His Excellency the Governor General in Council has been pleased to order that your services as sub-collector of customs at the outport of Gretna, under the survey of the port of Winnipeg, Man., be dispensed with, the Order in Council being dated 9th April, 1897.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) JOHN McDOUGALD.

Commissioner of Customs.

Through the Collector at Winnipeg, Man.

Here we see that no reason is given for dispensing with Mr. Tennant's services, and so this gentleman who for over nine years occupied the position of deputy collector was dismissed without any reason being assigned. He naturally inquired what was the cause of his dismissal, and he was first told that he had interfered in the election against an hon. member of this House ; I think the hon. member for Winnipeg.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Lisgar.

Mr. QUINN. Very well. On receipt of this information Mr. Tennant, I think, proved to the satisfaction of that hon. gentleman, if not at any rate to the satisfaction of any unprejudiced judge, that he did not interfere in this election in any manner whatever. Then another reason for his dismissal was given and he was told that he had deserted his office on several occasions, and particularly on election day, and allowed it to be taken charge of by one of the customs officers of the United States. Mr. Tennant at once forwarded a statutory declaration disproving this charge, and then another charge was made, namely, the one referred to in the article which I have read in the "Nor'Wester." Now, Mr. Tennant explained this charge and he proved conclusively that the Attorney General of Manitoba had used language not only unfit for a public man—

Mr. WALLACE. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) permit me to ask him, whether that was the present Attorney General of Manitoba or a past Attorney General ?

Mr. QUINN. The present Attorney General ; Cameron is his name. I say he used language not only unfit for a man occupying any public position in this country, but unfit for a man who wished to be called a Canadian. The Attorney General of Manitoba spoke on a public platform, as I am informed, stating that it was impossible for any man to be a loyal Canadian and to be a Roman Catholic. It is further asserted that Mr. Cameron stated particularly, that it was impossible for any man to be a loyal subject of Her Majesty and to advocate in any way the existence of separate schools in Manitoba. Now, Mr. Tennant who heard this charge at a meeting held in the interests of one of the candidates for the local legislature, necessarily felt wounded; he a man who had served Her Majesty in the army; he who had sacrificed his liberty and even his blood in proof of his loyalty to his Queen and country. It was natural that such a man should resent that insult and Mr. Tennant did so. He did so to the satisfaction of the audience present, and he did so to the great discomfiture of the Attorney General who made the charge. This was the last ditch for the Minister of Customs; for this was the only charge that could be proven against Mr. Tennant. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say, in the first place, that such a charge is not one that should be entertained by any Minister of the Crown for the purpose of dismissing a Dominion public servant, and that, no matter what the charge might have been, it is not only fair and even-handed justice, but it is in accordance with the principles laid down by the right hon. leader of this Government and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, about a year ago, that no officer occupying the position that Mr. Tennant occupied should be dismissed without having had the benefit of an inquiry and been given an opportunity to defend himself.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SAFETY OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES AND PASSENGERS.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 4) further to secure the safety of railway employees and passengers.—(Mr. Casey.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I am sorry that we have not a larger committee present to consider this Bill, although I recognize that it has been already before a very competent committee and has been reported on favourably. That committee sat last year and heard evidence upon the general subject. It took the testimony of gentlemen connected with railways, and I have no doubt gave the Bill every consideration, but while that was the case, I think it is to be regretted that we have not the benefit of the opinions and judgments of a larger number of members of this House, so that we may be sure to pass a Bill which has been thoroughly considered on all sides and to which the judgment of the members of this House has been generally applied. I am in entire sympathy with any measure which has for its object the safety and protection of the employees upon our railways, and under existing conditions, perhaps, that safety is not as well secured as it is desirable it should be. But I am afraid that in adopting these somewhat stringent provisions, imposing these duties upon railway companies generally, we may be placing obstacles in the way of a number of the smaller railways and branch lines, which are not able to equip themselves up to the standard required under this Bill. The effect may be, therefore, to prevent their running at all, and it is important that we should realize that if the law is to be enforced, as it now stands, it may have the effect of actually preventing the running of many railways which are very useful and necessary, which have small capital and limited means and find it quite up to their present capacity to run their roads as the law now requires. Before requiring an expensive equipment, we must contemplate the possibility that we may thereby shut down some of these many smaller railways; while I am not prepared at this moment to say that the Bill as proposed by my hon. friend, or at least the earlier sections of it, should not be enacted, and while, at the same time, I would be very adverse either to our casting upon the Governor in Council, or the Railway Committee any additional duties to those now imposed upon them, yet it does seem to me just possible, in the interests of these many railways, and without any real prejudice to life and safety or security of railway employees, that exception should be made from the operation of the Bill in those cases in which it is not found possible for railway companies, owning and operating small lines, to equip themselves as this Bill requires them to do. In the case of the Grand Trunk Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway and Canada Southern and some other wealthier corporations, there would be no difficulty in their complying with this Bill, but there occurs to my mind a number of very useful small railways in the maritime provinces, which will have to shut down if required to comply with this Bill, unless possibly it be found that the section we are now considering does not, after all, mean very much, and that these smaller companies may become possessed of second-class or other old cars and run them upon their roads, and by so doing not subject themselves to any of the penalties imposed in this Bill.

Mr. CASEY. There is nothing costly in these provisions at all.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They are required to build cars of a certain standard and with certain appliances. Possibly these things may not be expensive. I have no means for forming a judgment upon that, but it occurs to me that there is just the danger that we may be placing obstacles in the way of small railways, which have all the difficulties now to overcome that they are capable of meeting successfully.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman is no doubt quite right in his reference to the smallness of this committee, which is called upon to pronounce on this important Bill; but according to the evidence submitted to the special committee last year, the railway employees did not object so much to the trunk lines as to the smaller lines. They held that the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canada Southern, and, I believe, the Intercolonial have endeavoured, as far as their means would allow, to have the improvements on the rolling stock made as fast as possible, but the railway employees found that the smaller railway lines did not, in any sense, try to have their rolling stock made so as to prevent accidents to employees. That was the chief objection they raised, and that was the reason they wanted this Bill passed. The trunk lines have complied with this pretty well, though the Canadian Pacific Railway have, I believe, some objection to the outside ladders. They think the end ladders are sufficient, but the Canada Southern have both the outside and end ladders in use. It is chiefly to compel the smaller roads to use these ladders that this Bill is intended. They would not suffer by it, because they have only, in some cases, three or four cars, and it will be no hardship at all to them to comply with it.

Mr. ELLIS. While I am in favour of the Bill generally, yet I think there was an understanding last year in the committee that it would not be so rigid as to apply to the smaller roads to which the hon. Minister of Railways refers. I recollect the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), who is now not in his seat, and who took a great deal of interest in the proceedings, having been a constant attendant at the committee, took special objection to the application of the rigid regulations of the Bill to some of these smaller roads in the province of New Brunswick. I think the Bill is really a little more stringent with regard to these roads than I thought the hon. gentleman would have made it, having in view the evidence taken by the committee.

Mr. CASEY. I think that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways has had his fears a little too much aroused on behalf of the smaller railway companies. That question was fought out pretty thoroughly in the committee. The smaller railway companies of the maritime provinces had their representative there and put in a written statement. I have forgotten the gentleman's name, but my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis) was there, and, I doubt not, knows to whom I refer. I do not remember any objection being made by this gentleman to the provisos here stated. This matter of ladders on cars is not a matter of car construction. They can be added at a cost, I should think, of two or three dollars per ladder. It was proven clearly to the satisfaction of the committee that ladders were requisite both on the ends and on the sides of the car for the convenience of the brakeman getting on and off. Any gentleman with a knowledge of these affairs will know that it is necessary for the brakeman to get on sometimes at the end and sometimes at the side when the car is moving. As a matter of fact the Michigan Central operating the Canada Southern carries out exactly this plan, and I think it is also in use on most railways in the United States. As to the standard height of cars, an agreement has been reached as to the standard height of cars in America by the Master Carbuilders Association. An important point is to have the draw-bar, the coupler part of the car, of a uniform height above the rail, so that a man going between the cars to couple them may know where to expect the draw-bar to come, and so that the two cars which are to be coupled will come together in the same plane. This is not a question of expense but a question of convenience. I know that it is no more expensive to build cars of a uniform height from the rails than it is to build them at different heights. This provision of the Bill is only designed to crystallize into law what has already been provided by the practical good sense of the Master Car Builders' Association. I do not think my hon. friend (the Minister of Railways) is running any risk in letting that section pass.

Mr. DAVIN. The railway men of the west took a very great interest in this legislation, as hon. gentlemen who were in the House in 1891 will remember. I placed before the House on that occasion the feelings and sentiments of western railway men when I brought a Bill before the House covering some of the more important provisions of this Bill, which was read a second time and referred to the Railway Committee. If we are to attain the object of this Bill, which is to safeguard life and limb, I cannot see how we can make an exception of a small railway company. An accident on a small railway will impair a man's soundness of limb as completely as one on a great railway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. But a very small proportion of the injuries occur on the small railways.

Mr. DAVIN. Naturally, under the doctrines of chance it could hardly be otherwise, for there are a larger number of people employed on the large railways than on the small. But I have often read of accidents on small railways, and my impression is that, if we had the casualties tabulated, it would be found that in proportion to the number of cars, the number of trips and the number of employees, you have relatively a larger number of accidents occurring on the small railways than on the larger ones.

Mr. INGRAM. I might draw the attention of the Minister of Railways to the fact that Mr. Harris, who represented the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railways, stated that he had control of thirty-six miles of railway, and that his railway owns two box cars and thirty-two flat cars, but they transfer from the Intercolonial Railway and handle foreign cars. So, it will only affect this road to the extent of two box cars. There would appear, therefore, to be nothing in the argument as regard the small railways.

Mr. CASEY. I am very glad that my hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) has called attention to this point. These small railways use almost exclusively the freight cars of other companies. I have known some of the worst accidents on some of the excursion trains of small railways, as my hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) knows also, no doubt. And, moreover, these accidents occurred for lack of carrying out the precautions provided for by this Bill.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not wish to be understood as being desirous of raising serious objections to this portion of the Bill, for I really have none. My suggestions were made in order to call the attention of the committee to the ideas that occurred to my own mind, and if the committee is of opinion that the Bill could safely pass in its present form, I shall offer no further objections to that portion of it, at all events.

On section 3,

Mr. INGRAM. Though I am quite in sympathy with this Bill, I can see that this section would do great injustice to the trunk lines in Canada. For this reason—all the railways now in Canada have a large number of old cars on hand, and they would, not unnaturally consider it a great hardship to be obliged to fit out old cars that may not last a year or even six months longer with all the devices specified in section 2.

Mr. CASEY. This only applies to the ladders, you know.

Mr. INGRAM. Now, take old box cars, it would be most unfair to expect a railway to fit out old cars, however old, with all these devices.

Mr. CASEY. Let me say, in the first place, that this clause only refers to the ladders.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. And the draw-bar.

Mr. CASEY. That would not be fitting out a car with an attachment, it would mean the rebuilding of the whole car. I think there is no doubt about that.

Mr. DAVIN. Make it clear that it applies only to the ladders.

Mr. CASEY. I would suggest then that it should be made to read "with ladders as required by section 2." I am astonished that my hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Ingram) should object to this clause, if he objects to it when taken in that restricted sense. There is no doubt that the main trunk lines have a lot of old cars, but, if it is considered right that cars should be fitted with ladders for the safety of the men employed, I think it is right that old cars as well as new ones should be fitted up in that way. The companies have two years to fit up the cars with these ladders. They need not fit out cars that are old, unless they think it will pay them. They can keep them for two years without ladders and then throw them aside. If they are good enough to keep in use, it will be worth while to put ladders upon them, as this will cost not more than $4 or $5 per car. I am not a mechanic but I think it can be done for at a small cost.

Mr. INGRAM. I was speaking of a section as I found it. It requires the companies to have cars of a standard height and to be supplied with ladders. The hon. gentleman sees fit to amend it by making it apply only to ladders, and to the clause in that form I can see no objection.

Mr. CASEY. I thought it was quite well understood, in committee, that this meant to apply only to the ladder. I thought we thoroughly understood that we could not rebuild an old car very well and make it of a standard height. If I understand the matter correctly, it would mean putting a lot of new substructure under the car.

Mr. INGRAM. I do not think you could make it of the standard height.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What is the meaning of the date "herein mentioned" in section 4? There is more than one date herein mentioned.

Mr. CASEY. That means the date of the passing of this Act. If the hon. gentleman does not think this clear enough, we will put in some words that will make it so.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You are going to have two different dates.

Mr. CASEY. Because the Act provides that some things must be done immediately, and other things need not be done for two years. All box freight cars built after this date must have such appliances; all old cars need not have them for two years.

Mr. INGRAM. I think that is quite clear. The first line will cover the two sections.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It seems to me that the fourth section is intended to impose a penalty upon any person who shall build cars which have not these appliances. Section 2 provides that all cars built after the passing of this Act must have these appliances; therefore, it is intended that the penalty shall apply immediately to any case that arises after the passing of the Act. It cannot apply to cases referred to in section 3, because that has reference to applying these equipments to cars already built.

Mr. INGRAM. Section 2 applies to all cars built for use on Canadian railways. The other section applies to old cars that are already built, and they must be fitted within two years. Surely, that is plain.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I move the following amendment:—

The penalty for building such car, in violation of section 2 of said Act, shall be $25 for each car.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 5,

Mr. CASEY. This section imposes a penalty for using any car which is not built or remodelled in accordance with sections 1, 2 and 3. There is a penalty for building cars illegally, and another for using cars which do not comply with the provisions of this Act. I move to strike out the words "after the date herein provided."

Amendment agreed to.

On section 6,

Mr. CASEY. This is a section which naturally has a personal interest for the Minister of Railways, and which certainly may properly form the subject of discussion. The section was inserted because the employees themselves asked for it, and as it appeared to be necessary to appoint some special person to enforce the penalties for infringements of the Act, the Minister of Railways was thought to be the proper person to appoint, as he would be capable of bearing the heavy responsibility which would rest upon him. It was considered that, if the duty was left to any ordinary person to proceed in the ordinary way by information, the railway companies would go scot free. Employees would not lodge information or start proceedings to recover penalties, because the penalty of dismissal would be enforced on them, whether the prosecutions were successful or not; and, therefore, unless some one was charged with the duties, ex officio, of public prosecutor, the Act would not be enforced. There is a great deal of force in that contention, and it will be necessary to charge some one with the duty of enforcing this public Act.

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. DAVIN. Would not the proper person be the Minister of Justice? Why should this burden be thrown on the Minister of Railways?

Mr. CASEY. I suppose, the Minister of Justice might be charged with the duty. He could hardly, however, proceed in the provincial courts, ex officio.

Mr. BERGERON. We might appoint a special officer, as there are many persons now looking for positions.

Mr. CASEY. I would be willing to agree to the appointment of a public prosecutor, if provision were made for his remuneration.

Mr. INGRAM. I cannot see that this Bill gives greater power to the Minister of Railways than he possessed before. Under section 205 of the Railway Act:

Whenever the Minister of Railways receives information to the effect that any bridge, culvert, viaduct, tunnel, or any portion of any railway, or any engine, car, or carriage used or for use, on any railway, is dangerous to the public using the same from want of repair, insufficient or erroneous construction, or from any other cause, or whenever circumstances arise which in his opinion render it expedient, he may direct one or more engineers to examine and inspect the railway or any portion thereof, or of the works connected therewith, or the engines and other rolling stock in use thereon, or any portion thereof, and upon the report of the inspecting engineer may condemn the railway or any portion thereof, or any of the rolling stock or appliances used thereon, and with the approval of the Governor in Council may require any change or alteration therein or in any part thereof, or the substitution of any new bridge, culvert, viaduct or tunnel, or of any material for the said railway, and thereupon the company to which such railway belongs or the company using, running or controlling the same shall after notice in writing proceed to make good or remedy defects in the said portions of the railway or in the locomotive, car or carriage which has been so condemned, or shall make such change, alteration or substitution as has been required by the Minister.

According to section 6 of this Bill, it does not give the Minister any more power than he has already under the General Railway Act.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) will see that under the clause of the General Railway Act the Minister of Railways is called upon to act in an administrative capacity; this Bill calls on the Minister to act really as the prosecutor and to put the legal machinery in motion, which if they succeed against the railway company will entail penal consequences.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) might let this 6th clause drop. It does appear to me to add very materially to the duties which are attached to the office of Minister of Railways, and from the little experience I have had I am inclined to think they are already sufficiently laborious. I would not want my successor to be saddled with any greater load of duties than I have myself to discharge.

Mr. BERGERON. You have two years yet for that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) would allow the section 6 to drop for the present, we might after consideration and experience arrive at some conclusion with regard to this matter.

Mr. QUINN. I am sorry to say that I do not agree with the Minister in this particular, nor do I agree with this method of providing a law such as has been introduced. I am in perfect sympathy with the Bill as it stands, but I think it should be taken charge of by the Minister of Railways himself and put in the form of an amendment to the General Railway Act. We provide for penalties in this Bill by sections 3, 4 and 5, but when we come to provide for the means of collecting these penalties we are face to face with great difficulties. This places the power of proceeding, either in the hands of an officer of the Government, or of a private individual. If we place it in the hands of an individual to collect these penalties we render the persons liable to be proceeded against subject to blackmail, and on the other hand if an official is to look after the matter, we know from experience that the duties are very often performed in a perfunctory manner. I therefore think it would be well if my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) would induce the Minister of Railways to take this Bill in his charge, and to make it an amendment to the General Railway Act which provides the means of collecting these penalties. If my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) puts it in the hands of any individual to institute proceedings against the railway company and to collect $5 a day for the user, or $25 for the construction of a car not fitted up in the manner provided for by this Bill, he is putting great power in the hands of irresponsible people. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) provides that the action should be taken by the Minister of Railways he is charging an already overburdened official with work that it would be impossible for him to look after, and which must necessarily devolve upon his officials. I would suggest that a section might be put in the Bill providing that the penalties should be collected by any one who would institute an action in the name of Her Majesty.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The penalties might be recovered in the name of Her Majesty under the Summary Convictions Act.

Mr. QUINN. The same as a qui tam action.

Mr. CASEY. There is no use saying that if everybody is allowed to institute proceedings you are subjecting the railways to blackmail, for we know that any person is subject to be prosecuted for any offence against the law upon the information of any other person, and I do not see why the railway companies should be exempted from that rule. The great thing is to provide that this Act should be enforced. If my hon. friend the Minister of Railways thinks that he, or his successor, should not be burdened with these duties, I am willing to strike the provision out and to leave in the latter part of the clause: that any person may institute proceedings for the recovery of any penalties provided by this Act. How he shall institute the proceedings, I suppose will depend on the legal procedure in each province.

Mr. QUINN. That would be an outrage. My hon. friend says very truly that railway companies should not be protected any more than private individuals; but we do not, for instance, make the mere possession of a bundle of bananas the basis of a prosecution against a fruit merchant, whereas in this case the mere possession of a car not fitted up according to the requirements of this Act would be the basis of a prosecution against a railway company. I think all railway companies require protection in a matter of this kind. You would not surely put in the hands of any disgruntled employee the power to institute against a railway company, not one action, but 500 actions, simply because it had that number of cars which did not comply with the provisions of this Act. The railway company would be required to defend every one of these actions, and be put to enormous expense, only to find in the end that the man who instituted the actions was entirely worthless. That would be the effect of the clause as it now stands.

Mr. CASEY. I think that, under all the circumstances, we had better leave the clause as it is, making it the duty of the Minister of Railways to see after this. He is a responsible party, and would not institute proceedings on flimsy grounds. Of course, as has been pointed out, he would have to delegate that duty to an official of his own department, which could easily be done.

Mr. McALISTER. I would suggest that the word "handling" in the second line is unnecessary and objectionable. Suppose, for instance, that there is a car in a yard not fitted up, and it is shunted from one place to another. That would be handling it. I think the word "using" is sufficient to cover the whole.

Mr. CASEY. I move that this clause be amended by inserting after the word "shall" in the first line the words, "on the information of any credible person," and by striking out these words where they occur later in the clause, and also striking out the words at the end of the clause, "provided, however, that any other person may institute any proceedings for the recovery of any penalties provided by this Act." This leaves the clause in such a shape that it will be the duty of the Minister of Railways to proceed on the information of any credible person, and does not leave it to everybody to prosecute. In other words, if a man has a grievance, he has first to complain to the Minister of Railways, and then it will be the duty of the Minister of Railways to prosecute.

Mr. INGRAM. While the hon. gentleman is amending the clause in that way, it might be well for him to go a little further. There might be some doubt as to who would be a credible witness. Suppose the Minister of Railways considered a representative of the railway employees to be a credible witness; if so, why not amend the clause to provide that any employee associated with the Railway Employees' Union would be a credible witness?

Mr. CASEY. I think it would be for the Minister himself to determine, to a certain extent, who would be a credible person.

Mr. QUINN. We have got to the point I feared a few minutes ago. We are passing an Act which is utterly unworkable. We are placing the power in the hands of the Minister of Railways to institute an action; if the railway company guilty of an infraction of the law happens to be in any way friendly to the Minister of Railways, he might refuse to take action. I am against the passage of any Bill which purports to do something which, as a matter of fact, it does not do. I am opposed to the passage of an Act which purports to protect railway employees and does not protect them at all. I say that this section is unworkable. It says that the Minister of Railways shall proceed on the information of a credible person; but what power is there to compel the Minister of Railways to proceed? What defence can he set up if charged with not proceeding in a particular case? He might say, "I do not know this man at all." As my hon. friend suggests, the question is, who is a credible person? One credible to me might not be credible to the Minister of Railways, and one credible to the Minister of Railways might not be credible to me. If it is the intention of the Government to pass an Act of this kind—and I say it is a good Act and ought to be passed—the Minister of Railways ought to take charge of it and put it into such shape that it can be worked.

Mr. CASEY. I understand my hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Ingram) to suggest that certain persons should be named in the Act as being ipso facto credible persons, upon whose information the Minister should act, though he could also act on the information of other credible persons. I think that is a very good suggestion; but on the whole, perhaps we had better let this clause stand.

Section allowed to stand.

On section 7, subsection 1,

7. Every employee of a railway company injured while in the discharge of his duty shall, for every day during which he is thereby unfitted for duty, be entitled to compensation from the railway company at the rate of not less than sixty per cent of the current rate of wages for men similarly employed by the company, at the time the injury occurs, to be paid for not more than fifty-two weeks.

Mr. CASEY. I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways to similar legislation which was passed by the British Parliament at its last session, and to urge the necessity that exists in Canada for a provision of this kind. It is well known that it is almost impossible for a railway employee to obtain ample compensation for injuries he has suffered while in the service of the company, in cases where any question arises inviting litigation. No doubt, in a number of cases, perhaps in the great majority, the railway companies give what they consider fair compensation without going into court at all; but, when a railway company does go into court, and the question as to its liability is raised, hinging on some such point as its liability for the actions of any of the fellow-employees of the one who is injured, litigation goes on almost ad infinitum, and the wealthy corporation has all the advantage of wealth in its favour. I have two or three times brought before the House an individual case which arose in Montreal, and which was carried through the courts of the province of Quebec and thence to the Supreme Court, and was sent back to the provincial courts, and then came again before the Supreme Court, and was finally adjudicated upon by the Privy Council in favour of the employee. That case would never have been fought to a conclusion by the plaintiff, if he had not been assisted by his fellow-workmen, and by men who were not fellow-employees, with considerable sums of money to fight the railway company. No doubt, there are many similar cases in which justice was not done, simply because of the lack of funds on the part of the complainant to push the case through the courts. I do not propose to trouble the committee with details, but I think it will be admitted that a railway employee is not in a position to fight a railway company in the courts for compensation in the case of injury, disability or death. This view of the matter was so strongly felt in England that, during last session, a Bill was passed by the Imperial legislature, applying, not merely to railway employees, but to all those who are engaged in what are considered dangerous employments. On page 118 of the report of the special committee will be found the text of this Bill, which subsequently became law in Great Britain :

1. (1.) If in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule to this Act :

(2.) Provided that :

(a.) The employer shall not be liable under this Act in respect of any injury which does not disable the workman for a period of at least two weeks from earning full wages at the work at which he was employed.

(b.) When it is decided as hereafter provided, that the injury was caused by the wilful and wrongful act or default of the employer or some person for whose act or default the employer is responsible, nothing in this Act shall affect any liability, civil or criminal, of the employer or persons for whom he is responsible ; but the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation both independently of and under this Act, and shall not be liable to pay compensation independently of this Act except in case of such wilful and wrongful act or default.

Mr. DAVIN. Has that passed the English House of Commons ?

Mr. CASEY. Yes, and is now the law. In other words, the employer is liable in any case, either under this Act or the common law.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Would my hon. friend allow me to interpose a remark or two to the committee ?

Mr. CASEY. I should like first to make out my case.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I know that my hon. friend would like to enter into a full discussion of the English legislation ; but there is a difficulty which arises at the threshold, and upon which, I think, the committee should come to some conclusion before we take up our time considering these clauses. It appears to me, that we ought first to satisfy ourselves that, in passing the sections and subsections, from No. 7 down to the end of the Bill, we would really be legislating within our competency. There is very serious doubt as to whether this is not a subject of civil rights, within the exclusive competency of the provincial legislatures. What the civil rights of an employee against his employer shall be, whether upon a railway or any other class of work, may be a matter which can only be properly legislated upon and determined by the legislatures of the various provinces ; and I fear that, in passing this Bill, we would be holding out an illusory hope, and thus mislead and deceive the people who have applied to us to pass this Act. It may be found that the people instead of getting bread from the Parliament of Canada, were simply given a stone. That is the fear I entertain, and I would like to know, before we enter into details, what the sense of the committee is upon this point, and whether my hon. friend has taken the precaution to ascertain what the views of gentlemen learned in the law are upon it. I do not think it is one which requires a great deal of argument. If any hon. gentleman thinks that the law is clear, it seems to me that his opinion would be, that the law is clearly against our jurisdiction.

Mr. CASEY. I am sorry my hon. friend interrupted me. I think it is a little late to raise the question of ultra vires after passing this Bill three times to a second reading, the second reading being the stage in which the question of "vires" should be considered ; and, after it has been considered by a special committee of this House. But, if it is determined to raise that point now, I have only to say in regard to it that during the three years that this Bill has been before the House I have never heard that point raised by any lawyer in the House. I have heard the Bill objected to on every other ground, but never on that ground. The Dominion railways and all concerning them, are stated by the constitution to be entirely within the control of this House. We regulate the railways in all their relations to the public. It has been held by the courts in the province of Ontario that on such matters as the drainage of railway lands these railways are not subject to the law of the provinces. Even though the constitution states that the provinces have the right to legislate as to property and civil rights, they have no right to legislate as to the real estate of the Dominion railways. The question has never gone, I believe, to the Supreme Court or the Privy Council, but that is the decision of the highest courts of the province. That is, that every question of Dominion railways is within the power of this Parliament and within its exclusive power by virtue of an article in the constitution which puts Dominion railways under our charge. The hon. Minister of Railways says it is a matter of civil rights, as it involves the relations of employer and employed. A vast deal of our legislation does the same. We legislate about the civil service, and claim the right to regulate the relations of employer and employed in regard to superannuations and a hundred matters of the civil service. And why we cannot make similar laws with regard to the Dominion railways that are specially committed to our care, I confess I do not see. I am not a lawyer, but I have been, to some extent, a student of the constitution. I await the opinion of some legal gentleman who is a constitutional lawyer, and who has experience of matters of this kind, one who is an authority, before I consider my case entirely hopeless. I would ask the hon. Minister whether before he opposes the clause on this ground he asked the opinion of the Minister of Justice, who is admittedly the highest constitutional authority in this country. If he takes the position he does on the basis of an opinion of the Minister of Justice, he has some valid objections, but I think he should not raise this point except after advice by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. BERGERON. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) is a lawyer, too.

Mr. CASEY. That may be, but he is not the member of the Government charged with guarding the constitutionality of Bills, and I think he would strengthen his case by having the opinion of the Minister of Justice on such a matter. When the hon. Minister interrupted me, I was pointing out the scope of the British legislation on this subject. I was pointing out that the employer was always liable for an injured employee either under the special Act or under the common law.

Mr. INGRAM. Does that Act apply to every employer?

Mr. CASEY. No, there is a list of occupations given, to which it applies, but the list includes railway men. In the schedule at page 120, my hon. friend will find the scale of compensation. An injured man, or his representatives if he is killed, have an option as to how they will be compensated, whether under this Act or under the common law. If they accept compensation under the Act, they cannot go to law with the employer. That proposition is also embodied in a subsequent provision of my own Bill. When death results from injury, if the workman leaves dependents, the compensation is the amount of his wages for three years next preceding the injury or £150, whichever is the larger, but not exceeding £300, provided that the amount of pecuniary payments made under the Act shall be deducted. In case of incapacity, 50 per cent of the weekly earnings in weekly payments, such weekly payments not to exceed £1. There is no limit to the time over which these weekly payments shall extend, according to the British Act, but according to this Bill it is provided that they shall not extend over more than one year. There is provision in this British Act as to who shall be considered dependents and so on. It closes with a provision that if the registrar of friendly societies certifies that any scheme of insurance for the workmen provided by the employer is not less favourable to the workmen than the provisions of the Act, the employer may until the certificate is revoked, contract with any of the workmen that the provisions of these schemes shall be substituted for the provisions of the Act, and this employer is liable then only under the provisions of the scheme. If this Bill is proceeded with, I propose to move to add a clause of that kind. I propose to provide that if the railway company puts forward a scheme of insurance or compensation which shall be reported by the superintendent of insurance to be as favourable to the workmen as the provisions of this Bill, the railway may contract itself out of its obligations to the men, but otherwise it shall be liable under the provisions of the Bill. That will put the Bill on all-fours with the British Act. I think that is perfectly fair, for it will not deprive the employee of his rights under the Bill, unless it can be shown on the certificate of this actuary that what the railway is doing for him is quite as favourable as the terms of the Act.

Mr. INGRAM. I understood the Minister of Railways to express grave doubts as to whether this Parliament had the right to pass this section. I may say that that was brought up before the special committee while Judge Clarke was giving evidence with respect to sections 7 and 8. Mr. Powell, who was a member of the committee, asked the judge this question. Hon. members will find it at page 101:

Mr. Powell.—Is there any decision in Ontario which says that the local Act applies to railways?

Mr. Clark.—No, I don't know that there is; and I am rather of the opinion that it would be ultra vires. My own opinion, and I say it with hesitation, because I do not think it is common among lawyers, is that for the purpose of building and carrying out Dominion railways on the theory of their good to the country, no provincial legislation can affect them.

Mr. Casey.—Your contention is that Dominion railways are quite outside the provincial Acts regarding employer's liabilities?

Mr. Clark.—Yes, sir. It is a very interesting subject to me, and my theory is that it may be necessary in an Act embodying this. A Dominion railway is an implement in the hands of the Government for Government purposes, managed by the Dominion Parliament. It declares the conditions under which companies shall build, the same as a lighthouse or a fortification, and it is inconsistent for a local government to interfere.

Mr. Choquette.—You do not go so far as Quebec or Ontario laws, making laws against railways passing through our provinces.

Mr. Clark.—There is no limit. If it is good for anything, it is good to this extent. If the Government want a railway built, say from Toronto to Montreal and want it built through every provincial parliament ground and every graveyard, it is sufficient—it may be bad judgment but good law—for them to say so. If it is wanted and authorized by the Dominion Parliament, which means that it is wanted for Canada, no local legislation can affect it in any way.

So according to that, it seems to me, though I am not a lawyer, that this Parliament would have power to pass section 7 and subsections. That was the judgment of Mr. Clarke, who has given a great deal of experience to this subject.

Mr. ELLIS. That refers only to railways within the Dominion law by the Act itself. It would not apply to provincial railways.

Mr. INGRAM. There are so few provincial railways that they are scarcely worth mentioning.

Mr. CASEY. My own opinion on this question is still unchanged, but, as it appears that a discussion of the powers of this House in this matter may lead to the waste of valuable time on the subject to-night, I suppose we had better postpone the further consideration of the Bill until this day week, as the remaining portions of the Act will all be affected by the questions that have been raised. In the meantime, those who take opposite views of the question can enlighten themselves by further reading and consultation. I confess, it has been quite a new view of the question to me, that we have not the power to legislate in this respect regarding Dominion railways. But, with the view to clearing that matter up, I beg to move that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again; and this night week we hope to settle the matter more effectually.

Committee rose and reported progress.

ATTACHMENT OF SALARIES.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Richardson: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 14) an Act respecting the attachment of salaries and moneys in the hands of the Government.

Mr. FLINT. There has already been a very valuable debate on the principle of this Bill, and I would suggest, in order to facilitate the discussion of the details, that the Bill go into committee. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) has two amendments to propose, and I think we can discuss the measure more thoroughly and with a greater likelihood of reaching a result, if we discuss it in committee.

Mr. BELCOURT. I desire to speak on the principle of the Bill before it goes into committee. If I understand rightly, the measure introduced by the hon. member for Lisgar has two objects. One object is to render attachable, at the instance of any person, all moneys payable by the Government to any person for any cause or reason.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I intend to withdraw that clause in committee.

Mr. BERGERON. You had better do it now.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I withdraw it.

Mr. BELCOURT. As the hon. gentleman abandons the first and second clauses, I need not discuss them any further. Then, the other object of the Bill is provided for by section 3, and that is, to render attachable the salaries of all civil servants. As was pointed out to us the other day by the Solicitor General, there are grave doubts as to the constitutionality of that provision. It has been argued here, that it would be a violation of the principles of the British North America Act, and that it would be an interference with property and civil rights. I have not gone into that question, and I am not prepared to discuss it, but there has been such great doubt raised as to that part of the Bill, that I think it ought to engage our serious attention before it is adopted. The principal objection I have to urge against this Bill is, that there is no occasion or necessity for it. The civil servants in the city of Ottawa, I think—and I speak of those in Ottawa, because I have personal knowledge of the civil service here—are an honourable class, and they have, to my experience at all events, discharged their obligations as well and as faithfully as any other class or section of the community. There may have been a few delinquents in this city. Some of them may not have fulfilled their legal obligations as promptly and as satisfactorily as they might have wished, but that has been a very rare exception. During the fourteen years that it has been my privilege to live in the capital, during all of which years I have practised the profession of law, and had, therefore, special opportunities of judging, my experience has been, that the civil servants have, as a class, fulfilled their obligations faithfully and well. Now, there have been a few delinquents, but they are largely recruited from that class of civil servants who borrow from money-lenders. There have been in this city a certain number of people who have made it a practice to loan money to civil servants at exorbitant rates, and I cannot for myself very much blame some of the civil servants in having endeavoured to get out of the performance of contracts that were of the most usurious kind. Contracts have been made for the loan of money at rates running from 20 to 60 per cent. Those are the only persons who have not fulfilled their legal obligations as they might. Some hon. gentlemen have indulged in what I consider unjust declamation against the civil servants. Some politicians think civil servants are fair and legitimate game. I know that in rural districts the civil servant in Ottawa are considered as drawing enormous and extravagant salaries. The civil servant who is drawing a salary of $1,000 is pointed out as a man who receives enormous remuneration. No doubt it must appear a large amount to people living in rural districts and who handle very little money. But when it is remembered that civil servants are called upon to pay large amounts for rents and other expenditures their salaries should not and really do not appear extravagant. The result of this unjust and unfounded declamation is that unfair measures are adopted against the civil service. The Government are pressed either to decrease their salaries or impose unjust imitations on the service. I am sorry to say I do not quite agree with the present Government in the policy of doing away with the statutory increases to civil servants. I am glad to know that the matter is still under consideration, and when it is again considered I trust that it will receive the fair and impartial attention to which it is entitled, and the service will in the end receive the statutory increases to which its members are entitled by law and justice. I may be pardoned perhaps for referring to a matter that may not be exactly germane to this question, and I take this opportunity of directing the attention of the Government to this subject and in behalf of the civil service beseeching them to give a better and more fair consideration to their case. I believe in the end the system of statutory increase, which is properly called automatic, is the best one. There may be certain objections which can properly be urged against it, but on the whole it is the only satisfactory method. Uniformity of increase among the civil servants is the only practicable method. If there is not uniformity there is unjust discrimination, and pressure is brought to bear on the Government to increase salaries in cases where a claim does not exist as a matter of right but merely as a matter of courtesy, or of political influence.

Another objection which I have to this Bill is, that by adopting it this House will be encouraging the practice of giving credit, which is against modern progress, which is to discourage credit among all wage-earners, and this House will not be acting in accordance with modern ideas by adopting legislation of this kind. To my mind also this measure is not, as it has been termed, a liberal or progressive measure. It is not a progressive measure in this sense that it renders the salaries of wage-earners attachable. The tendency is all in the other direction. We know that one time all the salaries of all wage-earners were attachable. These salaries have been made partially unattachable, and the tendency has been all along to render the salaries of all wage-earners less and less attachable. This is going back to a system which has been abandoned, to an idea which does not prevail to-day, and for that reason the Bill is neither liberal or progressive.

But perhaps the most serious objection that can be urged against the Bill is, that by adopting it Parliament will be creating a means of collecting moneys or debts for a certain class, for a minority, which certainly is not in accord with either the practice or theory of Government. You will enable a certain number of people who are creditors of a civil servant to collect their debts at the public expense. It is quite plain that any measure of this sort cannot be carried out except with great expense to the Government. Officers and legal gentlemen will have to be appointed to look after attachments, attend at court and make declarations on the part of the Government. That will entail the appointment of several officers who will have to receive pretty large salaries. And for what purpose? In order that a few people may collect their debts at the expense of the community. I submit it is contrary to good government that the whole community should be taxed and called upon to meet the expense of collecting these debts for the benefit of the few. Some hon. members told the House the other day that the Government was not in a different position in a matter of this kind from a railway company. The cases are not parallel, they are entirely different. A railway company is engaged in business, has servants and employees for the purpose of trade and gain. The Government is not in business, it has no objects of commerce, gain or profit. It is simply administering the affairs of all for the benefit and advantage of all. To my mind this Bill, if adopted by this House, would be utterly unworkable. It would be expensive, and as I have shown, it would be illiberal and not progressive. I am opposed to the principle of the Bill, and if I have the opportunity I shall vote against it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot see how any hon. gentleman can plead that the civil servants of this country should be protected against paying their honest debts any more than any other class. The rule in this country is that money can be garnisheed, but an exception to that rule is made in favour of civil servants. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) has spoken very strongly in behalf of civil servants; but this House should remember that there is no class in this Dominion so well paid. The civil servants in Ottawa receive an average salary of a little over $1,200. I should like any hon. member to state any other line in which there is an average salary paid of $1,200. Do clerks and managers of banks, or clerks in wholesale houses, or employees of any other class receive such a large average salary? Why is it that the law which calls upon all other classes to pay their honest debts should not call on civil servants to do so? It is unfair that they should be protected by any law that prohibits money justly due them being garnisheed to pay their honest obligations. The hon. gentleman said it would be an injurious practice. I do not think so. It would be placing them in the class with all other people and on a par with all other persons who are wage-earners, and would enable those to whom they are indebted to obtain what is justly due, and I do not see why they should not be able to do so. My hon. friend has stated that the adoption of this Bill would entail very considerable expense on the Government, because when salaries were liable to be garnisheed, it would be necessary for the Government to appoint officers to appear in the courts and look after orders made against the Government for payment of money honestly due. That could very easily be avoided by his suing the civil servant, getting a judgment. The Government would not require to appear in that case. The Act could provide that a certificate of the judgment should be filed with the accountant of the department in which the civil servant works, and then, if proper provision is not made for payment within a reasonable time, the civil servant would be liable to be hauled up before a judge, and the judge would make an order that a certain amount of the wages should be paid until the debt is liquidated. That order would be filed with the accountant of the department, and he would be supposed to see that the order of the judge would be carried out, and in that way the Government would be put to no trouble at all; they would not have to hire a lawyer to attend court. My hon. friend (Mr. Belcourt) says that there have been few delinquents in Ottawa, but I have heard of men in Ottawa who gave credit to such a number of civil servants that it eventually resulted in driving them into insolvency. These fellows could strut up and down the streets, dressed in the best, and their families moving in the highest circles, but, notwithstanding that, they would not pay their honest debts. It is not creditable to this Parliament that any class of persons should be placed in that position. For my part, I shall vote for this Bill in some form which will reach this privileged class and place them upon an equal footing with others in this country whose salaries can be garnisheed for their honest debts.

Mr. QUINN. I wish to say a few words, Mr. Speaker, in opposition to this Bill. I have followed with a good deal of interest the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen), and, when he speaks of a number of merchants being ruined by giving credit to civil servants, his argument will not hold water. What reason have they to give credit to civil servants to an extent which put them into bankruptcy, when they knew that the wages of civil servants have been unseizable. If they gave credit to such a large number, knowing that the salaries could not be seized, then they were incompetent and unable to conduct their business properly. They were acting in the face of the law of the country, which said that these salaries were not seizable. I agree with my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt), who states that the civil servants are as respectable men as can be found in any other class of the community. The evil of making the salaries of civil servants liable to seizure is, principally, that it subjects the officers of the Government, and subjects the revenues of Her Majesty, to attacks by all sorts of people; it affords an easy way of attacking the public Treasury, and a way which has never been permitted in this country before. My hon. friend (Mr. Richardson), with a looseness which characterizes all legislation of this kind, asks this House to pass a Bill permitting any individual who has a judgment against a civil service employee, to put a seizure in the hands of whom? In the hands of, as the second clause provides:

2. Process for the attachment of the said moneys shall be served upon the accountant of the department by which they are payable, or in the case of an attachment against moneys payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, upon the Auditor General.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have already announced that I intended to drop clause 1, and I might have added that I intend to drop clause 2. If clause 1 is dropped, it would naturally follow that clause 2 should also be omitted.

Mr. QUINN. Then, let us take section 3; it provides:

3. Any judgment creditor of a person employed in the public service of Canada may attach the future salary of such person, whether such salary is payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund or otherwise, in the same manner and by the same process as salaries of other persons payable out of moneys in the hands of private persons, and service of such process shall be in the same manner as in the next preceding section provided.

There must be somebody made "tiers saisi," or garnishee, in the matter.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is the reason I desire to get into committee; I have an amendment to propose which will cover that ground.

Mr. QUINN. We are obliged to take this Bill as it is presented to the House; and let me ask, who is going to be the garnishee? It must be Her Majesty the Queen; and, therefore, this Bill puts it in the power of any person to take an action against Her Majesty the Queen on a judgment for $1 or 50 cents.

Mr. FLINT. Would my hon. friend (Mr. Quinn) allow me to ask him a question. There is a law of this kind affecting the salaries of civil servants of the province of Quebec. My hon. friend is a professional gentleman from that province, and I would like to ask him how that law operates? It has been represented to the House that it worked well.

Mr. QUINN. I have not much experience of the operation of that law in the province of Quebec, because, I am happy to say, that the public employees in the province of Quebec all pay their debts. I have never had occasion to operate the law against any of the public servants in that province. I understand, however, that in the province of Quebec the law is, that salaries up to $500 or $600 may be seized to the extent of one-fifth, and salaries above that to the extent of one-fourth or one-third, according to the amount of the salary. How the law has operated, I really do not know, because, as I have said, the civil servants in the province of Quebec have paid their debts very regularly, and there have been very few seizures. Be that as it may, it does not do away with the objection I have taken. We have here the objection that the funds of Her Majesty may be seized, and that an action may be taken against Her Majesty for 50 cents or any larger sum of money that may be found to be due by the civil servants. The consequence of that will be, that in each department of Government it will be necessary to have an officer specially appointed for the purpose of looking after these seizures, who shall, when the seizure is put in, on the authority of an Order in Council or by some other proceeding, make the necessary declaration in court. It would be necessary for him to be thoroughly posted on the amount due by the department to every officer in Canada, no matter where he is. Not only that, but it will necessitate the existence in each department of a particular legal representative to defend the rights of Her Majesty in each case that may come before the court. If this Act is passed, it will require the employment of a legal representative of each department of the public service in every city, and town, and hamlet, in the Dominion.

Mr. McMULLEN. You ought not to object to that.

Mr. QUINN. I am not looking for jobs of that kind. I do not say that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and other hon. gentleman opposite are supporting this Bill for the purpose of giving some of their friends employment. I would not attribute that to them. I merely point this out as a serious difficulty, which has been avoided by all governments that have existed in this country up to the present time, and which I believe will present itself so strongly to the members of this House as to prevent the passage of this Bill. The case of the civil service employees has been so ably advocated by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt), who is certainly competent to speak on that subject, that it is not necessary for me to say anything on that subject. But I will say this, that probably the most respectable men in our different towns and villages throughout the Dominion have been or are public employees; and it would be not only a reflection, but a very serious stigma upon their character for this House, without any representation from the outside at all, but at the whim of a private member, to pass an Act of this kind. If such an Act is necessary, let the Minister of Justice assume the responsibility of introducing it and passing it through the House as a Government measure. But until it becomes absolutely necessary to pass such an Act, and until that necessity is manifested by the Minister of Justice introducing it, I do not think this House ought to take it into consideration. If it were possible to pass any Act on this subject here, I would rather favour the passage of an Act which would exempt all salaries and all wages from seizure. I think the giving of credit by retail merchants is the greatest curse of this country, particularly the giving of credit to people who are drawing a limited salary or wage. Look at the power which the provincial laws of this country vest in petty creditors. For instance, in the province of Quebec, if a man who owes $20 or under, is sued by his creditor, and judgment obtained, a seizure is placed in the hands by his employer, and by the time the judgment is executed, the costs of the case, involving perhaps $5 or only $1, will amount to $15. There is no reason in the world why a labourer should be subjected to such proceedings because he happens to be unfortunate enough to owe a man $2 or $5. I would rather support an Act if it were in the power of this Parliament, which would render the salaries and wages of labouring men altogether unseizable than to put on the Statute-book an Act like this. I think, as the hon. member for Ottawa says, it is a retrograde step.

Mr. ROGERS. I would like to say a few words on this question, as the rural representative has been mentioned as the instigators of this motion; otherwise I would not have spoken. I believe that the respectable portion of the class under discussion to-night do not want any legislation made in their favour: I believe if the question were left to themselves, they would vote against any such special legislation. They would say, "We are responsible men, and we are willing to bear our share of the burdens of life, and pay our debts." The majority of them are, I am glad to say, honourable men; but unfortunately the minority bring that class under the ban of shame, which renders this legislation necessary. I am glad to say that in my own constituency we have no trouble of this kind, because rural people generally do not live beyond their means and pay their debts; but in the cities something needs to be done. I know many instances in the city where I live in which men have lost seriously through not being able to collect the debts due to them.

Mr. BELCOURT. Would not this be special legislation against the civil service?

Mr. ROGERS. Not at all. If it would, I would not ask for it for a moment. The man to whom I pay a dollar a day has to pay his debts.

Mr. BELCOURT. Are not the wage-earners of Ontario exempt up to $25 of their wages?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. BELCOURT. Is not that discrimination? This Bill provides for the attachment of all the salary of the civil servant.

Mr. ROGERS. I am willing to put them all on the same footing, and the Bill could be amended to do that. Hon. gentlemen will remember that there has been an agitation in the Ontario legislature on this subject for a number of years, and just on the eve of the last election the Ontario Government thought it well to pass a law, and they did pass a law to compel the Government employees of that province to pay their debts like other men. That was done because of the demand that came from the rural constituencies. I know that this will be a live question at the next election if this House does not take action upon it. I think it is a slight upon the civil service to say that they shall not pay their debts the same as other men in the community. It is said that the civil servants are not well paid, and are hardly dealt with as a class. Then, why is it that so many are after positions in the service? We all know how many are after every vacancy that occurs. If the work were put up to tender, if that were possible, it could be done for 50 per cent of what it costs to-day. That is evidence enough that they are either too well paid or have too little to do. It is said that this measure is not constitutional in this House. Well, if members of the civil service are put on the same basis as the employees of railway corporations, that would fill the bill. Then, if there were a judgment against any civil servant, and that judgment were not at once or within a limited time redeemed, the civil servant should be dismissed. That would avoid the necessity of any laws and save all trouble. It might be provided that on the second or third appeal, or at the end of three months, the civil servant would be dismissed if within that time the judgment was not redeemed. I think it would be a charity to the civil service if that were the law. I agree with the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Quinn) and would not object if a law were passed providing that no salaries or wages should be seizable, although that might give rise to hardships by preventing these people obtaining credit when, in cases of sickness, they were unable to earn money to pay cash for what they get. I know that this is a live question and will continue to be one, and any hon. member who opposes the doing away with these exemptions will find himself in a pretty hard box when he goes before the people again. The Ontario legislature dared not dissolve the last House without taking some action in the matter. I believe it would be rather a benefit than a disadvantage to the civil service if this measure were passed. No honourable straightforward men want any special legislation in their own interest, but are willing that every man should be made to pay his debts, and it would be a great advantage to the community at large if action were taken along that line.

Mr. DAVIN. Now that the two clauses are to be eliminated, which the hon. gentleman says he is willing to strike off in committee, this Bill will be rendered completely abortive that there can be no earthly use in putting it on the Statute-book. We have heard a great deal said about the character of the civil service, but for my part I must say that having been a constant visitor to Ottawa for the last twenty-five years, I entirely endorse all that has fallen from my hon. and learned friend, the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) in their regard. The Ottawa civil service, the Dominion civil servants throughout the country at large, will stand comparison in character and honour with any class in the country. I have no sympathy whatever with certain hon. gentlemen and certain gentlemen outside this House, in the dead set which it is their fashion to make against our civil servants. They are most unjust to ninety-nine one-hundredths of them. We meet these civil servants in society, we transact business with them in the departments, and it is our experience of them in all the departments, that these men who are so often described throughout the country as idlers who do nothing but carry little short sticks in their hands and walk up and down the sidewalks, are, on the contrary, up to their eyes in business and as hard working, on the whole, as any class to be found in Canada. I entirely object to legislation that makes a dead set against an entire class and tends to make the minds of the people of Canada uneasy by giving them a false impression of the public service. What we are asked to do here is to pass legislation to protect people who recklessly give credit under circumstances which they are fully acquainted with, by enabling them to collect the very smallest sums by means which will entail a large expenditure upon the country. Why, to carry out what is proposed we should require to employ legal gentlemen to attend in court whenever Her Majesty is served with a writ, in order that Tom, Dick or Harry may collect some trifling sum for which he has given a civil servant credit. And although it does not bear on the subject under discussion, I propose to follow the example of my hon. and learned friend (Mr. Belcourt) in expressing the hope that the Government will pay heed to his representations with regard to the statutory increases, and not break the contract which the Government has entered into—because no one can doubt that a contract has been made—with these gentlemen when they entered the civil service, not only to pay them a certain amount of wages per annum but also to pay them statutory increases. I am very glad that my hon. friend made his appeal to the Government of which he is so distinguished a supporter, and certainly, if one vote from this side can help him, I shall be glad to give him my support should he bring that question before the House. In the condition in which this Bill is at present—mutilated, decapitated and detrun- cated, with nothing left but the feet, and these feet in a puddle, because he says he will have to take away the closing sentence—the best thing he can do is to withdraw his Bill and not ask the House to stultify itself by putting on the statutory book so lame and impotent a conclusion as this Bill, in its mutilated shape, would amount to. I listened very carefully to my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) as I always do, but I must say that he is not as instruc- tive on this subject as I have found him on other occasions. I fear that the argu- ments he put forward to support my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) were not of that conclusive character which gen- erally characterizes what he says about sub- jects of an agricultural nature, about which he knows a great deal more than he does about this matter. I hope that my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) will be satisfied with the elucidation this Bill has received from this House. I really sympa- thize with him. As he told us that he will take away the first and second clauses, I have drawn my pencil through them, and as I look at the Bill, with those clauses struck out, it bears such a dilapidated appearance and is altogether such a pitiable thing, that I really sympathize with him and think that the best thing he can do with his poor little bantling is to reform it out of existence altogether. It is evidently not destined to live. It is battered so completely about the head and the waist and loins that it is at its last gasp, and I think he will best consult his own dignity by withdrawing it.

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not rise to dis- cuss the merits of the Bill because I do not think it makes much difference what is said either for or against it on either side of the House, but I think it is of such a nature that we ought to have the opinion of the law officers of the Government upon it. Is the Government of opinion that it is com- petent for this Parliament to pass a Bill of this nature? If that opinion were given in the negative, that would at once put an end to all discussion. My own opin- ion, which I give for what it is worth, is that this Bill, if passed, would be unconstitu- tional. I do not think that this Parliament has the power to pass an Act making the salaries of any persons garnisheeable. I think that the process of garnishee and at- tachment comes altogether within the pur- view of the local legislatures, and that they alone can pass an Act of this kind. This is a view which many lawyers share, and I think that it is due to the House that Par- liament should have the opinion of the Gov- ernment on this point.

Mr. DAVIN.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COM- MERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I am quite aware that the hon. gentleman is within his right in requiring that the Gov- ernment should express an opinion on this question. I may say to my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) that the Solicitor General had taken this into special consideration and fully expected to have been present, but as the House is aware, he has been summoned to the city of Quebec to perform a melancholy duty, and it was impossible for him to be present to-night. Perhaps in view of the very large alterations my hon. friend proposes to make, the best course would be for him to move the House into committee, make such alterations as he proposes, and have the Bill reprinted in order that the House may then consider it in its amended form. It would be quite impossible for us, I think, to express an opinion on it as matters stand. By the time it is reprinted, the law advisers of the Crown will be present with us and we will be able to get an opinion on the somewhat complicated questions that are involved. I may say to my hon. friend from Lisgar, though his object is excellent and though, prima facie, the thing appears very simple and straightforward, I am perfectly aware that in working it out there is a risk of a good deal of difficulty arising in the different departments, and, what is quite as important, a considerable extra expense may be inflicted on the country at large. I fear it would prove that the par- ties who will make the most out of it will be the legal gentlemen, who, it may be, must be employed by us. In any case, I am not in a position to offer an opinion on the legal questions raised. That must be decided by the law officer. Now, if it meets the wish of the House, I think the course I have suggested to my hon. friend—that we should go into committee and then have this Bill reprinted for the use of the House, by which time the law officers of the Crown will be ready to give their opinion, is the best solution that I can offer for the moment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not propose to speak on the merits of the Bill or of the amendments I offer. I think it would be a pity to kill the Bill at the present stage, and I would be glad to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce to go into committee, and place before the committee the amend- ments I propose, which, I think, will sim- plify matters considerably and meet with the approbation of nine-tenths of the mem- bers of this House. If hon. members will allow the Bill to go into committee, I will make a few remarks on it which I think will show the Bill to be one acceptable to hon. members.

Mr. CLANCY. Before proceeding I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce what is the policy of the Government with regard to a Bill of that kind involving all the difficulties it does, including some to which the hon. gentleman himself made reference. Even if it were in the power of the House to pass such a Bill, it is contended that it would raise many serious difficulties in connection with every department of the civil service.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I have already stated to the House that this matter has been referred to our law advisers and only the accident of the Solicitor General's absence prevents us getting the benefit of the opinion they have arrived at.

Mr. CLANCY. Would the hon. gentleman allow it to stand until the Solicitor General comes?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I propose to do that virtually, but I think it is only reasonably courteous to my hon. friend from Lisgar that he should be allowed to have the Bill reprinted so that the House may see what it is asked to pass upon. He proposes to strike out two-thirds of the Bill, and, if I understand, to largely amend the remainder. We shall thus have virtually a new Bill. I want it printed and laid before the House so that every man, the law officers of the Crown included, may see what the hon. gentleman proposes. I think that would save a good deal of unnecessary discussion.

Mr. BERGERON. I understand the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), in his kindness to the hon. member for Lisgar, desires to kill the Bill in committee instead of killing it now.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. My hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) must not put that construction on it.

Mr. BERGERON. We have witnessed here since eight o'clock just such treatment of another Bill. It was very nearly killed, and, in fact, it can hardly live after the treatment it received at the hands of the Minister of Railways. If the proposal is as I have suggested, I do not see any reason why we should not allow the Bill to be killed in committee. But I would remind the hon. Minister that this is the second reading of the Bill and affirms a principle.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is mistaken, this is a motion that I leave the Chair and the House go into committee. The second reading has been carried.

Mr. BERGERON. If it is so, the House and the committee will stand on the same footing, because three-quarters of the Bill is cut off.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is not cut off yet.

Mr. BERGERON. Anyway, I will not discuss mere words. It is evidently the intention of the Government to kill it in committee, and I will allow them to do it.

Mr. McINERNEY. While I sympathize with this Bill, I can see an easy way to get along without it. The garnishee would be troublesome to Government. If the Governor General in Council would issue an order to each department to instruct the civil servants in every branch of the service that if they are reported a second time as not paying a just debt they will be dismissed, we shall have no trouble.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is time this question was settled. There is more feeling in the country on this subject than many hon. gentlemen are aware of. While the civil servants are, in the main, an honest class, there is a remnant of whom that cannot be said. I was made administrator of an estate to which a civil servant owed a considerable Bill. I sued as executor and got judgment, and the judge decided that the debtors should pay $2 a week. He made two payments and no more. Since then I have been unable to get a cent from him simply on account of his being a civil servant. Had he been in ordinary employment I could have secured the payment of the debt. We hear it said that this law should not be passed to discriminate against the civil servants; but I ask that there should be no discriminating in favour of any class, but that all should be equally compelled to pay their debts. I do not agree with the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Quinn) or the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that it would be necessary for the Government to have a lawyer go into court in each of these cases. Let the civil servant employ his own lawyer if he thinks his case is worth defending. Let the judge give his judgment and let that be recorded. That takes it out of the hands of the court. I am under the impression that the majority of the civil service would rather be placed on an equality with other classes than left in an anomalous position as at present. With regard to doing away entirely with the credit system, I may say that I have lived for fifty-four years in Canada, and I know that there is a large and respectable class of workmen who, especially within the last two years, have been unable in the summer to earn enough to carry them over the winter, and had there been no credit system, a large system of charity would have to be organized to prevent these people from starving. But, having a small credit given them, they are able to tide over the winter, and they come forward and pay their debts in the spring. If debts had not been collectable by process of law, I think the credit would not have been given, and their case would have been much harder that it is.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not know how it is with the civil servants in the province of Ontario, one of whose constituencies is represented by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, but I know that in the province I come from there is no distinction in respect to the obligation to pay his debts between a civil servant and any other member of the community; he is just as much obliged to pay his debts as any other man. The civil servant does not seek any special privileges over other members of the community, and for that reason, so far as my own province is concerned, I cannot understand why any special legislation should be made against that class. If a civil servant happens to owe a debt to one of his creditors in the province of Nova Scotia, he can be brought up before a commissioner and be examined as to his means of paying his debts, and, if he is possessed of means and is able to pay his debts, an order can be made upon him to pay them in such instalments as the commissioner thinks just. If he does not obey that order, he is guilty of contempt of court and can be imprisoned. If other provinces have not laws as equitable or as effectual as we have in Nova Scotia, we are willing to furnish them with the patent if they desire. I understand from my hon. friend near me that such is substantially the law in the province of Ontario. The hon. gentlemen who are so furiously pursuing the civil servants with this special legislation against them say they do not want civil servants to have any special privileges. Neither do we. Why is it, then, that by this clause, by the remainder of this Bill, which is still on its last legs, and still has a gasp of vital breath in it—why is it that by this clause they want to impose special burdens upon the civil servants not borne by any other members of the community? Why pick out of the whole community one particular class and say we are going to put them under a special disability, and put them in a different category from any other part of the community? I am unable to understand that. If the friends of the Bill can show me that this is not the effect of the Bill, I might be somewhat inclined to vote for it; but I would have to be convinced that this Parliament has power to pass this Bill before I would be disposed to give it my support. I am inclined to agree with the view that has been propounded by some professional gentlemen on the other side of the House; I am inclined to concur, at all events, in the doubts that were expressed on a former occasion by the Solicitor General. Of course, I would be diffident in expressing an opinion on the subject, after the information that has been given to us, that the matter is under the consideration of the Solicitor General. But, if we must go on and consider it to-night, and if our friends are so anxious to get at the civil servants that they cannot wait a single day or a single hour until the Solicitor General gives us the benefit of his opinion on this question, then we must use the best intelligence and information we have at our disposal without that assistance. My own impression is, that, in spite of the fact that a court in Quebec and the Ontario Court of Appeal have given judgment which would seem to show that this Parliament alone could pass an Act such as is before us, I am inclined to think these judgments will not be sustained when they get into the Supreme Court of Canada. I think that the reasoning on which these judgments have proceeded—though I have not looked at them for a long time, my recollection is, that the grounds upon which those judgments proceeded are grounds which do not exist in this country at all; that our courts in this matter have gone by light which has “led astray”; they have gone according to the condition of things south of the line; they have gone upon the analogy of United States cases, which ought not to have any application to the condition of things in this country. There are, I believe, decisions in the United States, on the strength of which decisions have been pronounced in Ontario and Quebec upon this question. There it was necessary for the Supreme Court to lay down the position, that a state legislature could not by legislation encroach upon the salaries or incomes of a servant of the central government, because, if they had power to do that, they would have power to cripple the central government in the execution of its administrative powers. But no such reasoning as that can apply to the condition of things in this country, because we have a remedy for anything of that sort in the Dominion of Canada, which they do not have in the American Republic. If any legislation of any local legislature encroaches upon the rights and powers and administrative action of the Government of the Dominion, the Government of the Dominion can advise its disallowance. I think the existence of that power altogether destroys the analogy of the cases in the United States courts upon which our courts have mistakenly adopted the conclusion that the Dominion Parliament alone can pass an Act which will make the salary of a Dominion official attachable. However that may be, I only express it as a matter of doubt, and I think, before we are asked to vote on this question, we should have those doubts cleared up, and until they are cleared up, when we are asked to vote to put the civil servants under a special disability which does not exist with reference to any other members of the community, I am prepared to vote against this Bill.

Mr. McINERNEY. With the permission of the House, I wish to make a suggestion. I think, that by going into committee now it would be like putting the cart before the horse. If the opinion of the law officers is, or will be, that this Bill is unconstitutional, I do not see why we should lose time by going into committee upon it. I think the Bill might stand over until we get that opinion.

Mr. INGRAM. Whatever I may attempt to say on this Bill, I say it from the standpoint of a layman, because I am not a lawyer. I think the hon. member for Lisgar deserves a great deal of credit for introducing a Bill of this kind. I found that our Patron friends, during the last election, urged that the Government supporters at that time should be condemned for not supporting a Bill of this character, compelling the civil servants of the Dominion to pay their debts; and I understand that other hon. gentlemen who were opposed by third parties, had to deal with this same question. I have had some experience in railway matters, and with the manner in which railway companies guard themselves against their employees taking advantage of their creditors, and I approve the simple method they have adopted of issuing a general order to all their employees that every one who is garnisheed twice shall be dismissed from the service. We have heard the arguments produced here by several legal gentlemen and others, showing the enormous expense that an Act of this kind would entail upon the people of this country, who would have to pay fees to our legal friends throughout the Dominion for carrying on cases, where civil servants might be garnisheed. Now, there are two evils complained of. One is that civil servants buy goods and do not pay for them, and there is no existing means by which they can be compelled to pay for them. Then, there is a complaint of the character that I have just named, namely, the large expense the people of this country are put to in professional fees to lawyers for the collection of the debts of civil servants. Now, of the two evils, I prefer choosing the least. I would endorse the suggestion of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) and also by the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie), that each department issue a circular, that any employee being garnisheed twice would be dismissed from the service, unless he could show good reason why he did not pay his debts.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Unless this Bill is passed, they cannot be garnisheed.

Mr. INGRAM. I understood, from the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), that in the province of Nova Scotia civil servants have no undue advantage over other classes of the community, and we are told that in the province of Ontario the same rule could be made applicable to civil servants. For that reason, as well as the other reasons I have named, I, for one, shall oppose this Bill. I understand, the Solicitor General intends opposing this Bill. When that hon. gentleman spoke upon this Bill before, he raised objections, which will be found on page 2955, unrevised addition of the "Hansard," and these objections are of such a character that we cannot hope for any support from that hon. gentleman for this Bill. The hon. gentleman says it is unconstitutional. Instead of accepting the suggestion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, after hearing all the discussion on the previous occasion and on this occasion, I consider it is simply loss of time for the House to go into Committee of the Whole, and I shall oppose the motion.

Mr. CALVERT. I think it is only fair that we should allow the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) to go into committee to consider this Bill. The hon. gentleman has proposed to eliminate all objectionable portions, and when we hear the amendment, no doubt the committee will agree with them. I cannot understand why any hon. member should desire a civil servant to occupy a different position in the country from any other citizen. If we took the vote of the civil servants, 95 per cent would vote that they should be placed on equal footing with every other citizen. I think if the proposition made by the hon. member for Lisgar, that the House should go into committee on this Bill, should meet with approval, and it is only fair to the hon. member that this should be done. The Bill should be reprinted, and should afterwards be passed.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. RICHARDSON. The discussion which has occurred on this Bill is exactly what I have desired. When I introduced the Bill I did it with but one object, and that was to remedy a grievance in the country. I did not introduce this Bill because I had any personal desire to do so, but because a great many people had spoken to me on the subject and urged that such a Bill should be introduced. Since my name has been connected with the Bill I have received petitions from many commercial associations, letters from all parts of the country, and from men of whom I never heard before, thanking me for the position I have taken and urging the adoption of this measure. Whether this Bill is right or wrong, I leave it for hon. members to decide, considering the merits of the question. I am not here to say anything against civil servants as a class. I believe as a class they are quite as honourable, and quite as above reproach as any class in the Dominion. The position I am here to take is that the exemption which exists in their favour should be removed and they should be placed on the same basis as all other classes in the Dominion. Surely that is a fair position. One hon. gentleman has spoken about the "fury" raised against the civil service in the country. Surely there is no "fury" against this class. So far as my observation goes there is as large a percentage of honest people in the civil service as in any other class in the Dominion. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) and other hon. members have spoken as if this Bill was specially directed against members of the civil service in Ottawa. I wish to remind the hon. member for Ottawa that there are others, and other hon. members who hold his views, that there are many civil servants throughout the Dominion besides those who live in the capital, and I am quite sure from the expression of opinions heard from members of the service that they themselves are quite satisfied that such a Bill as this should become law. They do not desire any special exemption, in fact many of them, doubtless a majority, consider it would be infinitely better in their own interest that such a Bill should become law. It may be asked, why should a layman take up this subject. I approached it with a great deal of diffidence and I discovered by the debate which took place, the extreme danger a layman like myself incurs in bringing a Bill like this before the House. I would not have done this, if any member of the legal profession had been prepared to introduce it. There is no particular glory in introducing a Bill of this description. There are no doubt very many clever lawyers in the House, and had any one essayed to introduce such a measure I would have been only too glad to have supported him. I was not in the House the other day during the closing hours of the debate—I had an important engagement and was obliged to leave the House for a brief time—but I read the remarks of various members who spoke on the Bill and I discovered that very many objections were raised. I discovered that the most prominent objections were raised to clauses 1 and 2 of the Bill. I did not draw the Bill; I had a number of legal friends draw Bills for me, I had three different Bills and I selected, on the advice of disinterested friends, the Bill which I considered covered the ground in the best way. I am not prepared to say that it is a constitutional Bill, but after obtaining the expression of the opinion of the House, if we could not find that we could carry a Bill that was constitutional, then, so far as I am concerned, I would be quite satisfied with a declaration from the Government that if any civil servant was sued twice that would be equivalent to a dismissal. I understand the rule in the United States is that if a civil servant is garnisheed that is tantamount to sacrificing his position. If the Government or members of the Government will rise and declare they will adopt that principle and will take such a measure to see that civil servants are placed in the same position as all other classes, I will be quite satisfied to withdraw the Bill. But I propose that, inasmuch as I have been memorialized by various mercantile associations throughout this country and been pressed all along the line to introduce and force to a conclusion such a Bill, if I do not obtain such a declaration from the Government, I propose to press my amendments in committee and leave members of the House to judge whether it is a righteous measure or not. If the committee will allow me, I desire to say that I have been considerably misrepresented in connection with this measure. I, like the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), have to complain of the spiteful misrepresentation of the correspondent of a paper published in the city where I reside—the Winnipeg "Free Press." I will read to the House one or two of the headings on a paragraph sent in respect to this effort of mine to put the civil servants in the same position as any other class of the community, and I will allow hon. members to judge whether I have been misrepresented in this effort or not: "Lisgar's Member. Severely Criticised by the Minister of Marine. An Attempt to Deceive. Richardson's Bill to Authorize the Attachment of Money in the Hands of the Government meets with general opposition. A Shocking Proposition." I listened to a portion of that debate, and it did not disclose general opposition, on the contrary, the consensus of opinion was that the principle of the Bill was all right. Many hon. gentlemen learned in the law took the view that it was not constitutional, and that it would be difficult to put it into operation, but so far as I could judge the general consensus of opinion was, that so far as my effort was concerned I was doing what I thought was right. I spoke to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) in regard to this, and whilst he saw the legal difficulties he considered that my efforts were in the right direction, and said he had no thought of reflecting on my action in the remarks he made. If any hon. member thinks that I attempted to mislead the House, or for a moment thought to railroad through any clause by deception, I would like him to state that to the House now. I know that members are obliged to submit to spiteful misrepresentations by spiteful correspondents, and as a newspaper man I am prepared to take my share of that. I want to vindicate myself before this House; I want hon. gentlemen to understand that I have but one object, and that is that civil servants may be placed on the same footing as any other class of the community. Recognizing the difficulties in the way, I have an amendment to propose which I think will meet with the general approval of the House. It probably does not go so far as I would like, but it is a step in the right direction, and if the amendment is adopted we will, I believe, discover in a year or two that the difficulty we wish to avoid will have entirely disappeared. I propose to substitute for clause one, the following:—

All moneys or salaries due or accruing due to any person employed by the Government of Canada shall be liable to attachment in each and every province of the Dominion of Canada, according to the laws and rules of procedure in force in such province.

That removes the exemption that exists in the provinces with regard to Dominion civil servants, and surely a clause of that kind will be acceptable. If, as many hon. members fear, such an Act as this will be expensive, I am sure that if the Government adopt the rule which I have urged: that any civil servant who is garnisheed twice shall forfeit his position, then the difficulty will be removed. That, after all, is the real way of getting at the evil. If the civil servants understand that they must not allow their salaries to be garnisheed, then they will readily pay their debts. Some years ago an Act of this kind was passed in the legislature of Manitoba, and they have the rule there, that if a civil servant is garnisheed twice he loses his position. That has been found to work admirably and no trouble has arisen from it and civil servants pay their debts like other citizens. It will not be necessary to employ lawyers or extra officials, because the moment that civil servants throughout the length and breadth of the land are placed in the same position as all other classes, that moment we will find that their debts will be paid. I made a personal allusion a moment ago, with reference to the spiteful manner in which I have been misrepresented, and I mentioned the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as stating to me that he perfectly approved of the principle of my Bill, and he believed I was perfectly honest in bringing it forward. Let me read a sentence from the speech which the hon. Minister (Sir Louis Davies) made on that occasion:

I think it would be possible, notwithstanding what my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron) has said, for this Parliament to enact a declaration, in some way or other, that the principle which prohibits the salary of civil servants from being attached should be removed. Some general law of that kind might be passed. When that difficulty is removed, then the local legislatures may enact a law enabling these salaries to be attached.

I may say that I took advantage of the suggestion of the Minister of Marine, and I went to the law clerk and had him draft a clause which I thought would cover the point. I also induced one or two of my legal friends in the House, men of great legal acumen, to draw up a clause covering that, and the result is the amendment which I have read to the House. Permit me to read the clause which I propose to substitute for clause two:

This Act not to apply to any debt contracted before its passage.

I have thought it would be unfair to make such an Act as I am introducing retroactive. I think that the civil servants should be placed in a perfectly fair position. Many of them have obligations hanging over them; old debts; and it would be ruin to such if this were a retroactive measure, and so I have decided that it shall only apply to debts contracted after the passing of this law. It will hardly be necessary for me, Mr. Chairman, to make any further explanation of this Bill.

Mr. INGRAM. What about section 3?

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the committee think that what I have substituted for clauses 1 and 2 will cover the object of the Bill, I have no objection to drop clause 3. My hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) characterizes the measure as illiberal. I have the highest estimation and the deepest respect for my hon. friend (Mr. Belcourt), but surely hon. gentlemen will recognize that a measure of this kind is not an illiberal measure, when it simply seeks to place the civil servant on the same footing as is occupied by every citizen of this country.

Mr. BELCOURT. Perhaps it does now, but it certainly did not before.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I explained, at the outset of the discussion, to the hon. member (Mr. Belcourt), that if he would wait until I introduced my amendment in committee it would probably meet with his approval. I take it from his remark that this now meets with his approval, and I shall be happy to get his support.

Mr. BEATTIE. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) allow me to ask him a question. Is he aware that under the present law in the province of Ontario the sum of $25 of wages cannot be garnisheed?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am aware of the existence of that law in Ontario, but there is nothing in my proposed amendment which will conflict with it.

Mr. BEATTIE. There is.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no desire to put the civil servant in Ontario in any different position from any other person in that province; nor have I any desire to put the civil servant in the province of Manitoba or in any other province of the confederation, on a different basis from that of his fellow-citizen. All I ask is, that civil servants shall be placed on the same footing as other members of society with respect to the laws of the provinces in which they live. I do not think anybody can object to that. If that is not a liberal, it is certainly an honest measure; and I believe that no member of this House can, after due deliberation, offer opposition to it. Its design is just, then why should we not adopt it? There may be constitutional difficulties raised, but if we place such an Act as this on the Statute-book it will be possible to garnisheed the salaries of civil servants, and if the Government adopt the rule which prevails in Washington: that persons who allow their salaries to be garnisheed twice shall lose their positions, then we get over the difficulty completely and there will be no cost whatever to the Dominion treasury in connection with the operation of the law.

Mr. BEATTIE. You will have to get the Ontario Government to repeal their present law. For instance, take a custom-house officer in the city of London. He is an Ontario citizen, and I do not think you could make that apply to him, because according to the laws of Ontario he would be exempt to the amount of $25.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have not the slightest objection to that. I would beg to move that clauses 1 and 2 be dropped, and that the clause I have read be inserted in their place; and also that clause 3 be dropped.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is quite obvious that my hon. friend has introduced a totally new Bill. I do not at all object to his doing so, and I dare say the new Bill will be found on consideration a great improvement on the one before us, and it may be one that will command the attention of the House. But he will see himself that in introducing a perfectly new Bill, it is only just and fair to the House that the new Bill should be printed before being discussed. I shall therefore ask him to move that the Bill be reprinted, and that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no objection to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, although I would like to know if there is any prospect, if that is done, of reaching the Bill again this session.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think so.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am exceedingly anxious that it should be passed.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the country is put to the expense of printing another Bill, I would like to draw the attention of the leader of the House to the remarks already made by the Solicitor General that deals with the amendment now before the House.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. If I might suggest to the hon. gentleman, as the Solicitor General is unfortunately absent to-night—

Mr. TAYLOR. I want to read what the Solicitor General said on this amendment.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Is it worth while discussing it?

Mr. TAYLOR. No further than to make this quotation, because I think that after I make it the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce will advise the hon. member to withdraw the Bill altogether. The Solicitor General said:

Suppose we declare here that the salaries of public officials in the employ of the Federal Government are attachable, and find ourselves in Quebec face to face with the statute there which declares that they are not attachable, immediately a conflict of authority would arise, which it seems to me desirable we should avoid.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no conflict there.

Mr. BEATTIE.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Solicitor General says that the salaries of federal officials are not attachable and you say they are.

Mr. INGRAM. If it is true that the Federal Parliament has not power to attach the salaries of public officials, this law would not be applicable in the province of Quebec at all, and therefore it would be entirely useless.

Mr. FLINT. I think it would be wise to accept the suggestion to have the Bill reprinted, and to discuss it at another time in the light of the remarks that have been made. I would therefore move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. CLANCY. The first ground on which the hon. member has rested his Bill is that it places civil servants on the same basis as all other persons; but I desire to point out that the hon. gentleman is absolutely destitute of any such ground. The Bill provides that the Crown may be made indirectly a party to every suit under this Bill; no person else can be; so that the Bill is placing them in an exceptional position in that respect. If I had a claim against any person in Canada who had moneys in the hands of the Crown, I could not proceed under this Bill; I would have to receive the assent of the Crown before I could proceed. Therefore, the Bill places civil servants in a position entirely different from that of everybody else in Canada. With regard to the drastic treatment which the hon. gentleman is proposing, that the civil servant should be dismissed upon any person twice bringing an action against him—

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is not in the Bill.

Mr. CLANCY. But the hon. gentleman advocates it in case of the Bill not becoming law. Let me point out what that would lead to. Some civil servant who has always paid his debts might fall sick and get behind, and might be made a victim by any one who chose to sue him twice.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Government could exercise its discretion.

Mr. CLANCY. I am pointing out what the aim of the hon. gentleman is. He repeated the statement two or three times this evening that he was quite willing to drop his Bill if the Government were prepared by Order in Council or resolution to adopt so drastic a measure. No such power should be in the hands of any person. I therefore think this Bill is surrounded with great danger.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 19th April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Mr. GIBSON moved :

That Bill (No. 40) to incorporate the Pacific and Eastern Railway Company, be withdrawn, and the fees thereon be refunded, less the cost of printing and translation, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. GIBSON moved :

That the first report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament be concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that just for the printing ?

Mr. GIBSON. This does not relate to the report presented to-day, but has reference to certain papers the printing of which was asked for by the hon. gentleman and the other members of the committee, and Dr. Dawson is simply waiting for concurrence in the report that he may go on with the printing.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 120) respecting the North American Telegraph Company.—(Mr. Hurley.)

DELAYED RETURN.

Mr. BERGERON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to remind the Minister of Marine and Fisheries of the question I put to him some time ago about the wharf at St. Anicet. Amongst the questions was this : "What is the amount of toll collected by Mr. Dupuis," the man who was in charge of the wharf then ; to which the hon. gentleman answered : "No statement of the collection has been received from the wharfinger, but he has been called upon by the Department of Marine and Fisheries to forward a statement." I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether this statement has come, and if so, would he be kind enough to lay it on the Table of the House ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I will make the necessary inquiries.

WAYS AND MEANS—RATE OF INTEREST ON DEPOSITS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. DAVIN. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to a matter of great importance to the country generally, and to a very important class of the poor and the thrifty in the community. When this debate was going on on Friday last, or rather in the early hours of Saturday morning, I was addressing the Government and the hon. gentlemen who happened to be in the Chamber, amongst whom, I may say, there was a very wakeful lot of members of the Opposition, and there was not a man on the opposition side of the House that was not fully awake, and from what has since come to my ears, I can safely say that without exception there was not a man on the Opposition side of the House that did not, in a way most gratifying to me, appreciate the facts and figures that at that early hour in the morning I brought before the attention of this House. I do not know what impression I made upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but I will say this, that the fumes of the Bohea, which I always find myself conducive to intellectual activity, must have quickened his usual apprehensiveness to a very high power ; and if so, I would fain hope that I had made a favourable and useful impression upon him. I do not know what impression I made upon the Minister of Finance, which may be of more importance, in the arguments I addressed to him relating to a feature of his Budget which I believe to be one of the worst features that has ever characterized any Budget brought forward in this House, which is inimical to the interests of the country, and which I trust the hon. gentleman would reconsider. Sir, the hon. gentleman, the Minister of Finance, in laying before this House his reasons for reducing the rate of interest on deposits in the post office savings banks, laid down certain propositions, and none of the propositions have a leg of logic, or fact, or sound reason to stand on. The first proposition was this, that in the establishing of the savings banks, and of the Government savings banks more particularly, the object had in view by those who established them was the safe-keeping of the money of the poor—that, he said, was the main object, not the profit that they gained, not the encouragement of thrift. Well, I was able to show, and I can show in a still more ample manner if necessary, that so far from that being the case, the main object held in view by those who established the savings banks originally in England, and subsequently in this country, was thrift ; and Mr. Gladstone lays down in his own eloquent and far-seeing way that there is no wealth in the community so great, so useful, so resourceful, so sinewy, so binding and clamping together of all the affairs of the community, as the principle of thrift amongst the poorer classes. Well, then, the second proposition that was laid down, and it was laid down not merely by the Minister of Finance, but it was supported by the powerful authority and weight of a statesman, the Minister of Trade and Commerce—it was this, that the depositors in our savings banks were men that did not need consideration, that there were poorer persons who had to pay the piper for their deposits, and that it was a mistake to suppose that it was the poor, the humble, the working classes, that were depositors in our savings banks. Then came the third proposition that the hon. gentleman, if not in form, yet by implication, laid down, namely, that in accordance with precedents, there should be a strict relation between the amount of interest allowed to depositors in the post office savings banks and the ordinary rate of discount in the chartered banks of the country. There, again, there is not a leg to stand on for this proposition. Now, Sir, it would be a pity if I did not give the Minister of Trade and Commerce a chance to explain in this House how it was that he who, in 1894, moved for a return which, as quoted by me, overturned completely the position that he laid down—how it was that he so misrepresented that return as to palm upon this House and upon the country the statement that the average depositor in the Government savings bank had a thousand dollars to his credit.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). No such statement was ever made.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I have the "Hansard" here.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. You have not in the least understood it. I will save the hon. gentleman a lot of trouble. What I said was this: That one-sixth of the depositors held very nearly three-fifths of the whole deposit, according to a return in 1894, and that some 26,000 depositors held among them twenty-five million dollars, being an average of about $1,000.

Mr. DAVIN. I am very glad the hon. gentleman retires from the position. I will give what the hon. gentleman said. If my hon. friend makes the statement now that he did not say what I said he did then, I will prove by "Hansard" that he is mistaken. If he retires from the position he took up, well and good. But I will prove to the House that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce laid it down that the average depositor had to his credit $1,000.

Mr. DAVIN.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I am very glad to hear the hon. gentleman, I am very glad to see that much evidence of the repentance that the Montreal "Star" has been hoping he would exhibit; it is edifying and the sooner we see that repentance still more complete, the more edifying it will be. Now, I will prove what I said in one moment. But meanwhile here is the language of the Minister:

It may be interesting to the House to know that in 1894 something like $25,300,000 of the then deposits, which amounted to about $40,000,000, were held by 26,000 depositors, being, as nearly as may be, at an average of $1,000 per head.

Is that correct?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That is perfectly correct.

Mr. DAVIN. Is this correct, that the depositors have at their credit $1,000 per head?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. What has that to do with the allegation that I represented that each depositor had over $1,000? There were 160,000 deposits in the bank.

Mr. DAVIN. I will read again what the hon. gentleman said:

It may be interesting to the House to know that in 1894 something like $25,300,000 of the then deposits, which amounted to about $40,000,000, were held by 26,000 depositors, being, as nearly as may be, an average of $1,000 per head.

What I attributed to the hon. gentleman was that he said that the deposits averaged $1,000 per head for 26,000 depositors.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That is not what the hon. gentleman said. What he said was each depositor. The depositors were 160,000, and if each had a deposit of $1,000 on an average, there would be $16,000,000 in the treasury.

Mr. DAVIN. I said average depositor.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It was exactly what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the hon. Minister of Finance consider that as a correct presentation of the state of things in the savings bank?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Perfectly.

Mr. DAVIN. Then I join issue with the hon. gentleman, and I will heap confusion on him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. I will heap confusion on him; a thousand "ohs" will not prevent my doing so. There was a return moved for by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on 25th April, 1894, as follows:—

Return to an order of the House, dated the 25th April, 1894, for a return showing :

1. The total number of depositors in the Dominion and Post Office Savings Banks.

2. The number of said depositors having deposits of $1,000 and upwards, and the total amount held by them.

3. The number having deposits of $500 and over, not exceeding $1,000, and the total amount held by them.

4. The number of depositors having deposits of less than $500, and the total amount held by them.

5. The number of depositors not residing in Canada, and the total amount held by them.

Now, mark this, the number of depositors having deposited more than $500 was 99,667, and the total amount of deposits was $10,312,558. The object, of course, was to present an argument that would bear especially on the present time, and I looked over the Public Accounts and found that the depositors from 1891 to 1896 were as follows :—

	1890-91. Number of Depositors.
From $1 to $10.....	53,217
11 20.....	26,247
21 50.....	37,561
51 100.....	17,685
101 200.....	7,965

Pretty much the same results following 1893-94. In 1896 the number of depositors averaging from $1 to $10 was 58,841. These persons so depositing are those represented by the hon. gentleman as having on an average $1,000 at their credit. What is the fact? The tabular statement will be found in the Public Accounts, and it shows that the average deposit in the Government savings banks, taking the whole $32,000,000 was standing at the credit of each depositor, $238; and yet the hon. gentleman represented that the average at the credit of the depositors, which was not true in 1894, which is not true now, which has not been true for a single year in the whole history of the savings bank, was $1,000, and the hon. gentleman thinks he is in a position from which he must not recede and therefore holds that the average deposits is of that amount. I defy the hon. gentleman to show it, and he will have an opportunity of doing so. According to the Public Accounts, the average amount standing at the credit of depositors was $238.85. Take 1894, when the hon. gentleman got his return, the average amount at the credit of each depositor then was $215. What is the result of analysing these figures? The analysis shows that 85 per cent are between $500 and $1,000; 8 per cent between $500 and $1,000; and 5 per cent over $1,000; yet hon. gentlemen try to convey the idea that the deposits did not represent the savings of hardworking people.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman give the amounts held by those depositors who had on deposit between $500 and $1,000, and the amount held by depositors who had over $1,000 invested.

Mr. DAVIN. I gave the figures the other evening, and the percentages are as I have stated. I now come to the question of the lowering of the rate of interest, and I say that the reduction of the rate of interest to 2½ per cent is unjustifiable, on the ground shown by the ex-Finance Minister, namely, that it would be actually a lower rate of interest than we were paying now for money borrowed in England. We have before us the precedents of England as well as the precedents of this country and other countries; but taking the precedents of England, what do we find? I showed the other night by quoting from the last returns of the Postmaster General the amounts on deposit in the post office savings banks in England at 2½ per cent interest, and I further showed by the return that the average amount in the chartered banks varied as regards interest from 2 to 3 per cent. If the hon. gentleman referred to what had been the tradition of the post office savings banks in the past, if he decided that he would be governed by English precedents, he would consider the calculation to be one in proportion, as follows :—As 2 or 3 per cent is to the average rate in the chartered banks of Canada, 5 or 6 per cent, so is 2½ per cent allowed in the English post office savings banks to the result. It will give you far more than 3 per cent, and what it would give would be, on the English basis, what might be allowed as interest in the Government savings banks. That seems to have dawned on the present Finance Minister, and it rather astonished me, because he has been a journalist, and as a rule journalists study almost every question. They are the most widely read, if not the most profoundly read of all the community.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I have to put in that qualification, because you cannot always have extent combined with depth. You may occasionally have it, but, as a rule, anyway, journalists are the most widely read men in the community. Sir, Lord Goulburn, Sir George Cornwall Lewis, Mr. Gladstone, they studied this question; they have dealt with the very matter which is being discussed here, and they refused to take any part in the reduction of interest on savings banks deposits. Lord Goulburn refused to look at it from the standpoint that we should only pay to the poor depositors in the savings banks the interest that was, as it were, legally due on their deposits. These eminent men studied the question, and they would not banish the idea of thrift. And, Sir, what was the result of their encouraging the post office savings bank? Why, between 1825 and 1841, and between 1841 and 1861, as the savings banks increased, and the number of depositors in the savings banks increased, and the deposits increased in amount, the number seeking for poor relief decreased in proportion, and in that way the nation was strengthened and repaid for its generous treatment of the depositors. The nation was repaid in two ways. In the first place, the money taken out of the treasury for poor relief was saved, and in the second place, the manhood of the nation was saved, and it gave it an extent of backbone and strength that it would not otherwise have had.

So, Sir, I say it is a pity that the shortsighted and poor conception of this question has presented itself as it has to the Minister of Finance. The other night, I quoted what Mr. Fawcett had done when he was Postmaster General, and how Mr. Fawcett, following the lines of Mr. Gladstone, would not banish from him the idea of thrift. Mr. Fawcett had to meet with these bankers; he had to meet with objections of the moneyed forces, but he never yielded to them, and I read to you the other night how that gentleman, when Postmaster General of England, followed in the wake nobly set him by previous statesmen, and refused to listen to the remonstrances of the chartered banks. Indeed, Sir, it is not in the interest of the chartered banks themselves even, in the end, because it affects actually at no distant date the wealth of the country, and it is not in the interest of any portion of the community, much less that portion of the community so completely concerned in our material and commercial progress as bankers, that the course taken by the hon. the Finance Minister should be approved of. I, therefore, move, seconded by Mr. Hale :

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that this House regrets the determination of the Government to lower the rate of interest paid to the depositors in the Post Office Savings Banks, and would urge its reconsideration.

Mr. MACLEAN. While a great deal may be said in favour of this proposition of the Government, there is something to be said on the other side in the interest of the Canadian people. The main objection against the proposal of the Government to reduce the rate of interest on the savings bank deposits is, that by it the Government are making their savings banks a less encouraging place for people to deposit their money in, and so the people are driven to deposit their money in a lot of concerns that call themselves savings banks, and which year after year rob from the people of Canada a million dollars. I believe that, for the last ten or fifteen years, an average of $1,000,000 annually has been lost on account of people depositing in so-called savings banks and private banks which are not solvent. It is the duty of the Government to encourage the people to place their money in a sound institution, such as the Government savings bank. We have in Ontario a law regulating the loan companies of that province, but that law is not administered as it ought to be, and the public are not protected as they ought to be. It is high time that this Parliament, and that the legislature of Ontario, should move in the direction of protecting the people who deposit their money in these wildcat concerns. It is a backward step for this Parliament to take, when it passes legislation which drives the people from depositing in a solvent institution, like the Government savings bank, and compels them to invest in these worthless monetary institutions. I, consequently, believe that it is a mistake for the Government to reduce the rate of interest on savings bank deposits.

Mr. BENNETT. I wish to express my sympathy with the resolution of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). While I have not carefully gone into the figures presented to the House, I do know, from observation in the town in which I reside, that the labouring men deposit their savings to a considerable extent in the post office bank. It is within my experience, that men with small earnings, who have earned their dollars hard, are anxious to deposit them in some such place as the post office savings bank, which gives them a guarantee of security, and which has the endorsement of the Dominion of Canada. In addition to what the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) has referred to, the failures of so-called loan companies, there have been an astounding number of losses through private bankers collapsing. There is hardly a little town in western Ontario which has not in the last few years been the victim of these so-called private banking enterprises; and many people who have been attracted to them by the higher rates of interest they have offered, have been losers to a very considerable extent. Not only has this been the experience of people who have been perhaps able to lose their money, or who have a lifetime before them in which to retrieve their losses, but large amounts of trust funds have been lost in this way. In the city of Toronto, I know of two cases, which are well authenticated, of men having actually suicided because of the losses they have suffered in these concerns. If the Government is going to reduce the rate of interest to the extent proposed, it must necessarily follow that poor people will be driven more than ever to deposit in these hazardous banking institutions, with the view of getting something tangible for their money. I do trust that the Government will reconsider this proposition. While it may effect a considerable saving in the interest to be paid by the Government, still I think it would be preferable to increase some of the customs duties to make up the difference; or, better than that, the Government should in some of the departments where they have promised rigid economy, practice that economy, and make up the loss that would be caused by keeping up the rate of interest.

Mr. FOSTER. We have had this question fairly well debated, and there are just one or two points that I would like to emphasize before it passes away, if indeed this ends the discussion on so important a matter. One of the reasons advanced for reducing the rate of interest upon the savings bank deposits is this, that the prime object for which the savings banks were instituted has largely gone out, namely, to provide a place of savings for depositors of small means—for men receiving small earnings, who are not able to have by them at one time sufficient for an independent and outside investment. That argument is, I think, untenable in the light of the facts. You may easily make up an average to show that a very small number of persons hold a comparatively large amount of funds in these savings banks; but that is not conclusive. You have to look at the overwhelmingly large number of those whose money on deposit, although not very heavy in the aggregate, represents to them a great deal of thrift and small investment. In this respect the return which was asked for in 1894 is very suggestive. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) has very thoroughly gone into the figures, but it will not harm to bring them out again. The number of depositors who at that time had $1,000 or more in the post office savings banks was only 5,418—a very small number. It cannot fairly be said that these were wealthy men.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but I apprehend from the printed returns in the Public Accounts that the return he has in his hands is only a partial one. He will observe that in 1894 the sum total of all our savings banks deposits was $43,036,000. It strikes me that the return refers only to the post office savings banks.

Mr. FOSTER. I am taking both kinds of savings banks. What I was going on to say was that we must not judge from the fact that these 5,418 depositors have each $1,000 or upwards in the savings banks, that they are not poor persons; because the conditions which existed then, and which exist now, provide that a person may deposit a certain sum every year up to a maximum, and he may continue to deposit up to that maximum year after year; but the deposit must not go above a certain aggregate. That aggregate was very large formerly, but by regulation it has been brought down, so that I think the maximum that can now be held is $1,000. But my argument is this, that for all we know, and indeed it is probable, the larger number of these depositors have put in that $1,000 in the course of three, four or five years. In small sums from time to time. When you come to the depositors having between $500 and $1,000 each, the number is 9,200. The argument holds still more with these, that they are likely to be poor people who have been depositing that amount, little by little, for a number of years, the deposits being the results of their steady savings. Even then the number is small. But when you come to the number of depositors having less than $500, what do you find? You find that the number goes up to pretty nearly 100,000 people—99,657, while in both of the other classes together you have less than 15,000. Now, I care not what is the aggregate amount at the credit of each of these two classes. I hold that the thrift and saving is represented by the 99,000 as compared with the 5,000 and the 9,000 who have between $500 and $1,000 on deposit.

Now let us come to the Dominion savings banks. Those depositors who have to their credit from $1 to $500 amount to 45,305. Those that have from $500 to $1,000 amount to 5,127, and those that have $1,000 and upwards amount only to the small number of 4,607. So that out of the total number of depositors of 55,039, 45,305 have less than $500 in the Dominion savings banks. If you add 45,000 and 99,000 together, you get pretty well up to an aggregate of 150,000 persons who hold less than $500 each in the savings banks of both kinds as compared with 15,000 who hold from $500 to $1,000, or above $1,000. That is indisputable proof that these deposits are not the deposits of moneyed men for convenience sake, but the deposits of poor men who put their money there for the sake of saving what little they can keep out of what is necessary for their daily or monthly or yearly expenses—not enough, as I have said, to make an independent outside investment, but sufficient to put by, in the children's names or the wife's name or the father's name, in a convenient post office near by, where it can be done right under their eyes and with perfect security. What would become of these if these offices were not established? In nine cases out of ten, the saving would not take place. The little amounts would go for expenditures of one kind or another, and what is of greater moment than the habits of thrift in the family, which are promoted by the parents saying to the children: Now, you have so much money in your little bank, put that in the post office savings bank, and let it draw interest for you, and see how much you will have when you are twenty-one or eighteen years of age. Everybody knows that that process is going on from one end of the country to the other; and in these days of comparative extravagance and high living, it is an inestimable lesson for the young people of this country to learn. I am not going to say that a large proportion of this money will not be kept in the savings banks, even when you reduce the interest to 2½ per cent, but is it not something that the country owes to the great mass of the people who do deposit in these banks, that it should give them an incentive to learn habits of thrift by making these investments. I commend this most earnestly to the Government, in the hope that even yet it is not too late for the Government to reconsider their policy. Leaving aside the other argument, I think I have proved beyond doubt that it is an encouragement to thrift and saving that is proved by these figures I have given.

Now, how is it with reference to the other argument. I am not going into a laboured argument, but it seems to me that with the money rate as it is in this country, with the bank rates as they are in this country, the Government might very well have left the rate as it was, without any fear that it would react or act adversely to the general credit of the country. I think it will not act that way. I do not think you will find that because you take away from these depositors the one-half per cent that they have been used to getting, the great mass of borrowers in this country, for business or other purposes, will get their money a single shade cheaper than they are getting it to-day, because I believe that 3 per cent is a fair and reasonable value for money—that is for money in the gross. Very few people at this day get money from the banks at 5 or 6 per cent on business ventures, on call loans or short loans; more are paying 7 per cent than 5 per cent by long odds, and 6 per cent is about the average rate that the banks will charge on loans for business purposes and business ventures of a good kind, too. So that while you are taking away a strong inducement to thrift on the part of the people, you are giving no benefit to the great mass of the people, and I believe that the reduction is a great folly. I am sorry, therefore, that the Government has undertaken to reduce the rate by one-half per cent.

The argument relied on by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was this. He said you might add about three-eighths per cent for management, and then you would be putting this rate on about a par with what we are getting money for in this last loan. I want to call this fact to the attention of my hon. friend. Unless you anticipate the closing of the savings banks entirely—and I do not imagine that the hon. Finance Minister anticipates or contemplates that at all—you are not saving, comparatively speaking, one single cent in the matter of expense. So long as you have savings banks at all, you will pay about the same for managing banks that have in them $20,000,000 of deposits as you will for managing those that have in them $50,000,000 of deposits. You have about $50,000,000 in your Government savings banks to-day. Suppose that $20,000,000 or $50,000,000 of those deposits are taken from your banks, the cost of carrying them on will not be lowered to any extent at all. On the contrary, in proportion you will have heightened it because you will have just about the same expense whether you are administering $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 or $50,000,000. So that you will save nothing at all in the item of the expenses of management by the reduction of one-half per cent, and if that has the effect of driving a portion of these deposits out of the Government savings banks, I am afraid it will end disastrously. What the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) said is true. A portion of these depositors will be attracted from the said Government savings banks to the less safe—I am not going too far in that—loan companies of the country. Far be it from me to say a single word against the credit and standing of the loan companies, and I am not going to do that, but I say that they are not any safer—and I think the chances are they are not nearly so safe—than the Government savings banks; and you administer almost a stinging blow to the habit and thrift and saving among the people if you drive them to put their investments where they are liable to meet a loss, because then they will argue: what is the use of our trying to save? We put our savings in the savings banks, and they go to pieces and we lose all, and we might just as well spend the money as we make it. Taking all these things into consideration—and I am not speaking from any partisan point of view—the Government are making a mistake, and it would not be unwise in them to revise their opinion, and instead of saving half a million dollars by reducing the rate of interest on these deposits, which encourage thrift, they would do better to try and live up to their ante-election pledges and dock the expenditure by $200,000. We would be then just as well off by the end of the year and the country would be much better off.

Mr. McDougall. Coming as I do from a part of a province where there is a large number of labouring people and others, who, at the cost of great sacrifice, manage to save a little money for deposits in the Government banks, in order that they may earn a little interest, I feel I would not be doing my duty if I were to remain silent on this question. I find that in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, we have a much higher rate of deposits per head of our population than the other provinces have. I have here a statement of the average deposits per head of the population in 1896; and according to that, I find that while the average deposits per head of the population of the Dominion in that year was $9.13, in the province of Nova Scotia the average was $19.46; in New Brunswick it was $25.43; in Prince Edward Island, $20.05; in Ontario, $9.02; in Quebec, $3.23, and so on.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one very strong reason why the amount on deposit per head of population in the province from which I come is so large is that a large proportion of our people are of the mining class who manage to save a little money from their wages. They feel that there is less certainty of constant employment for them than for many other classes, and they manage, with great sacrifice for the time being to the comfort and convenience of their families to save a little when they have the opportunity, and they put these savings, for convenience, in the Government savings bank. I feel that the change in the policy of the Government with regard to the interests on these deposits will be very hard on this class of people, and it will have the effect of causing a great many of them failing to continue to put their little savings in these banks, and, in some cases even to withdraw what they have there and put their savings into investments that are not safe and will not, perhaps, in the end, prove so profitable. For these reasons, I feel that I should not be doing my duty if I were not to enter my protest against this reduction in the rate of interest, which was already small enough—for I consider that 3 per cent interest is low enough as compared with what these people would have to pay if they had to borrow money from the banking or loan institutions of the country. The difference between what they receive and what they have to pay, which was great enough before, will be greater than ever now. This step will not afford the people any guarantee that when they want a hundred or a thousand dollars they will be able to borrow it at a less rate of interest than they do at present. A number of banking institutions of the country, who were not placed so conveniently within the reach of the people as the Government savings bank, are paying 3 or 3½ per cent, and I cannot see the reason why the Government should reduce the interest they pay to 2½ per cent, especially while they pay for what moneys they obtain from other quarters at a higher rate than 2½ per cent, and considerably higher when you consider the expenses connected with obtaining these loans, even those which are obtained on the most favourable terms. Therefore, I do hope that the hon. Finance Minister will see the propriety of reconsidering this matter and restoring the old rate of 3 per cent interest on the deposits of the poor class of people. For it is the poor and not the wealthy class that are affected by this. We cannot say that a man who has five or six hundred dollars or even a thousand dollars saved from his hard labour extending over many years should be classed among the wealthy or even among the comfortable. It is the poor that this will affect and for that reason I appeal to the Finance Minister to restore the half cent that he proposes to take off the savings of the poorer class of people.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). This matter was pretty well discussed in the general debate on the Budget, and, I suppose we cannot get much new light on it to-day. So far as the argument goes in relation to the encouragement of saving and thrift in the small depositors, it is one which has to a very large extent my sympathy. The difficulty, however, is that the moneys in the savings banks, as has been pointed out by several speakers, are to a large extent, not the moneys of small depositors but the moneys of persons in moderate circumstances, and not the particular class for whom the savings banks were designed.

Mr. DAVIN. Would my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) allow me a moment?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIN. I make the statement, which statement my hon. friend is in a position to test, that 50 per cent of the depositors have to their credit less than $100 each.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That may be correct and yet my statement be correct also. The returns of 1894 used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) in his remarks showed that out of the total amount of forty-two millions about fourteen and three-quarter millions were held by six per cent of the depositors. I am not denying that a large number of depositors hold small sums. I quite realize that that is the fact. But the figures show that the bulk of the savings are not held by the small depositors but by those having larger deposits. The Minister of Trade and Commerce made an observation in the course of his speech in the Budget debate which is now occupying the attention of the Government—that we should endeavour to make some discrimination between the smaller depositors and those whose deposits are larger. This might be done by a differential rate in the savings bank itself, but this would be somewhat inconvenient. Or it might be done, as the hon. Minister suggested, by the issue of Canadian stock, such as was issued some years ago, bearing 3 per cent interest and payable on a fixed date. Either of these would meet the cases of the small depositors and encourage thrift. This is well worthy of consideration, and, as the change is not to take effect until 1st July next, there will be ample time to consider that side of the question. As far as the bulk of the deposits are concerned, I feel confident that the views of hon. gentlemen opposite are erroneous. Every argument used for a higher rate than the ordinary commercial rate is, in my opinion, a mistake. Canada has everything to gain by such a rate for borrowers as will encourage the industries of the country, and if, by the action of the Canadian Government, we have an artificial value placed upon money, I do not think that that is the best way to develop the trade of the country. At all events, we have a strong opinion that inasmuch as by the acknowledgment of all concerned, there has been an artificial value placed on money by the high interests on savings bank deposits, we should not continue that but, as respects, at all events, the larger depositors, we should pay only the fair value of the money. I know that it is argued that, no matter what your savings bank rate is, it will not affect the rate of discounts at the banks. I think that is a mistake.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think the argument was pressed that far, whatever may have been said, because that would not be fair—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The argument was certainly that, so far as any changes we had made, no difference had been caused in the rate of accommodation to the public, and that it was not going to make any difference. I admit that the difference does not become perceptible in a moment. A great change of that kind must come about gradually. But I believe the change is already taking place and that it will continue to extend its effects, and that the result of the course we are pursuing will be to make money cheaper to the borrowers of the country. I happen to have a helper here from whom we do not generally get much comfort—I refer to the Toronto "Mail and Empire." This journal contains an interview with Mr. D. R. Wilkie, general manager of the Imperial Bank of Canada. I know that the opinion of a banker is not regarded by some as worthy of much weight in this discussion. One hon. gentleman referred to the banks as financial sharks. I suppose that, if we want things from the banks which we cannot get, we are apt to consider them a hard lot. But the fact remains that they occupy a very important position in carrying on the business of the country, and I do not think that anybody will deliberately say that the opinion of the managers of the great banks in the country is not worthy of consideration. An hon. friend near me says that Mr. Wilkie is a Tory. I have the pleasure of knowing Mr. Wilkie, but I do not know his politics. Of course, the fact that he has carried his interview to the "Mail and Empire" is suggestive. The "Mail and Empire," introducing the interview, says :

Mr. D. R. Wilkie, general manager of the Imperial Bank of Canada, has come out strongly in support of the Government policy of reducing the rate of interest on deposits in post office savings banks from 3 per cent to 2½ per cent. A "Mail and Empire" representative interviewed Mr. Wilkie yesterday, and the latter outlined his main arguments on the matter.

"I am totally opposed," said Mr. Wilkie, "to making the policy of the Government a political issue. It is one of commercial expediency, pure and simple, and the Government should be allowed to take the responsibility for its action without opposition from the Conservatives. Were I not firmly convinced that it is not a political question, my mouth would be closed."

Mr. Wilkie goes on to make an observation of which I have no knowledge, but hon. gentlemen opposite have.

Mr. FIELDING.

As many people are well aware, it was the desire of the late Conservative Government to bring about a reduction in the rate of interest paid to the depositors in post office savings banks which would bring it into some proportion with the interest paid on Government loans.

What I suppose it means is that my hon. predecessor in office realized, as I did, that it was a desirable thing, but for good reasons, I do not say for reasons other than good, he hesitated to do it.

Mr. FOSTER. I will tell my hon. friend what I think it means. It means that this rate was reduced from 4 per cent to 3½ per cent by the Conservative Government, and that it was the intention of the Government in due course to reduce it from 3½ per cent to 3 per cent.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. "And so on," not of course stopping at 3 per cent. Then Mr. Wilkie goes on to point out that if you consider a gold reserve, which ought to be held, perhaps we might argue, as against savings bank deposits, the rate we are allowing is a very considerable one. But passing that point, he presents what the editor's heading describes as "The borrowers' side of it." He says :

In addition to that feature, is the fact that the lower the rate of interest paid by the Government to depositors, the lower the rate charged by the borrower. The post office savings bank has kept up for years a rate of interest to borrowers, in consequence of the large sums locked up, higher than it should be to enable borrowers to compete with the foreign manufacturer and the trader. The proposed reduction should be hailed with delight by the borrowing community, who are really the class on whom the country's development is most dependent.

Now, I take that to mean that in Mr. Wilkie's opinion, as a banker, the borrowers will receive the advantage which they should from this reduction in the rate of interest. But if hon. gentlemen opposite are determined to regard the bankers as mere financial sharks, and if we are to regard them as men whose opinion is not entitled to any consideration, if it is to be popular to attack the bank in the House with the view of making a little party capital, then I want to go outside of the banking community and offer the opinion of a commercial body. I have received to-day from the secretary of the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto a communication conveying a resolution which he informs me was unanimously passed by the council of the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto :

Whereas the payment of the Government of 3 per cent upon post office savings deposits is, by virtue of the cost of management and the necessity of keeping a reserve against demands equal in reality to 3½ per cent ;

And whereas the Government has effected and can effect loans at a net cost of 2½, or ¾ of 1 per cent under what is presently the cost of post office savings bank deposits ;

And whereas the rate which the Government pays for deposits is a standard by which rates of interest are to a large extent regulated, and, if unduly high causes the withdrawal of money from trade and increases the cost of money to the farmer, the trader and the manufacturer, conduces to hoarding and checks enterprise ;

And whereas this Board of Trade has for a number of years past advocated a reduction in the rate of interest on post office savings deposits to a figure that, with expenses added, would not exceed the cost of moneys borrowed for fixed periods by way of debentures ;

Be it therefore resolved that this council approves the decision of the Government to reduce the rate of interest paid upon post office savings bank deposits to 2½ per cent on the 1st of July next.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend sustain the position of the Board of Trade of Toronto that we have to keep a reserve for our post office payments ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, as a matter of law we have not to keep any, but there is much to be said in favour of keeping it, and I am inclined to the opinion that it would not be inaccurate to say that it is something which should always enter into the consideration of a Minister of Finance, though to-day there is no legal enactment on the subject.

Mr. DAVIN. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask a question ? Mr. Gladstone says—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member who had the floor did not seem to object to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) asking a question.

Mr. DAVIN. The quotation from Mr. Gladstone dealing with that subject holds quite a contrary opinion to that of the board of trade.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. All we are concerned with in this instance is the fact that the council of the Board of Trade of the great city of Toronto, representing not bankers, but representing traders and merchants of that city, second perhaps in number only, I imagine, to the Board of Trade of the city of Montreal, is a body to which we ought to pay great attention on commercial and financial questions. The Board of Trade of the city of Toronto, by unanimous resolution of its council, has declared that the policy of reducing the interest in the savings banks is sound policy, not in the interest of the banks only, but in the interest of the trade and commerce of the country, in the interest of the borrowers.

An hon. MEMBER. What is the date of the letter ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The letter is dated the 16th of April, and I think the meeting was held on the same day. Now, I do not wish to argue this at any further length. I have already stated that as respects the class of smaller depositors to whom reference is made, I have much sympathy with what has been said ; and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, at an early stage of this debate the other day, suggested that the Government might still further consider whether something should not be done to deal with these small depositors as a distinct class from the larger depositors. That matter is under consideration, and the Government have every desire to do what is fair and reasonable to encourage thrift in that class of depositors, while at the same time not paying on the bulk of the deposits a rate of interest more than the fair value of money, and one which disturbs the business conditions of the whole country.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is not the board from whom this resolution came, which the Minister of Finance has quoted, composed of some seven or eight bankers in the city of Toronto ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I cannot answer my hon. friend's question, but I know that in the community in which I have lived for the most of my life, a representative meeting of the board of trade would naturally represent the business elements, and I do not imagine that the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto differs in this respect from boards of trade elsewhere.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is it the banking section of the board of trade who passed that resolution ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will read the letter I have received from the secretary :

I have the honour, by direction of the council, to place in your hands copy of a resolution unanimously adopted in connection with the Government's proposal, now before the House, for the reduction of interest on post office savings bank deposits.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Yours faithfully,
EDGAR A. WILLS.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a resolution of the council.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Of the council, as I said.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not wish to prolong this debate, but to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to two very important points as to the support which he has claimed for the action of the Government from the paper which he has just read to the House. The hon. gentleman, in the first instance, I think, was mistaken as to the source from which this had emanated. The hon. gentleman refers to the board of trade, and to the great importance which the opinion of the Board of Trade of Toronto should have in this House. Now, Sir, it appears that this is not a report of the Board of Trade of Toronto at all, but the communication comes from the council of the board of trade, which would naturally embrace these leading banking and financial influences with which we are contending. No person doubts for a single moment that the banking interest of Canada is entirely in favour of the view that the hon. gentleman holds; no person in this House can doubt for a moment that the Minister of Finance would have at his back every banking and financial institution in this country if he would cut down the interest to 2 per cent on the deposits of the poorer classes of this country. The hon. gentleman has admitted that the great bulk of the depositors are poor, they may be classed as thrifty poor, but it is most important in the interests of the country that they should be induced to husband their resources. The hon. gentleman has also destroyed the value of the evidence which he has just given from the council of the Board of Trade of Toronto, because he has shown by his own statement to the House that the council of the board of trade were altogether wrong in the premises upon which they based their argument. The council of the board of trade stated in this paper, that, in their judgment, the Government of Canada is compelled to hold a large reserve of money for the purpose of meeting those deposits in the savings banks. The Minister of Finance has just explained that they are all wrong in their premises, because no such deposits are held, although perhaps it is worthy of consideration as to whether they should be held. I do not propose to prolong this discussion, because to do so would be useless from the position the Finance Minister has taken after the cogent arguments, the unanswerable arguments advanced from this side of the House. Let me ask the Finance Minister, if he can put his finger on the government of any country which is doing what he is doing? The mover of this resolution has shown that the policy adopted by the present Government is entirely at variance with the practice of the Government of the great Imperial country to which we belong, and, while we all admit the wisdom and propriety of having the interest paid to depositors bear some due relation to the cost to Canada of obtaining the money from other sources, the hon. Minister of Finance cannot show any country where the Finance Minister or Chancellor of the Exchequer is demanding a sacrifice at the hands of the thrifty poor, whose saving deposits should be encouraged, and refusing to pay them interest equal in amount to that paid to the great monetary institutions from which loans are obtained. The hon. gentleman has admitted that he paid 2½ per cent for the $10,000,000 borrowed for a term of fifty years, the lenders well knowing that, in all probability, twenty-five years hence they would not be able to obtain over 2 per cent for their money. When the hon. gentleman told the House that he was paying 2½ per cent to those large financial institutions which have loaned money to Canada, he failed to show to this House any ground, or to give any substantial reason why the Government of Canada should treat the thrifty poor in the mode proposed, to do that which has never been done before in Canada by any Government, even by the former Liberal Government. They made a reduction before, but they still kept the interest paid to savings bank depositors at about the rate which was paid by the Dominion for loans obtained abroad. Had the hon. Finance Minister maintained and pursued that policy, the House would have seen the reasonableness of it, but the hon. gentleman, by reducing the rate of interest paid to thrifty depositors, will induce them, in many instances, to withdraw their savings and risk the amounts in institutions which will not afford them the safety and security of the post office savings banks, and which probably will result in disaster and trouble to the poorer classes. The hon. gentleman stands to-day without having been able to offer any precedents, any arguments, or furnish any proof of necessity for the step taken, and I believe this action on the part of the Government will be regarded as a heavy blow and a great discouragement by a vast portion of the industrial depositors, whom it is of the utmost importance that Canada should induce to husband their resources by depositing them in the savings banks. The statement made, that we must provide for the expenses connected with the administration of the savings banks goes to the wall, because these banks are part of the post office system. The same parties who are employed in other branches of the postal service, take charge of the post office savings banks.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is a percentage paid, according to the amount of the deposits.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We would sweep away the utility of the whole post office, if we applied the principle which the hon. gentleman is applying to the savings banks. Does not every one know that, for the purpose of giving postal facilities to the people, a large amount is taken from the consolidated revenues, and why, therefore, we should take the ground that we must give a lower rate of interest on deposits and take action with respect to the savings department which we do not adopt with regard to any department of the public service, I do not understand. I will not prolong the argument, because the Finance Minister stands before the House without having been able to adduce any precedent, any argument, or any answer to the unanswerable arguments offered in criticism of a policy that I believe will be condemned, and justly condemned, by the people.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the Finance Minister was in severe straits, when he quoted, as authorities in favour of his proposal, an able banker, Mr. Wilkie, and a very acute one, as his interview with the "Mail and Empire" would indicate, and the council of the board of trade. The bank, I am told, reduced its rate on deposits some time ago, or is reducing it now, on the ground stated by the manager, that there is too much money being forced upon them. The bank reduced the rate of interest, and the "Mail" published a statement, which I give for what it is worth, to the effect that the bank was induced by the Finance Minister to invest in the loan made last autumn or winter and take a larger amount than it could easily handle. The bank has, therefore, a little grudge against the Finance Minister, and in order to appease the bank, he came down with this reduction of the rate of interest paid to depositors in the Government savings bank. What are the facts of the case? Mr. Wilkie is the manager, I believe, of the Imperial Bank. How does the bank stand? I have here the bank statement for 1st January last, and this statement shows that the bank, on 1st January, had at deposit payable on demand, $3,600,000, and of deposits payable after notice on a fixed day, over $7,018,000. That is, they had, on a capital of $2,000,000, permanent deposits, payable after a fixed date, of over $7,000,000. They had ample funds at their disposal, and a large sum they could not apparently invest profitably. What does the general statement of the bank show? On 1st January, deposits payable on demand were over $78,000,000, and there were deposits by the people after notice or on a fixed date of $140,700,000. Between the deposits payable on demand and the deposits payable on a fixed date, there were over $220,000,000 in the banks of Canada on deposit. These banks reduced the rate of interest, and, in order to make the public swallow the dose, they presumably put a pistol at the head of the Government and compelled them to reduce the rate of interest on savings bank deposits. I dispute the statement that 2½ per cent is the rate of interest paid to depositors in the post office savings banks.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Who said that?

Mr. WALLACE. You, yourself, Sir.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The figures I gave were $2.86.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of Finance stated to the House that when you counted the expenses of administering the Government saving banks, the rate paid to the depositors would be about the same as the rate of the last loan.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Of course this change does not take place until the 30th June, and I stated, that barring the war scare or anything of that kind, we anticipated that our securities would advance. I said that 2½ per cent, plus the cost of management, would probably bring it to a rate to correspond with what our credit would be on the 1st of July next, assuming there was nothing accidental to interfere with the condition of the market.

Mr. WALLACE. That is practically what I have been saying. I said that the Minister of Finance told us that the 2½ per cent paid to post office bank depositors, when you added the expenses to it, would bring it to about 2½, which was about the amount paid on the last loan. Now, Sir, in the post office savings bank the payment of interest on deposits commences on the first of the month, and if a deposit is made at the beginning of the middle of the month no interest is computed on it until the first of the following month. In the same way if a depositor draws money on the last day of the month, say the last day of March, he is not allowed interest on that money for the month of March. I was informed some years ago, and I think the statement is correct, that these lapses of interest on such deposits, paid the expenses of administering the post office saving banks, and that being the case, the Minister of Finance made a mistake when he added ½ of 1 per cent for the cost of administration. As a matter of fact 2½ per cent interest is all the depositor gets in the Government savings bank, and 2½ per cent is all that the money costs the Government. That being the case, the Government paid more interest on their last loan, and I say, Sir, the Government have no right to pay to the great money lenders of Europe or anywhere else, a larger amount of interest than they pay to the depositors of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. And the money lenders were paid before the Government got their money.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, that is so. More than that, we know from the experience of the last fifty years, and the last twenty years, and the last ten years, that the rate of interest has continually been going down. We have no reason to suppose that that decrease is ended, but on the contrary as the wealth of the world increases we may fairly estimate that the rate of interest will continue to decrease, and that is the judgment of the Finance Minister himself, who told us that in his opinion when another loan was made some years hence it would be at a still lower rate. The Minister made his last loan for fifty years at 2½ per cent, and he, therefore, is actually paying less to the depositors of Canada than he is paying to the European money lenders. In my opinion it was wise in the first instance to establish the post office savings bank in order to encourage our people in habits of thrift and economy. It is also wise that we should continue to encourage the people in these habits, and so there will be widespread dissatisfaction at this reduction of the rate of interest. I contend, Sir, that the rate of interest should have remained at 3½ per cent, and should not have been reduced last year to 3 per cent and this year to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. As has been pointed out, private banks pay 5 per cent on deposits, and so the Government is only giving one-half the rate of interest that can be obtained in these other institutions. That will be the means of inducing the public to deposit in these private banks where the security is not so sound, but where the interest is twice as high. That will lead in the future as it has done in the past to disaster to hundreds of poor people, because as has been pointed out, during the last ten years the average loss to depositors by the failure of private banks and other such monetary institutions has been \$1,000,000 per annum. Mr. Wilkie states in this interview that he favours the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent rate. Of course he does, for it is in the interest of his bank to do it; but the interests of the people of Canada should be of much greater concern to Parliament and to Government than the interests of any banks. I am sure, Sir, it was the pressure brought by the banks that induced the Minister of Finance to reduce the rate of interest, and it was not done because of any consideration of the public welfare, nor because of these patriotic motives which we are told will result some time in the future by which manufacturers and borrowers can get money at a lower rate. The banks today have \$140,000,000 on deposit, payable at a fixed date in the future; that is abundance of money for them, and they have no right to attempt to divert the savings bank deposits to their coffers, when in these savings banks the people have the amplest security, and by their means are trained to habits of economy. But, Mr. Speaker, there is another consideration. Suppose the people of this country should say: Very well, Mr. Minister of Finance, we will not accept your $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; we will find other means of investing our money and we will deposit it in other institutions. There is \$50,000,000 in these institutions. Suppose that one-half of that amount in the next twelve months were taken out of the savings banks and invested in other ways; in what position would the Government be then? Would they be in a better position, if they had to go to the old country and say: On account of unexpected causes we have to come back; we borrowed \$10,000,000 last year, and we have to come back to borrow \$25,000,000 more. I do not think that would be good for the credit of this country. The best creditors the country can possibly have are the 150,000 depositors in the post office savings banks; they are the men who give stability to our credit; they are the men whom the Government ought to get their money from, instead of going to the foreign money-lender. The other consideration is this, that the interest on that \$50,000,000 comes back to the people of Canada, every dollar of it, except that on the very small amount that may be deposited by foreign depositors. We ought to encourage the deposits, so that as much as possible of the public debt of Canada shall be in the hands of the Canadian people; but the motion made by the Minister of Finance produces exactly the opposite effect. Now, the Finance Minister said that, of the \$42,000,000 in the Government savings banks in 1894, \$14,750,000, or very little over one-third, was in the hands of 6 per cent of the depositors. Does the Minister find fault with that? Is he dissatisfied that 6 per cent of the depositors, or 10,000 out of the 150,000, had \$14,750,000? I think that, a few years ago, the regulations prevented any one having more than \$500 on deposit. If he does not want any depositor to have more than that amount, it is easy to so provide. But if this alone, under present conditions, produced a lower rate of interest by $\frac{1}{3}$ of 1 per cent for the recent admirable loan he has made, I say he should encourage as many as possible at this rate, instead of making it a subject of reproach that 10,000 people have \$14,750,000 on deposit. But the important matter is not with regard to the 6 per cent, but with regard to the 94 per cent of the depositors—the 140,000 people who have the lesser sums on deposit. They are the most important, numerically and in other ways. They have \$27,550,000 of the \$42,000,000 on deposit; and the Government is reducing to them the rate of interest below the legal value of money in this country. It is not a call loan, for only two or three days, such as the banks make to gamblers or others; it is a loan which can only be taken out on short notice; but, if it is, the Government has the advantage of the interest. This \$42,000,000 is a loan which the Government should encourage the people to increase and not to diminish. I hope, therefore, that the Government will reconsider the position they have taken, because I am quite sure that, on investigating all the circumstances, they will come to the conclusion that the money should remain at 3 per cent, though, to my mind, it should be $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. We are told, that at some places the banks lend money at 5 or 6 per cent. Well, I do not believe they do. I believe that, except in the case of the inner circle we hear about, they charge, on the average, 7 per cent. That is the ordinary rate they charge to ordinary business customers, who form the majority; and the bank that lends its money at 7 per cent, can surely afford to pay more than $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to its depositors. I will only say, in addition, that this is a matter removed from politics, as Mr. Wilkie said, and I hope the Government will take into account the representations that have been made on a purely business basis, and reconsider their decision.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly fair and just that this matter should be considered in its purely business aspect. The Government desire to pay for the money they borrow from depositors, large and small, all that the money, in their judgment, is fairly worth; but they do not feel justified in embarrassing the whole business of the country by keeping money at an artificial value. I think a good deal of confusion arises in the minds of some hon. gentlemen by not quite reflecting on what the deposits in the hands of the banks really do—what functions they discharge in the economy of trade and business. Some of my hon. friends would appear to think that the banks hold that money, so to speak, in their vaults, or that, if they put it out, they merely put it out on short call loans for the accommodation of gentlemen on the stock exchange or elsewhere. As a matter of fact, the $220,000,000 which now lies in the hands of the banks, constitutes practically the wage fund of this country. From that source are defrayed all the enormous expenditures and is provided the capital which every manufacturer, every trader, every importing merchant in this country uses; from that fund, to a very large degree, comes the wages of the labourers from one end of this country to the other. Now, there is no one thing that our manufacturers and merchants have insisted on more than this, that, by reason of the comparatively high rate of interest charged in Canada by the parties who supply them with money, they are put at a very great disadvantage with their competitors in the United States, and notably with their competitors in England and in Germany, where it is notorious that lower rates of interest prevail; and, if the Government have acted in this matter, it has been with the view, not merely to a reduction of the interest on a large part of the public debt, but with a view to a reduction of the rate of interest to the great bulk of the community. It is quite true, a comparatively small number, perhaps 2 or 3 per cent, of our population, may be somewhat inconvenienced by the reduction, although, as my hon. friend has pointed out, the Government desire and hope, as regards that class, that they may be able to devise a means of lightening the matter to them. But, as regards the great bulk of the community, the House ought to remember that the only possible way in which cheaper capital can be obtained for the use of the community is by reducing the rate on deposits to what the money is fairly worth. I fail utterly to understand how in this country, where large corporations, like those in Toronto and Montreal, are able today to borrow money for considerable terms of years at something like 3 per cent, or a mere fraction above that, and when my hon. friend is able to borrow money at a little over 2½ per cent—I fail to understand how business men can say that money which is at call on a very few days' notice can be held to be worth more than 2½ per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite who are acquainted with financial matters, know that in England, at this moment, outside of special institutions, like the Government savings banks perhaps, it is impossible to obtain for money on deposit more than 1 or 1½ per cent, as a rule; and most of the banks will not allow even that.

Mr. WALLACE. What do the Government pay the banks for their temporary loans?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. In England?

Mr. WALLACE. No, here.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Four per cent.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Well, that depends on where they borrow their money. Our banks are in the habit of charging very considerably more than 3½ or 4 per cent to their customers, and they cannot be expected to lend, even to the Government of Canada, if they can find more profitable occupation for their capital elsewhere. This is one of the things that are necessarily governed by the law of supply and demand. What I want to call the attention of the House to is this. Of course, if this money were lying idle in the banks, there would be a good deal to be said for the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. WALLACE. So it is.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Oh, no. The $220,000,000 on deposit that he spoke of, supplies the life blood of every manufacturing institution in the country.

Mr. WALLACE. They have $220,000,000 on deposit, and they have $227,000,000 loaned. That leaves a deficit of $7,000,000; but they have a capital of $62,000,000 and a rest of $27,000,000, making a total of $90,000,000. Deducting $7,000,000, you have $83,000,000 not lent out.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. But my hon. friend, as a business man, surely knows that no banker who is worthy of the name, would venture to draw on this $220,000,000 without holding a very large proportion of that in reserve to meet sudden calls and emergencies.

Mr. WALLACE. They have $80,000,000.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That is not too much, or very little too much, but the hon. gentleman perhaps knows that a good deal of the bank loans are of a somewhat permanent character, and could not be very readily converted into cash. However, that is a question that we need not now discuss. But he knows that this $220,000,000 consists practically of deposits to be drawn out on short notice or on calls, and the banks must hold a very considerable percentage of that in reserve to meet sudden calls and emergencies. The percentage may vary. It may be as low as one-fifth in some of the banks, but the old conservative rule is, in banks which are conducted on sound lines, that it should be as high as one-third, and I do not know, all things considered, that that is too much. But what I wish to impress on the House is, that the condition of things here is totally different from what it is in England. There the amount of money that goes into the Government savings banks does not, in the slightest degree, affect the plethora of capital available for business purposes, owing to the fact that it is a lending and not a borrowing nation. Consequently, it does not affect the rate on money allowed by the banks in the shape of interest on deposits. Here, however, it affects the rate promptly, and if it were possible for us to disentangle the two things and deal with the rate of interest on Government savings bank deposits without, at the same time, affecting the rate which is paid on the $220,000,000 on deposit in the banks, there would, I think, be a good deal to be said in favour of the hon. gentleman's contention. But the fact is, that, while we do not desire to borrow money from the people on any rate less than its value, we do not think we ought to be asked, in the interest of some proportion of the people, to keep the rate of money at an artificial level. I have no hesitation in saying that the very high rate of interest paid on deposits has a distinctly prejudicial effect on the general business of the country, and, therefore, indirectly, on the wages paid to the artisans and others employed in the various branches of trade and manufacture. In a certain degree, to lower the rate of interest on deposits, the lower the rate will be to all persons engaged in business, the more these persons will be able to extend their business, and the greater the general prosperity of the country, because there can be no doubt that the cost of capital in Canada is one of the serious impediments in the way of manufacturers making the best of their opportunities. The cheapening of money in Canada will lead to a very considerable enhancement of the general prospect of the country. That is the point to which I desire most to draw the attention of the House.

The other—and it is the only one I will spend any time on to-night—is this. As intimated in the Budget debate, the Government are not at all unwilling to consider the expediency of issuing a funded loan at 3 per cent for the benefit of the smaller class of depositors. There is a good deal to be said, not perhaps for borrowing money at call from the public at large, but for encouraging investment for a longer or shorter period in the funds of the country, and that is the thing on which my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Fielding) might very well, with the concurrence of the House, allow a difference of $\frac{1}{2}$ or $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, and I dare say that we would not be at all the poorer for that. So far, the Government are willing to consider the matter, but we do not think we ought to be called upon, under the circumstances, to pay more than the legitimate value on the money which we take on deposit. The point which I want to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to is this. A great proportion of the \$50,000,000 which we borrow, in the shape of savings bank deposits, is, I think, comprised in a very small number of accounts, comparatively speaking. I must say, with all due consideration to the encouragement of habits of thrift and so forth, insisted upon by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), that I cannot, for the life of me, conceive how the Government ought to pay, out of the earnings of the rest of the people, more than money is worth to parties who have deposits of \$1,000, or even \$500 and upwards, in the Government savings banks. If you want to grant any particular indulgence to the smaller depositors, if the House thinks that it is expedient to promote habits of thrift among the poorer classes of the population, then let them select those who are best entitled to the indulgence. Let them select those persons, amounting to five-sixths of the whole, who are investing small sums. I find, in the return of 1894, that those persons amounted to five-sixths of the whole, and that the average of their investment was very little above \$100 apiece, whereas the average of the others is about \$1,000 apiece. For these five-sixths, as I have said, it is possible to provide—and, I think, with advantage to them and the community—by allowing 3 per cent Canadian stock to be created in small sums, which these persons can have either in scrip or issued to them in the form of credits. That is a detail I do not wish to go into now. So far as the Government are concerned, they are willing to consider the suggestion thrown out for the purpose of meeting the needs and wants of that smaller class of depositors, and so far as they are concerned we would have liked, if it were possible, to separate the rate of interest which we pay on our savings bank and other deposits from the rates which the banks have to pay. But every hon. gentleman knows that, practically speaking, the interest paid by the Government in these two ways must, of necessity, form the standard of the rate which is allowed by the banks at large, and I must repeat, that, if you desire to obtain cheap money in this country, you cannot afford to pay more than a fair rate for the money. That we intend to pay, but I do not think we ought to be called upon to pay more.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman has put forward what appears to be a very strange argument, namely, that, by reducing the rate of interest on the deposits of the poor man in the Government savings banks, the Government will thereby entitle us to obtain cheap money. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, why it is that, when the Government goes to rich men to borrow money, they pay 4 per cent on their temporary loans, as the hon. Finance Minister has just told us they do ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) permit me ? When I stated to the hon. member for West York that the rate on temporary loans was 4 per cent, I was thinking of a quoted rate and not the actual rate. The temporary loans placed since I assumed control of the Finance Department have paid from 3 to 3½ per cent. I desire to make that correction.

Mr. SPROULE. But even that is a difference. The hon. Minister of Finance is willing to pay to the rich owner of money, the bank, from 3 to 3½ per cent. But when he receives the savings of the hired man, or the hired girl or the labourer or mechanic, though the security is the same, he will only pay 2½ per cent. Is that putting a premium upon industry, economy and frugality ? I think it is the very reverse, and, to my mind, this is one of the weakest arguments that the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) have given in support of their proposition. I quite agree with what the hon. member for South Oxford said, that it would be a good thing to have some means, by the purchase of Government bonds or in some other way, that the poor man, the small depositor, could get 3 per cent. But the Government intends to reduce it to 2½ per cent on the plea that the present rate makes money borrowed by ordinary people in the ordinary way dearer. For whom, then, is this reduction ? For the banks. When they loan money to the poor man they charge 6 or 7 per cent. They insist on a poor man paying—

Mr. DAVIN. Seven or 8 per cent.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, even 7 and 8 per cent. They compel the Government—that is they practically compel, as the argument they offer is sufficient to induce the Government to do it—to reduce the rate on the savings of the poor man in the post office savings bank. This will compel him to put it in the ordinary bank. The Finance Minister asked : What right have we to pay the poor people more for their money than we pay for the money we borrow ? But does he consider the difference in the quantity of money ? The last loan he floated was something like $10,000,000. And because he can get a loan of $10,000,000 for fifty years at 2½ per cent, therefore he is only willing to pay to the man who loans him $10 the same rate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The rate on the last loan was about 2½ per cent.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, and so the Finance Minister pays a higher rate for the large sum than he pays for the small sum loaned to him by the poor man. If I went to a loaning institution and asked for a loan of $10,000 for twenty years, if the security I offered was regarded as perfectly good, I would expect to get that money at a lower rate than if I wanted only $100 for a short time. You are compelling a man who loans his $5 or his $10 to accept the same rate of interest on the small loan, which often is for a short time, as the man who pays who is borrowing a million. That is not the way the banks do. If a man goes for an accommodation of $100 for a year, they charge him 8 per cent. But if they can place a loan of $10,000 for ten years they will charge less. If they could loan a million for a term of years they would accept even a smaller rate of interest, because the investment is a permanent one and a large one. But the Government are making the same rate for the poor man as for the rich. The hon. Finance Minister said this was to lower the rate of interest to the class who could dictate the rate of interest, that is to people who are strong financially. One of these men can say to the banks : My security is good, and I want money at a small rate of interest. So, this is for the purpose of making the rich class of the community still richer and impoverishing those whose savings are small. If the Government does not wish to pay 3 per cent to those having large sums of money on deposit, then, as the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) said, let the amount which each one may have in the post office savings bank be limited to $500 or $1,000, but still keep the institution open where the poor man can put his small savings where they will be safe, and so that he may have every encouragement to prudence and economy. Above all men in this House, the one whose position on this question most surprised me is the Postmaster General (Mr. Mullock), for he is at the head of the Post Office Department and it is to be presumed that he recommended this reduction of interest. What would be the result if this reduction takes place ? It would induce the poor people to take away their money and invest it where they can get a better rate of interest. They cannot invest in the ordinary banks unless they are prepared to accept a lower rate of interest. They cannot invest in the Farmers' Loan and Savings Company for that has gone down, and it also was carried on under the auspices of the hon. Postmaster General. This proposal has for its object to drive the poor people out of the post office savings bank to places where the security is not so good. Suppose this had passed a few years ago. Or suppose that as a result of the last reduction—and, no doubt, such a thing did happen—a large number of people took their money out of the savings bank and invested it in the Farmers' Loan and Savings Company, in which they could get 4 per cent. And widows and orphans are crying out now because that institution has gone down which was under the financial management practically of the Postmaster General. It has resulted in compelling them to take their money out of an institution over which the hon. gentleman the Postmaster General presided under the ægis of the Government and put it into this other institution over which also he presided. So it will be when they take their money from the post office savings banks and invest it in the private banks, some of which are going down all the time, but which offer a high rate of interest. Now, I have always believed that the two great objects in establishing these banks were, first, to put a premium on industry, economy and frugality, and, second, to handle the money of a class of people who are not business people, not financiers, people who could earn money but who could not invest it or look after it from year to year. It did not matter how poor the person was, if the money was invested in a Government or post office savings bank, the party knew that the security was all that could be desired. Then, it was managed by people with business training and financial ability, and so the people felt that it would be managed to advantage. Now, who are the people who put their money into the post office savings banks? They are the labourers, the mechanics, the domestic servants, both male and female, the poorer farmers, who sometimes have a little money but who cannot invest it or take care of it, and the widows and orphans of the country. You cannot pick out a single one of these classes which can be said to be composed of business people, men or women of financial ability, able to look after and invest their money. The Government, for that reason, has provided this means of inducing them to work industriously and save their money, by offering them a place of security with a fair rate of interest.

Now, then, they earn money, they save money, and they put it in here, and the Government turn round and say: You are earning too much interest on your money. we can borrow ten million dollars at 2½ per cent, therefore we will only pay you 2½ per cent. But suppose I go to that poor man and I ask to borrow $100 from him, or $50, or $25, and I give him a note for it. How much do I expect to pay? Why, I expect to pay him the same rate of interest as the banks are charging me, 6, 7 or 8 per cent—it would be 8 per cent to-day. I would expect to pay him that, because it is a small amount of money when I borrow money for a short time, and because I would have to pay the same rate to the bank if I went there to borrow. Therefore, I say the Government has a right to pay them as much as the banks are charging for money when they loan it out, at least as much as the banks pay for money when they borrow to the tune of millions, or as much as the Government pays for it when the country is standing at the back of the Government as security. The parties who have induced the Government to make this reduction are the parties who, above all others, should not have first claim to consideration, I mean the banks of the country. I understand that Mr. Wilkie, the president of one of the banks, and a prominent member of the Board of Trade, is one of the largest bankers of the country, therefore it is for the benefit of the bankers of the country this is done, to compel the poor man to withdraw his money from the post office savings banks and to put it into the chartered banks where he would get a small rate of interest, therefore, the bankers ask the Government to reduce that rate of interest. I say this is unfair. It takes away a stimulus to the industry of the poor people of this country. Then again we might ask: What is the legal rate of interest in the country according to the judgment of Parliament? If I owe a debt, and there is no stipulation with regard to the interest, I am compelled to pay 6 per cent. Why? Because the wisdom of Parliament says 6 per cent is not too high a rate of interest to pay in this country. Parliament has not reduced the rate of interest below 6 per cent, because they think it wise it should be kept at that high rate, and yet the Government proposes to fix the standard rate of interest to the poorer class of the community, at 2½ per cent when they save and invest money, or a little over one-third of the legal rate. I think the Government should reconsider their decision, because if there is any class in the country that ought to be the wards of the Government, whose industry ought to be stimulated, and who should be induced, if possible, to save their money and to put it by where it will be taken care of, it is the poorer class of people who have recourse to these savings banks for the purpose of investing their small earnings, and from which they will receive a reasonable rate of interest.

Mr. MOORE. There are a few points of view from which we might look at this question, which have not been touched upon. The Minister of Finance made the statement that he had consulted the manager of a bank, and he had also consulted a section of the Board of Trade of Toronto. Well, Sir, I have no doubt the managers of all the banks of this country would be very glad indeed to have the Government reduce the rate of interest to 2½ per cent upon deposits in the Government savings banks. I have no doubt that the boards of trade, representing the business men of this country who are borrowers of money, would be very glad to have the Government reduce the rate of interest to 2½ per cent, which they think would enable them to hire money at less rates than they are paying to-day. But if the Minister of Finance had consulted the depositors, if he consulted the thrifty poor who are making deposits in the savings bank, instead of the bank managers and boards of trade, he would have found a different view prevailing, and he would have found a request for a higher rate of interest than what the Government propose to give. The Minister of Trade and Commerce tells us that 3 per cent is more than money is worth. That is the opinion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, whose opinion is very valuable, undoubtedly. But when we see what money is being loaned for, and what business men are paying for it, I think we would have a right to claim that 3 per cent is not more than money is worth in this country. Money is worth what it will bring, it is, like any other commodity, regulated by supply and demand, and if the demand is great enough to lead men to pay over 3 per cent, then we must consider that money is worth more than 3 per cent in this country. The Minister tells us that corporations are hiring money at 3 per cent. These corporations have to give gilt-edged security in order to get it at that low rate. I can name a corporation in this country that is paying more than 3 per cent. I call your attention to a corporation that stands at the head of all other business corporations of Canada, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that is paying 5 per cent interest on a large amount of money to the province of Quebec. If there is a corporation in this country that can hire money cheaply, the Canadian Pacific Railway certainly should be the one, and still it has been paying for a good many years 5 per cent interest to the province of Quebec on millions of dollars. It is undoubtedly an advantage to the banks of this country that the rate of interest should be reduced. This will enable them to make money a little faster than they have been making it in the past, by enabling them also to reduce the interest on deposits, and it will have a tendency, as has been pointed out already, to induce the poorer depositors to take money from the Government Savings Bank and spend it, or put it in the chartered banks, or in other places, where it is, perhaps, not as safe. Now to show you the position the banks occupy at the present time, and to show you that they are quite able to take care of themselves, I will read you a quotation of the value of stocks in a number of the banks of this country. The Bank of Montreal is quoted at 245 premium, the Ontario Bank at 110 premium, Molson's Bank at 206 premium, Bank of Toronto, 235, Merchant's Bank, 180, Eastern Townships Bank, 160, Banque Nationale, not quite so high, Union Bank, 115, Bank of Commerce, 140½, Hochelaga Bank, 155, Bank of Nova Scotia, 230. That is the position of the banks of Canada at the present time, and that is what their stocks are worth. A man who has $100 in the stock of these banks, has an investment worth from $160 to $245 to-day. They have been paying a very low rate of interest. It has been said that the banks are charging the people from 5 per cent to 6 per cent. I know one of the best banks in this country, one of the soundest institutions in Canada, and yet if they are asked to carry a discount note of a customer, he has got to give them a note at 7 per cent, and that is compounded every three months, which amounts to about 9 per cent. A great proportion of these notes are taken at 8 per cent. Now I believe that the banks are able to take care of themselves as they have made large sums of money as shown by the quotations I have read by giving low rates of interest on deposits and letting it out at high rates. This Government might well afford to let them look after themselves, and to give instead a little attention to the poorer people to provide for them a place of deposit where they can keep their money in safety and upon which they can draw 3 per cent interest, which is a low enough rate. A 3 per cent rate from the Government is not any better than 2½ per cent from the banks. The formalities through which people have to go when they want to draw their money out of the post office savings bank, are so great that they would prefer to loan their money to the chartered banks at a half per cent less. When they make their applications for withdrawals, these have to come to Ottawa and be ratified, and then be sent back again, and it takes a good deal of time, and the people are subjected to considerable trouble when they want to make withdrawals. The Government have complained that this is to be made a political question; I think if they will say that the rate of interest shall remain as it is, it will not be made a political question, and every man on this side of the House will support the Government in so doing.

Mr. ROGERS. After the orations we have heard from the big guns on this subject, you will scarcely expect to hear much of importance from me. We have heard some hon. members express a good deal of solicitude for the interest of the banking and commercial interests of this country. My little experience in this House shows me that they are generally pretty well taken care of; therefore, I will devote my remarks to the great agricultural interests of this country. I should like to assist poor men who are striving to accumulate earnings for a rainy day, as far as I could consistently, and I would favour encouraging such even more. But when I read the enormous amount of money accumulated in our savings banks, I ask who are the people who have deposited this large sum, from what classes of the community has it come? I have had some experience both from observation and otherwise, of the agricultural class, and I am satisfied that very little money is deposited by farmers in the savings banks. No doubt, private investors place some amounts there, but the great majority of the deposits are made by mechanics. I have always felt that the National Policy has enabled them to put a good deal of money in the savings banks, and I have always felt, at the same time, that they were putting it in the banks at the farmers' expense. A 35 per cent duty on agricultural implements has enabled them to deposit a good deal every year.

An hon. MEMBER. What is the duty now ?

Mr. ROGERS. The great point I wish to come to is this : what percentage of return on the capital invested is earned by the agricultural community ? We know that farming does not pay 2 per cent, notwithstanding all the hard labour put into it. I should like a loan company or private money-lender to compile a statement of operations on hundreds of thousands of acres thrown upon their hands, and ascertain what percentage is earned on the capital invested. Let one of the best farms of the province be placed in the hands of a loan institution, and let it hire all the help, and make an allowance for wear and tear, and at the end of five or seven years it will not show 2 per cent interest on the capital invested. This is not 50 per cent of the return secured by other industries. When money is loaned on farm lands, and farmers and their families work for years in order to pay 5 or 6 per cent interest on money borrowed, the only advantageous result is that the farmers, by working long hours and exercising great economy and self-denial have been able to increase our exports. This interest is, however, paid at the expense of almost the life-blood of the people. It is stated that there are $140,000,000 on deposit in the banks, and that $83,000,000 are lying idle. The only remedy for the high rate of interest charged is to let money flow into the banks until they cannot find investments, and then our farmers may be able to get money at cheaper rates. I can well remember the time when 8 per cent was paid for advances on good farm security. I admit the rate is getting less all the time. The reason is that it no longer pays to invest money in farm lands. The time is coming when the rate must be still lower. The enormous amount of money on deposit in the savings banks and elsewhere shows that there are not good investments to be had outside, or so much money would not be invested there. If our industry paid 4 or 5 per cent, there would be less money in the savings banks. The post office deposits are made, however, not so much on account of the interest received as because the money is thus made a safe investment. I have no sympathy with the banks, which have pressed heavily on the people, especially on the agricultural class. While a farmer has been compelled to obtain two names on his notes, with the security of a good man worth perhaps

Mr. ROGERS.

$10,000, an ordinary business man has been able to obtain money without such additional security. That is the reason why private loan companies have had a great run, because the banks have not given farmers accommodation. I am glad to say the banks have at length become more reasonable in dealing with the great farming class, and have been glad to obtain farmers' notes. Loan companies do not care any longer to lend money on agricultural lands, which should be the best investment, and that is one of the principal reasons why there is so much money in the hands of banks and money-lenders. The Government is taking the right stand in seeking to give the people cheap money. The banks will have to lend money at 4 per cent, and that demand is being made. Any agricultural representative in this House who does not join in that demand will have a hard time when he goes back to his constituents, because the people of the country want it. The farming community are the backbone of this country and we know that if the farmers go down, then all others will go down with them. I am glad to see the action taken by the leaders of the Government along that line, and I am glad to hear the interest they express in the welfare of the agricultural classes. When I came to this House first, it was said that there were only a few Patrons in it, but I am pleased to see now that when any question comes up relating to the farming community, there is a sort of rivalry as to who can say most on behalf of the farmers. I trust, Sir, that sentiment will grow, and if it does it will be a good thing for the country.

Mr. BRODER. The hon. gentleman from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) takes rather an extraordinary view of the business conditions of this country. I have yet to learn that there should be one set of business principles for the farmer, another for the mechanic, and another for the commercial man. The reason why the farmers have not been successful borrowers from the banks is, in my opinion, that the farmer sometimes overlooks the fact that time is the essence of the contract ; he sometimes does not pay sufficient attention to the day his note is due, and so the endorser often has to look after it. I question very much the statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) that the farmers as a rule have no deposits in the savings banks of this country. My experience is, Sir, that they have relatively more deposits in the savings banks than have any other class in the Dominion. I know one man, a farmer, and a well-to-do farmer, too—I do not know whether he is a Patron or not, but he has good stuff to make one of—he went to a cheese manufacturer and borrowed fifty dollars in advance on his milk. His milk would not be going to the factory before three months, but the fifty dollars was an accommodation, and he got it without interest. Now, the cheese manufacturer had occasion to go down to the bank shortly afterwards, and he found his good farmer friend depositing fifty dollars in the savings bank branch. That happened in my own town. Now, Sir, no mechanic in this country could do that; he could not borrow in advance on the milk that was to come from his mechanical operations. I state here that the farmers have more money in the savings banks of Canada than any other class of the community. It is true that the farmer who has a new farm and is improving it does not deposit money in the savings bank, because he has to spend it on his improvements, but if we go into the older settled sections of Canada where there are improved farms, you will find that many of the farmers—and it is to their credit, and I am glad to be able to say it—have money in the savings banks. And why should they not have money in the savings banks as well as any other class of people. My friend from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) ought to remember that the argument he uses has no foundation at all, because it is not guaranteed to the farmer, or to any other borrower in this country, that he can get money cheaper because the rate of interest has been reduced. If it did cheapen money for the farmer then there might be some argument in its favour, but it does not. I can tell the Government that this reduction in the rate of interest affects a much larger class than many people think. For instance, it will affect depositors in the chartered banks. A great many farmers who are not in a position to loan money out at long terms and in large sums, have gone to the chartered banks to deposit their thousand dollars, and I can tell my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers) that some of them are even shareholders in these banks. The reduction in the rate of interest will affect that class of depositors to a very considerable extent.

But, Sir, what has become of these gentlemen on the Treasury benches who in the past have been so anxious about the welfare of the poor people, and who have been breaking their hearts about the farmers for the last eighteen years. Since these gentlemen came into power, they seem to have lost all their love for the farmer and the workingman, and their policy now is to get the financiers of the country into their hands. They are done with the poor people, they want the capitalists and the financiers and the manufacturers and the railway contractors and the bank managers. It is these men that the Liberals want now since they came into power, and not the farming classes. They have lost their love for the poor farmer, and the only voice we hear raised for him in this Chamber now is the voice of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers). I fear that his voice, too, may be silenced. Since the Government came into power they have done many unpopular things, but there is nothing which they have attempted to do which will be more unpopular than their present proposal. A small depositor in the savings banks cannot venture into schemes in which to invest his money. The depositor in the savings bank cannot lend money to the farmer, and why? Because if a farmer wants to borrow from $1,000 to $3,000 in buying a farm the poor depositor has not that amount to lend him. The ex-Minister of Finance raised a point here which has a great deal of force in it, and which ought to be considered by the House in this connection. Many a man in Canada, who when his son is first able to write his name, deposits $5 in the bank for that boy. The father endeavours to teach that boy the value of money, and when you have taught him that you have taught him a good deal towards getting along in the world. Will the reduction in the rate of interest help on this commendable work? No, Sir, it will not. Such things as that ought not to be smothered out in the country, but ought to be encouraged by the Government. Now, Sir, why should my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) get up in this House and discredit his own class? Why should he get up here and say that his fellow farmers are in beggary throughout this country. That is not true. I say, Sir, that the average wealth of the farmers is equal to the average wealth of any class in the community, and it is a credit to our farmers that it is so. If a business man would go around decrying his business as our friend from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) decries his business of farming, why that business man would have no credit in this country in six months. I tell you, Sir, the farmer of Canada has got to be strong financially and in every other way, to stand the abuse he gets from his friends. It is about time some one should stand up in this House to defend the farmer; it is about time my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers) would take another line, if he is going to promote the interests of Canadian farmers. I, for one, have a great deal of respect for that class of the community; I was born and brought up in that class, and I hope I shall die in it. I venture to say he will never hear me state here that the farmers of Canada are at poverty's door, and that they have to stay up day and night and work hours after hours to pay the interest which they owe for money loaned them. It is without doubt that many a farmer in Canada in his early history would not be able to have a farm at all had it not been that some one advanced him money with which to buy it. The business men throughout Canada, the men who are abused by such gentlemen as the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) have done more to put the farmers in a solid position than any other class. The business men have credited the farmers with their seed grain ; they have given them their groceries until the crop was marketed ; they have lent them money to till the farm and to build the little house, and they have waited until the farmers were able to pay it, and with the increase in the value of the land, put the farmer in a prosperous condition. It is time that the material benefits conferred by one class of the community on the other should be recognized in this House rather than that one special class should be selected for abuse. I respect the man who has helped the poor farmers of this country, no matter what his business may be. There are some gentlemen on these benches on the other side of the House, and there are gentlemen upon this side of the House, who from the manner in which they have treated the farming community not only deserve the respect of the farmers, but deserve the recognition of the country at large.

Mr. CLARKE. I wish to draw the attention of the House to a statement made by the hon. Minister of Finance during the course of his remarks this afternoon, in which he made special reference to the action of the council of the Toronto Board of Trade on this matter. The hon. the Minister of Finance, very properly in my humble judgment, spoke in the highest terms of the gentlemen who compose the council of the Board of Trade of Toronto, but he did not inform the House that all of them, or nearly all of them, are directors or managers of banking institutions in that city. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) quoted approvingly the remarks of Mr. D. R. Wilkie, the very able general manager of the Imperial Bank, as approving the policy of the Government in reducing the rate of interest, but he forgot to tell us that Mr. Wilkie is one of the leading spirits on the council of the Board of Trade in the city of Toronto. It must surely be within the recollection of the House that the high opinion entertained by the Minister of Finance of the commercial and business ability of the council of the board of trade, is an opinion that has been recently formed by that hon. gentleman. Within the past two or three weeks the council of the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto passed unanimously a resolution against the Bill that was before this House to incorporate the Kettle Valley Railway Company, and yet, if my memory serves me rightly, every member of the Government from the province of Ontario voted for the second reading of that Bill. The opinion then entertained by the members of the Government as to the soundness of the business and commercial views of the members of the council of the board of trade, has been considerably changed.

Now, this reduction in the rate of interest will affect thousands of thrifty depositors in the city of Toronto and throughout the province of Ontario. The Government have not been in office two years, and yet twice have they cut into the earning power of the savings of these classes. The interest was first reduced from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per cent, after they had been but a few months in power ; and now, less than twelve months after that first cut, another cut is to be made from 3 to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The people who are affected by this change are among the most industrious and thrifty classes of our population. As has already been pointed out by gentlemen who have spoken, they are not experts as to the best means of investing their money, or as to how to get the best possible returns from their investments ; but having confidence in the stability of the Government and post office savings banks, they have been induced to put their money in them ; and it would in my judgment be sound economy and wise policy on the part of the Government to allow the highest rate of interest possible for that money, in order that these people might be encouraged to keep it in institutions which are absolutely secure, rather than be induced to withdraw it and invest it in other institutions where it will not be nearly so safe. I fear that the effect of these repeated reductions in the rate of interest will be that many persons who are not adepts as to how best to invest their money, will be induced, by representations, or misrepresentations, of designing persons, to withdraw it from the Government and post office savings banks, and invest it in institutions less sound and stable.

I am not aware that there has been any agitation throughout the country for a reduction in the rate of interest on deposits. I am not aware that any petitions have been sent here by merchants and business men of the city of Toronto or the province of Ontario or the Dominion of Canada, asking that the rate of interest paid in the Government institutions should be reduced. We may wonder, then, what influence has prompted the Government twice, without any appeal being made to them, to cut down the rate of interest paid in those institutions. So far as I know, the only influence brought to bear on the Government has been the influence of those gentlemen engaged in banking. I believe I am safe in asserting that notwithstanding the fact that last July the rate was reduced from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per cent, those who have been compelled to go to the banks since to get accommodation have not yet discovered any appreciable lowering in the rate of interest ; and I venture to say that after the rate has been reduced from 3 to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, those who have to do business with the banks will find that they will have to pay just as high a rate of interest during 1899 as they have had to pay during 1898. Those who are let in on the ground floor, those who compose that inner circle referred to by the Minister of Finance, may derive some benefit from the change ; they may be able sometimes to dictate terms to the banks ; but the great mass of the people who go to the banks for accommodation will not be substantial gainers. I have not seen any evidence that the lowering of the rate of interest has been of any benefit to the working classes ; I have not seen that it has in any degree increased their wages ; and thus far we have had no evidence to substantiate the statements to that effect made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Sir, it seems to me that the people who are affected, along with other classes of consumers in this country, will be greatly disappointed at the policy which this Government have pursued during the short time they have been in office. They have reduced the rate of interest paid on deposits one-third in less than two years, and at the same time they have passed legislation to increase the price of some at least of the necessaries of life. By the legislation proposed this session they will increase the price of sugar to the consumer ; during last session legislation was imposed upon us which increased the price of the tobacco of the masses of the people ; and now we have this third proposition, to decrease the earning power of the savings of the people. I venture to affirm, with all due deference to what hon. gentlemen have said on the other side, that nothing more unwise or unfair to those people, or more unpopular, has ever been presented by this Government to the people of Canada. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce made a point that these deposits in the post office and Government savings banks are there on call. Technically that statement may be correct ; but I could not conceive it possible that at any given time all the depositors would ask to have their deposits remitted to them. These deposits are there to all intents and purposes permanently, and it is absurd to suppose that the Government in one year would be called upon to pay out forty or fifty millions of money which the people have deposited in doles from time to time. That being the case, they have a right to demand at least as high a rate of interest, and a little higher, than the Government pay to capitalists in the old country or elsewhere from whom they borrow the money they require from time to time to carry on the affairs of this country. I regret exceedingly the action the Government have taken. I believe it is a move in the wrong direction, and I will hail with satisfaction the opening of the opportunity to the wage-earners of this country to invest their savings in Canadian stocks, such as the Finance Minister has stated may be afforded. We should try to cultivate habits of thrift and industry among our people, and we can do that successfully by allowing them as high a rate of interest as they are fairly entitled to, rather than by cutting it down, as it has been twice since this Government came into office.

(In the Committee.)

On resolution 2,

2. That it is expedient to provide that section seventeen of "The Customs Tariff, 1897," shall be repealed on and after the first day of August in the present year, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, and that the following section shall be substituted therefor:—

17. Articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of any of the following countries may, when imported direct into Canada from any of such countries, be entered for duty or taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada at the reduced rate of duty provided in the British preferential tariff, set forth in Schedule "D" to this Act:—

(a.) The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

(b.) The British Colony of Bermuda.

Jamaica.

Turk's Island and the Caicos Islands.

The Leeward Islands (Antigua, St. Christopher-Nevis, Dominica, Montserrat, and the Virgin Islands).

The Windward Islands (Grenada, St. Vincent and St. Lucia).

Barbados.

Trinidad and Tobago.

British Guiana.

(d.) Any other British colony or possession the customs tariff of which, on the whole, is as favourable to Canada as the British preferential tariff herein referred to is to such colony or possession.

Provided, however, that manufactured articles to be admitted under such preferential tariff shall be bona fide the manufactures of a country or countries entitled to the benefits of such tariff, and that such benefits shall not extend to the importation of articles into the production of which there has not entered a substantial portion of the labour of such countries. Any question that may arise as to any article being entitled to such benefits shall be decided by the Minister of Customs, whose decision shall be final.

2. The Minister of Customs, with the approval of the Governor in Council, shall determine what British colonies or possessions shall be entitled to the benefits of the preferential tariff under clause (d) of this section.

3. The Minister of Customs may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, make such regulations as may be deemed necessary for carrying out the intention of this section.

Mr. DAVIN. We should like the hon. Minister of Finance to give us some idea of what the result will be on the importations into this country and on the revenue—whether the revenue will be strengthened by means of this clause or diminished, and in the event of the revenue being swelled, how will it affect the production of our home manufactures? How, in fact, will it affect in the end the tax-paying power of the community?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). My hon. friend has given me a pretty large contract, and I think I could make a three hours speech in answer to these questions. So far as the revenue is concerned, I made in the Budget speech a general reference which is about all I could say. Undoubtedly the effect of the 25 per cent reduction, which is not new but simply a carrying out of the old clause, will be to increase British importation. To some extent, it will involve a loss of revenue, but I think it will lead also to some expansion of trade, and in that way a part of the loss of the revenue will be met. But in so far as the loss of revenue is not met by the expansion of trade, we look to some increase in the duty on sugar to make good the balance. I do not think I can say anything from the point of view of revenue which would cover the ground more fully than that. We anticipate some loss through the 25 per cent reduction, but it will undoubtedly be made good by the expansion of trade, at any rate to a large extent, and whatever else is necessary, it is expected will be made up by the small increase of the duty on sugar. Of course the preferential rate is not an increase but a reduction, but I do not estimate that all the sugar, or even a great part of it, will come under that preference, and so I speak of an additional revenue from the sugar business. As to the effect of the reductions upon home industries, I am afraid that that is a question upon which the hon. gentleman and I should differ, because, perhaps we will look at it from different points of view. I think this will not injuriously affect the best interests of the country. My hon. friend has taken the opposite view. I am afraid that if we discussed that matter, we should only be able to state and re-state our views without adding much light to that aspect of the question.

Mr. IVES. Will the hon. Finance Minister explain the term "substantial portion of the article has been manufactured or created by the country favoured"? As I understand the words, it is not intended by the Government to admit, for example, German or Belgian goods or the goods of countries not participating in the favoured arrangement and manufactured to some extent in Great Britain or a favoured colony and then allowed to come in as if entirely the product of Great Britain or the favoured colony. I think it is important that we should know what are the views of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) or the Minister of Customs as to the extent of this "substantial portion," which is a very wide door, and which may be made wide enough to admit everything if the Government wish to so interpret it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman has referred to a question which, I admit, is one of considerable difficulty. But I am afraid we are not likely to come nearer to a solution than we have in the words of the resolution. We must recognize the fact that Great Britain, which is a great manufacturing country, imports a large portion of raw material. If it were necessary that the material should be produced in Great Britain, as well as the manufactured article, this would restrict the benefit of our preference to a great extent. Where the manufacture is bona fide a British manufacture, even if it includes a considerable proportion of foreign materials, if British material or British labour was incorporated into it in a substantial degree, we should treat that as of British manufacture. If the hon. gentleman asks what is a "substantial portion," I have no means of answering him. I think he should leave that to the reasonable discretion of the Minister of Customs. I think the hon. Minister of Customs should deal with it in the spirit which my hon. friend has referred to. We must guard against colourable manufactures which would evade the law. We do not desire that foreign goods, that could not get the benefit of the preference if imported direct, shall be sent to England and there have a colourable amount of labour put on them and sent here as British goods. But if an article is a bona fide British manufacture, made in the ordinary way, with a substantial proportion of British labour entering into it, we must give it the benefit of the preferential tariff. We must ask the House to leave the question with us, in the hope that as a result of the experience of the coming year, we shall be able to define more clearly what a "substantial portion" is. I am afraid that we can only, for the present, give the statement that it is intended to prevent a colourable importation of foreign goods under the guise of British manufactures.

Mr. IVES. It is not usual to leave even to the whole Government substantially the making of the tariff of the country, and it seems still less desirable to leave it to a single member of the Government. Take, for example, a printing press. Does the hon. Minister of Finance mean that if the material, the iron or steel, is brought from Germany to Great Britain and there made up into a printing press, it will be entitled to a reduction as if the raw material had been British? Or does he mean that if the printing press is made up all but, say, the turning of the cylinders—nineteen-twentieths manufactured in Germany and only the last twentieth in Great Britain, would it then come in under the preferential arrangement? The same question might be asked with regard to every item of manufacture. For instance, paper, as to which the Germans are on our list as vigorous competitors, it might be brought from Germany to Great Britain, and there run through a stack of calendars and sent out here as a British manufacture. This clause will leave an enormous discretion to the Minister of Customs and may play havoc with the revenues and the industries of the country. The cases I have given are only two, but a great variety of cases might be instanced. I think that as business men, we ought to have some rather distinct declarations from the Government as to whether this phrase is going to be stretched in the direction of widening or whether it is going to be contracted and only used in cases where clearly the great majority of expenditure and material is the result of British labour and British capital. I think we are entitled to at least that statement as to what the intention of the hon. gentleman is.

Mr. MACLEAN. I would like to point out for the information of the hon. Minister and the House that this clause will have to be very carefully interpreted by the Government, or the industries of this country will be attacked in a way that our people have no idea of at the present time. There is a very large class of fancy goods imported into this country concerning which care will have to be taken. These goods are made up for the main part of goods imported from Germany and other portions of continental Europe to England and after being put together are shipped to this country as British goods. There are such goods as laces, for instance, that are imported from Germany, France and other countries. These will be imported into England, attached to some common material and sent to this country as British make. Unless the greatest care is taken this country will be simply swamped with the goods of all Europe, and not only will England not get the preference but our own industries here will be greatly hampered.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The cases the hon. gentleman have given show how difficult it would be, at the present stage, to lay down any hard and fast rule in the matter. I will answer the questions the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ives) asked me. As I view it, and not, of course, speaking on behalf of the Minister of Customs, I would say that a printing press made in England, even though the raw material came from abroad, was British manufacture. Of course I do not speak officially, and the Minister of Customs might do otherwise. But if it were made abroad and brought into England, and a few parts burnished up, I would say that it was not of British manufacture and ought not to be allowed to come in under the preference. While I give that as my own view, the hon. gentleman will see that there would be a thousand such cases, and it would be exceedingly difficult in a legislative enactment to express exactly what we desire. We understand that we should not stretch the clause one way or the other. If an article is bona fide the manufacture of British industry, and if there is any large substantial percentage of British labour in it, we ought not to exclude it merely because the raw material comes from abroad. I quite concede that efforts may be made to evade the object we have in view, and to bring in goods as of British manufacture which really have very little British labour upon them. The very object of the clause is to prevent that. But I think the hon. gentleman will see that if we are asked to define it in any other way, it would be exceedingly difficult to find a form of words which would express better what we all have in our minds.

Mr. CLANCY. It seems to me that what the Minister of Finance has pointed out is a clear indication of the difficulties of a section of that kind at all. Now I am sure it would be beyond the possibility of man to discover in future to what extent English labour has been employed upon any article where the raw material has come in in any stage from a foreign country. It does seem to me utterly impossible to adopt a clause of that kind with any measure of safety. As has been pointed out, the ingenuity of men must be trusted, and the exigencies of trade will always induce men to defeat a law of that kind. No sooner will it be placed upon the Statute-book than persons will at once take advantage of it. Now, the hon. gentleman laid down a rather hard and fast clause last year. I see he has departed from that this year, and that was that the article should be of the growth and product—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The same as here.

Mr. CLANCY. But the hon. gentleman has made it wider this year by expressly stating in that clause that a substantial amount of English labour should be employed upon the goods. He will see that he has greatly broadened the clause, and has therefore greatly increased the difficulties. Now I think that with all our desire to give a preference to goods that are English goods in every sense, we must draw the line somewhere. Is it not the safer way to define it by statute, rather than leave it to discretionary power that will always be defeated, because the fraud will be most difficult to detect? I cannot see that this can be worked out with safety. The word "substantial" admits of a great deal of latitude. It may mean, by comparison, a very considerable or very little. No one can say whether one-third of the labour employed in the manufacture of an article was English labour, or whether there was not a substantial amount of foreign labour employed. Yet would that be a fair reason, if two-thirds, I may say, of the labour put upon the goods coming into Canada, was foreign, that under such circumstances they should be admitted? I desire to point out to the hon. Minister of Finance the utter impossibility of detection of that other two-thirds. I say in many cases it would be impossible to determine seven-eighths. I would like the Minister now, since he has asked for such discretionary power, to say what machinery he intends to employ to detect the amount of English labour or foreign labour that is put on goods that will be admitted under this clause. It seems to me doubtful whether the hon. gentleman can lay down anything like a rule to guide the Minister of Customs in dealing with matters of that kind. The truth is that he is not in a position to do so. This is in the hands of the customs-house officers throughout the country, and an investigation in every case seems to be utterly impossible. Whatever measure the hon. gentleman may devise to reach the object he is aiming at, it seems to me the present one is extremely faulty, and if it were applied to-morrow, I cannot see how he can proceed to work it out with safety.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not profess to believe that that particular clause is absolutely perfect ; all I do claim is that it is about the best we can do under the circumstances, and I am open to any suggestion for improving it. The hon. gentleman says we had last year a hard and fast rule, and we have now varied it. If he will compare the two clauses he will see that we are this year drawing the line a little tighter. We did not have this clause in last year, but in the light of our experience we see it is necessary to guard against an evasion of the law, which is the danger, I presume, the hon. gentleman wishes to guard against. I am afraid the objection he takes would strike at the root of the whole question of preferential trade. We might differ as to the ways of bringing it about, but I believe the hon. gentlemen wish it to be understood that they would favour preferential trade under certain circumstances and conditions differing from ours. But the same difficulty would arise then as arises now. This is a question which we have thought over a great deal. We realize all the difficulties that are in it, but after looking into it very carefully we have come to the conclusion that it is not a matter in which we can lay down, in the statute, a rule to govern every case. You must lay down a general principle, state the object you have in view, as I have stated it, and then leave something to the discretion of the Government, particularly of the Minister of Customs who may be expected to carry it out in the spirit in which we desire on both sides of the House it shall be interpreted. I do not think it is possible to do better, at least I have heard no suggestions of any form of words that could be accepted as accomplishing the purpose any better than those we have put in the resolution.

Mr. IVES. I think it would save all the trouble and danger if the hon. gentleman would simply require that the article should be wholly the product of British labour.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That would destroy the whole preference to England.

Mr. IVES. It is preference to England, not to Germany, or Belgium or any other country, that you are after. I do not suppose it is preference to the British importer that you are after, it is not to give a preference to the British importer of an article from Germany, it is not to give a preference to a man who brings a half finished article over for the purpose of finishing it, and getting the advantage of the 25 per cent reduction. Now, you will see what will happen under this clause. You will find an enormous amount of labour thrown upon the Minister of Customs, you will find that he will have to work from early morning to late at night in deciding upon applications for admission of articles under this clause. You will find that the taking of evidence will be so enormously expensive that you will have to rely upon the affidavits that you receive, you will find there will be an enormous amount of evasion and fraud, and you will have to repeal it sooner or later, you will do so yourselves. You cannot possibly work such a clause. I know from my own experience as having been one time in the Department of Trade and Commerce, that the number of appeals and of questions coming before the Minister of Customs to decide, is enormous. There is still, I suppose, an appeal to the courts, by petition of right, from his decision. So hon. gentlemen opposite will find themselves involved in an enormous amount of litigation.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is made final.

Mr. IVES. The Minister will, no doubt, want evidence as to where the goods are produced, affidavits from England or from Germany, and he will not trust to ex parte affidavits, and the Minister will be utterly unable to do the work with satisfaction to himself, and will be the victim of fraud and attempts to defraud, which will make his life a burden. The result will be, that a very large amount of goods will come in, to the detriment of our own manufactures, and hon. gentlemen opposite will have to repeal this section, and, in all probability, repeal it next year.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman, I am afraid, has hardly given us a remedy. I have already stated that the Government do not contend that this section is perfect, but the hon. gentleman will, no doubt, come to the opinion, on reflection, that his remedy will not meet the case. He has stated that the material should be British and the labour British. That, however, would limit very much the range of manufactured products coming into this country. Britain imports the raw material for her manufactures. Let us take as an example cottons. Does England grow cotton? No; she imports it from the Southern States and from distant markets; and, if the interpretation of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) were to prevail, we would shut out all her cotton goods. England does not produce a large quantity of wool, but imports it from abroad; and because the wool was not of British origin and the goods made by British labour, we would shut out all British woollen goods under the interpretation of my hon. friend; and so, in fact, throughout the whole range of manufactures. The hon. gentleman will see, on reflection, that the effect of his interpretation would be to destroy the preference altogether.

Mr. CRAIG. I do not know whether my suggestion will be a good one or not, but, in my opinion, this clause would be improved by allowing it to read as follows:—

Provided manufactured articles to be admitted under such preferential tariff shall be bona fide the manufactures of a country or countries entitled to the benefits of such tariff.

Then any question arising might be decided by the Minister of Customs. I think it would be better than any statement as to the goods being the bona fide manufacture of a country, and then the question whether such was the fact would be decided by the Minister of Customs.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That matter was very thoroughly considered, and we were advised, and correctly advised, I think, that if you left out the following words, there would be no limitation. An article the bona fide production of England, no matter what proportion might be English product, could come in. It was thought that we would, by adopting that suggestion, open the door more widely. The other words were put in deliberately, with a view to giving a limitation, which we thought was within the spirit of the resolution.

Mr. MACLEAN. Do the Government propose to compel importers who claim preference, to make an affidavit that those goods were substantially the product of Great Britain?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I suppose that will be done, but it will come under the regulations to be framed under these resolutions.

Mr. MACLEAN. There might be an affidavit made in England, where the goods originate, and also by the importer to the same effect. If that were insisted on, a great many frauds would be barred.

Mr. BENNETT. I understand, with respect to entries in the Customs Department, that, in the event of a ruling being made by the Minister in respect to which the party feels aggrieved, the importer can, by petition of right, with the consent of the Department of Justice first had and obtained, bring an action in the courts. I think I am correct in that assumption. I submit, that, having regard to the very large number of entries made, it is placing in the hands of the Minister a very large power, when it is stated that, in regard to all these appeals, no matter how vast may be the amount involved, he, and he alone, is to be the sole judge as to the merits of the case. If the clause is adopted as at present drafted, it must, of necessity, result in appeals being taken from the decision of the Minister of Customs. Would it not, in view of that fact, be better to stop at the word "customs," and omit the words "whose decision shall be final"? There will, from time to time, be very large claims made on account of differences of opinion which may arise or exist in regard to entries made, and this resolution will throw on the Minister almost unlimited work in taking, viva voce or by affidavit, the evidence of the parties concerned. I submit, it would be unfair to say that the Minister of Customs is to be sole arbitrator, and by the passage of this clause prevent an application being made to the courts by petition of right, although the court has been opened to importers, and by the passing of this statute they would be estopped from carrying an appeal beyond the Minister of Customs.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is very important to have an authority to determine the question promptly. No doubt, at the beginning, there will be difficulties, such as have been suggested, but each case determined will help the Minister to lay down general rules, and he may be able to make regulations which will cover certain matters. When new questions arise, it is very desirable to have each transaction promptly settled, and, if we allow appeals from the Minister to the Treasury Board or to the Governor in Council—I am waiving for the moment the question of appeals to the courts—it will so weaken the hands of the Minister that there will be a lack of that firm administration in the carrying out of the law which is so desirable. Suppose an importer wishes to bring in certain goods or articles under the preferential tariff which, in the opinion of the Minister, do not come under it, if the Minister promptly gives judgment, the matter may be finally settled. If the party could, however, appeal to another tribunal, those goods would continue to be brought in, and the question would be revived. It is very desirable that the Minister, who, of course, has to be responsible to his colleagues, and through them to Parliament, should be clothed with power to deal with matters promptly, and not encourage people to take appeals against the ruling of the Minister. It would not serve the purpose which hon. members on both sides of the House have in view, and which this clause is designed to carry out.

Mr. BENNETT. It is admitted that differences of opinion will arise, particularly in respect to what is meant by the words "substantial portion." Assume, for the sake of argument, that a heavy importation of goods from the old country is questioned, and the Minister holds out that there has been a violation of this principle of preference, and that the goods do not come within the purview of the clause, what must necessarily arise? It would be a most expensive proceeding to bring witnesses from the old country to give evidence before the Minister of Customs. The Minister would not be in the same position to deal with the matter as would a court, in this, that a court, being, I assume, a court of record, might issue a commission for the examination of witnesses in the old country, and the evidence taken by that commission might come before the court, and the case be adjudged on it. There would be no process to compel the attendance of witnesses in England to testify in behalf of the importer or person aggrieved. If you add the remaining words, you effectually shut out any appeal to the courts, to which an importer can now appeal. I submit, that this is a matter of very grave importance, and, if appeals are to be shut off and the Minister is to be the sole judge, it must necessarily result in the Minister of Customs being occupied during the best portion of his time in listening to the evidence of witnesses in regard to customs claims.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I think, if the hon. gentleman had had any experience, he would know quite well that almost every custom-house officer throughout the country is accustomed to know the classes of goods imported from each country.

Mr. FOSTER. Customs officers ?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Collectors of customs at all large points where importations are made. They are perfectly conversant with the classes of goods made in Germany, Switzerland, Belgium and elsewhere. There would, therefore, be no trouble in regard to arranging with respect to the classes of goods coming from the different countries.

Mr. IVES. Do you think an ordinary collector could tell the difference between German and English goods ?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). There is always a stamp mark on German and French goods, and with that safeguard I can see no trouble to be anticipated at the custom-houses. Further, when an entry is made, there is a declaration by the importer as to where the goods come from. So, hon. gentlemen opposite are alarmed before they are hurt.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is very true that the importer makes a declaration, where the goods come from. We can see the absurdity of such a declaration, because it is impossible for him to know where they are manufactured. He may know that he bought them in England, but he does not know where they were made. I place very little confidence in the affidavit of the importer, and, in fact, it is unfair to ask him to make any such declaration, because it will be impossible for him to know the facts.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). If they are made in Germany, there is a mark to that effect on the goods, and there is no difficulty.

Mr. HENDERSON. If we are going to rely on the brand, we may expect that goods from Germany will be marked "manufactured in England." The question of brand is of very little importance. The hon. Minister (Mr. Fielding) did not fully answer the question of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), and it is a very important question.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) repeat it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I shall. I say it is an important question because I anticipate that the customs officers throughout the country and the importing public will watch this debate very closely, and will be guided to a very considerable extent by what is said here as to the manner in which they shall carry on their business. The question was : What machinery is the Minister of Customs going to employ in order to determine where the goods were manufactured. There is a difficulty there that I am unable to get over. The Minister of Customs may be a very wise man ; he may have knowledge of a great many different lines of business, but I am utterly at a loss to know what kind of evidence he can get to satisfy him in each particular case where these goods were made, or how much labour had been expended upon them in Great Britain and how much in other countries.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is the very fact that you cannot at present determine all your machinery which makes it necessary to leave a large measure of discretion to the Minister. I think myself the Minister might adopt various means. The affidavit, if affidavits are to be used, should not alone be the affidavit of the importer, but you may have to produce some evidence from the manufacturer. However, these are matters of detail which it would be utterly impossible to determine in a statute, and that is the reason we ask to leave it to the Minister of Customs, feeling assured that his desire will be to carry out the clause in the spirit which both sides of the House seem to determine it should be interpreted.

Mr. MacPHERSON. I regret very much that I have not heard the whole of this discussion.

Mr. CAMPBELL. You have not missed much.

Mr. MacPHERSON. My hon. friend (Mr. Campbell) says I have not missed much, and I dare say he is correct, but I wish to draw attention, in a few words, to the clause more particularly in so far as it relates to sugar refineries. I understand that the Minister of Finance has had communications from the sugar refiners, drawing attention to the fact that under the new tariff they will be in a worse position than they have been in since the commencement of sugar refining in Canada. I have no desire to speak on behalf of the refiners, but I do think they ought to have a fair hearing.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That question will come up on section "d" a little later on.

Mr. MACLEAN. I wish to impress upon the Government that they must take the greatest care in interpreting this preferential clause, that it shall be confined to England, and that other countries shall not get the benefit of it. If they do not start in to make the clause as narrow as it ought to be; if they allow it to be opened in the least degree, any number of frauds will be attempted to be perpetrated. The clause must be narrowed down to what it says and be kept there, and it will require the greatest firmness on the part of the Minister of Customs to protect the country against fraud.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We certainly have no desire to narrow it down with a view of defeating the preferential clause, but we have no intention to broaden it to the extent of allowing the fraudulent importation of goods.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Finance, talk around the matter as he pleases, is quite able to see the immense difficulties of administering this clause as it is worded. In the first place, the autocratic nature of it is plainly apparent. The Minister of Customs is really the boss of the whole situation; he is the supreme arbiter, he is the sole arbiter, and I do not have any sympathy with him for the amount of work that will be put on him, because in the first place he has invited it upon himself, and in the second place he is not here to-night when all these valuable suggestions are being made which might make his work a good deal easier, and which would give him a good deal of information which he will sadly need when he comes to the administration of this clause. So far as the manufactures are concerned, the clause is a most difficult one to administer, and it will really have the effect, especially in regard to goods coming from Great Britain, to render it possible to bring in under the preference certain manufactured goods from continental countries. I do not see how the Minister of Customs is going to keep them out. What is he going to do with regard to the large classes of manufactures that are almost indefinite in number, which can be partly made on the continent and brought to England and finished, and stamped as English manufacture, if they are stamped. The Canadian merchant goes to Birmingham or London or any other great mart and he buys these goods from the wholesale dealer. They are British goods; he is not to ask whether they are British goods or not; he simply buys them and he imports them into this country from Great Britain. What is the Minister of Customs going to do with reference to that? Who is to raise the question in the first place? Take a plate or anything of that kind, and suppose nine-tenths of the material and labour have been supplied in Germany or in any other continental country, and then it has been brought over to a British wholesale establishment and the finishing touches put on, and it is sold to the Canadian importer.

Mr. MACLEAN.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Would the hon. gentleman name one or two of this class of goods?

Mr. FOSTER. It does not require to name them in detail; they are legion. My hon. friend (Mr. Wood) says that any customs officer in this country can tell whether certain wares are made in Germany or Switzerland or not.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). So he can.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is intelligent, and he knows he is far more intelligent than the average customs officer, because of his long experience in business; but can he tell, when a ware is made partly in two countries, which country it is manufactured in? If the whole article is completed in one country an experienced man will be able to tell, but does not my hon. friend (Mr. Wood) see that the conditions are now entirely changed. Formerly other countries paid the same duties as did Britain, and therefore they had no object in partly making the goods in one country and sending them to be finished in Great Britain. But under the present circumstances this would be a great advantage to them.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I am speaking of my own class of goods in which I have been dealing for nearly fifty years. It is well known throughout Canada by the customs officers, what class of goods are made in the different countries. They are known not only by the quality and appearance of the goods but by the invoice and everything about them.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot get my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood) to look at it from my point of view. Suppose you take the pattern of a spoon or fork or knife; suppose you cut it out with the die in the United States, and bring it to Canada and have it finished here by a Canadian finisher. My hon. friend knows nothing about what has taken place in the process. Is he going to tell, when that is presented to him as a finished article, whether a part of it was made in the United States or whether it was not?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). An experienced hardware man can tell it in an instant. It is his business to do so.

Mr. FOSTER. It will be exactly the same pattern and will be made out of the same kind of raw material. Is there anything in the air of Rochester, for instance, which will leave on a piece of steel an impress or a smell which will enable my hon. friend to distinguish it when he puts his nasal organ near it?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). There is a finish on the goods peculiar to each country that is easily detected by an experienced man.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I do not think I can carry on the argument with my hon.

friend. I will have to address my argument to the common sense of plain men who have not had that experience in hardware and kindred goods. I am addressing myself now to the Minister of Finance and the administrators of the tariff. How can they tell whether an article has been manufactured in Great Britain or not? Who will raise the question? The British exporter will not raise it, because it is his interest to sell the goods to Canada; the manufacturer in Germany or Belgium or Switzerland, who has sent the raw material or the half-finished goods to the British manufacturer will not raise it; the importer himself will not raise it. Who, then, is to raise the question? It can only be raised in two ways. Either the Customs Department must be suspicious of everything, and demand the evidence with regard to everything imported from Great Britain, or else those who make a similar article in this country must have their legion of spies and detectives everywhere, and object to everything in their line that comes in. This is a common-sense way of viewing the matter. That is exactly what will take place. I fear that what we shall really have under this combination of things will be, not preferential trade with Great Britain, but that manufactured goods will trickle through Great Britain or be collaborated between the two countries, and will be brought in from every manufacturing country in Europe, so far as that can be profitably done; and the competition in business is so great that wherever an opening can be found for goods at one-fourth less duties by carrying out a certain process of collaboration, the incentive is to do it. Then, I would like to ask my hon. friend on what principle it is that he gives the preference to the West India Islands, making no distinction between the good and the bad, but letting the rain of his bounty fall equally on the just and the unjust. In the different colonies, as he knows, the duties are very divergent. Some of them have very high duties on the products which we send to them; others have very light duties. In Bermuda, I believe, the whole tariff on imported goods is extremely low, and goods from there might be let in under the preferential tariff on the same ground as goods from Great Britain. But there are other colonies, the tariffs of which are especially hard on the products which our farmers would send them. You make no distinction; all is given up, and for nothing. There can be no principle for this at all, except one of unbounded generosity, under which, without getting anything at all in return, we give to the West Indies a preference in our markets. With reference to the substantial portion of the labour, suppose the question does arise, and the Minister of Customs is to make his decision, what course of argument will have to be taken to convince him of the exact amount of labour necessary? I have not heard my hon. friend make any explanation of what would be called a substantial portion of the labour to be put into the production. There is nothing definite at all. It is one of the most indefinite clauses that could possibly be framed, and it is so framed that in the end what it will evolve itself into is, I think, practically an import of all that class of articles which can be brought through British channels of trade into this country, oftentimes by having them finished in Great Britain, perhaps more frequently by not having them finished at all; because our German friends are particularly bright in adapting themselves to the foibles and customs of the people with whom they trade. I cannot understand how my hon. friend is going to guard that phrase. Perhaps he has some idea of what he understands by a substantial portion of the labour.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think my hon. friend overlooks this important fact: Great Britain is still a very great manufacturing country; and, although in some few lines Germany has run her close, it is not to be supposed that in the great majority of articles that will come in, the Germans can afford to handicap themselves, as they would be obliged to do if, instead of importing direct to us, as at present, they would first have to send their goods to Great Britain to undergo there some process of finishing, and to pay the middlemen for handling them before sending them to Canada. I think the English manufacturer, with that advantage in his hands, would be able, not in all cases perhaps, but pretty completely, to keep out of our market his German competitor, whom he is very anxious to keep out; while, on the other hand, if it were proved that evasion was taking place, I think you could trust our manufacturers, who will keep a tolerably close eye on these matters, to keep the Minister of Customs pretty well advised as to any attempts at evasion by means of colourable importations. After one or two years of administration it may be possible to comply with the hon. gentleman's wishes to define this provision more closely. But I would point out that in England, where an enormous proportion of everything she makes is made up of articles imported from every quarter of the globe, it would utterly destroy any preferential advantage we propose to give her if we were to construe this clause too strictly. The hon. gentleman exaggerated the number of articles that will be imported from Germany and other foreign countries through England. What little experience I have had in that way tends to show that you cannot possibly send goods from the place of manufacture in a foreign country to a centre like London, Birmingham or Manchester or any of the other export points in England, without incurring pretty considerable additional expense in the way of transport charges and the treatment necessary in England to put these goods in shape for export. If we attempted to define exactly how this is done, we should fall into tenfold trouble. The only possible way of carrying this out is to give a reasonable amount of discretion to the Minister of Customs. The hon. gentleman knows too that this is necessary, in the interest of the revenue, to prevent the interminable litigation that may occur if the exporters were allowed to appeal from pillar to post—from the Minister of Customs to the Governor in Council, the Treasury Board and the courts. After all is said and done, it is a question of the remission of duties. It is a question of giving certain privileges to certain parties who qualify for them, and therefore it is fair and just that the Government should impose reasonable regulations on these parties and put the onus of proof on them in case of any dispute.

Mr. HUGHES. I notice in the resolution that certain islands, Jamaica, the Bahamas and other West India islands come under the preference schedule. I do not rise to find fault but only to make a suggestion, and it is this. Canada bonuses a line of steamships running to Australian colonies. En route they call at the Fiji Islands and New Zealand. Queensland produces all tropical commodities that these other localities do. For instance, Queensland is reputed to be one of the best sugar districts in the world. The Fiji Islands also produce vast quantities of sugar and tropical fruits. These colonies take immense quantities of Canadian manufactures. They also take farm products and are consumers of large quantities of Canadian flour, and other Canadian commodities in the off seasons, which they themselves produce. For instance, while Tasmania and other Australasian colonies produce apples in great quantities, which they export to the old land in season, they also import apples in the off season. They also import large quantities of our wood and timber. There is not a steamer leaving Vancouver, which does not leave behind it hundreds of tons of freight. The difficulty is to encourage return freight. These colonies buy so much from us that it is only fair, following out this line of policy, that the Government should give them some consideration, when giving consideration to the other colonies, and I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that the Australasian colonies are just as loyal, just as favourable to the preferential trade, and were just as anxious to see the privileges accorded to Germany and Belgium in the treaties abrogated as we were. For years, these colonies endeavoured, as Canada did, to have these treaties abrogated, so that when these privileges are being extended to our sister colonies in the West Indies, it is only fair they should be extended to the Australasian colonies.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. McDUGALL. Referring to the point that the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) speaks so lightly of, I would like to ask the hon. Finance Minister what there is in these resolutions that would prevent the exporting houses of Germany, Belgium or France from sending the cheap products that enter into the manufacture of certain lines of goods to England, putting them together in England, and then exporting them to this country, without paying the duty that would otherwise be imposed upon them. Take, for instance, the article of ladies' hats, which might consist of ribbons, feathers, velvets, laces and a number of other articles, all of which might be manufactured in foreign countries and be worked into hats in England. How can it be expected that the customs officers in this country will be able to tell where any of those articles come from that enter into the composition of a hat made in England. I am satisfied it would be impossible. The same argument might be applied to hundreds of other articles. Take, for instance, mantles, certain lines of dress goods, boots and shoes, woollen and silk goods, socks, stockings, ties, buttons, in all of which the cheap products that enters into their manufacture may be made out of England but put together in that country and thence imported into Canada, under this reduction. In what way are the officers of customs going to be able to tell where any of these products were originally manufactured.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman could not have been present when I previously answered the same question. It is difficult to tell exactly how it will be done, and that is the reason why we should not endeavour to do it. The object of the clause is to give the Minister of Customs power to deal with the cases as they present themselves. If, in the case of hats, it is apparent to the Minister of Customs that only a small part of the work was done in England, and that it was practically of foreign manufacture, sent to England to evade the law, the Minister would exclude it from the effect of this clause. I do not see how by any words we can meet the difficulties, and I think it much better to leave the matter to the discretion of the Minister. I do not pretend that you can define the exact way in which this difficulty can be met, but everything possible for human intelligence to do will be done, and the object of the provision will be best carried out by leaving to the Minister the discretion we desire to leave him, rather than attempt to tie him down by any hard and fast line which hon. gentlemen opposite would have great difficulty in defining.

Mr. McDUGALL. The hon. gentleman must admit that it is impossible for the Minister of Customs or the officers of customs to make the distinction, and therefore why not put some other machinery in the hands of the hon. Minister.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. What would the hon. gentleman suggest?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would suggest this. If it were my business, I would put such machinery as this in the hands of the customs. Let him exact from the manufacturers a declaration to the effect that the articles which enter chiefly into the manufacture of any particular article are the product of British manufacture and not of foreign manufacture.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is a fair suggestion and no doubt the Minister of Customs will adopt it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I contend that it is Parliament that should give him power to do so.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Parliament gives it by this resolution.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I speak subject to correction, but it seems to me that Parliament should specifically give this power to the Minister of Customs.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton.) That is largely done at present.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The power should be given by this resolution.

Mr. CLARKE. I would like to have some information with regard to the importation of such articles as biscuits, confectionery, marmalade, jams, &c. These articles are made, to a great extent, in the British Isles out of the bounty sugar of foreign countries. Is it intended that they shall be admitted under the preferential tariff? Then take the case of pulp. Vast quantities of wood pulp are exported from this country to the old country and there made into paper. Will that paper be allowed in under the preferential tariff?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I should almost hope that it would, if made out of good Canadian pulp. I do not know why it should not.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Of course the importation of wood pulp is not confined to wood pulp from Canada. Vast quantities will be imported from the United States and other countries. Will the pulp manufactured from that foreign wood pulp come under the preferential clause?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Much would depend on the proportion of British labour entering into it. If it were substantially the manufacture of British industry, it would come in, but there again it is a matter concerning which we cannot give any details. The hon. gentleman will observe that we have made provision for dealing with refined sugar; but sugar enters into the manufacture of so many articles that I am afraid it would be impossible to follow it in all its ramifications. We have made provision for the admission of refined sugar only when manufactured from raw sugar produced in the British possessions; but as respects the various articles into the manufacture of which sugar enters, that would open up a wide range of articles indeed.

Mr. CLARKE. Would marmalade, biscuits, and so on, come under this preferential clause?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Only when shown to the satisfaction of the Minister of Customs that the percentage of British labour entering into them was such that they ought to get the preference.

Mr. IVES. Take the article of paper to which my hon. friend has referred. Wood pulp is imported from the United States. Chemical wood pulp, when the freight is paid and it is delivered free on board in London or Liverpool, costs about £9 or very nearly two cents a pound. That is all from the United States, and the result of United States labour and wood, and the British manufacturer will make that into paper and send it back here, and sell it for 3½ cents per pound, so that more than half the value of the paper is the result of United States labour and material and freight charges. There is a case in which you let in an article, under the preferential clause, of which more than half is the result of foreign labour and material, coming from a country not entitled to a preference at all. I think that you will find that you must limit this resolution to raw material, even if you have to set up a separate clause declaring that wool and raw cotton and other articles we might mention are to be considered raw material. Limit the resolution to the importation of goods made entirely from British labour, though the raw material be imported, and by a second clause say that, for the purposes of this Act, wool, pig iron, steel, &c., shall be considered as raw material for the purposes of this Act. The difficulty is working out the provision, as it is, will be found insuperable.

Mr. CLANCY. I just want to point to two or three articles only that enter largely into the imports of Canada, for instance, bicycles and their parts. A large quantity of bicycles and parts of bicycles are imported from foreign countries into England. We expect large quantities, and if we are able to export large quantities, other countries can do likewise. We also import very large quantities of bicycles and their parts. I would like to ask how it would be possible for the Minister of Customs, under the discretionary powers given him and with the desire that we ought to have the resolution lived up to as nearly as possible, to be able to judge matters of that kind.

Take also leather, of which large quantities are imported into England from all countries. Canada, in fact, exports very considerable quantities, and imports again. Take leather belting. Could any customs officer, or could the Minister of Customs himself, tell anything about a matter of that kind? He is absolutely in the dark in the application of this clause. What will follow? There will be an uncertainty and disturbance in trade that the people of this country should not be subjected to. Suppose that a large quantity of rice is imported, what would be the hon. gentleman's view with regard to that? I do not know whether he regards the cleaning of the rice as a manufacture. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce thought it a very small part of the work, and used to think that a few rice-mills were living at the expense of the people of this country. And yet that is a question the hon. gentleman will have to deal with, if this resolution becomes law. This is not a question of giving discretionary power. After all, that is given. The question is, as to the utter impossibility of the Minister of Customs working it out, no matter what machinery he is able to employ. I have pointed out that it was quite impossible for the hon. gentleman to learn the facts upon which to decide these questions. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) tells us that he would know; but we have not a hardware man, or an expert in woollens or cottons at every customs-house. The Minister of Customs himself, doing him full justice, would not be able to work it out. But we are told, and I admit that it has much weight, that, if we have preferential trade, the same question will arise. I hope that that question will come under a different form from this. When it does, we shall have to lay down some hard and fast rules. We may not be prepared to admit so many classes of goods as here proposed, and the reason why we would limit them would be, the safety of the people manufacturing a similar class of goods in this country. The great question is, as to the difficulty of applying this clause.

Mr. POWELL. I would like to know from the hon. Minister of Finance, if he has any idea what amount of trade in imports into this country will be diverted from foreign countries to Great Britain. Of course, I do not suggest an exact computation; a general estimate is all we can ask for. But, in looking over this matter, the Minister of Finance must have considered the effect of this clause, and must have considered whether, in this matter, we are giving any substantial advantage or not.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am afraid I am unable to give the hon. gentleman a formal estimate. We do consider that we are giving, in one sense, a substantial advantage to Great Britain, so far as favourable tariff terms are an advantage.

and also an advantage to the people of Canada, in giving this reduction. We have not made even an approximate estimate of the amount. Speaking generally—and we can only speak generally—when you come to make a distinction of 25 per cent between British goods and foreign goods, the importations of British goods must very substantially be increased. But we are not able to give figures; we have made no estimate.

Mr. POWELL. According to the figures of British trade, the situation must certainly be alarming to the British traders. Since 1878, I find by our returns that our importations have increased twenty millions, taking the year 1878 and last year. I find that while our total importations have increased twenty millions, our importations from Great Britain have decreased eight millions, but our importations from the United States—I am speaking of importations for home consumption—have increased no less than thirteen millions, from France, $1,500,000; from Germany, $7,000,000; from Belgium, $700,000; from China and Japan, $2,800,000; from all other countries, $4,500,000. Now, if the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the Minister of Customs hope to turn the tide of affairs and to allow a further increase to British trade at the expense of foreign trade, then I would like to know that before I vote for this measure. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he hopes so to divert trade from foreign countries to Great Britain as to turn the tide that has been running against Great Britain for the last twenty years.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman will see that on the whole Great Britain will have an advantage as against her American and German competitors, of probably six to nine per cent. Now, if the British merchant is not able, with such an advantage as that, greatly to improve his position, he does not deserve to. In my opinion he will have a great advantage over the whole of his foreign competitors, and we mean him to have it, it is for him to make use of it. In my opinion he has been negligent, and his own official reports show that he has been negligent in adapting himself to our trade, and to the trade of other countries. But he is picking up. We are giving John Bull a chance. There is no doubt that the tide has been turning heavily against English importations. Our trade with the Americans has increased very much faster than our trade with Great Britain, and I think it is time to give the old country a chance. I cannot say, nor can any man say absolutely, how soon or how far that may extend.

Mr. POWELL. We might have an estimate.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is a matter of extreme difficulty, as the hon. gentleman knows, particularly if he will cast his eye over the column of imports he has in his hand, and it depends on a good many more things than the exact amount of taxes levied under a tariff, to say how trade will develop itself.

Mr. FOSTER. And so none of you have attempted it.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Some of us may have attempted it, but having examined it, we find how extremely impossible it would be to estimate the exact amount, as it was for my hon. friend to estimate the exact amount of revenue he would be receiving for the year 1897. He will recollect there, that with all his experience, he was considerably out, although he accounted for it. But I think everybody will see this, that where you give such advantages as we propose to give, there is a strong probability that English trade will increase and expand. I may remark that with such information as has come to us within the last two or three months, the Government are able to say that it is increasing. There was a considerable improvement in the quarter ending on the first day of this month in the exports from Great Britain to Canada. I have not got the figures by me, perhaps my hon. friend has, but they were quoted. I think to the best of my recollection that the exports from Great Britain showed an increase of 12 per cent over the corresponding quarter of last year. Now, that is a tolerable indication that the steps that have been taken—

Mr. POWELL. Might I ask the hon. gentleman if that is more than proportional to the general increase of importations during the same period?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think it is considerably more. The increase in importations generally I think has not been that. Of course, these are taken from the British trade returns. The exports to Canada during March increased 6 per cent, and for the three months increased 12 per cent. That is the statement which was quoted by my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). All British exports to all countries during the same period decreased 4 to 3 per cent respectively. This contrast in Canada's favour may fairly be attributed to the new Canadian tariff. I cannot at this moment give the exact increase in our importations for these three months. But speaking from recollection, I think that although they did increase to the extent of 12 per cent, I think perhaps they may have increased all told to the amount of 7 or 8 per cent. But to make an absolutely accurate estimate would be really impossible; I would not undertake to do it. If the hon. gentleman wants a guess he must recollect it would be purely a guess—my impression is that the increase in all probability may be four or five millions on that trade, that is, as soon as the 25 per cent tariff comes into operation. At present he will remember that we are working under a reduction of 12½ per cent, which is not likely to make anything like as great an improvement as the 25 per cent tariff. But remember I do not offer it as a prediction, but simply as a very rough estimate.

Mr. POWELL. I am prepared to accept that. Now, Sir, in any view we may take of this matter, it is a perfect sham. In the first place, if it does not give a benefit to the British trader and to the British exporter, it is a sham. It is a sham so far as the British manufacturer is concerned. If it does act favourably to him, and increases the exportations from Great Britain to this country to the amount of five millions, then it is a fraud and a sham so far as the gain to the taxpayers of this country is concerned. The Minister of Finance said that the taxpayers of this country would derive all the benefit that would result from increased importations from Great Britain. That is the most palpable fallacy. Suppose, for instance, that this scheme is going to divert the import trade to the amount of ten millions from the United States to Great Britain. What does that mean? If we import goods to the amount of ten millions from the United States, supposing we take an average duty of 33½ per cent, that would mean $3,333,333 of customs duties to be paid into the public treasury. A quarter of that would mean $833,333 which is the amount under the preferential tariff which is really given as a bonus to the English manufacturer. Now if that amount, under the preferential tariff, is necessary, and it may be necessary, because the question is of such dubiety that a gentleman so versed in commerce as the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not willing to stake his reputation upon its diverting any foreign trade to Great Britain, it must be a matter of extreme dubiety whether it is going to take the full amount of that preferential 25 per cent to give the trade to the British producer. If it does, what does that mean? We pay him the same amount with duty paid for our goods as we pay the producer of the United States, but the difference is this to the taxpayers of this country; if we buy ten million dollars worth of goods from the United States we are paying $3,333,000 into the public treasury, and if we buy from Great Britain we are paying in, not that amount, but $833,000, or one-fourth less. It is all hollow, it is a sham. If we do that, we are making to British producers and British manufacturers a present of $833,000 per annum, and we actually ask the taxpayers of this country to put their hand into their pockets and pay that amount. That is the actual outcome of it, we cannot possibly avoid it. If the hon. gentleman estimates the effect of preference to British trade as against foreign trade, at five million, then the diversion of trade to Great Britain, for the sake of a sham fealty to the Empire, a fantastic Imperial idea, the taxpayers of this country are asked to put their hands into their pockets for $416,000 per annum. If we are going to buy those goods from Great Britain, let it be because British manufacturers can produce them as cheaply as others. If we are going to pay any amount to Great Britain, let us pay it to Great Britain herself. She protects our commerce on every sea, and, if we wish to assist her, let us contribute a ship to the navy or make a contribution in some such way; but to contribute money to men whom we are to assume to be lame and impotent, who are not able to hold their own in fair competition with the rest of the world, is absurd. Where are all the arguments of the Minister of Trade and Commerce which he formerly advanced against protection and against bloated protectionists? Where is his loud complaint about the hundreds of millions of dollars that he, when in Opposition, said went into the already too-full pockets of the manufacturers? There is no sympathy for our manufacturers now, so we are going to put the money into the pockets of the manufacturers of England.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Our taxpayers will get the benefit from getting goods at reduced rates.

Mr. POWELL. No, not at lower prices; but we will enable the British manufacturers to get their goods in here. We will not get the goods cheaper or get any benefit, but the British producers will get the benefit and have that portion of our trade, and by the amount of the reduction through the preference our revenue will be short. I would be untrue to my constituents, did I in any way undertake or desire to deny our right to help Great Britain along; but if we are going to help Great Britain, let us help, not the producers in Manchester or Sheffield but the British nation as a nation, and let it be a fair business equivalent for the need of protection she affords our commerce on every sea.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. As Great Britain takes two-thirds of our exports, and is likely to take a great deal more, and as there is no better axiom in trade than that, if you want some one to buy from you, you must buy from them, we will be encouraging trade with them and assisting our own producers, too. It is clear as daylight, that, if you reduce the tax on a given article, the Canadian consumer will get the benefit of it. I know, of course, that hon. gentlemen opposite do not care anything for the interest of the consumers.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. gentleman says, that, in order to have trade, we must buy from those whom we wish to buy from us. Hon. gentlemen opposite in this show the fallacy of their whole argument. Our exports to Great Britain have been rolling up by leaps and bounds, and last year increased $17,000,000, while imports from Great Britain have, year to year, decreased; at the same time, our exports to the United States have declined, while our imports have increased year after year.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. By the National Policy.

Mr. POWELL. I do not care what did it. The hon. gentleman is too keen a logician not to know that his remarks are not pertinent to the issue. The hon. gentleman made the point, that reciprocity was needed to secure export trade. My contention is that under modern conditions that is not true, and my contention is supported by the results of trade in every part of the civilized world.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I wish to inquire, what amount of money was refunded to countries outside of Great Britain for goods that were imported subject to duty without giving the preferential tariff of last year, up to the time it was decided to apply the preferential tariff to those articles?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am sorry I cannot make a definite reply to the hon. gentleman, in the absence of the Minister of Customs. I think the amount was about $100,000; I make that statement subject to correction.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Then, about $100,000 was the necessary reduction under the 12½ per cent. It is understood that it cost the country $100,000 for the Government to adopt the plan adopted last year, by going blindly into giving a preferential tariff only to Great Britain.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The only difference between my hon. friend and myself is, that I do not agree that we proceeded blindly in this matter, but that we proceeded with very intelligent sight, and accomplished what we desired.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I understood the hon. gentleman said the preferential tariff would not apply to those other countries, and he went into it blindly. If he had taken the advice of the ex-Minister of Finance, who told him that it was impossible to carry out the plan as laid before the House and the country, we would not have been obliged to pay $100,000. It would have been better to have induced the mother country to remove the restrictions which were subsequently removed, and have thus saved $100,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the Minister of Finance will bring down a correct statement of the refunds paid, because it will show the amount we were obliged to pay, and for which the people have got no benefit, and which they had to pay for the blunder of the Minister. Those goods were brought in, they paid an increased duty, they were sold to the consumers on the basis of the increased duty, and, after the consumer had paid the full price, plus the increased duty, it was found that the Government had to put their hands into the Treasury to the amount of $100,000 and make a present to those gentlemen who exported the goods. The hon. gentleman may be cock-sure of many things, but, if he is cock-sure about tariff changes, it would be a very good lesson to him, if he had to pay the penalty. It is very easy to make these blunders, and then, when the penalty has to be paid, to put your hands in the Treasury and pay out the necessary money. I want to make the point plainly—and the hon. gentleman cannot deny it—that the consumers first paid the increased duty and then had to pay a penalty in the shape of $100,000, or $150,000, for this blunder of the Minister. A cognate point has been made by my hon. friend (Mr. Powell), and the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not answer it, and did not attempt to answer it. It was, that, if you put up a general tariff to a certain height, and if a country cannot on certain articles come in and compete, and you let down the fence so that that country is able to compete under the general tariff, and you allow it to come in, what benefit would the consumer obtain from a little gap being made. They are as bright and keen for the penny, those English exporters and manufacturers, as are Canadian, and, when they get through the gap and find the general height of the tariff is so much, they intend to have everything allowed by the general tariff. If they do not get the benefit, the importers here will get it, but the consumers will not obtain it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not imagine that we on this side of the House will ever be able to act so that hon. gentlemen opposite will not be able to rise in their places and denounce our actions, and say that we have blundered. It is an easy thing for the hon. gentleman to say that we have committed a blunder in everything, but the repeated assertion of that has not been accepted by the country as a fact, and will not be accepted as a fact in the future. If hon. gentlemen assume that, by stating day after day that we have blundered, they are making any gain and progress, I can tell them that they are under a mistake. The public will judge by results, and not by the empty statements of hon. gentlemen opposite. When the hon. gentleman says that, on goods on which a part of the duty was refunded, the consumers had to pay the higher tariff, his statements are open to doubt. The bulk of the goods were, no doubt, sold after a reasonable period had elapsed after the facts respecting the refunds became known, and sold in the ordinary way and at prices which would allow an ordinary selling profit to the merchant. So, it is fairly open to argument as to whether whatever was repaid did not really go back to the people. Something has been said about preferential trade being a sham. If any sham, if there has been any sham, it is in hon. gentlemen opposite pretending to be in favour of preferential trade in any way, when every statement they have made and every argument they have used to-night has been against preferential trade in every shape and form. They put up difficulties in the way and they ask: How are you going to do this, how are you going to do that, and how are you going to do the other thing; when every one of these imaginary difficulties would arise if they had preferential trade according to their own way of getting it. And yet, Sir, they assume that all these difficulties are peculiar to the preferential trade we propose to establish, when they must know that if they exist at all, they will exist under any system. If we take two prominent gentlemen opposite who have discussed the question to-night as fair exponents of the views of the Conservative party, then it is a perfect sham to say they are in favour of preferential trade in any form. My hon. friend from Sherbrook (Mr. Ives) says he would admit no goods from England unless the whole of these goods were made in England from English materials. Well, you cannot admit English manufactures at all if you do that. When an hon. gentleman says that any goods made in England out of commodities imported from abroad shall not receive the benefit of preferential trade, then he denies the whole theory of preferential trade. There is not an English manufacturer who would not say that preferential trade of that kind offered to England is a sham of the worst sort. Then, my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) is against preferential trade altogether, because the whole trend of his argument went to show that by a reduction of 25 per cent you give nothing to England. How much would he give? Is it not a fair question to ask him, would he give a reduction of 26 per cent, 27 per cent, 28 per cent, or 50 per cent. If 25 per cent preferential rate will give nothing to England, how much are they prepared to give on the other side of the House. My hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) makes it clear that he is not prepared to give anything, for he does not want any goods to be brought from England under a preferential tariff. My hon. friend from Westmoreland says it is a sham because the preference is only 25 per cent, but I venture to say that hon. gentlemen on the other side are not prepared to name the rate of preference at which they will admit English goods. If there is any sham at all in this matter, it is not a sham on the part of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House; it is a sham on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite who talk preferential trade as they have been talking it for the last ten years, but who have taken very good care never to carry it into effect.

Mr. HENDERSON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) has waxed very warm indeed at the position taken by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House with reference to preferential trade.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What is your position?

Mr. HENDERSON. In order perhaps to give the hon. gentleman a little more reason for speaking as he did, I may say that so far as I am concerned, I am totally opposed to his plan of preferential trade, and have always been. I am not ashamed to state that; I stated it last year when this question was under discussion and I have not changed my mind since.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What is your plan?

Mr. HENDERSON. My system of preferential trade would be one by which we would get something for what we give. I never approved, and do not expect ever to approve, of a system of preferential trade that will be all give and no get. I do not think that is the kind of preferential trade we want in Canada. The Minister (Mr. Fielding) asked the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) to name the rate of preference that would be satisfactory to him. The rate I name would be, the equivalent to Canada for what we give to Great Britain. I think that would be a fair rate and the only rate that can be properly named. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce told us some time ago that he desired to give John Bull a chance. Well, I am sure that John Bull will be very grateful indeed to Canada for the chance we propose to give him. But, Sir, we must remember that in this country we have a great many of John Bull's children who have come here to make their home and their living, and it is our duty to give them a chance just as well as to give it to their father in England. They are much more entitled to our care than is John Bull, Sr., who is much better able to take care of himself. I am much more interested in John Bull's children in this country than I am in John Bull himself in the old land, and I believe it is unfair that we should open the door for the exclusive advantage of the manufacturers of Great Britain and give them an opportunity to send their manufactured goods in here to the detriment of our own mechanics, our own artisans, and our own workmen. We must remember that every dollar's worth of goods that is sent in here from Great Britain must of necessity reduce by a corresponding amount the quantity of goods manufactured in this country; it must have a tendency to reduce the employment of labour in this country, and also to reduce the wages paid for that labour. For that reason, I again say that I am not in favour of the kind of preferential trade which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) has imposed.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I am surprised to hear an Englishman talk as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) has. England has for years taken everything we had to send her without charging us a cent of duty, and now are we to say to England: You must give us 5 per cent preference over every other country or we will not give you preferential trade with us. I am surprised that any man claiming to be not only an Englishman, but a Canadian would make such a statement as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson). It has been stated on the other side of the House that as the result of this preferential tariff the merchants did not reduce their prices, and that therefore the consumers did not get any advantage because of the reduction of the duty. I may tell hon. gentlemen opposite that all the leading wholesale houses not only reduced the price of the goods imported under the 12½ per cent reduction, but they also reduced the price of the same class of goods in stock before the reduction. I am satisfied that the people of Canada have derived a very substantial benefit, and when they come to get the 25 per cent reduction on the 1st July next, the price of the stock on hand will also be reduced to that amount, so that the consuming population of this country will derive a substantial benefit from the preferential tariff.

Mr. TAYLOR. On what articles?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). On all articles imported from England, and that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) knows quite well. He is conversant with the fact that in buying certain English articles which he uses in his manufactory, he got the benefit of the reduced tariff even to the one-eighth, and when the reduction comes to the one-quarter, he will receive the benefit of it, not only upon the stock freshly imported, but upon the stock held on hand at that time.

Mr. POWELL. In reply to the Minister of Finance, I may say that while he does not mean to be unfair, he might as well mean it, for he has displayed unfairness in his argument. What I said was this: that this was a sham in any way we looked at it. If it did not divert trade from foreign countries to Great Britain, it was a delusion so far as the British exporter was concerned, and if it did, it was a sham so far as the Canadian taxpayer was concerned. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) asks me, what amount of reduction I would have? I would have no reduction without there was a quid pro quo. That is what we understand on this side of the House by a preferential tariff. If there is a quid pro quo, then I am prepared to make a reduction, but not otherwise.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am quite satisfied with that explanation.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) told us that the consumer got the benefit of the rebate in duty that was given to the importer, and that statement was backed up by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood). It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that every man in this House ought to know, that it is not the consumer who buys the goods first after they enter into this country. Take, for instance, the importer from Montreal who imports goods from Germany. He imports the sample first. His traveller goes all over the country and sells the goods on the sample at a certain price. The importer orders a sufficient quantity of the goods to supply the sales which have been effected by his traveller; the goods are imported by the importer, and they are distributed to the retailers throughout the country. Does the Finance Minister mean to tell me, after the importer in Montreal imported $4,000 worth of goods and paid $1,000 of duty on them, and after say, six months, the Government refunded 12½ per cent of those duties, that the importer in Montreal went to all his customers throughout Canada, amounting to a hundred or several hundred, and handed over to them their share of that refund? I say no. No sane man would attempt to offer such an argument. The consumer paid the duty, and the importer or the manufacturer got the benefit. Not only did the consumer pay the 12½ per cent refunded by the Government, but whatever profit the importer and the retailer chose to put on that 12½ per cent, and not one cent of the money refunded by the Government went to the consumer. It may be that to the extent of what the importer kept in his warehouse, if he ventured to import a certain quantity above what he sold in advance, and held it for future sales, he would cut down his prices; but on the goods that were already distributed to the retailers throughout the country and from them to the consumers, not one cent was given back to the consumers or to the retailers.

Mr. TAYLOR. I want to ask the Minister of Finance a question or two in reference to a statement made by the Minister of Customs in his speech on the Budget. The Minister of Customs stated that for the six months ending the 31st of December, 1897, the reduction, owing to the 12½ per cent on the preferential tariff, amounted to $521,451. I want to inquire if he took into consideration the $100,000, more or less, that the Minister of Finance just now stated, in reply to an inquiry from this side of the House, was refunded—if that sum of $521,451 was collected over and above the refund, or if it should be reduced by the amount of the refund? Then I would like him to tell me also what proportion of the goods that made up this $521,451 came from England, and what proportion came from other countries; because the Minister of Customs made the statement that if the reduction were applied to a year it would amount to $1,000,000, and if applied to two years it would amount to $2,000,000; though it is patent to everybody that the preferential tariff for the six months preceding the 31st of December, 1897, applied to nearly all countries. I believe that the United States was about the only exporter to Canada that did not receive the abatement.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think it would be better that I should leave my hon. friend to put that question to the Minister of Customs at a later stage, when he will be here. I have not the figures with me, and I would prefer that the Minister of Customs should answer the question himself.

Mr. DAVIN. I rather think some of the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches misunderstand the position taken on this side of the House in regard to a preferential arrangement with England. We are glad, of course, to see that the hon. gentlemen who for so long took a pro-United States position, now that they are in power, are driven by the logic of events to take the loyal and Imperial position which they now take. The only thing in which we differ from them is this, that we think it would not only be better for Canada, but better for the Empire at large, in making a preferential arrangement, if it were found feasible—and an attempt should be made to see whether it is feasible or not—not to have a jug-handled arrangement, but to have one that would be strictly and mutually preferential. In regard to the very thing we are now discussing, on March 30, my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) asked a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was then leading the House, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce said in reference to the question, which referred to a debate that took place on March 14, in the Imperial House of Commons:

I think my hon. friend will be able to obtain full information in a very short time, when the Budget is brought down. The propositions are necessarily closely intertwined with certain proposals of the Budget, and we hope then to give my hon. friend full satisfaction.

My hon. friend from East York was not the only person in this House who was very curious to know what was the significance of a most interesting debate which took place on the 14th of last month in the Imperial House of Commons, when Mr. Chamberlain moved for £120,000 for sundry colonial services, including certain grants in aid. In the early part of his speech, Mr. Chamberlain, referring to the general question of the trade of the West India Islands which Mr. Labouchere wanted to enter upon, said:

As I have already stated, in answer to a question of the hon. member for Northampton, that it will be impossible for me to enter upon this general question at the present time, and the reason will satisfy the House. It is this: that we are engaged in negotiating with the United States, and also with the Dominion of Canada, which we hope may result in a reciprocity arrangement between those two countries and the West Indies for West Indian products. I am unable at the present to say that the negotiations have made much progress.

Mr. Chamberlain, referring to the grant, concluded with these words :

It is a small one, and must be treated as part of a great question of the future condition of the West Indies. To that matter we shall return as soon as the negotiations with the United States and Canada have come to an end ; but in the meantime we hope that the committee will not refuse the small grant we have asked.

Acting on the request of Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Labouchere and others abstained, apparently with difficulty, from going into the general question, and the vote was carried by 236 to 78, with a majority of 158. Now, there is a clear indication that at that time Mr. Chamberlain had some negotiation with this Government and with the Government of the United States for the purpose of bringing about a reciprocity between the West Indies and Canada and between the West Indies and the United States.

We have nothing to do with the United States here, but we have with Canada and the West Indies. As the Government are determined to make a one-sided preferential arrangement with England, I may say that I was very glad to see them take up a thoroughly Imperial position and show an interest in our colonies generally ; but I do not think, in the light of what we have here, and of what we know took place in the Imperial Parliament, that we ought to be satisfied with what the Minister of Finance tells us, in his Budget speech, on the very matter we are now discussing in committee. He said :

Knowing as we do that Her Majesty's Government are following this question very closely, knowing that they are dealing with a difficult problem in the face of many difficulties, it has occurred to us that, as the West Indies are our natural market, as they are British colonies, though far away in one respect, colonies with which we have close relations, that we have some Imperial responsibilities in this matter—it has occurred to us that we should be willing in a small way to lend a helping hand to those colonies in the sunny south. If we adhere too rigidly to the underlying feature of our preferential tariff, I am afraid we shall have to admit that the terms of the tariffs of the West Indies are not favourable to us, and perhaps we could not by a mere reciprocal clause extend the preferential tariff to the West Indies. We have examined the tariffs of the West Indies, and we find that while they are high tariffs to a considerable extent, they are in no sense protective tariffs.

The hon. gentleman gave the list of the West Indian tariffs, but now, when he states that these tariffs are high but not protective—that is his description of them—what would be in the way of any one or all of these islands that he set out in that list in his financial statement, giving to Canada, say, the 25 per cent preference which Canada is now about to give them ? I think we ought to be told in the committee why it is that the

Mr. DAVIN.

Government have not sought to get that preference in their markets on, for instance, our flour, oats, potatoes, butter, cheese, codfish, planks and boards. Why should it work other than well in their case to give us a 25 per cent preference ? Seeing what the character of their tariff is, they are not estopped by any free trade tendency, as is supposed to prevail in England and with the English people generally. I explained, the other night, that, even in England, there would be no difficulty—but I only referred to that in passing—in meeting the only argument that was used against Mr. Chamberlain's original idea to impose a countervailing duty on sugar, namely, that it was a tax on food. I just refer to that in passing, but what I say now is, that, in the light of the debate in the Imperial House of Commons, and the promise of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that, when the Minister of Finance came to deal with this matter, he would enlighten us with regard to the debate in the Imperial Parliament and Mr. Chamberlain's statement, we ought to have some explanation from him. Now that we are in committee, and can probe, in a conversational way and at the same time in a more thorough way, any subject that comes up, I think the Minister of Finance should give us some information on this matter.

As regards the question that was raised so pointedly by my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), I think it would be a misinterpretation of the position taken by him, to hold that he feels any antagonism against giving a preference to England, or that he feels that some injury would be done to us, if England gained something by the preferential tariff. One of the horns of the dilemma set up by the hon. member for Westmoreland was this, that, if English goods come in, it would be because the 25 per cent preference enabled them to compete with goods from the United States, and so the Canadian consumer would not really get the benefit that was intended, because there was a contradictory position taken by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and, I think, also by the Minister of Finance. At one time they say : We are giving you 25 per cent of advantage, and we put a plus quantity on the side of the consumer in Canada : and the next moment, they say : We give you a 25 per cent advantage, and we put a plus quantity to the same amount on the side of the manufacturers and merchants in England. You cannot have your cake and eat it. The consumer cannot have the advantage of that, and at the same time the English manufacturer. The Government must adhere to the one side or the other, and I think that was a point well taken by the hon. member for Westmoreland, and pressed home logically, and not met.

What I rose chiefly to say was this. Those hon. gentlemen have taken the position and not the best position—that they will give what they called a preference and not ask any advantage for Canada in return. As they have determined not to take the wise and logical course, both for Canada and the Empire, of asking for a preference for our manufacturers, our exporters and our farmers in the British markets, I am glad, nevertheless, to find that they are standing on good Imperial ground. I prefer to see them do that a great deal more than turn their eyes toward reciprocity or commercial union with the United States. I much prefer to see them take a course which has a Conservative colour to it, than see them take that course which would be in accordance with their past tradition. Nevertheless, there is one stage better than that, and it is a stage that would give us what Mr. Chamberlain, and Lord Salisbury, and the Duke of Devonshire thought we would have asked for, namely, that position in the British market which would be as advantageous, in the long run—aye, more advantageous—to the British manufacturing merchant than this one-sided arrangement, which has neither logic nor statesmanship in it.

It has none of the elements in it that will commend it all round. While I can rejoice that these hon. gentlemen have been forced into this position now, I certainly would prefer that the view that has been so well expounded many a time and oft by my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) should prevail. I showed in a speech that I made on the Address, when I quoted from reports of small mechanics' institutes and farmers' institutes throughout England, that a year before the right hon. the Premier went over there the people of England were discussing this question of preferential trade. Why, Sir, the English people were ripe for it, the English statesmen were ripe for it, and the unfortunate thing was that, no doubt, the strong free trade and pro-American party in the Cabinet, those men who were determined at all hazards to seek the Yankee dollar in preference to the English shilling, had made the Premier forswear his professions at Brantford, they had denuded him of the strength he had put on when he said he was as much in favour of preferential trade as Sir Charles Tupper himself, and by the time he had got across the Atlantic the message that was in his mouth was a wholly different one from what the people expected. It was the reverse of what happened in the case of Balaam. Balaam was brought to curse Israel, and he blessed Israel. The Canadian electorate, in voting for the present Prime Minister thought they were voting for a man who would bless preferential trade; but when he went to England he cursed it up hill and down dale; he could do nothing better than raise his head and throw out his hands and say that preference was protection and protection was a curse. He declared that we could not have a Zollverein, much to the amazement of Mr. Chamberlain, of the Duke of Devonshire, of Lord Salisbury and all the English statesmen who thought that the time had come for a new step forward in binding the Empire more closely together. They found the Prime Minister of England's premier colony saying that he would have nothing to do with any preferential arrangement, a proposal that the statesmen of South Africa, the statesmen of Australia, one statesman excepted, that the statesmen of Canada—those statesmen who had built Canada up to what she is to-day—had nursed into the ripeness that it had attained; they found the Prime Minister of practically seven colonies, flouted the idea, and so for the time dashed our hopes to pieces. But, Sir, he did not kill the idea of preferential trade, and it is barely possible, looking at that debate in the Imperial Parliament, there may be something more for us to learn. I cannot believe that the answer given to my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) by the Minister of Trade and Commerce had no significance. It is barely possible that the Secretary for the Colonies, in asking the Finance Minister to do this favour for the West Indian colonies and so help the Minister when he was regularly pressed back in his seat, when he was turned down in the Cabinet by Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, being enabled to say to the West Indies: In addition to the £120,000 voted, here is the great Dominion of Canada going to give you 25 per cent preference in her market—it is possible, I say, that there may have been some negotiations or arrangements. I would ask the Minister what negotiations or arrangements took place between himself and Mr. Chamberlain, and what inducements Mr. Chamberlain held out to him with reference to the future of inter-Imperial trade that is so dear to those who sit on this side of the House.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I must say I am somewhat surprised at the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), though I should not be surprised at any statement that he may make. I happened to attend the meeting of the United Chambers of Commerce, when the hon. gentleman's leader (Sir Charles Tupper), a gentleman of eloquence and ability, discussed this question with the statesmen of England. And, after two days hard work, there was not a vestige of his argument left by Sir John Lubbock and several of the leading statesmen of England. They stated that the manufacturers would never consent to even a 5 per cent preferential trade with Canada or any other colony. They showed that they had only 4 per cent of the trade of Canada, while we, like a lot of sturdy beggars, were asking for a 5 per cent preference upon our trade, though they had been for years and years taking everything we had to send them without charging us a farthing of duty. And yet the hon. gentleman wanted the workingmen and operatives to pay an extra duty upon their imported goods for the purpose of enabling us to sell more in that market. I am surprised that Englishmen should attempt to handicap the mother country in such a way. Competing, as the English manufacturers do, with every part of the world, unless they have their capital and labour at the cheapest rate, it is not possible for them to be successful in the competition with the Germans, French and Belgians in foreign countries. They now receive everything we send free of duty, and we are still harping on getting a preference on the ground that we are letting them into our markets at less than we are charging other countries. I do hope the hon. member (Mr. Davin) will take a more patriotic view of this matter and come to the conclusion that anything we can give is a benefit to ourselves as well as to them.

Mr. DAVIN. Patriotic view, Mr. Chairman! The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) need not lecture me about patriotic views. I have nothing to learn about patriotism from the hon. gentleman or anybody else. There is a vulgar proverb that what is good for the goose is good for the gander. If it is good for our friends in England to have 25 per cent preference, why should it not be good for Canada to have 5 per cent? If it is no harm to give England 25 per cent preference, why in the name of Heaven should it do any harm to England, or do them anything but good, to give us 5 per cent preference? Now, I would like the hon. Minister of Finance to give us a little enlightenment on the subject that I brought to his attention a moment ago in reference to the West Indies.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I made allusion to that subject in the Budget speech, and I do not think it would be politic, in the interests of the Dominion, that I should go into that question any further. This tariff is, so far as it relates to the West Indies, unconditional. We do however hope that good may come of it in another direction. I see the difficulty of hon. gentlemen opposite who do not view the matter from the same standpoint as we do. They still insist that unless we get something at every move, therefore the thing is a failure. The hon. gentlemen seem unable to learn that there is that that scattereth and yet increaseth. We do not think it is sound policy to demand at every stage that we shall get something for what we give. But we believe we will get something in most cases.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) says that the Canadian people are sturdy beggars. I would like to know what the hon. gentleman means by sturdy beggars.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Begging something for nothing.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton).

Mr. CLANCY. He is constantly saying that England is giving us so much, and we are giving nothing. We are speaking now entirely of trade matters, not of sentimental bubbles. England treats us justly, as she treats every other country in trade matters. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) pointed out a very serious fact. He shows that the trade in England is constantly declining, especially in certain articles and manufactures that hon. gentleman said would be a special benefit to us. He pointed out that England was behind in trade, and you must bring her up at the expense of the Canadian people. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) pointed out that if the English people are behind the age you have to bring them up by preference. Where will the difference stop? Just at the point barely to exclude foreign goods from other countries, and the Canadian people are to pay the whole price. If hon. gentlemen will say that England is now fighting for a share of Canadian trade, that she is standing on a level with all other countries, then if you give her a slight preference of 5 per cent and they would come in to that extent, give them 25 per cent and you will have English goods. But I defy any hon. gentleman on that side of the House to declare that that state of things exists to-day. There is no hope held out to the Canadian people beyond the one mentioned by the hon. member for Westmoreland, that to the extent that you are able to bring in goods that are constantly on the decline, and they must inevitably be brought in at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. BENNETT. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the concluding words in that clause which says: "Whose decision shall be final." Is it intended by that that henceforth it is to be understood in the Customs Department that there are to be no appeals to any court of law on any rulings or decisions of the Minister of Customs? At present, I understand that if a party feel aggrieved in respect of an entry, then by petition of right to the Exchequer Court an appeal can be had. It must of necessity arise that a great many cases will present themselves where importers will ask that the Minister of Customs shall have placed before him every evidence, and under this ruling it will be necessary to bring the witnesses from England. On the other hand, if resort can be had, as the present procedure allows, then evidence can be taken in the old country by a commission.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This clause does not in any way interfere with any practice of the Customs Department, except as to the particular matter of which it treats. In dealing with the question, whether an English article shall be admitted at the preferential rate or the general rate, the design of this clause is that the judgment of the Minister of Customs shall be final. We have put that in deliberately, because we believe that if you are going to have appeals either to the Treasury Board, or to the Governor in Council, or to the courts, or to any other body, constantly arising as they might under that, then that preferential tariff will be unworkable. We believe that after a few cases the meaning of that clause will be so clearly defined that importers will understand it, and there will be no need of appeal. But we thought that in the interest of the efficient working of the tariff, and in order to prevent the evasion of the law by colourable importations of foreign goods under the preferential rate, it is of the utmost importance that some tribunal shall have authority to decide finally, and we cannot imagine any other tribunal under our system than that of the Minister of Customs, who of course, in all these things, is not going to act arbitrarily. We are bound to consider that he will act as an intelligent official, responsible to his colleagues and through his colleagues to Parliament. But we think it would be a misfortune to leave room for appeals on the point the hon. gentleman refers to.

Mr. BENNETT. Is it provided in the present customs regulations that there shall be no appeal beyond the appeals to the Minister of Customs, or do the present regulations of the Customs Department apply which allow appeal to the courts?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If there is such a regulation, this does not in any way change it. This deals particularly with the present case. As a matter of fact we know that appeals are made occasionally, I presume by petition of right. However, in this case the judgment of the Minister of Customs is intended to be final, but in the general administration of the tariff, whatever rights are open to the importer remain untouched by this Act.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask my hon. friend with relation to number 2 in connection also with "c" just above:

The Minister of Customs, with the approval of the Governor in Council, shall determine what British colonies or possessions shall be entitled to the benefits of the preferential tariff under clause "b" of this section.

Clause "b" is:

Any other British colony or possession, the customs tariff of which, on the whole, is as favourable to Canada as the British preferential tariff, herein referred to, is to such colony or possession.

I ask my hon. friend on what principle he gave preferential advantage to the West India colonies, inasmuch as there was a wide divergence in the duties they imposed on the products of Canada. With respect to the other colonies which are referred to in the clause I read, what is the principle which the hon. gentleman and the Government are going to adopt? Are they going to let those colonies in arbitrarily because they think it would benefit the West India colonies to do it, or have they laid down a fixed principle that with respect to those other colonies they must come up to a certain range of preferential tariff with respect to Canadian goods different from what they give to outside countries.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The principle acted upon is first to give the preference to Great Britain because Great Britain has a free trade system. In the second place we extend it generally to the colonies whose tariffs are favourable to our goods. Further, we admit the West Indies, because, while under a fair interpretation their tariffs are not such as would admit them, we specifically admit them for the reason stated in the Budget speech, that we desire to extend our trade with those colonies particularly, and further that owing to the difficulties under which the West India colonies are labouring, we think it is not desirable to drive a hard bargain, but to make more liberal terms with those colonies than we find it necessary to make with others, the position of the West Indies being peculiar at this time. No doubt some of the islands have more favourable tariffs than others, and yet we thought it not expedient to divide them, but to admit the whole group. Clause "d" will be found to contain substantially the words of the tariff of last year; so we are simply renewing what we at that time declared, except to make it apply to the colonies only and not to other countries.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman lays down a principle and immediately proceeds to violate it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In the case of the West Indies, by arbitrarily admitting them.

Mr. FOSTER. They are British colonies and as such they have all the same difficulties.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not all the same.

Mr. FOSTER. They are all British colonies, and they have difficulties which they consider very tangible ones. The hon. gentleman has made no statement as to whether the Government are going to admit other colonies under present conditions. They admit that under present conditions the Australian colonies cannot be admitted. If the conditions had been favourable, no doubt in this section New Zealand and Cape Colony would have been admitted. After a year, however, hon. gentlemen opposite are still in doubt as to whether they can let in Australia or the African colonies, and consequently they do not take them in. I understand then that until those colonies make some concessions which are not made at the present time by their tariff to this country, their goods will not be allowed entrance here at the preferential rate. Am I correct?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is not very materially wrong. In the Budget speech I stated that under the general clause we proposed to admit at once New South Wales and British India. They are enjoying the benefit of the preferential tariff, having been specially admitted. Whether we will go further and admit other colonies is a matter which has not been up to the present moment decided. I am not able to state that we will not admit those colonies, but we may do so subsequently by negotiation. Our present intention is only to admit New South Wales and British India.

Mr. FOSTER. If there is any good in this preference as regards sugar, the hon. gentleman is working a great injustice to British Columbia. The refiners there might get their sugar from Fiji or Queensland, and they no doubt do so. The hon. gentleman is making an arbitrary tariff by which the Halifax and Moncton refiners and the Montreal refiners, to a certain extent, can get their sugar at a preferential rate. They are going to get sugar cheaper by securing a reduction of one-fourth of the duty, and the Government are thus practically giving a bonus to those refineries. But a refiner who places his capital in works in British Columbia will find he is shut out from this advantage. He has as good a right, if by arbitrary rule you grant this reduction so that the Halifax and other eastern refiners shall take advantage of it, to secure an equivalent reduction on sugar imported from Queensland and Fiji, and thereby be placed on equal footing with the eastern refiners. Surely the hon. gentleman is committing an injustice in this respect.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have had the case of the British Columbia refiners brought to my notice. The colony of Queensland imposes a pretty stiff tariff on Canadian products. According to the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite, that we should get something in return, we might fairly wait and open negotiations with Queensland. As regards the West Indies, we admit that we are making an arbitrary rule.

Mr. HUGHES. It is more necessary to build up at the present time our Pacific Coast interests than those on the Atlantic, which are at the present time pretty well looked after. Our interests on the Pacific are new, and the line of steamships to which I have already referred, which is sailing every month, will no doubt sail every two weeks during next season. The Government should endeavour to uphold our interests in British Columbia and on the Pacific, and the adoption of such a measure as has been suggested would be of very material service to the country. I trust the Minister will see his way clear to take colonies in the Pacific Ocean under his patronage, as he has taken the West India colonies.

Mr. MAXWELL. As regards the British Columbia sugar refinery referred to, which is in my constituency, I may say that I have heard no complaint whatever with respect to the present tariff.

Mr. OSLER. I must contradict the hon. gentleman, because I saw a telegram from the manager of the refinery, stating that the business would be ruined if the preferential clause in the tariff was not extended to British colonies in the Pacific from which the sugar used in that refinery was obtained. The telegram was signed by Mr. Rogers.

Mr. MAXWELL. That does not invalidate my statement, because I said I had heard no complaint.

Mr. OSLER. The hon. member (Mr. Maxwell) spoke for the industry in that part of the country.

Mr. MAXWELL. I simply said, I had heard no complaint.

Mr. OSLER. Well, I have heard a complaint, and that is the complaint I have heard to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a very serious matter, and I do not think the Minister of Finance is justified in doing nothing, simply because one member from British Columbia says he has not taken interest enough in it to know how the proposal will affect that industry in his province.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In justice to the hon. member from British Columbia, I should say that, before the tariff was brought in, and in consequence of some newspaper rumours that the arrangement would work against them, I received a telegram. I do not wish to say that we are indifferent to that industry. My information is, that they are in such a position that they are not likely to fear the competition, as would the Atlantic refineries. I am quite willing to consider the question, but I certainly have not been persuaded up to the present time that their interests will be adversely affected.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) does not need time to consider that labour and capital are higher in British Columbia than on this side of the continent. Nearly all the conditions make it to the disadvantage of the manufacturer on the western coast. Everybody knows that, in staple articles like this, a very small margin makes the profit or loss, and, when you raise raw sugars by a duty of 15 or 16 cents a hundred and then give to one class of refiners, on account of their geographical situation, an advantage of one-fourth on that duty, you are putting up a competition on an unfair basis, and the industry which does not get the advantage must be prejudiced. If the West India Islands have to do their business under difficulties, Queensland could tell you of her difficulties, and the Fiji Islands could tell you of the difficulties under which she labours. Why is it that this milk of human kindness which flows in my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), does not flow out a little to our sister colonies in the Pacific, especially when the restraint in that respect is making the conditions of trade very onerous to these manufactures on the Pacific Coast?

Mr. HUGHES. In the case of the Fiji Islands, nearly all their northern trade is with Canada, and they import large quantities of Canadian produce and Canadian manufactures of various kinds. I know that the Fiji Islands are about sending a commissioner here to consider the question of trade with us. The large Island of Trinidad, which, next to Jamaica, is the most important of the West India Islands, takes very little of our Canadian produce. Here are the figures for last year:

	United States.	Canada.
Bread	$ 43,000	Nil.
Butter	9,467	$ 489
Cheese	24,345	1,915
Coal	11,808	Nil.
Oats	59,553	22,430
Flour	611,390	Nil.
Fruit	9,948	48
Meats	206,563	547
Wearing apparel	32,031	14
Peas and beans.....	27,360	2,952
Lard	75,705	Nil.

We see from this that the bulk of the trade of these West India Islands is with the United States. The British Pacific Islands do trade with us, and I maintain that they have on us at least, the same claim as, if not a better one, from the view point of trade, than have the West India Islands. More than that, I maintain that our British Columbia sugar industry requires to be built up just as much as the Halifax sugar refineries do. Before these resolutions are finally adopted, I would impress upon the Finance Minister the necessity of his reconsidering his decision, and of allowing the same privilege to Fiji Islands, and to Queensland, and other Australian colonies, too, I hope, as he does to the West India Islands.

Mr. McNEILL. I want to say to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that I think he was—unintentionally, I am quite sure—scarcely fair to hon. members on this side of the House in some remarks he has made. I heard him say that we on this side of the House would give nothing at all to Britain, unless we got something in return; in other words, that we must have our pound of flesh every time. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) has forgotten that from this side of the House, last session, there was a resolution moved, especially stating that we were prepared to give “an appreciable and unconditional preference” to England. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) and his confrères were not prepared to do that then, but we were. I am glad to find that he is willing to give a preference to the mother country to-day, although he was not ready then. It is but fair that the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) should be called to that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is only fair, I should say, that I believe my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has not indulged in the same strong anti-British sentiments as those which came from hon. gentlemen on his side of the House. Might I ask my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill), what is the meaning of the words “appreciable reduction” in the resolution he moved last year? I have not been able to discover from hon. gentlemen opposite how much they meant by appreciable reduction. We on this side of the House have placed on record what we meant; we meant 12½ per cent reduction last year, and 25 per cent this year. What rate per cent reduction do hon. gentlemen opposite mean by “appreciable reduction”?

Mr. POWELL. The same as “substantial reduction,” I suppose.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Let my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) answer.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) is not meeting the proposition I have placed before him. The statement he made was, that we were not prepared to give any reduction without something in return, and I have pointed out that we moved last year in this House, that we would give “an appreciable and unconditional reduction.” My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) was not willing, at that time, to give any preference to England, as compared with other countries. My hon. friend will remember that I tried very hard to get him to say then, that he would give a preference to England alone, but he would not say so. He asks me, what amount of reduction exactly we are prepared to give, and my answer is: It will be time enough for us to tell my hon. friend, when we have an opportunity of making the reduction. We are now stating the principle in general terms; we are not specifying details; that is for the gentlemen who are framing the policy of the Government to do. We stated the broad principle, that we are prepared to give “an appreciable and unconditional advantage” to the mother country, and I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), in fairness, whether it is quite right for him to say that we are not prepared to give any reduction at all, when, at the very time, we were offering this preference to the mother country, he would not give a preference to Great Britain, except that which he knew was only an accidental and ephemeral preference?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. When my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) said last year that we were not willing to give a preference, my answer was: We are doing it. Although my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) joined others in saying that we could not do it, we know now that the result was, that a preference was actually given to the mother country through our policy. My hon. friend and his colleagues, for years, were talking about preferential trade, and did nothing. I am quite sure that Kipling must have had my hon. friend in his mind, when he wrote:

Carry the words to my sisters,
The queens of the east and south;
We have proven faith in the heritage
By more than the word of mouth.

Kipling must have had my hon. friend in mind, because he had been talking preferential trade for a long time, and never came to the point of doing it. But my hon. friend says I have done him an injustice to-night, when I represent that hon. gentlemen on that side are not prepared to grant anything without getting something in return. That is not true, he says. Let him ask the hon. gentleman who sits beside him (Mr. Powell), who distinctly declared twice to-night that he would give nothing unless he got something in return.

Mr. McNEILL. I think the hon. Minister of Finance does my hon. friend an injustice in what he says now, because my hon. friend said that he would be willing to give a substantial sum, if necessary, to assist in the defence of the Empire.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is another question.

Mr. McNEILL. Do not, then, say that he was not prepared to give anything. He may not be prepared to give it in the same form as my hon. friend, but it is not fair to say that he is not willing to give anything. Will the hon. Minister of Finance say that he is willing to give a substantial sum to assist in the defence of the Empire?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We are discussing to-night the question of preferential trade, and there will probably be an opportunity later on when one can offer his opinions on that very important subject; but I do not propose that hon. gentlemen opposite shall get away from the question of preferential trade by introducing an entirely different question. The hon. gentleman sitting beside my hon. friend to-night distinctly stated that he would not be prepared to give England a preference in our markets unless we got a substantial preference in return.

Mr. OSLER. I would like to make one remark on this question. By the proposal to give a preference to the eastern refiners and not to the refiners in British Columbia, an injustice is done not only to the western refiner, but to the trade of western Canada. We are endeavouring in every way in our power to increase our trade with Australia, and I am told that during this year it is expected that 1,500 tons a month of sugar may come to Canada as return cargo in our vessels coming from the Australian colonies if the British Columbia refiners are not discriminated against. Surely, it is not fair either to those refiners or to our shipping on the Pacific Ocean to discriminate in any shape or form against the sugar industry of British Columbia, as will be done if this tariff goes into effect. I am very diffident in speaking about this matter, because I am a shareholder in the British Columbia sugar refining industry to a small extent. In looking over correspondence, I found that the manager of the refinery had no idea that the Government was going to discriminate against them. He wrote as if it was so plainly in the interest of the country that he took for granted that there was to be no preference given to the east over the west.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I can certainly say that the Government had no thought or intention of discriminating against the western refiner or against the trade of British Columbia, and if it can be shown that this arrangement will have that effect, I am willing to reconsider the matter before it goes through. Of course, if we accept the hon. gentleman's suggestion, we will be open to the charge of giving something to the Australian colonies and getting nothing in return.

Mr. OSLER. I am only speaking of the Canadian interest that is affected.

Mr. HUGHES. The sugar trade of the Pacific Coast is largely handled by the Americans. They bring sugar from the Hawaiian Islands, and supply the refiners of the whole Pacific Coast, and our refiners in British Columbia cannot get that sugar without paying duty on it. But the Canadian vessels control the trade of the Fiji Islands, and tributary to them are the Solomon Islands. If that group were brought under this clause of the tariff, it would be a great advantage to our sugar refiners, and we would sell to them more goods than we do now.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Is it feared that the eastern refiners will be put in such a position by getting cheaper raw material that they will be able to compete unfairly against the refiners of British Columbia? Unless that is the case, I do not quite see the force of the argument. The general argument in favour of extending our trade is a fair one.

Mr. HUGHES. The fact is that the western sugar refiner will have to go out of existence because of the way he will be handicapped in comparison with the American refiner.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This does not touch the American refiner. Does the hon. gentleman mean that the Montreal and Halifax refiners are going to send their sugar to British Columbia because of getting their raw material on preferential terms? If so, that is a fair argument; but I should think that the British Columbia refiner would have a sufficient advantage in his own market by reason of the long haul.

Mr. HUGHES. I think the hon. gentleman will find that Germany sends any amount of beet-root sugar to this country, and it is sent to British Columbia. I would be strongly in favour of increasing the duty on bonused sugar; but of course that is not under discussion at the present time. The western refiner has the advantage of the long haul; but when the preference is given to the eastern refiner, the western refiner is simply wiped out of existence.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. These resolutions do not propose to give any advantage to the Americans or the Germans. Unless the hon. gentleman means that the eastern refiners are going to get their raw material cheap and send their product to British Columbia, there is nothing in his argument. If it is going to enable him to compete unduly with the British Columbia refiner in British Columbia, that is a fair matter for consideration.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend will do well to look into that, because it means a great deal of trade. My hon. friend makes the mistake in supposing that the British Columbia refiner is refining only for British Columbia.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He is not going to refine for Montreal and St. John.

Mr. FOSTER. He is not, but he is going to refine for the whole country as far east as Winnipeg. It does not take a very great difference to give competing power to your eastern refiner in order to put him into that market. But the particular ground I took at first was this. If we are one country, and going to have uniform legislation, what is the reason why we should in an article like sugar give a preference to any part of the country? There is on the other side a sister colony, and if you can give away the whole principle of your tariff and by that means put the eastern refiner on a certain basis with reference to his raw sugar, why not stretch a point and put the sister colony on the other side in a similar position?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If I were satisfied that we were going to injure the trade, that is a matter we ought to consider. We do not want to dismiss the point lightly.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad to hear the Minister of Finance say that he will look into that matter. He will act very wisely in following the suggestion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Even if we get nothing back.

Mr. FOSTER. If you have departed from your principle in one case, why not depart from it here? These hon. gentlemen have no regard for consistency. These patriots of to-night who are boiling over with loyalty, were shouting five or six years ago for discriminating against Great Britain, and a trade union with the United States. Last year when they brought in their tariff, they had not the remotest idea of giving an exclusive privilege to the mother country. It was the whole world they were going to give an advantage to, and when my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) suggested that they should give a direct preference to Great Britain, they scouted the idea. They were not going to narrow down their offer at all. They blundered into the position in which they are to-night when they have to turn around now and say that it shall be excluded. These hon. gentlemen who try to rally us about patriotism are patriots from opportunism.

Mr. McNEILL. I just wish to say to the hon. Minister of Finance that, so far as his course with reference to the West Indies is concerned, I, at all events, feel very strongly that a very exceptional condition of things exists there to-day. Those colonies are standing on the verge of ruin. They are in such a position that the Imperial Government was actually obliged to come to their assistance with a money bonus to save them from absolute black ruin and destruction, and therefore on that account there may be something to be said in favour of the position taken by the hon. gentleman.

I do hope that my hon. friend will carefully take into consideration the arguments presented to him with regard to the unfair competition which is likely to be imposed on the sugar refinery in British Columbia. He has promised to do so.

And now with regard to the other matter I was speaking about when I was last on my feet, I just want to say again to him that he did not at all meet what I brought to his notice. When we on this side last session moved a resolution in favour of a straight preference to the United Kingdom, my hon. friend would not support any such proposal. Under these circumstances, it is not fair then—and I think his sense of fairness will bear me out in this statement—to hurl at this side of the House the broad statement that we are not prepared to give anything at all to the mother country unless we get something in return. It is true my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Powell) made a remark of that kind with reference to the tariff, but he coupled it with the statement that he was prepared to give something substantial to the mother country in the form of a grant of money for purposes of imperial defence. It is all very well to say that this proposal has no reference to the tariff, but it is inconsistent with the statement of my hon. friend the Finance Minister that the hon. member for Westmoreland is not prepared to give anything to the mother country unless we get something in return. I think my hon. friend should retract his statement.

Mr. CLANCY. I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance to the question with regard to British Columbia. It will be seen that there was imported from Belgium last year no less a quantity than 4,000,000 pounds of refined sugar, and from Hong Kong, China, Belgium and Japan nearly 2,000,000 more. Of the 6,000,000 pounds of refined sugar imported into Canada, 2,000,000 pounds went to British Columbia, which pretty nearly substantiates the statement made here that British Columbia is suffering from the competition of bonused sugars.

Mr. DAVIN. How much raw sugar is brought in from the Fiji Islands and Queensland?

Mr. HUGHES. That trade has only been started.

Mr. CLANCY. Only a small quantity comes from there, but it would not affect the argument in any way, because the bonused sugar we get from Germany would come in and would compete against the long distance pointed out by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. OSLER. We accept the Finance Minister's statement that he will look into this matter, and if he will go carefully into the letters and figures I have mentioned and finds that they are correct, I am quite sure he will make the change required.

Resolution agreed to.

On resolution 3,

That it is expedient to provide that Schedule "D" to "The Customs Tariff, 1897," shall be repealed on and after the first day of August in the present year, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, and that the following schedule shall be substituted therefor:—

SCHEDULE "D."

British Preferential Tariff.

On articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of any British colony or possession entitled to the benefits of this preferential tariff under section seventeen, the duties mentioned in Schedule "A" shall be reduced as follows:—The reduction shall be one-fourth of the duty mentioned in Schedule "A," and the duty to be levied, collected and paid shall be three-fourths of the duty mentioned in Schedule "A."

Mr. McNEILL.

Provided, however, that this reduction shall not apply to any of the following articles, and that such articles shall in all cases be subject to the duties mentioned in Schedule "A," viz.:—wines, malt liquors, spirits, spirituous liquors, liquid medicines and articles containing alcohol; tobacco, cigars and cigarettes.

Provided further, that the reduction shall only apply to refined sugar when evidence satisfactory to the Minister of Customs is furnished that such refined sugar has been manufactured wholly from raw sugar produced in the British colonies or possessions.

Mr. WALLACE. Why do you not make a reduction on wines, malt liquors, &c.?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is exactly as it was in the resolutions a year ago. We know no reason why we should reduce the duties on that class of goods.

Mr. WALLACE. That is a very good reason, as far as it goes. But why are these exempted from the reduction? The principle being established, why is it departed from?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We are not exactly convinced that there should be a reduction on that class of goods.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no change in these duties?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, these words are exactly the same as they were before, except the change with regard to sugar.

Mr. WALLACE. But I do not remember that the Minister gave reasons for these exceptions last year.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think that the whole thing was so patent that I was not asked for any reason.

Mr. WALLACE. But why should these things be omitted from the preferential tariff? The hon. gentleman said that it is not desirable that they should be included.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is a good reason.

Mr. WALLACE. A lady's reason. But I think we are entitled to some reason.

Resolution agreed to.

On resolution 4,

That it is expedient to repeal items 435 and 436 of Schedule "A" to "The Customs Tariff, 1897," and to substitute the following therefor:—

435. All sugar above number sixteen Dutch standard in colour, and all refined sugars of whatever kinds, grades or standards, testing not more than eighty-eight degrees by the polariscope, one dollar and eight cents per one hundred pounds, and for each additional degree one and one-half cents per one hundred pounds. Fractions of five-tenths of a degree or less not to be subject to duty, and fractions of more than five-tenths to be dutiable as a degree.

436. Sugar, n.e.s., not above number sixteen Dutch standard in colour, sugar drainings or pumpings drained in transit, melado, or concentrated melado, tank bottoms and sugar concrete, testing not more than seventy-five degrees by the polariscope, forty cents per one hundred pounds, and for each additional degree one and one-half cents per one hundred pounds. Fractions of five-tenths of a degree or less not to be subject to duty, and fractions of more than five-tenths to be dutiable as a degree. The usual packages in which imported to be free.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend give us an idea of what the effect of this will be, in the first place, on the actual absolute duty, and, in the next place, in the protection which will hereafter be enjoyed, compared with what is now enjoyed by the refiner? The hon. gentleman gave a very general statement about that, but I would like him to go more into particulars, according to the different degrees.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The protection is, perhaps, difficult to determine exactly, owing to the fact of the duty being a graded one. At present you have a difference of 50 cents in the duties, as between raw and refined of all grades. As we propose a graded duty in this case, it is not the same all along the line. For example, taking what are called yellow sugars, a class of refined sugar, testing 88, there will be an increase of 8 cents per hundred pounds on the refined, while the increased duty on the raw material will average, it is estimated, 15½ cents. Assuming the average of our sugar used in Canada to be last year, as stated by the refiners, 92, and applying this to our raw sugars, we will get duty of 65½ cents per hundred pounds, instead of 50 cents. I am leaving out the question of preference now, for the sake of simplicity. Assuming the average to be as I have stated, we are going to get 15½ cents more on the raw sugar. But the refiner will have 7½ cents less increase on the refined than on his raw material. If you follow it along until you come to sugar testing 93, the increased duty on the refined will exactly correspond with the increased duty on the raw. Beyond that, the increase is greater, until finally, at 99½ degrees, you reach an increase on the refined of 24½ cents, while the raw material would only pay, on the average, 15½ cents. Summarizing the matter, the refiner will have a little more advantage in the higher grade, and a little less advantage in the lower grade, and, on the average, I think, he will be left about where he is now. The exact effect of these changes upon the refiners, I do not think the refiners themselves have quite determined. They are a little uncertain, a little anxious, and desirous of having more—I do not hesitate to say. My own opinion is, that the refiners are left in no worse position, at all events, though I think some of them will not concur in that. They are anxious about the preferential rate. We have provided a preferential rate on raw sugar, and also on refined sugar when made from sugar grown in the British possessions. Just what amount of sugar will be brought in at the preferential rate is what they are in doubt about. If they felt that a large amount of refined sugar was to be brought in, I think they would feel that they were placed at a disadvantage or, at least, deprived of the advantage they had. What proportion of refined sugar will be brought in is uncertain, as is also what proportion of raw material they can get in at the preferential rate. The United States is a sharp competitor for the West India trade, and I do not venture to estimate how much of the West India sugar our refiners may be able to get. As to the effect upon the revenue, I think it will not differ from the estimate made by the hon. gentleman himself. He said that we would get from $250,000 to $400,000. That is a wide range of estimate, and I do not think I would differ materially from my hon. friend. It is not easy to make a close estimate, owing to the doubt as to what may come in under the preferential rate. I think that the refiner is left where he is, that the revenue will get the advantage of the increased duty, which, of course, will be carried to be refined, and the consumers will, on the higher grades, have to pay a little more than hitherto, while, on the lower grades, the advantage to the refiner will be less.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) has made some things pretty clear. He has made it clear that what he actually proposes, under this duty arrangement on sugars, is to get from $250,000 to $400,000 more taxes.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think that the latter figure is high.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, but it will be somewhere between the two. That is rather a come-down from the high and generous ground which was taken, of the benefit to the struggling colonies in the West Indies, because the statement the hon. gentleman makes to-night is, in the first place, by the readjustment of duties the refiner will stand about where he is now or a little worse position.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He says so; I do not think he is right.

Mr. FOSTER. And the consumer will not pay less, but practically a little more. So that the consumer in Canada will certainly not get cheaper sugar. The refiner will, I think, occupy no better position, and the question, what advantage it will be to the West Indies, is a very doubtful one, indeed. There are two things which, I think, will make it rather uncertain as to whether the West Indian producer is going to get much benefit out of this trade or not. One reason has been stated by my hon. friend, and that is, that the United States market is a choice market for the West India cane sugar, and the great bulk of the sugar which is marketed from the West Indies to foreign countries, that is to say, not in Great Britain, goes to the United States. The currents of traffic are very firmly set in these directions, and all affiliations are made and have been made for years, and it is very difficult to break them. The other element that I refer to is, that there is a very close connection between the British capitalists and the sugar estates of the West Indies in many instances, and that they will draw the raw sugar in a certain proportion, which will probably not be interfered with by this preference to Great Britain.

I do not anticipate that you will find any West India raw sugar which now goes to the British refiner, will be drawn away by this preference, for the reason that it is in intimate connection of the British capitalist with the sugar estate, in fact it is one usual condition of the sugar estate, even the actual working of the sugar estate; then there is a roundabout process of a preference upon refined sugar made from West Indian raw sugar that will take place in the case of the British refiner. Those two elements, I think, will combine not to divert any West India raw sugar that now goes to the British refiner away from the British refiner. I doubt if you draw much of it away from the United States market where it has found its way for so many years. So that the advantage to the West India raw sugar producer is very illusory. The consumer here will get no benefit, the refiner will get no benefit, I think he is left in a worse position. But the coffers of the country will be the richer by $250,000 to $400,000. What this Government has really done, and what I must say it intended to do, is to add taxes to the country in order to spend them. Instead of reducing the expenditure from any considerable point, in the second year of their administration, as in the first year of their administration, instead of decreasing the expenditure, they have taken the alternative of increasing the taxes of the country in three ways. They have increased the excise taxes very largely last year, they have gained a large amount of money for their own spending by docking the savings of the country one-half per cent, and by docking them in prospect another half per cent on the 1st of July, whereby they will have $500,000 more next year to spend than they had last year, I mean taking into account the current year. Then there is a large addition to the excise revenue, which is taxation for those who use those articles, and there is a large proportion of the people who do. Now we have an extra tax of from $250,000 to $400,000 placed upon the sugar consumers of the country all through. This is a very high appreciation of taxation. On the other hand, we have no relief so far as expenditure is concerned. Now, with reference to raw sugar, the average is 92 degrees, but there is a great deal of it which will go more than 92, otherwise the average would be lower. Now, has my hon. friend made any calculation as to how the refiner would stand on that class of sugar above 90 or 92 degrees, raw sugar upon which he places a larger sum than 15½ cents, and it is a very large class of sugars. On that the refiner is put in a much worse condition than before under the disparity of duties.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend must take the average as being conclusive. He says there is considerable sugar of a higher grade imported, on which the refiner will have to pay more than 15½ cents increase. Certainly there will also be a considerable amount of sugar of a lower grade, there will be a considerable amount on which he will pay less than 15½ cents. We are now dealing with the duty on the raw. The refiner, on the average of his total import of raw sugar, assuming he was to keep the average of last year, would pay exactly 15½ cents. We say the tendency of this tariff will be to reduce the average, because while you have flat specific duty in which you charge the same rate on 100 pounds of sugar worth $2.15 as on another 100 pounds worth less than a dollar, the natural tendency of that system is to induce the refiner to use the higher grade material.

Mr. WALLACE. Sugar that is worth $1, what does it grade?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Speaking from memory, sugar testing 75 degrees would be less than $1 per 100 pounds. I have quotations making it still lower than that, quotations of a few weeks ago while I was considering this matter. Raw sugar testing 75 degrees was selling in bond as low as 86 cents per 100 pounds; on the same day sugar testing 80 is quoted at $1.36; testing 85 at $1.82; these were the selling prices in bond. For 90 it would be $2.09; for 92, $2.15; 94 would be $2.19; 96 would be worth about $2.91. I was pointing out that the tendency of a flat specific duty of half a cent a pound is to induce the refiner to use a higher grade material. Per contra, a graduated duty will not leave him in the same position; he will not have the same inducement to use a higher grade, and it is only reasonable to suppose that he will import some lower grade sugars from the West Indies. If the average is reduced he will pay less for 100 pounds than the 15 cents I have mentioned as the increase. Everything depends upon what the average is.

Mr. HUGHES. Has the Minister of Finance taken any steps to tax the beet root sugar coming in from bonused countries? As he is well aware, the British sugar refiners in the West Indies, in British Guiana and all over the world, have been petitioning the British Government for years, and the British Government has given very serious consideration to the request, to impose a duty on sugar coming in from a country like Germany, where they make it from beets, and where they pay a bonus on all sugar exported. Into Canada last year there came more sugar from Germany than from any other country, five or six times more than from the West India Islands. This sugar was all bonused by the German Government, just as they bonused the steamships that carried it. They control our markets with that cheap commodity. I am told that it is an adulterated commodity, but our people have not yet caught on to that. There were 125 million pounds of sugar imported from Germany last year alone. If the hon. gentleman wishes to upbuild the Empire and help our Canadian refiners he should take into consideration the propriety of taxing the sugar from those bonused countries.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The effect of this arrangement will undoubtedly be to tax sugar coming in from those bonus countries at a higher rate than now.

Mr. FOSTER. Not proportionately.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I admit not proportionately, but to the extent of 25 per cent. If the hon. gentleman asks if the Government are going to impose countervailing duties I must reply that this is a large question, and we do not intend to do so now.

Mr. WALLACE. Raw sugar brought in last year would pay a duty of 70 cents per 100 pounds as against 50 cents. We imported raw sugar to the amount of 329,000,000 pounds, costing $2.23 per 100 pounds. Ninety-four degrees came in at $2.19; 96 degrees at $2.31; 95 degrees at some figure between those values.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have given the hon. gentleman the source of my information. I have stated on the authority of the refiners that the average was 92 degrees. The prices are very uncertain.

Mr. WALLACE. The prices have been very steady during the past year. My figures are taken from the Trade and Navigation returns, and the average quality would be 95 degrees. That sugar paid 40 cents plus 30 cents or 70 cents, which would be 20 cents more than the present duty. So that the importation of raw sugar would involve an additional charge of $660,000.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. WALLACE. I am taking the figures given by the hon. gentleman and those published in the Trade and Navigation Returns. This quantity of raw sugar would give an increased taxation of $660,000, or twice as high as the hon. gentleman's estimate. But the hon. gentleman says that under the specific duty the higher grades would come in and that under the ad valorem duties lower grades would be brought in. If sugar worth only 86 cents per 100 pounds comes in and sells for less than 1 cent per pound, while sugar of 95 degrees sells at 2½ cents, which it does, a great many more pounds must come in to make the quantity of refined sugar. Of course, sugar selling at 86 cents per 100 pounds, or less than 1 cent a pound, more than 21 pounds would be required to make a pound of refined sugar, and more than 2½ pounds to make one pound equal to 95 degrees. So that if a larger quantity of cheaper sugar comes in to refine it will increase the revenue over $660,000, and this I estimate as the increased taxation imposed by the tariff placed before the House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If a larger quantity comes in it will be at a lower rate.

Mr. WALLACE. As it takes 2½ pounds to make one pound equal to 95 degrees, when it comes in at a lower rate the quantity will be enormously increased and thus impose higher taxes on the people. So that under any calculation there will not be less than $660,000 more taxation imposed, taking last year's importations as a basis, or twice as much as the estimate submitted by the Finance Minister. So far as I am able to judge, the protection to the refiner will be somewhat increased. The Finance Minister has told the committee that the information he has received from the refiners is directly contrary to that statement. No doubt, the result is problematical, but we are entitled to our opinion as to the protection given to the refiners, and my opinion is that it will be somewhat increased. It will be increased by about $60,000, and $600,000 will be added to the taxes on the sugar paid by the people. That is a pretty high tax to propose on one of the necessities of life, because sugar is considered a necessary. The taxation on sugar will be increased from $1,750,000 to $2,500,000.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Even if we were going to tax sugar of 95 degrees at 70 cents as an average, I want to call attention to the fact that under a tariff which existed when the hon. gentleman and his colleagues were in power, there was a duty on the same grade of 95 of no less than $1.83. So that by comparison with that tariff our taxation will be extremely moderate and the country will no doubt be grateful.

Mr. WALLACE. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns it will be found that the duty imposed was 64 cents per 100 pounds. The hon. gentleman has referred to the duties under the polariscopic test. We subsequently abolished the duties.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. You abolished the duty on raw, but you kept the duty on refined. My hon. friend is mistaken in the assumption that there is going to be $660,000 added to the Dominion treasury. I suppose I should not regret if that were the case, because we are interested in keeping up a sound financial position, and as we are making material reductions in the duty on other classes, it might perhaps be well to have something to compensate for that, because we do not want to become a party of deficits.

Mr. WALLACE. The Trade and Navigation Returns give the average of all the importations of raw sugar at so much per hundred pounds in value.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Inasmuch as there was no ad valorem duty there was no particular reason for being critical as to giving the value of the sugars. The value I gave the hon. gentleman is the value in bond.

Mr. WALLACE. There is no talk about being critical here; the invoices are produced and sworn to as being the correct price.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That would be f.o.b. at port of shipment, but the value I gave the hon. gentleman was the value in bond at Halifax, and the value would probably be the same at Montreal. The refiners would have no interest in misrepresenting the average test of the sugars they used last year. I have had information from several refiners separately, and that information leads me to believe that 92 was as nearly as may be the correct average. My hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) is mistaken in saying it was 95. When the polariscopic test was in force before, the average of the several years was from 78 as high as 90, and when we allow 92 as the average for the past year, we are allowing for the tendency to use a higher grade of sugars. This is one of the questions we will have to leave to that great arbiter time. If my hon. friend can show me next year that we have $660,000 additional revenue I shall be surprised.

Mr. WALLACE. And pleased.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Well, it will not embarrass me, and I hope not to need it. I am not counting on any such money, and I do not believe we will get it.

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend wish to put through the tobacco resolution to-night? I am afraid there will be quite a discussion on that.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). It is a very short thing.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, but very short things are sometimes very dangerous.

6. That it is expedient to provide that items 445 and 446 of Schedule "A" to "The Customs

Mr. FIELDING.

Tariff Act, 1897," shall be repealed on and after the first day of July in the present year, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight.

Mr. CLANCY. If we consider this resolution to-night it will take up considerable time. I am surprised that the Government should make this change. Last year when they introduced their tariff they held out an inducement to the western people and to the people in Quebec, to engage in the extensive growth of tobacco, by changing the excise duty to a customs duty and increasing it somewhat. As a result the people of western Ontario and also Quebec, have gone into the production of a superior class of tobacco which will largely take the place of the foreign leaf formerly imported.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLANCY. I am glad to hear my hon. friend say "hear, hear," but I would call his attention to the fact that the change he now proposes will destroy the prospects of those farmers who have prepared to engage in the cultivation of this tobacco. This is a matter of very great importance, and I trust that the Minister of Finance will not press the resolution to-night. Although a reference was made to this in a former speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), I hardly thought there would be such an outcome as we have here. I trust that the hon. gentleman will reconsider the proposition that he now makes, of changing the duty from customs to excise.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This does not change by one cent the result of last year's resolution, and as to which my hon. friend appears to be so satisfied. This resolution merely gives to the Excise Department the duty of collecting the 10 cents on unstemmed, and the 14 cents on stemmed tobacco that was imposed last year. It does not interfere at all with the farmers growing the tobacco. The reason the change has been made is this. Last year it appeared as though it would be easier to collect the duty through the customs than it would through the excise, but we found it was impossible to carry that out in practice. We had all the warehouses connected with the tobacco factories, and our officers had to weigh the tobacco and deliver it and to do all the work in connection with it. It seemed logical that since our officers had to do the work the Excise Department should assume the collection of the revenue instead of the Customs Department. This resolution does not alter by one cent the amount that is to be collected.

Mr. CLANCY. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the customs duties will still be collected on foreign leaf as formerly?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There was no duty collected on foreign leaf formerly.

Mr. CLANCY. I am speaking now of the law that was passed last year. There was a customs duty of 10 cents a pound on unstemmed tobacco, and 14 cents a pound on stemmed tobacco.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is the same duty that was collected by the Customs Department. The only difference is, that it will be collected by the Excise Department.

Mr. CLANCY. The point I am making is that, by making this an excise tax, you have taken away the encouragement given to the grower of Canadian leaf, because the foreign leaf will come in now.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The foreign leaf pays the 10 cents and the 14 cents the same as before, only the Excise Department collects it, instead of the Customs Department. The encouragement is the same as before to the Canadian-grown tobacco.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman propose to collect any excise duty on native-grown tobacco?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There is no charge on native-grown tobacco, except when it is manufactured, when it pays 5 cents. The duty is exactly the same as before.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to have that made clear. I think I can see now what the hon. gentleman proposes—that, instead of the tobacco going through the Customs Department, it will go through the Excise Department, and the persons taking it out will have to pay what is equivalent to a customs duty, but will pay it to the Excise Department.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. DUGAS. The excise duty is collected only after it is manufactured.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The 10 cents and the 14 cents will be collected when the tobacco is taken out of the warehouse and delivered to the manufacturer. There is no change in the law in that respect.

Mr. FOSTER. All foreign tobacco that comes in must go into the warehouse?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. DUGAS. I understand, that from the customs warehouse to the excise warehouse there is a certain limited time, and you give the manufacturer more time to pay the duty than before?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No, it is exactly the same thing.

Mr. DUGAS. I mean, that you will not collect any duty except when the tobacco is manufactured, and you give the manufacturer permission to keep the money in the bank, whereas, under the old system, he had to pay the customs duty at the customs warehouse.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Let me remind my hon. friend that it was only when the tobacco was ex-warehoused that the duty was paid. It was supposed to be put in the customs warehouse, but as we had no customs warehouse, the moment the tobacco was passed, the importer was obliged to apply to our warehouse; but the duty had to be paid only when the tobacco was ex-warehoused.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am sorry the hon. Finance Minister has seen fit to continue this high duty on tobacco, as he must know that the advance that was made in the duty on tobacco last year is very unpopular in the country, especially among the working classes, who, as everybody knows, must have their tobacco. I know plenty of people who would rather go without their third meal than without their tobacco, and it seems to me quite unreasonable for the Government to expect to meet approval with any great portion of the people of this country for their action. Under this very resolution they provide for making the silks and the expensive goods of the wealthy cheaper, while they keep up the price of tobacco which the poor man consumes and must have, and which cannot properly be classed as a luxury; it is a necessity. The great bulk of the people throughout the country consume tobacco, especially the poorer classes, and I do hope the hon. Finance Minister will see fit to bring the duty on tobacco to where it stood before he interfered with it a year ago. I do not wish to detain the committee; but, while on my feet, I wish to ask the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, whether he proposes to make any change in the regulations under which his officers collect the duty on tobacco leaf. I have heard several complaints made with respect to the regulations regarding the allowance made for the moisture in the leaf, which worked rather hardly against the tobacco manufacturers. The regulations complained of had reference to the allowance they considered it was necessary to make for moisture in taking the weight of the tobacco, and collecting the duty on that. I would like the hon. Minister to promise that something will be done to meet the wishes of the people in that respect.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. My hon. friend will see that this is provided for in the regulation, because in Resolution No. 8 it is provided that the weight upon which such duty shall be computed shall be with reference to the standard mentioned in paragraph "C," of section 247 of the inland revenue law. That paragraph "C" establishes the old standard. Experience has shown that no kind of tobacco can ever be found with any amount of pliability, that would not break when it was touched or handled, that had not at least 10 per cent of moisture. Instead of our charging actual weight, we have thought that the tobacco manufacturers were right, and that it was only just to go back to the old standard instead and take into consideration the amount of moisture.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is there any standard of allowance of the moisture?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The manufacturers complain that the officials were not acting according to the regulations issued and were not allowing enough for the moisture.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This new measure covers the case.

Mr. DUGAS. What amount do you allow for the standard?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It will be calculated by the amount of desiccation by our officers.

Mr. TAYLOR. I want to inform the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, as well as the Minister of Customs, that there is a general complaint all along the frontier on the part of our merchants that they are not selling any tobacco, but that the American storekeepers are supplying all the Canadians on the border with the tobacco they use. I am quite conversant with that in my own town.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Under ground?

Mr. TAYLOR. Not quite underground, but the people are crossing every day and buy a plug of tobacco the length of your arm nearly for 15 cents on the other side, for which they have to pay 30 cents at home. I know some friends of hon. gentlemen opposite who are making a business of peddling this American tobacco throughout the country, which they get by the underground railway. I drew attention to the fact last year, but the business is going on the same.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. If my hon. friend will come to my department, he will see that within the last six months we have made 150 seizures of smuggled tobacco. We are doing our very best to prevent smuggling. And if our neighbours on the other side adopt the means by which they expect to raise money to carry on the war—which I hope will not take place—by placing an excise duty on liquor and tobacco, I hope we shall have much less smuggling than we have had.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. Minister would have less smuggling and would not be obliged to make so many seizures if he would lower the duty. Moreover, I think that if this duty were lowered it would meet the wish of the people of the country.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I would rather fight the smugglers than to give way to them.

Mr. LANDERKIN. But if the duty were lowered there would be less smuggling. I understand that the revenue has not been increased since the imposition of these high duties. If it were lowered, there would be less temptation to smuggle and less smuggling. If I have any influence with the Minister of Inland Revenue, I trust he will lower the duty on tobacco. I do sincerely hope he will reduce it, and I think my voice ought not to be raised in vain on this question.

Mr. DUGAS. I desire to ask for information as to this question of 10 per cent of moisture. The customs duty provides for a standard. Suppose an excise duty is collected will it be on the basis of the same 10 per cent of moisture? The longer it stays in bond the greater is the moisture up to about 25 per cent.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We think it only fair to make the tobacco manufacturers pay for 10 per cent of the moisture, because, to make his tobacco at all tractable for working it must have this proportion of moisture. And even if it be dried out, it will absorb 10 per cent of moisture in half an hour. But if there is more than 10 per cent of moisture, we think it fair to credit him with the excess.

Mr. DUGAS. That is in favour of the manufacturer which is the point I want to get at.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do hope the duty on tobacco will be reduced as a means of increasing the revenue and meeting the very general wish of the people throughout the country.

Mr. FOSTER. As to this question of desiccation, I desire to ask the hon. Minister if, when the manufacturers waited on him they were unanimous?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. They were so unanimous and especially the cigar manufacturers, that if my hon. friend would read some of the petitions I have here, he would see that they were not only unanimous, but unanimous in abusing us.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the Minister of Inland Revenue on what condition tobacco was formerly admitted under customs duty as to this percentage of moisture? The reason I ask is that the drier the tobacco, of course, the less the duty, and this takes away the protection of the Canadian growers.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That standard was not used formerly in charging the duty on tobacco. Before the change in the tariff last year, the only charge on imported tobacco was after it was manufactured, so that there was no question of standard or desiccation. The tobacco manufacturer applied, say for 10,000 pounds to be manufactured. When he got the tobacco he knew that he must show a certain proportion of manufactured tobacco for that, I think it was 95 per cent. This precaution was taken to make sure that none of the tobacco was withdrawn and disposed off illegally. In some of the large factories, McDonald's, and others, they were satisfied with a 10 pounds moisture to 100 pounds of tobacco, and never asked us to ascertain the standard. But others did. When it was found that the moisture was for instance 20 per cent, when they had to return manufactured tobacco at the rate of 95 for a hundred pounds of tobacco, we credited them for the extra amount of moisture. For instance, if there were 20 pounds of moisture we asked them to return not 95 pounds of the manufactured tobacco, but 85 pounds. The standard was not established to fix the price.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I feel that I owe an apology to the Minister of Inland Revenue. I understand that it was he who raised the duty on tobacco. But I find it was the Minister of Finance, and it is he that I am going to assail now, and I want him to regard what I say with some consideration. I find that throughout the country there is a widespread feeling that the duty on tobacco should not have been increased. I find that the revenue has not been increased by the increase of the duty, and I do not see why the department should wish smuggling to be continued to reduce the revenue. I hope the hon. Minister of Finance will take this matter into his serious consideration, and see to it that the duty is lowered.

Mr. INGRAM. Does this proportion of 95 pounds to 100 pounds apply in the case of cigars as well as in manufactured tobacco?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There was a different scale. For every 22 pounds of tobacco they were to return a thousand cigars. Generally it takes only 18 or 19 pounds of tobacco to a thousand cigars.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to know what excuse the Finance Minister had for increasing this duty and thereby increasing the smuggling?

Mr. WALLACE. I think that is a very proper question. In the six months of 1896, from the 1st of July to the 1st of January, there were $860,000 worth of tobacco leaf imported into Canada. For the corresponding six months of the next year, under the new tariff, there were $146,000 worth free and $114,000 worth that paid duty. That made altogether $260,000 worth of tobacco leaf imported for the six months under the new duty as compared with $860,000 under the old duty—the one entirely under the new duty and the other entirely under the old duty. Unless the Minister can explain it, it appears to me that instead of $860,000 worth of tobacco leaf being imported in the last six months, as in the corresponding six months of the former year, there were $600,000 less, and the only explanation I can think of is that that $600,000 worth of tobacco was smuggled into the country. Now, the duty the Government have put on, I think, is out of all reason. It is so high that it encourages smuggling. There is an excise duty of 39 cents a pound upon tobacco, 25 and 14. In the United States there is an excise duty of 6 cents a pound on tobacco, and that gives an advantage to the Americans of 33 cents per pound. Now, take one example. Tuckett & Billings, of Hamilton, make a celebrated brand of tobacco sold all over Canada. It is considered one of the best brands of tobacco that is sold. They sell it in large distinctive plugs, and in packages. Now, they have a factory in the States as well as in Canada where I am told, they make the T. & B. plug. Everybody knows they make exactly the same kind in the States as they do in Canada, the same size, and same appearance, and all that, three plugs to the pound. Suppose a man takes a caddy of this American make under his arm and carries it across the boundary, on a 20-pound package he makes $6.60 by the operation. The American tobacco is 33 cents a pound cheaper than the Canadian tobacco. Tobacco can be manufactured, I presume, as cheaply in the States, and tobacco leaves can be bought as cheaply there, so that there is 33 cents of preference for the American tobacco on every pound. The figures the Government have supplied here prove that they have widely overshot the mark when they added that 14 cents a pound additional duty on tobacco. I thought the late Government, in placing the excise duty at 25 cents, had gone to the extreme limit, and even that allowed tobacco to be smuggled in. But when you added 14 cents a pound additional, you made it a very great object for people to smuggle tobacco across. The Minister of Inland Revenue tells us that he has been remarkably successful in hunting up smugglers.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No, I have tried. I have not caught them all.

Mr. WALLACE. But the Minister made the boast that he had made 150 seizures, and that that was more than in any former period, and I believe it is. At any rate, 150 seizures won't stop the smuggling of tobacco, it is too profitable an enterprise. They more than double their money by smuggling it in. Tobacco in the States is not worth as much as 33 cents per pound, yet it is worth more than twice that here by the additional duty put on. I think the Government should reconsider their decision. They have put on too high a duty, and they have defeated the very ends they were aiming at. The duty, of course, was put on to increase the revenue; by the statement I have here the revenue will be very largely decreased by reason of the smaller importations of tobacco leaf, and the smaller amount of excise revenue they will receive in consequence. But outside of that is the other question, that a necessity, as tobacco is to many people, is taxed at far too high a figure. An excise duty of 39 cents a pound is a good deal more than 100 per cent on what is a necessity to very many people in this country, largely poor people. Rich people are able to afford it, and may not make complaint. But there are in this country many people who are working hard, who have not many pleasures, and tobacco is a solace and a comfort to them, and it has become a necessity as well. Therefore, I think the Government is not justified in putting more than 100 per cent duty upon an article that is a necessity. Besides the policy has been found, according to their own returns, to be unsuccessful, because instead of getting an increased revenue from the manufacture of tobacco, they have obtained less. I presume that the Inland Revenue returns will correspond, if not exactly, very largely, with the customs statement which I have just quoted showing that $260,000 worth were imported this year, and $860,000 worth were imported last year, for the half year in each case. I think the Government ought to reconsider their decision in this matter, both for the sake of revenue and for the sake of doing justice to those who use tobacco. They will increase the revenue of the country, and they will benefit those who are presumably getting cheaper tobacco by breaking the laws of the country, and having the Minister of Inland Revenue pursuing them with a troop of his officials.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Let me explain the difference between the revenue on tobacco last year and that of this year. My hon. friend will see that if there has been a decrease, the decrease was not caused to any great extent, by smuggling. Now it is interesting to see what happened in March and April of last year. On the eve of the bringing down of the tariff last session, the tobacco importers and the tobacco manufacturers knew that some change was to be made, but they did not know exactly what it was going to be. They had an idea that the duty would be increased, and that instead of being added to the excise duty it would be added to the customs duty. In order to avoid the customs duties, the manufacturers imported a quantity of tobacco much greater than the importations during a similar period of other years. They did so because they thought a customs duty would be imposed, and they stored it in our excise warehouses. The following is a comparison between the revenue of the Inland

Mr. WALLACE.

Revenue before and after the tariff of last year :

	1896.
March		$ 602,609 00
April		637,702 69
May		670,716 00
June		704,745 32
July		566,830 95
	1897.
March		$1,654,302 00
April		1,608,902 00
May		342,147 00
June		201,894 76
July		344,986 84

The revenue is now recuperating at the rate of about $150,000 a month.

Mr. INGRAM. If it is the case that during March and April last year the tobacco imported was $2,000,000 in value in excess of the importations of March and April of the previous year, are the Government aware that the tobacco is now manufactured in smaller plugs than formerly and a higher price charged.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. INGRAM. The workingmen use this form of tobacco in large quantities, and they complain very much of the increased duty imposed. If the increased duties should not be removed entirely, they at all events should not be increased.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Why do not the workingmen smoke Canadian tobacco. We are making efforts to instruct the farmers as to how to take care of their tobacco, not so much when it is growing for they perfectly understand that part of the business, but how to take care of it after it has been cut. It is the curing of the tobacco which is defective, and we are seeking some help from the Government, not to do as much as has been done in regard to the dairying industry, but to teach our farmers that which they evidently cannot learn for themselves, that is the proper curing of tobacco.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the hon. Minister's figures are incorrect, for the total imports for the year amounted $2,000,000. The imports for the last six months were of the value of $860,000, and for the last half of 1897 they were down to $600,000. The importations of tobacco are less because tobacco smuggling is going on, the people are using this smuggled tobacco, and so the Government are getting little or no revenue.

5. That it is expedient to provide that items 445 and 446 of Schedule "A" to "The Customs Tariff Act, 1897," shall be repealed on and after the first day of July in the present year, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight.

6. That it is expedient to provide that on and after the first day of July, in the present year, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, the following items shall be added to Schedule "B" to "The Customs Tariff, 1897" :—

636. Tobacco, unmanufactured, for excise purposes, under conditions of the Inland Revenue Act.

7. That it is expedient to provide that on and after the first day of July, in the present year, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, in addition to the excise duties at present levied on manufactured tobacco, cigars and cigarettes, there shall be levied and collected the following excise duties, that is to say :—

(a. On all foreign raw leaf tobacco, unstemmed, taken out of warehouse for manufacture, in any cigar or tobacco manufactory, ten cents per pound.

(b.) On all foreign raw leaf tobacco, stemmed, taken out of warehouse for manufacture, in any cigar or tobacco manufactory, fourteen cents per pound.

Provided that the weight upon which such duty shall be computed shall be with reference to the standard mentioned in paragraph (c) of section 247 of the Inland Revenue Act.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Resolutions to be reported.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EXTENSION TO MONTREAL.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I was asked, the other day, by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) for copies of the contracts or agreements entered into between the Government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, with reference to the Intercolonial Railway extension. I am willing to lay them on the Table, but I understand it will be necessary, in conformity with the rules of the House, that a motion be made for a return. I beg to move, seconded by Sir Louis Davies :

That an Order of the House do issue for a return of copies of all agreements not hitherto laid on the Table of the House, entered into by the Department of Railways with the Grand Trunk Railway Company in connection with the Montreal extension of the Intercolonial Railway.

Motion agreed to.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I beg to lay these papers on the Table of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg to move that the papers laid on the Table of the House be printed, and that the rules be suspended in that regard.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask, what business will be taken up to-morrow ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The Premier is not here, and I cannot give a definite answer, but I fancy we will go into Supply.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The franchise.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the Solicitor General is here, the Franchise Bill will be taken up first, but if not, it is likely we will go into Supply.

Mr. FOSTER. A number of gentlemen on this side are not here who would like to be present when the Franchise Bill is up.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Premier stated, the other day, that he hoped to take the Franchise Bill up after we got through the resolutions on Ways and Means. If the Solicitor General is here to-morrow, we will ask the House to go on with this Bill. But if not, we may take up Supply.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.45 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 20th April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CHOQUETTE presented the second report of the Select Standing Committee appointed to supervise the Official Debates of the House, and moved that the House concur in the same. He said : I wish to say just a few words before this report is concurred in. The committee have ordered to appear before them all the official reporters of the House in order to explain a little inaccuracy which appeared a few days ago in the report of the Debates, when a question put by an hon. member and answered by a Minister, were not reported in the "Hansard." All the gentlemen employed in making the official reports explained to the satisfaction of the committee that this omission occurred through no fault of their own. At the same time, they complained of the too narrow limits of the room in which they do their work. Though the report of the committee has been read from the Table, I think it well for me to read it over again, because I believe that some members of the House have not heard it clearly, and afterwards some members of the committee will explain the purport of the recommendations. The committee recommends that better accommodation be provided for the gentlemen who are doing a very important work, and doing their best to make an accurate report, but under conditions somewhat unfavourable. The committee report :

The committee recognize the utter inadequacy of the present accommodation.

Now, you remember, Mr. Speaker, that last session I went several times to your rooms to speak to you about this matter, and a sub-committee composed of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière)—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If my hon. friend will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I would like to draw his attention to the fact that it is the practice of the House not to move the adoption of a report on the day on which it is presented, but to allow it to lie over until the House has had an opportunity to consider it. I think it would suit the convenience of the House if my hon. friend were to adopt the usual course, and let that lie upon the Table and to-morrow he can move its adoption.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I quite agree with the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, but perhaps it might be well for me briefly to outline the recommendations so that the members of the House may be the better prepared to discuss them.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must insist on a compliance with the rules. Either the hon. gentleman must ask leave of the House to make the motion now, or else he cannot speak upon it. As has been suggested, if the report lies over till to-morrow, it would appear in the Journals, and full information can be given when the motion is made afterwards.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Then I will let it stand until to-morrow.

SHIPPING ACCOMMODATION AT MURRAY RIVER, P.E.I.

Mr. MARTIN asked,

1. Has the Government received a petition or memorial from the inhabitants of Murray River, High Bank, Glen William, Peter's Road, &c., in the province of Prince Edward Island, asking for improved shipping accommodation at Murray River ?

2. If so, has the Government decided to grant the prayer of the petitioners and what steps, if any, has the Government decided to take in the matter ?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to send the steam dredge to Murray River during the coming season ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Yes. 2. A report has been obtained from the local engineer, and the matter is under the consideration of the department. 3. The engagements of the dredge "Prince Edward" for the present season are such that it does not appear probable that it will be possible to send her to Murray River this season.

Mr. CHOQUETTE.

OAK MILLS POST OFFICE, P.Q.

Mr. McALISTER (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

1. Has Oak Bay Mills post office, in the county of Bonaventure, province of Quebec, been closed ?

2. If so, when, for what cause, and at whose request ?

3. What was the revenue from this office for the years ending 30th June, 1895, and 30th June, 1896, respectively, also for the half-year ending 31st December, 1896 ?

4. What was the revenue from Oak Point post office, in said county, during these years respectively ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. Yes. 2. It was closed on the 1st of April, 1897, after communication with Mr. Guité, because in the public interest it was not considered as needed. 3. The revenue for the year ending 30th June, 1895, was $75; for the year ending the 30th June, 1896, $71, and for the half year ending 31st December, 1896, $40. 4. The revenue of Oak Point Post Office for the same periods was $39.69, $39.27 and $22.35.

BREAKWATER AT TROUT COVE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER asked,

Were any repairs done to the breakwater at Trout Cove in the course of 1897 ?

If so, what was the cost of such repairs ?

Was any money paid to Solomon M. Dakin, William Cossaboom, Adrian Dakin, Alfred Ward, and Capt. Thompson, respectively ; if so, what was the amount paid each and for what purpose ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Yes ; repairs were made to the breakwater at Trout Cove at a cost of $3,989.77. The following sums have been paid to the parties named :—

S. M. Dakin, conductor.....	$208 50
Wm. Cossaboom, labourer and team.	118 99
A. Dakin, labourer.....	44 06
A. Ward, carpenter.....	153 75
E. R. Thompson, hardware and freight	143 43

DISMISSAL OF FINLAY BEATON.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER asked,

Whether Mr. Finlay Beaton, postmaster of Beatonville, Inverness County, has been dismissed ?

If so, for what cause ?

At whose request ?

Did the post office inspector make a report ?

If so, what is his report ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Complaints having been made by patrons of the office and others against Mr. Finlay Beaton, postmaster of Beatonville, that he kept the office in an unsuitable place, in the kitchen of his dwelling house ; that his general management of the office was poor and his treatment of the public rude and discourteous, the matter was referred to the post office inspector for investigation, and a report was received from him stating that the charges against the postmaster were fully borne out by the facts. Under these circumstances, the postmaster was removed from office.

MAJOR GENERAL GASCOIGNE.

Mr. BENNETT asked,

Has a militia commission been issued to Major General Gascoigne as major general in the militia; if so, on what date?

If issued, is it in the same general form as those issued to other militia officers; if not, in what respect does it differ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). No commission has been issued to Major General Gascoigne, and I am informed by the Deputy Minister that commissions have never been issued to Major Generals in command of the militia prior to Major General Gascoigne.

THE FISHERIES OF CANADA.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked,

1. Was an appeal instituted by the Government from the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the matter of a reference in relation to the fisheries of Canada and ownership of the beds of rivers, harbours, &c., to Her Majesty in her Privy Council?

2. If so, at what date was said appeal so instituted?

3. Has the case been argued before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and, if so, when?

4. Who were the counsel for the Government?

5. Has judgment been delivered?

6. If not, have the Government any intimation of the date upon which judgment will be rendered?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). 1. Yes. 2. February, 1897. 3. Yes, in July, 1897. 4. Mr. Robinson, Q.C.; Mr. Haldane, Q.C., and Mr. Loehnis. 5. No. 6. No.

THE DREDGE "MUDLARK."

Mr. McINNES asked,

1. Is the Government aware that the working time on the dredge "Mudlark" has been increased from nine to ten hours per day?

2. On whose recommendation and for what reason was the change made?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to continue the increased working time?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I have no knowledge that the working time on the dredge "Mudlark" has been increased. We have wired our resident engineer at New Westminster for this information, but a reply has not been received as yet.

THE REPRESENTATION OF BAGOT.

Mr. BERGERON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to the fact that a vacancy has occurred in the representation of the county of Bagot, in the province of Quebec, in this House, by the death of our late colleague, Mr. Flavien Dupont, in order that said county may be represented in this Parliament at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. SPEAKER. Notification having been given by an hon. member, I will order a writ to be issued immediately.

INSOLVENCY.

Mr. MACLEAN. Is the leader of the House in a position to inform the House and the country, whether the Government intend to make arrangements for taking up the question of insolvency and putting through a Bill during the present session?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). That question, as the hon. gentleman is aware, is in the hands of an hon. member of the House at the present moment. I cannot say that the Government will interfere in the matter.

GANANOQUE DRILL SHED.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, and as I now see the Minister of Militia in his place, I beg to repeat the question I put a few days ago, when the right hon. Premier said he would make a note of it, and would give information the next day—when will the correspondence moved for on March 4th, in respect to the removal of the drill shed at Gananoque, be brought down?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I will make inquiries, and within a day or two I will be able to lay the return on the Table of the House.

MANITOBA PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I wish once more to call attention to a return ordered for papers and correspondence connected with the Manitoba Government, regarding their claims against the Federal Government for the erection of public buildings in Manitoba. On March 2nd of this session, the Minister of Trade and Commerce took note of my claim, and he said he would inquire into the matter. I again called attention to it on March 25th, and I did not have extended to me the courtesy of an answer at that time. And now, for the third time, I ask, when we may expect to obtain this return, which was voted last session?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). My hon. friend recently made a statement respecting this return. I subsequently discovered that some misunderstanding had occurred, that the order of the House had been sent to the Public Works Department, and the correspondence could not be found in that department. The matter has been referred to my department, and within a day or two I promise that the papers will be laid on the Table. If it is not so, if the hon. gentleman will be good enough to remind me again, either personally or on the floor of the House, I promise him it will be attended to.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I have done so three times before, and I suppose I can do it the fourth time.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The matter has only come to my department within a few days; I promise the hon. gentleman there will be no further delay.

EDMONTON BRIDGE.

Mr. DAVIN. I beg to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact, that the return respecting the Edmonton Bridge has not been brought down. My hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) promised me quite a time ago now that it would be brought down the next day.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). These papers will be brought down as soon as possible. I may have forgotten something about it, but I will see that they shall be brought down to-morrow if they can be got ready.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman told me a week ago they were ready.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not think I said anything of the kind. I said just what I say now, that I will try to get them ready. We have been pressed very much in the department, but I will see that they will be brought down as soon as possible. I do not think there will be any more delay.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT— FRENCH TRANSLATION.

Mr. BERGERON. I call the attention of the Government to the fact that the Auditor General's Report which was laid on the Table three weeks or a month ago, has not yet been translated into French. I know that the French copy does come down later than the English, but I trust that the French translation shall be done as soon as possible. Some of our members have been asking for the French copy of the report, and it is important that it should be brought down as soon as possible.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is in the printer's hands.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. It should be in the members' hands.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I understand it is being pressed forward, but there is such a mass of matter with the printer that there has been delay. It is hoped it will be brought down within a few days.

Mr. FIELDING.

SUPPLY.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House do resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Charges of management..... $152,843 80

Mr. FOSTER. There is a reduction of $200 in the Winnipeg office which might be explained. The Minister of Finance should give us an idea of the changes which have taken place in the country savings bank of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia which cause the reduction there. I suppose it is because of transfers to the Post Office Department. The Minister might also explain the increase of $5,000 for printing Dominion notes.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The expenditure on charges of management for the Winnipeg office last year was $5,254.69, and we are taking $5,400 this year.

Mr. FOSTER. There has been no change in the office.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There has been no change. With regard to the country savings banks the reduction has been caused by the transfer of the following agencies to the post office, namely, Annapolis, New Glasgow, St. Andrews, Woodstock, Liverpool, and Summerside, P.E.I.

Mr. FOSTER. What has occasioned these changes?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In two cases, I believe, dismissals were made on political grounds; in the other cases they were caused by death.

Mr. FOSTER. What were the two political dismissals?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Annapolis and New Glasgow.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman might explain why he made the changes in these important offices.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In both cases charges were made and communicated to the gentlemen referred to. I believe I am correct in saying that they did not deny the accuracy of the charges; and, according to the rule which has been laid down, they were subject to dismissal, and they were dismissed. I do not think I can say more.

Mr. FOSTER. Was there a formal investigation in each case?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There was not, because the gentlemen accused did not deny the charges.

Mr. FOSTER. Was the charge a heinous one?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is a matter of opinion. It was a charge of active political partisanship.

Mr. FOSTER. Did they shoot two good Grits?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think their conduct was that bad.

Mr. FOSTER. I think their conduct should be explainted. What did they do?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. One of them was the secretary of the Conservative committee in his county. The other took the public platform and made speeches against the Liberal party.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Were they good speeches?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I was not present, but I have no doubt they were the best speeches that could be made in support of a very poor case.

Mr. FOSTER. Were the speeches a personal arraignment of any one of the Ministers, or disquisitions on the issues of the day as between the two parties?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think in either case they would be open to the charge. I think that public officials are not to go on the stump to engage in discussions of the political issues of the day.

Mr. FOSTER. And now it is laid down as a principle that the secretary of a Conservative club cannot receive deposits at the desk and pay over interest.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I should think he had better not try to do the two things at once.

Mr. FOSTER. There is an increase of $5,000 in printing Dominion notes.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That arises from the increased circulation. The figures have already been given. The circulation is exceptionally large, and there is a corresponding increase in the expenditure for printing.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the engraving for these notes being done in New York as before?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The making of the die was, I believe, done in New York, and I believe the contract was made on that understanding. But I believe that all the work now being done is going on in the building in sight of this building.

Mr. FOSTER. That is, the printing?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The printing, and I believe also the engraving, if there is any.

Mr. FOSTER. Is my hon. friend sure of that? Can he tell us that the work of engraving for these notes is really being done by engravers in that building?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I fancy that at the present moment there is no engraving going on. I presume the notes are being printed from plates which were engraved months ago.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose I were to make the assertion that all the engraving from which these notes are now being printed was done in New York and none of it done here, would my hon. friend feel like disputing that?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If my hon. friend will make the assertion on his responsibility that the contract is not being complied with, I am sure I would feel it my duty to investigate it.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think the question is as to the contract not being complied with. My question was whether the engraving was done here or in New York. My impression is that every bit of the engraving has been done in New York, and that Canadian workmen have nothing to do with the matter.

The Governor General's Secretary's Office. $11,450

Mr. FOSTER. What makes the increase of $50 here?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The only change is the addition of $50 to the salary of one of the clerks.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that a statutory increase?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, might I ask my hon. friend to give us an idea now of what the policy of the Government is as to statutory increases? In the session before last it was stated very decidedly, as a matter of permanent policy of the Government, that statutory increases were to be done away with. That was heralded throughout the country from one end of it to the other. Gradually, as the session went on, it was found that some Ministers had favourites to whom they gave increases varying from $50 to $200. Later on the Postmaster General came down with very general statutory increases, and an unedifying contest took place at a late hour one night between him and his colleagues, which resulted in those statutory increases being withdrawn. And now the first item we come to has a statutory increase. Is this a matter of favour, to be extended now to one and now to another, according to the good-will of the Minister, or have the Government reconsidered their position, and are they going to allow statutory increases?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I cannot recall any occasion when any member of the Government stated that no statutory increases would be granted. The idea intended to be conveyed was that statutory increases were not to be granted as generally as they had been in former years. The present policy of the Government is to grant statutory increases on the recommendation of the Minister to such officers as may be deemed worthy of them. Of course, different Ministers may have different ideas as to who may be deserving of statutory increases.

Mr. FOSTER. The statutory increases were never given except on the report of the Deputy Minister, as given to the Minister, and approved by the Minister. I grant you that statutory increases were the rule, and I would much rather that they would be the rule—that every deserving and painstaking officer should have his statutory increase as a matter of right, and that it should not be, as it seems to be in the present case, brought down simply to a matter of favouritism. My hon. friend says that he does not understand that there was a general declaration against statutory increases. My hon. friend knows that it was stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) and one or two of the other Ministers, as a great advance on the former policy, that they were to be done away with, but now it appears they are not to be done away with but that one man is to be picked out here and another there according to the favour of the Minister, while equally deserving and painstaking officers go on year after year without any statutory increase at all.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. What was stated was this. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well, from long experience in the office of Finance Minister, that for a very long term every man who was entitled to a statutory increase got it as a matter of course, whether he was good, bad or indifferent. There were Estimates upon Estimates brought down in which every single officer, out of hundreds who were entitled to the statutory increase, got it. He knows perfectly well that there is the widest possible difference in the capacity and diligence of the various clerks in the departments. You have some who barely earn their pay, and you have others who are worthy and most efficient and capable men, oftentimes deserving larger salaries than we are able to grant them. This applies particularly to the higher branches, because I have always maintained that our higher branches were underpaid while our lower branches, as compared with the salaries paid in banking and other institutions are decidedly overpaid, and we have decided that we could not endorse the system of giving statutory increases indiscriminately. But the hon. gentleman is in error in assuming that we arbitrarily declare that we would make no increases at all. We never said that we would make no increases at all, but that when any deserving case arose, we give it due consideration. My own opinion is that the sum demand for civil government is quite as large as Canada ought to pay, and if we are to give the statutory increase indiscriminately, that would involve the necessity of dismissing a larger number of men and giving the statutory increases to the remainder, or dispensing with the statutory increases, except in specially deserving cases, and thus keep the sum total as near as possible to where it is.

Mr. FOSTER. What rule is now being adopted? I would judge that this is the rule, that all deserving clerks who are eligible for statutory increase in every department should get it, and therefore when, as in this case, the Minister brings down only one statutory increase, it is to be presumed that other clerks in the department are not painstaking and deserving of it. They do not get theirs for that reason, but this gentleman gets his because he is worthy of it. The inference is that the others do not do their work well or neglect their work. How many are there in the Governor General's Department who are eligible for the statutory increase?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. What we said was that those who are specially deserving will get it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There are two, one of whom got the increase.

Mr. FOSTER. Who got the increase?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Mr. Walker got it.

Mr. FOSTER. And who is the other?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Mr. Sladen.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the relative time in office of these clerks?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I really am unable to answer the question.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a very important question.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Mr. Walker entered in 1886, but I have not the date of Mr. Sladen's entrance.

Mr. FOSTER. Then it is quite possible that Mr. Walker is the junior clerk.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman will know that one of these gentlemen is at the maximum of his class.

Mr. FOSTER. I asked the Minister of Finance who are eligible, and he told me that two were, and I am relying on his statement.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. You were asking about the other first-class clerk, and he is at his maximum.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. Finance Minister said that two were eligible.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. One is first-class and one is second-class.

Mr. FOSTER. And they are Messrs. Sladen and Walker ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The gentleman who gets the increase is a first-class clerk, and the other is a second-class clerk who is getting $1,100.

Mr. McNEILL. Are we to understand, then, that the second-class clerk who does not get the statutory increase is not worthy of it ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Not necessarily, but not sufficiently.

Mr. McNEILL. This is monstrous, in my judgment. I do not think the word is too strong. These gentlemen entered this service on the distinct understanding that if they conducted themselves and discharged their duties as they should, they would get that statutory increase. That has been the rule for years. If the Government thought that that was a bad rule, they should make a change, as to the men who now enter the service. But that they should deal in this way with men who entered the service under the distinct understanding that they were to get the statutory increase is a disgrace to Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. There must be some method by which we can get at the information as to what are the relative services of these two classes. This department, I believe, is under the President of the Council.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. In a sort of a fashion it is, as the hon. gentleman knows.

Mr. FOSTER. Under whose supervision, as deputy, does this department come ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think, if it can be considered under anybody's supervision, it would be that of the Governor General's Secretary.

Mr. FOSTER. Am I to understand that the Governor General's secretary favourably recommended Mr. Walker and did not favourably recommend Mr. Sladen ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. All I can say is that the gentleman who is getting the increase was certainly recommended, but I would not like that to imply any reflection on the other gentleman, by any means.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will not say that both were recommended, as in the case, for instance, of some other departments ?

Mr. INGRAM. Is this W. H. Walker the same gentleman who received a salary for three months at the rate of $1,200 and for nine months at the rate of $1,250 ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, he is the only person of that name.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Mr. Sladen was appointed the 1st of January, 1891. Mr. Walker was appointed in 1886.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. Minister tell us if it is understood that the same principle is to apply in all the departments with reference to the statutory increases, or does every Minister regulate that according to his own judgment ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is largely given on the recommendation of the Minister. Each Minister makes such recommendations as, in his judgment, are deserving, and the Council deals with them. That is the only way this matter can be dealt with.

Mr. SPROULE. And there has been no understanding come to by the Council that the same principle will prevail in every department, namely, that each Minister exercises his own judgment with regard to the promotions he makes in his own department ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Each Minister recommends those who, in his judgment, are specially entitled to consideration.

Mr. SPROULE. I think that that is a very unhealthy rule, and a very unfair one to the civil servants. These men are making their engagements from year to year upon the assumption that if they do their work creditably and are efficient employees, they will get an increase at the beginning of the next year, and there is no doubt that many of them are embarrassed to-day owing to the new system that has been adopted within the last couple of years. As my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) said, when they went into the service it was with the distinct understanding that if they did their work satisfactorily they would get the increase, and their outlay was, no doubt, based upon that understanding. But they find now, perhaps after having incurred expenses which they would not have incurred but for this understanding, that they are deprived of the increase and they know of no reason why they should be deprived of it. Many of them are afraid that the custom will prevail that only favourites of the deputy heads will be likely to get the increase, while none will know in advance whether they are to get the increase or not. This is a pernicious system, because it leaves it to the Minister or Deputy Minister to advance their own favourites, whether their term of service is short or long, and those who have not the pull on the Minister or the Deputy Minister will remain as they are. I have always thought that the proper way would be to allow a statutory increase, great or small, whatever might be considered fair, and give it to all deserving employees in the service, of course with the same restrictions as heretofore, that when the civil servant reaches the maximum of his class the increase shall cease. Then let the Deputy Minister, say at the end of the year, make a report on the employees of his department, and where he finds any that were not suitable, let him so state, so that those who are not doing their duty or who are not fit to be in the service may be dismissed, while those who are efficient may be advanced in salary, not as a matter of grace or of favour, but as a matter of statute and as a matter of right. I think this would add to the efficiency of those who remain in the service, while it would weed out those who are not faithful or not efficient.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He was increased from $1,400 to $1,450.

Mr. FOSTER. I find by the Auditor's report that Mr. Walker, in the Governor General Secretary's Office, got in 1896-97 for the first three months, $1,300, and for the succeeding nine months, $1,350. If he is getting $1,400 now he must have got a statutory increase in the meantime. And it is proposed to grant him a further increase next year. Thus, so far as Mr. Walker is concerned, the statutory increase has been regularly given to him from the time the present Government came into office.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). He was appointed a first-class clerk on the 1st July, 1897—that is, he was promoted.

Mr. FOSTER. That is equivalent to the same thing.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is not a statutory increase, but only giving him the regular salary.

Mr. FOSTER. Is $1,400 the maximum of the second-class ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Then Mr. Walker received two statutory increases and got his pass over the limit of the second-class, and another increase for him is now estimated. So that, with statutory increases and promotions, the advancement of salary is steadily carried out with regard to Mr. Walker, while Mr. Sladen, a second-class clerk is refused his statutory increase.

Mr. CLANCY. I understand the rule is that when a clerk is promoted the first year of promotion is the same as the last year of the statutory increase, and, therefore, the increase does not take effect by reason of promotion until the year after.

Mr. INGRAM. There is another point in connection with that. As I understand, Mr. Sladen did receive his increase in 1896-

Mr. SPROULE.

96, why should he be refused his increase this year, while on the other hand, Mr. Walker received his increase year before last and last year, also this.

Mr. BENNETT. It will be within the recollection of the House that last year when the Estimates of the Post Office Department were being passed, the question of statutory increases for some officials in that department came up. I am free to admit that the two officials who, in that instance, were rewarded had, according to the evidence of the Postmaster General, and according to the printed evidence—because they were the gentlemen who compiled the printed correspondence that they succeeded in finding in some of the hidden archives of the Postmaster General's department—rendered special service. They were picked out for this increase despite the fact that they enjoyed very considerable salaries. On that occasion the Postmaster General laid down what would be the guiding principle in future as regards preferment and promotion, that is, so far as salaries is concerned. He spoke as follows :—

I therefore intend to have a special report with regard to each officer, not to be severe, but simply to grant these rewards in an intelligent way.

May I ask if that has been adopted in all the departments, and has it been accepted as a rule in the other departments ? At the same time I wish, on behalf of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) to register his protest against these increases, and I cannot do better than quote the hon. gentleman's own language of last year, although he seems to be weakening in the faith of protesting against expenditure. Last year he said as follows, with regard to the proposed increases :—

I am exceedingly sorry to notice that the system of granting sums of money to civil servants, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, is being continued. In the cases mentioned by the Postmaster General, there may have been exceptional services rendered ; but if we are going to continue this system, I think it would be much better to amend the Civil Service Act.

And yet the hon. member is perfectly silent and docile at the present moment, and I presume, from his present attitude, that he intends to continue so throughout the whole discussion of the Estimates. There may have been some special reasons for exceptional advances last year, but the hon. member for North Wellington has not satisfied me that the gentleman whose statutory increase is being given is worthy of it on the ground that he has rendered exceptional services.

So far, I have not heard that this gentleman has rendered any exceptional services. The whole basis of the case is, that there is a contract between the people entering the service of the Government, and the Government, and from this out it is to be laid down as a principle, that, if a man has, so to speak, a political pull, he is to have an increase of salary, while, on the other hand, if he has no political pull, he is not to have an increase, or, if circumstances should arise, as did arise in the case of two clerks last year, who were able to render exceptional services to the Postmaster General, then they are to be rewarded. If exceptional services are performed by these clerks, then there may be some reason for giving them advancement; but, if this is to be the principle henceforward, that no advancements are to be made except according to the will and caprice of the Minister in charge of the department, then all I can say is, that in plain English it means that resort can be had to political leverage.

Mr. DAVIN. Unless we have a statement from the Government that they intend to proceed on a principle, they can hardly justify what I find to be the case here. We are asked to vote here $11,450 for the Governor General's Secretary's Office. The amount that was asked for in 1896-97 was $11,112; there is an increase in a very short time for this office of $300. If the Government says this increase is in consequence of a binding contract between the Government and the officers in this department, well and good; but, if they say they have selected two particular clerks, then I have to say, speaking for the people who have to pay the money, that this is not carrying out the promises of economy we have had from the hon. gentlemen.

Mr. CRAIG. I think the plan chosen by the Government in these matters is most unfortunate. It seems to me that all the deserving clerks ought to get this increase, if any get it; then we would understand that those who did not get it were not deserving, and they should not be retained in the public service at all. But to select one or two out of a great number. I think is a most unfortunate plan, and will lead to great abuses. It will lead to wire-pulling, and to having friends use their influence with the Deputy Minister, or the Minister himself, to obtain these increases. It seems to me, the proper business method is, either to do away with these increases altogether, and let the clerks understand that their salary is fixed at a certain figure while they do that work, or else let it be understood that all the clerks who do their work well get this increase, and, if they do not deserve the increase, let the Government dispense with their services altogether.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, if he has found, in his experience, that there is any uniformity in the departments as to the advance to be given to the clerks in each department. It is easy to understand that there is naturally a constant pressure in all the departments. Under our party system, I am afraid the hon. gentleman has had time to see the difficulties that will arise under the new system now adopted. I have no hesitation in saying, that there is no protection for any clerk in the service, if you adopt this plan now proposed. I have no doubt that, in the present service, as there always must be in any service—I care not what system you adopt—there must be drones. That has been the case in all other classes of business; it will obtain to some extent in the public service. But you must make the service independent, in the first place, and to make it independent, you must give them a statutory increase, it matters not what party may be in power. At present hon. gentlemen have a means of harassing the present service, and if they were to remain for a considerable time in power, it is easy to understand that an incoming party might apply the same lever; yet there would be as many drones in the service in one case as in the other. I think the Government of the day should have an efficient and an independent service, a service independent both of the whim of the Minister and of the whim of the deputy head. There is no deputy head in the service who might not make it impossible for a single clerk to get an advance, if he thought proper to do so. I do not make any charge, but I say that hon. gentlemen have made it possible for that to be done. It may be very proper to weed out from the service those who are unable to perform onerous duties, and some who are not entitled to increases; but you must weed them out according to some system. It seems to me a great mistake to place the service under the thumb of an incoming Government, I care not whether it be Liberal or Conservative. Now no man dare say his life is his own, politically speaking, because he feels it necessary for him to become almost the abject slave of his superior officer in order to be recommended for an increase. I would like to know, from the hon. gentleman, if there is any uniform opinion among the Ministers as to how many clerks should be put upon the list. I venture to say, that, when this comes up at Council, hon. gentlemen will say: We are swelling this much greater than we expected; some are asking more than others. The only uniform system is to adopt statutory increases of some kind, and weed out of the service men who are unfit to perform their duties satisfactorily.

Mr. WALLACE. The Finance Minister has not explained why the two officers who were promoted on the 1st of July, 1897, one to be a first-class clerk at $1,400 a year, and the other to be a second-class clerk at $1,100, and why it is now proposed to increase the salary of one by the statutory increase, and not the salary of the other, who is, however, receiving the smaller salary. If the circumstances are parallel, the Government should give us some reason why they have increased the salary of the higher-priced officer, and have not touched the salary of the lower-priced officer.

Mr. CLARKE. As the question of the policy of the Government in granting or withholding statutory increases has been raised, I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to the position occupied by the letter carriers in the public service. I think it will be conceded by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, that of all the officials in the service of the Crown in Canada, they are the most deserving, and receive the poorest remuneration for the work they perform. Throughout this Dominion they perform their duty with great accuracy, with great celerity and with great regularity. They enter the service at a salary, probably, of $25 or $30 per month, and I think I am correct in saying that, for the past two years, this miserable pittance these men have been receiving has not been implemented by the usual statutory increase. This matter has been mentioned elsewhere, and I thought, from the kindly way in which the proposition was received by the Minister of Finance, we had reason to hope that the matter would be favourably considered by the Government, and that provision would be made for giving these men the increase to which they are justly and fairly entitled.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will bring this matter up when the Postmaster General is in his seat, as I am not in a position to answer his inquiry.

Mr. MACLEAN. The Government should inform the House how many clerks there are in the service who claim this increased allowance, and also whether they believe what is said to be their opinion, that there are too many clerks in the service or not. On this first discussion the Government should announce how many men are entitled to the increase, and the reason why the increase was not given to all.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think I can state the reasons in all cases. The contention that each member of the civil service should have a statutory increase as a right is one in which the Government do not concur. We are not prepared to go so far as to say there should be no statutory increases, but we hold that they should be given on the judgment of the Minister on the various claims and services of the officials. That there will be inequalities in the judgment of different Ministers is quite possible, but at the present time we do not see any other way of proceeding. As to why a particular officer receives an increase while other officers do not receive the increase, we not being able to give to all applicants the increase, I am bound to say that under such circumstances the increases must be deemed to be given to those who are considered to be the most worthy.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. INGRAM. That is the very strongest reason why we should now, in the face of all the complaints made in the city of Ottawa, on entering into this first department of the service, receive an explanation why Mr. Walker received an increase and Mr. Sladen did not. Surely we are entitled to learn the reasons why increases are not given. If it is to be understood that we are not to receive any reply or satisfaction, we had better understand that now and refrain from asking questions in respect to increases in the different departments of the service at Ottawa. I think we are entitled to this explanation in the present case, and if the hon. gentleman is not in a position to give it to-day, the item should stand.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. With every desire to be courteous to the hon. gentleman, I must say that if hon. gentlemen are going to take up a large number of names and ask why a certain officer received an increase and another did not, it will be impossible to furnish information. But if an hon. member asks why we give an increase, I will be able to say, as I have already done, that the increase was recommended and approved. I cannot undertake to prove the negative as to why a large number of officers do not receive increases, especially as if we were to attempt to give reasons we might convey the impression that we were reflecting on the character and services of certain officers. But even among officials who are all in a certain sense meritorious, there will be some in every department of the service whose services will be considered particularly valuable, and those naturally claim consideration which does not exist as regards other officers, who may in their way be very worthy.

Mr. INGRAM. Mr. Sladen was refused the increase because he was a Tory, while Mr. Walker, who received the increase, was a Grit. So I was informed by a gentleman who knows.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Then the hon. gentleman has information which I have never heard of until this moment. This I can say, speaking especially for my own department, and I think I can speak also for the other departments, that the hon. gentleman is mistaken, and that in no case have politics entered into these matters.

Mr. FOSTER. What amount is Mr. Sladen receiving now?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. $1,100 a year.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Sladen is receiving $1,100. Who is the second man eligible to this statutory increase?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Mr. Walker was one and Mr. Sladen the other.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Sladen is at the maximum of his class ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He is in the first year of the second class.

Mr. SPROULE. What we should obtain from the Minister is information in regard to the principle adopted. Is the deputy instructed to report on all the officers in his department, and say who are entitled to statutory or any increases ? Or does the Minister trust him to report only on certain officers ? It seems to me very unfair if the deputy does not report on the whole number of officers in his department, because there will be injustice done to some, whether intentionally or otherwise, while others, not deserving any more consideration, will receive a good deal of consideration. The same principle should be followed in every department of the service. If the deputy has to report, let him be instructed to report on all the officers, and thus the deserving will obtain increases to the extent they may be given in each branch. If such a rule is not carried out, unfairness is done to the service and no stimulus given to ambitious officers who desire to do what is right to the service. I repeat that a great hardship is being done in many deserving cases. I know some civil servants who from misfortune or sickness contracted debts with the intention of paying them out of their statutory increases, and made promises on the strength of receiving those increases. But they have not received those increases, and they are now liable to be charged with dishonesty when the fault did not rest with them, but was due to the principle introduced by this Government. Any officer who desires to keep his expenditure within his income cannot do it if he does not know what his income will be. His promises are based on what he believes will be his income, including the statutory increase. He finds subsequently that he does not receive the increase, and this action embarrasses him and does a gross injustice to his creditors. The Government should lay down some principle applicable to all the departments, and state to the House what the rule is.

Mr. McNEILL. Has this gentleman, who is not to get the increase, been negligent in his duty ?

The FINANCE MINISTER. I am not aware that such has been the case, nor do I wish anything of that kind to be inferred.

Mr. McNEILL. The Act says :

The increase, statutory, to any officer, clerk or employee, authorized under this Act for the then current year may be suspended by the head of the department for neglect of duty or misconduct.

But the hon. Finance Minister does not pretend to say that there has been any neglect in the discharge of duties by this officer. Then, by what right does he deprive him of the statutory increase ? Not by the law. The law distinctly says that the minimum salary for a third-class clerk shall be $400 per annum, with a yearly increase of $50 up to the maximum of the class. That was the understanding and arrangement made when these clerks entered the service, and that is the law. The law says, moreover, that if an officer is negligent in his duties or guilty of misconduct, the Minister may deprive him for that year of the statutory increase, and that he may be subsequently restored by such head, but without arrears. That is the law, and that is the law only. By what right do hon. gentlemen treat men, deserving men, who have entered the service, men whom the Minister does not deny are deserving men, in this way ? By what reason does he endeavour to deprive such a man of the legal claim he has for this statutory increase ? If an attempt is being made to get round the spirit of the Act by means of a legal quibble, I repeat what I said before, that it is a disgrace to Canada to treat the civil service in such a way.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). My hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) is misreading—at any rate as the Government are advised—the law. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) has taken the trouble to examine the different sections bearing upon these statutory increases. If the hon. gentleman does take that trouble he will see that those who drafted the Act originally, obviously intended that the statutory increase should not go as a right to every official.

Mr. COCHRANE. Give us the clause that supports that statement.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The original intention of the statute was that this increase should be given to the officers who were held to be deserving, by the Deputy Minister in the first place, and by the head of the department afterwards.

Mr. COCHRANE. Read the statute.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Would the hon. gentleman kindly allow me for one moment. As years rolled by, the Ministers and the deputies did not take the trouble to make any discrimination between deserving and undeserving men, and for years up to 1896 these statutory increases were granted to every officer as a matter of course. It came to be an accepted axiom that this was a statutory right, but it never was. It was a statutory privilege, and nothing more. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) will remember that last year the Government brought down the opinion of the Justice Department—Sir Oliver Mowat was then at its head—that this section did not give a statutory right to the increase, and the Government from the first acted upon the opinion of the Department of Justice. The section which the hon. gentleman refers to merely enables the head of the department to suspend the increase for the current year for which it was granted, because of any misconduct or any neglect of duty, on the part of the officer to whom the increase had been granted. If the hon. gentleman will look at the previous section he will see that the increase is only to be passed by Council and recommended to the House, when the deputy in the first instance and the head of the department subsequently, reports that the individual officer is deserving of such an increase. That implies the exercise, not of a capricious judgment but of a proper judgment on the part of the Minister and of the deputy. For years this Act had been flagrantly abused. No attempt was made to exercise that discretion which the law imposed, and when this Government came into power they found the increases were granted to every clerk whether he was deserving or not. It became a public scandal and disgrace. The efficient officers who work early and late—and I am proud to say that there are a large number of them in the different departments of the public service who are ready at all times to give their best efforts to the Minister or the deputy at any hour of the day or night—these men received no recognition from the Government more than did the “4 o’clock men,” who sit watching the clock from a quarter to four until it is time to leave. Rightly or wrongly the Government came to the conclusion last year that this was an unfair system, and that it involved a large annual increase in the public expenditure which could not be justified. The Government found that they had either to grant increases to the most deserving, as the deputy and as the head of the department determined, or that they had to exercise the pruning knife and dismiss a large number of clerks from the departments altogether. The whole country was crying out against the system which prevailed before this Government came into power, and members of Parliament on both sides were denouncing this continual increase in the cost of the public service. We all know that the statutory increases, in the manner in which they are given, amounted to about $47,000 a year. The Government stopped that. As is well known there are in every department gentlemen whose whole heart and soul is in the public service, who are willing day and night to do their work, and the Government thought it proper not to repeal the section but to administer it in the spirit in which I have no doubt the draughtsman of that section intended, namely: that the increase should not be given indiscriminately as it had been given for many years, but that it should be given to those whose conduct recommended itself to the department and to the head of the department, as men whose services should be specially recognized and rewarded. It does not follow that because others have not been specially rewarded in this way, that they have been guilty of neglect of duty; not by any manner of means. In all departments there have been men who for one reason or another have rendered special service, and these gentlemen are recommended for an increase. This power has been used most sparingly; I think in my own department there is but one, and I believe a great many of the departments have not seen any special reason to recommend anybody for the increase. In each department the circumstances may have been a little different. I rose chiefly to point out to my hon. friends opposite, that they were labouring under two errors, one, that the Government are not acting on a principle in this matter, and the other, that like my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) they have not correctly interpreted this section of the Act. I say, Sir, that we are acting upon a principle, and upon a defensible principle. I acknowledge that you cannot lay down any principle which is not open to some criticism, and a good deal of the criticism offered by hon. gentlemen is reasonable. There are men who perhaps looked forward to obtaining this increase but who did not get it, and probably they have suffered some inconvenience. No one regrets that more than do my colleagues and myself, but we have carefully considered it. We felt that in the public interest we were bound to stop the yearly increasing amount which had been heaped upon the civil service for many years back, that it was not possible consistently with the mandate we have received from the people, and consistently with the views entertained by the majority of this House, to go on adding $50,000 a year in an indiscriminate manner to the salaries of the civil servants. Our plan may be open to some criticism; you may say that the Minister will not exercise his judgment fairly, but in answer to that, my reply is: the exercise of that judgment is a matter that in each case must be submitted to the representatives of the people.

In every single case in which there has been an increase this year, that increase must be justified by the Minister, not only to his colleagues in the first instance, but to the House and the country afterwards. There is no desire on our part to do injustice; but we have to recognize that there is a certain person in this country known as the taxpayer, who must not be absolutely ignored. We must also recognize the fact that in Canada we have an abnormally large civil service. We must recognize that if we had dismissed a large number of these men, we would have been charged with cruelty to them. So that, if we wanted to economize at all, the fairest and most just and honest way to do was to put the civil service on the basis on which the law intended that it should be put in the first place, and grant the increase only to those who are recommended to Council as entitled to receive it.

Mr. McNEILL. I am glad my hon. friend has made that explanation, because it puts the case very clearly before the House. The hon. gentleman's opinion is that only those who are specially deserving should have the increase, and that that is the sense of the Act. I would like to ask my hon. friend how he as a lawyer, reading the Act, can justify a statement of that kind.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I told my hon. friend that that was the opinion the late Minister of Justice gave in writing to the Government.

Mr. McNEILL. I think the late Minister of Justice gave the opinion to the Government that the Government could hold back the statutory increase of a civil servant. We all understand that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We are not bound to give it. It is a matter of discretion.

Mr. McNEILL. The statute provides that the minimum salary of a third-class clerk shall be $400 per annum, with an annual increase of $50 up to a maximum of $1,000; that the minimum salary of a second-class clerk shall be $1,100 per annum, with an annual increase of $50 up to a maximum of $1,400; and that the minimum salary of a first-class clerk shall be $1,400 per annum, with an annual increase of $50 up to a maximum of $1,800. Does my hon. friend mean to say that the Minister of Justice declared that that meant that only the deserving men among these men should get the increase?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I do not. My hon. friend is not acting with his usual fairness.

Mr. McNEILL. I am, as far as my mind is capable of being fair.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend must be aware that the section he before referred to is not any one of the three he has just read.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend must not interrupt me.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman asked me the question, and I am answering him. The section he referred to was section 26.

Mr. McNEILL. I am coming to section 26. We are talking of the whole Act; we are not talking of one section. My hon. friend spoke of the meaning of the whole Act, and when I referred to that particular section, he ran away from it and referred to the whole Act, and now when I refer to the spirit of the Act he runs away to the clause; and now he accuses me of unfairness because I take up the very argument he used himself. I say again that the Act is as plain and clear as the English language can make it, so far as these sections are concerned. With regard to section 26, it is an enabling section—a section controlling these other sections.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not an enabling section.

Mr. McNEILL. A controlling section. It is enabling in one sense: it enables the Minister to withhold the statutory increase, and it is a controlling section, because it controls the increase in a certain sense. That section is this:

No officer, clerk or employee shall receive any increase of salary except by Order in Council passed on the report of the deputy head, concurred in by the head of the department, stating that such officer, clerk or employee is deserving of such increase.

And then the subsection says:

The increase of salary of any officer, clerk or employee authorized under this Act for the then current year may be suspended by the head of the department, for neglect of duty or misconduct.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It can only be suspended after it is granted.

Mr. McNEILL. If the deputy head reports in favour of the clerk, he gets his statutory increase, unless he has been guilty of neglect or misconduct. That is as clear as it is possible for the English language to make it. My hon. friend talks a great deal about the cost of the civil service, and about the way in which the expense of the civil service was being heaped up by these statutory increases. That is all very well; but this is the law that we are dealing with. If my hon. friend wishes to make another law applying to men who are entering the service under other conditions, he can do so; but he has no right to violate the contract entered into by Canada with Canada's civil service, simply because he wishes to make political capital, or for any other reason. These gentlemen have rights here; and however the taxpayer of Canada may feel indisposed to increase taxation, I will say this for the taxpayer of Canada, that he wants to see the men in his employment properly treated, fairly and honestly treated; and I do not think it is honest treatment to bring men into the civil service under a distinct understanding, and under the provisions of a law, and then violate the law and break the understanding. My hon. friend speaks of members of the civil service who work overtime and of the zeal of some of the civil service. No doubt there are many members of the civil service who are zealous to a degree. The civil service of Canada is a service of which we may very well be proud ; but the fact that certain members of the civil service work overtime and are specially zealous, and deserving of recognition, is no reason why other men should be deprived of their rights. I believe that the rights that have been secured to these gentlemen under the statute are rights which no Government has any right to violate ; and I am very much surprised at the defence which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has set up in this matter.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not wish to enter into a discussion of the general policy ; upon that my hon. friend and I probably would not agree ; but I do not want him to go away with the impression that I have tried to misconstrue the law. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that by the section which the hon. gentleman attempted to rely upon, in the first place, the increase which may be suspended on account of neglect of duty is an increase that has already been given, and you cannot suspend a thing that has not been given. It does not relate to the giving of the increase at all, but to the suspension of the increase for misconduct after it has been given. On the other point, I venture the assertion that section 26 involves the exercise of judicial discretion on the part of the Deputy Minister and the Minister of the department and that no officer was entitled—

Mr. DAVIN. That is, if there was misconduct.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It had nothing to do with misconduct at all. Misconduct has only reference to the suspension of an increase already given, and has nothing to do with giving the increase in the first instance. The giving of the increase in the first instance is a matter which depends on the report of the deputy to the head of the department.

Mr. DAVIN. No, it depends on the conduct of the clerk.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not at all. That report must be dependent on whether, in the opinion of the deputy, he is, in the language of the statute, deserving of such increase. Those words necessarily import the exercise of judicial discretion upon his work and conduct, and until the deputy has reported that the clerk deserves an increase, in the language of the statute, he has no statutory right to it whatever. Therefore, the practice which has existed so many years, of giving the increase in every case, was one directly contrary to it, and we are now carrying out the spirit and intent of the statute.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not think that the hon. and learned gentleman understands the meaning of the word "suspension." He asks us to believe that he would not misconstrue a statute. After the speech we have just heard, it would be hard to convince us that he would not. My hon. friend has a habit at times of extemporizing his law, and I rather think that, in the earlier part of this discussion, he extemporized the law, and now he is trying to twist the statute. I propose to show you that he has failed signally—I shall not add, ignominiously. Section 18 reads as follows :—

The minimum salary of a first-class clerk shall be $1,400 per annum, with an annual increase of $50 up to the maximum of $1,800.

Section 20 reads in precisely the same terms, respecting second and third-class clerks, the only difference being in the figures of their salaries. Their salaries are to be so much at first, with an increase of $50 every year until they reach the maximum, subject to no provisions. Then comes the provision to section 26, which was necessary in order to prevent persons who had been guilty of misconduct, but not of such misconduct as would justify their dismissal, from getting the benefit of the statutory increase. It provides :

No officer, clerk or employee shall receive any increase of salary except by Order in Council, passed on the report of the deputy head, and concurred in by the head of the department, stating that such officer, clerk, or employee is deserving of such increase.

What that means is this, that, in order to give action and fruition to sections 18, 19 and 20, the deputy head shall state that the clerk has not placed himself outside of the law, as any one can do. There is not a right that any of us enjoys in regard to which we cannot place ourselves outside of the law ; and, when we do, we discover that the protection which belongs to us at other times no longer exists, because we have forfeited it by misconduct. No officer, clerk or employee shall receive an increase of salary, except by Order in Council, as I have read. Then comes subsection 2 :—

The increase of salary of any officer, clerk or employee, authorized under this Act for the then current year,—

Mark you, the increase for the current year. That evidently provides for the increase imperatively provided for in section 18, 19 and 20, which goes into operation in the natural way, as provided by the statute, the deputy head having reported that this man has behaved himself. Then, what is said :

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. What section is the hon. gentleman quoting ?

Mr. DAVIN. Section 26. It provides that that increase may be suspended by the head of the department for neglect of duty or misconduct. What is the contention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries ? I do not know whether my hon. friend who has just put me that question, was in the House when his learned colleague was speaking, and I ask his attention to this :

The increase of salary of any officer, clerk or employee, authorized under this Act for the then current year, may be suspended by the head of the department.

What is the meaning of that? The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries contends that it leaves it optional with the Minister and his deputy to give the increase or not. He contends that the increase could not be given without their volition and action, and, therefore, if they were of the opinion that he should not get it, it would not be given. But where, then, would be the need of suspension? Where would there be room for a suspension? On the contrary, it is because an almost automatic increase is going forward in the regular way, and because this man has placed himself outside the law, we provide that, instead of the increase going into action and fruition in the manner provided by the statute, it may be suspended by the head of the department in the case of neglect of duty or misconduct. And so strongly did the men who framed that section feel that this increase was part of the salary that they provided that, although it might be thus suspended, as it was going forward into action, they provided that it might be subsequently restored by such deputy head, but without arrears. If the man behaved himself in such a manner as to, as it were, wipe out his misconduct, then the statutory increase might be restored to him, but he would not be entitled to any arrears. Why, according to the contention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that word "restore" is an improper word, just as "suspension" would be an improper word. How could the increase be restored, if it did not properly belong to the man—if, in fact, it was not part of his salary? I hope that we shall hear from my hon. and learned friend the Solicitor General, who asked me the question on that head. I see that he shakes his head, and I am quite convinced he will not interfere, because he knows very well that his colleague has a talent for extemporizing law and excogitating facts, and I do not think he will come to his rescue in the matter. I say, let us either have that Act carried out as it should be, or repealed. I agree with my hon. friend who last spoke on this side. If the people of Canada owe these clerks the money, let us pay it, and let us afterwards take any course that may be deemed necessary to limit the number of civil servants. But, if we owe them the money, do not let us eke out a saving by docking $50 here and $50 there. And where is the economy to come in? My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries speaks of $47,000 as the savings, but where do we save that? Apparently, we are saving very little, as I will show in a moment with regard to this very item. All we are saving now is the statutory increase that the caprice—or, if you like, the wisdom—of an odd Minister may think it well to withhold, because that the Government are not withholding the increase in certain cases is palpable from this very item. Not only that, but so far as I can see in the item before us, we have increases such as were not provided for by the law at all. It is a very remarkable thing that the increase which took place from 1895 to 1896-97 was only $100 in this office. From 1896-97 to 1897-98 an increase took place very much greater than that, an increase of about $300 in one year. And, to some extent, this House was deceived by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. I do not say he did intentionally, but certainly we last year voted this item under a statement from the Minister of Trade and Commerce that gave us a false impression. This is the argument used by the Minister last year in order to induce us to vote the items for that year :

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). This is precisely as heretofore, with the exception of a very small statutory increase of $25 in the one case and $12.50 in another.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought the Government had stopped all statutory increases this year.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. These were statutory increases that had been granted before. They are just balanced periods. They had been granted, in the one case, terminating on the 1st October, and in the other case, terminating on the 1st of January next.

So that the hon. gentleman, when asking for the vote last year, gave the House the idea that there would be no statutory increase. I have also the hon. gentleman's language in 1895, when we were in committee :

As to the particular small increases of $50 per annum, we know very little about the efficiency of the clerk, and I am not going to criticize them. But I am bound to say this, and it applies also to the other estimates in connection with the civil service, that we are at present expending about one million and a half for civil government, as it is called, which is very nearly double the amount it was found necessary to expend under this head sixteen years ago.

The standard he had in his mind was the expenditure of 16 years before, and yet he is not increasing the expenses of this office by $100 a year, as in former times, but by $300, and that in a way that cannot be justified on the ground of statutory increases :

There has been no pretense whatever made that the work of governing the country is double now what it was then, nevertheless our expenditure has gradually grown until it is about double the expenditure of 1878.

Said the hon. member for South Oxford, now the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I would not have complained, nor would the country, of a moderate increase, but it is utterly and entirely disproportionate as compared with expenditures in previous years.

And now let me say, I would never complain in regard to this item or any item increased on statutory grounds. But what I say is that we cannot allow these hon. gentlemen to come forward and say to the House and the country that they are going to economize, that they are not going to give statutory increases, but are going to select here and there those who are to receive increases, and actually, in one item, make a larger increase in a single year than ever was made in the past. I say the gross inconsistency is one thing to complain of, but the extravagance is another thing which we have an equal right to complain of. We have no adequate explanation as to the increase that has taken place. I confess I am surprised when I see my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) sitting quietly there.

Mr. COCHRANE. He is smiling.

Mr. DAVIN. I want him to do more than smile. I love to see him smile, but it fills me with rapture when I hear him criticise budgets. Therefore, I would like my hon. friend to get back his voice. There are cases in medical history of persons suffering from hysteria and losing their voices. It is a matter partly of fancy on their part, and partly of craft. I heard of a very eminent medical man who had a case of that kind. He said to the father of the patient, who was a lady: Send your daughter to the hospital and I will see to it that she is cured in three or four days. He gave directions to the consulting physicians what was to be done, as the patient pretended to be deaf and dumb.

Mr. BENNETT. He (Mr. McMullen) is not deaf.

Mr. DAVIN. No, he is only dumb. The consulting physicians had their directions to say in the hearing of the patient that if the powders to be given were not successful, her hair, which was long and beautiful, should be cut off, and if that did not succeed in three days she would be sure to die. In two days the patient was quite well. I think that if we could have it whispered in the ear of the hon. member for North Wellington, that the high office he is aspiring to would not be given to him unless he recovered his voice, we should soon have him in his pristine vigour criticising hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. I am anxious for the hon. gentleman's reputation. He had a historical character, in this Parliament, and he has almost entirely lost it. The Montreal "Star," a newspaper for which I have the greatest respect, takes a fatherly interest in the hon. member for North Wellington, and almost weeps over the fact that McMullen is silent. I want to hold up a picture to my hon. friend, and it is the picture that he himself presented in other days. Even so late as a year ago, the heroic memories of 16 years clung glorious around him, and the aureole of Auditor General's criticisms flamed around his brow. In 1897, he said:

I am exceedingly sorry to notice that the system of granting sums of money to civil servants, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, is being continued.

I am not complaining only of the increase, but of the inconsistency. These are not statutory increases that have taken place. In one year, we have $300 added to the cost of the department, which is $200 more than was ever added before. And yet this is a Government of economy, a Government that will violate the just claims of the civil servant in order that they may make a bastard claim to economy before the people of this country. The hon. member for North Wellington continues:

In the cases mentioned by the Postmaster General, there may have been exceptional services rendered; but if we are going to continue this system, I think it would be much better to amend the Civil Service Act. I found fault with hon. gentlemen opposite when they practised this system.

That is perfectly true, there never was a man so persistent in this respect sitting on this side of the House.

It appears that every clerk who has any possible excuse upon which to hang a claim for additional salary, makes application and presses it until, eventually, possibly with the assistance of the deputy head, the Minister gives way and the evil continues.

This is exactly what appears to be going on now.

I think the Civil Service Act should be amended in some way, so that we shall not be asked every year to pass votes of this kind.

The hon. gentleman, however, is silent. I have again to reiterate that I have shown that my hon. and learned friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) was palpably astray in the administration of an Act of Parliament.

At first he misstated the law, but when he had the law in his hands, he hovered around the point and never touched it, and tried to becloud it to this House. I hope he will acknowledge that he utterly failed to answer the able argument made by my hon. friend from Bruce; and I think that before we pass this item we must have some more satisfactory explanation from the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. ORAIG. I think the explanation given by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will not be satisfactory to those who have read this Act. It seems to me that any fair-minded man reading this Act would understand it to mean what has been contended by those on this side of the House.

Any man entering the civil service and reading this Act over carefully, would understand that he was entering at a certain salary, and that if he faithfully performed his duties he would be entitled to a statutory increase of $50 a year until he came to the maximum, on condition that he faithfully performed his duties. Section 26 lays down the way in which a clerk shall get this increase, and that is by deserving it. All that is necessary in order that he shall get it is that a report be made to Council that he deserves it, and if he deserves it he shall get it. I hold this Act reads fairly that all who deserve the increase should get it, not that one or two should get it, and that all the rest should be left out. Clause 2 of section 26 says :

The increase of salary of any officer, clerk or employee authorized under this Act—

Not granted under this Act, but authorized under this Act.

—for the then current year, may be suspended by the head of the department for neglect of duty or misconduct.

Only for that; and I maintain that if the Government do not intend to carry out this Civil Service Act—and I am not saying they should do this, I am not advocating that every clerk should receive the $50 increase yearly—but I maintain that as long as this Act is on the Statute-book the Government are bound to go by it, and not construe it as they please, not make a ruling just to suit themselves. I maintain that a fair interpretation of this Act is that every officer in the civil service who faithfully discharges his duty is entitled to this increase yearly, and that those only who fail to discharge their duty, who are guilty of neglect or misconduct, should fail to get this increase. If the Government do not agree with that principle, then let them bring in a Bill repealing this Act, and I do not say that I would not support it. I only say that while this Act remains on the Statute-book the Government should be guided by it, and not pick out one or two from a department, one this year and one next year, and so on, and give them the increase, and leave all the others out. I say they are misrepresenting the men in the service who do not get this increase. I hope the Government will reconsider this matter and arrive at some conclusion and not leave these increases to wire-pulling or to favouritism. Suppose there are a dozen men in an office, and there are one or two who get these increases, while it is withheld from all the others, the inference will be that these men have used some underhand means to influence the deputy head or the Minister. If that state of things continues it will be most unfortunate for the country and the civil service.

Mr. TISDALE. There is one point I have not heard mentioned that ought to simplify the construction to be placed upon this statute. I understand it is held that it is in the discretion of the Minister and the deputy to give the increase or not. If that is so, is it not extraordinary such a provision was not placed in the law? When all these different sections were being passed how simple it would have been to say in the first section what the minimum and maximum should be, and then provide that in the discretion of the Minister or the deputy, upon the good conduct of the employee being certified to them, he should get his increase. That would have been all the law required to justify the contention of the Government. I think my hon. friend from Assinibola (Mr. Davin) gave the true construction, and the only construction that a court of justice would put upon it. It seems to me that having that law on the Statute-book, especially in view of the fact that our civil service as a whole is creditable to the country, we ought to carry it out. I do not see how it can be successfully contended that Parliament in passing this law would have deliberately ignored these four or five sections and subsections, if all they wanted to say was that in the discretion of the Minister or his deputy the increases should be made from time to time up to the maximum.

Mr. MACLEAN. Will the Solicitor General tell us where this report of the Attorney General is to be found construing the law?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He has not reported upon it, it is simply his advice.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to say a word to the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale). If we were now considering a Civil Service Bill, his remarks would come in very well, but the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House made the law, and this Government are now administering it. If the law was intended to be imperative, certainly clause 26 would not have been put in. The law is simply permissive, the deputy head or the Minister of any department may consider it prudent and in the interest of the country to recommend that certain statutory measures should be given to certain clerks in the departments; and if they do not consider that the clerks are entitled to them, or if they think they are sufficiently paid for the work which they do, they may decline to make the recommendation. I think that is clearly pointed out by section 26. Hon. gentlemen opposite are taking a very peculiar course in this discussion. When the Budget was under consideration, they charged the Government with not carrying out their pledges. They said that we on this side of the House had promised to make reductions in the annual expenditure, and hon. gentlemen opposite assailed the Government fiercely because they were making no effort to carry out those promises. But now when the Government are making an effort to promote economy by declining to grant statutory increases to civil servants in Ottawa who are not entitled to them, hon. gentlemen opposite assail them fiercely and bitterly because they do not go on and make the statutory increases. But when we come to consider the gross expenditure they will again assail the Government fiercely, and say: You are expending this year more than the previous Government did. Hon. gentlemen should be a little consistent. The Government are trying to do what they think best in the interests of the country. I think there is no class in the Dominion that is better paid than the civil service, and I think the Government will see that no deserving increase is withheld. I am a little surprised, and amused also, at the course hon. gentlemen opposite are taking in connection with this matter.

I wish to say a word with respect to the Civil Service Act. I should like very much indeed to see it carried out; I do not like to see after an item in the Estimates, the words, "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act." Frankly, I object to that. There may be some cases of great hardship where men have been employed on special work and not paid; but the Civil Service Act should be carried out in its entirety, or it should be amended. Nor am I disposed to have the civil servants placed in a position to dance attendance on the deputy head or the head of any department for the purpose of getting at the end of the year $50 increase. The Act should provide that civil servants be fairly and sufficiently paid, and there should be no discrimination against any officer by a deputy head who is disposed to do injustice. I admit that the Act is not all what it should be, but the Government have to administer it until such time as it is amended; and I earnestly hope a change will be made and that the service will be placed on a better footing than it occupies at the present time.

Mr. CRAIG. I desire to say a few words in reply to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). The hon. gentleman is correct in saying that I wish the Government to carry out their promises; I want them to be economical. The hon. gentleman says he wants them to be economical. But we are not finding fault with the Government for being economical. They are not exercising economy, for they are placing in the Estimates votes for statutory increases. If such increases had not been in the Estimates, this discussion would not have taken place. Now, is the hon. gentleman going to vote for this increase? He says he is in favour of economy, and therefore he should vote against the increase. I propose to vote against the increase, and I challenge the hon. gentleman to do so. I want to make the Government economical, but it is difficult to do so. I repel the insinuation that we are doing this for any other reason than because we consider this question one open for discussion as to whether there should be increases granted or not. What we object to is that the Government should retain in their hands the power of giving two or three officers increases, and refusing them to other officers, who are perhaps equally deserving and are receiving lower salaries, and have larger and more expensive families to maintain. Let the Government either give no increases or give all the officers increases. There is no proper discrimination made, and if we were in the inside circle we would learn the true reason why one or two officers receive increases and the others do not. I hold that the officials who have the most influence and who are able to pull the most wires receive the increases. I do not say that they are not deserving, but there are other officers equally deserving. Hon. members on this side of the House are not in favour of extravagance, or in favour of increases, but we are in favour of fair-play, and we want the Government either to carry out the Act and grant the statutory increases all round, or bring in a Bill to amend the present Act, and then hon. gentlemen will find out where we stand. They cannot ascertain that now when increases are proposed to some officers on the recommendation of somebody, while increases are refused to others. We do not know at the present time why this officer in question has been recommended for an increase. He has been recommended by somebody; who made the recommendation? It appears it was the opinion of this gentleman that the officer was deserving. I maintain there are other officers equally deserving who have not received increases. We are desirous of having the Government conducted economically, but we want these increases to be granted according to law, and if the Government do not believe in carrying out the present Act, let them repeal it, and in doing anything to promote the interests of the country we are prepared to give them our assistance.

Mr. SPROULE. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries laid down the rule that increases were only given when certain work had been done for which the officer deserves special consideration.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. On the special recommendation of the Minister.

Mr. SPROULE. Because the officer had done some special service in the interest of the Government or the department. The House is entitled to information as to what special work this officer did.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not say special work, but I said specially deserving.

Mr. SPROULE. What special work has this officer done that entitles him to an increase, while his colleague, who is not regarded and has not been said to be other than an efficient servant, is not entitled to an increase? What special consideration has he given to the country to entitle him to the increase, while increases are withheld from others?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot answer the question; I am neither the head of the department nor the deputy head. The hon. gentleman has been informed already that the officer's name was reported favourably to Council.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. By whom?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. By the head of the department.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Who is the head of the department?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Jones, I think, is his name; I do not know his name.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand the head of this department is the Minister of Finance. I refer to the principle laid down by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that an officer having done special work was entitled to an increase. I think the Minister of Finance should be well able to inform the House what special work was done by this officer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not say special work, but that he was specially deserving.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the Minister to say that this increase was for special work. The hon. gentleman said that certain officers were available at all hours and were often called upon to do special work, and in consideration thereof they were entitled to the increase while others were not. What special consideration was there in this case that did not apply to others?

Mr. TAYLOR. I understood the Minister of Trade and Commerce, at the commencement of this debate, to say that the Government had one alternative or another to a department, either to reduce the staff or to cut off the statutory increases. I should like to ask that hon. gentleman, whether since the hon. gentlemen opposite came into power the staff has been reduced? I look through the departments and find that instead of reductions, there have been increases. Since the present Government have been in power vacancies have occurred in the departments by death and otherwise. Have the Government curtailed expenses? They filled up the vacancies and superannuated certain officers. You cannot go down town without meeting officials who have been superannuated at the expense of the country. Among officers of the Indian Department you will meet Mr. McGirr, who has been superannuated. We meet Mr. Balderson, the late secretary of the Department of Railways and Canals walking about the streets. He was an efficient officer; he is a young man in the prime of life, and he has been saddled on the superannuation fund, and another man has been put in his place.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) nods his head, to affirm that he cannot justify that; no honest man could justify such conduct on the part of the Government. These gentlemen talk about economizing, but they go on superannuating young and able officials at a heavy annual cost to the country, and they go on putting other men not half so efficient in their places. Look at the case of the late Deputy Postmaster General. He was one of the most efficient officers in the service, but he has been superannuated at an extra cost to the people of two or three thousand a year, and another official at a high salary has been installed in his office. The services of Mr. Balderson, Secretary of Railways and Canals, were dispensed with and we were told the office was abolished, but there is a secretary to that department to-day. At this very moment each of the departments has as many officials as it had under the late Government, and yet these gentlemen when in Opposition told us, day after day, that there were two or three clerks to do one man's work. Now that they are in office, they find the staff hardly able to do the work, and we find gentlemen on this side asking for returns, ordered this session and even last session, and the answer from the Government is that the clerks are not able to keep up with the work. In addition to all that, we find that an increased amount is asked for contingencies and clerical work in nearly every department. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) can justify a pretty bad case, but when he shakes his head and says he does not justify superannuating young men at the expense of the country, it is a sign that he is commencing to repent. In this case which we are discussing we have one clerk getting the $50 increase and the other clerk not. Why, Sir, the Government ought say that they will violate the law altogether and give no increases, or else that they will apply the law and give the increases, particularly to the third-class clerks who commence at $400 a year.

Mr. DAVIN. They have not shown that their action is according to law.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries tried to construe this law to suit his view, but when the Solicitor General is asked to back up the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the Solicitor General shakes his head and leaves the Chamber, as much as to say that the construction put upon the law by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is correct. That is the only inference we can draw from the conduct of the Solicitor General. The Government talk about economy, but here they are bringing down Estimates to the amount of three or four million dollars more than was ever asked for by a Conservative Government during the last eighteen years.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) wishes to increase the expenditure of the civil service within the next two or three years, I would be pleased if he would put a notice on the paper to say, that in his judgment, and in that of his friends, it is desirable that the civil service of this country should cost $1,600,000 or $1,700,000 annually. Then we would know they had some honest belief in the statements they have been making this afternoon. I would point out to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor), that the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) brought down in 1896, Estimates for the civil service, contingencies included, to the amount of $1,449,000, and we ask, after two years with a considerably larger population, for $1,418,000. In these very Estimates in my hand, I see there are the salaries of about a dozen less employees asked for than we asked for last year. There is one less in the Department of Militia; one less in the Department of Printing and Stationery; one less in the Auditor General's office, apparently; three less in the Department of Agriculture; two less in the Department of Public Works; one more in the Geological Survey; one less in the Department of Trade and Commerce. On the whole there are several less, as the hon. gentleman will see.

Mr. TAYLOR. Two more in the Post Office Department.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. There appears to be an increase of two there, but on the whole there are some eight or ten less, as far as I can see, asked for in civil government on this occasion. I may just repeat once for all, that the position we take is this. No civil servant has a right by law to any increase whatever. That is the position we take, and that position of ours was confirmed by Sir Oliver Mowat when he was Minister of Justice, and is confirmed by the opinion of my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Fitzpatrick). We take the position that it is our duty and our right, and we propose to exercise it, when special merit is brought to our notice, to increase the salary of the officer having that special merit. We take the position also, that the Act was most flagrantly abused during the half dozen years before we got into office. I repeat what I have said often from the other side of the House: that it was a farce, and a disgrace and a scandal, that over and over again Ministers came down and told us that there was not a man in the civil service who was not qualified to receive the increase. Over and over again I have pointed that out, and it is only necessary to look at the rate of increase to see that the late Ministry made the Act as a dead letter. They gave every man, good and bad and indifferent, an increase if he was qualified by law, which I say was a flagrant abuse. It is in consequence of that flagrant abuse that we have been obliged to introduce this somewhat stringent rule. It is as clear as daylight, that under section 26 no man has a right to claim an increase.

No officer, clerk or employee shall receive any increase of salary except by Order in Council passed on report of the deputy head, concurred in by the head of the department, stating that such officer, clerk or employee is deserving of such increase.

Here are three parties required to concur. First, the deputy head, next the head of the department, and third, it is within the province of the Governor in Council to refuse any increase whatever, if in the public interest they think that the civil service is costing money enough. We think the civil service is costing money enough; costing a great deal too much money, taking into account the proportion which it bears to the sum at our disposal for general expenditure, deducting fixed charges. My opinion is that there are a very large number of the inferior members who are much better paid than they would be in any other department of civil life, though I repeat that there are some of the superior officers who are not paid sufficiently. I say that we would not be justified in going on, raising the salaries of these men from the sum of $1,100 to $1,400, or from $1,400 to $1,800, or from $1,800 to $2,400, without any regard to special merit and qualification. We have reversed the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite. Instead of giving this increase as a thing of course, we give it now on special merit, on our own responsibility, and if we find that a man is specially deserving we propose to give it to him. I do not desire by that to make any reflection on those who are not thought specially deserving. It simply means that they are doing their work in the ordinary fashion and way which ordinary clerks do it, but they have not established a special claim. That is all we contend.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, putting it on that ground, may I ask my hon. friend if he will inform the House, what is the special claim in the case of Mr. Walker which entitles him to the consideration of an increase, while Mr. Sladen does not get it?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. All I can say is, that Mr. Walker was reported by the officers specially in charge of that department; that is, by the officers close to the Governor. They reported Mr. Walker as deserving of the increase, as having been a specially good officer; that is all. They are the parties with whom he comes in contact; they are the parties who know who is the best deserving, and we have to take their recommendation in each particular case. Of course, there is no Minister, as the hon. gentleman knows, who can be considered as specially responsible for this particular office; all the Ministers in their capacity as a Council are responsible for it. These things are usually done on representations from the chief clerk of the Governor General's Secretary.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has missed the point of the contention on this side of the House, and, no doubt, without meaning it, has misrepresented our position. If the Government wish to take the ground that statutory increases ought not to be given at all, let them so act; that would be consistent. But, if they take the ground that the power is simply discretionary, and they carry it out in this way, by picking out one or two from five, or six, or eight, or ten, clerks, the large proportion of whom are equally deserving, so far as straightforward, honest work is concerned, and give to the one or two the statutory increase, and refuse to give it to the others, that is a principle of favouritism, if you call it a principle at all. If you provided some machinery by which the special services in each case could be reported upon and made a matter of record, not only for the Ministry, but for the House, there would be some principle in that; but, when we ask in this case, where is the report on the special services, there is none at all; the Minister has none, and I believe none is asked for by him. I believe the Minister consults with his deputy or not, as he pleases, and comes to the conclusion that this man or the other man shall have the increase, and he puts it in his estimates, and it is submitted to Council, and is carried or not, as the case may be. It may be, that the Minister has an outside friend or supporter who is anxious that a certain clerk shall get the increase. He goes and pleads with the Minister, and the result is that the clerk gets the increase. That is what we complain of. We complain, in the first place, that you are destroying the morale and the efficiency and the proper ambition of the service by making the increase simply a matter for the whim of the Minister—a matter of favour. If it is not, have your board, or your proper officers, who will report on the clerks, and carry out the recommendations of those officers. Who knows more about the department and the work of the clerks—the deputy head or the Minister? There is no doubt about it; it is the deputy head, the permanent officer. He is the man who can tell, if he is qualified—and you should not have him there if he is not—the special merits and the conduct of every clerk in his department. If he makes a report and recommends that the increase be given in certain cases, it is for the Minister to take his report or not, because the Minister must be the one to decide in the last resort. You would then have something to go upon; but you do not have that; you have simply the will or the whim of the Minister himself, for whatever reason may at the time be uppermost and have weight with him. It may be the persistent appeals of a supporter; it may be one thing or another. Under this system, you are keeping the whole power to give the statutory increase, but you are simply using it as a matter of favour for the individual Ministers; and, while it is a good thing for the man who gets the increase, it destroys the morale of the whole service. For instance, it will be found, when we come to the Finance Minister's estimates, unless he changes them, that he has recommended statutory increases for seven or eight of his clerks; but, when the Auditor General asks that statutory increases shall be given to a certain number of his clerks, than whom there are none better or more hardly worked in the service, and he has so rearranged the work by dropping a clerk, that, even with these increases the aggregate expenditure will not be more than it was before, and he puts his application before the proper Minister, he is refused those increases, and is afterwards given the opportunity of picking out for the increase two or three out of the eight or ten. What is the rule of parity between these two cases? In the one case all the clerks, or nearly all, get the increase; in the other case only a minimum of the clerks, though equally deserving—I do not say, more so—get it. How do the young men feel when they walk beside each other? Some of them say, "We could not get it, because the Minister would not give us his ear: but you could get it, because the Minister gave you his ear." That, I think, is going to injure the service. We do not ask hon. gentlemen to pile up the expenditure. We ask them to decrease it. I fully agree with my hon. friend, that the civil service of this country costs too much. My hon. friend is not consistent in keeping the cost at the same as, or a little above, what we had; he is only consistent with his professions, if he brings it down to hundreds of thousands of dollars below our expenditure. I will go as far as he can go to prune the service and bring it down to a reasonable point. I am not asking that hon. gentlemen opposite should put all the increases on or take them all off; but I say they should devise some method by which a man in the service would know what to expect. Now he may work as hard and as faithfully as a man can, and he does not get the increase, while another man, who works no harder or more faithfully, gets it; and the knowledge of that rankles in him, and it destroys the efficiency of the service. Let hon. gentlemen devise something that will be equitable and fair in its working, and the House, on both sides, will support it.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The whole difficulty arises from the neglect of the law in former years. I am inclined to think that the hon. gentleman, if he could, would have enforced such a provision as we are enforcing. He knows that they never refused the increase to anybody, and nothing could be more demoralizing to the service than to reward all alike. If proper distinctions had been made by our predecessors, it would not have been necessary to apply this rule so strictly as we are now doing; and, unless we introduced the American spoils system—

Mr. FOSTER. You are going a long way towards it.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think not. The hon. gentleman knows that there is an extreme difference between the American spoils system and the line we have taken. But there is no doubt whatever that, so far as regards the economy of the service, it would have been very largely promoted by the dismissal of a very large number of civil servants and by its complete reorganization. That, however, would have involved certainly a great hardship, and what is more, in a political sense, to be deprecated, probably the introduction of a system closely akin to the American system. That was one of the reasons why we did not feel disposed to dismiss right and left ruthlessly a great number of civil service employees. But if we did not do that, we did feel that we were not justified in asking for a larger sum than we now ask. If the hon. gentleman thought it was necessary to vote $1,449,000 for the service of 1897, which was the sum he asked, he must consider that if we had gone on accepting his Estimates and adding the regular number of statutory increases, we would have had to come down to-day and ask for a sum of probably $1,540,000 or $1,530,000, instead of $1,418,000.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the difference now?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. We would have had to add something like $80,000 to the sum he demanded for the service of 1897.

Mr. FOSTER. For statutory increases?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman figure it out?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. There will be two years, you will observe, since 1897. He asked, as he knows, for about $1,450,000, in round numbers, for 1897. If we had gone in the same ratio we would have probably have required to ask for something like $1,480,000 or $1,490,000 for the service of 1898, and would have required $1,530,000 or thereabouts, in all probability, for the service of 1899, whereas we are not asking more than $1,418,000. The only way to avoid that was to stop these statutory increases. I do not mean to say at all that that does not involve hardship, but you must remember that you have to deal with this thing in the mass. For a very large number of years, the civil service got the increase indiscriminately, and I do not accuse the hon. gentleman on that account. It would be far pleasanter and easier for us all to grant the thing indiscriminately. It is not pleasant for Ministers to refuse it, but we think the sum we ask of $1,418,000 is as much as the country ought to pay for its civil service. The hon. gentleman is not himself in favour of indiscriminate increase. I think he exercised a tolerably close hand in the treasury when he was Minister of Finance, but nevertheless he could not avoid the large increase going on from year to year in this item. When did my hon. friend become Minister of Finance?

Mr. FOSTER. It is so long ago—1888.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I see that in 1888 the expenditure was $1,211,000 only, and yet in the last year for which he brought down Estimates he was compelled—and I think it was wholly due to the statutory increases, or almost wholly due—to ask for $1,450,000. The statutory increases look but little in each individual case, but in a term of years, it amounts to a great deal of money, and he was compelled to increase the expenditure nearly a quarter of a million of dollars from the year he first became Finance Minister until the last year of his term. If we were to give the statutory increases indiscriminately, I have no doubt whatever that we would have to run up our expenditure, in the course of four or five years, to something like $1,600,000 or $1,700,000, and the country and our friends would feel bitterly aggrieved if we did that. We have had to call a halt. I think the expenditure on the civil service was too great by far during the last years of the late Government, although, frankly, I acquit the hon. ex-Minister of Finance of having done more than go with the tide and yielded to the pressure put on himself and colleagues. But it is now time to call a halt. I do not believe that the hon. gentleman, if he were to go over our various departments, would say that at this moment the minor officials in those departments are underpaid. I do not think he would say that they are receiving less than they are fairly worth or could get in the open market of the world. It may be quite true—and I believe it is—that some of our superior officers, some men of special talents, are receiving considerably less from Canada than they could obtain in other countries and from other employers, but that is not the case as regards the work performed by the great majority of the employees. That work—and none know better than the two hon. gentlemen before me—is, in the great majority of cases, clerical work, which does not require any very superior degree of intelligence and accuracy, and it is work which is exceedingly well paid for, in my judgment, in the majority of cases, at the salaries the employees now receive. I would not like, nor would my hon. friend, to ask any man to work for the country for less than he is fairly worth, and I look upon it as a matter for regret that in some very important offices we are deprived of the services of men of great value to the country because we find it impossible to give them adequate salaries, but that does not apply to the great majority of the civil service. They are exceedingly well paid, compared with the salaries granted by many railway companies and banks, and unless there was a special compact, a legal compact, I think the course we have taken is a just and right one. We inquired carefully into that matter, and I think, if I remember right, that there is one thing in connection with it that is overlooked. I think there was at one time a series of clauses which might seem to bear out the contention made by one or two hon. gentlemen opposite. Those were the old clauses 21, 22 and 23, which were deliberately repealed by 58-59 Victoria, passed, I think, by the hon. gentleman himself, or at any rate in a year in which he was a member of the Government; and the repeal of those clauses shows conclusively that he had come to much the same conclusion, namely, that these increases were not to be made as a right, but must be in the discretion of the Government. If the hon. gentleman will look back to 58-59 Victoria, chapter 15, section 2, I think he will see that it bears out largely my contention.

Mr. FOSTER. The tone of my hon. friend's remarks are all that could be desired, but he has scarcely done justice to the preceding Government. I admit candidly that the burden of the civil service made itself apparent to the late Government just as it does to this. It was felt that the burden was a serious and heavy one, and there has been no time within the last few years that I have not been ready to admit that our civil service was costing us more than it should. My hon. friend details the difficulties which occur to any Government in reducing the Estimates, but he did not feel it so difficult three or four years ago. The late Government did take steps to reduce the cost, and one of the things done by it was an almost perfect remedy in a very large class, intended to act gradually but still most effectually. As my hon. friend says, there is a great deal of work being done in these departments by men who are paid $1,000 per year, which could be equally as well and effectively done by persons at, say, $500 or $600 per year. And when you had a system of third-class clerks who commenced at $400 and went up to $1,000, and the clerk got up to his maximum, or between $600 and $1,000, in these cases you were paying just that much too much for the amount and kind of work done. Three years ago the Government, at my own suggestion, abolished the appointment of third-class clerks entirely.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. For the future.

Mr. FOSTER. We found the difficulty of interfering with an establishment, but, for the future, no third-class clerks were to be appointed. Consequently, we avoided the whole difficulty of ultimately having a large number of high-class and highly-paid men doing what you might call clerks and writers' work. That is the endeavour that was made, and no one can look at the facts or at the statistics without seeing that to-day you are getting a great deal of this clerks and writers' class of work done by young men and young women who come in at $400 and go up to $600 or $650—I do not recollect exactly—when they become stationary. No third-class clerks are appointed, so you save all the sums that would be paid in salaries for that class of work above $600 and up to $1,000.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But the hon. gentleman will see that that, inasmuch as he preserved—and I do not question that, but I will say properly preserved—the rights of the existing third-class clerks, it will take years before his system works out in the way he says.

Mr. FOSTER. Not so many years. Those above third-class clerks die, and promotions are made. Third-class clerks also die, and so vacancies are made which cannot be filled. If the hon. gentleman will look over the list he will find that there are departments in which there is only one third-class clerk. So we are reaping the fruits of that policy, and I hope that my hon. friends will not disturb it, as they have not disturbed it so far. My hon. friend, to be fair, must give us credit for having introduced that legislation which, in the course of not very many years, ten or fifteen years, must almost entirely do away with third-class clerks and introduce in their places those who are getting from $400 to $600 for writers' work. That would be a great saving.

With reference to the increase, it is a fact that it became the rule for the increase to be granted. There were some departments in which it was perfectly right that the increase should be given, because of the class of work done and the quality of the clerks who did it.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. My hon. friend will hardly say that it was so in all.

Mr. FOSTER. No, I will not say that it was so in all. It depended, to a large extent, on the deputy. He had it in his power, in making his report, to discriminate. That has been done frequently in cases within my own knowledge, but the majority of the deputies felt, I suppose, the same disinclination to interfere between one and another that the Ministers feel, for reasons which are well known, and so it came about that the increase was given largely as a matter of course. But because it was given largely as a matter of course, that does not militate against the principle, and provided you fix the maximum of salaries at the right point, I believe it is the best principle you can have—to allow statutory increases and give them only when the clerk has been deserving and faithful in his work.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend approves of that. But under your rule, you are not giving it to those who are deserving. Out of eight or ten who are deserving, you give to three or four, while you deny it to the others. That is the weakness of the plan hon. gentlemen opposite have adopted, and they will find that it will not work well. It will be an odd thing if, with both sides of the House anxious that the civil service should be made as effective as possible, we cannot come to some conclusion which will give the clerks a firm assurance of what will be their due and what will be given to them if they do their work faithfully and well. Under the plan followed by hon. gentlemen opposite, this will not be. Under the old rule, it was almost as bad, because the undeserving class got their increases the same as the deserving. Both of these systems are bad in their effect upon the morale of the departments. Can not there be a system by which the clerk will occupy something like solid ground and have every incentive to do his work? It demoralizes the service when a man works hard and is denied an increase, while an increase is given to another who works no harder.

Mr. McNEILL. I would like to ask one question before six o'clock to save time—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

The Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 31) to incorporate the Lake Bennett and Klondike Railway and Tramway Company.—(Mr. Haggart.)

Bill (No. 47) respecting the Brandon and South-western Railway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Mr. FOSTER.

NAKUSP AND SLOCAN RAILWAY.

The House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 52) respecting the Nakusp and Slocan Railway Company.—(Mr. McPherson.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BOSTOCK. I had given notice of a clause to be added to this Bill in order to protect the interests of the mine owners in that part of the country in the event of the competition between the Nakusp and Slocan Railway and the Kaslo and Slocan Railway, after this branch is built, resulting in the Kaslo and Slocan Railway being practically driven out of business. My object was to protect these people in that part of the country from being left at the mercy of one railway after the other was practically knocked out. But I may say that after I had drafted this amendment and had it placed on the Order paper, the matter was brought to my notice, and it was shown to me that in the way this clause was drafted it would cause a hardship and an unfairness to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. As I had no intention of proposing anything that would be unfair or unjust to that company in any way, my only object being to protect the interests of the miners and the mine owners in the country in the event of competition between these two lines resulting in the transport trade of that part of the country being left in the hands of one railway. I think it will be better not to press this amendment. But I desired to take advantage of this occasion to make a few remarks in order to point out to this House the danger that may possibly arise under this Bill which is now before the House.

Bill reported, and read a third time, and passed.

DAWSON CITY ELECTRIC LIGHTING AND TRAMWAY COMPANY.

Bill (No. 118) to incorporate the Dawson City Electric Lighting and Tramway Company, was read a second time.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Mr. SPEAKER. With respect to referring this Bill to the proper committee, I find that although it is a Bill to incorporate a Tramway Company, they do not propose to ask for any powers of expropriation under the Railway Act. I therefore think it will be properly referred to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Bill referred to Select Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 119) to incorporate the Dawson City and Victoria Telegraph Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 120) respecting the North American Telegraph Company.—(Mr. Hurley.)

SUPPLY.

The House again resolved into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McNEILL. I desire to ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce a question. We have heard a great deal regarding the opinion given by the law officers with respect to the construction of the Civil Service Act, especially the opinion of the law officers at the time Sir Oliver Mowat was Minister of Justice. I do not suppose it is a matter of very much importance as to who was Minister at the moment, but as that fact has been referred to, I should like to ask the hon. Minister whether it be a fact that Sir Oliver Mowat, as Minister of Justice, advised that under the Act those who were entitled to a statutory increase were only those who were especially deserving?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). What the Minister of Justice advised, to the best of my recollection, was this, that there was no right under the statute for any increase, that it was a matter resting at the discretion of the Government.

Mr. McNEILL. It is very evident that a Deputy Minister or head of a department and the members of the Council could block the statutory increases, but I do not think that view in the slightest degree meets the point which we have been endeavouring to impress on the committee, which is that the Act had in contemplation that every man who performed his duties properly as a civil servant, was entitled to a statutory increase. It is perfectly true it was made necessary under the Act for the protection of the country and of the employees that men who are not performing their duties should not obtain this increase, and therefore the Deputy Minister makes the recommendation, the Minister approves and the order is passed by Council. But what I want to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who has kindly discussed this matter with me, is whether he thinks in equity it is right to take advantage of a technicality of that kind, and whether he does not think and know that when the Act was passed it was intended that every civil servant who discharged his duties should receive the statutory increase. Does he really think that it would have been a right thing under the Act for a Deputy Minister to have refused to recommend. Suppose all the men in a department were performing their duties properly, would it be carrying out the spirit of the Act if the Deputy Minister refused to recommend the statutory increases? And yet if he did not make the recommendation, those men could not obtain the statutory increases. I admit there is the legal technicality. I commenced my argument by saying that the Government might take advantage of the legal technicality, but that Canada was under a moral obligation to pay these men the statutory increase under a well understood and definite arrangement. It is all very well to say that strictly under the law you can get out of your moral obligation; but that is not meeting the point put forward. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, who discussed the question with the greatest possible perspicacity and good taste, gave another reason why it should not be done. He said it would cost a great deal of money if the country carried out its obligation and contract with the civil servants. Is the honour of Canada so cheap as to be bought with $100,000, for that is what it comes to? The question is, are we in honour bound?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. We do not admit the obligation in the slightest degree.

Mr. McNEILL. The fact that we may be able, by resorting to a legal technicality, to absolve ourselves from an honourable obligation into which we have entered is one thing, but if the country is honour bound to give this statutory increase, that is another thing.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That is what we deny. I may say that is exactly what we utterly repudiate. We utterly repudiate the idea that the country is bound to give one cent.

Mr. McNEILL. Does the hon. gentleman mean honourably?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Either morally, equitably, honourably or any other way.

Mr. McNEILL. Then, I venture to say that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) will find that the country will not agree with him in that. The only argument that has been adduced is not an argument as to moral obligation at all, but it is an argument as to this mere legal technicality. I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he will say that he believes, that, under this Act, the man who discharges his duty as a civil servant properly and well, is not entitled to a statutory increase. I will ask the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies), whether he does not think that these men who did discharge their duty properly, should have the statutory increase. I do not want any legal technicality now; I want to know what the hon. gentleman considers is the meaning of the Act.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. As I said this afternoon, I do not think that was the spirit or intention of the Act as it was passed. I said I thought the practice had been to prostitute the Act, so that many men during the last few years, before this Government came into power, received statutory increases who ought not to receive them, according to the spirit and intention of the Act. I do not give any dogmatic opinion on it, but my judgment, after a good deal of consideration, was, in accordance with the judgment of Sir Oliver Mowat, that it was a discretionary matter, which the Minister was responsible for exercising in each department. I do not think that a civil servant who fairly discharges his duty is necessarily entitled to a statutory increase. Numbers of men may discharge their duties fairly well from year's end to year's end who do not necessarily become entitled to the increase. The presumption is, that a man gets what his services are worth, and I do not think he is entitled to a statutory increase, under this particular section, unless the deputy, and the Minister after him, report that his services are of such a special kind that they would entitle him to this increase.

Mr. IVES. Does the discretion exist, if the servant has deserved the statutory increase and has performed his duties faithfully and well, or is the discretion limited to granting it or not granting it in cases where the servant is entitled to it on the report of the deputy?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think the Minister is bound to follow the deputy. The judgment which the Minister is bound to exercise is not a capricious judgment at all.

Mr. IVES. Under the statute, does the Minister have discretion as between those deserving of the statutory increase?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman assumes the very point in issue. The Minister, before he can concur in the report of the deputy, must exercise his judgment. He cannot do that capriciously, but he must bring his mind to bear on the facts. That involves ministerial responsibility and discretion, and, therefore, it appears to me beyond argument that the increase does not go as a matter of course.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) has answered the question, so far as that is concerned. I never for a moment suggested that the Minister was not to exercise his discretion. I say, this clause is put here for the protection of the public, in order that men who are not deserving should not get the increase, but I say also, that the deserving man is entitled to the increase under the Act, and if Council does not give it to him, or if the Minister does not give it to him, or if the deputy does not recommend it, they are violating the spirit of the Act. You cannot go on reading out of the Act these clauses which lay down in a most explicit way, that the increase shall be given.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Read the sections together.

Mr. McNEILL. Of course, you must read them together, but you cannot read them together in the sense my hon. friend lays down. If all these clauses were put in the Act to express merely what my hon. friend suggests, it makes the Act ridiculous, because all that could have been said in a very short clause. Here is what is explicitly laid down in the law:

The minimum salary of a third-class clerk shall be $400 per annum, with an annual increase of $50 up to $1,000.

In face of this explicit declaration, the Minister says that the official is not to have this increase.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Act says he is not to have it.

Mr. McNEILL. The Act does not say so. The Act says that there are certain conditions precedent to his having it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Act is in the negative; it says that no officer shall receive it unless certain conditions precedent are complied with.

Mr. McNEILL. Exactly; but does my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) say that the Act would be complied with, if all these men in the service had been properly discharging their duties, and the Deputy Minister refused to report in favour of the statutory increases? That argument goes so far as to say that the Act would have been complied with, if not one of these men got a dollar of statutory increase from the day that Act was put upon the Statute-book, although all were discharging their duties well. Does the Minister say that would be in accordance with the spirit of the Act?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) cross-questions me upon it, I suppose I must answer. If the Act, in so many words, declares that no such increase shall be granted unless the Minister and the deputy report in favour of it, and the Council concur in that report, then, unless those three things come about, you cannot get the increase.

Mr. McNEILL. I may, then, leave the matter as it stands between the Minister and myself. The hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) contends that the spirit of this Act is complied with, if no civil servant got a statutory increase at all. His contention goes to the extent, that, if from the passing of this Act until the present moment, not a single civil servant in Canada had got statutory increase, although they had all discharged their duties efficiently and well, the spirit of the Act would be complied with. There is the difference between my hon. friend and myself, and I am glad it comes down to that point. I say, the spirit of the Act would have been violated; my hon. friend says the spirit of the Act would be complied with, under those circumstances.

and I am quite willing to leave the matter at that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend is going to leave that there. I just put this point to him: The Act singles out two high officials in whom it places certain discretionary power, to be exercised, not capriciously, but judiciously. They are selected because they occupy positions from which they are supposed to judge properly, and they have to report to Council whether in their opinion any individual officer is entitled to the increase—deserves it. If they do not report in his favour, he cannot get the increase; there can be no question about that.

Mr. McNEILL. We know he cannot get the increase; there is no difference between us as to that. But the question is whether, supposing these men had discharged their duties efficiently and well, the spirit of the Act would be complied with if no civil servant in Canada got the increase which the Act says they should get; or whether, when this Act was put on the Statute-book, it contemplated giving to the civil servant who discharged his duties faithfully and well, the statutory increase of $50 a year.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I go further than that. Suppose there had even been a report in favour of an increase from the deputy, and the Council thought that the man was already receiving as much or more than he ought to receive, they would not be justified either by the spirit or the letter of the Act in giving him the increase.

Mr. McNEILL. That is another matter. We will just keep the matter where it is between my hon. friend and myself. The hon. gentleman says that the Civil Service Act would be complied with if, from the moment the Act was put on the Statute-book, not a civil servant of Canada ever got a statutory increase, no matter how efficiently or well he discharged his duties. When my hon. friend says that the Act had been abused, that men had been recommended for statutory increases who did not deserve them, that is another matter altogether. That may be true, and it would be right that that should be put an end to; men who have not been discharging their duties properly should not get the statutory increase. I think that is what the Act meant; and in that respect the Act should be more rigorously enforced than before. But that does not touch the question between my hon. friend and myself at all; and I am quite satisfied to leave the matter as it is at present between us.

Mr. QUINN. I would like to say a word on this question, which is probably one of the most important questions that we may have to debate. I do not quite agree with anything that has been said in the present debate. I take a different reading of the statute altogether to any that I have heard, certainly different from hon. gentlemen opposite. I would like to have had an expression of opinion from the Department of Justice on this question; I think the House is entitled to that. It is all very well for us to be told that Sir Oliver Mowat said this, that or the other thing on a certain occasion; but unfortunately he is not here. But we have the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) here representing the Department of Justice, and I have waited until this late hour in the hope that he would give us his opinion, to which I would bow at once. I have nothing to say of the opinion given by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He is a lawyer, but he is not saddled with the responsibility of a legal opinion in this House; therefore, his opinion on a point of law only carries the importance of that of a prominent lawyer; it is not as important as an opinion coming from the Department of Justice. Now, I take it that the Civil Service Act was passed for one object, that is, to secure permanency in the civil service, and to secure the public employees from possible interference, either on political or other grounds, that would deprive them of the benefit of their appointments. The civil service is not the same as ordinary mercantile employment. A bookkeeper, who is dissatisfied with his employment, or with the salary he is receiving, in a mercantile house, may give up his engagement and go to another mercantile house. But the civil servant cannot do that. There is only one power in Canada that employs civil servants, that is, the Dominion Government; so that the civil servant requires that there should be some permanency in his employment, in order that he should accept it and work diligently in it. In order to secure that permanency, the Dominion Parliament passed the Civil Service Act, and in order to secure the best persons possible to fill the positions in the service, certain clauses were incorporated in that Act—sections 16, 17, 18, 19 and 20. Either section 16, section 18, or section 20 will be sufficient for the purposes of the argument, because they are almost word for word, referring to chief clerks, first-class clerks, and second-class clerks. Take section 20:

The minimum salary of a second-class clerk shall be one thousand one hundred dollars per annum, with an annual increase of fifty dollars up to a maximum of one thousand four hundred dollars.

Now, nobody will pretend that a second-class clerk could be appointed at a salary of $900, because that would be in direct contravention of the Act, which provides that the minimum salary shall be $1,100. The word "shall" there is imperative; it is not permissive. The minimum salary shall be $1,100, with an annual increase of $50; that is, there shall be an annual increase of $50—"shall" is carried through the sentence. So that this section is imperative: the minimum salary shall be $1,100, and there shall be an annual increase of $50 until the maximum is reached. Every second-class clerk comes under this section; he is subject to all the disabilities and is entitled to all the privileges of the section. Then there is a mode set down in the Act by which this increase shall be administered, and that we find in section 26. This is not a governing section, it is merely directory, defining the powers of the deputy head, the head of the department, and the Council in this regard, and what does it say:

No officer, clerk or employee shall receive any increase of salary except by Order in Council passed on the report of the deputy head, concurred in by the head of the department, stating that such officer, clerk or employee is deserving of such increase.

There is no such word here as "specially deserving," all that is necessary is that he should be deserving. There is no question here about whether the Government wishes to economize or not; that is not part of this Act. It is not made discretionary with the Government as a matter of economy; but by the law the civil servant is entitled to his increase if he be deserving. This clause then is merely directory. That is, the deputy head is bound to report to the head of the department whether the civil servants in his department are deserving of the increase. Then the Minister has to bring the matter before the Council in order to have the increase granted. That is the law. What is the recourse of the civil servant, in the event of this law not being carried out? It is the recourse he has here to-night. The Estimates come down, and we find that men who are admittedly deserving of the increase do not all get it. One of them gets it and the other does not. What is the recourse of that one? It is to ask the Minister: Why did you not carry out the law? What does the word "deserving" mean? I lay down the general principle that any man in the employ of the civil service is entitled by law to his increase, but of course there may be circumstances which would disentitle him to his right, as, for example, if he had been notably inattentive to his duties. Then, the matter would be reported by the deputy to the head of the department, and the head of the department would refuse to recommend the increase to the council and no Order in Council would be passed. Then, when the Estimates come down, and it is found that out of thirteen clerks entitled to the statutory increase, only twelve received it, the Minister could be called on to say why it was refused to the thirteenth. The Minister would reply: Here is a report against him; he was not deserving of it.

Then we come to subsection 2 of section 26:

The increase of salary of any officer, clerk or employee, authorized under this Act for the current year, may be suspended by the head of the department for neglect of duty or misconduct, and may be subsequently restored by such head, but without arrears.

That does not mean that no deputy head has the right to refuse to report in favour of his clerk, but it means that notwithstanding the fact that the law says he shall receive his statutory increase, and notwithstanding even the fact that an Order in Council has been passed granting it to him, the increase may be suspended by the head of the department for good and sufficient reasons. Therefore, I conclude that there can be no question as to the right of the civil servant to the increase where there is no report against him. The statute declares that the increase is due, as a matter of law, to every public employee, and that it can be taken from him only for cause shown, and that the man who refuses to grant it is responsible and answerable to Parliament for his refusal. He is bound to give Parliament a reason for refusing it, or he is not doing his duty. That may be a very light thing, and a majority of Parliament may at any time do an injustice, but it will not save the Minister from the responsibility of having acted unjustly, whatever the vote of the House may be. In this instance, no reason having been given by the Minister why one should receive the increase and the other should not, the general public opinion must be that the one who did not receive it has been very badly treated.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I quite agree with my hon. friend in his construction of the second paragraph of section 26, but I beg to differ from him in the construction he has put upon the words "annual increase" in section 20. I shall take the same section as he did, and endeavour to state, as briefly and clearly as I can, the construction that I put upon this section 20:

The minimum salary of a second-class clerk shall be $1,000 per annum, with an annual increase of $50 up to a maximum of $1,400.

The words that it is necessary to consider here are the words, "with an annual increase of $50." Now, the whole question turns upon this. Under section 20, does the law operate automatically? If there were no other section, would the effect of section 20 be that each year a second-class clerk would be entitled to receive the sum of $50 increase up to the maximum salary of $1,400? My answer is yes, it would. But now we come to section 26, and with regard to that section I differ from my learned friend in this respect, that I say it is a governing section. I said a moment ago that the words important to construe are the words, "with an annual increase." What does section 26 say:

No officer, clerk or employee shall receive any increase—

Therefore, section 26 governs the preceding section, and the effect of it is, in my judgment, that no officer, however he may be entitled to it under the preceding section, shall receive the annual increase unless the deputy head reports that he is entitled to it and unless that report is concurred in by the head of the department, and finally sanctioned by the Governor in Council.

Mr. QUINN. If my hon. friend would permit, what is that report to be—that he is deserving?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The report from the deputy head, I will grant, may be that he is deserving of the increase, and in that report the head of the department may concur, but there may be reasons, in the opinion of the Governor in Council—reasons of public necessity, such as, for instance, the condition of the public exchequer—which may make it imperative on the part of the Governor in Council to refuse the increase. In a word, section 26 puts upon the Governor in Council the exercise of the discretion which they alone can exercise, and for which they are responsible to the public. Surely you will not contend that the head of the department, with the assistance of the deputy head, can impose on the exchequer this burden if the Governor in Council is not of the opinion that it should be imposed. But the discretion of the Governor in Council must be exercised in the last resort. I say in this case, and I concur in what has fallen from the lips of the hon. member for York, the merits or demerits of the employee must be ascertained by he who is in direct and daily contact with him and knows his capacity. And he having made his report to the head of the department, the head of the department, in his turn, has a discretion to exercise, to say whether he concurs in the report of the deputy. And I think that the Governor in Council is there also for some purpose. Why is he called upon to act if he has no discretion?

Mr. QUINN. If my hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will allow me, I will answer that.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If it is unautomatic, it is unnecessary.

Mr. QUINN. It is in order to the permanency of the Act—that is the reason he is there.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That gives away the whole case. The Order in Council is necessary for what? Does it operate automatically, or must it be exercised with discretion on the part of those who pass it. It requires discretion that must be exercised in the last resort. I give my construction of the statute, and it is for gentlemen on both sides to put a value upon it. I give it because I have been called upon to do so. My view is that section 26 makes it necessary that some person, having the knowledge of the duties performed by the employee should report to the head of the department that these duties have been fulfilled in such a way as to entitle that employee to his annual increase. And then there is a discretion to be exercised by the head of the department which must be exercised by him, I think, according to the honest view of the case that he ought to entertain, and I think no head of a department would be justified in lightly setting aside the report of the deputy head, because he is the person who is best in a position to ascertain the merits of the employee. But after that is done, even if the head of the department concur with the deputy head, the whole matter must be submitted to the Governor in Council, and that is the last tribunal to which he must have recourse, and that is the tribunal that is responsible to Parliament for the exercise of discretion both by the deputy head and by the head of the department.

Mr. QUINN. I desire to say a few words in answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I am glad to see that he takes the interest he does in this matter and that he has given me the information, for which I am very much indebted. As regards the Order in Council, we know that the Department of Railways cannot pay a contractor even a proportion of the amount due him for work done, on the certificates given, unless an Order in Council is passed. An ordinary employee of a merchant, if his salary is increased, is really under a new engagement. And so with the civil servants; and the Order in Council is to consecrate by a new engagement the increase of salary given to the employee. It is a new engagement made by him. That is the object of the Order in Council. I deny what my hon. friend says about the discretion of the Minister. I say the discretion is the one thing of which the Civil Service Act deprives the Ministry. They are bound to do this, and they are answerable to Parliament if they do not do it, they are bound to give explanations in Parliament if they fail in their duty as regards the most insignificant officer of the civil service. Let us read this section 26 in a new way, first as it is in the statute:

No officer, clerk or employee shall receive any increase of salary except by Order in Council passed on the report of the deputy head concurred in by the head of the department, stating that such officer, clerk or employee is—

What?

—is deserving of such increase.

What is it that is necessary? As a matter of fact, once it is established by the deputy head of the department that he is deserving of that increase, the Order in Council as of necessity follows. Now let us read it another way. What is the converse of it? It is this: Every officer, clerk or employee shall receive an increase of salary by Order in Council passed on report of the deputy head, concurred in by the head of the department, stating that such officer, clerk or employee is deserving of such increase. Now, my hon. friend says that there is, after all, an appeal to the Governor in Council. I say there is no such thing. Reasons of public importance, forsooth. Condition of the exchequer. The Government of Canada is supposed, when they passed this statute, to have been in a position to pay these increases. The Parliament of Canada is here sitting at the present time for the purpose of voting the supplies to pay these increases of salary. This Act was not passed in a blind manner by the Parliament of Canada, but it was passed as a living Act to conduct public affairs, and it was passed as well, we must remember, for the protection of these employees as for the protection of the exchequer of Canada. So when my hon. friend says there may be public reasons, reasons of public importance, the condition of the exchequer and so on, which might induce the Governor in Council, notwithstanding the advice of the Minister, to refuse to increase the salary of the civil servant, I cannot follow him that far. I regret, of course, to differ with my hon. friend the Solicitor General, but his argument, though very able and very good special pleading, has not convinced me that my view of the matter is wrong, and I still adhere to it. And I would ask the Minister of Finance to give the reason, now that he has had time to find out why the second clerk does not get the $50 increase as well as the first.

Mr. MONK. I do not pretend to decide between the opinions put forward by the hon. the Solicitor General and my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Quinn). But what I wish to draw the attention of Parliament to is the difference between the law as laid down by the Solicitor General and the answers given this afternoon by the gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches to repeated questions from this side as to what was the system followed in granting the increases in the several departments, and what, in particular, had been the system followed with regard to these two clerks in the Governor General's Department. So far as my own opinion may be worth anything, I should be inclined, I must confess, to support the proposition that under section 26, even after a favourable report has been made by the deputy head of the department and that report has been concurred in by the head of the department, the Council would still be at liberty to refuse the increase. I think that a different interpretation might lead to a great deal of confusion in the carrying out of this section with regard to increases. I do not think that the law works automatically. But, under section 26, conditions are imposed upon the granting of the increase. The first of these conditions is a favourable report from the deputy head, and that must be concurred in by the head of the department. And I really believe that as section 26 ought to be read, after these formalities have been complied with, the Governor in Council is still there to decide as to whether these reports shall be acted upon. But what took up a great deal of time this afternoon, it seems to me, was the repeated queries from this side as to what system had been adopted by the Government. That is what we want to know. Are the provisions of section 26 carried out? For instance, in regard to the matter under discussion, were the formalities pointed out as necessary by the Solicitor General followed? Was there a report by the deputy head, and was it concurred in by the head of the department? And, if so, why was it not acted upon by the Governor in Council? It is here, it seems to me, that our right begins, for we are entitled to say to the Government: Why do you, in the face of the fulfilment of these formalities, in the face of a recommendation of the deputy head concurred in by the head of the department, increase one man and not another, and we are entitled to know the reason. And that is precisely what we failed to apprehend this afternoon. But I took particular care to notice that of those gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches who spoke, the Minister of Finance only stated that the increases were made upon the determination of the head of the department, which is absolutely contrary to this section 26. Now, I think the Government will save considerable time if, at this stage, it tells us exactly whether in all the departments the provisions of section 26 are observed, and then when we come to face the increases, if there are many in the different departments, we will be entitled to know from the Government what the reports are in regard to the employees of the civil service, and what the state reasons are which prevent the Government from acting upon these reports and giving the increase which the civil servants were entitled to.

Mr. QUINN. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) agrees with me perfectly when he says it is a moral duty on the part of the deputy head to make his report if the officer is deserving, and it is a moral duty on the part of the head of the department to concur if the report is favourable, and it is the moral duty of the Governor in Council to pass this, unless there is some objection to it. That is the argument of my learned friend, and it is my argument in a nutshell. I say the deputy head is bound, both by law and morally, to make his report independent of every other consideration except whether the man is deserving or not. That is the only thing that he has to consider. In the next place the head of the department is bound to concur in it, and in the ordinary course of events, he must bring that before Council. When we find that has not been done, then the duty of Parliament comes in. I say it is our duty now, a duty that weighs just as heavily upon us as upon the head of a department, to inquire from the Minister, and it is his duty to answer, why the other officer in this department has not received his statutory increase. Is it because the Dominion of Canada finds that it is impossible to saddle $50 more per annum upon it? Is it because the head of the department has refused to concur in the report of the deputy head, or is it because the deputy head has refused to obey the law and to make a favourable report, or finally, is it because the servant has not been deserving of the increase? That is what we want to know.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not want to be discourteous to my hon. friend. First of all, I have to say that our view of what is the law differs from his, so that we cannot agree with him.

Mr. QUINN. Does the Solicitor General agree with me?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Solicitor General does not agree with my hon. friend, nor does any other member on this side of the House of the legal profession, so far as I know. My hon. friend insists that this is law, and bases his statement on something that somebody else has told him. As we are advised, it is not the law, and we do not feel bound to answer the hon. gentleman in the terms of his request. I have already stated that to the best of my knowledge no recommendation has been made for any increase that has not been recommended by a deputy head, where there is a deputy head. But if the hon. gentleman means that in every case where no increase is given we are to be catechised as to why we did not give an increase to that particular individual, all I can say is that that is not our view of the law, and I am afraid that we shall not be able to accommodate the hon. gentleman and give him the answer exactly as he requests.

Mr. INGRAM. Will the Minister say whether the clerk asked for the advance?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not know, but I have no doubt they would all be very much pleased to have it.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I do not wish to say anything unnecessarily to prolong this debate. I apprehend, however, that if my hon. friend the Solicitor General, who has been practicing law in the province of Quebec and is entitled to practice law in the province of Ontario, had been appealed to on behalf of a civil service employee as to what his interpretation of this law was six months ago, or one year ago, it would have been such as the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Quinn) has explained. No one supposes that what the Solicitor General says as to section 20 providing for this automatic increase, is the case. I do not for one moment suppose it is. But on reading section 26 it is plain that if an employee in any department is deserving of that statutory increase which was a part of his agreement with the Government when he entered into their service, it is the duty of the deputy head of that department to state so frankly as pointed out by the law. Then it is equally the duty of the head of the department to approve of that, and take that to Council. No one supposes that the Governor in Council is bound to act upon it even then; no one supposes that there is not discretion in the Governor in Council to grant it arbitrarily if they choose. However, if there is an arbitrary dismissal of any report, or if the Governor in Council declines to act upon that report, it is my humble opinion that this Parliament has a right to call for that report, this Parliament has a right to judge of the action of the Governor in Council upon this as well as upon any other question that comes before Council and is determined by it. I apprehend that is the only question at issue between the parties here to-day. From what I have heard I do not believe that the question will drop here, as the Government propose that it shall, unless something further is given to this side of the House more satisfactory as to what the policy of the Government is going to be towards the civil service of this country, whether the civil service is to be at the caprice, I will say, of any Minister of this Government or of any other Government. The hon. gentlemen are not going to remain in their present places for ever. When an official entered into the service of this Government there was a plain bargain that, though he entered upon the minimum salary of a third-class clerk or a second-class clerk, if he behaved himself, he had a right to expect every year there would be a certain increase. Now you repeal this enactment without stating what your policy is to be except that you alone will arbitrarily decide whether any clerk shall have his increase. If that is to be the position taken by the Government, all I can say is that it is one of the most arbitrary, I believe, that any Government has ever taken with regard to the civil service of this country.

Mr. MONK. I wish to press my question, because the Minister of Finance refused to answer my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Quinn) on the ground that his interpretation of the law did not agree with that of the Solicitor General. My interpretation does agree with it, therefore, I expect him to give me an answer. I think it is treating us in a very arbitrary manner to ask for a vote upon this item when we are not informed what reason has prompted the Government to withhold an increase in one instance when there has been a favourable report by the deputy and by the head of the department, and to give the increase in another instance. Suppose ten clerks are employed in the department, and favourable reports are sent in by deputy heads respecting five of them, is this committee to be asked to vote statutory increases, under the interpretation of the Act submitted by the Solicitor General, to those five clerks and refuse it to the others, and not know the reason why? I would not vote on such information as that.

Mr. McNEILL. Irrespective of the legal argument that is going on across the floor—in which, I think, the right side is our side—I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Minister of Trade and Commerce to this other view of the question. The hon. Minister of Marine has stated, that the statutory increase cannot be demanded by members of the civil service as a right. The hon. gentleman knows, as well as he knows he is sitting in his seat, that members of the civil service who entered the service in years past, entered it with the understanding, and in the belief, that they were entitled to this statutory increase; and under these circumstances to deprive them of the statutory increase on the ground—to put it at its highest point—that there is a doubtful question of law involved, is an immoral act on the part of Parliament, and it is something that Canada should be ashamed of.

Mr. QUINN. The Minister of Finance refuses to give information, because he does not appear to look at the Act eye to eye with me. Yet the Minister is in this position, that he is no more independent than I am, because he is asking me to vote $50, when I do not know what it is for—$50 of an increase to a man of whom I know nothing, and as to whose good conduct and deserts I have no information. And yet, because the hon. gentleman happens to have a majority on whom he can rely, he refuses to furnish the information to which I am entitled. That is not a proper spirit in which the Finance Minister should approach the subject. I should not like to set myself up as being able to teach the Finance Minister anything in parliamentary procedure or parliamentary debate, but I cannot help saying, as a young member, that I hardly expected to be so treated by a Minister of the Crown, when we are discussing a question with the light we possess. I am entitled to information as to why this officer is to get an increase, and his colleague in the same department is not to receive an increase. All we know is, that the statute is there. The Minister, in one case, invokes the statute for the purpose of giving $50 increase to an officer, and he invokes it again in order not to give another officer an increase. Why this discrimination? I cannot help looking upon this case as one of those cases in which it is intended that the Act should prevent the possibility of any political discrimination. When an hon. gentleman pointed out that the beneficiary in this case happened to belong to the same political party as the Minister of Finance, it was a very convincing argument with me, and I am afraid it was also with the Minister.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I told the hon. gentleman that I never heard what the politics of the gentleman were until an hon. member mentioned them to-day. I have not even the pleasure of knowing the gentleman, which is a great disadvantage to me. It was not from any desire not to be courteous to an hon. member, that I did not repeat my statement half a dozen times. Some members appear to think it is desirable to do so, but I think that, if I state the matter clearly once, I should not be asked to repeat my statement. I stated to the hon. gentleman, or to some other hon. member, that this particular officer is to receive this increase because, in the judgment of the Government, he is a specially meritorious person. That does not lead me into a discussion as to why a number of other officers do not receive increases, because, as we are not proposing a vote in any of those cases, they stand in a somewhat different position. We are bound to give information when we propose to grant increases, but not in the cases of other officers. It is the difference between proving the affirmative and the negative.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. Minister should not refuse to give this information. He says it is proposed to give Mr. Walker the increase for special meritorious reasons. Will he detail to the House what those reasons are?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I cannot. I simply say that the chief officer recommended him to the Government, that Council adopted and confirmed the recommendation, but I cannot give the hon. gentleman details of the various services he rendered.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. Minister places himself in this position—and he might as well confess it first as last—he does not know.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Indeed, I do not.

Mr. FOSTER. Between two persons the Government pick and choose; they give $50 increase to one man, and refuse to give a like increase to his colleague. The hon. gentleman does not tell the committee what point of merit the one officer possessed that he should receive the increase, and he confessed he did not know anything about it. He does not put on the Table the report containing the recommendation on which action was taken, the report, not of a deputy head, but of the secretary of the branch.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The head of the branch.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman does not put the report before the committee.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Was it ever done?

Mr. FOSTER. Was there ever a Government that undertook to pick and choose in this way?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen opposite have changed the conditions, and, when they are no longer going to give every deserving officer the statutory increase, but they are going to pick out the persons they think deserving, and take the responsibility, we ask them to give the committee the foundations for judging as to their action, and thus be able to place the responsibility where it belongs. What have we got? Nothing but a statement from the Finance Minister equal to this: I know nothing about the man; I never met him; I know nothing about his work or as to why he should receive $50 increase. We say: Who asked that the increase be made? The hon. gentleman replies, that the head of the department recommended it. Then, let us have the report of the head of the department and ascertain the meritorious points of Mr. Walker, who is to receive this increase, while his colleague is not mentioned. We have a perfect right to ask for that report. If hon. gentlemen are going to pick and choose and assume the responsibility, let them give us the grounds on which they pick and choose.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The grounds are, that we are advised by the competent party to judge, that the man has done his duty specially well.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the competent authority given the Government information that the other man has not done his duty well?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is nothing about him.

Mr. FOSTER. On what points has the recommendation been made?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is simply as to one man.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Move to strike it out.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the head of the department mentions that A deserves special recommendation, and does not say anything about B, how can we bring down anything about B?

Mr. FOSTER. But you can bring down something about A.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We have told you.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Solicitor General laid down anything as the basis of his argument, it was, that in justice to the civil service, under this Act, you were bound to have a report from the deputy head. I appeal to the hon. gentleman, if he did not take that position. What ground is there for fair and even-handed justice to the civil service employees in the department, if the deputy is able to refuse to report? The Solicitor General saw the point, and made it strongly, that, in order to carry out the Act honestly, it is the duty of the deputy to report upon those officers to his Minister, and then the Minister may concur and carry the recommendation through Council, and Council is the arbiter. Are hon. gentlemen going to set aside that law, with its moral obligation, and make it abortive by saying to deputy heads, that they need not do anything? If so, a civil servant is powerless. When a young man engages to enter the civil service of Canada, he does not come up here under an engagement to receive $1,000 per annum as a second-class clerk. He comes up here on a system of graded salaries; graded with superannuation abatement; graded with certain increases to come according to desert, and his salary is not fixed at the simple $1,000, but it is fixed at a beginning of $1,000 and an increase of $50 each year, under certain conditions. Keep your deputy from reporting and you nullify that condition, and you break your contract under which you engaged your civil servant. Then, we are told that it is the duty of the deputy head to report. Shall he report on a favourite of his? No, he shall report on all, and it is the only fair and just way. Shall the deputy head pick out his favourites; for deputy heads do have their favourites; I know it. Deputy heads are mortal men the same as Ministers, and as Ministers have their favourites, so will the deputy heads, and the only fair thing for the service is that the deputy head shall be asked to report on all, and the Minister can take the onus of picking and choosing if he likes. The fact of the case is that these hon. gentlemen opposite have not a report from one single deputy head. The fact is, that the Minister of Finance knows nothing about it, so far as these increases are concerned. He is the medium through which they are brought and he asks us to vote $50 for one man and nothing for the other man who is a colleague of this fortunate clerk. Are these gentlemen on the Treasury benches going to be fair to the civil servants, or are they not? Are they going to be fair to Parliament or are they not? If they are going to take this absolute and arbitrary responsibility, let them give us the ground so that we can say whether their responsibility is rightly assumed. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) cannot get away from that ground, and I am quite certain the Solicitor General would not attempt to get away from it.

The CHAIRMAN. Shall this item be carried ?

Mr. DAVIN. No, Sir, because I am about to bring before the House the opinion on this subject of a great lawyer who was at one time highly respected by hon. gentlemen opposite. With reference to the opinion we have had from the Solicitor General, it may be described as this : that he agrees entirely with the interpretation of the law that came from this side of the House, qualified by the statement that there might occur an instance where the Government of Canada would have to make a declaration of bankruptcy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIN. That is it. The Muscovite Government has been characterized as a despotism qualified by assassination. This law is a law guaranteeing, as a matter of course, increases of salary to the civil servants of Canada, and in the opinion of the Solicitor General it is qualified by the possibility that there might come a time when, if these $50 increases were granted, the Government would have to make a declaration of bankruptcy, and say that the condition of public funds would not allow them to do it. When the Act was before Parliament in 1885, the Postmaster General took a hand in the debate, and even the Minister of Marine, who can take so convenient a view of a legal question, took a hand in. But, Sir, greater than either of these took a hand in, and that was the Hon. Edward Blake. When this very clause granting the statutory increases was before the House, the following occurred :

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). The late Act makes no provision for the annual increase of $50.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friend has not read the amendment to Victoria 46.

Mr. BLAKE. This has been amended by providing for the annual increase of $50.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It has.

Mr. BLAKE—

Now, Sir, observe the opinion of this great lawyer, Mr. Blake, who stood so high in Canada, and who has justified the statement I made, when asked about him in 1872, that if he were to go to London, he could stand up to the greatest man in Westminster Hall or the greatest man in Chancery Lane. Mr. Blake has gone over and he has taken the very highest position at the English bar. He does not say that this is an elastic clause, which gives a discretion.

Mr. QUINN. He was ex-Minister of Justice at the time.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, well, he has gone higher than the Minister of Justice since. Mr. Blake says :

In pursuance of the notice which I gave in the course of the debate, I rise to call attention to those parts of this measure which prescribe once again the principle on which the salaries and promotion in the civil service have been and are to be regulated. The subject is one of very great gravity, in view of the enormous increase which has taken place and is taking place in the cost of the service, and added gravity is attached to this particular part of the system to which I desire to call attention, by the official statement which was made in the earlier part of the session, as to the effect of the law which we are asked once again to consecrate by the third reading of the Bill. In the Budget debate, on the 3rd of March last, the Finance Minister adverted to the expenditure for civil government in these words :
Mr. FOSTER.

"While the expenditure for civil government for 1877-78 was $823,369, last year it was $1,584,417, or an increase of $261,047."

Mr. CASGRAIN. Hear, hear.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The hon. gentleman says hear, hear. I do not wonder at it, because hon. gentlemen opposite have made this one of the great charges against the Administration throughout the length and breadth of the country, to prove the extravagance of the Administration. Now, I desire to call the attention of the House to the facts as regards the cost, to the circumstances that have led to this increase of $61,000 in six years. One of the difficulties that every Government must experience in preparing the civil service estimate is the increase that is inevitable under the provision of the Civil Service Act, by which a very large proportion of the employees receive each a yearly increase of $50. This increase for the last six years is estimated as follows :—It is estimated that 420 of the civil service employees have received an increase of $50 each year, and each year since 1877-78, that is during six years, or a total increase of salary to each employee of $300. That amount for 420 civil servants gives $1,275,000 of an increase.

Now, Sir, there is an addition of $126,000 a year to the cost of the civil service. And that addition does not stop there ; it is progressive. Under this law it is to be progressive, and you have already accumulated under the law an addition which represents a capital charge of more than $3,000,000.

Could anything be more explicit than that as to the view which the Hon. Edward Blake took as to the significance of this law ? Again, Mr. Blake says :

But, Sir, the practical operation of the law, which was passed in conformity with the recommendations of the commission, and which has not worked in conformity with those recommendations, is that there are these increases and these promotions going on steadily.

He says further :

That the mischiefs to which I refer still prevail, and they prevail to this extent, as the Finance Minister sums up the case, that 420 out of the civil servants of the country have, within the last six years, received increases which make them now in receipt of $300 a year by virtue of these $50 increases apart from the promotion increases, or a total of $126,000 a year, which would be equal to the average wages of 420 mechanics with families.

He goes on further :

I maintain that it ought to be changed ; I maintain that the system is a bad one. In those cases in which you give increases, the increases ought not, in my opinion, to be given as this law gives them.

Not as the Government have interpreted the law; not as the Council sitting on the recommendation of the Minister, who has had a recommendation from his deputy head, and thinking whether the finances of the country will justify them in making a partial declaration of bankruptcy, but to be given as the law gives them. Mark again the words of Mr. Blake:

I maintain there ought to be no right to an increase, even in those cases in which increases may be given.

What is the meaning of that? It is senseless if there was not a right to the increase: "I maintain that there ought to be no right"—he declares there that there is a right; and when speaking on legal subjects at any rate, Mr. Blake was confessedly a master of precision. He says:

I maintain that the increase should only be given as a stimulus to extra exertion; whereas, by this law, it is given as a matter of course.

"As a matter of course" is almost equivalent to the word automatic, which I used in an earlier part of this debate, and mark how that agrees with the interpretation I ventured to give of the second subsection of section 26. I never give an opinion on legal matters here without much deference to the men who are constantly in practice; but this agrees entirely with the opinion given by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Quinn) and other legal gentlemen on this side as to the meaning of the second subsection of section 26. Mr. Blake says:

I maintain that the increase should only be given as a stimulus to extra exertions; whereas, by this law, it is given as a matter of course, for unless a man's conduct is disgracefully bad, the rule is to give the increase. If the rule is not without exceptions, let us hear the exceptions. But I need not argue this point, because the Finance Minister himself describes the increase as an increase inevitable under the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

He then moves a motion that all the words after "that" be left out, and that the said Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of amending the same. Who spoke afterwards? Another lawyer, and a member of the present Government—no less a person than the hon. gentleman who at present presides over the Post Office Department (Mr. Mulock), and this is what he said, seconding the motion of Mr. Blake:

When we pass to the first-class clerk, we find he draws a salary of $1,400, increasable to $1,800 by an annual increase of $50.

This language is as precise as Mr. Blake's—

Then we descend in the grade, and we find a second-class clerk commencing with $1,000, increasable at the same arbitrary rate, as time rolls on, to $1,400 a year. The same fixed sum of $50 a year is added to the salary of each clerk, whether he is of the lowest class or the highest class. The Secretary of State must know that increases in salaries should be in proportion to the value of the services, having due regard to the then salary; whereas, in this case, there is an arbitrary sum of $50 a year, without rhyme or reason, added to the salary of each officer, from the lowest class up to the highest.

The motion of the Hon. Mr. Blake was negatived, and then the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) moved a motion, which did not relate to the question we are discussing to-night; but he gave us an obiter dictum on that subject, and this is what he said:

Yet, in the face of this fact, Parliament is asked to increase the salaries of these mechanical clerks, and give them $50 annual increase.

It is really amusing to read these expressions in the light of the observations we have had from these learned gentlemen to-day. Then we had a statement from the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who I know is not a legal authority, but still he used to be a man of some account among them, and he said:

Any person who listened to the speech delivered by the hon. Finance Minister must have been struck with the fact of the announcement he made on that occasion, that an increase of $126,000 annually took place, through the operations of this Act, by giving the increase of $50 a year to the servants in connection with the civil service.

If necessary, I could quote some remarks of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) which show that the impression on his mind was the same. Now, what do these extracts which I have read from the debate of 1885 show? They show, in the first place, that in the mind of the Government of that day, and in the mind of Mr. Chapleau, who had charge of the Bill, the idea was that unless there was gross misconduct the $50 was added "as a matter of course," to use Mr. Blake's phrase. They show also that it was the opinion of Mr. Blake, the opinion of the present Postmaster General, and the opinion of my versatile friend in regard to legal opinions, the hon. and learned Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Now, whatever we do, surely the first step, if reform is needed, for a man or for a Parliament is to go to the bottom facts which you have to deal with.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I see that one of my hon. friends opposite feels badly. He may well feel badly, because he sits behind a Government that presented a spectacle to-day not dignified or to the credit of the Government of Canada. We have one opinion from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—a wabbling opinion on this subject; so that he might be called a wabbling Minister, just as his leader might be called the wimpling Wilfrid, for the one wabbles and the other wimples. What have we seen? We have had an opinion from the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), and then we have had a wholly different opinion from the learned Solicitor General, whose position and character at the bar will not allow him to endorse the opinion of his colleagues. He had to tell us that he agreed entirely in the interpretation of the law which came from the hon. member from Montreal (Mr. Quinn) and my own humble interpretation of it, and he had to take refuge in this plea, that there might possibly come a time when the fact of adding $50 a year to a clerk's salary would cause the Government to make a declaration of bankruptcy. Then we had the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who rose in his seat, or rather he did not rise but remained seated, like a cardinal in the purple, who speaks ex-cathedra and therefore does not need to stand on his feet. The hon. Minister spoke there, sitting in his chair and waving his hands, and in that authoritative manner which he knows how to assume—and in which after all there is very little—he declared that as regards the statute of 1885—which was a guarantee to the public that a Minister would not promote clerks improperly, and which was a charter, at the same time, to the civil servants themselves that they would have some position of independence in the service, and that if they were worthy men and behaved themselves properly, a certain increase yearly up to a certain sum would take place—did not care a fig about it, and the Government were perfectly at liberty to do what they pleased in spite of it. That was frank, there was something noble about that, he butted his head against the Act of Parliament, and the only thing that could be said about his conduct was what a Yankee said about the conduct of a bull which charged a railway train. The Yankee said: "I admire the beast for his courage but darn his discretion." So I admire the courage of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, but darn his discretion, if that is parliamentary, and if it is not, why you know, Mr. Chairman, that even in anticipation I will do, as the Princess Chemay did. She did what she was told before she heard it. And so I am ready to apologize for any breach of order even before I commit it, to such a state of discipline have I been brought in the last two years by our present rulers. Then we had a most extraordinary exhibition from the hon. Minister of Finance. He got up and he told us that he could not really help it if we could not agree with him. He did not tell us what the law was, but he said: Our view of the law is not the same as yours, and so much the worse for you. But what his view is, we have not been able to make out. He struck me as very like the man—an Irishman, of course—found in a railway station at Hamilton. He was asked where he was from, and he said: I am from everywhere but here, and I will be from here as soon as I can. That is exactly the position of the hon. Finance Minister on the law. The first thing we ought to do is to ascertain what the law binds us to do, and then do justice though the heavens should fall. I do not think that the people of Canada want to have economies made by wrong-doing. No greater wrong can be done than to rob some poor civil servant who may have a large family in order to make a small economy; and the plea that great wrong should be done in order to effect a small economy comes from that Government which is ready to run into the most reckless extravagance and spend millions, or at least a million and a half—I will not go too far—if it will only give a helping hand to a fellow who is a man and a brother, and who stands to us, and especially if it falls within the sanction of the new Evangel of those benches; "business is business." I say that in the interests of the Government and in the interests of the civil service, there ought to be some principle of promotion, and we ought not to sanction the claim of hon. gentlemen to promote at caprice. We ought to protect our civil service against such caprice. Why, there must have been increases beyond the statutory ones, because in one year $300 are added to the expenditure of an office whose expenditure previously was increased by only $100 a year. I might even appeal to the heart—because I know that even still the Minister of Trade and Commerce has some heart left—of that hon. Minister for he has a couple of very near relatives in the civil service.

Mr. FOSTER. What?

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, yes, he has given hostages to fortune. There is the hon. member for Wellington who has given quite a number of hostages to fortune.

Mr. FOSTER. A bashaw with two tails.

Mr. DAVIN. There are three or four or five others in the same position, and if these hon. gentlemen stay in office long enough, you will see what will take place. We should deliver any class in the community, but especially the important class in it that is doing our business, from the mere caprice of a Minister or a Deputy Minister, and I say here we have not had a satisfactory statement yet from those Treasury benches. I may say for myself that—and I can only speak for myself—but with my humble convictions on this question, we must have a more satisfactory statement from the Government benches or they will not get on very rapidly with their Estimates.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to ask the hon. Minister of Finance another question, and see if I will be more successful than I was before. I appreciate his position because of course he is not now dealing with his own department, but he has, or ought to have, the advantage of the recommendations of the superior officer in that branch. Does he recollect whether or not any reason was given by that officer as to why this increase should be given Mr. Walker. Was it just generally recommended or was there any special reason for it?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The reasons were general rather than special—that he was a particularly deserving officer.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has no doubt reasons for the increases granted of different kinds. What we want to get at if possible is on what ground my hon. friend himself, when it comes to a matter of personal knowledge, is going to decide. If I recollect rightly, in the case of one of the departments, he put in the plea why certain clerks were selected for the increase, that they were young men who had the smallest salary, and who, with the families they had, found it most difficult to get along.

Now, there is tenable ground. Does my hon. friend mean to recognize that in other departments as well? Is that the principle which governs in these cases? I do not want to go into the private affairs of the different members of the civil service, but is there a reason in this case that pecuniary circumstances are more difficult in the one case than the other, and so the statutory increase is given in one case and not in the other?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That element was not alleged in this case?

Mr. INGRAM. This matter may not be of very great importance to some hon. members of the House, but it is of very great importance to those who are not drawing large salaries in the civil service. As I understand it, previous to the dissolution of the last Parliament a number of civil servants in the different departments found a great deal of fault with the late Government for what they held to be injustice done to them by that Government. Since then this Government has come into power, and, as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said, found that the late Government had abused the Civil Service Act by granting increases to civil servants in the different departments. We know that in the late election many civil servants used their influence against the Government on account of this alleged injustice. But hon. gentlemen opposite, having come into power, have failed to grant the increase to the civil servants as provided in this Act. Now, several hours have been spent in trying to ascertain what is the principle by which these men are to receive their increases from year to year. We have been unable to obtain any information, and now I want to know from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has accused the late Government of being too free in granting statutory increases, what method this Government have adopted in order to bring down in these Estimates the increases that are to be granted to a number of civil servants. We have been told that it was on account of certain special services that these employees had rendered. In view of the number of increases granted, as shown by these Estimates, and in view of the number of employees to whom increases have not been granted who heretofore have received them, I want to know from the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether any of these gentlemen who have not been placed in the Estimates for increases have done equal service with those who are getting these grants. I say that if there is not some principle established by which every civil servant can be rewarded on his merits, we are placing in the hands of the Government a very dangerous weapon indeed. From my experience of the Liberal party and their leaders in this country, I have been led to believe that they were always favourable to their own. Now, if what we read in the "Globe" is correct, and is to take place, several Deputy Ministers who are Conservatives are liable to be beheaded and friends of the Liberal party appointed as deputy heads. I believe the civil servant will not fare very well at the hands of the deputy heads under these circumstances. Therefore, it is the duty of this Parliament, who are responsible to the people, to try to shield the civil servants as well as possible from the influences of party politics. After having expended about six hours of the afternoon in trying to get information, we are still left to ask for it. Instead of refusing to answer, I think the Government will save time if they will give us such information as we may fairly expect, and tell us what the treatment of the civil servants will be provided they do their duty, no matter whether they are Grit or Tory, and no matter what department they are in. If they do their duty, they should have reason to feel confident of the increase from year to year as the Civil Service Act provides.

Office of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada $29,750

Mr. FOSTER. We would like to have an explanation of the increases.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. There are none.

Department of Justice, including an allowance to the secretary of the Solicitor General, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act to the contrary $25,160

Mr. FOSTER. We would like to have an explanation of the increases here, please.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is one chief clerk at $2,600 and one $2,400, Mr. Fraser. This brings the salary of Mr. Fraser up to the maximum. Then there is a first-class clerk at $1,800 and one at $1,550, which is an increase of $50.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is that ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Mr. Coté. There are five second-class clerks, two at $1,400, one at $1,350, one at $1,150, and one at $1,100. There is an increase of $50 to Mr. Narraway. There is one third-class at $750, an increase of $50—Mr. Harris.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask my hon. friend how many clerks in the department are eligible for the statutory increase ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think there are two unprovided for.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, will my hon. friend give the committee the reason why, if there are these clerks who are eligible for the increase and there are only four selected—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There are more than that altogether.

Mr. FOSTER. Not more who are eligible. The hon. gentleman has provided for four, and he tells us that there are two unprovided for. What I wish him to inform the committee about is on what ground he has made his selection of four and left out two.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think I may safely say, so far as the department is concerned, that the report was made by the Deputy Minister to the head of the department. I am not familiar with the contents of that report, nor, if I were familiar with them, would I consider it right to discuss them in this House. I speak subject to correction, being a junior member of the House, but my opinion is that it would not be right to give this House the report made by the deputy head to the head of the department. It is a matter of internal economy of the department, and I do not think a discussion of it would be fair to the employees.

Mr. FOSTER. Can the hon. gentleman inform me whether the two that are not provided for were unfavourably reported ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I cannot say that, I cannot say anything of the sort. I do not think there is an employee in the department I could make such a statement as that about.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, my hon. friend sees what he has done. As I said before, this Government assumed the reins of office with a flourish of trumpets that the old system was to be done away with. It has been disputed to-day that that statement was made absolute. That may be tenable, but the general result of the declarations was, that now under the new Government the statutory increases do not hold. There may be cases now and then in which an increase will be given, but such a thing as statutory increases are a thing of the past. Consequently, there would be a very large saving. Now, out of six possible statutory increases which could be made in the Justice Department, the hon. gentleman has made four ; so that, so far as the Department of Justice is concerned, the majority of four to two shows that the rule exists that statutory increases have not been done away with. Now, my hon. friend raises a very vital and, I think, important question. Is the case over which he, or the Minister of Justice, for the time being happens to preside, is that a close corporation as between the Minister of Justice and the servants, or are these servants the servants of the country ? As the country pays them, the country has a right to know how those servants are doing their work, whether they are earning their money, and if some of them are not earning their money and not doing well, has the Minister of Justice a right to step in between Parliament, who provides the salary, and whose officers these clerks really are, and to say : No, I will not give you any information. The deputy has reported to me, but that report I will not give to the representatives of the people, I will keep that myself, but I will ask the representatives of the people to vote the money for this establishment. Its affairs are semi-private, at least, so far as this is concerned ; it is a private matter between myself and them, and I will not give the information. That is the logical conclusion of the hon. gentleman's remarks. I take the liberty to say, that I do not believe that this is the attitude which a Minister ought to take. The Ministry, on the whole, are simply a committee of this House to administer the affairs of the country, and are responsible to the representatives of the country in this House. Wherever we delegate a committee to look after our affairs, we do so on the ground that they are to give us the fullest information with reference to those persons whom we employ, as in this particular instance. I think we have a perfect right to the report of the deputy with reference to these clerks. Anyway, I want to point out, that, if we are not given this information, we are simply reduced to this—the principle is as good in one case as another—that the Minister has simply to say : I think this ought to be voted ; I am not going to give you any reasons why, but I think it ought to be done. When we ask for the reports, we are told : That is simply between myself and my subordinates. Now, I can understand the motive of my hon. friend. He may say : Well, I do not want to compromise the clerks. There may be something in this report which will not be creditable to one of the clerks.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, I will not say that ; that would be unfair.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not say the hon. gentleman made that statement, but why does he refuse the report ? If everything is all right, what grounds is there for his not letting Parliament know as much as he knows about it? Parliament has as great an interest in the administration of the Justice Department as my hon. friend, probably more; I think he will admit that. What right has he to intervene between Parliament and the workings of that department, and refuse to give us the report of its authorized head as to the work of the clerks under his department? His making a selection is prima facie proof that the other two clerks are not as good as the four that he selected, that is, that there is something against them. Now, I do not want to press this too far, because there are cases where a confidential report is necessary in order to get at the truth. If the Postmaster General, for instance, wants to understand the truth about certain matters, he may find it almost impossible to get it, unless there is a confidential report which will be respected between him and his confidential officers. There is detective work to be done, and you can only do it properly under the veil of secrecy. But, in the ordinary workings of the department, surely that principle cannot be obtruded. I think my hon. friend has taken ground which is not tenable.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It appears to me, at first sight, that perhaps the better way to get this information would be for the hon. gentleman to move for this report. It would be hardly fair to expect that, as each item in the Estimates is under discussion, all the information with reference to that, such as the hon. gentleman now points out should be obtainable. Let me say now what, perhaps, I should have said before, with reference to one of those who does not receive the statutory increase, that is, the gentleman who is my private secretary, one of the employees whom I found in the department when I came in. I did not think, as he was already in the receipt of a salary, as a private secretary, that he should receive an increase over and above his usual salary. Coming now to deal with the other case, I take it to be my duty to say that there is not, to my knowledge, in the department a single gentleman who has been reported against as being undeserving of the statutory increase. But, assuming that the Deputy Minister did make a report recommending all the employees for their statutory increase, and that the Minister concurred in it, then we have got to deal with the Council. The matter goes before the Council, if the report reaches that stage. Now, how are they to deal with it? Of course, in the exercise of our discretion, we may decide not to give the increase; that is a matter of political responsibility. How are you going to deal with that?

Mr. FOSTER. Parliament ought to be put in possession of the facts as far as the door of the Privy Council.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I still maintain the view, that it is open to us to say that the report from the Deputy Minister to the head of the department is a matter of internal economy in connection with the department. That is simply my view, and I think the report should be the subject of a notice of motion.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no time more pertinent for that information than when you are asking for the money on that very head. The moment my hon. friend singles out four from the six, he raises the question in reference to the others. I think it is fair that this committee should be put in possession of the report of the deputy head. If the deputy head has reported that these two clerks are eligible for the increase, and that is concurred in, we will say, by the Minister—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I did not go that far.

Mr. FOSTER. I am taking it as the basis of an argument. The committee ought to be put in possession of that report, in order that they may judge as to the responsibility of the Council. Suppose the Deputy Minister says that four of these clerks ought to have their increases because of special work, but the two other clerks he cannot recommend. Very well, that would be one stage of the case. Or he might say: The six are eligible, and I recommend them for their statutory increase. How can you place the responsibility on the Minister unless you know what was the report of the deputy head which reached the Minister? I think it will be necessary under this new arrangement to have the reports of the deputy heads. What I want at this moment to call the attention of the Ministry to is this. We are going to come across departments soon where there are clerks equally as deserving, and I am saying nothing against the clerks of my hon. friend, equally painstaking, whose term of service is as long and who have as great difficulty to make ends meet and who require equally as much the $50 increase as this officer in question. We have passed a vote for the Privy Council where there are no statutory increases. Are all the men there doddards, have they no work to do? If there are gentlemen doing their work well, who are eligible to increases, how will they feel when they walk side by side with the four clerks in the Justice Department, who are perhaps equally good, but no better, but who are receiving $50 increase? This is going to act like poison in the civil service, and will not promote its welfare.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think the hon. gentleman cannot reproach me for not attempting to do my best, in view of the fact that I succeeded in securing the statutory increase for four clerks out of six.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the explanation of the hon. gentleman is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). No member of the committee wishes to reflect on the hon. Solicitor General on account of the way he has treated the officials in his department, but that is not the question at issue. What I wish to emphasize is that in view of the new system of treating civil servants, it will be found necessary to have the reports of the deputy heads submitted. Then we will know the reasons which actuated the deputy head of the department. This will be necessary especially since it has been ascertained that the Government do not treat all the officials alike. I emphasize again what has been said, that Ministers had better be prepared to answer all questions as to the reasons why they have given increases in these special cases.

Department of Justice — Penitentiaries
Branch $3,150

Mr. FOSTER. There are no statutory increases?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. There is no increase at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Are there any clerks in this department eligible for increases?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think there is one, but I am not positive.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman know of any reason why that one clerk was not given the statutory increase?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not in a position to answer that question.

Mr. FOSTER. Was any report made in regard to that clerk?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not able to answer the question.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will make a note of my inquiry.

The Department of Militia and Defence, including $2,000 to J. W. Borden, $2,800 to Lt.-Col. D. A. Macdonald and $1,400 to Lt.-Col. Guy, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act to the contrary $41,250

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I move that the item be reduced by $50.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman give information on this vote in two lights: First, the number of clerks eligible for statutory increases; and second, the number of those to whom increases have been granted.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There have been no statutory increases granted. Six clerks are eligible. I observe there is a mistake in the item. Instead of two clerks at $1,250, there is one at $1,250, and one at $1,200. The mistake was made in printing.

Mr. MONK. I moved for a return in March last, and the Minister would confer a great favour if he would bring it down.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I will do so.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the meaning of the third item, in which the salary of $2,400 is given as against the general provisions of the Civil Service Act?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. That is the salary of the accountant.

Mr. FOSTER. How did the accountant's office become vacant?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The former accountant was superannuated.

Mr. FOSTER. At what time?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. In September or October last.

Mr. FOSTER. What salary was he getting?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. $2,400.

Mr. FOSTER. What is his superannuation allowance?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. $1,600.

Mr. FOSTER. And you are giving the new accountant, what?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. $2,400.

Mr. FOSTER. How much saving does the department make by that transaction?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The hon. gentleman presses me to state how much saving will be effected. I cannot tell at the present moment, but I think by the end of the year we will be able to show a saving. I do not wish to reflect on the former accountant, but if I am forced to make a statement I will say that a good many thousand dollars have been saved to the country by the change.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The former accountant, Mr. O'Meara, was known as being one of the very best accountants in the service. I do not know what the Minister has found out which would require him to take a new man and put him into the position of an old servant, who has been for a number of years in the civil service, at the same salary as Mr. O'Meara was receiving. The Minister of Militia promises us the information later on, but the Government are always promising us something later on, and we never get it. When we move for returns they are not brought down, and so we have to discuss all these matters on the Estimates at a most inconvenient time. I have nothing to say about the new accountant of the Department of Militia, but I can say that during the troublesome times of the North-west rebellion, the late accountant, Mr. O'Meara, proved himself to be one of the very best officers the civil service of Canada ever had. I do not know what reasons the Minister (Mr. Borden) had for superannuating Mr. O'Meara, but it cannot have been because of economy, because the hon. gentleman has appointed in his place a new man, and an untried man, however able he may be, I am not prepared to say anything about the new accountant's ability, but I do know that the Minister has superannuated at $1,600 a year, a gentleman who I am prepared to state is as good an officer as the Government of Canada ever had as an accountant. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) takes in a new man and gives him the full salary of the position. Well, it has been the rule almost invariably that even when a Deputy Minister was succeeded by a new man, the new incumbent did not get the salary that the old deputy had earned after years and years of service. When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) considers it quite prudent to give us all the information about this superannuation, and as to how he expects to save so many thousand dollars, I shall be most anxious to look into the matter closely.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the age of Mr. O'Meara ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Sixty-five years, I think.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not know about his age being 65, but I know that he is as good for the position he filled as when he was forty-five.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I do not desire to say anything reflecting upon any former officer of the department, but I do say that I found it absolutely necessary in order to carry on the business of the department, to have a new accountant. The hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) was head of the Militia Department some years ago, and I dare say at that time the officer in question may have been very efficient. He had been in the service since 1861; thirty-seven years. I believed that the time had come when it was necessary to introduce more modern methods of keeping the accounts and of administering the accountant's branch. As the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) knows, the accountant's office in the Department of Militia is a very important one indeed. He has to a large extent, to perform the duties of an auditor, and he has an enormous number of accounts to check coming in from the different depots and military districts. I found it was necessary to make a considerable change in the method of transacting the business of the department. Under the former system the moneys were sent out in large cheques to the different districts, but I found this very inconvenient and undesirable, and I have made a change so that now we pay nearly all the bills from the head office here, and consequently the number of cheques issued at present by the office at Ottawa, is at least ten times what it was when I came into the department. I think the committee ought to accept the statement which I make and ought not press me to go beyond what I have said, when I stated that I found it absolutely necessary in order to carry on the business of the department that a change and an improvement should be made. I have no reflection whatever to make upon Mr. O'Meara as to doing anything intentionally wrong; but the system of keeping the books, so far as any books were kept at all, was antiquated, and I found it impossible to induce him to make any change, so that it was necessary that I should make a change. Now, with regard to the gentleman who has succeeded Mr. O'Meara; the hon. member (Sir Adolphe Caron) says that he is an untried man. He is a gentleman who had experience at one time in the office of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Winnipeg, at a time when they were doing an enormous amount of business there in the boom years of 1881 and 1882. Subsequently he went into banking and he rose from the position of clerk and accountant to that of manager of a branch bank. I believe him to be one of the very best men that could have been selected for the position, and I may say that since he came in we have proofs in the department that he is the right man to fill that office. As to the salary; he would not have taken the position for anything less than the salary he is receiving. He was receiving not quite that salary where he was, but considering the difference in the cost of living here as compared with where he was—

Mr. WALLACE. What place was that ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. He was living in Kentville, N.S. He said he would not accept the position for anything less than $2,400, and I believe that the country will not lose anything by the change which I made.

Mr. WALLACE. Is he a relative of the Minister of Militia and Defence ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes; he has that advantage.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The question of his being a relative does not enter into the point I am discussing at all. I do not know the gentleman who has been appointed, but I do not doubt for one moment that the Minister selected a very well qualified man to occupy the position. However, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) has not answered a single objection which I have submitted to him. He does not submit any reason why Mr. O'Meara should be turned out except, as he says, that he changed the system of book-keeping and he could not get Mr. O'Meara to change his system. Well, that is no reason, for the Minister lays down the rule in his department and the officers have got to comply with it. This new accountant may not be an untried man in so far as his professional qualifications are concerned, but he is untried in so far as the Department of Militia is concerned and yet the Minister gives him $2,400 a year.

The hon. Minister of Militia, giving his reason, says: "I gave him $2,400 because he wanted $2,400, and he would not accept anything less." Under such a system, the Government will be helpless to resist pressure for increases of salary from gentlemen who are allowed to judge of their own qualifications. The cutting off of $50 a year to the poor civil servant is not considered. But the pressure which the hon. gentleman will have to resist under the system he has introduced will leave him powerless to carry out the Civil Service Act. When selecting a new accountant, he sent for this gentleman, and he said that $1,600 was paid to the late accountant. "Oh, but," says this gentleman, "you do not half know me; I am a far superior man to the other man, and you must give me $2,000." The hon. gentleman says that he could not secure the services of this eminent expert without conceding to him the salary he considers himself entitled to. Sir, it is no use any longer to have Estimates; it is no use discussing them in council to decide what is right and what is not right, if the gentlemen who are appointed to the service are going to settle for themselves the salary they are to receive. I was unfortunately not here during the discussion which was taking place in regard to the $50 statutory increases. As I read the law, especially the Post Office Act, with which I am more familiar, a man is appointed at $500 or $600, with an annual increase of $50 or $40 according to his grade. That means that the salary is fixed at $600 and the additional amount forms part and parcel of that salary, unless in the judgment of the Minister, supported by his Deputy Minister, who is supposed to know more about the civil servants than the Minister himself, the increase is withheld. That is my reading of the Post Office Act, and I think it is impossible to controvert that opinion. I think it is conceded that Canada, whether under one Administration or the other, has been blessed with one of the best civil services that any country has ever employed to carry on the work of the different departments of the Government, and if the system which the hon. gentleman wishes to introduce now is followed, it will be impossible to secure in the future as efficient a civil service as we have to-day, because without giving any reason, the hon. gentlemen who are administering the different departments can say, "I give an increase to this man, and I will not give an increase to the other man." Who is going to stand between the civil servant who does not receive an increase, while his comrade in the same department, probably in the same branch, receives it, and the Minister who chooses to make a difference between the two. It is introducing a system which I think will be injurious to the country and will interfere greatly with the efficiency of the civil service. But coming back again to the new accountant of the hon. Minister of Militia, I say that no new man, however proficient he may be, should be taken into a department at the same salary as a man receives who has been there for thirty years. That is the principle I acted upon in the department, and I am prepared to stand by that principle.

Mr. SPROULE. Last session, in answer to a question which I put upon the paper, we were given a return showing that in nine months hon. gentlemen opposite had superannuated or dismissed no less than fifty-two employees of the civil service. That was about one out of every twenty-four or twenty-seven in the whole service. In justification of that course, they explained to this House that it would result in a great saving of money to the country, because, while they had dismissed these men, some owing to age and others owing to incompetency, they were filling their places with better men at much smaller salaries. By that one act, these hon. gentlemen saddled on this country an additional expenditure of $18,229 annually under the superannuation law, which is a permanent addition to the expenditure until these men die. In addition to that, $3,179.79 was paid in gratuities to some of the men they dismissed. In looking over that list, I find that of those dismissed two were twenty-eight years of age, two or three others thirty years, two or three others thirty-one years, others thirty-three, thirty-four, thirty-eight, forty, forty-one, and I think the highest was seventy-one or seventy-two years of age. It was claimed that in all these cases there was a great saving to the country, because in many instances it was not necessary to fill the places of these men. But in looking over the Estimates before us, I find that there are about the same number in the civil service at the present time as there were before these dismissals were made; and it cannot be successfully claimed, if they filled the places of these men with new men who are drawing as large salaries as their predecessors, that any saving was effected. In looking over the Estimates before us, we find that the aggregate salaries paid to them are quite as large as those that were paid before. There is another feature of the matter which I think is very reprehensible. I have always had strong views on the subject of nepotism on the part of members of a government or a party. I do not think the Ministers of this Government should be so much given as they are to appointing their own relatives in the civil service. I do not think the principle is right, for two reasons: one is because it creates a jealousy among outsiders; another is that hon. gentlemen are using the position which the people put them in for the purpose of promoting their own interests or those of their relatives.

I think, if a member is elected to this House, and he has anything to give, he should give it to his constituents, and not to his own family or relatives. I, therefore, regard the principle as a very unsound one. It may be said, that both parties indulge in it. It is none the less reprehensible on that account. Two wrongs will never make a right. Then, the other feature is wrong, of bringing in a new man and giving him the same salary as a man who occupied the position for over thirty years. There ought to be much stronger reasons to justify that, than the Minister of Militia has given in this case. I notice that hon. members opposite seem to be prone to this principle, because I remember very distinctly that the same argument was advanced with reference to the bringing in of Mr. Lash as Deputy Minister of Justice under the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, as has been given to-night, namely, that he was a good man, and would not come unless we gave him the salary. He was given a larger salary than usually paid to new men, and the plea for giving it to him was, that he would not accept a smaller one. I do not think that is a sound argument, and I think the less frequently it is used, the better it will be for the service and the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. Minister a report from his deputy head with reference to the clerks in his department, showing how they carried out their duties, and whether they are entitled to the statutory increase or not?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There was no report and no commendations made.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no consistency in the actions of the Government at all, and I would call the attention of my hon. friend who is leading the Government to this point. One department has clerks, for instance, that of my hon. friend, six of whom are eligible for the statutory increase, but not one has been given it. The hon. Minister will not say that these are undeserving clerks and not doing their work well, because, if they are not, they ought not to be there, and from what my hon. friend has said, they would not be there if they were not doing their work well. What position is the civil service placed in, when young men, serving the Government equally well, whether in the Militia Department or the Justice Department, are discriminated against in that way? In the one department they get no statutory increase, although they do their work well and deserve it, and in another they get the increase, although they are not doing their work any better. Is that fair? Can the Government hope to carry on its affairs satisfactorily on such a principle of divergence and discrimination? Have the Government no conception at all of the effect that will have on the civil service? Nobody who loves justice and fair-play, will say that this is not unfair treatment. You should either treat them all alike by giving the increase, or by simply giving increase for special good work, and that upon proper report; but for one department to refuse the increase and another to give it to all, or nearly all, its employees, is a discrimination which cannot be considered otherwise than unfair, and which will work to the detriment of the service. Another point brought out in the treatment of the department by my hon. friend is this. He says that he is going to make great savings in the department. We are now discussing the question of civil government, and in that my hon. friend has done what? He has superannuated one man, giving him a superannuation allowance of $1,680, and he has put a new and inexperienced man in the department at a salary which this other officer, after thirty or forty years service, was receiving. What is the reason the hon. Minister gives? The reason he gives is, that the new man would not take any less. But the hon. gentleman has a good precedent for that. When the Drummond County arrangement and the Grand Trunk Railway arrangement made last year was explained to the House by the Minister of Railways and Canals, he was asked why he gave so much money to the Drummond people, and he said he tried to give less, but these men would not take any less.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I made the best trade I could.

Mr. FOSTER. When the Yukon arrangement was being so ably explained by the hon. Minister of Railways, he declared that the Ministers wore out their trousers going down on their knees and begging these people to take less, and the Government gave them the 25,000 acres per mile because they would not take any less. My hon. friend who is junior member of the Cabinet, may, of course, shelter himself behind the precedent set by the eminent head of the Department of Railways, who has so much experience in political life. But, at the same time, he has thrown completely to the winds the cardinal tenet of the Opposition which they have been preaching for years, that, in the first place, the superannuation business must be done away with, and that, in the second place, if you do superannuate, you must show a saving. My hon. friend shows a saving of $1,680 on the wrong side of the ledger. I want to point out one other thing. I am not going to take too strong ground with reference to the employment of relatives, but I do say this, that, if a relative is to be employed, he had better be employed in some other capacity than that of the responsible accountant of an office in a department of which the Minister to whom he is related is at the head. I say that it destroys, or has a tendency to destroy, the proper discipline of the department, when a son, or a brother, or a cousin, of the Minister who runs the department is put in the responsible office of accountant for that same department. Whether it influences the Minister or not, it will have the tendency in the department to make the other employees believe that it does influence him. This gentleman may be very capable, but my hon. friend is knocking to the winds the rule that hon. gentlemen opposite strove for during all the years they were in Opposition. He superannuated the former accountant, and gave him $1,680 superannuation allowance, and put in his place a new and untried man at the very same salary that the former accountant received, while he refuses the $50 increase to the deserving clerks who are entitled to it under the Act.

Mr. QUINN. I cannot help congratulating the Minister of Militia on having the power to put his relative into this position and on having set aside the law of the land to secure a position for him that would be sufficiently remunerative, and to secure for the country such eminent services. I look at the list of civil servants, in connection with the Department of Militia and Defence, I would like to call the attention of the hon. the Solicitor General to the names. I am glad to see the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) present, because he is the hero probably, of the system. I would like to call the attention of the Solicitor General and also the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Hurley), who I see, is here, the hon. member for South Victoria (Mr. McHugh), and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Stenson), while I read the names of the three leading officers in this list. I quote from page 15 :

Col. Charles Eugène Panet—present rank, Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence; date, 4th February, 1875; present salary, $3,200; date of birth, 17th November, 1830; date of first appointment, 4th February, 1875.

Lt.-Col. John Macpherson—present rank, chief clerk, director of stores; date, 25th April, 1891; present salary, $3,000; date of birth, 8th January, 1830; date of first appointment, 1st September, 1872.

Cornwall Herbert O'Meara—present rank, chief clerk, accountant; date, 1st July, 1881; present salary, $2,400; date of birth, 25th May, 1833; date of first appointment, 1st June, 1861.

So that, of course, the relative of the Minister of Militia and Defence must be provided for. It is very unfortunate, and I draw the attention of the Solicitor General and the other gentlemen to whom I have referred to it, that a man named O'Meara should be displaced, but it is quite usual. I draw their attention to this fact that it is quite in keeping with the system, or rather the theory that has been broached by the Minister of Public Works in that famous newspaper of his, and of course I am glad to see it followed. I am sure these gentlemen will enjoy it, and I hope they will vote to support the decision that Cornwall Herbert O'Meara, a principal officer of the Militia Department, who, on the admission of the Minister of Militia was dismissed or superannuated, not because he was too old; not because he was not faithful in the discharge of his duties; not because there was anything dishonest about him, but he was superannuated and Mr. Borden replaced him probably only because his name was O'Meara.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. McINERNEY. I would like to call attention to one thing. I have not risen to find fault with the appointment of Mr. Borden to this position, nor have I risen to find fault because Mr. Borden happens to be the cousin of the hon. Minister. I do not make any point against the Minister on that account. But he has brought into his department a new man as accountant, giving him a salary of $2,400. Now when we run over these Estimates of the amounts paid to the accountants of the different departments, we find that in the Department of the Interior, the accountant is paid $2,350, the Department of Indian Affairs $1,950, the Department of Marine and Fisheries $1,800, the Department of Public Works—it has been reduced from $2,400—$1,800.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a new appointment, I suppose.

Mr. McINERNEY. I suppose so. The accountant in the Department of Railways and Canals receives $2,000, and the accountant in the Post Office Department $1,800. So that we have a brand new man brought into the Militia Department at a higher salary than the accountant of any other department.

Mr. MONK. I would like to ask the hon. Minister what was the salary given to the clerk in question before his appointment, and also why Mr. O'Meara was incapacitated? The hon. Minister must bear in mind that it must appear strange that a previous clerk should be set aside at an expense to the country of $1,600 a year, that a relative of his own should be taken into his own department at a salary of $2,400, and that he should claim that he would not come here for any less. What was he getting then?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I do not know that I am bound or that I am in a position to state. I have stated already that this gentleman told me that he was receiving what he considered a full equivalent to the salary he now receives.

Mr. DAVIN. Taking the cost of living into account?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Exactly.

Mr. DAVIN. Where was he living?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. At Kentville, N.S., as I have already stated. With regard to the statement that has been made that I allowed this man to dictate his own salary, I said nothing of the kind. What I said was that I believed the man appointed was worth the amount of money he receives and that a man as good as he is to fill the place could not be got for less. I repeat that. He is one of the best in the service to-day, not only in the Militia Department, but in any department.

He will earn to the department and to the country more than the amount of his salary. Now with regard to the question of nepotism which has been raised by some of my hon. friends on the other side, I may say by way of preface that possibly they are about the last people to advance a criticism of that kind. But for the comfort of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) who asked me whether he was a relative of mine, and for the satisfaction of some of my hon. friends opposite, I will say at once that he is my cousin. But while he has that disadvantage, he has the very great advantage of being a brother of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden); so that possibly my hon. friends may not feel so badly after they are fully aware of what his relationships are.

Mr. HUGHES. The discussion of this item may be a good occasion for me to make a few suggestions to the Minister. I notice here that salaries ranging from $550 to $1,000 are paid to third-class clerks, and salaries from $700 upwards are paid to second-class clerks. I wish to draw the Minister's attention to this fact, that the officers who serve in the permanent corps in Canada are paid very much less than is paid to second-class or third-class clerks. Take, for instance, the officer commanding a battery and compare the work he does with that of one of these clerks, or an officer commanding a school of infantry, or an officer commanding a school of cavalry, and compare the work they do, their training, their technical knowledge and otherwise, with that which these clerks require. Then contrast the qualifications that are required for the militia with those of a third-class or second-class clerk, and there is really very little comparison between the two. I would take this opportunity of suggesting to the Minister the advisability of working out some system whereby the officers of the permanent corps of cavalry, infantry or artillery, might be placed at least in a position somewhat equal to that of a second-class clerk. Officers commanding an infantry corps get $3.50 a day, which is really less than many of these third-class clerks are getting, although they have to by their own uniform, a very expensive uniform, and are subjected to a great many other calls upon their purse that no civil servant in Ottawa is called upon to meet. I am satisfied that the people of this country would be pleased to see these officers placed, at all events on the same salary as a third-class clerk. Let the field officers be placed on the salary of a second-class clerk, and the officers commanding corps be placed in the same rank as first-class clerks. I am satisfied that would meet with the approval of the entire electorate of the country, and then we would be able to retain the services of the very best men that we now have in the force.

There is another point to which I will take the liberty of calling the Minister's attention, although it may not be strictly in order under this item. It is in connection with the working out of a scheme for the mobilization and transport of troops and supplies at the present time. The department at the present time is in a very chaotic condition in that respect, it has never been anything else. I would take the liberty of suggesting to the Minister of Militia and Defence that it might be advisable to form a mobilization department, putting our capable quartermaster general at the head of it, and having under him, say, the heads of the leading railways of the country. For the Grand Trunk Railway, take Mr. Wainwright, for the Canadian Pacific Railway, take either Sir William Van Horne or Mr. Shaughnessy, for the Canada Atlantic Railway, take Mr. Chamberlain, or any other officials of those roads for officers. Give them the rank of lieutenant colonel, perhaps, but let these men work out a plan whereby, in case of war, or if need arose of going into camp, the troops might be mobilized and moved from place to place. The steamship companies also might be represented. More than that, the men who have been in the habit of carrying out large contracts might have a place on this board. Take, for instance, a man like Mr. Davis, who has had great experience in engaging men and carrying out contracts—such a man would be invaluable for engineering purposes and in the construction of field works. Take, for conducting transportation, a gentleman like Mr. Mann or Mr. Mackenzie, who has had large experience in handling men and transporting material. These would be able to render invaluable service to the department in the way of bringing up troops. At the time the North-west rebellion as high as $20 a day was paid for teams when the whole outfit was not worth more than $40 or $50. Yet these men were getting $25 for stealing, for that is what they occupied themselves about, while the volunteers were fighting for 50 cents a day. If we had had at that time some proper system organized with such men as I have named at the head of it, if such a system had been organized in advance, I am satisfied the country would have saved two million dollars in that North-west campaign alone.

Then there is another point that I take the liberty of suggesting to the Minister. On the 24th of May, the 1st of July and Thanksgiving Day, it is the custom in many localities for the volunteer officers to meet at their own expense. I would suggest to the Minister the advisability of passing a vote so that any corps that was regularly called out, or which regularly turned out, having first obtained the authority of the department therefor, when such corps turns out for a field day under proper command on either of the days mentioned, each member should receive his day's pay. Now, on the 24th of May the celebration in Ottawa, I believe, is likely to be a failure owing to the fact that many of the volunteers cannot afford the expense to come from a distance to take part in it. I suggest that the department take a vote of a few thousand dollars, $5,000 or $6,000 would cover the need for the whole of Canada. I am satisfied that the country would reap much more than that value of benefit from having the volunteers turn out.

Mr. WALLACE. I think that the explanation made by the Minister of Militia and Defence will hardly be considered satisfactory by the House. His last attempt to bluff off inquiry was by saying that as to the charge of nepotism, those on this side should be the last to raise that question. I do not think that would be accepted by the House or by the country, either as an answer to the charge of appointing his own relation, which perhaps is not a crime, or to the circumstances which accompany this appointment. I contend that in that appointment, the law of the land has been violated. The law requires that appointees to the civil service, except certain specified appointments, shall have passed the civil service examination, under those requisite qualifications, excepting unspecified cases. The cases specified are as follows:—

When the deputy head of a department in which a vacancy occurs reports, for reasons set forth in such report:

(a) That the qualifications requisite for such office or employment are wholly or in part professional or technical;

(b) That the requisite qualifications are not possessed by any person then in the service of the department; and

(c) That it would be for the public interest that the examination herein provided for should, as regards such vacancy, be wholly or partially dispensed with;

The Governor in Council may, without reference to the age of the person, if the head of the department concurs in such report, select and appoint such person as is deemed best fitted to fill the vacancy, subject to such examination as is suggested in the report.

Was there any examination held in this case? There was not. Then the law was violated in that instance, because it says there shall be an examination, not a full examination, if it were, none of these cases would be applicable. But I find in that case the examination has been held. But are we to be told here that these qualifications are professional or technical. What are the qualifications of an accountant? Why, that is the occupation of a large portion of the civil service in Ottawa, doing accountant's work. In every branch of the public service here in Ottawa there is a staff of accountants. In the Department of Militia we are told that there is a great deal of work to be done, and there should be a branch, and I suppose there is, to cope with that work.

A statement has been made that there was no one in that department fitted for the position, that the training other officials had received under Mr. O'Meara did not qualify them to carry on the work after Mr. O'Meara's superannuation. I decline to believe that such is the fact, in the absence of any evidence, none of which has been produced so far. The appointment was made; the requisite qualifications were not possessed by any other person in the department. The statement had to be made by some one that the qualifications had to be professional or technical. They were not professional or technical any more than the qualifications of civil servants are of that class. It may be that in some department a doctor is required; and in the Department of Inland Revenue a chemist is sometimes needed, and then the qualifications are distinctly technical. In some departments a legal adviser may be needed, and his qualifications are technical. Looking at the Auditor General's Report, it will be seen that a large number of the departments are occupied in doing what, for the purpose of this appointment, is called technical work. I contend that the law has been distinctly violated in this appointment. But the Minister says this new officer is the best man in the civil service. I characterize that statement as a piece of bombast. A gentleman who has not spent one-fourth of the time since his appointment in performing his duties, is not in a position to say what are the qualifications of every officer in every department; and in making that statement he was simply making a bombastic utterance when he could have no knowledge as to the truthfulness or untruthfulness of his statement. What do we find the Minister doing? He said in the innocence of his heart that he could not offer this officer this office at a less salary. I presume he means that he had offered him a less figure. There are different grades of office. The highest grade is that of a Deputy Minister, and the next is that of chief clerk. The latter commences with a minimum salary of $1,800, and the maximum is $2,400. This gentleman was made a chief clerk, I presume. Is that correct?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. He was.

Mr. WALLACE. This officer was given the maximum salary of a chief clerk the first day he stepped into his office. I do not think there is an example of a similar proceeding in any department of the Government since the new Administration came into office, and I am quite sure there was not such a case under the late Government. He got the most-favoured treatment. An hon. member has read the list of salaries of accountants of the different departments. The other Ministers have recognized that when a new accountant came in he was doing pretty well if he was promoted to the position of chief clerk and commenced with the minimum salary of that position. But this gentleman was a relative of the Minister. He tells us he was a brother of the member of Parliament for Halifax; but I do not think the member for Halifax appointed him or recommended him. It is not usual for members on this side of the House to be called upon to make recommendations; it was not the practice under the old Government, and is not under the new Government. The outrageous proceeding, in my opinion, consisted in this, that this officer is a relative of the Minister and was given treatment not accorded to any other gentleman, that when he was taken into the service because he was a relative, and from the start he received the maximum salary of a chief clerk. The Minister made some insinuations about Mr. O'Meara, and said he could tell something if he only wanted to do so. I contend, however, that now is the time and here is the place to give the committee information, and it is entitled to receive all information. If Mr. O'Meara has been incompetent, we are entitled to know it. We have the evidence of his chief for many years, the late Minister of Militia, who testifies from his experience that in the greatest emergency which has tested the capacity of the department, in 1885, Mr. O'Meara proved a most capable and efficient officer. That was the opinion I had formed from a general knowledge of Mr. O'Meara's capacity, capability and honour. If there is anything to be said derogatory to him, we should know it. He received a superannuation allowance of $1,680 a year. He received $2,400 for performing the duties of his position, and the performance of those duties now costs the country $4,080; $2,400 to this gentleman with the fortunate name of Borden, and $1,680 to Mr. O'Meara, whose days of usefulness have not passed away. But he was superannuated, I understand from the Minister, because he was getting old; or was it because he was inefficient?

Mr. QUINN. It was because he could not change his name.

Mr. WALLACE. No Irish need apply. I do not think, however, it was for that reason; but we are entitled to know whether it was on account of his age or his inability to adapt himself to the new system of book-keeping which the Minister was inaugurating.

Mr. BERGERON. For the sake of economy.

Mr. WALLACE. I think we are certainly entitled to a full statement of what the Minister has insinuated he could say with respect to this matter, something that will satisfy the committee, for we want to be satisfied. We desire that the Minister shall tell us what he has not told us yet and furnish some justification for the superannuation of Mr. O'Meara at $1,680 a year and the appointment of the Minister's relative at $2,400 a year, without examination, without complying with the Civil Service Act, in defiance of the law of the land and in defiance of fair-play to other officials in the public service. In this connection I might fairly ask the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who is making his bow across the House and who apparently is ashamed of this conduct, for he usually sits behind the Minister of Militia, and he has now got as far away from him as he possibly could without coming over on this side of the House; I would like to ask the Minister—no the hon. member for North Wellington—

Mr. FOSTER. He should have been a Minister.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. member for North Wellington were Minister of Militia and Defence—

Mr. BERGERON. Borden would not have been there.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Borden would not have been there with $2,400 a year to commence with, in defiance of all law, and Mr. O'Meara would not have been superannuated at $1,600 a year when he was in good health and capable of efficiently discharging his duty. I once had a little faith in the hon. member for North Wellington; more than I have lately. This world is full of surprises and indeed I would not be surprised to hear that hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) get up and say that this was the finest transaction that he ever knew of in his life.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WALLACE. Oh, yes. I would not be surprised to hear him say that everything in connection with it is most economic.

Mr. BERGERON. The "Hansard" for the past eighteen years would fall on his head.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes; but it is said the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) had a relative of his own appointed, and he may be looking out for a position for himself.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Brodeur). Order.

Mr. WALLACE. I am glad, Mr. Chairman, you are calling these gentlemen opposite to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The reference is to you.

Mr. WALLACE. To me, Sir. We want to know, Mr. Chairman, the reason why the late accountant was superannuated, and why the Act of Parliament was violated so that this man could get the maximum salary when others and we presume capable men—we must assume that the Government keep capable accountants in every department—are getting far less salary, although they have been long in office. I think the action of the Minister highly unjustifiable in this case.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) was in the House or not—

Mr. WALLACE. I was.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I have endeavoured to explain why I found it necessary to superannuate Mr. O'Meara. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) has seen fit to say that I have indulged in insinuations against Mr. O'Meara. I am not aware that I did, and I certainly did not intend to.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. Minister said that he could state something.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) allow me for a moment. I know the hon. gentleman is very fond of hearing his own voice.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not so fond of appointing my own relatives.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Well, I am not so sure the civil service list would not show something of that kind.

Mr. WALLACE. You do not know anything about it, then.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I was saying that I did not make any insinuation against Mr. O'Meara. I stated that I found Mr. O'Meara entirely unfit to fulfil the duties of the position in which I found him, and for that reason, in the public interest, I superannuated him. If I were to be asked fifty times over I could only repeat that in my judgment, as the head of the department, Mr. O'Meara was not competent to discharge the duties of the position in which I found him. I do not think I ought to be asked to go further than that. With regard to the law being violated, of course I know that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) is a very eminent authority on a great many subjects, but I did not know that he was an eminent lawyer. I do not profess to be, but I took the opinion of the Department of Justice with reference to this matter, and I have the written opinion of the Department of Justice, that the appointment of an accountant is one which comes under section 37, which the hon. gentleman referred to. Under that section, and upon the statement of the Deputy Minister of the Department of Militia, I made the appointment. So far as the examination is concerned, the gentleman who has been appointed could pass the examination without the slightest difficulty. It happened, however, that he was beyond the age limit, being somewhere about forty years instead of thirty-five, and therefore he could not come into the civil service. I consider that the position of accountant is eminently a technical one. We know that we have now a profession, known as the profession of accountants, and I think the committee will agree with the written opinion given by the Department of Justice that this position may be fairly classed as a technical one. There was no violation of the statute; I proceeded in conformity with the requirements laid down in section 37.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). What about the examination?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There is no examination.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). There should have been.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. Minister (Mr. Borden) says that the accountant's metier or business has now become a profession, and if a profession it would be a profession containing a considerable number of professors. Did the Minister make any effort to get tenders or offers to see how many persons would be candidates for this position.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. Minister took this gentleman in at $2,400 a year which is higher than is paid to the accountant of any other department, some $600 a year higher than is paid to some of the accountants, and at least $500 a year is given to this new man more than the average salary of the accountants in all the departments. The only reason given by the Minister for this is, that the cost of living is so much higher in Ottawa than in the place where this gentleman comes from. The place mentioned is not sufficiently known to fame for me to remember, or probably my education has been neglected.

Mr. BERGERON. Kentville.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes; it did not sound very familiar to me. But, Sir, I am told on very good authority that the only commodity cheaper in Nova Scotia than in Ottawa are apples.

Mr. BENNETT. They are very wholesome.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, and I am told they are cheaper in Nova Scotia than here. But from what we know of Ottawa we know that if a man lives a simple life he can live as cheaply here as in any other part of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. But he must not learn frivolities.

Mr. DAVIN. Of course I grant you that if he is a man of fashion, it is a very expensive place. It is barely possible that this gentleman may have been under the impression that when he obtained the high position of accountant in the Militia Department, he at once became a man of fashion and would have to incur expenses to keep up the dignity of the position. He may have had false impressions with regard to the social encumbrances of the new office.

Mr. FOSTER. He may possess some accomplishments.

Mr. DAVIN. Now, the Minister says that this man was earning nearly as much salary at Kentville; he refuses to tell us what the discrepancy is. It is a case of 'hiatus valde defendus'—there is a large gap to be spanned. Under these circumstances, we may come to the conclusion that he was not earning anything like $2,400. But the reason given by the Minister why he could not come in at $1,800, was the great difference in the cost of living. Well, Sir, a simple man, like myself, can live as cheaply in Ottawa as at Regina or at Kentville; but I am not a fashionable man. There is an article here in the "Journal" which may indicate the streams and rivers of rumour that have gone out from this great capital, this Washington of the North, which the present leader of the Government was to do such great things for. The right hon. gentleman sees visions and dreams dreams when he talks of his achievements in the last twenty months—how he has made Canada a nation, and done many other great things.

Mr. BENNETT. But he could not build the Yukon Railway.

Mr. DAVIN. No, there are limits to the highest capacity. You know what the French judge said to Alexander Dumas before he had achieved his fame.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member for Assinibola, but there are four Ministers sound asleep, and perhaps he had better wake them up.

Mr. DAVIN. I will wake them up shortly; but I am afraid to tell this story about Dumas, with the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) before me, because, in his sublime unconsciousness of the imperfections of the accent with which he speaks his native language, he does not think that my accent is what it ought to be; but it was in Paris that I learned French, and I am sure his accent is what Edmund About would call "un accent déplorable."

Mr. BOURASSA. I do not accept the judgment of the hon. gentleman on this point, as on many other points.

Mr. DAVIN. When Dumas went before a French judge, he was asked what his profession was, and he replied that he was of the same profession as Corneille. The judge said to him: "Ah, il y a des degrés"—there are degrees. And so I say, there are degrees of power; and, although the leader of the Government could do great things, he could not build the Yukon Railway. But here is the extract from the Evening "Journal," which is a paper for which I have the greatest respect:

A SOCIAL POINT.

A newspaper outside Ottawa printed recently a report that one of the Cabinet Ministers was taking dancing lessons, and use was made of the report as a text for sneers and smart remarks at the expense of the Minister. Most people will be inclined to consider that sort of journalism a thorough'ly dirty business. If a newspaper in this city were to use a similar rumour in a similar malicious way about some Sparks Street merchant or city lawyer or doctor, there would be no two opinions about the contemptible nature of the publication. In personal matters the fact that a man is politically prominent gives no excuse for assaults on what he has a legitimate private right to do.

As far as dancing is concerned, the man who is liable to be thrown in the way of it and who, not having conscientious objections to it, does not fit himself to do it tolerably well, he is a fool. Any man is a fool who is willing to look like a fool because he can't do commonplace things which people favour into whose society he must come more or less.

And the paper goes on to say that a Cabinet Minister who fits himself by terpsichorean studies for the exigent claims of the society into which he may be thrown, displays wisdom rather than the reverse. I say that, with such articles as that going out from this city, you can easily understand how a candidate for a high position in the Militia Department might think there would be social claims upon him here of a higher kind than there would be at Kentville. Not only would he have to pay a higher price for his apples than he would at Kentville, but he would have to dress better, take dancing lessons, and so forth. I say, that we must in future disabuse the minds of candidates for high positions in the civil service of such an idea. We do not want our civil servants to run away with the idea that they are to be pampered by society or the curled darlings of fashion. The hon. Minister himself, who is a man of university training, and who knows something of logic, knows that if a man gives a reason for a proposition which he lays down, and that reason is found not to exist, the proposition falls completely. He laid down the proposition that this man should receive $2,400, and the reason he gave was, that the cost of living in Ottawa was great. I am sure that at Kentville, save in apples, the cost of living is as great as it is in Ottawa, and the hon. gentleman is not justified in giving this man $600 more than he would to any other good accountant. The hon. gentleman advanced another reason, and it was a lame and impotent one. He said that this man was a brother of an hon. member here. What do we care about that? It is not the principle of this Opposition, I can tell him, to place men in the public service merely because they happen to be relatives of prominent politicians. He says some Conservatives did it. The more shame to the Conservatives, if they did it. We who are in this Opposition do not justify any Conservative Minister who may have taken relatives into his office; and I echo what the ex-Minister of Finance said, that, above all, to take into the responsible accountant's office a near relative of the Minister, is utterly unjustifiable. Why, Sir, a thing like that, but not so flagrant or heinous, drove one of the greatest lawyers that ever sat on the English woolsack, Lord High Chancellor Westbury, from office, and the other day, in France, a man high in political life was driven from his position because he was guilty of nepotism. The people of Canada want to see the same high standard introduced into our public life that exists in England, where we have the august mother of parliaments, on which our own is modelled; and so long as I sit in this House, I will protest in the strongest terms I can against thrusting on the public service men because they happen to be relatives of the Ministers. If the salaries of the Ministers are not high enough—and I think they are not—let us raise them; but let us not do it an underhand way by appointing relatives of the Ministers to office. The Minister adds $600 to the $1,800 of the late accountant, and he superannuates him at $1,680. This is equal to 33½ of the statutory increases; and then he has the equivalent of 12 statutory increases given to the man who comes in, so that you have 45½ statutory increases swallowed up in this one's man's case. So that, while they are boasting, and boasting hypocritically, of their economy in refusing the statutory increases, in this one case—and it is part and parcel of their whole policy—they add on a burden to the public Treasury equal to 45½ statutory increases. For that reason, I move that the amount placed in this item over and against the accountant shall be reduced by $600.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I wish to ask the hon. Minister of Militia whether his deputy made a report in this case, as required by subsection 3 of section 37 of the Civil Service Act?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. He did.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Let me read this for the benefit of the committee:

The Governor in Council may, without reference to the age of the person, if the head of the department concur in such report, select and appoint such person as is deemed best fitted to fill the vacancy, subject to such examination as is suggested in the report.

That report would not be complete, in my judgment, unless an examination of some kind had been suggested in it by the deputy head. Then if the deputy head did suggest an examination, the head of the department must have ignored the suggestion, inasmuch as we have been informed by the hon. Minister that no examination was held. With regard to the contention of the hon. Minister that the position is a technical one within the meaning of the Act, I must say that I never heard any more absurd contention put forward. It simply means that the Government may ignore every line and section of the Act. The existence of a society of chartered accountants is no reason why the members of that society should be placed on the status of a profession. They are not a profession in the sense of the Civil Service Act or in the sense that members of the other professions are, which are chartered by Act of Parliament. I have not heard any argument put forward that will justify this most extraordinary proceeding. Assuming that the qualifications for this position are technical, within the meaning of the Act, and assuming that a professional accountant should be appointed to take the place of the old and experienced official who preceded him, there is nothing in that contention to justify this Government in appointing as chief clerk a new man with a salary of $2,400, or the full maximum of that office. That cannot be justified. In 1895 my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Wallace) appointed to the office of accountant of the Customs Department a gentleman with every technical knowledge required in order to keep the books of that most important financial department perhaps in the whole Government, in so far as the keeping of books is concerned—in which $20,000,000 a year have to be accounted for in one way or another—and that gentleman received a salary of $1,650, and has gone on relying upon the statutory increase as the only addition to his salary. The position of accountant to the Department of Inland Revenue, perhaps, requires more technical qualification than even that of customs, and I venture to say that no gentleman who has not experience in the methods of bookkeeping in that branch of the service could take his place, and yet I assert that there is not a single line of justification in the Act for the appointment of a professional man to that position. Yet we find that this Government, without regard to anything laid down in the Act, has appointed a practical accountant to the position of accountant in the Militia Department and appointed him without any examination and at the maximum salary. We certainly require more explanation of the policy of the Government regarding their interpretation of the Civil Service Act than we have been able to get to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. The point raised is a most important one. If the contention of the hon. Minister of Militia is to hold, we are going to have a complete change, with reference to one office at least in all the departments. We are going to take that office out of the Civil Service Act entirely and make it one to which any person can be appointed, whether he comes up to the requirements of the Act or not. I have had experience in the Government since 1895, and I confidently assert that never in the wildest times of Liberal-Conservative Administration did I know of the Government even contemplating the idea of making the position of accountant a technical office. It was never contemplated and it was never held by any Minister of Justice that it was possible to do it. But there seems to have been an accommodating Minister of Justice of late to warrant this departure from the Act, and we are asked to vote $2,400 in order to pay this man, who has been appointed in violation of the Act, the maximum rate which an accountant will receive. And the word accountant is not used at all in the estimate. What we are asked to vote is the $2,400 for a chief clerk, and the hon. Minister asks us to do that on the ground that it is a technical office. I want to know if the Government are going to take this as the basis of their administration of the civil service, and if from this time out we are to consider that any Minister may appoint an outsider, irrespective of the terms of the Civil Service Act, to any chief clerkship, simply by dubbing him an accountant and setting him to work keeping books. This is no light matter, and the member of the Government who leads it for the present, should give us the policy of the Government with reference to this.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The point is whether, in legal parlance, the qualifications required for this particular office are such as warrant the Minister in considering it technical. On that point he consulted the Minister of Justice, and I understand he was informed that it did come within the terms of the Act. That is a legal question, and my hon. friend took the only means in his power of ascertaining whether he was within the law.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think that quite meets the question I put. The vote is not for an accountantship at all. We are asked for $2,400 for a chief clerk. When we inquire whether the Civil Service Act has been complied with, we are told that the chief clerk is a technical officer in this respect, and that it is so construed to be a technical officer by the Minister who wants the office calling this man an accountant and telling the Minister of Justice, to whom he applies for an opinion, that an accountant, in his opinion, is a professional man, and consequently this may be held as a technical office. Now, if that be so, every accountant and sub-accountant in any department of the Government may be appointed on technical grounds, and the provisions of the Civil Service Act, as it has been administered from the first, set aside, because the Minister says, what I think is questionable, that the accountant, doing the work of book-keeping, is from this time forward to be called a member of a profession and his office a technical office. I do not see how we can vote this.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I suppose the Minister of Militia would have no objection to bringing down the report of his deputy as to the appointment. I think we are fairly entitled to that, and also the report of the Minister of Justice should be brought down, for this reason—it seems to me to be antagonistic to the whole Civil Service Act, and in these reports we may be able to find some reasons why this appointment was made contrary to the Civil Service Act. The only ground on which I put it, not wishing to go behind the record, is simply that it seems to me that that report breaks through the Civil Service Act, and if so, we ought to know the reasons which induced the Minister to, as I believe, break the law existing up to that time.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest that this item stand until we have these reports and papers. This is a very important point and we want the opinion of the Minister of Justice and the presentation of the case made to him.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The question does involve important considerations, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) desires it, I will not object to the matter standing over. Now, it is twelve o'clock, and I do not wish to press hon. gentlemen opposite unduly. But there are two or three items in which there is absolutely no difference. Could he take these and adjourn?

Mr. FOSTER. The three following?

Mr. BERGERON. This other will stand over?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It will stand over. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) that, as there is a considerable reduction in the Department of the Secretary of State—

Mr. FOSTER. No, an increase.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not think there is an increase in the Secretary of State's Department.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, $100.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Where?

Mr. QUINN. That is what we want to find out.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. At page 14 of the Department of the Secretary of State is $34,412, and it was $34,950.

Mr. FOSTER. No, it was $36,400, and it is $36,500. You have the wrong Estimates.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. So I have the wrong Estimates. My hon. friend handed me the Estimates for 1898 instead of those for 1899.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest that in this first plunge into the Estimates we have had important questions to discuss—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I am not at all objecting. It is perfectly fair, and I will not press the thing if the hon. gentleman cares about it. We would come to the Department of the Interior, and I suppose, of course, he would wish to have some discussion. But the two before that, the Secretary of State and Printing and Stationery do not involve any increase.

Mr. FOSTER. We must keep some easy work for to-morrow.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Then we will do some work to-morrow, I suppose.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Resolution to be reported.

Mr. FOSTER. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. We shall probably proceed with Supply or go on with the Franchise Bill. We may have the plebiscite first reading. The main time will be on Supply or the Franchise Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Are we not to expect the plebiscite?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It will be introduced to-morrow, but we could not pretend to discuss it—it will be only the first reading.

Mr. FOSTER. It has the look of a very important child.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is one in which, I know, the Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

hon. gentleman will take an interest. I understand that it will be ready to be introduced and distributed to-morrow, and, if so, it will probably be introduced. Afterwards it will be the Franchise Bill or Supply. I move that this House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12 o'clock (midnight).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 21st April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF BAGOT
—ISSUE OF WRIT.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that my attention having been called by the hon. member for Beauharnois, in his place, to the fact of the demise of Flavien Dupont, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of Bagot, I have, in accordance with section 8 of chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

REPORTING AND PUBLISHING THE DEBATES.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that, in obedience to the order of the House of the 14th February last, the Clerk has laid on the Table a return showing the cost of "Hansard" for each year from and including 1890 and 1897—the return covering the cost of reporting, transcribing, translating, printing, binding, circulating through the post office or express offices and all other expenses connected with the present system of reporting and publishing the debates of the House.

SASKATCHEWAN RAILWAY AND MINING COMPANY.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved:

That the petition of the Saskatchewan Railway and Mining Company, praying for leave to present an Act to amend their Act of incorporation, notwithstanding the expiration of the time for receiving private Bills, be received forthwith, and be referred to the Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

PROHIBITION OF THE IMPORTATION, MANUFACTURE AND SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 121) intituled "An Act respecting the Prohibition of the Importation, Manufacture and Sale of Intoxicating Liquors."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, to give an explanation of the purport of the Bill, although no doubt, in a general way, the House thoroughly understands its object. It is, however, a Bill which has been looked for with some expectancy and with a little impatience on the part of a very large number of people in the country, and it is well a short resume of the provisions of the Bill should be placed before the House before asking for the discussion which will naturally arise upon the second reading. I may say, Sir, that at the present stage of the proceedings there is no desire at all to argue the question in any way or shape; I shall, therefore, confine myself to a short explanation of the clauses of the Bill and the object aimed at.

The Bill is a short one, as simple as it could possibly be made to reach the object desired. It contains first of all the title, the interpretation clause, and in the third clause there comes the question to be submitted under the Act, based on this Bill, to the people of Canada. We are all aware that this question has been the point in the Bill which has been most commented upon and most discussed by the people who are interested in this measure. I am very gratified indeed to be able to say here and at once, that the question as contained in this Bill will, I think, meet fully the approbation of those who have been interested in the submission of this question of prohibition to the people of Canada. I will read the question. The section of the Bill reads thus:

There shall be submitted to the vote of the electors hereinafter declared entitled to vote thereon, the following question:—

"Are you in favour of the passing of an Act prohibiting the importation, manufacture or sale of spirits, wine, ale, beer, cider and all other alcoholic liquors for use as beverages?"

Mr. FOSTER. Manufacture "or" sale?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Manufacture or sale. The "importation, manufacture or sale." This, I think, Mr. Speaker, is as simple a question as could be framed to ask the opinion of the people upon. It is largely framed upon the lines of the prohibition resolutions which have been on various occasions submitted to this House of Commons, and it is, I believe, a thoroughly satisfactory form of question on which to ask the vote of the people of Canada.

The fourth clause provides, that the Governor in Council shall by proclamation name a day on which the vote shall take place in the country.

The proclamation shall be published in at least three successive issues of the "Canada Gazette" and of the "Official Gazette" of each province.

This follows practically the lines of proclamations for a general election, and I may say here that the whole tenor of this Bill is to adapt to the purpose for which the Bill is introduced, the election law of the Dominion of Canada.

The provision as to who may vote, provides that everybody who is entitled to vote for the election of a member to the House of Commons under the Franchise Act as now before the House of Commons, shall be entitled to vote in the plebiscite.

Mr. MACLEAN. Cannot the women vote on it?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Those who are entitled to vote for a member of the House of Commons, without any change as to personnel or as to qualification.

Clause 6 provides for the application of the Dominion Election Act and the Franchise Act to the vote to be taken under this Act. This clause takes in every provision of those Acts, providing thereby not only for the franchise—that is to say, those who are entitled to vote—not only for the manner in which the vote shall be taken, but also providing for the machinery and providing the necessary provisions to enforce law and order, and such penalties as may be incurred by contravention of the Franchise Act or the Election Act. I think, that the clause is complete in this respect, and that it provides in the simplest and plainest form for everything that is necessary.

Clause 7 provides for regulations:

That the Governor in Council may from time to time, for the purposes of this Act, make and give all such regulations, orders and instructions, not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, as are in his judgment necessary or expedient for the effectual carrying out of such purposes, and to the adapting of such purposes, of the Dominion Elections Act and the North-west Territories Representation Act and their amendments, and the Franchise Act of 1898.

Clause 8 provides for the ballot paper, and the ballot paper as proposed contains simply the question which I have read, and beyond to the right hand of the question, are two columns, one under the word "yes" and one under the word "no." These columns contain the space on which the cross shall be made. Those who wish to vote "yea," affirmative on the question of prohibition, will place their cross under the word "yes"; those who wish to vote "no" or negatively on the question of prohibition, will place their cross under the word "no." Hon. genlemen can see here the form of the ballot which is as simple as it possibly could be and is only changed from the ordinary election ballot, as is necessary in consequence of the substitution of a question of this kind instead of the names of candidates for whom the votes shall be cast. The Bill says that the ballot paper shall be prepared at Ottawa by the Queen's Printer and forwarded to the different returning officers.

Clause 9 provides for the appointment of representatives at the polls, of the two sides of this question, in very much the same way as the Election Act provides for the presence of the representatives of the candidates at the poll.

Clause 10 provides for the oath being administered to the voters in the same way as in the Dominion Election Act.

Clause 11 provides for these representatives showing and producing a written authority from any authorized or known body of electors who may wish to be represented at the poll. For instance, the Dominion Alliance, or the Good Templars, or other temperance organizations on the one hand; and the Licensed Victuallers or any other liquor organization on the other hand, can give an authorization to one chosen by themselves to represent the side of this contest, the interests of which they wish to see safeguarded in the election.

Clause 12 provides that in case no such person with any authority comes to represent one side or the other, the returning officer may, as in the Dominion Election Act when there is no representative of a candidate; he may call upon any elector present to come and act in reference to the counting up of the ballots and for the conduct of the election.

Clause 13 provides what shall be done in the presence of those representatives who are rightly and properly appointed by any particular organization.

Clause 14 describes the way in which the ballot paper shall be marked, just in the way I have already described.

Clause 15 provides that after summing up the votes, as provided in the Dominion Elections Act, the returning officer shall declare the total number of votes given for the affirmative and the negative with respect to the question asked, and clause 16 provides for the returns to be made in practically the same way as returns are made by the deputy returning officers and the returning officers of each electoral division under the Dominion Elections Act; they being transmitted by post duly registered to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. Two copies of the return in each polling division must be delivered to the representatives of the two sides of the question, just in the same way as under the Dominion Elections Act a copy of the returns is delivered to the agents representing the various candidates. The forms of the returns and of the summing up, and the closing of the polls, and all the routine work, are to be exactly the same as they are in the case of Dominion elections.

Clause 17 provides that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall declare in the "Canada Gazette" the result of the voting in each electoral division as the returns come in. Clause 18 provides that after all the returns of the different electoral divisions shall have come in, a summary of all the returns, by electoral divisions, by provinces, and for the whole Dominion, shall be made up and published in the "Canada Gazette." This is the whole of the Act, showing, as I started out to say, that it is perfectly simple, that it provides only and solely for the submission of the question which I have read to the people of Canada, by means of the machinery which would be employed were a Dominion election to be held. I do not know that any further explanation is required; and as there is no need, upon the first reading, to go into details or into any argument on the matter, I will leave the Bill in the hands of the House, and move its first reading.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. I think that in the main question the word "or" is used. It struck me, as the hon. gentleman read it, that the word should be "and" instead of "or."

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The question is: "Are you in favour of the passage of an Act prohibiting the importation, manufacture or sale." I think the hon. member will see that this means the prohibition of each or any of these particular things; that is to say, the importation will be prohibited, the manufacture will be prohibited, and the sale will be prohibited.

Mr. FOSTER. All of them?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Each and all.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Each one separately or all together. If the hon. gentleman's amendment were made, it might be read by lawyers to mean that it would be the whole collectively that would be prohibited, or nothing.

Mr. FOSTER. I imagine that was the ultimate purpose of those who asked for the plebiscite—that all should be prohibited.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. But if my hon. friend's amendment were made, reading it in the light of my knowledge of the language, I would say that if any one of the things were done, it might be held that was not a contravention of the prohibition, but that a person would have to do the whole three in order to be guilty of contravening the law; and that certainly is not the intention or object of the people who have the temperance cause at heart.

Mr. FOSTER. I just made the criticism as a verbal one. The hon. gentleman speaks of my amendment. I do not call for any amendment.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I did not mean that.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that the Government mean to make it thoroughly inclusive—that what they intend to obtain is not simply an expression whether the electorate is in favour of one of these things and not the others, but all of these things. On the first reading of the Bill, I do not intend to enter into its merits or to offer any criticism of it, except to state this, that I think the hon. gentleman will have to add another clause to his Bill in order to give any point to it at all; and I throw this out for him in the meantime, so that when the Bill comes to the second reading he may be prepared; that is, if we are going to the cost of a plebiscite, which will not be a trifling matter at all, to obtain the opinion of the people, a clause should be added that in the event of a majority of votes being cast in favour of prohibition, the Government would then consider it its duty to introduce at the next succeeding session, a prohibitory law to carry out the effect of the popular will.

Mr. CASEY. You cannot put that in a Bill.

Mr. McINERNEY. If I understand the hon. gentleman correctly, he intends that the vote shall be taken under the Franchise Act now under consideration. But suppose that Act does not pass.

Mr. LISTER. It must pass.

Mr. McINERNEY. Suppose that Act were withdrawn. The hon. gentleman knows that there is no such thing as the Franchise Act of 1898.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The Government have not the slightest degree contemplated that Bill being withdrawn or not passing. The Government have decided, so far as they are concerned, that that Bill shall pass at this session of Parliament; and therefore it is not necessary to raise that question.

Mr. McINERNEY. There are other Bills which the Government determined to pass, which have not passed into law. Every Bill the Government determines to pass does not necessarily pass. What I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to is this. This Bill provides that the vote shall be taken under the Franchise Act of 1898, and I call his attention to the fact that when he introduces this Bill, there is no such thing as the Franchise Act of 1898; and if any accident should happen to that Bill—because I believe that when it comes to be considered, the Government will have good sense enough to withdraw it—or if it should be defeated—

Mr. CASEY. Where?

Mr. McINERNEY. In this House or in another place having the authority to defeat the Bill, then we would have no such thing as the Franchise Act of 1898, and the temperance people of this country would be deprived of any opportunity this year of passing on the prohibition question.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I do not know whether we are to interpret the words of my hon. friend who has just spoken as a threat that the fate which has already overtaken another Bill that has passed this House this session is to overtake the Franchise Act; but I will wait until the Senate have pronounced against the will of the people once more before I will accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman. But let me remind my hon. friend that if the Franchise Act which is before this House should be rejected in another House, then this House will have to determine whether to have what I have called before a terror to the members of this House—another revision this year of the electoral lists—or to have the vote of the people on the plebiscite taken on lists four years old. I suppose my hon. friend does not consider that it would be advisable on such an important measure that the vote should be taken on so imperfect an electorate as is provided by lists four years old. Then another question would arise, whether or not this measure would have to be postponed until another year, so that a new revision of the lists could take place, for I may say that it does not enter into the intentions of the Government to have this plebiscite taken on lists four years old, which disfranchise perhaps one-fourth of the rightful electors of this country. Therefore, we have contemplated that the votation under this Act shall take place under the franchise which we hope shall by-and-by be the franchise of Canada.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I consider that the manifestation of temper which we have had from the Prime Minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN—in consequence of an attempt of a member on this side of the House to place a member of the Government in a proper position—in consequence of a member on this side of the House, who happens to be the chairman of a committee of ourselves who have been going over that Franchise Act, suggesting, very properly, as I consider, and, with great deference to the Prime Minister's superior experience, very properly as a parliamentarian, that, when initiating legislation in this way, it is not a proper thing to place in the Bill which is introduced a statement that a franchise which has not yet been called into existence by Parliament or by this House shall be the base on which the vote is taken. Why, Sir, it is only common sense, and the Prime Minister falls into what I cannot help characterizing as a piece of buncombe unworthy of one of his high position, when he comes forward and attempts to make a piece of platform claptrap by a reference to the Senate. Is it to be supposed that this House is so degraded that any Government is in the position to declare, before a Bill has been considered in committee, that as sure as fate it is going to pass. One of the Quebec newspapers described the right hon. Prime Minister as telling his followers in Room 16 that whether they are right or wrong he is going to hold his head. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) laughs. Would he prefer that I gave the description of the First Minister which the hon. gentleman himself gave of him, namely that he was a man who is venerated all over and absolutely without principle? The right hon. gentleman is assuming to-day the attitude that, according to truthful chronicles from that caucus, he assumed when he told his followers that he was going to have his head no matter whether his followers thought he was right or wrong. But he cannot have his way in this House without convincing this House that he is right. I need not suppose that because he has a big majority behind him, if a Bill is found on discussion to be a piece of legislation that it is neither in the interests of this country nor in the dignity of this Parliament, to pass, this Parliament has fallen so low that it will pass at his dictation, such a Bill. I hope Parliament has not fallen that low. This exhibition of temper, in reply to the fair comment as made by my hon. friend behind me on the Bill brought forward by a colleague of the right hon. First Minister, was unworthy of the Minister, most unworthy of his past record, and most unworthy of his present high position.

Mr. CRAIG. I merely rise to put a question concerning this proposed measure. As my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) said a few minutes ago, it will cost a great deal of money, and no doubt a great deal of trouble will be taken by the temperance people to see that the friends of prohibition record their vote. The suggestion is most opportune that before we spend any more time on this Bill we should have the assurance from the right hon. First Minister that if a majority is recorded in favour of prohibition, the Government pledges itself to bring in a prohibitory Bill. Another most important point on which we should be informed is this—whether the Government will require a majority of the votes recorded or a majority of voters on the lists before they feel called on to bring in a prohibitory Bill. These are two most important questions, and temperance people would be greatly obliged to the hon. First Minister if he will answer them, and let us know where we stand—whether a majority of votes will be sufficient or whether a majority of the voters will be required before the Government pass a prohibitory Bill, and whether they will pledge themselves, in case there is such a majority, to pass it.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The Franchise Acts of the provinces, according to this Bill, are those on which the voting will take place. In Ontario the franchise law provides that before an election, there shall be a registration of the voters in the towns and cities. Is it intended that before this proposition is submitted to the people, there shall be in all the towns and cities where that law now prevails a registration of the voters?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. (Mr. Fisher). That point is provided for in the Franchise Bill before the House, the terms of which will apply to this election, just as if it were an election for the House of Commons.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That simply means that the Government will not be able for some months to submit the proposition to the people, as there would have to be a registration in the towns and cities of Ontario previously.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. My impression is that the Franchise Bill provides that if a year has expired between the registration in cities and towns in Ontario and the date of another election, a new registration would have to be made; but if it has not, the last registration would be taken and acted upon.

Mr. McNEILL. I just wish to say that it seems to me the criticisms of my hon. friend beside me on this Bill were perfectly well taken, and I rise to enter my protest, as strongly as I can, against the position taken by the Government. I think that it is not short of insult to the House of Commons for the members of the Government, one after another to declare in this House that they are determined that a Bill shall pass which has not been fully discussed in this House. It is equivalent to saying either that their followers are impervious to any argument that may be adduced, or that no matter how completely convinced they may be that the Bill ought not to pass, the Government have the power to make them pass it. My hon. friend (Mr. Fisher) shakes his head. If he will be good enough to show me how it is possible to explain in any other way the position that the Government has taken I shall be very glad to hear of it. But I repeat I cannot understand how any Government can have the assurance to declare in this House that a Bill shall pass, which has not been discussed at all in committee, except on the supposition I have referred to, namely, that they are convinced that their supporters are impervious to argument or that they are determined, no matter how convinced their supporters may be, to compel them to pass it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I shall explain it when I am in order.

Mr. BERGERON. Every one can understand that it will cost a great deal of money to carry out the Bill which is presented by my hon. friend. The vote will be taken according to the law governing our Dominion elections, which means expenditure for the payment of returning officers, clerks, and so on. I wish to ask the Government whether they have examined into the constitutionality of their measure in this respect. Supposing that the majority in certain provinces voted in favour of prohibition, and that in some other provinces the majority went against it. Would it be constitutional for this Parliament and Government to enforce prohibition in the one province which may have voted against it? The reason I ask this is because I was present one day at a demonstration where the Attorney General of Quebec, who is supposed to be a very learned lawyer, declared that he looked upon an Act of that sort as unconstitutional, and if the Parliament of Canada should submit this question and it should carry in the Dominion as a whole, while the majority in Quebec voted against it, he, as Attorney General of the province, would move that an address be presented to the Imperial Parliament to preserve Quebec from being subjected to the Act.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Oh, no.

Mr. BERGERON. I am not surprised to hear the hon. Solicitor General laugh, because, I suppose, he has not studied the question very much. I think it is a good deal more serious than the Solicitor General seems to think. Let us take it for granted that prohibition will carry and that the Government will carry out its promise and bring before Parliament a Bill to give effect to the vote of the majority. I suppose that the province of Quebec will vote against prohibition—I believe sincerely that it will. I want to know whether, in such a case, this Government is going to impose prohibition on Quebec. And I think this should be known before we go on to expend from $400,000 to $500,000 for plebiscite purely and simply to carry out what hon. gentlemen opposite call a promise made at their convention. Before taking this step, we should be perfectly sure that we are not doing something that is unconstitutional.

Mr. MACLEAN. I would like to add: If a province is to have that right, why should a county or a city have it also? I would like to see the city solicitor of Toronto free to send a similar address in case prohibition is carried, although we vote against it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I understand that my hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) will not vote for the amendment which, I understand, is to be moved by my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) to the effect that the Bill should contain a declaration that, if there is a majority for prohibition, the law shall have effect as soon as the vote is taken.

Mr. BERGERON. I have not heard of any amendment yet.

Mr. IVES. The temperance people were a good deal exercised until recently by the fear that this measure would be harnessed up with a question that would perhaps militate against an affirmative verdict. But I think that while their minds may be set at rest on that point, they will have equal reason to find fault with the leader of the Government for having harnessed this question up to his odious franchise measure, which is now before Parliament. He must know very well that the Franchise Act is a measure that the Liberal party promised for years, but one which has been opposed by the Conservative party from the first. By harnessing the plebiscite to the repeal of the present franchise law and the adoption of the local lists as the basis of representation in the House of Commons, he is arraying against his plebiscite measure more or less of opposition which he might very easily have avoided. It is quite possible also that the right hon. gentleman, in his astuteness, thinks that this is going to afford a door of escape in case he does not think it politic hereafter to introduce a measure founded on a vote for prohibition. One thing is certain—it is a gag upon this Parliament, and upon both branches of this Parliament, to force them to adopt the Franchise Act. If either House were not to pass that measure hokus bolus, without the slightest possible amendment, the hon. gentleman would have an adequate excuse, in his own mind, for refusing to go on with the plebiscite vote or refusing to introduce the measure to make it binding and effective. Supposing the Senate were to amend the measure in any particular, the right hon. gentleman could say: I will not submit this Bill upon a Franchise Act mangled and amended by a Tory Senate that ought to be abolished, and all that sort of thing. But if the hon. gentleman is harnessing this Bill up to something that it should not be entangled with, he is incurring the opposition of strong Conservatives in the country against the harnessed measure, and he is doing that quite unnecessarily. It is evidently in order that he may have a door to escape, if a door of escape he finds it necessary to seek. Supposing the Senate, when the measure comes before them, were to amend that part of the Bill which relates to the adoption of the local franchise, supposing they were to pass the measure in all other particulars, but in that particular they were to say that the Dominion shall have its own franchise which shall be one and the same all over the Dominion—for example, manhood suffrage; in that case the right hon. gentleman could retire gracefully with this measure, and say: I will not submit it, I will not go on with the plebiscite because the Senate has mangled my Franchise Act. This question is not a political question and ought not to be a political question. There are quite as many temperance people in this country who are Conservatives as there are temperance people who are Liberals. The desire on this side of the House is to keep it free from political entanglements and partisanship, and the first step this Government takes is to make a partisan measure and one that a large number of Conservatives must oppose because of the course the Government have taken.

Mr. INGRAM. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) in discussing the lists to be used in the cities and towns where registration is in existence, said that the Act provided that, if a list was in existence for one year previous to the submitting of this plebiscite vote, the Government would prepare the lists themselves. Now, section 8 of the Franchise Bill now before the House provides that when a list is not in existence for 12 months "the Governor in Council may appoint all necessary officers and confer upon them all necessary powers, and in the preparation and revision and bringing into force of such new voters' lists the provisions of the laws of the province regulating the preparation and revision and bringing into force of the provincial voters' lists in such cases shall, as far as possible, be observed and followed." I apprehend that there is nothing in this Act which compels a province to pay for the revision of this list to be used in the plebiscite vote. On the other hand, I see no provision in the Act to compel this Government to pay for it. Surely you could not compel the province to bear this expense.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Clause 7 of this Bill provides that where it is necessary on the part of the Governor in Council to make regulations, they can make the necessary regulations without appealing to the provincial authorities, but they must do it on the same lines as those upon which the provincial authorities can do it.

Mr. INGRAM. That is clause 7 of the Plebiscite Bill which you have just introduced. It provides for payment of costs of that kind.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think so.

Mr. TAYLOR. Why could not the Government have the vote taken on the municipal lists?

Mr. IVES.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear; that is not so bad after all.

Mr. TAYLOR. If you want to remove this question from the arena of politics and do the thing fairly, the last municipal list should be the one used. There is no question but that this is going to affect property. There are a certain number of women in municipalities who own property in their own right and have the right to vote. These persons should have the right to vote on this question. To base this law on a Bill that is not yet made law is unfair. But in every province there is a municipal list for the election of municipal councils and if this question were referred to this class of voters it would remove it from politics and would bring out a fair expression of opinion.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

POST OFFICES CLOSED.

Mr. TAYLOR asked,

How many post offices have been closed since the 1st day of July, 1896?

Where the same located?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). There were 169 post offices closed, 19 of which have been reopened, making in all 150 which have been closed since the 1st of July, 1896. During the same period, 297 post offices have been opened, making a net increase during that period of 147 post offices. The hon. gentleman asks where these offices are located. Now, I must say to the hon. gentleman, if he does not desire me to think I am treating him as he thought I did about Seeley's Bay, does he seriously wish me to proceed and read the list?

Mr. TAYLOR. Not necessarily. Lay it on the Table of the House.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am willing to lay it on the Table.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. Minister volunteered information that was not asked for. I did not ask for the number of new offices opened during the same period.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I was sure the hon. gentleman was thirsting for information, and so I gave it to him.

IMPORTS FROM GREAT BRITAIN AND UNITED STATES.

Mr. WALLACE asked,

What was the amount of the total importations entered for consumption from Great Britain and the United States, respectively, for the six months ending 31st December, 1896, and for the six months ending 31st December, 1897; also, the duties paid by Great Britain and the United States, respectively, for the same periods?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The total value of goods imported from Great Britain and entered for consumption, during the six months ending 31st December, 1896, amounted to $15,080,272; and for the corresponding period of the year 1897, the amount was $15,391,318. The total value of goods imported from the United States and entered for consumption, during the six months ending 31st December, 1896, amounted to $32,214,340; and for the corresponding period of the year 1897, the amount was $38,577,025. It is not possible at present, to furnish information as to the duties paid on such imports from the United States and Great Britain, respectively, for the reason that in the statistical books of the Department of Customs the duty collected on articles entered for consumption is not kept separately for each country. Such duty is arrived at by calculations usually at the end of each year—the calculation being made by applying the tariff rate to each item by countries. To make this calculation for the periods in question would involve a very large amount of work, and it could not be completed in time to be of use during the present session of Parliament.

DISMISSAL OF WM. REID.

Mr. BERGERON asked,

1. Whether William Reid, bridge-keeper on the Beauharnois Canal, has been discharged?
2. If so, for what reason?
3. By whom has he been succeeded?
4. Who recommended the appointment of Mr. Reid's successor?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. William Reid, bridge-keeper on the Beauharnois Canal, has not been re-employed when the department were engaging employees for the opening of the new season. 2. The reason he was not re-employed was that another person was preferred. 3. He was succeeded by Hormisdas Lecavalier. 4. Mr. Lecavalier was recommended by a person in whom the Government has the most implicit confidence.

DISMISSAL OF XAVIER LEFAIVRE.

Mr. MONK asked,

1. Why was Xavier Lefaiivre dismissed as lockmaster of lock No. 3, St. Gabriel, on the Lachine Canal?
2. Was there any complaint made against him, and by whom?
3. Was there any complaint made against Xavier Lefaiivre's successor in office?
4. Was there any inquiry on said complaint, and what was the finding of the person who made the inquiry?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Xavier Lefaiivre, lockmaster of lock No. 3, St. Gabriel, Lachine Canal, was not dismissed, but he was not re-employed on the 1st May, 1897. 2. The employment of the present lockmaster, Jos. St. Denis, was recommended by those in whom the department had confidence. 3. A complaint was made against Xavier Lefaiivre's successor, Jos. St. Denis, by some of the lockmen and boat captains. 4. An inquiry was made into the complaint, which was not sustained.

COMMISSIONERS—ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY.

Mr. MONK asked,

1. What is the amount claimed from the Government as compensation by each of the commissioners appointed to investigate the administration of the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary?
2. How much has been paid to each in partial or final settlement of such claims?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). 1. O. K. Fraser, $2,480; James Noxon, $2,710; D. A. Lafortune, $7,350. Mr. Noxon has received on account $560; Mr. Fraser, $570; Mr. Lafortune has not received anything.

JUBILEE STAMPS.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the hon. Postmaster General a question, although it is not on the paper? I think the question was put once before, but the hon. gentleman did not give an answer, and he may have the knowledge now. I wish to know how much was received from Jubilee stamps up to the 30th June, 1897, and how much since?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I think the answer which I read to the House met the case. It explained the impossibility of giving the information.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it impossible to give it?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The Jubilee stamps were furnished along with ordinary stamps to the postmasters, and there has been no separate return made from all over Canada. There is always a certain amount of stamps outstanding in the hands of postmasters; and unless we applied to all the postmasters to give returns showing what particular portion of stamps on hand were Jubilee stamps, it would be impossible to know what quantity of Jubilee stamps were actually sold. Stamps are not sold for cash, but accounts are kept throughout the whole country. I think the hon. gentleman sees the difficulty of answering his question.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will allow me—Does he mean to say to the House that these postmasters have not made a return for the year 1896-97?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No, I did not say that.

Mr. FOSTER. Then if they have made their returns, they must have returned what they have unsold.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It don't show whether they are Jubilee stamps or others.

Mr. FOSTER. Is he certain of that?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I gave the answer of Mr. Stanton, I think it is, who is in charge of the branch, the answer that he gave me. I know nothing about the details, but I will make inquiry again and see if he is in error.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The Postmaster General knows that when the Jubilee stamps were issued a certain amount of ordinary stamps had been issued already, and these can be accounted for under the returns coming in from the various post offices. Now, if the Postmaster General will look into the amount of the Jubilee stamps which he has issued, and take the amount of the old outstanding stamps which were in existence when he issued the Jubilee stamps, he can arrive at a solution of the difficulty.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No, you have to ask for further returns.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I beg to differ with the hon. gentleman. He knows that the stamps which are issued must be accounted for by the different postmasters. There can be no question about that. That is a fact well known in the post office, and cannot be contested. Now, up to a certain period of time, there was only one class of stamps, that is the old stamps. Accounts must have come in regularly—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will allow me to point out the irregularity of his making a speech now, when a mere question was asked by courtesy.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am not making a speech.

Mr. SPEAKER. Then I am afraid I do and know what a speech is. There is nothing at all before the House, the hon. gentleman sees this is quite irregular. I must insist on carrying out the rule.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I really do not mean to make a speech, I am putting a question to the hon. gentleman. I ask the hon. gentleman whether he cannot make out a statement according to the rule which I have just laid down, and which every officer in his department knows.

Mr. WALLACE. I should like to ask the Postmaster General a question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot ask questions of which notice has not been given. When the Orders of the Day are called, certain subjects are allowed to be brought up as a matter of courtesy, but at this stage of the proceedings there is no possibility of allowing any questions unless they appear on the Notice paper.

Mr. WALLACE. The question I wished to ask was in regard to stamps.

Mr. SPEAKER. Because I was wrong in allowing the hon. member for York to ask a question irregularly, that does not permit other members to continue. I made the mistake, and I admit it, and I will endeavour not to repeat it.

Mr. WALLACE. I bow to your decision, Mr. Speaker.

REPORT.

Report of the Department of the Interior for the year 1897.—The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton).

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY.

Mr. McMULLEN. I should like to know when we may expect the report of the commissioners appointed to investigate the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). To-morrow.

JUBILEE STAMPS.

Mr. WALLACE. I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the statement is correct that postage stamps of the Jubilee issue are not redeemable. The other issues can be redeemed in large quantities, and I desire to ascertain whether the same rule applies to the stamps of the Jubilee year, and whether they are also redeemable.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). There is no law requiring the department to redeem stamps. It is quite the exception to redeem them, Canada being practically the only country that does so. We have been redeeming the regular issue of stamps, but the Jubilee stamps when issued were declared to be issued finally and not redeemable.

CANNED GOODS FOR THE YUKON.

Mr. QUINN. I should like to call the attention of the Government to a clipping from the "National Provisioner," of New York and Chicago. It is in the following terms:—

A contract has been awarded at Ottawa to Libbey, McNeill & Libbey. The contract is a large one, and requires canned meats to be furnished for use both in the Klondike and northwest. This is the first time such a contract has been awarded to a Chicago concern, the Canadian Government having heretofore secured these goods in the Canadian market.

I have received intimation from an eminent packing firm in Canada, which tells me it has received an order for about 100,000 pounds of canned goods for the Yukon, bought by a large American company, and this is in competition with the people who have secured this contract from the Government. They also intimate that the contract, if awarded, was awarded without any tenders being asked for, and in a way to prevent Canadian packers receiving any benefit from it; and this firm which has communicated with me declares it possible only to produce the goods and sell them to the Government at the same prices, but even at lower prices than they can be supplied for. I therefore wish to ask the Government if such a contract has been given, or rather if the article I have read is true in effect or not.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have received no notice of this matter, and I am sorry the hon. gentleman did not communicate with me, because I might have been able to give him some information. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will hand me the paper from which he read.

Mr. QUINN. Certainly. I may say in explanation that I received it only a few minutes before the House opened.

INQUIRIES RESPECTING RETURNS.

Mr. McALISTER. I wish to draw the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that an order of the House was passed for correspondence and papers relating to Oak Bay Mills post office. When will this return be brought down?

Mr. MONK. I desire to call attention to the dilatoriness of the Government in bringing down returns. Two returns were ordered to be brought down by the Department of Public Works on 15th February last. I think those returns will be very short. One has reference to the wharf at Pointe Claire and the other called for the report of an engineer connected with some survey at Ste. Genevieve. These returns cannot be more than two or three pages at the outside. As we are now considering the Estimates, I call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to these matters. Short returns were also called for on 14th March, two from the Department of Public Works and two from the Department of Militia. I trust that these returns will be brought down before we proceed with the Estimates.

Mr. DAVIN. Did the Minister of Public Works remember to make inquiries respecting the Edmonton bridge?

WORKS ON THE RIVER STE. ANNE.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I wish to ask the Minister of Public Works a question. It is in connection with the protection works which are to be carried out on the River Ste. Anne, for which an appropriation of $5,000 was voted last session? In reply to a question which I asked him last session, the hon. Minister of Public Works informed me that the matter was under consideration. As I do not see any appropriation in the Estimates which were brought down this year, I should like to know what action is to be taken in this regard?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). (Translation.) The matter is still under consideration.

IMPORTATION OF HORSES FROM UNITED STATES.

Mr. MARTIN. Is the Minister of Customs aware that a large number of American horses are being taken into the Northwest and Alberta at very low valuations? I find from a letter the following:—

Americans are rushing horses in here entered at $10 per head, on which they pay but $2 duty. This is a manifest injustice, as we cannot send a horse into the United States under $50 duty. * * * Three thousand have already come in, and 10,000 are soon to follow.

I would ask the Minister of Customs if he is aware that those horses are entered at this new valuation?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Representations of a nature similar to that have been made to the department on several different occasions formerly, and they have been renewed lately. Some time ago the department took action and we wrote to our collectors asking them to ascertain the facts known to them in connection with the matter. It is engaging the attention of the department, and has been for some little time.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act.

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I beg to move that after the word "Canada" in the 16th line, sub-paragraph 3, the following words be added:—

And in the province of Prince Edward Island means the election of an Assemblyman.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That is because they have two different franchises there.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY. In subsection (a) of section 3, the hon. gentleman will see that it refers to an electoral district of the House of Commons. Now, the provincial lists are prepared for provincial electoral divisions, and that cannot in the province of Ontario be the same. Has the hon. gentleman made provision to meet that?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In section 7, I have endeavoured to provide for the emergency the hon. gentleman suggests.

On section 5,

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to ask the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), who has charge of this Bill, what provision he has made, if any, for Prince Edward Island, which, as I pointed out on a former occasion, has no voters' list at present in existence.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). It is not essential that there should be a voters' list. I would like my hon. friend to point out in what respect he thinks we have overlooked the case of Prince Edward Island. The first paragraph of this section provides for the adoption of the provincial qualifications. In the province of Quebec and in the province of Ontario the essential requisite to enable any one to vote is his registration on the voters' list. In the province of Prince Edward Island there is no such requisite. I draw my hon. friend's attention to section 17, where he will find it provided that upon an elector entering the room where the poll is held, and declaring his name, if he is found entitled to vote, he shall receive from the deputy returning officer a ballot paper. I may say to my hon. friend that when we reach that section I intend to introduce an amendment to make it absolutely clear, so as to provide that in Prince Edward Island the same method of voting shall be pursued as in the local elections.

Mr. HEYD. I must claim the indulgence of the House for a few minutes, while I allude to the effect which this section has in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. It says :

The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote thereat shall be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

Unfortunately for some 647 of my constituents, their names do not appear on the provincial lists. The provincial laws of Ontario do not recognize Indians, in the ordinary sense of the term, to be qualified to exercise the provincial franchise; but some twelve years ago provision was made in the Dominion Franchise Act, for the first time in the history of this country, to admit Indians of that kind to the exercise of the franchise, and they have exercised that right on four different occasions. Whether that legislation was wise or unwise is a question I am not going to discuss to-day. At the time the Bill giving them the franchise was introduced, it created a great deal of excitement. The party who introduced were charged with having introduced it for political purposes. But I do not propose to discuss that question or introduce anything of a controversial character. The clause of this Bill which I have read has given rise to a good deal of comment in my constituency, as our Indian friends, after having enjoyed the franchise for the last twelve years, and having exercised it on four different occasions, have learned to regard it with considerable affection. I am quite willing to admit that at the time the franchise was conferred upon them, they objected to it. It was a new thing, something that had never been indulged in before. On the reserve in South Brant the affairs of the tribe were conducted on the old tribal system, under which the chiefs were elected by the females of the family; and to have suddenly obtained the right to take part in the management of the affairs of this Dominion was rather a big undertaking for them. But now, after having exercised that right in four different elections, they appreciate it, or at least a large portion of them do; and I have received petitions from that section represented by 647 votes, or nearly 4,000 people, who are affected by this proposed change; and I will read these petitions in order that the House may understand the position these people occupy :

Ohsweken Council House,
21st February, 1898.

C. B. Heyd, Esq., M.P.

My dear Mr. Heyd,—I herewith inclose you a copy of a minute passed by the Six Nations Council on the 17th inst., respecting the Franchise Act, which you referred to in your letter to me for the consideration of the council. The majority of the chiefs desired me to ask you kindly to do all you can to retain the privilege of the franchise which they enjoyed heretofore, and to pay no attention to protests which may be forwarded to you by a few of the chiefs who are opposed to the measure.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,
JOSIAH HILL,
Secy., S.N.C.

I have also received a petition signed by a large number of the chief warriors of the tribe, to the number of some 276, as follows :—

Honourable Sir,—We, the undersigned warriors of the Six Nations band of Indians, residing on the Grand River reservation, in support of the wise legislation and decision of the Six Nations Council to retain the franchise, we the undersigned electors beg to subscribe our names in support of that decision upon the following grounds :—

In the interests and in behalf of civilization and education, we desire to advance as an intelligent community, and not go back or retrograde to a state of disregard of all Christian principles, and an irresponsible state of government of our national affairs.

We realize that the conferring of the franchise has been a great educating factor amongst our people, and that in having a voice in the government of the Dominion, in which our treaty rights exist and have been respected, that we have a power in our representative in Parliament which we did not have before the franchise was conferred, in the management of our affairs by the Government of Canada, in whose safe-keeping our treaty rights have been intrusted by the Imperial Government of England, by the sanction of our mother, Her Britannic Majesty the Queen of Great Britain.

We desire, in conclusion, to request the Government to concede to us, in accordance with the decision of the Six Nations Council of 17th February last, the privilege of exercising the franchise, in a special manner, as heretofore given to us by a special provision, by Act of Parliament of Canada.

Your Government is requested to consider the fact that there are some of that portion of the population of our reserve who are Pagans, and many of whom are not, in regard to property qualifications, entitled to a vote, even if they so desired, who are desirous of setting aside the Franchise Act. That in regard to civilization, education, enlightenment and progress, it would be unwise for the Government to support the weak contentions of these people, who are praying for the retrogression of our people to a position such as existed two hundred years ago.

In conclusion, we desire to express the hope that the Government may kindly support the recent decision of the council, and retain for us the exercise of the franchise, as herein requested by us.

And we, your humble petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

In support of that petition, there are some 276 names. These names include, of course, the great majority of the chiefs and leading men of the Six Nation Indians. It would not be fair, although I have pledged myself to always try and advance the interests of the Six Nation Indians, as expressed by their regularly constituted authorities, to conceal the fact that I have also received a petition, signed by 354, asking that the franchise, which was forced upon them some twelve years ago, be taken away because it introduces an element of discord in their midst and instead of bringing about that era of civilization which it was expected to promote, has tended to bring about discord and antagonism among the various families living on the reserve. The petition against the franchise is as follows:—

We, the undersigned, warriors and members of the Six Nations, residing in the townships of Tuscarora, Oneida and Onondaga, in the province of Ontario, desire from the council of chiefs held 1st March, 1898, a privilege to express our views respecting the enfranchisement to the Indians of the Six Nations

And at the council of the warriors, held 4th March, in their council-house, a decision was arrived at, that a petition will be circulated to solicit the signatures of those who are not in favour of the enfranchisement.

Therefore, your petitioners desire to ask you to bring the matter before the House of Commons, now in session, to have that privilege, and to exempt the Six Nations from the operation of the enfranchisement.

We, therefore, your petitioners, hope to have the fullest attention from you, as we ever pray, &c., &c.

This petition is signed by 354 who are opposed to the retention of the franchise. I have a petition here signed by the Missisagua Indians, who have a council of their own election, and are not governed by the hereditary system, signed by some 31, in favour of the franchise. These are the peculiar circumstances in which the Six Nation Indians are placed.

Mr. DAVIN. What is the relative number for and against?

Mr. HEYD. I think that the two petitions in favour of the franchise contain together 276 names, while the petition opposed to it has 354 names. The Six Nation council is constituted of some 60 chiefs, who are elected by the women from the various families of the tribe. These are almost unanimously in favour of the franchise. Those opposed to the franchise are principally the pagan element, which has always objected to it. Numerically the hostiles have the majority. Now that they have had the privilege of exercising the franchise, that they did not at first want, these people have learned to appreciate it. Being precluded from exercising their hereditary combative instincts, they find an opportunity of getting rid of their superfluous steam at election time, and have learned to be most inveterate politicians. They take the Conservative or Liberal side in the most ardent manner, and take a most lively interest in politics, and are just as well qualified to exercise the franchise as are the whites. It may be a matter of some interest to those members who have not large Indian settlements in their constituencies to learn that in my constituency out of 4,000 Indians 667 have the right to vote, and of these a great many have learned to appreciate that privilege. It is on their behalf that I am lifting up my voice to-day, and while I am sorry to take up the time of the House, it must be admitted that a great deal of its time has been absorbed in much more frivolous discussion. Although, in the first place, a great many were opposed to the franchise, they appear to have exercised it to a considerable extent when they had the opportunity. In the first election after they were given the franchise, which took place in 1887, there were 463 voters on the list, and of those 250 voted.

An hon. MEMBER. What did they cost?

Mr. HEYD. I am proud to say that it does not cost anything to get an Indian to vote. He is sufficiently loyal to our country to come forward and vote as he thinks best in the interest of his country without any money inducement. It may be interesting to hon. gentlemen to know how they voted. In 1887, the magnificent personality of the present Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) induced 123 to give him their support, while 127 went against him. It was supposed by the Liberals that the Indians were put on the list because they were under the control of the Government that managed their affairs. That may or not have been the case; but naturally the Indian is loyal to the Government, and they have steadily stood by the Government ever since the right of the franchise has been conferred on them. In the election of 1891, out of 414 on the lists 214 voted—102 for the Liberal party and 112 against. In the election of 1896, 647 were on the roll. The number had been increased by over 200. Of these 400 voted, showing that a very large proportion of those who had the right to vote, exercises that right. Well, at the last election out of 647 on the roll, 437 cast their vote.

Mr. BERGERON. How did they vote ?

Mr. HEYD. My modesty prevents me from saying.

An hon. MEMBER. He raked them in.

Mr. HEYD. Some hon. gentleman says, I raked them in. I am happy to-day that I got a majority. The Indians probably thought that they ought to stand by the Government, and they stood by it in good stead, so far as I was concerned. Under the circumstances, I believe that their right to the franchise should be continued. And I beg to move the following resolution :—

That after the word "election" in the thirty-third line of the Bill, at the end of subdivision "a," the following words be added :—

"Provided that, notwithstanding any provincial enactment, the Six Nation Indians and other Indian tribes that have the right to vote, under the Electoral Franchise Act of 48-49 Victoria, chap. 40, and shall be entitled to vote at any election for the Dominion Parliament."

Now, I desire, before I sit down, to make the plain statement that these Indians are educated, in a great many instances, that on the reserve in the county from which I come there are ten schools in active operation, and there is also an industrial school which has 125 pupils. Some of these men who are being deprived of their vote are amongst the most intelligent people of Canada. While many among them have probably not had the advantage of education, they all know what they are doing when they come to vote for. In the last election, out of the large number, 442 that cast their votes, there was only two spoiled and three rejected ballots, being a much smaller proportion, I believe, than amongst the white population in any part of the Dominion. Believing that these Indians are intelligent, and that they are qualified to vote, and as they have exercised the franchise in four general elections, I stand up and ask that they shall have that right conceded to them under this Bill.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I would be prepared to vote in favour of this motion for this reason—I feel that now that the franchise has been granted to the Indians in Canada, it would be a retrograde step to deprive them of it. I believe it is almost an unheard of thing for the franchise, once conceded, to be taken away from the people who have enjoyed it.

Mr. HEYD.

Mr. QUINN. This is only for a portion of the Indians.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not so understand it. I understand that it includes all the Indians that have the right to vote under the existing franchise law. It is that principle that I support.

Mr. QUINN. I think my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron) is mistaken.

Mr. BERGERON. The amendment applies only to the Indians in the county of Brant.

Mr. LISTER. I take it that it does not matter to what county the Indian belongs. I believe that the amendment introduced by my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Heyd) ought to become part of the Bill in some shape, though, perhaps, as drafted, it cannot be incorporated at the present moment. There is a principle in this matter. We are not to consider whether the granting of the franchise to the Indians was a wise step or not. We are not now to consider whether the Government of that day, in view of the fact that the Indians were the wards of the Government, should have given the franchise to the Indians. We are face to face with the fact that it has been the law for the past twelve or fourteen years, and that the Indians have exercised the right to vote during all that time, and that it is now proposed by the Bill under consideration to take away from them this privilege. I think I may fairly challenge the Government to produce an instance in which the franchise has been given to a class of the population and afterwards taken away from them by the law. So far as the right of these people is concerned, it is not of very much consequence in the consideration of the present question, whether they have exercised the right which was given to them wisely or not. They have had the same right as every other voter in the Dominion of Canada. But I may say to the House that my experience is that the Indians upon the reservation in my county have exercised that right as wisely, as prudently and as intelligently as any other class of the people in the county of Lambton. I may say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the tribe in the county of Lambton differs from that in Brant inasmuch as they have, for many years, elected their own chiefs and other officers, and in every contest that has taken place these Indians have taken an active and intelligent part in the election in which they have had a right to vote. As an instance of their great intelligence, I may say that, notwithstanding the fact of the old Government being in power, I have always received a majority of the votes of the Indians upon that reservation. That proves one thing—it proves that the influence which it was supposed the Government would have had on the Indians has not in fact existed, but that the Indians, notwithstanding that they are wards of the Government, have been sufficiently independent to vote as they thought proper.

Mr. CLANCY. Then, you have been mistaken?

Mr. LISTER. How?

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) opposed the enfranchisement of the Indians very strongly.

Mr. LISTER. No, not very strongly. I have thought as I think now, that if the Indians were to have the vote, the Government should have freed them from the position they then occupied, but the Government thought differently and granted them the franchise. They gave them full rights of citizenship, and now we propose to take those rights away from them.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. LISTER. Yes, unless the local government passes an Act extending the right to them, which we have no guarantee they will do. The result will be that the Indians who have for years exercised this right will be deprived of it. After giving a class of the population the right to exercise the franchise, that right should not be taken away from them. Therefore, I shall support the amendment.

Mr. MACLEAN. I think that the argument the hon. gentleman has just put forward shows the weakness of this whole Bill. The fact that provincial legislatures can do things that will deprive us in effect of a federal franchise, is the weakness of the whole case, and shows the danger to this Canadian people as it has never been presented before. I should like to see the Indians have their vote. I know many of them on the Grand River reservation, they are intelligent farmers and well qualified to exercise the franchise. But the argument put forward by the hon. gentleman proves what we on this side have always said, and would almost go so far as to justify another body in defending the Canadian people in the matter of their franchise. I hope now that this question is put that the greatest care will be taken to insert some provision under which the provincial legislature cannot rob the Canadian people of the management of their own franchise.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not think it can be said that this Bill or the action of this House proposes to take from any class of the community the right of the franchise. This Bill merely proposes to abdicate the exercise of a power to the provincial government. We are dealing with a question irrelevant to the issue when we talk about the right of Indians or anybody else to be on the list, for we propose to adopt the principle that we will not meddle with the formation of the lists. The Government in 1885 passed a franchise law and proceeded to establish a separate set of machinery for the purpose of having a voters' list for the Dominion. In view of all the evils that followed this action, we now propose to declare that that was a step which was not in the interest of the people.

The Bill proceeds upon the assumption that the condition of things that existed in this Dominion for eighteen years after confederation, when the elections were held upon the provincial lists, was a condition of things we had better return to. During that eighteen years there was not the slightest objection to the operation of that principle. There was never any serious objection raised in this House or in this country that the provinces had not dealt properly or fairly with any element of the population in their regulation of the matter of the franchise. I repeat that we are simply going back, by the provisions of this Bill, to the old regulations which worked smoothly and to the public satisfaction for the first eighteen years of the life of this confederation. It was unfortunate when that condition of things was set aside, without reason, without application upon the part of any element of society in Canada that that step should be taken. We have gone on under the operation of this Bill now for many years. We have found it to be costly and unworkable. We have only had, I think, four revisions since 1885; we held the last two elections on voters' lists two years old, when no citizen of Canada under twenty-three years of age had a right to vote. Now, we are going back to the old principle, relegating to the provinces the power to deal with this question; in point of fact, saying to the provinces: the right of representation in your ridings and for your people in this House is a civil right over which you may exercise jurisdiction, stating by your laws who shall or shall not vote, and we will accept your voters' lists for the sake of uniformity, for the sake of avoiding difficulties, injustices and expenses. Now, if we are going to take up that policy, we have got to follow it out right straight to its conclusion. If we are going to break in upon that principle by providing that this class in any province who do not have votes shall have votes, and that that class who do not have votes shall have votes, we may as well sweep away the whole Bill, and have a Dominion Franchise Act. We either want a Dominion Franchise Act or we want to put this matter back in charge of the provinces and allow the voters' lists of the provinces to be the voters' lists for elections in the Dominion. The issue is a clean-cut one, a distinct one. So far as the Indians are concerned, I have not a word to say against them. There is not an Indian in Brant county, and there is not an Indian in the county of Lambton, who cannot be a citizen if he chooses to become so. But I object to giving to a class of the population who are living in tribal relations and who are not citizens of this country, special rights that belong to me. If I do not have the rights that belong to them. If I cannot have the tribal advantages of the Six Nations, I do not want the Six Nations to have the citizen's advantage that I have, and I do not think they have a right to claim them. For that reason, while I would not deprive these Indians of a right, while I have the utmost sympathy for them, I would advise them, if they want to exercise the rights of citizenship, to become citizens of Canada. I think we might as well either dismiss all this work of tinkering with this Bill, and making exceptions here and exceptions there that the provincial laws do not make, or we had better adopt the provincial laws and have done with it. It is a very clean-cut, distinct alternative—on the one hand, adopting the provincial franchises in their entirety, and on the other hand sweeping them all away, and having a franchise of our own. There is properly no middle ground.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I wish to ask the Government what they propose to do in respect to the very important question which has been raised by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I think we should understand at the outset whether the Government intend to take the franchises of the various provinces purely and simply as they exist to-day, and as they may be changed from time to time at the will of the local legislatures all over Canada, and that they shall be the franchises for the election of members to the House of Commons. If I am not mistaken, I think it was the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) who expressed the wish and the expectation that the officials who were disfranchised from voting in the provincial elections in the province of Nova Scotia would be enfranchised under this Bill, and that they would enjoy the franchise for the election of members to the House of Commons. I believe I am also correct in stating that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) has also expressed an opinion to that effect, that the officials who are disfranchised under the local laws of Nova Scotia would not be disfranchised under this Act. It therefore becomes important that at the very threshold of this question, when we are dealing with who are to have the franchise, the Government should say whether they intend to adopt, pure and simple, the laws of the various provinces in reference to the parties who enjoy the franchise, and adopt whatever changes they may make in them from time to time, or whether, taking the electoral franchises of the various provinces as a basis, they propose that, as in the case of the Indians who have been enfranchised under the Dominion Act, they shall continue to enjoy this right; or, as in the case of the officials who are disfranchised under the local laws in some of the provinces, they shall be enfranchised under the Dominion.

Mr. CHARLTON.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The principle of the whole Act is that we intend to adopt the provincial franchises as the basis of the franchise for the Dominion. That is our intention. It is idle for my hon. friend to assume, or to suppose that we assume, that the provincial franchises existing to-day will continue for all time. I cannot follow the argument of hon. gentlemen on the other side who say that we dispossess ourselves of control over our franchise. We do not do anything of the sort; we simply adopt for the present the franchises of the provinces. But if at any time the provinces should do anything that we consider detrimental to the interests of the Dominion, we are entirely free, we do not tie our hands for all time, to make any change that we think proper. We do not dispossess ourselves of our control over the franchise.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not at all suggest that. I did not assume that the permanent franchise we adopt by this law is the franchise that exists to-day in Ontario or in Prince Edward Island, that is not proposed by this Bill. This Bill proposes that we shall adopt as the franchise for electing members to this House the franchise as it exists at the time whenever a general election or a by-election is held for this House, that we shall adopt whatever may be at that time the franchise of the provincial legislature.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. As long as this law is in force.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The point I wanted the hon. gentleman to meet was this: Whether my hon. friend who preceded me is right in saying that you do not propose under this Bill to enfranchise any person to vote for a member of the House of Commons who has not the franchise under the local legislature. That is the point I wanted the hon. gentleman to meet.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We certainly do not intend to adopt amendments, so far as Indians are concerned. When I come to argue that point, I think I will be able to point out that under the provincial franchises, to a large extent, the Indians now have a right to vote. So far as Dominion officials are concerned, that is an open question which I think has been treated from the standpoint of relieving them altogether from this disability. Of course, I am not prepared to say more on that point at the present time.

Mr. LISTER. I want to say a word about the remarks of the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Chariton). My hon. friend says the Bill now before the House does not deprive the Indians of their vote.

Mr. CHARLTON. No. The point I made was that this Bill does not absolutely disfranchise anybody, because it simply adopts the franchise of each province.

Mr. LISTER. Well, I say that it temporarily, at all events, disfranchises the Indians of this country, it may not do so permanently. My hon. friend may trust to the local legislatures throughout the country granting the franchise to the Indians of the different provinces. That, however, is problematical, that may never be done, and if it is not done, as a matter of fact the Bill now under consideration deprives the Indians who have voted for the last fourteen years, of the right to vote. I say this is an arbitrary measure. The hon. gentleman says this Bill must go through, that there can be no exception made. The Solicitor General says that if it turns out in the future that a province acts unjustly in adopting provisions respecting voting, then we can intervene and undo what they have done. If that is the intention of the Bill and if that is the power the Government reserves to itself, which is no doubt the case, then they are depriving unjustly a portion of the population of the right they possess, or of the right to continue to vote under the Franchise Act. I say again that once having given the franchise to a portion of the people, who have proved themselves able to exercise it intelligently, the Government should not now take away from those people that which free men all consider a boon, and do an act which the Indians will remember as one of the greatest injustices ever perpetrated upon them by any legislature in this country. The Solicitor General has stated that a large portion of the Indians of Ontario have the right to vote now. I deny it. A very small percentage of the Indians of that province are entitled to vote as enfranchised Indians. They are living on the reserves, and everybody knows that Indians have an objection to becoming enfranchised for many reasons, tribal reasons among others. But we need not go into these questions, but remember the one question, and that is, that we once gave the vote to these men, they have had it for years, and there is no good cause for taking it away from them.

Mr. MACLEAN. Do we understand the Solicitor General to lay down the basis of this Act as follows: That this Parliament has a session and it closes. The Government then decide they will go to the country. The legislature of Ontario happens to meet, and that body deprives a large number of citizens of the franchise, and they are not able to vote when the Dominion elections come on. Is that the situation which the franchise occupies in this Act? If so, then it is the worst Act ever submitted by a Canadian Government, it is the greatest attack ever made on our federal institutions. It is the strongest attack ever made on the autonomy of Canada; and I hope now that this statement has been made, Parliament will be able to defend its franchise from the attacks made by the Liberal party, and I hope in some other quarter the rights of the people will be protected, and the federal power will continue to control its own franchise so that the voice of the people of Canada may be heard.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. By whom was the assault made on the people of Canada from 1867 to 1885?

Mr. MACLEAN. That is another question.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I also point out to the hon. gentleman that if he had carefully read the Bill, he would have found that the very case he has discussed has been provided for by subsection 2 of the section we are now considering.

Mr. LISTER. Pardon me, Mr. Speaker, for again addressing the House. I say, what I stated in 1885, that no Government ever introduced a more unjustifiable measure than the Government did in that year. I opposed it then, and have opposed it since. The Liberal party has pledged itself, election after election, that if returned to power, the Act would be repealed. They are bound to the people to repeal that Act, and I believe I voice the feelings not only of the Liberal party but of a large portion of the Conservative party when I say they desire the repeal of that Act. It has been most burdensome in its working, and every member who has had anything to do with elections knows hundreds of dollars have been expended during the twelve years for the purpose of trying to make perfect an Act which it was impossible to make perfect. We have pledged ourselves, over and over again, to the country to repeal it; the people have returned us to power on that pledge, and we will prove false to the people if we do not repeal the Act. But I say in this one case an exception might be made by the Government and Parliament, so as to continue to the people who have been given votes under the Act the right to vote at elections for members of this legislature.

Mr. QUINN. I think this is the clearest proof in the world that in the one case in which the Liberal Government have attempted to carry out its promise, it has made the usual leap in the dark. The party pledged itself to the country to repeal the Franchise Act. Hon. gentlemen introduce a measure framed for that purpose, and the first clause is attacked on all sides by their own followers. We have the question of the Indians discussed. What difference is there between the Indians affected by the Ontario Franchise Act and the class of persons included under section 15 of the Quebec Election Act? The following persons in that province are not allowed to vote:—

agents, collectors of provincial revenue, and the officers and members of the provincial police force.

There is great solicitude expressed by the hon. member for Lambton and the hon. member for Brant for the Indians because, I suppose, there happens to be a certain number of them in their constituencies, and they happen to be a class of the community I suppose who can, at all events, discriminate between the methods of Liberal and Conservative candidates towards the electors, and they probably have recognized their influence in the way of bringing the Indians to their way of thinking, at all events to their way of voting. With virtuous indignation the hon. member for Lambton says that if we once enfranchise a man it is an insult to him to withdraw the franchise. Here are: "Clerks of the Crown, clerks of the peace, sheriffs, registrars, Crown lands and timber agents, collectors of provincial revenue." who from time immemorial have the right to vote on the Dominion Franchise Act, but who by subsection "a" of this Act will be disfranchised, because the qualification necessary to entitle any one to vote at Dominion elections shall be that established by the law of the province and such as is necessary to entitle the same party to vote at provincial elections. So it is impossible for all these officers to vote at Dominion elections. Is this disqualification imposed because these men are officers of the provincial Government, is it because they are personally not competent men, is it because officers of the provincial Government are unable to discriminate between what is right and wrong? The hon. member talks about outraging the feelings of the people. I cannot conceive a greater outrage on these responsible officers of the provincial Government of Quebec than to provide that they shall be disfranchised by a single clause of the Bill. It shows the absurdity of having for the Dominion of Canada a sort of crazy-quilt Franchise Act, instead of adopting one system for the whole Dominion. We find in one province men entitled to vote because they come under the provincial law, while in another case provincial men are disfranchised because the ideas prevailing in that province happen to be more narrow than those existing in a province next door.

Mr. FOSTER. Who are disqualified in the province of Quebec now?

Mr. QUINN. The judges of the Supreme Court, the Exchequer Court, the Court of Queen's Bench, the judges of sessions, the district magistrates and recorders, clerks of the Crown, clerks of the peace, sheriffs, registrars, Crown Land and Crown Timber agents, collectors of provincial revenue and officers and men of the provincial police force. Under the Manitoba Act I am informed that the exemptions are: the provincial judges, Indians, those disqualified for corrupt practices, lunatics and prisoners, all officials and employees of Dominion and Manitoba Governments, in receipt of a salary to the amount of $350, all regular soldiers and persons enrolled in military services, and all registrars, sheriffs, county court clerks and bailiffs in receipt of fees to the amount of $350 per annum. If they are so accomplished as not to be able to earn $350 a year they are entitled to vote, but if they are intelligent enough to merit $350 a year by salaries or fees, then the Manitoba law says they are too intelligent to exercise the Dominion franchise.

Another peculiarity of the Provincial Franchise Act in Quebec is, that it includes as persons who are disqualified, men who have committed offences against the provincial Act. We can easily understand why persons who have been guilty of an infraction of the Dominion Franchise Act should be disqualified in a Dominion election, and that persons who have been guilty of an infraction of the Provincial Franchise Act should be disqualified at a provincial election, but why persons who have been guilty of an offence against the provincial franchise should be disqualified at a Dominion election, is something I cannot understand. In Quebec you will have men disqualified, while at the same time men who are guilty of the same offences in the other provinces would be entitled to vote. I say, Sir, that the Act which is presented to us here is more in the form of a crazy quilt enactment than anything that has ever before been presented to this Parliament. It seems to me an absurdity that we cannot, for the purpose of Dominion elections, form some basis upon which the voters of this country shall vote in the election of members to this House of Commons. Why should we here in the Parliament of Canada be governed by the prejudices which exist in the different provinces in local matters. It is not my intention to reflect disparagingly on the prejudices or privileges that exist in the different provinces concerning the right of one man to one vote or to many votes. In the province of Quebec we have the principle, that if a man holds property in two or in fifty constituencies, he has the right to poll his vote in each, if it be a physical possibility for him to do so. With the greatest deference and respect to the majority in the province of Quebec, I may tell the House that this was an enactment made for the protection of the English-speaking minority of that province. It was a concession granted to the English-speaking minority, who in the province of Quebec are usually those possessing most real estate. It was enacted for the purpose of giving them not only the representation to which they are entitled by their numbers, but also the representation which their more extensive ownership of land in that province might entitle them to. That was done in Quebec for provincial purposes and for municipal purposes. But, it was never contemplated that it should be extended to the Dominion franchise because as we know the English-speaking minority in the province of Quebec becomes the majority in the whole Dominion of Canada. The French Canadian majority in the province of Quebec, with their usual liberality, gave to the English-speaking minority the right to protect themselves in all the constituencies in which they might own land. There is no necessity for protecting the English-speaking people in the Dominion of Canada in that way, but it was felt by the French Canadians in Quebec that in that province where the English are a minority they should have that protection. In consequence of that principle, Mr. Chairman, you see a larger representation of the English-speaking minority in the provincial legislature in Quebec, than you do of any proportionate minority in any provincial legislature in the Dominion of Canada. That principle has worked admirably for the protection of the minority in that province. The reason why this liberality was evidenced on the part of the French Canadians, is because in the provincial legislature the civil rights of the people are legislated for, and in municipal institutions the property of these people is taxed. It was felt that those who contributed to municipal taxes and who held real estate should be properly represented in the different municipal councils. But no such reason for this principle exists when we come to elect members of the House of Commons of Canada. While the principle in Quebec works well and is a just principle, yet I do say, that when the principle is carried into the Dominion franchise, and when a man owning property in fifty or sixty constituencies in Quebec can vote in every one of them if it is physically possible, it is absurd that he can do so while in the province of Ontario, a man equally wealthy and holding as much property can only poll one vote. Instead of passing section 5 as it appears in the Bill, it is in my opinion the duty of the Government to strike out the clause and to present to the House some settled basis of a Dominion franchise, which will make it uniform throughout the whole country, and which will include not only the Indians of the Six Nations, but these Indians and other persons all over Canada who are included in the Dominion Franchise Act which it is now sought to repeal.

Mr. MACLEAN. The Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) says that his party is committed to repeal the present Dominion Franchise Act, which he says is a bad law. That is one thing, but to repeal that law by abandoning Dominion rights and by surrendering to the provinces our most important privileges is quite another thing. I would point out to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) that one does not at all follow from the other.

Mr. McNEILL. I desire to call the attention of the Solicitor General to the statement that was made by the hon. gentleman from Lambton (Mr. Lister) in regard to the number of Indians who will be disfranchised by this Bill. I am quite sure that my hon. friend made the statement he did in all good faith, that comparatively few would be disfranchised, and that a comparatively large percentage would still retain the franchise under the local law. With regard to my own constituency, where there are two bands of Indians, my hon. friend's remark is really not correct at all. I do not think that any of them would have a vote under the local law; if any would have, they would be very few. This Bill practically disfranchises the Indians in my constituency and, as my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) said, it is a very strong measure to deprive any class of the community of rights which they have enjoyed, and have not abused in any way, for many years. As the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Quinn) has pointed out, it is not only the Indians who are going to be deprived of their franchise, but many other people throughout the Dominion. When the hon. leader of the Opposition called attention to this matter, my hon. friend the Solicitor General asked, What became of the rights of the people that we allege are now being assailed, from 1867 to 1885? Well, I will tell my hon. friend what became of them. Those rights were subject to the caprice of the local legislature, and the local legislature so abused the power with which they had been entrusted by this House, that this House itself had to pass an Act to protect the rights of the people of Nova Scotia from the improper action of the local legislature.

Mr. CHARLTON. Were there any complaints made by the public upon which this House acted?

Mr. McNEILL. I am astonished that a gentleman who has had a seat in this House so long as my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) should ask such a question as that. Does my hon. friend suppose that this House would put an Act upon the Statute-book without reason?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). When did the legislature of Nova Scotia commit these outrages?

Mr. McNEILL. I do not think it is at all necessary for me to state the date. It is the Act of 1882 I am referring to. It was previous to that Act, I think, in 1871 that the wrong was done and the Act of 1871 was recognized in 1889. But the hon. Postmaster General knows that it does not matter what the date was.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes, it does.

Mr. McNEILL. It does not matter at all. This Parliament felt it incumbent upon itself, in defence of its privileges, to pass an Act to protect itself from the Acts of the legislature of Nova Scotia. I think that is a sufficient answer to my hon. friend the Solicitor General. We tried the experiment, and it proved to be a failure, and this Parliament, in protection of its privileges, passed the Act of 1885. Whether that Act was a good or a bad Act is not the question. There are many of us who are ready to admit that in operation it proved cumbersome and expensive; and, as has been pointed out in this House before, the Conservative party, under Sir John Thompson introduced an Act for the purpose of simplifying and cheapening its operation. But the fact that the Act is defective in some particulars is no reason why a measure of this kind should be introduced. You may amend or improve the Act, but there is no reason why you should deprive this Parliament of its privileges. Surely there is enough statesmanship on the other side of the House to manage affairs a little better than that. Surely it is not necessary, in order to cheapen the operation of the Franchise Act, that the privileges of this Parliament should be taken away from it and handed over to the local legislatures. My hon. friend says we may take these privileges back again; but why does he hand them over in the meantime? We have already tried the experiment; the experiment proved a failure; and why does he propose to repeat it now? Surely, it would be more reasonable for the leaders on both sides of the House to meet together and endeavour to arrange some compromise in regard to this matter, so that this House shall still be seized of such an important privilege as this. What possible excuse is there for giving back to the local legislatures a power which they have already been entrusted with, and which they have abused?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The reason I asked the hon. gentleman for the date when the offences were committed by Nova Scotia, which he said had led to the passage of the Franchise Act of 1885, was this: The Bill which led up to that Act was, I believe, the Bill which the Government led by Sir John Macdonald, introduced into the Dominion Parliament in the year 1871 or 1872. Now, if the Acts which my hon. friend speaks of had been committed prior to that time, it is most extraordinary that the Conservative Government, for thirteen long years, failed to do justice to the people and protect them from those outrages, and allowed the general elections to be held three times on those fraudulent lists which the hon. gentleman refers to. I think I can give a better explanation for the passage of the Franchise Act of 1885 than the one which my hon. friend gives. Having listened to the debate of three months which ended in the passage of that Act, I think I can safely say that you will not find that any person who was in favour of that Act ever suggested the alleged outrages by the legislature of Nova Scotia, now cited for the first time, as the moving cause of that legislation. The object of that Bill was, I think, known to every person. The late Government had exhausted their methods for obtaining favourable verdicts from the people. They had passed a Gerrymander Bill which did violence to every sense of right, and they had so mismanaged the affairs of the country that at last a rebellion broke out in the North-west that threatened to sweep the Government from power. That, I think, was the moving cause that incited the Government to introduce the Franchise Bill; and though it failed to accomplish what its movers designed it should accomplish, they were unable to abandon it, and it had to go through in its present form. The ground advanced by Sir John Macdonald for the measure was to secure what he called uniformity throughout the whole Dominion in the franchise under which members were elected to this House. While many trifling reasons were advanced, the real and only standing ground the Government adopted in respect to that measure was uniformity and, as it was called, control of their franchise in order to have uniformity. These alleged outrages are, I think, the creation of an inventive mind at the present time.

Mr. McNEILL. In regard to the observations of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, I am surprised that any hon. member who heard the debates of 1885, as he did and as I did, should have forgotten the reference that were made to the attacks by the local legislatures at that time.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Side references.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not know what my hon. friend means by the interruption. I say that references were made, and I am very much surprised my hon. friend has forgotten the fact. That was one of the principal reasons at that time for the action of the House. How has my hon. friend met the statement that in 1882 this Act was passed? He has not met it at all. Does he pretend to say that Act was passed for no reason at all? Does he mean to say that this House passed an Act in 1882 protecting the privileges of certain subjects of Her Majesty in Nova Scotia from the action of the local legislature of that province, when there was no need for such protection? My hon. friend has not, in the slightest degree, answered the objections that I have brought forward.

Mr. GILLIES. I am not at all surprised at the statement we have just heard from the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), because we have had already frequent displays of lamentable ignorance on the part of the hon. gentleman concerning the administration of the department he is supposed to control. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that he should be entirely ignorant of the administration of matters affecting the franchise of the different provinces of the Dominion. He asked my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), in a very flippant manner, to tell him the year in which the disqualifying clauses of the Franchise Act were passed in Nova Scotia, showing most palpably that this was the first time he had ever heard of that disqualifying Act. I am here to tell the hon. gentleman when that Act was passed, and to read it to him. And I would ask him to keep the information in his mind, and not in future show such lamentable ignorance when addressing the House on a matter of so much concern to the House and country generally. The disqualifying Act of Nova Scotia was passed in 1871, and the very words of that Act are to-day the words of the disqualifying Act which now obtains in that province. These are the words :

It shall not be lawful for any person to vote at an election for a member or members to represent the people, in the general assembly of this province, who, at any time within fifteen days before the day of election, was in the receipt of wages or emolument of any kind as an employee in the post office, the custom-house, the Inland Revenue Department, the lighthouse service, on the Government railroads, in the Crown land office, or the local public works and mines.

The hon. gentleman will see that that was a wide Act in its operation, and that Act was passed in 1871, and is word for word the Act we have to-day in the statutes of Nova Scotia. But the Act did not end there. Section 4 provided that in the case of any names of these parties getting, in any way whatever, upon the list they are to be struck out. It reads as follows :—

The names of the persons disqualified under the first section of this Act shall not be inserted in the lists or register of electors, and, if entered, shall be struck off in the manner provided in chapter 28 of the Acts of 1863.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that the law now in Nova Scotia ?

Mr. GILLIES. Yes, the disqualifying Act is word for word as it is to-day.

Mr. McNEILL. What is the date of that ?

Mr. GILLIES. 1871. That is what the Postmaster General asked for in that non-chalant manner which it would be much better for him to leave aside and thus not expose his lamentable ignorance.

Now, we had complaint after complaint from the province of Nova Scotia that a large number of persons qualified in every respect, who paid their assessments and taxes and contributed in every way to the revenue of this country, were disqualified from voting in a federal election if they were in the enjoyment of a small emolument from the Federal Government. Complaint after complaint came to us asking for some Dominion legislation to remedy this grievance ; and it was in pursuance of these complaints that the Act of 1882 was passed by this Parliament, and not until that Act was passed by this Parliament were any Dominion officials of the province of Nova Scotia permitted to vote. The hon. Minister of Finance surprised me very considerably when he showed, on the second reading of the Bill, what I think was in him an inexcusable want of knowledge. He said repeatedly on that occasion that the Dominion officials were not disqualified from voting in the province of Nova Scotia at a federal election. He stated that not once but several times, and when the correctness of his statement was questioned by the hon. leader of the Opposition, he spoke as follows :—

My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) said that the provincial lists prevented them from voting. That would be a very strong argument, only that the hon. gentleman is misinformed as to the facts, for, as I have shown, the local lists did not prevent him from voting.

Now, I have read the law :

The list contained the name of every Dominion official who is qualified to vote by his property or otherwise, in the usual way.

How could the list contain the names when this very Act was the law in the province at the time we passed the Dominion Franchise Act, and the 4th section of the Act stated that they would be struck off if in any way they should have got on ? How could these names be on the lists when the Provincial Act provided that if any of them were put on the local lists they should be struck off ?

Mr. RUSSELL. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that section 4 of the Act of 1872 is still in force ?

Mr. GILLIES. No ; I am coming to that in a moment. My hon. friend need not be in the slightest degree apprehensive that I will make any statement which will not be entirely correct in this House or elsewhere. He may possess his soul in patience. I shall get down to that to which he now alludes. I do not at all say that section 4 is now existent, but that section 4 of the Act of 1871 was the only law governing in the preparation of the lists in Nova Scotia at the time the Dominion Franchise Act was passed in 1885.

Mr. McCLURE. The hon. gentleman is wrong in that. That section was repealed by the revised statute passed in 1884.

Mr. GILLIES. That fact does not save the hon. gentleman, as I will show in a moment. The hon. Minister of Finance went still further. He said :

The facts show from the beginning that the disqualification of Dominion officials was merely a freak of the imagination.

Now, how can it be a freak of imagination when the law expressly, unequivocally, and most emphatically, as I have shown by reading it, disqualifies them ? And how can it be a freak of the imagination when they were not permitted to vote, as we have been saying all the time since this Act was passed. Section 4 expressly says that if, by any manner of means, they get on the list, they shall be struck off. Well, my hon. friend did not stop there. He went a little further and said:

Hon. gentlemen have heard the statement, and I challenge contradiction of it—that the names of Dominion officials were never left off the lists under the provincial law, and the names being on the lists the parties were entitled to vote in the Dominion election. There was never any need for the passing of the Act of 1882

Now, I need not labour that part of the question any further, because I think I have completely met the position taken by the Minister of Finance on that occasion. And, having done so, if he has any sense of justice, and I am sure he has, he will acknowledge it. I should gather from the position that he took on that occasion that if these people were to be disqualified in any way and forbidden to vote under the provincial laws, he would be inclined to look upon it as a grievance. I think the hon. gentleman went even that far. Let him go to the law as it is at this very moment. The disqualifying clause that I read to you, that was passed in 1871 is as I have said, the disqualifying clause that is on the Statute-book to-day. What does it say about the making up of the lists? I will read the law as it is at this very moment:

The revisers, when making up the lists, shall include the following persons, if of the full age of 21 years and subjects of Her Majesty by birth or naturalization, and not disqualified by any section of this Act.

Now, I have read the disqualifying section of this Act which provided that if a man is employed in any way by the Federal Government that disqualifies him, and provides even that if he is "otherwise by law prevented from voting" be excluded from those entitled to have their names entered on the lists of the electors. Now, by law the Dominion officials are prevented from voting, and, therefore, Dominion officials cannot be included in the lists that are made by the revisers as prescribed by this section. I, therefore, say, and in this I fully agree with my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Lister) that it is a most retrograde step to take, once a body of men is enfranchised, to disfranchise them. If this is a hardship as affecting the Indians of his constituency, how much more is it a hardship as respects the white men of Nova Scotia. They were disfranchised under the Franchise Act of 1871. The Dominion Parliament came to their relief by the Franchise Act of 1885. From that time until now they have been exercising their right to vote for candidates for this Parliament just the same as the Indians in the constituency of my hon. friend. We now propose to take away this right by enacting this clause. Heretofore the franchise law of Nova Scotia was applied to the election of members to the House of Assembly of that province. That Franchise Act disfranchises a large number of white men in the province of Nova Scotia.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend (Mr. Gillies) probably did not hear the Solicitor General state that the Government were considering the propriety of amending the Bill so as to maintain this right.

Mr. GILLIES. I am aware of that, and I am arguing this question on a similar line with my hon. friend the Solicitor General who has studied the Act and knows its genius very much better than the Minister of Finance. He admitted that these people were disqualified under the franchise law of Nova Scotia. What I wish to impress upon the committee and particularly upon my hon. friend from Lambton is, that if it is a hardship for the Indians of his constituency to be disfranchised, if it is a retrograde step to deprive them of the right they have enjoyed for thirteen years, he will surely agree with me, and his friends associated with him also, that it is a much greater hardship and much more a retrograde step to disfranchise the white men in Nova Scotia who have been enjoying the rights of voting for members of the House of Commons.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. On one point the hon. gentleman has shown that I was inaccurate as to something in the law of Nova Scotia a quarter of a century ago. One does not care to admit that he remembers so far back as that. If the hon. gentleman has quoted correctly, I am bound to admit that I was inaccurate. But when he went further and stated, in answer to the question, that that was the law of Nova Scotia to-day, I think he is mistaken; and for all practical purposes, as bearing on the point before us in the previous discussion, my hon. friend was wrong and I was right. What was the question? After all we only deal with the Act of 1871 as a matter of history, which is interesting, but we are more concerned in the Act of 1888 in Nova Scotia.

Mr. MILLS. You mean 1889.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The law as it is to-day is the one we are concerned in. We propose that the franchise lists of Nova Scotia shall be the lists for Dominion elections. My hon. friend (Mr. Gillies) found fault with the provincial lists and said they were bad for our purposes because they excluded Dominion officials. I submitted to my hon. friend that he was wrong because the lists did not exclude the names—

Mr. GILLIES. That is the provincial lists?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The provincial lists of to-day.

Mr. GILLIES. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) permit me.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Certainly.

Mr. GILLIES. How does my hon. friend explain this one line in the Act? This prescribes the manner in which the provincial lists shall be made up. Now, these are to be the lists for federal purposes if this Bill becomes law. The law says:

The following persons, being males of the full age of 21 years, subjects of Her Majesty by birth or naturalization, and not disqualified by any section of this Act, or otherwise by law prevented from voting,— —shall be on the lists. Now the law says that Dominion officials cannot vote—there is no doubt about that. For the law says:

It shall not be lawful for any person to vote at an election for a member or members to represent the people in the general assembly of this province who at any time within fifteen days before the day of election, was in receipt of wages or emoluments of any kind as an employee of the post office, custom-house, inland revenue, lighthouse service, Government railroads, Crown lands office, or local public works and mines.

Here you say any person who, within 15 days before the election, is in receipt of any emolument of any kind from any of these sources, cannot vote. The law to-day says that whoever is prevented in any of these ways from voting, cannot go on the list.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The best answer I can give to that is that they do go on, and they are on. I state now that in the community in which I live we have very good Conservative lawyers and campaigners—

Mr. GILLIES. How can they go on?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman might as well ask me: How can he be in his seat there to-day? He is there. I see him there, and I know he is there. If he were to read me a thousand clauses in the statutes to show he was not there, I would still believe my own eyes.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is a member of a Government who has brought a Bill down here, and the hon. gentleman has placed in that very Bill he has brought down the class of persons who, in Nova Scotia, are disqualified to vote. There it is, on page 7, and under the heading "Nova Scotia," which says: "Any one who, within 15 days before the election, was an employee or in the receipt of wages or emoluments of any kind as such employee in the post office," and so forth, and so forth. His own Bill declares that they shall not vote.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman must not imagine that he has made a point, because he has not. What we have said repeatedly in discussion is that the Nova Scotia lists are to be applied to the Dominion elections; therefore the whole question is whether these officials have their names on the Nova Scotia lists.

Mr. FOSTER. This says they have not.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This does not say they have not, it says they can not vote. It has always been the case—I won't say always, that is too long, but I do say that for many years—within my observation, Dominion officials have their names on the local lists. I see them on in the city of Halifax where we have several hundred officials. I would probably not be wrong if I say there are three or four hundred Dominion officials there whose names appear on the lists. I can give my hon. friend several reasons why I know they are there. In the first place, I have seen them there, they are on the list. My hon. friend will understand that if they are on the list, and if that list is adopted, as we intend it shall be adopted, for Dominion purposes, then they have a right to vote.

Mr. McALISTER. Take the case of an alien who, under our law, cannot vote. Suppose he owns property in the Dominion of Canada and has his name on the Dominion list, would he be entitled to vote?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If his name is on the list, the only way you can prevent him from voting is by challenging him, and he can vote unless you can show some disqualification. Notwithstanding what my hon. friend has read, the Nova Scotia law has been understood for years to mean that the disqualification only arises at the polls, and with the knowledge of the disqualification, Dominion officials as a rule would not go to vote at a local election. When I say I know their names are on the list I can give my hon. friend various pieces of evidence in that direction. In the first place, I have seen their names on the list; in the second place, I know that in the party rooms, where they always get to the bottom of things, men are told off to go to the polls with a list of the Dominion officials and challenge them, so that they shall not vote. That is a proof that their names are on the list. My hon. friend says that they have no right to be there. I tell him that an experience of many years enables me to say that they have been there, and if his view is correct, no doubt that some of the sharp party campaigners in Halifax would long ago have found it out, and they would have taken very good care to have the law interpreted as he reads it.

Mr. GILLIES. The law distinctly says that whoever is prevented in any way by this section from voting, cannot go on the list. How can he get there?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He is there. It is the old story, we have already heard it here, of the lawyer who told a man he could not be put in jail for something ; and the man says : I am there.

Committee rose and reported progress.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not see in the House any members in charge of the Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. You had better wait a little.

Mr. MONK. We were told on behalf of the Government by the Solicitor General that he intended to give the committee the policy of the Government in regard to the right of Indians to vote, which has been taken away by this Bill. I do not know whether the right hon. Premier is able to tell the committee what the policy is. It seems to me that before voting on this amendment it is important we should know the policy of the Government.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am sorry I was not in the House this afternoon when the question was discussed. There can be no doubt what the policy of the Government is on this subject. We have introduced the principle and have fought for it for many years that the franchise ought to be regulated by the provincial legislatures, that it is for them to decide whether or not the Indians should be admitted to vote or not. If it be the opinion of the legislature of the province of Ontario, for instance, that the Indians there have reached that degree of civilization when they can be entrusted with the franchise, the legislature will so enact. If the hon. gentleman had been in the House in 1885 when the present Act was introduced he would remember that, as introduced, it gave the right of the franchise to the Indians, not only in the older provinces, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, but it gave the right of suffrage also to the Indians in the North-west Territories; and it was pointed out at the time to Sir John Macdonald by Mr. Mills that, according to the Bill, as introduced, Poundmaker, who was at that time engaged in rebellion, and Big Bear, would be invested with the franchise. The Bill was modified subsequently, and Indians were granted the franchise only in the older provinces and the Indians of the North-west Territories were restrained. This shows that even according to the Act some discretion is to be exercised in this matter. Who is to exercise it? We think it should be left to the provincial legislatures. Accordingly, after this Bill becomes law, if it should become law, it would be for the legislatures of the different provinces to determine whether or not Indians should be admitted to vote. This is the policy of the Government on the subject.

Mr. FIELDING.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very sorry the right hon. First Minister was not in the House this afternoon, for we had a very interesting and instructive discussion on this subject, which I think it would have been well if the right hon. gentleman had been able to hear it. The policy of the Government, as stated by the hon. Solicitor General, is that the Indians shall not be enfranchised under this Bill. That was clearly stated by the hon. gentleman.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I say they are not to be enfranchised further than they are now under the provincial laws, and the leader of the Opposition stated that under certain provisions of the Ontario law they are not entirely enfranchised. I shall have occasion to refer to that matter again.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That was not the point at issue. The question was, will the Indians, under this Bill, be enfranchised or not. The hon. gentleman stated that they could not be enfranchised under this Bill, because under the laws of the provinces they did not enjoy the franchise, and it was under the federal law they enjoyed the franchise.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Except to a limited extent.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That does not affect the question, because, up to a limited extent there has been no issue on this subject between the political parties. There was a very interesting discussion, as the hon. gentleman may remember, in 1885, when the federal Franchise Bill was passed, as to whether the Indians should be enfranchised or not. It was no doubt a very legitimate object for discussion on which hon. gentlemen might fairly be expected to differ. We are not in that position to-day. I want to call the attention of the committee to the position occupied by the right hon. gentleman as the leader of a Liberal Administration, whose first important act is to take away the franchise from a large body of British subjects in this Dominion who at the present time enjoy it. That is not a position upon which the right hon. gentleman will plume himself as leader of the Liberal Administration. One of the great principles of the Liberal party throughout the world has been to broaden and extend the franchise to all persons who could properly enjoy it. If the right hon. gentleman had been here to-day he would have had an instructive lesson from both sides of the House and from his friends on both sides. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Heyd) went very fully into the question and made a very powerful argument against the disfranchisement of the Indians who now enjoy the suffrage under existing legislation, and he pointed to the fact that whatever had been the difference of opinion at the outset when any question was first considered, any doubts as to the propriety of the enfranchisement of the Indians in certain cases had been entirely removed by that most potent of all influences, the influence of experience. He showed the impression prevailed at the time that because the Indians were wards of the Government they should not be enfranchised. The argument was followed up still more fully by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), who showed that the great danger felt in respect to the enfranchisement of Indians was that they were wards of the Government, and it was therefore supposed the Government of the day would exercise an overwhelming controlling influence over them and they would not be in a position to give free votes and exercise the franchise freely and intelligently. Those hon. gentlemen went into the evidence on this point, and they proved to the House conclusively, in my judgment, that all the fears entertained in regard to the enfranchisement of the Indians had proved to be delusive, that they exercised the franchise as intelligently and independently as any other class of the electors, that instead of being entirely swayed by the Government, they had again and again, although somewhat dependent on the Government, shown their independence by dividing their votes, in a great many cases, about equally between the two political parties. Those hon. gentlemen showed that the Indians were perfectly qualified to vote, and they proved by many long years' experience in those counties where the Indians, in very considerable numbers live, that they were well qualified to exercise the franchise in a wise, judicious and independent manner. I put it to my hon. friend whether he can find any Liberal Government in the world, except the Government of the province of Nova Scotia, where a Liberal party ever attempted to induce Parliament to take away the franchise from men to whom it had been entrusted, who had been exercising it, without being able to show that those men had in the slightest degree failed to discharge in an independent and intelligent manner the duties imposed on them.

My right hon. friend is in a very awkward position when he finds his friends to the right of him and to the left of him complaining of this provision in the Bill. It is not these unfortunate Tories whose opinions have no weight with my right hon. friend who are now complaining, but it is his strongest supporters who tell him that they would regard it as an outrage and as a complete abandonment of these great principles of Liberalism for which they have long fought and of which they thought the right hon. gentleman was an exponent; if, as he now proposes, he disfranchises a large class of the population. Long ago the question was decided as to whether the Indians should be enfranchised or not, and year after year they have proved that they possessed all the qualifications necessary to exercise the franchise in a wise, independent, and judicious manner in the interests of the country. For the leader of the Government to deprive them of that franchise, without being able to advance a reason for his action, is a thing for which you will search in vain for a parallel all the world over. You might find some fossilized Tory who would go back on Liberal principles and who would not regard the importance of maintaining good faith with a large body of the electorate; but except in one memorable instance where a Liberal Government of Nova Scotia tried to do something of the same kind, you cannot find in parliamentary history any attempt to take away the franchise from a section of the population to whom it had been entrusted, and who for many years had wisely exercised it.

This is a most significant illustration of the vicious character of this measure, and to-night the Premier's own friends point it out to him. It is all very well to say that the legislatures of the provinces shall have the right to exercise their judgment as to who shall have the franchise. They have shown in the different provinces that they differ very widely on that question, but so far as their own legislature is concerned, they have an indefeasible right to exercise their judgment and to say what class of the community shall elect its members. But, Sir, it is an entirely different thing when you undertake to say that you are going to turn over to the provincial legislatures the power to say what shall be the franchise on which members of this great Federal Parliament of the Dominion are elected. It is a very different thing when you come to legislate here, that you shall commit to half a dozen independent legislatures in which you have no voice, all of them differing more or less one from the other on the question of franchise; the control over the representation in this Federal Parliament. It would be bad enough if it were to rest there, and if you were to legislate that the existing franchise laws of the provinces should be the franchise of the Dominion, but under the present Bill you have no security whatever as to that. You have not even the security that in these provinces the franchise for this Dominion Parliament will be the same as they intend to use for themselves. If you were to take the provincial franchises of to-day it would be bad enough, but it would at least have the merit of being permanent. The members of this House and the men who are to be candidates for seats in this House in years to come, will be in a frightful position indeed if we in this Parliament adopt a franchise law that enables a local legislature, after a general election in that province has been held, to change the franchise and to manufacture a special franchise law, not for the purpose of the representation in their own legislature, but for the purpose of controlling the Federal Parliament of Canada. If we pass this Bill we will give the local legislature the power of adopting a franchise without the slightest intention of using it themselves, but for the sole purpose of promoting the interests of their party in the federal elections, intending subsequently to repeal that Act and to go back to their old franchise before the provincial elections come off. That has occurred before, and you will search the world in vain to find anything that will correspond with such a state of things as that which can exist under these circumstances. But that is not all. What have we here in evidence from gentlemen who not only know whereof they speak, but who have had a practical experience of the effect of the franchise of some of the local legislatures. Does my right hon. friend admit for a moment, that any member of the Parliament of Canada should be subjected to a franchise under which, not the legislatures but the government of a province can control the representation in this House from that province? My right hon. friend will, I am sure, instantly repudiate the idea that we should have members of the House of Commons of Canada elected from any province, not by the independent electors of that province but by the government of that province. Go to Manitoba, and what do you find? It has been proven by indisputable testimony—testimony that no man has been able to refute—that the franchise of Manitoba is a franchise under which the Government of Manitoba can elect whom they please.

Mr. LISTER. They lost an election a short time ago.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They did; but there is such a thing as a Government becoming so unpopular that a province rises in revolt against it. If the hon. gentleman wants an illustration of what I am saying, let him look at the two elections that took place in the province of Manitoba, one almost immediately following the other. I mean the elections of 1896, when a general election took place for the local legislature, in which only four or five members opposed to the Government obtained seats, and a short time afterwards a Dominion election took place, in which but for the fact that our candidate for Lisgar was attacked with typhoid fever, the Liberal party would not have elected a single member from that province.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Providence interfered.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Providence has done a great deal for hon. gentlemen opposite—a great deal more than they have done for themselves, in many instances. Then everybody knows that the hon. gentleman who represents Selkirk in this House would not be here to-day but for an unfortunate error on the part of the judge, a friend of ours, I admit, who advised the Conservative candidate to deposit his $1,000 in the wrong place; and that prevented a recount, which would have given a majority of at least twenty to the Conservative candidate. The constituency of Brandon was carried by a very distinguished member of this House, but certainly not under the banner of the Liberal party; it was carried on a religious question, the school question. But apart from Lisgar, where, as my hon. friend suggests, Providence interfered in their favour, the Liberal party returned only one man out in the whole province, and that in a province where the battle-cry was that the Conservative party were for coercing Manitoba and the Liberal party were for preventing that coercion. I give that to my hon. friend as an evidence of the most overwhelming character to show the frightful nature of the local franchise of Manitoba. Under that franchise they appoint an insignificant member of the community, some person who has no standing, no character, who has nothing to lose, and they place the control of a constituency in his hands. I gave an illustration of this to the House before, but it will bear repeating, because it is a historical matter. Where there was a real majority of at least fifteen for the Conservative party in a constituency, fifteen names were put on the list. What names? Names of people who did not exist in the country at all, known to nobody—utterly fictitious names. What happened then? Of course, they were challenged.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I call my hon. friend to order. He is not speaking to the amendment, which has reference to the Indian vote, but he is going into a general discussion of the Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Chairman, I hope it is not too late yet for the hon. gentleman to learn from the discussion that has taken place on the Indian vote, that he is making a frightful mistake in this measure, and I am endeavouring to draw his attention to the fact that his own strongest friends and supporters are denouncing this measure in this particular; and where does that denunciation come from? It comes from the vicious character of this measure, that hands over the franchise of the members of this House to the local legislatures, and leaves us powerless, however desirous to protect the Indian vote, or any other vote that ought to be protected; and I hope it is not too late to make every hon. gentleman on the other side of the House feel that we are not asking to take away any control or any power from the Government. In every word we are using in relation to this measure we are placing ourselves largely in the hands of the Government to which we are opposed; and if we do that, I think hon. gentlemen opposite ought to feel that we are asking for no party advantage, but are asking for an independent franchise that will protect the rights of every elector in this country who is entitled to exercise the franchise. I will not pursue the subject further; but I leave with the House that illustration of putting fictitious names on the list, and the person who acted as the reviser refusing to strike them off, because the parties who objected to them could not prove that they had served the parties with a notice, the fact being that the reason why they could not serve them with a notice was that no such persons existed. I give that to show that a measure that involves such an outrage upon everything that would be held to be fair and honourable and just in the character of a franchise, ought not to be passed by this House. The old law is not under discussion. I cannot understand why hon. gentlemen opposite have paid so much attention to the old law, because in 1895 the leader of the Conservative Government announced in this House that he intended to repeal it, and to-night we have repealed it by the clause which we have already passed. The question now is, can we not find some basis upon which gentlemen on both sides of the House, who desire to treat one of the most vitally important questions that can ever be considered in a free legislature, can arrive at some general principles which will prevent these acts of great injustice being perpetrated in the future? I do not see any difficulty, if you proceed, as Sir John Thompson proposed you should, for the purpose of lessening the expenditure connected with the list. If you take the franchise of the local legislatures as a basis but still preserve that independent control that will secure some security to the people of this country that even-handed justice will be meted out to every independent elector in this country entitled to use the franchise, that is all we ask. We do not ask for the maintenance of the old law, although it is true beyond controversy that it is much fairer than the one proposed, and I have no hesitation in saying that if the old law had been open to the objection made against it on the other side, namely, that it gave the Dominion Government an inordinate power of controlling the constituencies, we would not have had this proposition to repeal it to-day. I am inclined to think that hon. gentlemen opposite would have held to it, but it is because they know, after many long years of trial, that that law was not open to any such objection and that it has never been charged against it that it has been the means of any undue influence being used to prevent a free expression of public opinion in the different constituencies, that they now ask to repeal it. No man in this House ought to be willing that the question of the franchise for this Parliament should be a party question. In a question of that kind we should rise above and beyond party, and be ready to treat it fairly, without reference to party, and see if we cannot engraft upon this measure, taking the provincial lists as a basis, such action as will secure to every independent elector in this country, who is entitled to be put upon the roll, the putting of his name upon the roll and prevent men not entitled to that privilege from being put on it. There ought to be no difficulty in half a dozen gentlemen on both sides arriving at a common ground that would be acceptable to both sides of the House, and thus save a great deal of heart-burning and feeling of deep injustice, which will undoubtedly prevail in the great majority of the people, if this measure be forced through in its present form.

I shall just read a short extract from an article in a newspaper, which is a strong supporter of the present Government, on the Franchise Bill, and that paper is the Manitoba "Free Press." After saying a good deal against the old franchise law, which I shall not trouble the House with reading, as it is rather too long, and my voice is not in a condition to read more than I am obliged to, the Manitoba "Free Press" says:

Now the Liberals have their turn, and one of their first acts is to repeal the present law. They intend to wipe it out and substitute the provincial lists, without any federal interference.

There is the point at issue between us. We do not object to taking the provincial lists as a basis, but we do object to making them absolute and taking all control and power from the Dominion Parliament. How long hon. gentlemen opposite may be in a position to exercise power, I shall not undertake to say, because prophesying is a rather dangerous thing, but I say that we are willing that the federal control should be in their hands, and they ought not to vote want of confidence in themselves and say that they are afraid to trust themselves with that power. I would infinitely prefer that it should be in their hands than that these lists should not be subject to federal influence at all.

The "Free Press" goes on to say:

In one province, Manitoba, the principle of government control of the lists is the very foundation of the law, and in its operation an election is assured in every doubtful constituency by the dishonest practices of the registration clerks. The law could not contribute more effectively to the stuffing of the lists in the interest of the ruling party if it had been specially and avowedly designed for that purpose. In Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island the laws are also capable of gross abuse. We need not inquire whether the Liberals have forgotten or swallowed their scruples of 1885; it is sufficient to know that by the Bill now before the House a federal election law will be imposed on this province, and on other provinces, that will be infinitely worse than the existing Dominion law was ever claimed to be. Our only hope of escape from a measure under which the electorate will be left at the mercy of the Government agents, and the free expression of the popular will need not be permitted, lies in the Senate. To that body we make our appeal, and should the Bill go to it in its present shape we ask, in the name of electoral purity and electoral decency, that it be rejected.

The PRIME MINISTER. What is the date of that article?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. April 15th, 1897. And as I have said, it is a paper that certainly is no supporter of hon. gentlemen on this side. I might call attention to another opinion. I have not the paper under my hand, but I have a reference to it, and that will take less time. The "Globe," on the franchise, on May 14th or May 20th, 1896, said:

The qualification of electors cannot be left to the provinces.

Now, Sir, if the hon. gentleman will listen either to his own friends or to the dictates of justice, and will be disposed to do that which is fair between man and man and party and party, I think we will be able to get along and he will save a great deal of time. I think we would then be able to remove all the objections to the old law and arrive at a franchise that will be regarded as a fair and just franchise, which will protect the rights of electors all over Canada.

Before I sit down I intend to make just one general reference to some observations made by the hon. Minister of Finance. I cannot understand that hon. gentleman. He got up the other night, at the close of the debate, after I had spoken just before the question was put, and made a number of statements to the House on what he regarded, I have no doubt, as matters of fact. Well, he has found out that his statements were not statements of fact. He found out that he was altogether wrong, and to-night he admitted that he had been altogether wrong in the controversy I had with him on that subject. But he still claims that he was not wholly wrong. I would just say to him that he must not hope in this House, by vehemence of statement, to prevent people understanding facts when they are established beyond controversy. The hon. gentleman, with great warmth, when my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Gillies) read the law and showed that he was altogether wrong and that under the laws of Nova Scotia these officials, who had been disfranchised, could not be on the lists, his answer was: Oh, I saw them on the lists. But I must say to my hon. friend that vehemence of statement is worthless.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In the face of absolute proof made by my hon. friend from Richmond, I think my hon. friend the Minister of Finance would have done better if he had simply said: Well, I find that I was mistaken.

The following persons, if of the full age of 21 years—

—this is the present law of Nova Scotia—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

—of the full age of 21 years, and subjects of Her Majesty by birth or naturalization, and not disqualified by any section of this Act—

Mark, this Act contains that disqualification, the Act which you have on the last page of this Bill, under which a large number of officials are disqualified——and not disqualified by any section of this Act, or otherwise by law prevented from voting, shall be entitled to have their names entered on the lists.

Now, can the English language furnish proof more conclusive of the fact that the names were not allowed to be entered on the lists than the law declaring that only those could have their names on the voters' lists who were free of any disqualification by this Act.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Certainly.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Let us go back to the Indian.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will come back to the Indian.

Mr. RUSSELL. I wish to ask the hon. gentleman the same question that I was desirous of asking the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies). The revisers make up their lists some time in April or May. Now, by what possible divination or inspiration can they know who will or will not be disqualified from voting in an election which may not take place for two or three years, seeing that there is no disqualification in the Nova Scotia statutes of Dominion officials as such, but only a disqualification of persons who, within a certain fixed and limited period receive Dominion money as officials of the various departments? How, then, can a reviser undertake to leave a Dominion official off the list when he is revising, simply because he imagines that probably, two or three years hence, when an election is on, that Dominion official may be disqualified? I think it was the discovery of that impossibility that led to the repeal, in 1885, of the provision that these officials should be struck off the lists, and my apprehension of the matter is there has never been any attempt on the part of the reviser to leave Dominion officials off the lists, because they were not disqualified and disentitled to vote as Dominion officials pure and simple, but only if they continued to be in the employ of the Dominion within 30 days, or, as amended 15 days, of the time of an election. The provision which authorized and instructed the revisers to strike the names off the list was repealed by the repealing clauses of the statute of 1885, and since then there has been no power in the revisers to leave off the names of Dominion officials, and I am certain, as a matter of fact, they never were left off, except in such cases as that pointed out by the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), where revisers mistook their duties. But it is well understood that they are not to be left off and have not been left off. And my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) knows that there is no pretense that Dominion officials are disqualified in municipal elections, and yet these elections are held upon the lists thus prepared.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I could not have a better evidence given to this House of the utterly untenable position that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance occupies than the defence put forth by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), one of the ablest jurists in this House. If that hon. gentleman has nothing more to say in defence of the position of the Finance Minister than he has said just now, it will be unnecessary for me to take up much further time. I would ask the hon. gentleman: Can the fact that the lists are made up perhaps long before the election takes place controvert the fact that under the Nova Scotia law this clause is to be found, as every hon. gentleman has it in his hand, furnished him, I am glad to say, by the Solicitor General? This is given as Revised Statutes, chap. 4, section 67:

Any one who, within fifteen days before the election, was an employee or in the receipt of wages or emolument of any kind as such employee in the post office, the custom-house, the Inland Revenue Department, the lighthouse service, on the Government railroads, in the Crown lands office, or the local public works and mines, but nothing in section to extend to contractors.

And so on. There is an absolute disqualification by name of large classes of people, and that clause is embodied in the law that is here proposed.

Mr. RUSSELL. Disqualification of whom? Not Dominion officials, but Dominion officials who are in receipt of emoluments 15 days before the elections.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) has been looking at this with a microscope.

Mr. RUSSELL. If by that the hon. gentleman means that I have been looking at it with accuracy, I do not deny it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As I say, there is a disqualification absolute and complete of all persons who are in receipt of money from the Dominion. Fifteen days has nothing to do with postmasters and customs' officers and Inland Revenue Department officers and railway employees; it has nothing to do with parties who have been for long years in the enjoyment of these offices. It has no bearing on the question that the hon. gentleman has raised. I have read the section which declares that British subjects of the full age of 21 years, and not disqualified by any section of this Act, are entitled to have their names on the lists. And here you have a disqualification by a section of the Act. I cannot conceive how it is possible for any case to be made clearer, more overwhelming or more complete. Now, Sir, I may recall to the mind of hon. members the ground upon which that disqualification was made. In those days, Sir, the hon. Minister of Finance—

The PRIME MINISTER. I must ask my hon. friend to keep to the question, and the question is the Indian franchise, and not the franchise in Nova Scotia.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is not aware that I am replying to the speech made by the Minister of Finance this afternoon. If the Minister of Finance, from the Treasury benches, is permitted to discuss this question as he did, am I not right in calling the attention of the Chair to the answer?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Campbell). I hope hon. members will keep to the point.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid I have been keeping too close to the point. I was about to explain how this disqualification was put on the Statute-book of Nova Scotia. The Liberal party of that time, as the Minister of Finance knows, was in bitter hostility to the Dominion of Canada, and he knows that the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, in introducing this Bill in 1871, said:

Before the session closed such laws should be passed that every person who had the smell of Canada upon him would be excluded from this House.

That was the policy of the Liberal party at that time, and this Bill would prevent any person in the employ of the Canadian Government from being walked up to the polls and voting, whether he was asked or not.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. "Being walked up." That was it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not quite certain whether he walked up or whether he was carried up in a carriage. At all events, these are the circumstances under which this Bill was passed; and I ask the Solicitor General as a loyal Canadian, I ask him as a man who believes in maintaining the integrity of this wide Dominion—indeed I do not require to ask him, because he has already said that he is preparing to deal with this question in such a way as will enable these parties thus disfranchised to vote, and I thank him sincerely for it. I am aware that the Government has changed hands, that these officials are now the officials of a Liberal Government. But that would not induce me for a moment to lend myself to the degradation of an official because the Government was in the hands of one party or the other. I want to see the franchise in the hands of men of independent character who will faithfully discharge their duties in relation to it ; and I am certain that whichever party is in power, they may be entrusted safely with that duty. I was glad to learn from the Solicitor General that he intends to protect these parties, and that he is going to provide for maintaining their rights as electors. But what position does that put him in with the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), and with the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Heyd), if the rights of the Indians, which it has been proved they have exercised wisely and independently, are to be taken away because the legislation in Ontario does not preserve them. How is it that the Solicitor General is going to make fish of one and flesh of the other? How is he going to restore the franchise to these men from whom it was thus improperly taken away, so improperly that this Parliament had to interfere in order to restore it? I still hope that my right hon. friend and the Solicitor General—the latter I see has given this measure a great deal of careful consideration—will seriously consider whether it is yet too late for us to look calmly at that question with a view of finding whether we cannot arrive at some general principle that will enable us, while avoiding the great expense attending the operation of the late law, and making the lists of the province the basis of the franchise, will yet preserve federal control over the franchise under which our members are elected, and which I consider absolutely indispensable, after what we have seen in the various provinces, to the independence and freedom of this House.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend has dilated at considerable length on a question which is not before the House. The only question which we have to deal with at this moment is the amendment moved by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Heyd) regarding the franchise to Indians.

Mr. FOSTER. Would my hon. friend allow me—is that the correct rule? We have a substantive motion which we are discussing, an hon. gentleman has moved an amendment to that motion. Does the right hon. gentleman contend that we have no right to discuss the substantive motion on the amendment which has been proposed, and that we must confine ourselves entirely to the amendment?

The PRIME MINISTER. That is my opinion.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I will ask the ruling of the Chairman with reference to it.

The PRIME MINISTER. If my hon. friend will refer to the debates of 1885, which I have reason to remember, because at that time I sat on the other side of the House, he will agree with me that we were rigidly confined to the amendment which was under discussion before the Chair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Campbell). I think the Chairman read the whole of section 5, and this is an amendment to that whole section. Therefore I think that the whole section as well as the amendment are under consideration.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend appealed to me in the name of Liberal principles not to allow a class of electors, the Indians, to be disfranchised under this new Act. Sir, I cannot but feel flattered at the encomium which was passed by my hon. friend upon Liberal principles, but I differ from him in toto in the application of those principles. He applied them, not as a Liberal but a Tory. I noticed that in one part of his argument he spoke of a decision rendered by a judge against the interest of his party, and he used this expression, "though that judge was a friend of ours." Sir, this is not a Liberal principle, this is a Tory principle. A judge ought not to be the friend of any party. A judge is to administer justice according to the law, and to say upon the floor of Parliament that a judge—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will my hon. friend allow me—I had the very highest authority in this country for characterizing a judge as a friend.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am not aware to what authority he is referring. But I know that when the hon. gentleman speaks of a judge as a friend of his party, there is no authority in this country, or in any other country, which can warrant such language. However strong a party man a gentleman may be before his appointment, the moment he ascends the bench he should leave behind him all the party proclivities which he entertained up to that time. My hon. friend appealed to me in the name of Liberal principles to retain the franchise to the Indians, and he exclaimed: What, is it to be the case that this so-called Liberal Government is going to disfranchise a portion of the electorate? Sir, this is not the question before the House. The question is whether this franchise is to be regulated by this Parliament or by the local legislatures, and upon that question we differ. The hon. gentlemen opposite have taken the ground that this Parliament should regulate the franchise, while we have taken the ground that the best method of dealing with it, in view of our complicated government under a federative system, is to have one uniform franchise for each province and for the Dominion, that is to say, that the same authority which regulates the franchise for the local legislature should also regulate it for the Dominion Parliament. Now, this is the principle upon which this Bill is based, and I claim that it is the correct one. The hon. gentleman stated a moment ago that such a system had never been seen in any part of the world. Why, Sir, he has only to go to the other side of the line where he will find that, though the people have dual legislatures, federal and state, there is only one legislature which determines the franchise, and that is the state legislature, equivalent to the provincial legislature here. But if we are to deal with the question as an abstract question, if we are to determine whether the Indians should have the right to vote or not, I would not for my part have any objections to giving them that right after the testimony we have heard of the qualifications of the Indians to exercise the franchise. But in any well regulated system of government the proper thing must be done, not alone because it is just per se, but the proper thing must be done by the proper authorities. It is only a few days ago that we had a discussion in this House upon a Sabbath Observance Bill, a very good measure in itself. But this measure was killed because a large majority of the members were of the opinion that this Parliament was not the proper authority to legislate upon that question, that it was more properly the concern of the local legislature, and that it was for them to deal with it. So it is with this question as to whether the Indians ought to be admitted to the right to vote. It is a question which should not be debated upon the floor of this Parliament, it is a question which concerns the local legislatures. It may be that the Indian is as well qualified as the white man to vote, I do not dispute the statement at all. But with this question, as with the Sabbath Observance Bill, this is not the place to discuss it. There are provinces where it may be advisable that the Indians should have the right to vote, but under this very law which we are now engaged in repealing, these very questions were determined in one way for one set of Indians and in another way for another set of Indians. Under this very Act which we are repealing, the franchise was given to the Indians in the older provinces, and was refused to the Indians of the North-west Territories. Why? If the Indians should have the right to vote in one province, why should they not have it in another province? If, as a matter of justice, they should have the right to vote in Ontario and Quebec, why should they not, as a matter of justice, have the right to vote in the province of Manitoba? I stated that under the Franchise Act the enfranchisement of the Indians does not extend to the province of Manitoba. There must be some reason for that fact. The reason is that Parliament thought the Indians were not yet sufficiently advanced in civilization that they could safely be given the right of the franchise. What does this prove? It proves that the right of voting is a local question, depending on the education of the people. And who is to determine that question? Is it not the legislature of each province? Why have we this complicated system of federal government, under which power to legislate on certain subjects is given to the local legislatures, while power to legislate on other subjects is given to this Parliament? Because there are certain subjects which can better be treated on local lines. Take the question of education. Whoever thought it would be right that the question of education should be determined by this Parliament? No one believes that would have been wise. It is a question properly allotted to the local legislatures, because a system that might suit one province might not suit another. So it is with the question of the franchise. But, as I said a moment ago, if we were called upon to determine as an abstract question whether the Indians could vote or not vote, I would be fully prepared, after the testimony given this afternoon that they were fully competent to grant the franchise to them. But if the Indians are qualified to vote, as has been stated this afternoon, the local legislatures will deal with that question and give them the right to vote, and then hon. gentlemen will be satisfied. If in Ontario, for instance, the Indians are properly qualified to vote, the legislature—the Liberal party, which, thank heaven, are in power in that province—will deal with the question. And it will be the same in Manitoba. If the people are satisfied that the Indians who live with them are competent to take hold of the franchise, it will be granted them. But the hon. gentleman declared that the Liberal Government were about to disfranchise the Indians. I tell the hon. gentleman that the policy of the Liberal party, the principles of the Liberal party is not to disfranchise the Indians, but it is to refer that question to the authority competent to deal with it. But I will give the hon. gentleman the policy of his party. He referred to the Bill introduced by Sir John Thompson, and he wanted us to go back to that Bill and, if I understood him correctly, he wished to embody the provisions in this Bill. I am not doing an injustice in stating that the hon. gentleman wanted the Government to adopt the provision in the Bill of Sir John Thompson, who had taken the provincial lists as the basis and on that wanted the list for the Dominion to be prepared. There was a paragraph, an enactment in the Bill introduced by Sir John Thompson, with this end in view, which I commend to the hon. gentleman. Subsection 2 of section 4 provided:

No Indian shall be qualified to have his name upon the list of voters unless he is enfranchised within the meaning of the Indian Act.

This is the same provision as is contained in the law of Ontario.

Enfranchised Indians, whether wholly or partly of Indian blood, shall be entitled to vote without having a property qualification.

Under the Ontario law an enfranchised Indian can vote. If the hon. gentleman had his will, he would have a different state of things prevailing: he is going back on the policy of his predecessor, Sir John Thompson. We take a broader view than did Sir John Thompson. The view we take on this question, as on many others, is that a settlement is to be made not on the floor of this House but in every province where, according to the education of the Indians, the legislature thinks the Indians should or should not be entitled to the franchise. There are certain provinces where that may be; there are other provinces clearly where it could not be. Still the hon. gentleman wants us to have a uniform system on that subject. The arrangement proposed shows the position we have taken, that the question is to be considered by the provincial legislatures. I do not want to go out of the records and I have only one remark to make to the hon. gentleman on this point. Should this duty devolve on the provincial legislature or on the Dominion Parliament? Let me recall to the hon. gentleman's mind, because he seems to forget these matters very readily, that for the first nineteen years of confederation, this Parliament was elected on lists prepared by the local legislatures. Let me recall further that there were no complaints made at that time against that system. Let me recall again that under the system of the Dominion Franchise Act passed in 1885, there was not a year but there were complaints and grievous complaints in regard to that matter. I ask my hon. friend this question: Is it not the fact that if this Franchise Act is not passed during this session we shall be obliged to have a revision of the Dominion lists. There is not an hon. member who would not look with absolute terror on the prospect that in July he would have to meet the worry and expense of a revision of the lists. If hon. gentlemen opposite have a better system to propose, let them offer it; but as between a Dominion and provincial franchise, as between a Dominion list and provincial lists, there can be no hesitation, because we have had for nineteen years a provincial list and provincial franchise.

Mr. MILLS. The right hon. First Minister has told the House that we had, previous to 1885 a law giving the control of the franchise to the different provinces, and that there was no complaint and no cause for complaint. On that ground I differ entirely from the leader of the House. There was a great cause of complaint, and it existed in the province of Nova Scotia, where men were disfranchised from voting at the local elections. Their names were struck from the local lists and being so disfranchised they could not vote at elections for members of this Parliament. That matter was before this House in 1882. It was a cause of complaint then, and that was before the Franchise Act of 1885. It was such a serious cause of complaint at that time that this Parliament passed an Act providing that the electors who were struck off the lists in Nova Scotia by the iniquitous Act of 1871 should be restored to the voting power, and they were restored by a special Act, incorporated in a measure that was being passed through the House in 1882.

The Act of 1882 was introduced by the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, and after passing through this House it went to the Senate. It was amended by the Senate because it was brought to the ear of the Senate that some of the people of Nova Scotia who were disfranchised were—to use the words of the right hon. leader of this House—educated enough to vote intelligently for a member of this Parliament. The Senate amended the Act passed through this House in such a manner as to enable those who were disfranchised in Nova Scotia to vote at the federal elections that were about to take place. The right hon. the Premier is therefore incorrect in saying that previous to 1885 there was no complaint of the manner in which the provincial franchises were regulated. I have heard that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was proud of the work done in Nova Scotia disqualifying these men. He is now, however, endeavouring to shuffle the responsibility for these disqualifications on to the shoulders of other parties, but I tell the House that he cannot by any means get rid of the responsibility for that most infamous and most iniquitous Act.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS. I am glad that what I say is meeting with the approbation of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. McLennan). I know it would have had his approbation at one time in his political existence, and though he may have turned his coat in the meantime, yet he may have some solid and substantial reasons for so doing. If the responsibility for maintaining this Franchise Act on the statutes of Nova Scotia rests upon any person in this House, it rests upon the Minister of Finance. He was not a legislator in 1871, to be sure, but he was in a hot-bed of secession, and in a hot-bed of repeal at that time, and it was the hot-bed of secession and the hot-bed of repeal that gave vitality to that Act disfranchising a section of the community in Nova Scotia. It was the hot-bed of secession, it was the hot-bed of repeal, it was the hot-bed of anti-federalism, that caused that Act to be retained, as it is retained to-day in that province. The question was asked in this House, whether the fourth section of the Act of 1871 is still in force in Nova Scotia? I say that it is in force, and that it prohibits those voters not only from voting at an election, but it prohibits their names from being placed upon the list. The occurrences in this House this afternoon are a strong argument in favour of having a man of a trained legal mind to act as reviser, for even the lawyers in this House are at variance as to the correct interpretation of the Nova Scotia franchise law. We have the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) disputing with some hon. members on this side, and although there is no man more eminent in the law in the province from which I come, on that side of the House, still he is at variance with other able lawyers as to who, under the Act, can be placed on the voters' lists of Nova Scotia. If that is the case with lawyers, how will it be with ignorant revisers who know nothing about the law, but who are partisans above everything else; ignorant so far as the law is concerned, having knowledge in their own spheres of life, but being ignorant of the law, being partisans, being always in doubt, they look to their ward heelers who want to get men on or off the list, and so they do exactly as the machine politicians dictate to them. If you have a man who can intelligently review these lists, a man who understands how to properly interpret the law and has the courage of his convictions, then you will have a proper voters' list. The right hon. the Premier has stated that it is the policy of his Government to have the franchises regulated by the different provinces because, as he says, the provincial legislatures understand better the local conditions. I do not know but that he also stated that they knew who were sufficiently well educated to vote for the return of a member to this Parliament. He made the reference, at all events, to the Indians, and if that expression will apply to the Indians, it must apply to those disfranchised electors in Nova Scotia. Not only are some of these men kept off the lists, but many are called to halt when they go to the polls by that disqualification oath, and will any one tell me that these men are not intelligent enough to vote at an election, in the interests of the country. If this Bill passes in its present form, it will be one of the most degrading laws that was ever enacted in this Parliament. Sir, we are taking a long stride in retrogression if we put such a law upon the Statute-book. In 1892, or 1893, I brought to the notice of this House that most disgraceful franchise law of Nova Scotia, and I endeavoured to get Parliament to pass a retaliatory measure which would prohibit all local officials from voting at a Dominion election, so that the local government might be forced to remove the disfranchising clause which prohibited Dominion officials in Nova Scotia from voting at provincial elections. The Minister of Finance, to a certain extent, was correct when he said that the province of Nova Scotia enacted no law prohibiting any man in Nova Scotia from voting for a member of the Federal Parliament. They had no power to do that, but they did enact a law preventing the names of Dominion officials being placed upon the list, and disqualifying them from voting at the provincial elections, and, Sir, that very same law is engrafted in this Bill now before the House. So, if this Bill passes, the Parliament of Nova Scotia will have enacted a law which will prohibit Dominion officials in Nova Scotia from voting for candidates for this House. I think it is the duty of this side of the House to give this Bill a most decided opposition—a continued opposition, if you will. I believe that a good, fair, square, substantial Act could be enacted in this House. Let men get together and meet each other as men, and enact a Franchise Act that will do justice to all. Then, it will be a credit to this House and a credit to this country. The right hon. leader of the House points to the United States of America as an example of allowing the states to regulate the franchise for the federal parliament. To be sure it does; but it keeps a control over that franchise. Did it not do so when the fifteenth amendment was passed, calling into the voting arena the black population of the United States? That was entirely against the feeling of a great number of the Southern States but still the federal parliament passed that amendment; and there were other Acts, which I cannot just now remember, passed by the federal parliament of the United States, whereby it showed its control over the franchises of the different states under which members to the federal house were returned. I believe we would be doing something degrading if we gave to other parliaments the responsibilities and duties that are specially our own. It would be entirely a retrograde step, and I protest as strongly as I possibly can against any such transaction as this. There are a great many iniquities in this Bill, which should be amended; but there is no clause that should be more particularly amended than the clause we have under consideration at the present time.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). With regard to the observations of the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), I may say that, however much I admired the melody of his voice, and the very strong points he appeared to be making, in his own estimation, I did not rise equal to applauding him with the vehemence that some other hon. gentlemen did. The fact of the matter is I did not applaud him at all. While on my feet, I may say, with regard to the application of the Franchise Act in the province of Nova Scotia that I have been for sixteen years a member of the municipal council of Inverness, upon which body among other duties devolved the duty of applying the Franchise Act of the province. I am not a lawyer and therefore cannot join in the disputation which the hon. member for Annapolis declared was being waged between the lawyers in this House. I was one of the members of a body whose duty it was to apply the law, and not to dispute with regard to this, that, or any other phase of

it. We read it as we thought it was our duty to read it, and applied it according to the purpose for which the legislature of Nova Scotia passed it. Our application of the Franchise Act of Nova Scotia was this. That Act conferred the right to vote, upon the basis of a property qualification, an income qualification; and a qualification consisting of both combined. The assessors prepared the first instalment of the electoral lists, and then posted up their lists so prepared in three public places in the various electoral districts. The revisers then took these lists and copied therefrom all names opposite which they found the requisite amount of property stated. These revisers did not know or could not be supposed to know whether these names were the names of Dominion officials or not. The next step was that any person finding that he had the requisite qualification made application to the revisers to have his name placed upon the list within a fixed date. The revisers again were not supposed to know whether these applicants received their income from the Dominion Government, from the local government, from a private corporation, or from an individual. It was not the business of the revisers to know this at all, nor did they ever, to my knowledge, take the trouble to know it. The revisers met at a time fixed by statute and received these applications, and there and then took down this list as the list of electors qualified to vote at municipal elections, and at elections for members of the legislature. I ask the hon. leader of the Opposition or the hon. member for Annapolis where was the right of any of these revisers to leave off any of the names of the applicants I have indicated? What proof, for example, could they furnish that this, that, or the other person was a Dominion official? All they required to know was that they possessed the necessary property or income qualification to entitle them to vote. The lists were then made up in this manner, comprising these two sets of qualified electors. When a municipal election took place, all whose names were on the list went to the polls to vote. If there was then any disqualification, under the Act of the legislature, the question of the disqualification came up in the polling booth. In the same manner, when the elections for the local legislature came off, the very same lists were applied, and again, if there was any disability under the Act, the challenge could be made in the polling booth. For example, in the year 1882, a provincial and a Dominion election took place in Nova Scotia. The lists then made by the municipal authorities were the lists upon which the Dominion elections were contested. The elector whose name was on both lists went into both booths on the same day; he would first go into the booth for the local legislature and poll his vote, and then go into the booth for the Dominion Parliament and poll his vote there also; and it was left to the candidate whom he opposed, or his agent, to object to his vote on the ground that he was a Dominion official. I therefore cannot see for a moment where the great hardships depicted by the hon. member for Annapolis would come in, nor can I see, for the life of me, where the iniquities charged by the hon. leader of the Opposition came in. I represent a constituency comprising 27,000 of a population and with over 6,000 electors, and I have contested several elections there, Dominion and local, and in all my experience I never yet knew of an instance of a Dominion official being kept off the voters' lists. I have known of a few instances of such electors being challenged in the booths, but I never knew of an instance of a name being kept off the lists by the revisers in that constituency. So far as my knowledge goes, then, and I claim considerable acquaintance during that long term of service in the municipal council of Inverness, with the working of the Franchise Act in that constituency, and also considerable acquaintance with the work in other municipalities throughout the province, and I have never yet heard of a different order of things existing in any of these. Therefore I, for one, have no hesitation in declaring that the people of Nova Scotia are perfectly willing to have the franchises, Dominion, local and municipal, held in their own hands. If, for instance, an Indian in the province of Ontario desired to vote, as appears to be the case, from the memorials read in this House this evening, the people of Ontario would certainly have a better right to declare whether he should have the right to vote for the election of a member to this House than the people of Nova Scotia or any other province.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). That is exactly what this Bill now before Parliament seeks to bring about, namely, that every elector in every province shall have the right to declare who is entitled to vote for a representative from that province to this House. As the right hon. leader of the House has very truly said, this has been the order of things for nineteen years, and from my knowledge of the history of that time, in the province from which I come, I feel satisfied that there was no justification for this Parliament passing a Dominion Franchise Act, owing to any difficulty existing in the application of the Nova Scotia franchise law. I therefore have no hesitation in supporting the Bill now before the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, asked me a question, and I propose to answer it very briefly. He asked me on what ground I challenged the mode in which they constructed the lists in Nova Scotia. He took up all the time in which he spoke in informing the House that he did not know how to discharge the duties with which he was vested as a revising officer.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). Not as revising officer, but as municipal councillor, having the right to appoint those who applied the law.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Very well, he went on to state that he had been engaged in preparing the lists of voters.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). Not at all. I said that I was a municipal councillor, and as such had the right to appoint those who applied the Act.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then the hon. gentleman occupied the time of the House in speaking of something that is not under consideration at all. No one has been questioning the right of a municipal councillor to put all the parties, qualified by law, on the assessment roll.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). If the hon. gentleman puts it in that way, I am afraid I am not alone in my opinion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So far as the duties of the revisers go, they are laid down in this Act, and this Act shows that the revisers are bound, in making up the lists, to leave off the name of every man who is disqualified by the law of Nova Scotia from voting for a member of the House of Assembly. That law declares that the names of such men shall not be put on the list. It instructs them to leave these names off the list. Therefore, what he might have done in the discharge of his duty as municipal councillor we have nothing to do with. That is not the question before the House. The question is that of the voters' lists, and if he is not speaking of what he did in the character of a reviser, what he said had nothing whatever to do with the subject under discussion. The question we are discussing is whether, in the construction of the voters' lists, the revisers may put on the names of parties who are disqualified by the law of Nova Scotia.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). Will the hon. gentleman answer this question? Let us suppose he was a reviser himself, and that he was given a list by the assessor, how could he determine in revising that list and checking over the names of persons with the required property qualifications, that certain of these persons were Dominion officials.

Mr. MILLS. The party machine would tell him in every county.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). How is he to determine which of these were Dominion officials, and which were not?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is a matter of notoriety who are Dominion officials. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that he or the reviser in the county of Inverness did not know who were postmasters in the municipality and who were customs officers, and so on.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). Let us suppose that there were a half dozen people of the same name, how could the reviser tell which one of those was a postmaster or a customs officer? There might, for instance, be half a dozen John Macdonalds.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. McLennan) made one important statement in the first speech he made tonight. He said that, as proof of the fairness of the lists made in Nova Scotia previous to 1895, that the same lists were used in every constituency, both for local and federal elections. I am informed by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) that in his county such was not the case, but that a separate list was made for the local elections and a different list for the federal elections, and that in the list for the federal elections, the officials disqualified by the Nova Scotia Act, enumerated in the memorandum attached to this Act by the Solicitor General, were kept off the list prepared for the federal elections. If that be so, Sir, then the argument of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. McLennan) loses its foundation, and the basis of his argument being gone his conclusion is quite unjustified.

Mr. McLENNAN. I mentioned the lists of 1882.

Mr. McINERNEY. I said that. But that does not weaken the point I made, because the Dominion Franchise Act was only enacted in 1885. So that, in 1882, or 1879, what ever year you take previous to 1885, it reduces the hon. gentleman's argument to an absurdity. He says that the lists were fair because the same lists were used in both elections, the federal and local. Now, I am informed, and believe that the information is correct, and the hon. gentleman does not contradict it, that in the constituencies of Nova Scotia one list was made for local elections and a totally different one for federal elections, and in the federal lists the names of Dominion officials disqualified by the provincial law, did not appear.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. RUSSELL. I desire, with the hon. member's permission, to ask a question.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) has made about half a dozen speeches on this subject so far.

Mr. RUSSELL. And how many has the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) made?

Mr. McINERNEY. This is the only one. I have risen several times, but have always given way, notably to the hon. member for Inverness. I rose before he did and caught the Chairman's eye, but at the Chairman's instance, I allowed the hon. gentleman to speak. Now, I propose to say what I have to say in as brief a way and in as fair a way as possible. I think I have met the only statement of importance put forward by the hon. member for Inverness. If the conclusion that he drew was based upon it, it must be erroneous.

Now, the Prime Minister threw a new bone of contention into this debate. He is the first to announce the doctrine that to the local legislatures belongs the franchise. I would ask him if he states that as a constitutional principle or as a question of policy. I would like the hon. gentleman to state what ground he takes. He surely cannot seriously state, in the presence of many lawyers in this House, in the presence of men who know the constitution of their country, in the presence of the intelligent members of this House, such a doctrine as this as a constitutional doctrine. For, it is a complete absurdity, it is known to be utterly foreign to the facts, it is known to be completely erroneous. His statement was applauded by members on the back benches, but not by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), not by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), not by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), not by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), not by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), not by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister). There was not a lawyer of standing on that side who cheered this doctrine announced for the first time in this House, announced for the first time before any serious deliberative body in Canada, announced for the first time before sensible men—the doctrine that to the local legislatures belongs the franchise of the country. That is an entirely erroneous constitutional doctrine. This Parliament certainly has the power to say what shall be the franchise upon which members shall be elected to this House. Does the hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) deny that? I am not here to say that we cannot delegate that power to the local legislatures. It may be that my right hon. friend may take the other horn of the dilemma and claim that it is true as a matter of policy. But if he should stand up in this House and enunciate the doctrine—that it is the constitutional right of the local legislatures to control the franchise, I deny it most emphatically, and I do not believe there is a lawyer even on his own side of the House who will endorse his statement. I shall be surprised, astonished, if there is a single gentleman on the other side, of legal training, or a man of common sense, who will stand up and enunciate the doctrine that to the local legislature and to them alone belongs the right to declare what the franchise shall be upon which the members of the Canadian Parliament shall be elected. But if he takes the ground that it is a matter of policy, then the hon. gentleman is turning back the hands of the clock, he is making a retrograde movement. I understand that the Liberal party has claimed to be a party of progress. Who ever heard of the Liberal party in England, for instance, passing laws to restrict the franchise. I have never heard of it. Why, it was the boast of Mr. Gladstone, it was the boast of the Liberal party in England that they had extended the franchise and had given it to many who had never possessed it before. But hon. gentlemen opposite have made a retrograde movement. Why, will hon. gentlemen opposite name to me a single confederated country in the world in which there is not uniformity of franchise or in which the power to control the franchise does not rest with the federal authority?

The PRIME MINISTER. Do you say that seriously?

Mr. McINERNEY. I ask it most seriously. In the republic of Switzerland is it not provided that there is uniformity of franchise and with the central government lies the power to say what it shall be. In the German confederation is not the same thing true, and in the old North German confederation was not the same thing true? I can give the hon. gentleman the sections of the constitutions of these countries on which I rely, because I have them under my hand. They show that in every case it is declared that the franchise shall be uniform or that the central government shall have the power to control the franchise. On this side of the Atlantic, in the republic of Brazil, the United States of Brazil—because it is a federated country—the same rule and doctrine holds as in these older countries that I have mentioned. Now, the hon. gentleman may point out to me the case of the United States of America. In the United States of America there is a general provision that every citizen of twenty-one years of age shall have the franchise. I am not here to maintain that in some particulars and in some instances, certain restrictions are not put on individuals claiming the franchise in certain states, or that in certain other states they have not enlarged the franchise locally, that is beyond the general principle as recognized, as, for instance, in Wyoming, where they allow women to vote.

But, Sir, in the United States of America the general principle of the constitution is that every citizen 21 years of age shall have a vote. But there is an important difference between the principle underlying their constitution and that underlying ours. In the United States it is well known that every power which is not expressly stated in the constitution as belonging to the federal authority, belongs to the state authorities;

while with us the opposite principle prevails, that every power that is not expressly stated in the constitution to belong to the local authority, belongs to the federal authority. So there is one reason why we in Canada should go further in the direction in maintaining federal control over the franchise than they have gone in the United States. I am, therefore, surprised that the right hon. gentleman should have enunciated the constitutional doctrine, if it is a constitutional doctrine, that to the local authorities in this Dominion belongs the right to control the franchise of the country. I am the more surprised that having announced this as the policy of the Liberal party, he should then seek to turn back the hands on the dial and to restrict the franchise by giving control of it over to the different provinces. Now, Sir, I sympathise heartily with the views expressed by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister). I believe the hon. member for Lambton is thoroughly sincere in the views which he has put forward. He has called timely attention to the fact that the Liberal party of Canada pledged itself to this country for many long years that when they got into power they would repeal the Franchise Act of 1895 and amending Acts. They protested vigorously against the enactment of that Act, and from that time down to the last general election they had not ceased to protest vigorously against what they call the iniquities of the Franchise Act of 1895. Sir, I am here to admit that it was part of their duty, and I praise them for it, now to carry out that pledge, that plank in their platform. I say they are bound to carry it out; and when an hon. gentleman flung the charge across the House at me that I was holding out a threat in saying that this Act would not pass this Parliament, and that I was implying that another body would throw it out, that was the furthest thing from my mind and I cannot see how I could have been so entirely misunderstood. When I made that statement I was interrupted by an hon. gentleman from the other side of the House who asked me: Where will it be defeated? and I replied: In this Chamber. Therefore, when the hon. gentleman charged me with threatening that this Bill would be thrown out in some other Chamber, he entirely misunderstood me. I do not believe in that policy, with regard to this Bill. I am not here to say what the duty of any branch of this Parliament may be in regard to this or any other Bill. I believe that each branch of this Parliament is free to do as it pleases with regard to any piece of legislation. But I am free to say that since the Liberal party of Canada put the plank in their platform that they would repeal the Franchise Act of 1895, I think it is their duty to do so. I think in that respect they represent the voice of the people of this country—I freely admit that. Why, Sir, it would be strange if I did not admit it. It may not be interesting to this House for me to explain my own position with regard to the Franchise Act of 1895. However, I may be allowed to remind the House, and I do so in no boasting spirit, that when I first came into this Chamber in 1893, I was honoured by an invitation to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. At that time, although there was no mention of the Franchise Act in the Speech from the Throne, I departed from the matter of that Speech and took occasion to declare that I was in favour of the repeal of the Franchise Act as it then existed. But if the Liberal party is held to fulfil its pledges to repeal the Franchise Act, it does not follow, and I think the hon. member for Lambton will agree with me here, that in repealing that Act it is necessary to enact this one. The repeal of the Franchise Act of 1895 does not necessarily mean the enactment of such a piece of legislation as this. I am willing to say that the Solicitor General has done his best in a difficult situation in endeavouring to frame this Bill, but I am also bold to state, after a careful study of this Act, that I do not believe it ever came under the consideration of all the hon. gentlemen representing the different provinces in the Government. Does the Minister of Railways and Canals, for instance, tell me that he considered this Bill and helped to frame it in its present shape? I can tell him that in his own province some sections of it are perfectly unworkable, and I think he knows it. Why, he himself, when he was Attorney General of New Brunswick, passed an Act dividing the parish of Dundas, in the county I represent, all the electors in which had previously voted at one poll, and which formed one subdivision at local elections. He cut off a small part of that parish, and made a separate subdivision, but he made no further provision, and when the local elections followed soon after, the sheriff and returning officer did not know what to do. The returning officer wired the hon. gentleman to get his opinion as to what he should do in the premises, and I may say that the hon. gentleman had no opinion to give him at that time, and could not tell him what to do. There was no lawyer in the country that could tell him what to do, because the law dividing the parish had made no provision allowing the returning officer to make a separate list for each subdivision, and left him completely in the dark. With that instance before us, I cannot believe, therefore, that the Minister of Railways and Canals, the former Attorney General of New Brunswick, helped to frame a Bill of this kind in which it is provided that the subdivisions for the local elections shall be taken for the Dominion elections, and that the lists for those subdivisions shall be used for Dominion elections. Let me tell the Solicitor General that in the parish of Dundas and in the parish of Wellington, in my county, there are from 900 to 1,000 votes in each of these parishes, and all have to vote at one poll. If you are going to take the local subdivisions for Dominion elections, how are you going to get 900 or 1,000 voters to vote at one poll in one day? How can we suppose, therefore, that the former Attorney General of New Brunswick, with the circumstances in his mind that I have just mentioned, has had this Bill under his consideration, and has approved it? I do not believe that this Bill has ever come before Council for their serious consideration at all. Now, when the Liberal party went to work to repeal the Franchise Act, I would have imagined that they would have gone in a forward direction instead of taking a backward movement. I would have imagined that the Liberal party of Canada, having in its ranks such men as the Minister of Railways and Canals, having in its ranks such men as the present Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, who was until recently a member of the Government, having in its ranks such men as the Minister of Finance and other eminent gentlemen from the various provinces who have in days gone by enacted manhood suffrage—I would have imagined, I say, that a Liberal Government composed of such men, would have brought down some enlarged measure, instead of bringing down a measure to restrict the franchise, such as this measure undoubtedly does.

Why, Sir, with such men in the ranks as the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis), who as long ago nearly as I can remember him on the floor of the local legislature of New Brunswick raised his voice in season and out of season, session after session, in favour of manhood suffrage, how comes it that the Liberal party, instead of adopting the principle of manhood suffrage, should have brought in such a piece of legislation as this, which restricts the franchise of the people. It does not restrict it, I hear some one say.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It extends it.

Mr. McINERNEY. Is the franchise of the province of Quebec as broad locally as the old Franchise Act of the Dominion?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. McINERNEY. It will be open to the Solicitor General to prove it. But, at all events, there are many other provinces in which the local franchise is not as broad.

Mr. LISTER. Not at all.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) has argued against one restriction.

Mr. LISTER. Simply as regards the Indians.

Mr. McINERNEY. That is one restriction. Non-residents are cut out, Dominion officials and local officials are excluded from voting in many of the provinces. Take these three pages of disqualified persons in the different provinces, attached to the Act by the Solicitor General, and ascertain what they mean. They mean that a large number of the most enlightened citizens are excluded from the franchise by this new piece of legislation, introduced by the great Liberal party. I am amazed that a party claiming to be a party of progress has not, instead of introducing this restrictive measure, brought in a Bill broadening the franchise of the people; and I am more than astonished that the hon. Prime Minister should, in the face of the constitutions of all the federated countries, South American, and others, and in the face of the principle, which is the basic principle of our constitution, which retains to the federal authorities all powers not given specifically to the local legislatures, have declared that as a matter of principle and law the local authorities have a right to control the franchise. I am more than amazed. I am astounded and surprised that as a question of party policy the hon. gentleman should declare that he will hand over to the local authorities the preparation of the lists and allow them as they please to regulate the franchise on which the members representing both political parties in Canada will be elected.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Campbell). Amendment lost.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not yet ready to vote, and two hon. gentlemen were on their feet. The Chairman must cast his eyes around the Chamber.

The CHAIRMAN. I looked around.

Mr. FOSTER. I must protest against the amendment being declared either lost or carried.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is no objection to my hon. friend going on. The Chairman did not see anybody rise.

Mr. FOSTER. We saw them.

The PRIME MINISTER. Then I hope the hon. gentleman will proceed.

Mr. FOSTER. I was going to rise to my feet, but I did not like to take the place of the Solicitor General or the member for Halifax. I kept my place, thinking the Chairman would look around the Chamber.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. member has no right to speak in this way about the Chairman. He acted in good faith. There is no intention whatever to curtail the discussion. I hope the hon. gentleman will proceed, and I shall be glad to hear him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no desire to intimate that the Chairman did anything but discharge the duty, but it is absolutely necessary while discussion is going on and two hon. members on their feet, that a motion should not be declared lost or carried.

The PRIME MINISTER. Go on.

Mr. BENNETT. I wish to say a few words—

Mr. FOSTER. I gave way to the member for Halifax and the Solicitor General. I have two or three words to say, although the discussion has taken a wide range, and it would almost appear as if there was nothing more to be said on the question. The first point to which I wish to call the attention of the House and the country is the divergence of sentiment and opinion between the members of the Government themselves. I think that has been most marked. I want to ask the Solicitor General now, after the events of the last hour or two have transpired, if he is prepared to rise and reiterate his pledge to the House that they are taking into consideration the remedying of what we consider to be a grievance, that gentlemen who in Nova Scotia now have the Dominion franchise will, if this Act is passed, on the principle on which the Prime Minister declared it must be passed, be disfranchised—if he will stand up now and say he has under consideration a measure for giving those gentlemen their votes. Will the hon. gentleman answer me that question?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. What I understood from the Minister of Finance was that some such measure was in contemplation.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt it was in contemplation, and no doubt until the First Minister placed himself directly in the face of two responsible colleagues, one of whom has charge of the Bill, it was contemplated in good faith that such a measure should be carried out. Will it be carried out now? Will the Solicitor General be as brave as his words were two or three hours ago?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not go back on my words.

Mr. FOSTER. I believe the hon. Solicitor General wanted to do what was honest and right. I want, however, to put to the leader of the House this simple question: What right has he to take away from gentlemen, just as well educated as himself, just as good in every respect as himself, a franchise which they have enjoyed and hold as one of the most precious rights of citizenship? The hon. gentleman, simply to carry out a fantastic theory, which my hon. friend (Mr. McInerney) showed a moment ago has no reason in the constitution and is doubtful on the question of policy, presumed to say that, in order to carry out that pedantic and fantastic fancy or theory, which has no foundation in the constitution, he will ruthlessly take away the right of the franchise from one thousand men in Nova Scotia and two or three thousand in Quebec and in other provinces of the Dominion, any one of whom is in every respect as free as is the hon. gentleman so far as citizenship is concerned.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. So far as regards Quebec there is no disqualification which does not exist under the Franchise Act.

Mr. FOSTER. I will come to that by-and-by.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You are at it now.

Mr. FOSTER. I will reach it before I sit now; but I want to carry out my theory. The Solicitor General will not deny that my general assertion was correct, that there are probably thousands of gentlemen of high intelligence and standing in the community to-day have the right to vote for their friends and exercise the right of citizenship in giving that vote in the different provinces of this Dominion; who, if the theory of the Prime Minister is carried out, will from the moment this Bill becomes law be deprived of that right of franchise. Am I right or wrong in that? There is no gentleman in this House who will deny that assertion. In the explanations the Government have attached to their own Bill, there is a list of disqualifications greater than you can find in any Franchise Act in any other Anglo-Saxon country.

Mr. FLINT. They are not disqualified to vote for members of the Dominion Parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. So my hon. friend says, but what are we attempting to pass in this House. We are attempting to pass a Dominion Franchise Act to settle who shall be eligible to vote for Dominion representatives, and the list that is printed here is to inform us who, as far as the provincial lists now go, are disqualified from going upon these lists. Am I right or wrong in that? The Prime Minister says that there shall not be a cross over a "T" or a dot over an "I" different from the local voters' lists.

Mr. RUSSELL. I suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster)—

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) want to make another little speech?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; only to ask a little question.

Mr. FOSTER. A little question of half an hour long.

Mr. RUSSELL. No, not long at all, and I feel confident that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) with his long parliamentary experience and great ability will not be so sensitive as the gentleman behind him (Mr. McInerney) with regard to my asking him a question. I want to know if there is anything in the law of Nova Scotia as it stands, which prevents Dominion officials from being put upon the lists? The point the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) makes is, that certain people in the province of Nova Scotia who ought to be voters are disqualified from being put upon the list, and I ask him if it is his reading of the statute, that any person, or taking the matter in the concrete, that Dominion officials as such are disqualified from being put upon the lists of voters in the province of Nova Scotia. I distinguish, remember, between being put upon the list and being capable of voting. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has acumen enough to see that.

Mr. FOSTER. I will take my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) upon one ground first, and then go to the other. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) think that it is a dignified position for him to take as a representative of the people, to argue about a mere quibble?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, is my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) attaching any weight at all to the question he put?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, I am.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose that the wrong man gets upon the list, and suppose that when the man comes up to vote some one is there who knows he ought not to be upon the list and puts the oath to him or challenges him, can he vote?

Mr. RUSSELL. My hon. friend knows—

Mr. FOSTER. Can he vote?

Mr. RUSSELL. No, he cannot vote at a provincial election if he is challenged.

Mr. FOSTER. He cannot vote if he is challenged.

Mr. RUSSELL. Excuse me for one moment. Surely my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), who is a sharp reasoner sees exactly the fallacy he is endeavouring to impose upon this House. Is it not altogether a different thing, the right to be put upon the list which we say is going to be the list of voters for the Dominion Parliament, and the right to vote in a local election although being upon the list when the party is challenged and his vote is prevented from being recorded. Surely my hon. friend cannot fail to see that difference. Suppose that under this Bill, as we understand it,—and if there is any obscurity in it, it can be made plain—suppose that every person whose name is put upon the list is to be eligible as a voter for a member of the Dominion Parliament, and suppose also we say that as a matter of legal contention, and construction, and universal practice in the province of Nova Scotia, every person who possesses the necessary property or income qualification is to be upon the list notwithstanding the fact that he may be a Dominion official, does my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) say that any Dominion official will be disqualified by the operation of this clause?

Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) say they are not?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, I will certainly say they are not intended to be disqualified.

Mr. MILLS. The intention and the fact are different things.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not wish to deal with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) now as it is not my intention to take the floor from the ex-Minister of Finance, but I do want an opportunity of explaining this matter. Surely my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) did not listen to the explanation given a while ago, namely, that the very clause of the statute of 1871 which did prevent these persons from being put upon the lists was expressly repealed, by the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, and ever since 1885 they have had the right to be put on the lists. If we adopt that list as the basis of the Dominion franchise they can only be disfranchised by putting some oath to them which will disqualify them. Of course in local elections there is an oath which can be put to them and which disqualifies them. It is for us to say whether we shall have the disqualification here or not.

Mr. FOSTER. Is my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) through now?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Entirely through.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, he has made speech No. 10 as a sort of interpolation between the speeches of other hon. gentlemen when they are trying to put their views before the House. Now, Sir, to commence where I left off when my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) interrupted me, I make again this assertion, that what the Prime Minister proposes to do is to say that the provincial lists shall be the lists upon which Canadian electors shall vote for Dominion representatives. That is a ground I suppose we all agree upon. Then I go to the lists themselves. I do not go any further for the present than the information which I have here, and I take what the Government itself gives for our information as to who are qualified to be put upon the list and who are not. I find then with reference to Nova Scotia to take a concrete instance, the classes of persons who are declared to be disqualified and are not eligible to go upon the lists.

Mr. RUSSELL. Who do you say they are?

Mr. FOSTER. I will give them to the hon. gentleman, or he can read them for himself at page 6 of the appendix to the Bill. These are they:

Any one who, within fifteen days before the election, was an employee or in receipt of wages or emoluments of any kind as such employee, in the post office, the custom-house, the Inland Revenue Department, the lighthouse service, on the Government railroads, in the Crown lands office, or the local public works and mines.

These are the persons who are enumerated and all these are disqualified.

Mr. RUSSELL. From what ?

Mr. FOSTER. From going upon the list.

Mr. RUSSELL. Not at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, they are disqualified from voting.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, in the local elections in Nova Scotia.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, if they are disqualified from voting, can they go on the list ?

Mr. RUSSELL. They must go on the list.

Mr. FOSTER. Why must they go on the list ?

Mr. RUSSELL. Because the law puts them on the list.

Mr. FOSTER. The law puts them on the list then, and the law explicitly states that they are disqualified from voting.

Mr. RUSSELL. Exactly.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that the kind of law you have in Nova Scotia ?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, that is exactly the kind of law we have.

Mr. FOSTER. Then it is worse than I thought it was. It is an immoral law ; it is a cheat ; it is a fraud. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) says that they have a law in Nova Scotia which in the first place declares that certain men are disqualified to vote, and in the second place puts them upon the list as if to tell them that they can vote. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) think that that is an honest law ?

Mr. RUSSELL. Have you not many men on your lists who cannot vote, if challenged ?

Mr. FLINT. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) allow me ?

Mr. FOSTER. No. I cannot be interrupted any longer. I will have the whole horde interrupting me if I allow it to continue. The pertinacious member from Halifax (Mr. Russell) is all I can get along with. He is up on his feet every two or three minutes, and as he knows something of what he is talking about as a rule, I will take his interruptions as best I can. So much with reference to Nova Scotia. The contention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) is that disqualified men can get upon the list, and if that be so there is something very wrong with the machinery, and if they do get upon the list when they come to vote they cannot vote, for if there are sharp men at the poll they will challenge that vote. And there will be sharp men at the poll who will challenge that vote ; party men on both sides are there for that purpose and they will do it. The absolute actual effect will be that at the voting these men will be disqualified from voting. The oath will be put to them there, they will be objected to, and they will be unable to vote. Now, Sir, we are on the same ground on these terms. Therefore, I say the absolute effect in the ultimate resort will be this, that in Nova Scotia that class of people cannot vote for a Dominion representative, and are consequently disqualified entirely. We cannot but agree on this point, that under the existing law they are not qualified to vote ; my hon. friend will not deny that ; so that when this Bill becomes law, these gentlemen, thousands of them, who to-day are qualified to vote, will then be disqualified to vote. Now, I ask what right has my right hon. friend or a majority of this House to disfranchise thousands of the citizens of this country, just as intelligent as we are who sit and vote in this House ? I say that this is a retrograde movement ; that it is unjust ; and although there may be the mechanical majority to force it through the House, it does not lose one iota of its injustice or one shade of its retrograde character. My hon. friend the Solicitor General saw that, and he sees it yet, and in the course of the afternoon's debate he was quite willing to take that matter into consideration, with the view of preserving the right of the intelligent white voter who to-day in the different provinces has the franchise, prizes it, considers it a part of his citizenship, and will feel aggrieved if deprived of it. I can go to other provinces and show the same thing to exist there. My hon. friend has said that in the province of Quebec there are no persons to-day qualified to vote on a provincial franchise basis, who will be disqualified if this Act is put through. I do not think my hon. friend is right in that ; let us see. We find the list of disqualifications in Quebec at present on page 6.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I was speaking of Dominion officials.

Mr. FOSTER. I am speaking of voters. Does my hon. friend rest his case simply on Dominion officials ? He does not deny that people vote there to-day in a Dominion election who would not be qualified to vote in a Dominion election if this Bill becomes law.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL. The employees of the local government are disqualified under the local Act passed by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) two years ago. Among the Dominion officials there is not a single disqualification.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not concerned as to who passed the Act. Now, I have what my hon. friend means. He means that the province of Quebec is different from the province of Nova Scotia in that in the province of Quebec the Dominion officials are not as Dominion officials disqualified; but he does not go so far as to say that there are not electors in Quebec possessing the franchise to-day and voting in Dominion elections who could not vote in Dominion elections after this Bill passes.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no difference then between us on that point. Then, where is the rule or reason for disfranchising such gentlemen as these? Because a man in Quebec or in any other province happens to be the agent of a local candidate in a local election, where is the right or reason for depriving him of his vote for a Dominion representative in a Dominion election? And yet, if this Bill becomes law, every man who has been an agent for a local candidate is disfranchised because of that fact. Can anybody give a reason for it? These gentlemen are not connected with the Dominion Government in the least; they are simply agents for an entirely different election, and may be for an entirely different party, they are intelligent men and good citizens. By what right are they deprived of their vote? Then, we will come to the officers of customs. In some of the provinces the officers of customs are upon the disqualified list, so far as the provincial lists go. To-day these officers of customs, amongst the most intelligent classes of our people, vote for Dominion representatives. In that, they affirm their citizenship in the wide Dominion, they give emphasis to their intelligence and their moral worth, and they take a deep and abiding interest in the affairs of their country; but are you going to cut off from citizens of that kind the only effective way in which they can register their moral worth, their intelligence, their views with reference to their country's policy and their country's growth? Can any reason at all be given? Take clerks of the peace in all the provinces of the Dominion. What disability has a man, because he is a clerk of the peace in British Columbia or in Nova Scotia that he should be disqualified from casting his vote for a Dominion representative? Clerks of the peace in some provinces of the Dominion, I am not sure but all of them, have a legal training. In order to carry out a mere quixotic idea, which has no foundation in the constitution of this country, you are going to disfranchise every clerk of the peace in some provinces of the Dominion. Take the county Crown attorneys. They have no connection with the Dominion Government. They are the appointees or representatives of a certain power in the provincial legislature. They are disqualified by provincial enactments from voting for provincial representatives and there may be some reason for that; but what reason is there for depriving them of the right to vote for Dominion representatives? They have no connection at all with the Department of Justice or the Government here. Take registrars in the same way; take deputy clerks of the Crown; take agents for the sale of Crown lands and Crown timber agents in all the provinces. Because they happen to be agents of local authority, they are debarred from voting in another electoral sphere with which they have no official connection whatever. There might be a good reason why a Crown timber agent in a province, receiving his appointment directly from the Minister who is administering that department, should be debarred from voting in the province; there may be a reason; I do not admit it; but if there is any reason for that, there is no reason why such a man should be debarred from voting in the wider arena of the Dominion. Take postmasters, take stipendiary magistrates, take police magistrates, take district magistrates as a whole; if I am not misinformed, in some provinces they are put upon the prohibited list of the province. The magistrates of the country selected presumably because they are able and efficient—I am not going to say that that always holds good, but we are bound to stand to the theory that the dispensers of justice are men of intelligence, men of standing, men of general worth and good citizens—yet you are going to disfranchise them. They now vote, they will not be able to vote hereafter. Go through the whole list. The collectors of provincial revenue—how many are there? Why, they are legion, but no collector of provincial revenue in some of the provinces, if this Bill is passed, will be able to vote for a Dominion representative. The district magistrates I have already mentioned. Then there are the officers and men of the provincial police; and in Quebec, for instance, you disfranchise them. To-day they have the right to vote, the right to influence public opinion and public policy, and so contribute to the commonwealth and the progress and stability of the country, as a whole, but hereafter they will be deprived of that right. This is a segregated instance, but, at the same time, it is an instance of the rule of right that by this Bill it will be applied all through. The contractors with a local Government will also be disfranchised in some of the provinces. Wherever there is a contractor with a local government, in any line of contract, large or small, they are to be disfranchised under this Bill, in some of the provinces, because they are put upon the prohibited list, through having some connection with the powers that be in those provinces in the matter of bargain and sale, in the matter of contract work. These men are to be debarred from voting, on this ground, in an arena in which there is no such intimate relations between them and the Dominion Government through the payment for services which is presumably the reason why they are weeded out in the provinces. I have gone barely through the list of disfranchisements that will take place. Why do they take place? Solely because the right hon. leader of the Government feels that the easiest way for him to get out of a piece of perplexing legislation is to shunt off all responsibility for it and leave it to the different provinces, no matter what the principle or methods may be, as far as the provincial franchises are concerned. It requires some brains, some backbone, some mental struggle to bring down a franchise measure and put it through this House for the election of members to this House, and face the varied oppositions which will take place, and make a good law. It is no child's play to make such legislation, and my hon. friend does not propose to undertake it. He sets up a theory which no man in this Dominion but himself can or would attempt to justify, namely, that by constitutional right the franchise of this country should be in the power of the local authorities instead of in the power of this Parliament. He sets up this fantastic doctrine, because he sees that the easiest way is to shove all this troublesome thing off to the local legislatures and have no trouble with it here at all. Simply because we are members of Parliament and a gentleman outside just as good is not, does not give us the right to take away that man's citizenship without good reason. What right have we, because we happen to have the accident of power on our side, to say that he shall no longer be a full citizen? He is performing all his duties, he has not sinned against the moral law or the law of his country, he is a good citizen and an intelligent man, yet simply because by the accident of our being here and having a majority, and because the right hon. gentleman chooses to set up a theory for which there is no foundation, we reserve ourselves the right to take away this man's citizenship. The thing is monstrous. That word is not too strong to characterize such action.

What is the ground on which it is contended that the local government should have the power of fixing the franchise? Where do they get that power? Not in the constitution of this Dominion, for in that constitution it is expressly laid down that the establishment of the franchise shall be within the powers of this Dominion Parliament. If that power were exercised for nineteen years by the local legislatures, it was so exercised by permission of that constitution by permission of this body which has the power, because it is enacted in the constitution that until the Dominion Parliament fixed its basis of franchise, the provincial franchises should be accepted. Five months after confederation was established, this Dominion Parliament—if it had not had more pressing work to do may be, or work that it thought was more pressing to go on with—could have exercised this right for the whole period of confederation. It allowed instead that right to be exercised by the local legislatures, but when the fulness of time came, it took to itself its own undisputed constitutional right, and fixed the basis of its own franchise. Now, we are to go back simply because an hon. gentleman gets up and says: no matter what the constitution provides, I say that the right of fixing the basis of the franchise for this body belongs to entirely alien and different bodies, who move in different spheres and have different constitutional rights to exercise. Unless a better reason can be given, I make my protest against depriving citizens of the dearest right of citizenship. Is it a light thing to take away a man's franchise? I answer that question by asking another. What better, what more earnest, what more serious, what more bloody work was ever done in the world's history than the work of gaining the power of the franchise. Read the history of every country in its upward progress, and it is the history of its struggle for self-government, for the power to place upon the Statute-book, through its representatives, the views of the people with reference to the policy and the work of governing the country. That is the privilege for which the world has struggled, and it is no light thing to deprive any class of citizens, on a mere arbitrary opinion, of this dearly bought right. I protest against that. Every honest and justice-loving man, in this House will protest against it, and however he may vote, will wish that he did not have to do that.

The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) is not here, but in the course of the afternoon he was as brave as any man I have seen in this House for some time. He declared with the utmost freedom and conviction that he would not subscribe to the principle that by this enactment you should take away from any class the franchise they already enjoyed, and he stood up for the Indian. I sympathize with him for the Indian. Now if he will stand up full of sympathy and courage for the Indian, will he not stand up full of even greater sympathy and courage for the intelligent district magistrate, the intelligent customs officer, the intelligent clerk of the peace and the intelligent registrar in his country who, for his whole political life, has enjoyed his franchise, has given expression to his political principles, has read his political paper, has formed his political views, and has gone up to the consummation of all those to the poll and voted for his representative, and through his representative for his views upon the Government and the history of his country. The hon. gentleman entertains great sympathy for the Indian, who had the franchise given him a few years ago, will he have no word to say for the thousands and tens of thousands of intelligent and high-class white men who will be deprived of the franchise they have exercis ed for their whole political life since their majority in this country?

Why, Sir, the more you look into this thing the more monstrous—and I use the word advisedly—it seems to be. And what is it done for? For a mere theory and to get rid of a delicate and difficult piece of business, the making of a franchise which shall be properly applicable to the whole Dominion and yield general satisfaction. These gentlemen can tear down the preceding franchise law—they love to do that. And they knew all about it then. But, Sir, it is a difficult thing, after they have torn it down, to construct an edifice as good or better. These architects and carpenters confess that they are unable to do this, and so they turn it over to the cheaper workmen of the different provinces, and say: Put up a hut in every province, we cannot raise a central temple for this Dominion. Now, Sir, I do not know that I need to try to find words more strong to characterize this than I have already used. But, Sir, it does seem to me to be inherently necessary, if any parliamentary body is to keep its self respect and its power, that it shall regulate its own franchise. Why, the Solicitor General said this afternoon—and will he say it now after his leader has spoken?—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. He will. Inwardly, I suppose. But whether he will vocally make known the same feeling, I do not know. He said this afternoon: We are not giving up control of the franchise; and if, after we have enacted this plan, we find the local legislation in its transmutations, should change the franchise in a way that we do not think right, we will correct the evil. But the moment you step in to correct, that moment you come against your Prime Minister and leader, for he has declared that it is the inherent and sole right of the local legislatures to fix the franchise. If it is the sole and inherent right of the local legislatures to fix the franchise, what business has this legislature to meddle with it, no matter what the local legislature does? By the hon. gentleman's own theory, he cannot meddle with it—or else he denies himself which, it is true, is not a difficult thing for him to do. But surely he will not attempt that trick every day of the year and on all questions that come up. I ask him, if he makes that assertion and lays down the principle that the local authority ought to be the only repository of power with regard to the franchise, as it has the best knowledge of it and is, therefore, best fitted to fix it, is he going to lay the antagonistic principle alongside of it, and expect them to rest together, that we should interfere with the laws passed by the local authority if at any time they do not please us? No man who has the least idea of logic or consistency could put there two antagonistic principles together. And so the right hon.

Mr. FOSTER.

gentleman and the Solicitor General cannot occupy the same chair in this respect, because the Solicitor General declares in the first place that he would like—and is only considering the method—to remove the grievance as to the white voters, and if the local legislatures does not do what is right, we will step in and reform the case to such an extent as it is wrong. But, Sir, what about the independence and self respect of this body, when we look out upon seven different provinces, and find these provinces working fantastic changes with the franchise, changes dictated by party spirit or by what they may consider good principles, it makes no difference which, but which in every case may be totally and diametrically opposed to our convictions upon this matter? We sit here and legislate on a set of conditions which we reprobate and do not consider to be the best, and yet say we keep our self respect. It is impossible to do so, Sir. And if, this year, this Jubilee year, the hon. gentleman has boasted that he has brought a nation to birth, during this same year if he carries this Bill, he can put forth another boast—that after the nation was born, he degraded it by saying that it was not fit to form and frame its own franchise. Sir, the Government must be a unit upon this matter. The Solicitor General must give up that Bill now and let somebody else take it, or the right hon. gentleman must moderate his theory. Which will be done? Neither. Neither, Sir. The Solicitor General will hold on, as he has held on before; and the right hon. gentleman will theorize, as he has theorized before. And both will scrape along drawing their salaries, the Solicitor General feeling that he has not been able to do what his sense of justice prompted him to do, and my right hon. friend will sail along utterly oblivious to whether his theory is right or not, or what wrong he commits to men as good as he, or I, or any of the rest of us, if he can get his fantastic theory of the franchise carried out—the theory that this great body shall have nothing to say with reference to the franchise upon which it exists.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would endeavour, if at all possible, to lift this discussion to the level which it ought to occupy by reason of its importance. I would endeavour, if such a thing were possible, to have this grave question discussed in a quiet and judicial manner. I am afraid, however, that this would be expecting too much from my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) who has just taken his seat. The hon. gentleman does not seem to be aware of the many contradictions which are involved in his argument. He laboured, and laboured at great length to prove the malignancy of this Government in taking away the franchise of certain persons in a province if this Bill should become law. He stated, and stated with some warmth, that it was wicked for this Parliament to attempt to take away the franchise from anybody. What could be dearer to a man, he said, than the right to vote? I will ask, does he so far forget his own past, does not he remember that he was one of those who forced upon Parliament this Franchise Act against which we are now protesting and of which we are now trying to rid the country? Does he not remember that the Act which he helped to place upon the Statute-book took away from hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of men—

Mr. FOSTER. From whom?

The PRIME MINISTER. I will tell him directly. Did not the Government that he supported at that time enact a Franchise Act, which, under the pretense of making uniform the franchise deprive of a vote every man in certain provinces who did not happen to be owners of $150 worth of property—

Mr. FOSTER. Which province?

The PRIME MINISTER. Or did not happen to be in occupation of real estate to the value of at least $150? He forced upon Parliament a law which deprived every man of his vote even though he had it by the law of his province, unless he had a property qualification to the amount of $150. Now at that time British Columbia had manhood suffrage, and by forcing upon British Columbia the Franchise Act of 1895 which he helped to put upon the Statute-book, he committed this very crime with which he charged us a moment ago of depriving men of the right to vote.

Mr. FOSTER. Whom did we deprive of the right to vote in British Columbia?

The PRIME MINISTER. Every man who was not the owner or possessor of property.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has forgotten to read the law.

The PRIME MINISTER. Is it possible the hon. gentleman attempts in that way to deny the proposition I have now made? Is it not a fact that in 1855 British Columbia had manhood suffrage, and that the Opposition of that day protested against the Franchise Act which deprived men in that province of the right to vote unless they were the holders of property to the extent of $150? But he did it, therefore he was guilty of the crime with which he is now reproaching us. But this shows that we are approaching this subject upon broad principles, and not with the ad captandum arguments with which the hon. gentleman appealed to the committee a moment ago. The hon. gentleman for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney) said a moment ago that he was astonished that a Liberal Government had not endeavoured to enlarge the suffrage instead of restricting it, and he quoted the example of Mr. Gladstone, who, in his days, extended the suffrage. But my hon. friend knows very well that neither Mr. Gladstone nor any other Liberal statesman of Great Britain ever attempted to force manhood suffrage upon the British people. Now why is it that we do not wish to force the manhood suffrage upon the people of Canada? Why is it that when we, a Liberal Government, are now dealing with this question, we do not adopt the principle of manhood suffrage? There are two reasons for it. In the first place, I want to know why the Liberal statesmen of Great Britain, John Bright, Mr. Cobden or Mr. Gladstone himself, never at any time of their career proposed the adoption of manhood suffrage? Simply because they thought the suffrage ought to be a question of education, simply because every community ought to determine for itself what class of voters should be entrusted with the franchise.

Mr. FOSTER. Which community?

The PRIME MINISTER. The community which has a right to pass the legislation, in our case, the seven communities composing this nation. Now why did not the Reformers of Great Britain, when they enlarged the franchise, as the French did in 1848, at one fell swoop adopt manhood suffrage? Because they thought it better to wait for the influence of education, and to enlarge the franchise gradually until such time as the various classes of the community were ready for a wider franchise. We know that the French nation did otherwise. In 1848, after the proclamation of the second republic, they passed at once from a very restricted franchise to universal manhood suffrage. It is a question to-day whether the French people, in taking that step, acted in the best interests of their country. For my part, Liberal of the Liberals as I am, I do not believe that the French nation acted wisely in 1848 when they gave the right of suffrage to every man, whether he was qualified or not. Now we have the example of the United States, in every state of which to-day manhood suffrage prevails. It was all very well after the establishment of the republic in 1789, when the people of the United States were a small agricultural population, when every man could read and write, when every man was acquainted with the constitution, it tickled the vanity of the American nation to be able to say that every man was a voter, and accordingly they made every man a voter. The system worked well for a time, but in the course of years, when the country was invaded, if I may use that expression, by foreign immigration, at all events, when European immigrants came in in large numbers, many of them illiterate, knowing nothing of the laws of the United States, nor even of their own laws, the principle of universal suffrage began to develop weaknesses, and to-day it is a question whether the United States acted wisely in adopting universal manhood suffrage. At the present time I think the preponderance of opinion amongst the more educated classes of the United States is to the effect that the American people have prostituted their franchise. Now, Sir, why do I make this argument? Simply to show that the franchise is a question to be determined by every community for itself. There is my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), on the other side of the House. He and I do not agree upon many things, but I would like to know if he would dare to go into the province of Quebec and advocate universal manhood suffrage? Neither my hon. friend from Beauharnois, nor my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), I am sure, would dare advocate the cause of universal manhood suffrage in the province of Quebec.

Mr. MONK. If manhood suffrage is going to be conferred upon the other provinces, I would revendicate it for the province of Quebec. We would be entitled to it, it would be an injustice to deprive us of it.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman is very careful to qualify his admission. If it is to be conferred upon the other provinces, he wants it for the province of Quebec. But he does not want it for its own sake, however. Neither he nor I want it for our province, and that is the reason why I want to leave the question to each province to deal with as it deems best. This is the very foundation principle of this Bill now before the House. If the province of Ontario desires to have manhood suffrage, well and good; let them elect their legislature upon manhood suffrage. We in the province of Quebec will suffer nothing by it. But we in the province of Quebec believe that manhood suffrage is not the correct thing. If, then, we believe it is not best, why in the name of everything that is just should it be imposed upon us by this Parliament? Now, the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney), a moment ago in speaking, did not fairly represent the arguments that I had made. I never pretended that we have not the right to determine the franchise that should elect the members of this House; on the contrary, we have that right, it is vested in us. But I maintain this principle, that in a system of federated government such as we have, it is more in accord with the fitness of things that this right should be determined by the provincial legislature.

Mr. FOSTER. Why?

The PRIME MINISTER. Because the franchise is of the nature of a civil right, not absolutely a civil right, but of the nature of a civil right.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the distinction?

The PRIME MINISTER. I will not give it in my own language, but I will give it in Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

the language of "Story's Commentaries upon the American Constitution." Story says this:

The truth seems to be that the right of voting, like many other rights, is one which, whether it has a fixed foundation in natural law or not, has always been treated in the practise of nations as a strictly civil right, derived from and regulated by each society, according to its own circumstances and interests.

Now in Canada we are seven different communities, we have seven provinces composing this Dominion. Each one has its own system of laws, each one has its own civil rights, each one has to determine what are its civil rights, and how they should be regulated. Now, I do not pretend that, technically, franchise is a civil right; but I say that in the nature of things it belongs to civil rights, and therefore its regulation is a function that belongs to the provincial legislature.

Mr. DAVIN. Does the hon. gentleman mean that civil rights as coming within the jurisdiction of a province?

The PRIME MINISTER. I do mean that. Does my hon. friend mean anything else?

Mr. DAVIN. I will show what I mean in a moment.

The PRIME MINISTER. I mean to say that civil rights, under our constitution, come within the purview of the local legislature, the franchise being of the nature of a civil right, I say should be determined by the local legislature. My hon. friend said a moment ago he had never heard of such a doctrine before. Why, this was the very contention of the Opposition when the Franchise Act was passed. If I may be permitted to go back to the important debate which took place in 1885. I will say that, having had to speak upon this very subject, I was entrusted by my friends with the duty of moving an amendment. On that occasion I used the following language:—

The member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) said yesterday that the regulation of the franchise was a matter which properly came within the attributes of civil rights, and therefore had better be left in the hands of the provinces. I do not contend that we have not the right, constitutionally, to establish a franchise of our own to apply to the whole Dominion; but I say that, according to the spirit of our constitution, the regulation of the franchise is a matter of civil rights, which comes properly within the attributes of the local legislatures.

This is the doctrine we laid down in 1885.

Mr. McINERNEY. Was that the hon. member for St. John?

The PRIME MINISTER. Those were my own words. The reference was to the late Mr. Weldon. That was the language I used and the doctrine I laid down, and it is the doctrine I am now endeavouring to put into force. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) stated we wanted to get away from the difficulty. Sir, this question is full of difficulties; it is surrounded with difficulties; and no people know it better than hon. gentlemen opposite, since, after a trial of their own law for twelve years, they admitted that they had not found the true solution of the question, and another law was to be desired. Nothing can be more conclusive than that this question is one of very serious difficulties. What should we do? That is the question. We propose a remedy which has in it the merit, if no other merits are visible to the naked eye, that it has been in operation nineteen years and given satisfaction. I propose to revert to it. But I come back to the proposition laid down by the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney). Suppose we were to adopt manhood suffrage as a principle, would that relieve us of the difficulties? I do not say but that perhaps it would relieve us of some difficulties, but not of all the difficulties of the case. Because if we adopt manhood suffrage as the Dominion franchise, still we would have to provide for the preparation of the lists.

An hon. MEMBER. Registration.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not care whether you call it registration or preparation of the lists; we would have to follow the electors at an expenditure of time and money. If I remember rightly, it is not long ago in this House I heard the system of registration denounced by no less an authority than the leader of the Opposition. He denounced it as in force in Ontario, where it does not apply to all the municipalities, but only in cities and towns. It will be in the recollection of hon. members that the leader of the Opposition on that occasion attacked the system of registration prevailing in towns and cities. If we were to adopt manhood suffrage it would have to be done under a system of registration, and you would have the evils of that system extended all over the country, not only in towns and cities, but in the municipalities. Sir, I repeat what I said a moment ago, this question is one full of difficulties. How are we to meet it? We propose a system which has been in operation for nineteen years here. We propose a system that has been in operation in the United States ever since the establishment of the constitution. If there is anything better to be offered, I should like it now to be offered; but if we are only asked to adopt a system of registration, it will not at all remedy the evil, it will not relieve the expenditure necessary to-day; but if the House adopt the principle of the Bill we propose, we shall have a list prepared without any trouble, without any expenditure, and we will have, I believe, the best system of franchise and preparation of lists the country has had so far. I want to say a word more to my hon. friend, and it will be my last. The hon. gentleman says if we adopt this Bill we will be abdicating our rights to determine the franchise for the purposes of this Parliament. But we will keep our control over the lists.

Mr. FOSTER. How do we keep control over the lists?

The PRIME MINISTER. I will show it very plainly. When this sovereign Parliament says the lists for elections for this House shall be those of the local legislatures this Parliament exercises its own power as if it were to say we shall have this or that franchise of our own.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?

The PRIME MINISTER. Very well.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman says that if we use our power to fix these local lists as the lists which shall rule in Dominion elections, do we not abdicate our power to that extent?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. You do not on one condition, and I want to know if the hon. gentleman is prepared to subscribe to that condition. Do you propose after delegating that power to local legislatures and adopting their lists as the franchise list for this Parliament, to say that there shall be no change in those lists by the local legislatures, except by permission of this Parliament on the one side; or do you propose next year to come and take the power out of the hands of those local legislatures? If you do not, you have delegated your power, which you have a right to do, but you have abrogated your power as regards any future usefulness.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is easy for hon. gentlemen opposite to pick flaws and create difficulties, but after all we must suppose there is some reason and conscience in them. Local legislatures are likely to represent the people of the province; they are elected to represent the same people we represent here, and no other people. It is supposed, and it is not a very violent supposition to make, they will exercise that power in the very best interests of their constituents, according to their judgment and light. It is supposed they will adopt the best franchise to suit the province. But I will go further. Let us suppose that everything the hon. gentleman anticipates and dreads will take place, that the legislature will actually be guilty of fraud—I will go as far as fraud—in order to secure power and injure this Parliament, Parliament has always in its own hands the power to meet fraud by counter legislation. It is because we believe and suppose that the local legislatures will act as they have been acting, in the best interests of their own constituents, that we are acting in this way. In 1885 the legislature of the province of Quebec was in the hands of the Conservative party. It had been in the hands of the Conservative party ever since confederation, with the exception of two years. But I would not have hesitated to accept the franchise provided by a Conservative legislature in Quebec, because, though there were many things in that franchise, on the whole, to which I would have objected, still as it satisfied the province it would have satisfied me. It is in the same way as regards other provinces. It is possible that the control of the several provinces may pass into the hands of the Conservative party, still on a question of this kind. I am quite disposed, for my part, to accept the franchise prepared by the legislature, whether Liberal or Conservative. But, if the day comes when a fraud is committed against this Parliament, when legislation of a hostile character is brought forward in the legislatures, then it will be always open for this Parliament to resume its own powers, and to enact a franchise law of its own.

Mr. McNEILL. After the mischief has been done.

The PRIME MINISTER. Before the mischief has been done; before the general elections take place.

Mr. McNEILL. Not necessarily.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend will have the right of legislating at all times before a general election, and if it is found there has been fraudulent legislation against the Parliament here, then we have always the power to remedy the evil.

Mr. INGRAM. May I ask the right hon. gentleman a question? Suppose a local election takes place and the legislature meets and passes an Act affecting the representation in this Parliament, and the Dominion Parliament has dissolved and gone to the people, how are you going to remedy that?

The PRIME MINISTER. That is too thin altogether.

Mr. INGRAM. No.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) knows very well that if a dissolution of this Parliament takes place we will know by that time what are the lists that are in force, and the elections will take place upon the lists that are in force at the time of dissolution, though they should be afterwards altered. That is the law. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would ask our friends on the other side of the House to approach this question in a fair and judicial spirit. We have had two systems of franchise on trial in this country. We had the provincial franchise which lasted for nineteen years, and we have had a Dominion system of franchise which lasted for twelve years. The last system has not given satisfaction, even according to those who were the authors of the Act. I ask them to give a new trial to the other system, and if after giving it a new trial—and I am bound to repeat once more that the question is not free from difficulties—they find that the new system does not work any better than the old, then we will have to devote ourselves to the task of framing a better system. I want to ask another question. Do gentlemen on the other side pretend that there must absolutely be a franchise for the provincial Parliaments, and a franchise for the Dominion Parliament? Would it not be far better, as a matter simply of good government, if the elections to this House could be conducted on the local lists, and that the members of this Parliament and the members of the legislature who represent the same body of people, should be elected by the same electors? Is it not better that it should be so? Then, I say, that this system which has been proposed should not be condemned in advance, but a trial should be given to it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. DAVIN. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in reply to the argument of the ex-Minister of Finance taunted him and his party with disfranchising electors, and when my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) said: How did we disfranchise electors? The right hon. gentleman answered: You did it in British Columbia. Why, Sir, the right hon. gentleman is as far astray in his facts as he is in his constitutional law, as I will presently show. The Franchise Act of 1885, section 9, reads as follows:—

In the provinces of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, besides the persons entitled to be registered as voters and to vote under the foregoing provisions of this Act, every person who at the time of the passing of the same—

(1) Is of the age of twenty-one years and is not by this Act or by any law of the Dominion of Canada disqualified or prevented from voting; and

(2) Is a British subject by birth or naturalization and resident in the province, and is entitled to vote in the said provinces respectively by the laws now severally existing in the same,—

Shall have a right to be registered as a voter and to vote so long as he shall continue to be qualified to vote under the provisions of the said last mentioned laws and no longer.

Mr. FOSTER. When the right hon. gentleman made that statement with reference to British Columbia, and charged it on this side of the House, and when I asked him whether he had not better read up the law, will the right hon. gentleman now acknowledge that he made a mistake or will he not?

The PRIME MINISTER. I will answer by and by.

Mr. FOSTER. When it is pointed out to you directly, right in your face—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. The right hon. gentleman is not ready to admit it.

Mr. DAVIN. The right hon. gentleman started out with that accusation; he made the most he could of it; he treated it rhetorically, and he flung it defiantly across the House, but as I said about another Minister, the fact was excogitated. Take the constitutional argument of the right hon. gentleman. When the right hon. gentleman was reading Story, I asked him what he took Story to mean there by "civil right," and I asked the right hon. gentleman whether he meant by "civil right," that it came within the civil rights as reserved to the provinces of the British North America Act. The right hon. gentleman said it did, and that it was in that sense he used "civil right." The right hon. gentleman is a lawyer, and I ask his attention to the 41st section of the British North America Act:

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several provinces of the Union relative to the following matters:—

And one of them is the "franchise." I contend that as that is laid down there, it implies that this right is entirely within the province of this Parliament, and if you look at the 84th section, it reads:

Until the legislatures of Ontario and Quebec respectively otherwise provide, all laws which at the Union are in force in those provinces respectively, relative to the following matters, or any of them, viz.: The qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected to sit or vote—

Where? Is it in the Parliament of Canada? Not at all; but——as members of the Assembly of Canada.

Therefore, it is clearly laid down in the British North America Act that the right of voting for a member in this House is not within the provincial jurisdiction. I will not ask the House to take my interpretation of that, but I will ask the House to take the interpretation of a judge of high standing, and I will put his judgment on this very point against the position taken by the right hon. gentleman. On this very head this is what Chancellor Boyd says:

The subject of this class of legislation are of a political character, dealing with the citizen, as related to the Commonwealth, whether province or Dominion, and they are kept distinct from the federal constitutional Act, from matters of civil rights in the provinces, which regard mainly the meum and teum as between citizens.

What Chancellor Boyd means is, that they are not included in the clause of the British North America Act which defines what comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

It is, in my view, rather confusing to speak of the right of voting as comprehended under the civil rights mentioned in section 92, subsection 13, of the British North America Act. This franchise is not an ordinary civil right, it is historically and truly a statutory privilege of a political nature, being the chief means whereby the people, organized for political purposes, have their share in the functions of government. The question in hand, therefore, falls within the category, not of civil rights in the province, but of electoral rights in Canada.

Now, so far as there was anything vertebrate at all in the speech of the hon. gentleman, it was the statement he made as to the disfranchisement that took place in British Columbia, and his argument as to constitutional law. Well, Sir, even if I were not reinforced by Chancellor Boyd, I think having pointed out what is the clear meaning of the two sections I have quoted, the House will agree with me that the constitutional argument of the right hon. gentleman signally failed. Where are we in regard to this Government whenever it has to express an opinion on any subject? Last night we found the greatest possible contradiction on the Treasury benches, and to-day we have the Prime Minister contradicting point blank the position taken by the Solicitor General this afternoon. I am not surprised that there was a disposition to-night on the part of the Premier to prevent the Solicitor General from speaking; because the Solicitor General is a lawyer in practice and a lawyer of repute, and he would not dare to risk his reputation by buttressing the fallacious propositions respecting constitutional law that come to us from the amateur lawyers, and—I will not say the amateur statesmen, but we will say the experienced statesmen on those benches. The hon. gentleman made a flourish about the evils of manhood suffrage. He told us that the best citizens of the United States regretted manhood suffrage; and what is he doing by this Bill? He is trying to force manhood suffrage for the Dominion on provinces where we have not now manhood suffrage.

Mr. FOSTER. Without any education.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, without any education. He is forcing manhood suffrage for Dominion purposes on Ontario, on Nova Scotia, on New Brunswick, on British Columbia and on Manitoba, in which provinces manhood suffrage for Dominion purposes does not exist to-day. If there be conviction behind the rhetoric, if there be a strong and abiding conviction in the right hon. gentleman's mind, as to the evils of manhood suffrage, why does he want to force manhood suffrage on the foremost province of the Dominion—certainly foremost as regards wealth and population? The fact is that it looks as if any argument was taken up that would suit at the moment, and as if these arguments are not thrust upon us at all as convictions. Let me ask the right hon. gentleman, in regard to the latter part of his speech, where he has gone? The Solicitor General said to-day: we simply adopt for the present the provincial franchises, and if the provincial legislatures do not do what we think right, we can change the law at any moment. The right hon. gentleman took the view that the declaring who should vote for members of this House belonged as a civil right to the local legislatures, though towards the close of his speech, after laying that down, and laying it down weightily, he said something like what the Solicitor General said. Now, I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman: if it is the function of the local legislatures to declare as a matter of civil right who shall exercise the franchise for the Dominion, by what right do you sit in judgment on them and declare that they have done wrong, and propose to remedy the wrong? After listening to the right hon. gentleman's speech, I am reminded of the criticism that Matthew Arnold made on the first publication of a man who has since attained some celebrity: he said, "Here is a man who has some of the finest gifts that any literary man ever possessed, in speaking and writing the English language; but he cannot reason." And we might almost say the same of the right hon. gentleman. Towards the close he made an argument as to expediency. He said, would it not be a nice thing if all the provinces voted on the same franchise as the Dominion, and the Dominion voted on the same franchise as all the provinces? I do not know whether he meant that they should be uniform, or whether he means that no matter how bizarre or how different the franchises in the various provinces might be, still there was something beautiful and symmetrical in electing members to this House on the same franchise. But when the British North America Act expressly declares that it is for this House to decide what shall be the franchise for sending men to this Parliament, it is far from symmetrical, far from logical and far from expedient that we should give to other assemblies the right of making that decision. Is it not absurd to argue in that way, with the words of an hon. and learned gentleman who stands high in his party, the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), ringing in his ears? The very words of that hon. member were these: "We have no guarantee that the provincial legislatures will legislate in the right direction." These are the words of a man who aspired to be Minister of Justice, and who, if party justice had been done, would have been Minister of Justice. The right hon. gentleman said that the provincial franchises had been in operation nineteen years without one word of complaint. Why, Sir, how can he say that? It has been demonstrated again and again here that there were complaints. It has been shown by the leader of the Opposition and by other hon. gentlemen that you actually had to legislate in this House to undo the evils of a provincial legislature; and what more solemn complaint can you have than a complaint that is crystallized into an Act of Parliament? It would have been regrettable if the right hon. gentleman had not attempted to reply to the reasoned presentation of the objections to this Act made by my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney), as at first he seemed inclined to do. But I must confess that I feel disappointed that we do not hear more from the Solicitor General. He is chary of giving us anything like a reasoned opinion on this subject.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have no opportunity, there are so many others.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman shakes his head; but I have so much respect for what is in that head that I think it is a pity he does not give us a reasoned opinion. Up to the present I have not heard anything which can alter the opinion I have formed of this Bill, that it is ill-conceived, founded on a wrong principle, and contradictory in its provisions, and that, if passed in its present state, it would introduce confusion into the electoral franchise of this Dominion. If this were to pass, even with such amendment as may be possible—if such a misfortune were to happen, I believe it will throw back Canada in the march of progress and be a blot upon the administration of the right hon. gentleman.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) appealed to me a moment ago to correct a statement which I made that by the Act of 1885 he had disfranchised a number of voters in the province of British Columbia. The only correction I have to make is to add to that statement, and to say that by the Act of 1885 he not only disfranchised men who had the right to vote in British Columbia, but also in Prince Edward Island. Let me call his attention to a clause which was read a moment ago by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). Section 9 of the Electoral Franchise Act of 1885 enacts as follows:—

In the provinces of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, besides the persons entitled to be registered as voters and to vote under the foregoing provisions of this Act, every person who at the time of the passing of the same—

(1) Is of the age of twenty-one years and is not by this Act or by any law of the Dominion of Canada disqualified or prevented from voting; and

(2) Is a British subject by birth or naturalization and resident in the province, and is entitled to vote in the said provinces respectively by the laws now severally existing in the same,—

Shall have a right to be registered as a voter and to vote so long as he shall continue to be qualified to vote under the provisions of the last mentioned laws and no longer.

This means that under this Act any person in New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island who was twenty-one years of age on the 20th July, 1885 when the Act was passed, was entitled to be a voter and was a voter. The first lists made in 1886 in British Columbia and Prince Edward Island were lists based on manhood suffrage, but that was only to apply to those who were of age on the 20th July, 1885 or at the time this Act came into force. Subsequently, in the revisions of 1891 and 1894, there was no manhood suffrage, and the lists were made upon restricted franchises, and it is a matter of notoriety that in these provinces that fact was complained of. The fact was well known to every one in these provinces that in the subsequent revision of the franchises, the lists were restricted according to the terms of the Dominion Franchise Act.

Mr. FLINT. A few moments ago I was most rudely and discourteously refused by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) the privilege of asking him a question—a privilege which is always most courteously allowed on this side of the House to hon. gentlemen opposite. As it was the first time I rose to ask this privilege of the hon. gentleman, I now give him notice that it is not likely I shall ever do so again.

Mr. FOSTER. Thanks.

Mr. FLINT. The hon. gentleman not only did so in a manner which I thought was ungentlemanly and discourteous, but he added impertinence and insult, which I, for one, will not take from him or any other member of this House.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg leave to ask the hon. gentleman to point out what insulting words I used with reference to him.

Mr. FLINT. I will repeat the words which I considered were insulting, and which, I think, if the hon. gentleman were possessed of the spirit of fairness that ought to characterize a gentleman in his position, especially in the circumstances under which I rose, he would not have made use of. He was making an argument upon a particular legal point in connection with the Franchise Act of Nova Scotia and I asked him politely if I might put to him a question. In the manner I have not seen him use towards any other gentleman on this side, he refused me, as was his right, the privilege, and then he added that he had already given way to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), who knew something about this question, but he would not give way to the hon. gentleman for Yarmouth, who knew nothing about it.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is drawing inference of his own, which he had a perfect right to do, but which is not borne out by what I said, and has imputed to me a discourtesy of which I am guiltless.

Mr. FLINT. I have given the very words of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. I leave that to "Hansard."

Mr. FLINT. The hon. gentleman has the right to hold such opinion of me as he thinks fit. My own opinion of myself is modest enough, and I do not claim to know more of this question than any other of my colleagues.

Mr. FOSTER. I give the hon. gentleman notice that when the "Hansard" is out, I will bring this matter to the attention of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. If my hon. friend will allow me, the words used by the hon. member for York were not exactly as my hon. friend stated, but it struck me that my hon. friend had some reason to complain. My hon. friend from York did not mention my hon. friend from Yarmouth, but he said: I gave way to the hon. member for Halifax because he generally knows what he is talking about, but I shall not give way to another. There was an inference in that remark which justifies the complaint of my hon. friend.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. FLINT. The hon. gentleman, of course, will never be interrupted by me again under any circumstances whatever. The point to which he was addressing himself was one which this discussion made important, although in my opinion it had not previously been of very great importance. In the few observations I made on the Franchise Act, when first introduced, I referred to the suggested or implied disqualification of certain qualified voters in the province of Nova Scotia from voting at Dominion elections, and I said then, with the concurrence, I believe of all my colleagues on this side, that although there was no disqualification in the law now existing with regard to that class of voters, yet if there was any doubt, I was convinced that when we reached the committee stage there would be a general disposition to make the matter so clear that doubt would be removed. The ex-Minister of Finance reiterated the point that all Dominion officials were excluded by the Nova Scotia franchise from the lists, and it was contended, I think correctly, upon this side that they were not excluded from the voters' lists, although they were excluded by the election Act from voting in the local elections.

Mr. MILLS. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put him a question?

Mr. FLINT. Certainly; I am not like the ex-Minister of Finance.

Mr. MILLS. The Nova Scotia Act provides:

The names of persons disqualified under the first section of this Act shall not be inserted in the list of registered electors, and if entered therein shall be struck off.

Is that the law now?

Mr. FLINT. No, it is repealed by the Act of 1885.

Mr. MILLS. What Act of 1885.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Consolidated Statutes of 1885.

The PRIME MINISTER. Apologize.

Mr. MILLS. No.

Mr. FLINT. It was not my intention then, nor is it my intention now, to enter into a discussion of that question.

Mr. GILLIES. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Section 9 of the Act of 1889 is still in force, and that section prescribes the manner in which the electoral lists of Nova Scotia shall be made up by the reviser. It states what persons shall be entitled to vote and what persons shall be put upon the lists. And who are they? The following persons shall be put upon the lists:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The voters' list.

Mr. GILLIES. Yes.

The following persons, if of the full age of twenty-one years and subjects of Her Majesty by birth or naturalization, and not disqualified by any action of this Act or otherwise by law prevented from voting—

Well, now the Dominion official is prevented from voting.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). No, not absolutely.

Mr. GILLIES. They are disqualified.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. They are prevented.

Mr. COCHRANE. They could not be prevented if they were not disqualified.

Mr. GILLIES. My hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) does not understand it, and he has admitted it, and I am sure, will admit it now, that the Dominion officials are disqualified from voting. The section says that any person who is in receipt of pay from any of these departments within 15 days of the election.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Ah, within 15 days.

Mr. GILLIES. No person receiving pay from the Government within 15 days of the election is permitted to vote—he is disqualified. My hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will admit that.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think he is, he is prevented from voting under the local Act. If my hon. friend will allow me, he is continually confusing the Voters' List Act with the Election Act. What we touch here is the Voters' List Act. The election Act of the province we do not adopt. There is the confusion in the minds of hon. gentlemen.

Mr. GILLIES. You are adopting the election Act.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No.

Mr. GILLIES. Well, or of course we are making the Franchise Act here; we are making a Franchise Act for the Dominion—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. Chairman, I have the floor.

Mr. GILLIES. If my hon. friend (Mr. Flint) will allow me one moment—

Mr. FLINT. I have the floor. I yielded the floor to the hon. gentleman for Richmond (Mr. Gillies), but I want to know my status before the committee. I yielded the floor to answer a question of the hon. member for Richmond, but he seems to have forgotten that and addresses his remarks to somebody else. If he will address his remarks to me, I will try to answer him.

Mr. GILLIES. Section 9 of the Act of 1889, under which the provincial lists are made up, states who are eligible to go on the lists, and no others can go on, now is that correct?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. GILLIES. And it is provided that any person in receipt of emolument from the Dominion Government within 15 days of the date of the election cannot vote. Very well. This section says that any person prevented from voting cannot go on the lists.

Mr. FLINT. I understand the hon. gentleman asks me a question. I would frankly admit that there is a basis for argument and difference of opinion. But I will go further and say that, as a matter of fact in the province of Nova Scotia the opinion always has been held and the practice always has been that these persons are entered upon the lists, even though they may be prevented from voting if they hold one of these Dominion offices 15 days before the election. But I did not rise for the purpose of debating that question but to state my willingness, and I think that that willingness is concurred in by my colleagues from Nova Scotia and by gentlemen on this side of the House generally, if there is doubt on the point, to make it so clear that there will be no doubt. Now, the observation I rose more particularly to make was in reply to the ex-Minister of Finance who raised the point that it was immoral and outrageous and abominable—

Mr. FOSTER. Monstrous, I said.

Mr. FLINT. He used all the language of vituperation, of which he is a master, to state his disapproval of the laws of the province which deprived a person who was on the list of a vote.

Mr. FOSTER. Monstrous, I said.

Mr. FLINT. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was only indulging in that vague and wide vituperation to which we are accustomed from him and which passes harmlessly over those to whom he is opposed. But if he looked at the Franchise Act of which he is proud and which we are attempting to repeal, he would find that all these monstrous things occur there. The list is made under the Act, yet carrying out the intention of this legislature, with universal consent, large numbers of persons are prevented from voting though their names are on the lists. And so these Dominion employees names are upon the voters' lists, and they vote, unless within 15 days of the election they continue to hold these Dominion offices. And there is nothing immoral, outrageous, or unjust, or monstrous in the fact that they should be upon the voters' lists, and yet when the day of voting comes they should, for good cause moving the legislature to that end, be deprived of the right to vote. This franchise law which we are trying to repeal, as I say, has embodied in it the same principle. The list for the Dominion election is made up, but when the day of voting arrives large numbers of persons whose names are upon the lists are refused this great and glorious privilege of voting which the ex-Minister of Finance is never tired of eulogizing. Who, under either circumstances, would be more readily accorded the vote than our judges? Who are more worthy of eulogies as to their intelligence, their patriotism and the other qualities of which the hon. gentleman speaks, than the judges in our courts? And yet, for reasons that seem sufficient to Parliament, they are not allowed to vote. And the same is true of revising officers, and returning officers, and election clerks, and a large number of other persons. It may be open to question, it may be debatable, whether Parliament was altogether wise in preventing some of these persons from voting, and that is a question that may well be debated and settled in Parliament.

The principle of refusing persons the privilege of voting, either because they have been bribed or because they hold positions which seemed to the Nova Scotia Parliament incompatible with the right of voting, certainly does not render the Act liable to all those violent charges which the ex-Minister of Finance has made against it; consequently the superstructure which he built upon the assumed injustice of the Nova Scotia Act falls to the ground. The legislature of Nova Scotia, for its own wise purposes, may have thought it improper that in the local election certain Dominion officials should have the right to vote. With that we have nothing to do here. It is purely an academic question, which can be best settled upon the floor of the Nova Scotia legislature. But no one upon this side of the House contends that we would be doing right to prevent that class of voters from voting for representatives to the Dominion Parliament, and we have offered, and we offer now, to make that point clear. I trust that the time of the committee will not be taken up by objurgations and re-primations as to a purely local Act, which is strongly supported in Nova Scotia, and has been sanctioned there in election after election.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Flint), undertook to lead the House to believe that the universal practise in the province of Nova Scotia in carrying out the franchise law that existed previous to the adoption of the present franchise law, was to use the same lists for Dominion and local elections. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have had some experience as a reviser and as a municipal councillor in connection with the county sessions that had to do with the appointment of the officials who were revising the lists under those Acts. We revised the lists from the assessment rolls, under the qualifications stated in the statute. We made two separate and distinct voters' lists: one excepting the names of the Dominion officials who were not permitted to vote at local elections, and the other for Dominion election purposes, containing the names of all those who were qualified under the statute, and not disqualified by reason of holding office. These lists, after being taken from the basis of the assessment roll, were posted up, and notice was given to anybody who was displeased with the voters' lists, who wanted to add any names, or who wanted to object to any names, attended on a certain day fixed by the revisers for the purpose of hearing appeals. The two separate lists were then completed, after the revisers had given a hearing in this way. When the elections were held, the list with the heading "List of electors qualified to vote at Dominion elections," was used at the Dominion elections, and the list of electors qualified to vote at elections for members to the provincial Assembly was used for that purpose. So we had the two lists. The counties, they were counties before they were incorporated into municipalities, paid for the expense of making those two different lists. Now, my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. McLennan) told the House that the revisers in his county made only one list, and received all the names that were presented to them, in addition to those that were taken off the assessment roll under the property qualifications. He says they took all the names that were submitted, but were unable to tell who should be struck off or who should be put on, were unable to say who held an office under the Dominion Government or who did not. Now those revisers had to make an affidavit, and for the information of the committee I will read that affidavit:

We, the undersigned revisers duly appointed for revisal, section....., No....., in the county of, do hereby solemnly swear that we will well and faithfully discharge the duties assigned to us without favour or partiality, that we will place no name on the list of registry, and will strike no name off the same, unless we shall be satisfied that the same, by the law under which we have been appointed as revisers, should be placed on or struck off the same, and that we will in all respects conform to the said law, to the best of our judgment and ability.

The hon. member for Inverness stated that it was ridiculous to expect the revisers to know who held a Dominion office within the limits of the section in which they were appointed to revise the lists, and yet this is the affidavit which was taken by those revisers. Now, there is another point. It is impossible to have any such thing as a universal system for the making of those lists, even under the Act, when we have, as we do in Nova Scotia, 200 or 300 different revisers revising the lists to be used at elections for provincial and municipal purposes. I feel that I would be perfectly safe in saying that, under the machinery with which these revisers are appointed, not one out of every three of those revisers are competent to interpret the Act. The machinery by which their appointment is made, is this: Under the existing circumstances we have municipalities, we have the different districts of the municipalities represented by councillors, each councillor nominates the revisers in his own part of the municipality, and the result is that in a great many cases a number of those who are appointed to revise the lists are incapable of interpreting the statute. Consequently, our lists are imperfect, our lists are not made in conformity with the statute, and so imperfect are our lists looked upon that year after year it is the custom of the legislature of Nova Scotia to pass an Act legalizing the voters' lists for the province, notwithstanding any irregularity or anything that is at variance with the statute. I believe that has been the invariable custom, and continues to the present day. On account of the errors and irregularities, and want of conformity with the law in making up those lists, it was always considered necessary to pass an Act in the Parliament of Nova Scotia legalizing those lists, otherwise they could not be used. Yet those are the lists that we are called upon by the measure now before the House to adopt as a basis for the franchise for the election of members to this House. There are other influences brought to bear in the preparation of these lists and in their revision. There are local influences, there are political influences, and all these influences tend to make an imperfect list and one altogether unsuited to the requirements of the election of members to this House. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) told the House that the lists were only revised every two or three years, by the local revisers. The lists are revised annually, every winter.

Mr. RUSSELL. I rise merely to call attention to a single point.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will my hon. friend allow me to call attention for a moment to the statement made by the leader of the House, in which I think we all agree, that we are dealing with a question of vast moment, one that requires to be dealt with in a calm and judicious spirit; and in dealing with a question of this importance we have reached an hour that is not calculated to enable us to deal with it in that calm and collected manner which is desirable, and I suggest to the hon. leader of the House, especially with a view to prevent so great a calamity as that the leader may not be able to be with us, that he should consent to an adjournment. There is this amendment before the Chair with respect to the Indians, an amendment to which I am prepared to give my hearty support; but when that amendment is disposed of there will be another amendment moved, dealing with the question from the standpoint of the general discussion that has taken place to-night, the question dealt with by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). I hope that hon. member, who followed on the lines of the hon. Solicitor General, will receive the support of the First Minister in regard to removing any disqualification with respect to officials that may exist in the franchise laws of the different provinces. Why I rose particularly, however, was for the purpose of suggesting that while we should like to hear the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), we have reached an hour when the Prime Minister would be consulting the convenience of the House if he would adjourn the debate.

The PRIME MINISTER. I may say for my part that I shall always be willing to consider any amendment which may be offered from the other side with a view to the improvement of this Bill. I do not say that this Bill is perfect and should not be subject to amendment. At the same time I wish to say to the hon. gentleman, who asks the House to adjourn at twelve o'clock, that we have not made the slightest progress.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have done a great deal.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is no tangible shape in which we can see it to-day. If the hon. gentleman will tell me that we will make a reasonable progress to-morrow, pass the Bill through committee to-morrow, I have no objection to adjourning at the present moment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is impossible at this stage to arrive at that conclusion, but I desire to press the Bill forward as rapidly as possible.

The PRIME MINISTER. In the meantime I will be able to meet the hon. gentleman and see if we cannot arrive at an agreement. I will not press the hon. gentleman to give me his pledge to pass the Bill through committee to-morrow, but I will take his pledge that he will facilitate the passage of it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Very well.
Committee rose and reported progress.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Friday).
