Mr. Willison, of the "Globe," last year published a little pamphlet, in which he stated that these land grants to the Calgary and Edmonton Railway and to the Qu'Appelle and Long Lake Railway were terrible examples of iniquity. He sent these pamphlets to various members, though not to all of them. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) showed me the pamphlet, and asked me to explain it to him. Mr. Jameson came with me to Toronto. I took him in to Mr. Willison, and Mr. Willison offered freely to withdraw his pamphlet, saying that he was entirely mistaken. At the time of that transaction I was not a member of this House. I took it up in the ordinary course of business, and I made no more of that than I should of any similar transaction. I made much less, in fact, because I took £50,000 of the bonds issued by the Calgary and Edmonton Railway at par, and now I think they are worth £35,000; so that my direct loss on them to-day is £15,000.

Mr. DAVIS. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether any other parties were allowed to tender for the building of that railway.

Mr. OSLER. Yes. That road had been bonused to the extent of 12,400 acres a mile from Calgary to Edmonton years before. Contractors had come out to look it over years before, and had refused to build it. I do not say that the contractors did not make any money out of it. They should have made money out of it. But it was the lowest price at which that road could be built at that time. No doubt it could be built for less to-day. I hope my explanation of this matter will be satisfactory. I shall be glad to give the fullest explanation of every detail to any one who wants it, as all the financial operations of these two roads came through my office. I was very sorry that the Minister of the Interior, who ought to know about that matter made his attack upon me in connection with it.

Now, one of my reasons for opposing the terms of this contract is the experience we have had in connection with these two roads. The early policy of this country, in opening up the North-west, was to give large grants for the construction of railways, to avoid the expenditure of cash. These payments in the form of land resulted in enormous extravagance and extra cost in the building of these roads. The land had to be sold for almost nothing, and everybody connected with these contracts were supposed to have made a lot of money, because they were getting no money down. I need not say that when interested in these two roads I was not in Parliament. I was simply acting as a business man. The hon. Minister of the Interior, referring, I suppose to the land grants to these and other railways, made the statement that lands were locked up and were not paying taxes, and that that was one terrible blot on the administration of the Conservative party. I am not here to defend the action of the Conservative party at all. I am here to speak for what I believe to be the interests of the country, that is what I am sent here for. During last session the hon. Minister of the Interior had a discussion with me and Mr. Nanton, of Winnipeg, who is my partner, and who manages in Winnipeg for the holders of these lands. The hon. Minister of the Interior asked us whether if he gave us all these land grants, we would begin to pay taxes on them. I may say that both the Calgary and Edmonton and the Qu'Appelle and Long Lake Companies have received, in the case of the latter especially, very small portions of their land grants. The Minister asked me whether, if all these lands were deeded to the company I would be willing, as representing the holders of them, to pay taxes on them. I told them unhesitatingly that I would because I believe it is in the interest of the North-west that all lands should pay taxes, and on all lands which I hold or am interested in I am willing to pay taxes. From that time we have striven, day in and day out, to get a selection of our lands from this Government, and we are not any nearer to receiving them than we were last session when I met the Minister of the Interior. And he stands up and accuses me personally, as a holder of the lands, of being a monopolist and preventing the payment of taxes and the settlement of the country, although he himself has not taken one step since he has been in office to grant the lands that these two companies have earned and are entitled to.

Now, I am not going to oppose this Yukon deal on any small ground. I will assume that the Minister of the Interior has selected what at the present time is supposed, from all the information we have at hand, to be the best route. I accept it as the best route, and until a better route is found, I will not raise any objection to it, because I believe the Minister of the Interior in this respect has done the best he could. I find fault with this deal entirely on the ground that the Liberal party are giving for this railway what they should not give. During all the years since railways have been constructed in the North-west, so far as I can remember, the policy of the Liberal party has been against the locking up of land in the hands of railway companies. They have decried it as the most monstrous iniquity that has taken place in this country. The monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the locking up of lands in the North-west has been held up by them as the one great curse of the country. I acknowledge it. I say that when the Government first began opening up the North-west as an experiment, they thought it was best to give lands in payment for the building of railways. I believe that in the light of experience that was not a good thing. The Liberal party have opposed it for many years to the utmost of their power. They have said that it was the one thing that was fraught with danger to the country in that it nearly led to revolution in the North-west; that it was the one thing that kept the North-west back from the great prosperity that was its due. And yet, Mr. Speaker, on the first occasion after these gentlemen have attained power, the first occasion on which they are face to face with a really serious problem relative to the good of this country, what do they do? They are afraid to face the problem; they are afraid to ask the country for any money. They adopt holus bolus the policy of the Conservative party, which had already been found, I believe even by the Conservatives, to have been wrong. They rush into this transaction, and they give an enormous grant, amounting to 3,750,000 acres of the finest mineral prospects in the world to-day, to get built one hundred and fifty miles of tramway, call it what you will. They give that for the building of 150 miles of tramway, for that is all it is. One very often, in the heat of a sudden debate or argument, makes a statement that may be wide of the mark. The other evening, I said that the 3,750,000 acres granted to this road would be worth more to any one in the London market to-day than the 25,000,000 acres of agricultural lands given to the Canadian Pacific Railway for building 3,000 or 4,000 miles of road. I have been taken to task for that statement. Well, I have thought it over, and have no hesitation in repeating it to-day. I say that if you were to go on the London market to-day with the 25,000,000 acres of land in the agricultural districts of the North-west and with the choice between that land and the 3,750,000 acres of gold-bearing lands in the Yukon, the London market would pay more for the 3,750,000 acres than for the 25,000,000 acres which the Canadian Pacific Railway received for its vast work.

The Government, having apparently no other way out of it, were so anxious to adopt the policy of the late Government, that they followed it in this case down to the smallest details. The Dominion Government, in granting lands for the Calgary and Edmonton and other roads, took very great care to exclude from those grants the enormous mineral value that might be under these prairie lands. The Government of to-day, following in its smallest details the policy of the late Conservative Government, have excluded from this magnificent grant of mineral lands, those lands on which we may expect to see orchards, orange groves and banana groves flourishing in that Yukon valley. These the contractors will not be able to control.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. OSLER. You may well say "hear, hear." That hits you very hard. Now, as regards the $250,000 deposit, which has been made security for this contract. I am not a lawyer, and when I ventured the other evening to ask a question as to whether this was the only security, I was laughed down. But to-day it is stated in the House, without any reserve and without contradiction, that that is the only security for the carrying out of this contract. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) has tried to make a case by saying that these men do not get any land until they build the railway. But according to the contract they can have their lands locked up. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) last night, in pointing to the magnificent map, which he showed us, said that the great fault found with the land grants in the North-west Territories was not so much that the land had not been earned as that the land had been set aside and locked up. I contend that in the contracts now before us, there is nothing which a layman can understand—perhaps a lawyer might—that will force these men to build that road for five years. If they build only ten miles this year, they get the proportion of land to which that mileage of road is entitled, reserved for them, locked up, so that no prospector can go on it and no miner can take an acre of it.

Mr. TALBOT. Only two-fifths.

Mr. OSLER. I accept the two-fifths, but it is an enormous amount. It is the pick of the land. If they fail to build that road by next September, but have built 20 miles of it, they get the portion of land which that would give per mile locked up.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). They cannot sell it.

Mr. OSLER. Granted. But the land will none the less be locked up. The land locked up in the North-west Territories, as shown in that black map which the Minister of the Interior exhibited, cannot be sold by the railway companies owning it. Some of it is held for five years before another railway can get it. But these mineral lands may be held for five or ten years—there is no limit of time, so far as the contract is concerned, for that land which is locked up, and if in these five years, these gentlemen build that road, they can, so far as we know by the contract, claim all their land grant.

The building of this 150 miles of road is by no means a terrific undertaking. It is an easy job. The only condition that is hard is the condition of time. I know Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. They are personal friends of mine, and there are no two men in the Dominion that I believe deserve better to make money for good, hard work; and if the road can be built, they will build it. If they do not build it, the forfeiture of $250,000 deposit is a mere bagatelle to forfeit in order to control that amount of mineral land.

It was stated by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), in one breath, that these poor pigeons, Mackenzie & Mann, had got into a contract by which they were bound to take lands in payment for building a road into a mining region that was worthless. But the next moment, almost in the next sentence, he told us it was necessary to have this road built, because during this year 250,000 energetic miners would be scattered on over the whole of that country. Now, if 250,000 or 150,000 or 75,000 or even 50,000 go into that country during this coming year, it will pay the contractors to build that road free of bonus and at twice its estimated cost. The Government are taking great credit to themselves for not having given a money bonus. I take it that a man enjoying credit, who wants to go into an undertaking, who wants to build a house or a railway or expend money in any way, does not find two shrewd, hard-headed contractors who will build his house or railway and take in payment all the dead dogs and cats he has on his estate. He will not go to them and say: take all these, they are very valuable to you, but not to me and in return build my house. I will give you these instead of cash. Do you, Mr. Speaker, think that these contractors, men with good heads on their shoulders, are going to take a contract to build a house or a railway and accept dead dogs or cats in payment? These men know what they are doing. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton)—I am sorry he is not in the House just now for he gave me a little hard rap the other day—says that these men are going to make a terrible fiasco, that there is nothing in this at all, that they are simply running the risk and he got them to do it. At the same time, he made a sort of sporting offer across the House to me. He said that he assumed that the 25,000,000 acres of the Pacific Railway Company were worth $50,000,000, and he would sell me a similar quantity of lands to that given these contractors for $50,000,000. The Minister of the Interior was perfectly safe in that, because he had no authority to make the offer and I no authority to accept. It struck me at the time that my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), probably after a very pleasant dinner upon the Yukon—I do not know how far he got—talking with the contractors, who were probably talking a little on the bluff, made the same sort of sporting offer to them that he did to me: Build the road, and we will give you these lands, and the contractors said all right, and took him at his word. And the hon. gentleman, feeling that he had made an offer, which, as an honourable man, he could not very well back out of, brought the bargain down to this House and asks us to ratify it.

No one in this House believes more than I do in the importance of having a railway opened up into that country. The Government have committed themselves to a belief in Mr. Ogilvie's statements fully, absolutely and up to the hilt. They believe Mr. Ogilvie's statements as to the richness of that country.

Now, if one-tenth part of what Mr. Ogilvie says with regard to the wealth of that country is true, Canada owns the Eldorado of the world, the richest gold fields ever discovered. The leader of the Government, the other evening, much to my surprise, asked for the adjournment of this House that the members might waste an evening of the time of this House—if wasted it was—in hearing Mr. Ogilvie's lecture. I believe that Mr. Ogilvie is one of the finest specimens of Canadians that we have. I believe that what he says is true, that he does not exaggerate; I feel certain that he does not exaggerate wilfully. The Minister of the Interior tells us that so many people are going into that country this year that we shall not be able to take care of them unless we make extra-special provision. Yet, at the same time, the leader of the Government asks us to take an evening out of the session of this House to go and hear Mr. Ogilvie, that it may be telegraphed and cabled all over the world that the House of Commons of Canada has adjourned for an evening to hear a report on the subject of the gold fields, a subject more important than all the deliberations of this House. Now, I believe that the gold fields are enormously rich and that Canada cannot do too much to secure the trade of that country. I accept the statement, that probably this is the best route from the Pacific, but, for the life of me, I cannot see how building this road is going to give trade to Canada. From Seattle, from California, flour and other goods are being carried up there. How can our eastern men, how can Winnipeg even, compete with Washington Territory in sending flour in there, even if the

Mr. OSLER.

Americans have to pay the duty? I have been anxious to find how we could get trade through the building of this road but I have not succeeded. The route is open to the world to send on goods.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But not on the same terms as Canadians.

Mr. OSLER. But only for the National Policy, only for the duty placed upon manufacturers by the Conservative party, the terms would be equal. If we had free trade, if the leader of the House, our Cobden medalist, had his way and we had free trade in this country, a thousand pounds of goods would go to that country from the States for every pound that would go from Canada. The Minister of the Interior spent three hours in beating the air wildly, trying to prove that this was the best route. I have not heard in this House one single objection or contradiction to that. So far as I know, we all agree, on the basis of the information we now have, that this is the best route. But the Minister of the Interior spent three hours wildly gesticulating and asserting that it was a grand thing for this country to have that route. I do not know whether it is the best route, but I assume that it is. I believe the Minister of the Interior has done his best to ascertain the facts, and I believe he has reported fairly and squarely what is the best route, and I accept it. The Minister of the Interior winds up his grand oration by threatening all who oppose him. He threatens the Opposition and, I suppose, the Senate, that if they defeat this Bill, on their heads will rest the responsibility if that territory is lost to the Dominion of Canada. No more outrageous statement could be made in any body of men in Canada. If the Minister of the Interior, or the Government, think for one instant that there is a chance of this country being lost to Canada by the advent of any number of armed men, be they citizens of what land they may, it is the duty of Canada to devote all its resources—and they are very large and will accomplish much—to build a road to the country, no matter at what cost, so that Canada may control that country hereafter as clearly and as completely as she does to-day. But what have they done? They have made a contract with two men, who put up a penalty of $250,000 to finish this road by 1st September. Sir, $250,000 could be deposited in this country at one hour's notice at the call of such mineral lands and such a contract. A forfeit of that amount to have the call on such land for a year is a mere bagatelle. This country would have sustained the Government in building that road, terrible risk that it is, under their own control, if there is the least suspicion that that country may be taken hold of by armed men. This contract as first presented to the House, giving a charter that the citizens of any country in the world can control. The leader of the Opposition drew the attention of the Prime Minister to that point, and they amended the contract to that extent.

An hon. MEMBER. Promised to amend it.

Mr. OSLER. Promised to amend it—so as to provide that the directors of the company must be British subjects. Sir, there is no reason why the contractors of this company should not sell out, lock, stock and barrel, their whole contract to any citizens of another country, to any speculators in the Western States. They could make four or five of their clerks British subjects and appoint them directors, and so control the line without let or hindrance. I believe that this contract has been let without due consideration. As to the international question, respecting the navigation of the rivers, I do not deal with that, because I am not familiar with it. There are others who can explain it better than I, speaking, as I do, from a purely business standpoint. The contract, when I first read it, struck me as one of the most extraordinary and startling contracts I had ever seen. I spoke of it in haste a few nights ago. I have been rather pitched into by some of my friends about it, and I have tried to reconsider the opinions I expressed. I have given due weight to the fact that the hon. Minister of the Interior, able, patriotic and honourable, as I know he is, had considered all these things. But I cannot alter the opinion I first formed, that this contract has been entered into without due consideration of what it means.

The land grant is vicious in principle. The land grant has been held up on a map by the Minister of Agriculture as a little black dot on an enormous ground. But that is not the location on which the selection of lands under this contract is to be made, it is to be made over the whole of the large area which he exposed on the map. Notwithstanding all that has been said as to the registration of five miners gathered together, I still think that the contractors are able men, and I think that if I had that contract I would see that good men were on the lookout for all able prospectors, and that when a find was made on any one of these reserves, I would be very quickly at the registry office with a base line to receive all the reserves that the few miners had not taken up. I am not very familiar with the mining regulations, but I believe about one acre is all one miner can take up—if I am wrong correct me. Now, five miners have to come together to take up and register; five miners take up five acres, fifty miners take up fifty acres, 500 miners take up 500 acres, 500 acres within this little narrow strip which the Minister produced to-night. He showed us that little black space as if there was no gold anywhere else in that vast country but on that little space. But the reserves these men will get, there is no doubt about it, will be the picked mineral lands of that country. I grant you it is a speculation, but the problem is now whether it is a big speculation or a little one. The Government have come to the conclusion that it is a big one, or they would not have gone to the expense of getting Mr. Ogilvie's pamphlet published by the thousands and distributed everywhere, trying to bring enormous crowds of people to that small country which, according to their own report, has too many in it already—adding more people to those who are going in there to starve, according to the theory of the Government, adding fuel to the flame which the Government are afraid will break out in that country and lose us that valuable heritage. Sir, if the Minister of the Interior were in his seat at this moment I would tell him that, as a Canadian, I believe no matter what happens in that country, Canada is able to retain it, and will retain it, as a part of Canada for all time to come. I do not believe that unless we build this 150 miles of tramway—that may be built this year or may be built two years hence, on a forfeiture of $250,000—we are running the risk of having to send an army into that country to retain it in our possession. At the same time the Government, by advertisements and by speeches in this House, proclaim to the world that this is the richest gold country on the face of the earth. Now, I am anxious to secure the trade of that region for Canada, and I am anxious to have that region developed and become a source of strength to Canada, and whatever steps the Government may take to secure that end, I will support it. But I do not think the Government are taking the right means now to secure that end. They are running the risk of having no railway built there, they are giving away a great part of the choicest mineral land, they are making, as I said before, slaves of almost every prospector who goes into that country. If, as the ex-Minister of Railways says, 250,000 prospectors go into that country, no power that Canada can bring forward will prevent those men from mining on the lands of the contractors. The result will be that within two years Canada will have to buy back from the contractors their concessions at any price the contractors ask. I have seen no reason, I have heard no argument from the Minister of the Interior, or the Minister of Agriculture, or the Minister of Railways, that has caused me to change the opinion that I formed when I first read that contract. Many of the papers, I see, have rather insinuated that because I was a Canadian Pacific Railway director and had interests otherwise my voice would be still. I wish to say, Sir, that I am in this House, not as representing any corporate body, not as representing any one except the constituency that sends me here, subject to what I consider the best interests of Canada ; and if at any time private interests conflict with the public interests, I get out of one or the other.

Mr. BERTRAM. After listening to the eloquent, convincing and comprehensive statement made by the Minister of the Interior in relation to the question which is now before the House, and after listening with great pleasure to the able argument which the Minister of Agriculture has addressed to the House to-day I feel that there is little I can do further, as a humble member of this House, than to emphasize some of the statements that have been made by those who have preceded me, and who are able to speak on the question much better than I can. I have also listened attentively to the argument of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), and I am glad to be able to say that in some particulars I would like to emphasize some things that he has said in connection with this question. He says, and I hope he will be able to maintain his position in that regard, that he has not come to this House for the purpose of defending the Conservative party. I hope he will be able to stand by that ; but I would like him to go a little further and to say that he has not come to this House merely for the purpose of attacking the Liberal party. I was somewhat surprised to hear him state that the contractors, of whom he speaks very highly, are in a position to withdraw or to sell out to somebody else, and be relieved of all responsibility.

Mr. OSLER. No.

Mr. BERTRAM. I understood him to say that they could sell out the whole contract.

Mr. OSLER. I said they could sell out the road after it was built.

Mr. BERTRAM. The point, as I understood him, he was making, was that there was no security that these gentlemen would carry out their agreement, that beyond the $250,000 they had put up, there was nothing to compel them to fulfil that contract within the next four or five years. Sir, the Government made a contract with responsible parties, and besides the fact that these gentlemen have given a guarantee of $250,000, they cannot get rid of their obligations in connection with that contract, until that railroad has been built to Teslin Lake. I do not know myself what greater security any Government could take than the security they have taken in this matter. I was also much surprised to hear the hon. member for West Toronto say to this House that the contractors may not complete the contract for two or three years. If there was one thing that the contractors are bound to do in their own interest, even without regard to the country's interests, or to the contract itself, but solely in their own interest, it is to get that railway built at the earliest possible moment, because there is no guarantee that in three or four years, or ten years, from the present time, there will be any gold fields in the Klondike at all, or any trade in that country. If the contractors are going to take three or four years, they will not be able to secure the land grant. What will be the result ? The result will be that a very large number of prospectors would overrun the country, and if any land was valuable it would be taken up by them. So this is a most important matter in the interest of the contractors. They are interested in completing the contract at the earliest possible moment for the purpose of getting something out of it. Under these circumstances I was surprised at the statement made by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler).

I listened to the arguments addressed to the House against the endorsement of this contract, and I thought from the high position occupied by the hon. member for West Toronto, who is an able man and occupies a high position, that if there was one member who might be expected to contribute something substantial to the debate in the form of argument against the contract, it would certainly be that hon. gentleman. I listened carefully to what he said, and while he discussed several of the details, in all his argument there was not a single statement against the contract, except this one, namely, that the Government should have built the road themselves and should not have given a land grant to the contractors. The hon. gentleman made this statement in the face of the fact that the Conservative party has been giving land grants to railways for a number of years, and thus he indicated that they were going back in that policy ; in fact the hon. gentleman practically acknowledged that after eighteen years' rule by the Conservative party during which they gave land grants, their policy had been a great mistake. I am glad the hon. gentleman has come to adopt that view, and I quite agree with him in it ; and I am sure the House will also agree with me when I say that the policy of the Liberal party is to cease giving certain land grants to railway companies. Agricultural lands should not be given to any railway company, but retained for the benefit of the people. The argument advanced by the Minister of the Interior was a strong one and one that commended itself to the House, because in granting agricultural lands what do you do ? They are made valuable by the labour of the people, and if granted to railways the people who make them valuable do not get full returns. Mineral lands must be developed by the people who own them, and they can only be developed by large expenditures. I quite agree with the Minister of Agriculture when he said that the Government had come to the conclusion which is a sound conclusion and one which will be supported by the people, that the people of eastern Canada should not be called upon to contribute four or five million dollars for the building of a railway, the trade over which might last only a few years. That would be a purely speculative road, and the Government should not saddle the country with a permanent debt to support a railway which when built might only be used for a comparatively short period; but when the Government built a railway through permanent agricultural lands, while they were making a permanent debt they were also securing a permanent asset, and such an expenditure was justifiable. If there is one part of the Government's policy in respect to this contract of more consequence than another, it is that the Government decided, strongly and vigorously, on no account to give any money bonus but simply a land bonus for the purpose of constructing the Yukon Railway. I see no parallel between the two grants; there is a very great difference indeed between them, and we should be able to see what the difference is.

The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Oaler) also referred to the question of routes, and a little later on he disagreed with the conclusion at which he formerly arrived. I was very glad to hear from my hon. friend and the leader of the Opposition that there is no difference of opinion about the advisability of adopting the route selected. If there is no difference of opinion, why is it? It is because it was the only Canadian route that could be made available this year; any other route would have lost Canada the immediate trade of the Klondike and failed to secure the facilities we are about to obtain to get that trade, and so in that particular respect there appears to be no difference of opinion whatever. It has been stated over and over again that there might be difficulty even in connection with the Stikine route. I believe that the customs regulations question, which has been brought up, is after all not a matter of great consequence, but rather one of detail because the Government know and the country knows that it is not necessary for a vessel to go direct from Wrangel to the Stikine River to be able to ascend that river and get to Telegraph Creek. We know that cargoes can be transhipped at Port Simpson, and in my opinion the cost of carrying them from Port Simpson to Telegraph Creek would not be very much higher than from Wrangel to the Stikine and Telegraph Creek. The distance is only 170 miles from Port Simpson to Wrangel. So no matter whether the Americans act towards us in a friendly way or not, we are not dependent on them in connection with that route; but I believe they will act in a neighbourly manner in connection with the matter, for they cannot be interested in trying to thwart our efforts to secure trade that properly belongs to us and enjoy the free navigation of the Stikine River. Even if we have to fall back on Port Simpson to enable us to enter this country, we will still be able to secure that particular trade, and there is no difficulty in that respect. The Minister of Agriculture stated that he had been looking into the matter and discussing it with other people, and he was inclined to think that barges could be towed from Victoria and Vancouver via Wrangel and the Stikine River to Telegraph Creek. From what I know, because I have given great attention to the subject, and I happen to be building boats for the Stikine, I am very much inclined to think it can be done, while I am not absolutely certain. Then of course it would be a more available route than ever for the purpose of enabling people to send goods without breaking bulk from Victoria or Vancouver to the head of Telegraph Creek. A great deal has been said regarding the cost of the railway, and it has been represented that it would be a narrow gauge road and the cost of building it would not amount to a great deal, and the contractors would be able to make a large amount of money. The Minister of Railways in his speech happened to take exception to some statements he found contained in the engineer's report, which he thought perhaps were not correct or a true estimate of the cost of building a railway from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake. The reply made to that particular part of the Minister's speech by the leader of the Opposition was one that astonished me, because he said he never in all his life beheld such a spectacle as the Minister of the Crown condemning his own engineer's report and showing that he understood the question a great deal better than the engineer. There is one feature in connection with this matter to which I desire to call the attention of the House and it is that the cost of building the railway, owing to the short time allowed the contractors, is almost doubled. I do not think it is possible that any contractor, limited to the time mentioned in the contract for the construction of the road, can estimate the cost of building the railway, for the simple reason that it was impossible to calculate the cost of wages. The road has to be built in a limited time, the contractors have to get the men to build it cost what it may, and that being so, the cost must be largely increased. Now, the statement made by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) to which the leader of the Opposition took exception, was a very reasonable statement indeed. The remarks of the leader of the Opposition in reply did not surprise me at all, because I find that when he is making statements in regard to such matters, he makes them in strong language, or to use his own word "astounding" language. Here is what the Minister of Railways said:

I am prepared to say here, as in fact I stated at the time, that I did not consider we could place very much confidence on estimates made with respect to the cost of building a railway in that country. The cost of railway construction depends so largely upon climatic conditions, upon the distance it is necessary to carry supplies, materials and plants, and on a variety of conditions involving an unknown quantity that no one could make a very safe estimate as to the cost. I notice an estimate by our engineer in which he says the cost for such a line would be about $25,000 per mile, and I observe there are particulars in that estimate which I do not think I would be warranted in accepting as the cost of railway construction.

In support of that statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair), I may say that I have also noticed that there are some items in the engineer's estimated cost of that road which cannot be accepted as correct. I believe that the engineer in making his estimate simply gave the usual cost of building a railway of that kind, and did not take into consideration the particular locality, nor the fact that this line had to be built within a very short space of time. For instance, the engineer distinctly estimates the cost of steel rails laid down at Telegraph Creek and along the line of railway at $30 a ton. I believe the Minister of Railways is more correct when he said that it was more likely the freight would cost that to take the rails up there. Anyone who knows anything about the value of rails and the cost of transportation, knows perfectly well that rails cannot be purchased for that figure and delivered at Telegraph Creek or along this line of railway. I merely mention that particular item in the cost of construction to show that the estimate of the engineer is not based on the difficulties of the situation in this particular case. Therefore, I hold that the Minister of Railways was quite within bounds when he said that $30 per ton was perhaps the cost under normal conditions, but it had no bearing at all upon the cost under the abnormal conditions existing in this case.

Now, we have heard a great deal regarding the Klondike and regarding the enormous amount these contractors are receiving for the construction of the railway. After all, when we come to boil down the whole question outside of this one particular item as to the extent of the land grant, all other questions are merely matters of detail. The question of the route is settled, the necessity for the railway is settled, the importance of securing for the people of this country the trade of the Klondike is a settled question, for we are all agreed upon it; and, therefore, the only one point of any great consequence upon which we can disagree is: is the Government paying too much for the construction of this railway. We can make fanciful calculations regarding the wealth of the Klondike. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) told us to-night that Mr. Ogilvie represented it as a country of vast wealth, that there was an immense number of people going into that country, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler) told us, that these contractors were getting in fact one of the richest gold-bearing countries in the world. In my opinion the conclusion of Mr. Ogilvie's report gives a true estimate of that country, and as to the possible outcome of what is taking place now. Mr. Ogilvie says:

Taken altogether, we have a vast field with fair prospects, as fair, it may be claimed, as any other equally extensive region in the world. The natural conditions are not as favourable as in many other parts, but time and enterprise will, no doubt, agreeably modify many of them, and the reward may be great.

In that paragraph Mr. Ogilvie does not speak very glowingly of the prospects of vast wealth for all. We have in this country at the present moment what I might term a mining boom, and when calculations are made at a time when mining booms are on, these calculations as a rule are not borne out by subsequent experience. That has been the case everywhere. I have no desire to cast discredit upon any report, but I believe it will be found in this as it has been found in other countries, that thousands and thousands of people will go into the Klondike, will not find gold, and will be disappointed. It seems to be a law of nature, that if you want anything valuable in this world you have got to work hard for it and dig deep for it, and gold will not be got in the Klondike simply for the picking up as some people seem to think. Therefore, when we come to estimate the value of the land concession that the contractors are getting, we have to bear in mind that that value is purely speculative. I have listened carefully to many of the speeches delivered by gentlemen on the other side of the House, and it seems to me they have mostly come to the conclusion that the contractors are running no risk at all. Mr. Speaker, I am not a millionaire, I wish I were, but any man I have ever known who made large sums of money in business speculation of any kind, took great risks, and was willing to run great risks. We all know that money is not made in large sums unless there is a great risk attending it. There are some millionaires in Canada, and if you got at their inner history you would find that years of anxiety, and toil, and disturbance of mind, and want of sleep was their portion because of the tremendous risks they were running before they became millionaires. Their experience was something that most of us would not wish to undergo, even for the sake of being millionaires. I maintain that Mackenzie & Mann are running a great risk in this particular contract. I do not mean to say for one moment that it is not possible for them to make a large amount of money. They may make money, and I hope they will, and I am sure the Government will only be too glad to know that they made the contract pay well, because if the contractors cannot make any money out of it, then we will all be disappointed, whereas if they do make money the country will make money also. At the same time these gentlemen are taking very great risks, and if we look at the contract we will naturally ask what are the contractors receiving for the expenditure of some $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 as the case may be. They are simply told in the contract to go and look over that frozen Klondike region, and take what they can out of the ground and pay themselves. We all know that in prospecting, valuable claims are not found in a day. Prospectors sometimes work, year after year, in the best gold regions of any country without obtaining anything of value. It is only now and again that one succeeds. There is one feature in connection with this contract, which I am surprised at the contractors consenting to. Whether there was any discussion over it or not, I do not know; but if I had been in the position of the contractors, I would certainly have insisted upon being allowed to choose a certain portion of those lands the moment the contract was signed, for the simple reason that, if the statements made in the press of the country are true—and I hope they are true—there will be an enormous horde of prospectors going into that country this year, and during the next few months they will overrun the very best sections of the country. So that, before the contractors can select any of the land for the purpose of recouping themselves for their expenditure, individual prospectors will be able to secure it wherever they choose to select it, and it cannot be got by the contractors afterwards. I am surprised that the Government succeeded in getting that particular clause into the contract. I am not aware whether there was any discussion over it or not; but I am inclined to think that the contractors were opposed to that, because it does not seem reasonable that they would have signed a contract by which they assumed such heavy obligations, without being able to make a selection of any of the lands until after the middle of June, as the Minister of the Interior tells us. That is one of the risks the contractors are taking. It may end rightly enough for them, but still it is a risk, and a great risk indeed.

Now, it was stated, I think, by an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, that the railway should have been built by the contractors without a land grant at all, because the traffic on the road alone would pay them. I think it was figured out by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) that, with $100 for each passenger and $50 for each ton of freight, mark you, they would be able to make an enormous amount of money. But the most extraordinary thing about that observation was that, while it was going to cost $50 a ton to take freight over that railway, the contractors were going to be able to lay down steel rails along the line of the railway for $30 a ton. That struck me as a most extraordinary calculation. Now, have the contractors any security that there will be traffic along that line of railway two or three years after this? I say they have not. They have no security whatever that this Klondike boom will last one year; and if it does not last, they will suffer a heavy loss; because, if the boom does not last, there will be no traffic for the railway. Therefore, I say, they have no security at all that they will get a return from that railway within a certain length of time. If it were something permanent, something that was going to last ten, or fifteen, or twenty years, or even a shorter time, you might make a reasonable calculation of the return from traffic. But I say, the contractors are taking that risk, and taking their pay in lands whose value it is impossible to estimate, and in taking it they are entitled to have a large amount of land.

Another of the obligations assumed by the contractors is the question of time, and that obligation is a very great one, because, after all, if the railway is not completed by the 1st of September, will they not be in a position to forfeit their deposit of $250,000?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. BERTRAM. And what will become of all the expenditure they will have made up to that time? The loss they are liable to incur in that particular is very great.

Now, it is late, and it is not my intention to detain the House, because, as I said before, a great many statements have been made here which have no connection with this contract, but relate to other matters. We have simply to settle the one question in connection with the contract: Are we paying too much for getting the railway built? As to the amount we are paying for it, I am free to say that we do not really know—we cannot tell. But we do know that what we are giving out of that enormous area of land is a very small portion of the entire area. When I made the statement, on a former occasion, that, although the quantity of land looked large in figures, it did not look large on the map, I got that idea on looking over the map which Mr. Jennings showed me, and on which it was only a small section of the whole area.

There is another important feature in connection with this land grant. It simply means that the company will have to go in and develop that land and make it valuable; and the business and trade which that development will make is of far greater consequence to this country than the taking out of the gold itself. The leader of the Opposition has said that it costs about as much, or more, to take the gold out than it is actually worth, and I believe that statement is true. In all gold countries, if you consider the enormous expenditure that takes place, on the part of both individuals and companies, you will find that the actual amount of gold taken out is small as compared with the expenditure.

Mr. DAVIN. May I ask the hon. gentleman, as a business man, to explain what bearing that has on the contract?

Mr. BERTRAM. The bearing it has on the contract is this, that the Government have secured a company who will take up a certain quantity of land and develop it; otherwise they cannot get paid for the building of the railway. And the development of that land will add to the business and general wealth of the country. That is one of the reasons why I think it was an advantage to get a company to accept payment in land of that kind. The Government have done what I consider to be the very best thing in the interest of the country at large. I believe they have done a wise thing, a prudent thing, in securing the trade of that section of country to the people of this country without adding anything to the debt of the country. While the contractors may be running a great risk, they may make a large amount of money; and I say, that if they succeed in making money, they will succeed in adding wealth to the country and benefiting the country at large. The more this contract is looked into and examined, I am sure that this House and the people of this country will come to the conclusion that the Government have acted prudently, wisely and well.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 18th February, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 22) respecting the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Davis, Alberta.)

Bill (No. 23) to incorporate the Lewes River Tramway Company (Limited).—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 24) to amend the charter of the Union Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Mr. BERTRAM.

Bill (No. 25) to incorporate the Ontario and Quebec Bridge Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 26) to incorporate the Kettle River Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (No. 27) to incorporate the Cañon Railway Company.—(Mr. Britton.)

Bill (No. 28) to amend the Land Titles Act, 1894.—(Mr. Davis.)

CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY BILL—AMENDMENTS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to draw the attention of the right hon. the leader of the Government to the fact that during the debate on the Bill which is now before the House, the Government have intimated a disposition to make three very important changes. For one, the Minister of Railways and Canals said the question of a material reduction in the royalty charged to individual miners was being considered by the Government, or something to that effect. The Minister of Agriculture, I think, stated in his speech yesterday that the Government proposed to make a very important modification in the contract by the elimination of the clause, to which I took such great objection, concerning the mode in which lands should be selected by the contractors. Then the right hon. gentleman himself said that the Government would carefully consider another question to which I attach great importance, and that was a provision similar to that which exists in the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, by which a majority of the directors would be required to be British subjects. Now, it occurred to me that it would facilitate the discussion very much if the Government would place on the Order paper any material changes which they propose to move when we go into committee on the Bill. I merely make this suggestion as a means of facilitating the discussion of the question.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The hon. gentleman quite misunderstood my reference to the subject of a reduction of the royalties the other day. In making an argument, I compared the royalty which is reserved under this contract with the royalty which is being exacted under the regulations, and I said it was just possible that the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite might convince the Government that there ought to be an abatement of that royalty. But I did not intend, nor do I think it will appear that I did say that the subject of a reduction of royalties was now under consideration by the Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think that very materially alters the position. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that that question was open for consideration, that the Government were prepared to deal with it with an open mind, and that is about what the hon. gentleman himself says now.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If he says it is quite possible that the arguments of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House may lead the Government to make a change, he certainly must admit that the Government were meeting it with an open mind, at all events, I had hopes that what I suggested was the case. But assuming there is a disposition to deal with these three questions, that I regard as of great importance, it appears to me, as I said, that it would be a great convenience if the changes that the Government propose to make were formulated in some way.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). When this measure was introduced by the Government we were certainly conscious that there might be in it, as there are in all such Bills, details of more or less importance which had escaped our attention, and whenever, in the criticisms offered by hon. gentlemen on the other side, our attention is drawn to any point which can be amended by legislation, when we go into committee we will certainly be only too glad to do so, and to avail ourselves of the suggestions made to us. I am not sure that I am disposed at this moment to agree with the proposition made by my hon. friend, but it is worthy of consideration, and we will think it over.

LIQUOR PERMITS IN THE YUKON.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the First Minister to what appears to be a contradiction between members of the Government as to an important question, to which I think his attention should be called. I asked a question the other day as to liquor permits in the Yukon. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his answer, touched upon what is being done at the present time, and, as appears on page 493 of the "Hansard," the right hon. gentleman said:

The question remains in abeyance for the present, and no permits are being issued.

Well, I have just found in one of the daily papers that Senator Perley asked whether one Mr. Chamberlain, of Oak Lake, Man., or other persons, had been granted licenses to take spirituous liquors into the Yukon country, and Senator Mills replied:

That a permit had been granted to one William Chambers and other persons to take liquors into the Yukon country by the Dominion Government. He had, however, not been informed of Mr. Chambers's place of residence.

There seems here to be a contradiction, and I think it is important that my hon. friend's attention should be called to it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I cannot at this moment give an explanation to my hon. friend. I got the answer from the Department of the Interior, and I can only say now that I shall apply to the Department of the Interior for further information concerning this matter.

DREDGING LICENSES.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I think it well to call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to the fact that it is common talk in town that dredging licenses are being given by the Department of the Interior, and large banking transactions are taking place in connection with these dredging licenses. It is a very extraordinary thing that the public does not seem to have been made aware that these dredging licenses were obtainable, and if so obtainable, how is it that these persons who have got them, have been informed so that they could rush in, and if they are rushing in, why is it that the Government has adopted the policy of blindly letting these licenses, as it appears from the information we have that they are so doing?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Nothing at all is being done blindly. The regulations have been published to the world, everybody can take advantage of them who chooses to do so. Everybody can make application, and if he abide by the regulations which have been issued, the Government have no power but to accept the offer. As to the statement that banking operations are going on upon these licenses, the Government have nothing to do with that, as my hon. friend well knows. But there is no secrecy in this matter. The hon. gentleman may obtain all the information he cares for if he applies for it. I have only to repeat that the regulations have been published and all these gentlemen are conforming to them.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Blair for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, in rising to address a few imperfect remarks to the House on this question of the Yukon Railway contract, I may say at the outset that I occupy a rather embarrassing position, inasmuch as on this occasion I feel it to be my duty to differ from the leaders of the Conservative party in the House. I am very much pleased, however, at the altered tone, the entirely altered tone that is assumed by many of the leading members on this side of the House in discussing this Bill, as compared with their manner when discussing the subject on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I trust that with the lapse of time, because a few days work great changes in the swinging of the pendulum, they may come back until many of the hon. members on this side may see their way clear, after changes suggested in the contract, and amendments made, to revert to the old Liberal-Conservative policy of Sir John Macdonald, which, I am glad to say, is adopted almost entirely throughout this contract.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Hear, hear.

Mr. HUGHES. This is another instance in which the leader of the Government and his colleagues in office have stolen the clothes of the old Liberal-Conservative party. I will not, on the present occasion, enter into the details of the contract, or enter into objections put forward, or bandy words back and forth, but I merely propose, without criticising remarks addressed to the House by my friends on this side or by hon. members on the other side of the House, to offer a few remarks, pointing out the advantages of the contract, and possibly some of the disadvantages, and making suggestions with a view to have this matter passed upon as speedily as possible by the House.

Many hon. members will remember the time when the Canadian Pacific Railway was being constructed. The policy of Sir John Macdonald on that occasion was clear and distinct; the policy of the leaders of the present Government, many of whom were then members of the Opposition, was also very marked, as you yourself, Mr. Speaker, may very well remember. Many Liberals insisted that the route all through Canadian territory should not be adopted, but that the route through the United States should be followed. The Liberal-Conservative party on that occasion stood firm, and, although there was a very great outcry in the country, although very many Liberal-Conservatives had to follow on that occasion, thinking possibly the leader was wrong in adopting the route north of Lake Superior, nevertheless, time has vindicated the policy of Sir John Macdonald and his colleagues, and we find not only the Liberal-Conservative party, but the present Government, are loud in praising the foresight of the great Canadian leader. In the present contract the Government have wisely adopted an all-Canadian route. The only fault I have to find with this policy is that they do not immediately start from a tide-water seaport in Canadian territory and construct the road entirely on Canadian soil. Undoubtedly, there is a great rush of miners into that country, of men of all classes. Many of the noblest young men of all lands are rushing thither, but it cannot be denied that many of the most reckless and lawless are also rushing thitherwards, and it is not beyond the region of ordinary possibility that all those who go to Klondike will not strike it rich, that not one in a thousand will strike it rich, and those men, finding themselves short in funds or without funds, will become lawless and reckless; and it is not within the region of possibility, it is within the region of probability, that not only will it be necessary to have the mounted police there, but also a Canadian armed force to maintain law and order. I should be very much pleased, if the First Minister and the Government could see their way clear to go forward immediately and construct a railway from Port Simpson or any other Canadian port—I care not which—and have an all-Canadian route, so that we could send our soldiers there to maintain law and order, and also secure this route to transport supplies and freight and carry out general business connected with transportation into the Yukon territory. In so doing, we would simply be pursuing the policy adopted by Sir John Macdonald and his Government in relation to all matters of this kind. During the last two sessions, when Bills were before this House and the Railway Committee, asking for termini at various ports in Alaska, I took the opportunity—and I was the only member of the committee and of the House who took the opportunity—of pointing out that no railway should be chartered by the Dominion that did not tap a terminus at a Canadian seaport. On the eastern coast, we find Portland built up entirely by Canadian trade, and yet our farmers cannot send any produce there without paying duties to the United States. Then, again, there is Boston, which is more than half a Canadian city; but neither a Canadian merchant nor a Canadian farmer can send goods or produce there without having to pay the American duties. I pointed that out last year, and the Government having conceded that an all-Canadian route should be built to the Yukon, I am determined to support that contract, even though there may be many objectionable features in it of a minor character. I propose to support it on that ground alone, if on no other.

Many objections are urged against the present contract. What are they? One objection is, that it gives a monopoly to the road. But it has been pointed out, that the Government, in reserving to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council the right to determine what the rates shall be, both as regards passengers and freight, are merely following in the footsteps of the Liberal-Conservative Government many years ago. That policy was that all railway rates should be considered by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and that being good Conservative policy, I am in favour of it, and I am free to trust the Government to fix the rates. That they will be fixed fairly in the interest both of the railway companies and passengers, and merchants, and farmers, who will transport goods over the road, there is no doubt.

There is another objection urged, that there is a monopoly established, inasmuch as no other railway may be built there for a number of years from any foreign port along those shores. That is the true essence of Canadian national sentiment, and whatever other objections there may be to the contract, I am satisfied that no Canadian business man or Canadian statesman, politician or patriot will object to the contract on that score. I was very much surprised to hear the remarks offered in reply to the Address and the suggestion made that roads incorporated from Canada should run to Juneau or Dyea, ports built up and approached through American waters to the disadvantage of Canadian business men.

Another serious objection taken to the contract was, that the Government granted a tremendous monopoly of the lands in that country. I admit that the acreage is somewhat extensive, but, when you consider the grant, what does it amount to? According to Mr. Ogilvie, in his British Columbia speech—I did not hear his speech in Ottawa, but I have the one delivered in Victoria—there are 150,000 square miles of gold-bearing lands in that district. How much land is granted under this Bill? Why, Sir, only 3,750,000 acres; one block out of 26 is all that is granted to this railway company. Now, those who are familiar with placer or alluvial mining, know right well that this particular kind of mining is invariably found in existing or former river beds and valleys, and these placer locations vary in width from 100 feet to less than one mile on the average. Therefore, in giving the contractors the monopoly of these lands, it appears on the face of it that five-sixths of the land granted will be absolutely valueless for the purpose of placer mining. I have no doubt at all that if the wish of the contractors was consulted, they would much prefer to have simply 5,000 square miles of their own selection of land given in single square mile blocks, rather than 320 sections of land given them in 18 square miles of a block. There is no doubt of that. More than that, I believe they would prefer to take one-fifth of the land in a greater number of small blocks, than they would the immense quantity of land given them in this way. I know that from a mining point of view it would be much more advantageous to the contractors. I look upon this immense tract of land given in these large blocks of three miles by six, as almost absolutely useless, or the greater portion of it.

Another serious objection which some of these gentlemen urge is that no tenders were called for. Undoubtedly the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party in the past was, where it was at all practical, to call for tenders for the construction of any great public work. It is true that in connection with the Calgary and Edmonton road, the Regina and Long Lake road, and certain sections of the Canadian Pacific Railway, this policy was departed from, and, Sir, the present case is an instance where if an excuse could ever be offered for tenders not being called, such excuse is forthcoming. We must remember that the question of time was a most important consideration in connection with this contract. I had the privilege of being in the city of Vancouver quite recently. I found such a state of things existing that agents of trading firms in Victoria and Vancouver were actually paying the way of persons en route to the Klondike, down to Seattle and the Puget Sound outfitting establishments, in order that these establishments might outfit them and send them to Dyea, Juneau and other American ports, so that these men who are entering the Klondike might not be subjected to the obnoxious American customs regulations that were then in force. These objections have largely vanished owing to the regulations having been amended, and I presume such difficulties will not longer present themselves. But there was no reason to suppose at that time that the American regulations would be amended, and it was of the utmost importance that a Canadian route should be at once commenced. As to the objection that tenders were not called for and that these lands were granted without tender, I may say that the history of the Conservative party while in office, has been, that a tender was never called for in relation to public lands granted for the construction of a railway. Therefore, the present Government in pursuing the policy which they did, adhered to the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party led by Sir John Macdonald. There was another objection urged against this contract, to the effect that it entailed a surrender on the part of the Government, and that in making the contract the Canadian Government have proven themselves more ignoble than have the Chinese in their recent surrender of some of their seaports to Germany and Russia. Well, Sir, as I view it the case is exactly the reverse. As a matter of fact the Government in pursuing the course they did have refused to surrender the control of their seaports to foreigners, and have provided that the Canadian merchant and the Canadian contractor shall have the largest share of the trade of the district, and that the foreigner will have to come in second best. This Government has refused to surrender the control of that district to the foreigners, and so they are unlike the Chinese rather than like them. I must point out here, and I do so with the greatest pride, that the Liberal-Conservative party have not descended to the policy too often adopted by a few—I will not say by all—of hon. gentlemen opposite who in the past when any international dispute arose between Canada and the United States, had a fondness for pointing out the weakness of the Canadian case. I am pleased to say that as a rule the Conservative party in this instance have been loyal to the nation, and have not descended to point out the weak points in our armour, if any exist.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). There are one or two notable exceptions.

Mr. HUGHES. It is contended that we cannot tranship at Fort Wrangel without paying customs duties. Well, Sir, Wrangel is not the only port by which the Stikine River can be reached. I made special inquiries when I was in the city of Vancouver, with a view to ascertaining if there was any near-by port in Canadian territory where our business could be done, if the Americans refused to allow transshipment of Canadian cargoes at Wrangel. I was informed by men familiar with that coast that the navigation from Fort Simpson to the Stikine River was practicable for these small river boats 999 days out of every thousand, and that they would have no difficulty whatever in navigating these waters. All that is necessary is to take a chart of the coast, and the whole passage from Fort Simpson to the mouth of the Stikine River is as sheltered as, and even more sheltered than the Gulf of Georgia between Seattle and Vancouver or Seattle and Victoria. Therefore, were the Americans to adopt a policy of irritation in their customs regulations at Wrangel, the difficulty can be easily overcome, first, by transshipment at a Canadian point near Fort Simpson, and second, by building an all-Canadian route from Alice Arm or other convenient point along the undoubted Canadian shore. In doing this we will build up another Canadian town with which our farmers and merchants can do business rather than increase the prosperity of an American city.

The only other objection I have heard urged against this contract is, that the Government themselves should have built the road. Now, Sir, I stand here to say that had the Government undertaken to build that road I would have opposed them. Not only that, Sir, but I venture to say that my friends on this side of the House would have been even louder in their denunciation of such a policy than they are in their condemnation of this land grant. What does this land grant amount to? Figure up the acres given to the Regina and Long Lake Railway, these acres of magnificent farm lands, and you see that there has been granted to that line in the North-west Territories an area of within 100,000 acres of the acreage voted to this road. And yet, Sir, experience has shown that these magnificent lands which were granted to the Regina and Long Lake Railway and the Calgary and Edmonton Railway have not realized the expectations of those to whom they were granted; and I venture to say that experience will show the gentlemen who have accepted this land grant in the Yukon district that their expectations in that regard will not be realized either. Having reviewed the objections raised against this contract, let us examine whether it has any disadvantages. I have already pointed out the importance of having an all-Canadian route, and I would again respectfully urge upon the right hon. First Minister and his colleagues the advisability of not waiting for ten years or even one year, but at once opening up communication from Portland Canal to Glenora, first by a wagon or sleigh road, and as soon thereafter as possible by a railway. I venture to say that if the right hon. gentleman will pursue that line, not only all parties in this House, but the whole country, will to a man endorse his action. Let him give us an all-Canadian route, if not by the close of the present season, at least in time for next season's trade.

Another advantageous feature of this contract is that the railway must be completed immediately. As that feature has been fully discussed by other speakers, I will not stop to point out the advantages that will accrue to the Canadian merchant, the Canadian manufacturer, and the Canadian miner, in being able to get access to that country at such an early day by an all-Canadian route.

The granting of alternate blocks to the company has been condemned; but for every block that enriches the company, the adjoining block will enrich the nation. That was the policy that we fought for against hon. gentlemen opposite, I am sorry to say, in regard to the North-west, holding that the opening up of one block to settlement would render the adjoining block valuable. The same argument applies to these mining lands. Let them be opened up in one block, and the Government will be able to realize largely from the adjoining block. Miners will only be too glad to pay the Government a good sum or a good royalty for the opportunity of mining them.

Another advantage I see in the contract is that miners' claims are protected; and I am delighted to hear the suggestion that the royalty to be demanded from the individual miner should be reduced, because I think royalty of ten per cent is excessive. I have no belief, either, that the Government will ever be able to exact the ten per cent royalty from individual miners; it will be absolutely impossible to keep track of it, and there will be any amount of fraud and deception practised to avoid paying it. I believe it would be better to require a larger payment for the claims in the way of purchase or rental; for the history of mining proves that it is almost impossible to collect a royalty, especially if it is abnormally large. I would therefore respectfully suggest that the royalty to the individual miner be materially reduced.

I find another very advantageous clause in this contract. The waters of the Stikine River up to Glenora will always be open to every vessel, whether it be Canadian or American or British, for free navigation, and therefore the company have no monopoly of that. The railway will be controlled by them, but the wagon road will always be open, and they will have no control over that. Any number of companies may run stages on that road, and how long will it take a stage to travel the 150 miles? We can easily remember the old stage routes along the frontier in Ontario, by which travellers thought they were doing very good work when they covered 50 miles a day. This wagon road will always be open, and that circumstance will compel the company to keep down their rates. Then the Hootalinqua, the Lewes and other rivers of the country are open to free navigation. Moreover, there are other routes into the country by way of Skagway, Dyea and the Taku Valley, all of which will be open to stages or transportation companies. There is no doubt that any man who wants to get into that district will have ample means of doing so without going over this railway if the company should attempt to charge extravagant or monopolistic rates.

I find also a clause in the contract providing that the rates on the railway shall be controlled by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, which will prove to be of very great advantage and is in thorough accord with Conservative policy.

Another feature of this contract which gives me very great satisfaction is this: The contractors are two Canadian-born gentlemen.

An hon. MEMBER. Where do they live?

Mr. HUGHES. One of them resides in North Victoria during the summer season. The other is a county of Halton boy, whose home is in Montreal. They are two Canadian boys who, starting from humble positions in life, have by their pluck and energy made a name for themselves, not only in the Dominion of Canada, but throughout the world. The standing of these gentlemen with the leaders of the Conservative party or the leaders of the Reform party, or with any party in the Dominion of Canada, would, I venture to say, be a sufficient guarantee that if they undertook that contract, it would be carried out in good faith. I am very much pleased to see that this contract is with two such gentlemen as Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, who will give Canadian boys employment on that railway, instead of Chinese—whose policy in the past, in building railways in Canada, has always been to give Canadian workmen and Canadian tradesmen all the labour and trade it was possible for them to give. Therefore, the money which will be paid out upon this work will go to Canadian merchants and labourers, as a result of its being in the hands of Canadian contractors: whereas, if the contract had fallen into the hands of foreigners, the chances are that the great bulk of the money expended upon it would have gone into the hands of foreigners. Therefore, I contend that the country will benefit in the construction of this road as well as in the management of it.

In passing up and down the country and listening to the discussions on this question, I am free to admit that one hears any amount of condemnation of the Government for the deal; yet, when it is simmered down, it amounts to this, that the gentlemen who criticise it in the country like some who have criticised it in this House, had to admit they had never read the contract. It simmers down to this, that these gentlemen have been carried away by the headlines in the papers. It simmers down also to this fact, that certain persons saw in the endorsement of the contract by my dear old friend, the leader of the Opposition, an opportunity to take his political head off. I have no desire to see the head of that venerable old leader fall in the political arena or any other arena, but trust that he will long be spared to give to this House and country the exhibition of intellectual and physical vigour that has characterized him this session. And if he is to fall, I trust that he will fall in a different way from throat cutting.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Oh, they would not stop at that.

Mr. HUGHES. It is all very well for us to be wise after the event. No sooner was the contract given to Mackenzie & Mann, than forthwith on every side we heard that scores of other companies could be found to do the work more advantageously to the nation. That recalls to my mind the conduct of certain Liberals at the time of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, when we found these mushroom organizations going up all over the country. I do not know whether you remember it, Mr. Speaker, but I have a distinct recollection of a number of mushroom companies—I shall not use the term bogus companies—springing up all over the country, filling the columns of the Reform newspapers of the day with the most indignant protests against such a contract having been given when so much better terms could have been obtained. We all know that that is the cry of disappointed people, and therefore I am inclined to look with a great deal of suspicion on the cry of better terms that we hear so often repeated to-day.

Mackenzie & Mann have taken this contract at great risks. They have to put up money with the Government instead of receiving money from the Government. The country is not going to pay one dollar. On the contrary, Mackenzie & Mann stand to lose, in the first place, the $250,000 they put up. I hope that even if they do not succeed in carrying out the contract to the letter, they will not lose the $250,000, because some time has already been lost to these gentlemen by the delay in this House. They will find it a much more expensive job than they at first realized. A miner gets $15 or $16 a day up there for shovelling sand. Is any man going to shovel dirt for $1 or $2 a day when he can get $15 or $16 for shovelling mining clay? These contractors will find when they go to hire labour, that the figures will be higher even than those paid in that rock cutting which they undertook to excavate in the Rocky Mountains. Another thing which increases the cost is the great haste required.

Another point which nearly all the speakers who have criticised the measure omitted is this—the cost of constructing and putting steamers on the routes, the rendering streams navigable, the building of a wagon road from Glenora to Teslin Lake. All that will involve a very heavy additional cost on these gentlemen.

But the greatest risk which they run is this. It has been pointed out here that there will be 100,000 men in that country before midsummer. What will those men be doing there? I notice that Mr. Ogilvie, in his lecture, said that the Bonanza Valley was located one week after it was found out to be rich—and that was a year ago; and that Eldorado Creek was located five days after it was first discovered. These are the two centres that have given a rich name to this whole country. One of them was located in a week, and the other in five days after discovery, when there were only about 1,000 men in the whole district. By the 1st of June there will be 100,000 men there according to best authority. What will these men be doing? Five of them can meet together and locate claims, following up the rivers and valleys, and I venture to say that there will not be a single mile in which there is likely to be a mine that will not be located before Mackenzie & Mann are in a position to take up their lands. What will remain for the contractors? There will only remain the quartz rocks. We remember how in the province of Quebec, a few years ago, there was great excitement aroused by the discovery of a few nuggets of gold in the gravel at the foot of one of the rapids of the Chaudière River. Immediately there was a great cry that the whole country was rich in gold. But it was subsequently found that this gold came from the very weak quartz rocks up in the mountains. The same will no doubt be the case in the Klondike region. Undoubtedly the disintegration that takes place in the icy regions is greater than here where the waters in the spring have free sweep to the sea. Undoubtedly the gold-bearing rocks being brought down by the ice shoves in a region like the Klondike, the disintegration from the action of the water is much greater than it would be in more southern latitudes, for, as we know, all streams going north flood the districts below them and have not the free outlet that streams have which flow south. I venture to predict that that will be the case in the Yukon district, and that rich districts such as the Bonanza and Eldorado Creeks will be very few indeed. As I told Mackenzie & Mann, after I first read their contract, I thought that they had put their heads, each of them, into a halter, and that the risk was altogether too great, because the mining locations would be taken up long before they had an opportunity of selecting any rich, paying lands.

We are familiar with the history of the gold fever of South Africa, the mining fever of Nevada, California, British Columbia and Australia. The City of Melbourne alone turned out over 75,000 people to go into the Coolgardie district of Australia a year or so ago. How many of them struck it rich? Not one out of 5,000, and the fever there was just as great as it is in the Klondike to-day. I venture to say that the same thing will be the case in the Yukon district. I hope that every man who goes there will come back a multi-millionaire, but it is useless to shut our eyes to the facts. The history of the world, one age after another, is pretty much the same. The excitement in Australia, California, British Columbia and Nevada merely repeats itself in the Yukon country.

In conclusion, I would merely say that I trust the Government will lose no time in providing facilities for transportation. We have the right to transport goods under treaty up these rivers, but we have no right to the transportation of an armed force. Such a force must go in through Canadian territory. I would impress on the Government the necessity of immediately taking the matter into consideration, and at least opening up a wagon road, if not a railroad, from Canadian tide-water to the Teslin Lake or the heart of the Yukon district.

One or two other suggestions I would take the liberty of making to the Government. They should amend the mining laws of the country, so as to place them on the same footing as those of other countries whence so many miners come. These miners come into Canadian territory from the United States and there stand on an equal footing with Canadian miners.

Is that the case when our miners go to Colorado, or Montana, or Nevada, or even into Washington? Not at all; we are met there with the alien law, and our people have to become American citizens or declare their intention of becoming such, before they can mine a dollar's worth. I respectfully suggest to the Government the advisability of considering that aspect of the case, not in connection with this contract, but in connection with the general mining law, and to require from the miners who come into that country some assurance that the country will benefit from their coming here. Why, Sir a Chinaman, or a Jap, or an American, or a man of any nation, may go into the Klondike region, locate his claim, turn over the earth with a shovel for a few weeks, and then make his way out of the country with five or ten millions, and all the benefit we have from his being here would be covered by fifty or a hundred dollars. I maintain that the mining law should be amended, so that any man coming into this country to mine should be met with a similar law to that which meets our men when they enter the United States. That is only fair-play, and no nation can complain of such treatment. I am satisfied that the whole of Canada, as well as Britain, would endorse the Government in taking such a step.

Another point I was much pleased to see brought out in the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) was, that the management of the company should be an all-British management. As soon as I heard that that had been pointed out, I knew that it would be accepted by the two Canadians who control the charter, and with whom the Government is dealing. Whether it were in the charter or not, that would be observed, and I firmly believe they would have no hesitation in accepting that suggestion, as well as the other suggestions made by the hon. leader of the Opposition.

I trust that this discussion will not be prolonged. Undoubtedly, it is within the power of the Opposition—of any Opposition—to prolong debate. The history of this House shows many regrettable instances of debate prolonged by the Opposition in the past—but not in this Parliament. I say here, advisedly, that the conduct of the late Opposition, the party of the present Government, in factiously opposing every just and beneficial measure in this House, had more effect in keeping them in Opposition than any other single thing. They would have remained in Opposition until the morning of the resurrection—and I do not believe that they would have gotten into power even then—had it not been for the negative policy of our own party, which was the cause of their success rather than anything good in the policy of the other side. Therefore, as a Liberal-Conservative, as one who thoroughly believes in the policy of the late Sir John Macdonald, I trust that there will be no factious opposition to measures which, while there may be details that are objectionable, are, on the whole, in the best interests of Canada, and as well conceived as, under the circumstances, could reasonably be expected. I trust, Sir, that the members of the Liberal-Conservative party in this House will not follow in the footsteps of the late Opposition and factiously oppose everything brought forward by the Government. I can remember how, even before I was a member of this House, my blood used to boil—for I always had a warm side for everything that was for the upbuilding of our best interests—at the course taken by the Opposition of that day. Take, for instance, the case of the North-west rebellion. What policy should they have pursued? What should they have done? They should have crossed the floor and shaken hands with the Government and said: There is rebellion in the North-west; we will not discuss the cause of it now; law and order must be maintained and the rebellion suppressed; we are ready to help you. But did they do that? No, Sir; they gave, if not material support, at least moral support, to the rebellion by their conduct on that occasion. Again, on the occasion of the building of the great Canadian Pacific Railway, we found the speeches of members of the Opposition of that day used by the Americans as campaign literature in order to induce immigrants from the British Islands and from the continent of Europe not to settle in the Canadian North-west, but to settle in the United States. I could go over a whole list of such cases. There never was a Yankee fish-thief schooner caught on the Atlantic seaboard, but they pursued a similar policy—not to uphold the Government in enforcing the law, but to raise any trifling objections that could be raised. I respectfully urge upon the Liberal-Conservative party not to follow in the footsteps of our predecessors in Opposition, not to degrade ourselves to that level—I do not speak of all those who were then in Opposition and are now on the Government side of the House, because there were honourable exceptions—of the tactics pursued by some gentlemen who now constitute the Government of this nation.

Mr. CASGRAIN. If I were a greater enemy of the present Government than I am—and am not such a friend of my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) who sits behind me—I would probably wish that he should join the party of the Government; I think they would have so much trouble with him that they would be glad to get rid of him. When I heard that my hon. friend was going to support the Government on this question, I thought that he had some grave reasons for separating himself from his party upon such an important measure. I have followed his speech very carefully, and I must say that I have not found in any of the arguments he has given the House, any of those grave reasons for which, alone he should have taken the line of conduct that he has thought fit to take before the House. The other day, I followed with a great deal of interest the speech made by the Minister of the Interior. It was a most interesting speech from start to finish, and I think that a great many of the gentlemen who sit on this side admired the hon. gentleman's eloquence and the manner in which he presented his case. His brief was well gotten up, and the case was presented with a great deal of skill. But it seems to me, if my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) will allow me to say so, that the principal points in that case were not presented, that the principal objections which members on this side of the House have to the measure were not refuted by him. We heard a great deal about Major Walsh, we heard a great deal about the hon. gentleman's progress through that country, we heard a good deal to prove that his was the best route under the circumstances—upon which question we almost all agree—but when the hon. gentleman came down to the principal points which were cited by the Opposition in objecting to the contract, he skipped over them and did not answer them at all. He reminded me of an English barrister who was arguing a case. When he had nearly finished his address, his opponent said: "You have not said anything about such and such a point, which is most important." His reply was: "I will come to that just now." But he was drawing very near the end of his argument, and his opponent drew his attention to the point again. "Oh," he answered, "I have treated that very fully." And a short time afterwards he sat down. It seems to me that the line followed by the hon. Minister was that of the English barrister.

There is one thing I will permit myself to say to the hon. gentleman. There was a feature of his speech which I did not like, and that was the manner in which he treated the leader of the Opposition. Sir, of course we may differ as to the manner in which gentlemen are to be treated in this House by their fellow-members.

I have no right, and I do not at all propose, to read a lesson to my hon. friend. But, Sir, when I speak of the right hon. leader of this House, or his trusted lieutenant, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I try to do so with that respect and deference which are due, not only to the high positions they occupy, and have occupied, in this country, but which are due also to the difference in age between myself and those hon. gentlemen. Now, of course, that is my view, that is the way in which, I take it, that relations should be kept up between the different members of this House. But it is a matter of taste, and, as everybody knows, 'de gustibus non disputandum.'

Now, Sir, I will come down to the contract before the House and to the Bill which we are asked to pass. I think one of the first questions we should examine is: What are the obligations of the contractors? I may say, at this stage of the debate—and I will please the House by so saying—that I do not intend to make any extended remarks; but it seems to me that, upon a question of this kind, everybody who has studied it, who has studied the documents, who has studied the reports, is almost in duty bound to give his views to the House and to the country. Well, what are the obligations of the contractors? The principal obligation of the contractors, of course, is contained in the first section of the contract. They are obliged to build a railway from Glenora, or Telegraph Creek, or Clearwater Creek, to the Teslin Lake. Then, by section 8, they are obliged to build a sleigh-road from Glenora to Teslin Lake during this present season, before, I believe, the 15th of April. Then, again, by section 9, they are to provide for steamboat transportation upon the Teslin Lake to a point upon the Hootalinqua River. Those are the obligations which the contractors undertake to fulfil under the contract before the House. They are also obliged to deposit $250,000, upon which interest at 3 per cent is to be paid. Now, let me call the attention of the House to this fact, to which I believe, attention has already been called, that, under section 10, the only security that is given by this deposit of $250,000 is that the railway shall be built between Glenora, or Telegraph Creek, to the foot of Teslin Lake. Now, Sir, that is the only obligation which is guaranteed by this security. There is no security for the building of the sleigh-road, the contractors are under no obligation to provide for suitable navigation on the Teslin Lake or on the Hootalinqua River; but this particular section of the contract covers solely the obligation under which the contractors rest to build a railway. There has been some difference of opinion as to what will be considered as the completion of the contract, because section 10 says that:

And on such railway being completed and equipped, and accepted as hereinbefore specified, the said sum or security shall be returned to the contractors or to whom they may appoint, and if the same be deposited in cash—

Now, if reference is made to section 1 of the contract, the House will see it is Provided further, that for the purposes of the season of 1898 and of complying with the requirements of this contract in respect to the completion of the line on or before the said first of September, it shall be sufficient if on or before that date the contractors have the rails laid in such a manner as will permit of regular and efficient operation of the railway, although the whole work be not fully completed.

Now, does that mean that the deposit will be returned to the contractors when the road is built in such a manner as will permit of regular and efficient operation of the railway, although the road itself be not entirely completed? This question is an important one to examine, when you come to consider the time when these contractors have the right to obtain the land grant in fee simple which is given to them by the contract. It is also important to know what the execution of these obligations is going to cost the contractors. It has been said by my hon. friend here, and it has been said upon the other side of the House, that the contractors are taking an enormous risk, that they are spending an enormous amount of money. Well, of course, that will be an important element in the contract, if it is so. But take the first obligation, for instance, the obligation which they will be compelled to fulfil from the outset, that is, the building of a sleigh-road from Glenora, or Telegraph Creek, to Teslin Lake. Now, I say, firstly, that the building of this sleigh-road will not cost very much; secondly, that the building of this sleigh-road will be necessary, at all events, for the contractors' own use, for their own purposes; thirdly, does it not seem very probable that any money laid out by the contractors in building the sleigh-road they will recoup themselves for by levying tolls of some kind upon the miners who will take that route into the Klondike? I do not mean to say that the contractors would be allowed to levy tolls upon the road, to put up toll-gates, and to prevent the people from passing without paying for it; but there are a hundred and one ways by which these gentlemen will be able to recoup themselves, to a great extent, for any outlay of money they will make in building this sleigh-road. Now, let us come to the railway which is to be built between the two points which I have mentioned. It has been said in this House by, I believe, my hon. friend who preceded me this afternoon, by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture yesterday afternoon, and notably by the hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Bertram), that the cost of building this railway was going to be enormous. In order to prove that to the House, what course has been followed by these hon. gentlemen heretofore? We know that, when a case is to be presented to a court by counsel, or when a case is to be presented to this House by an hon. member who gets up to speak upon it, he bases his arguments, he relies for his case upon the documents which are laid upon the Table of the House. These documents are laid upon the Table for the information of the members, they are laid upon the Table so that the members of this House and the country in general may learn in a positive manner what, for instance, in a case like this, the cost of the work to be performed is going to be. I repeat what my leader said the other evening, that it is a most unusual course, a most extraordinary course, for a Government to lay reports of their own engineers, of their own officers, upon the Table of the House, and then to say: Here are our witnesses, here are our documents, here is the evidence in support of our claims: and then they turn around and say: These men are competent men, we employed them, and, therefore, they must be trustworthy, but do not believe a word they say, do not believe any documentary evidence that is put before the House, do not believe these witnesses whom we bring up to sustain our case, because they are all wrong. I have read the report of Mr. Jennings, which has been laid on the Table of the House; I have read it with great care, because I expected to find in it sufficient information to guide me in the few remarks I have to offer to the House, and also in the decision I wish to be able to arrive at; but when I heard the hon. gentleman from Centre Toronto saying that Mr. Jennings could not have given the real figures, could not have taken into consideration all the circumstances, could not state the kind of road that was to be built, or the country through which it was to be built, I came to the conclusion that this Mr. Jennings whom the Government had employed, must be a fool. Why, Sir, what does he say in the very beginning of his report, addressing the Minister of the Interior?

Sir, in accordance with your desire for an interim report covering the examination of the country made by me for a highway or railway route between Glenora and Teslin Lake, I have the honour to report.

So that, although he was sent up there as he says himself, to make an examination on the ground for the express purpose of seeing how this road could be built, what were the possibilities of the country, and what the probable cost would be, still we are not at liberty to accept his judgment. I have heard it said on both sides of the House, although I do not know the gentleman myself, that Mr. Jennings is not only a most competent engineer, but that he is a most reliable man, and for that purpose he was sent up there to make a report by the Minister of the Interior, and his report was laid upon the Table of this House so as to give us information, and enable us to discuss this question intelligently. Mr. Jennings was not there for such a short time. He arrived at Glenora and Telegraph Creek on 25th September, with a rather large party, which he divided, however, so as to carry on operations within as short a time as possible, and they all went over the ground following the different routes. But Mr. Jennings specially reported on the line on which the railway is to be built between these two points; he went over the ground himself, and he was on the ground from 25th September to 15th October and he came back the same way. I take it that if this report was of no value, it should not have been placed upon the Table of the House; if it does not contain reliable information, information which we could use as the basis of an argument, then the Government acted wrongly in submitting it to the House, and they thereby misled the House and the country. But if hon. members will read the report they will find that it is made with the greatest care, that Mr. Jennings goes into details, that Mr. Jennings has gone over this route for the express purpose of seeing what the possibilities are of constructing a railway in that district, and also what the cost of the railway would be. It has been stated by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) that the cost which is mentioned by Mr. Jennings is the ordinary cost of a railway. That is not what Mr. Jennings said, and I will refer hon. members to pages 25, 26 and 27 of the report. Here not only does Mr. Jennings give the general cost of the railway but he goes into specific detail, enumerating everything which enters into the building of a railway, and he concludes as follows:—

In conclusion, I may state that provided all arrangements are made and the location determined upon by April next, the line of railway by either route shown on the plan can be completed and in operation by September following, at a cost of four million dollars, that portion situated on the Stikine River below the crossing, including the bridge, costing $746,000 of the total amount.

This report is signed by Mr. Jennings. He stakes his reputation on it. It is made upon data which he has collected himself, and I again say that this report was placed before the House for the information of the members, and it was only after hon. gentlemen opposite saw that if we found in this document sufficient argument to condemn the course they have pursued, they have fallen back and adopted the most extraordinary course of saying that this information is not correct, that it is all wrong and hon. members should not believe a word of what the officer says and of the information which the Government have laid on the Table of the House.

This road which is to cost $4,000,000, according to evidence furnished by the Government, is to belong of course to the contractors when completed. The question arises—and I am now going into the second branch of the case—what are the advantages which the contractors are to reap under the contract? But not only does the road belong to the contractors, as hon. members will find if they will take the trouble to read the contract. The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) said that a great many hon. members on this side of the House had not read the contract. I think he was under the impression that he was speaking for the other side of the House, because every hon. member who has risen to speak on this side of the House showed himself to be perfectly conversant with every clause in the contract and the Bill. Now, what are the powers given the contractors? The road belongs to them, as I have said. If hon. gentlemen will refer to section 2 they will see that a great many other powers are given to the contractors, among others, these:

To build and operate a railway above mentioned and an extension thereof northward to Dawson City or thereabouts, and an extension southward to a point in British Columbia to be designated by the Government and capable of being made an ocean port, also a line of railway from the waters of Lynn Canal to Port Selkirk or thereabouts by way of Chilkat Pass, also branch lines of railway from any points on the company's railway to any property owned by the company, also lines of railway from any navigable waters to any property owned by the company: Provided that the power to build said line from Lynn Canal to Port Selkirk and said branch lines and said lines from navigable waters shall not be exercised without the consent of the Governor General in Council.

The said Act of incorporation also to give the company full and sufficient powers to build and otherwise acquire and operate docks, wharfs and lines of steam and other vessels in connection with its railways and property, also telegraph and telephone lines, also to carry on mining and smelting operations and such other powers as may be necessary for the due operating and conduct of all business connected with and incidental to the development and working of the lands (to be granted by the Government as hereinafter provided) and the minerals therein, including power to issue land grant bonds and bonds secured by the company's undertakings.

To complete this list hon. gentlemen will please refer to section 13 and 14 of the Bill in which the powers of the contractors are again greatly enlarged, so that there is hardly any power for transportation or mining development or transportation of any kind by steam, electricity, water or land not given and exclusively given to the contractors under the contract and by the Bill. I have stated upon the authority of the gentleman sent there to examine the road what will be its cost; let me for a moment refer to the Bill which gives the contractors the right and power to raise a certain amount of money upon the securities which they are empowered to issue under the Bill. The capital stock of the company will be $10,000,000; and if hon. members will refer to sections 17 and 18 of the Bill they will see that all the powers generally given to a company to mortgage, or raise money on their securities are given to the fullest extent to the contractors under the contract. It seems to me that—but I am not a business man, it is true, and yet I am prepared to leave it to business men to decide—that the contractors can go on the English market and raise such an amount of money to float the company as will necessitate the use of very little of their own funds in the project, and they will thus be enabled to carry it out almost entirely with foreign capital. That is not all. It has been stated in the House already, and I repeat it, that this railway will be from the very start a most paying concern. I have the figures which the hon. member for Westminster (Mr. Morrison) gave to the House the other evening when the Bill was introduced. What did he say? He said there are 3,000 people on the Yukon River at the present time, that there are 7,000 en route, that there will be 10,000 people in the country in a very short time. He further stated that 50,000 additional people would go in there this season. He said this population will take at least 25,000 tons of provisions. He went further and said that about two tons per man, of baggage, tools, provisions, &c., would be needed, and taking the number of people at 60,000 at the end of the season, the freight required would be 120,000 tons. The hon. gentleman says that it would take at present $20,000,000 to transport 100,000 tons into the Yukon country, but mark you, from the figures which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) gave the House the other evening (and they are very interesting) it seems that at least 250,000 people will be going into the Yukon this present season. I do not mean to say they are all going to wait until this railway will be entirely completed, but I do say that most of them will go over the sleigh-road belonging to the company, and will use the railway track whether completed or not, so that the profit which will be reaped by the contractors this season alone will be immense. It is true that this is probably not a permanent line, and that it may not continue always to be a paying line, but from the data we have to-day of the enormous influx of people to that country, we may justly conclude that during the next few years the tolls on the road will suffice to pay for the railway. It has been stated by competent authority that if the contractors had merely got the franchise, or if the Government had let the world know that they were giving this franchise with the monopoly, many would have been found who would have built the road without any land grant whatever, and in view only of the profit to be reaped from the transport of freight and passengers. The Minister of the Interior endeavoured very hard to make out that in the Bill submitted to the House, there is no monopoly clause. I will call the attention of the House to clauses 4 and 5 of the Bill, and it seems to me from these clauses that it cannot be controverted, that there is a monopoly, and as exclusive a monopoly as ever was given to any contractors or to any company building a railway. Clause 4 says:

For five years from the 1st September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by Parliament to be constructed from Lynn Canal or thereabouts, or from any point at or near the International boundary between Canada and Alaska into the Yukon district, and for five years from said date no aid in land or money shall be granted to any person or company other than the contractors and the contractors' company to assist in building any such railway.

Therefore, for five years no company and no person shall get authority from this Parliament to build any line of railway from the Lynn Canal or thereabouts, or from the boundary line between Alaska and Canada. The company has the exclusive right of building any of the lines which are mentioned in paragraph 4 of the Bill, and so they have a monopoly in that respect. I will prove that this is effectually a complete monopoly for the company, by reading paragraph 5. It says:

5. The contractors and the contractors' company shall be entitled to receive in preference to any other person or company during ten years from the said 1st of September, 1898, such aid or assistance in land or money as the Government may be authorized and may see fit to grant in aid of a line of railway from the Stikine River to an ocean port in British Columbia, provided that the contractors or contractors' company are willing to undertake the construction of the same at once and completion thereof within a reasonable time upon receiving notice thereof from the Government.

Therefore, under this section of the Bill, no aid is to be given to any other person or company to build a line of railway from the Stikine River to an ocean port, if the gentlemen named in that contract say they will build it themselves. Take it for granted that the line is built from Glenora to the head of Teslin Lake, and let me ask: who is going to risk any money to build a railway from the ocean to connect with this railway which belongs to the contractors? Who is going to take the risk of building with his own means—because he can get no aid or subsidy from this Parliament—any line of railway from the coast to the Stikine River? All the other routes being shut out by the fourth clause, it stands to reason that this fifth clause which gives a preference to the contractors, constitutes in their favour as complete a monopoly as was ever given.

The third question which I propose to examine is the following:—Have the Government not made an extravagant and improvident bargain?

A great deal has been said about the land grant, and as to that I shall not speak of my own knowledge, because like many other members of the House I have not been on the ground myself, but as to the value of this land I will take the evidence put before the House by the Government. My hon. friend (the Minister of the Interior) read to the House a part of Mr. Ogilvie's report upon the richness of the land in that part of the country, but it seems to me he did not dwell very much upon the most important part of the report in that respect. At page 92 of this report, Mr. Ogilvie says:

To use a mining term, many of those claims are "world beaters," and if the indications now known are worth anything at all they are worth from sixty to seventy millions of dollars in those two creeks. Taking this division as a whole, including the three creeks named, affluent to Indian Creek, a district some thirty-five miles in length and twenty-five or more miles in width, if the indications can be relied on, there are one hundred million dollars in sight in that area. No one can guarantee this amount, but the prospects so far developed point to that sum pretty conclusively. This district is exceptionally rich. Nothing has ever been found like it heretofore in that country; in fact, in very few countries has anything been found like it, and while we cannot confidently assert that other finds as valuable as it will be made, it is altogether improbable that gold is scattered over such a vast extent and only rich at a point which is less than the 140th part of the total area. If we add to this part of the northern area of British Columbia we increase it nearly two-fold, and the comparative area of the Klondike district is much lessened.

Taken all together, we have a vast field with fair prospects, as fair it may be claimed, as any other equally extensive region in the world. The natural conditions are not as favourable as in many other parts, but time and enterprise will no doubt agreeably modify many of them, and the reward may be great.

That is the evidence which is laid before this House by the Government itself, it is the evidence presented to the Government by a man who was sent out there for the purpose of obtaining information; and it is evidence which I think may fairly be relied upon. It has been said by gentlemen opposite that the contractors only get the odd-numbered blocks, that the Government get the alternate blocks, and that prospectors can go up there and stake claims and become proprietors by recording them, according to the mining regulations. I would call the attention of the House to the fact that these claims can only be entered by five miners when they are distant from the Government mining recorder at least 100 miles, so that if they are ninety or ninety-five miles away they will have to walk this distance to find a Government mining recorder before they can enter their claim. I do not think I am far wrong in stating, that at this very moment, or that in a very short while at all events, the contractors will have prospectors all through that country. They will take up all the rich land as soon as possible; and as for the individual miner, he will be hedged in on all sides by land taken up by this rich and powerful company.

These are the advantages which are given to the contractors by this contract. Their obligations are: to build a sleigh road, which will pay for itself, and to build a short railway of 150 miles, which will also be a paying concern, because it will be a monopoly. In addition to this, they have the right to build railways in other parts of the Yukon district. They can, if they wish, build a network of railways all over the country; they are almost the possessors of it. They have also the right to mine and smelt ores, and they are to become the proprietors of probably the richest gold mines in that country. I contend that the proportions are not at all kept between the obligations they assume, and the enormous present which this Government are giving them.

Mr. CASGRAIN.

Something has been said as to why the Government did not ask for tenders. Seeing the great importance of this work, seeing that the Government are giving to these contractors 3,750,000 acres of gold-bearing land, and seeing that it was most important for the Government to provide an all-Canadian route to convey miners and prospectors into the country, it was the Government's bounden duty to take all the necessary precautions to get this road built for the least possible money without giving away such a large extent of land. But it is said they could not ask for tenders, for the time was too short, and the case was urgent. That is not an answer to our objections. Why was the case urgent at the time these gentlemen entered into the contract? It was urgent because they had lost so much time last August, September and October. That is the reason they were obliged to make this contract so quickly and had no time to call for tenders. But the responsibility of that rests upon themselves. This state of things was brought upon them by their own dilatoriness.

Some controversy arose the other evening as to what the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) said in his speech on this measure. I understood him to say that before the last session ended evidences were pouring in on the Government as to the richness of the land of that district, and as to the enormous influx of people who would be likely to go in there this season. As I do not wish to misquote the hon. gentleman, let me read the report of his speech at page 196 of "Hansard":

Hon. members of this House will recollect quite clearly that before the close of last session, evidence was pouring in upon us of the immense discoveries of gold that were taking place in the Yukon district, and returning parties from that remote region were bringing us the most fabulous accounts of its mineral deposits. No one who is at all interested in public affairs could fail to realize that very important questions were likely to arise in that country in connection with its great gold discoveries. The Government had, therefore, as soon as the session of Parliament was over and it was possible for them to give attention to the matter, pressed upon their important consideration the solution of—not one problem alone—but various problems of very great magnitude.

When, Sir? As soon as the session ended, he says. Not only one problem—not only the problem of seeing that peace was preserved in that distant country, but also the problem of transportation, because a very few lines afterwards the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals said:

It became clear to us that we should immediately address our attention to dealing with these problems in a manner which would be most efficient and most promotive of good government and the general welfare and prosperity of the country. Now, in obtaining information with regard to the probable influx of people into that country, we were led to believe that the number of people who would be likely to seek the Yukon region during the present year would be exceedingly large.

And he goes on to say that some said at that time that 50,000 people would go into the Yukon district this season, while others put the number as high as 250,000. There is no doubt that the hon. gentleman made the admission in this House—not voluntarily, perhaps, and when he did so he put the Government in a bad box—that before the end of last session the Government were aware of the enormous discoveries of gold that had been made, and that in the present season there would be an extraordinary influx of people into the country; and, from what the hon. gentleman himself said, it was the duty of the Government to consider from that moment the solution of the important problem of how this large number of people should be got into the country. If we had not the evidence given to us the other evening by the Minister of Railways and Canals, I would only have to refer to the press, not only of this country and of the United States, but of the whole world during the months of August, September and October of last year. What did we see? We saw that even the French papers published in Paris in the month of September were full of the Klondike craze, and that parties were ready at that time to start from France and come to the gold fields of the Yukon district. There was the same thing in England and all over the continent of Europe. Hon. gentlemen must have very short memories if they do not remember reading in the month of September last that there would be an enormous influx of people into that country during the present season. Why, I remember seeing in the press early in the fall telegrams from Victoria and Vancouver warning people not to start for the Klondike during the autumn, but to wait till the coming spring. It was so well understood at that time that there would be a crush of people along the border or in the towns on the Pacific Coast, that the papers were doing everything in their power to convince people that it was most imprudent for them to start till the coming spring. I say the Government could not ignore these facts; and if they had set themselves to work to solve the problem, and could not have called for tenders in the usual way, they could at least have made known to the world in the month of October that what was needed was the shortest and most practicable all-Canadian route, and that the Government were ready to give substantial aid to any contractors or to any company who would build such a road. Am I not right in saying that if these facts had been made known last fall to the world—not only to contractors in Canada and the United States but on the other side of the Atlantic—contractors could have been found who would have competed against those with whom the bargain was made, and that in the long negotiations which, we are told on the other side, took place between them and the Government, Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann would not have been in the position of knowing that they were the sole parties who were seeking to obtain the contract, and would consequently have been disposed to accept conditions more favourable to the country.

One of the principal reasons for which we are asked not to oppose this bargain is that it provides for an all-Canadian route. Is it really an all-Canadian route? Take the facts as they are before the House. Fort Wrangel, if it is not in American territory, is claimed by the Americans and is in their possession. A great deal has been said about the effect of the Treaty of Washington in contradistinction with the Anglo-Russian Treaty of 1825, which it is said gave to British subjects the right of navigation, for all purposes, without any hindrance, upon the rivers which flow from British possessions into the Pacific Ocean. I do not propose to give my opinion upon the question as to whether the cession of Alaska to the United States abrogated the treaty which existed between Russia and Great Britain. That is a question of great moment which can be fairly dealt with, not by ordinary gentlemen learned in the law, but by those who have made a special study of international law. My hon. friend, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), however, setting himself up here as a student of international law and as a critic of the great men who were engaged in the making of these treaties, went out of his way, not only to attack the Conservative party, but our deceased leader, the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, when he said that a great blunder had been committed by the Conservative party and Sir John Macdonald in giving up the rights which belonged to us under the Anglo-Russian Treaty of 1825. Not to be unjust to my hon. friend, let me quote from "Hansard" what he said on this point:

Now, will the House take cognizance of the fact that the subjects of His Britannic Majesty possessed, under this treaty with Russia, a proprietary right for all purposes whatever in the Stikine River until that right was interfered with by the statesmanship of our friends on the other side. These gentlemen apparently had never read this treaty. They did not know what it contained. They had not the remotest conception of what they were doing when they put this clause in the Washington Treaty which they have been boasting of ever since the question of the Stikine River came up.

Sir, the men who made this treaty between England and the United States—I am talking now of the Treaty of Washington—were the Marquis of Ripon, Sir Stafford Norfolk and the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald. I need not mention the others. And these are the men who, according to the Minister of the Interior, did not know what the treaty between Russia and England of 1825 contained.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). They did not know.

Mr. CASGRAIN. My hon. friend repeats the statement.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I speak with knowledge.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I have great respect for the opinion of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but it seems extraordinary that in the discussions which took place upon this point, that very question was raised, and the view was held that the treaty between Russia and England had been abrogated by the cession of Alaska to the United States, and that, therefore, section 26 of the Washington Treaty had to be passed.

Mr. RUSSELL. That was the excuse that was given at the time.

Mr. CASGRAIN. That appears from the discussion at the very moment.

Mr. RUSSELL. Not at the moment, but after the Treaty of Washington was agreed to.

Mr. CASGRAIN. With all the respect which I have for the opinion of my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright), it seems to me most extraordinary that such men as those I have mentioned could have set about making a treaty between these two countries on this important question, in which the very consideration of these rivers comes up, and not know what was contained in another treaty bearing on that same subject.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would like to be informed what discussion the hon. gentleman is alluding to.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I am alluding to the discussion cited yesterday by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart).

Mr. RUSSELL. That does not very well define what the discussion was. I wish to know if the hon. member is referring to discussions which took place in this House when the Washington Treaty came up for ratification or to discussions which took place before it was ratified.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I am simply referring to the quotation made by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) from the works of Mr. Sumner. I shall not lay down any rule of law on the subject. I have not the pretension to say that I am sufficiently versed in international law to decide, upon the spur of the moment, or even after considerable consideration, whether or not the treaty between Russia and England was abrogated by the cession of Alaska to the United States, but I find in the books that treaties are abrogated, not only by lapse of time, not only by extraordinary circumstances such as war, but by other circumstances such as, for instance, the cession of sovereignty over the territory in relation to which a particular treaty was made. Take what happened the other day in England. Lord Salisbury distinctly stated—and I suppose we are not going to sit in judgment in this House upon his opinion—that when Madagascar was ceded to the French, the treaties which England had with Madagascar were terminated by that fact; and it seems to me, although the cases are not exactly identical, that when a treaty is made between England and Russia relating to a territory which belongs to Russia, the cession of that territory afterwards by Russia to another power abrogates, by that fact alone, such treaty.

I come to another point concerning this treaty. Of course this discussion is probably not quite germane to the subject, because we have to take the position of affairs as we find them. Fort Wrangel is claimed by and is in the possession of the United States. And under the Treaty of Washington they are entitled to make regulations which shall not be in any way contrary to the terms of the treaty. But supposing even that the treaty between Russia and England should still exist, is it possible that my hon. friends can say that under the treaty between these two countries an armed force such, for instance, as the mounted police could have passed through these waters which pass through territory which belonged to Russia? Although there is a right of navigation given to countries from which rivers flow through a foreign country, so far as I can see, whenever a foreign armed force passes through that territory, whether on water or on land, it is a subject of special negotiations between the two countries. But, Sir, I find that in the House of Commons in England judgment has not been pronounced in such a summary manner as it has been here. I find this despatch in the newspapers of to-day:

London, Feb. 17.—The Parliamentary Secretary for the Foreign Office, Mr. George N. Curzon, in the House of Commons answering a question as to whether the rights and obligations respecting Alaska, under all the then existing treaties, had been transferred when the United States purchased the country, said that only certain articles of the Anglo-Russian Treaty of 1827, regarding the geographical limits, were recited in the Russo-American Treaty under which Alaska was ceded. Article 26 of the Treaty of Washington of 1871, Mr. Curzon said, provided that the navigation of the Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine rivers were to be free and open to the commerce of British subjects and American citizens, subject to the laws and regulations of either country within its own territory, and not inconsistent with the privilege of free navigation. Inquiries, he added, had been made by the British Ambassador as to what regulations were best applicable to the navigation of the Stikine River.

Now, if hon. gentlemen will look at the treaty of 1867 between the United States and Russia as to the cession of Alaska, they will see that there is not a word in that treaty saying that at the same time that they ceded the territory the Russians ceded to the Americans the rights which they had under treaties with other nations. But, as I have said, let us take the position of the United States as it actually exists. Here is Fort Wrangel which is to-day in the possession of the Americans. They claim it as their post and they have the right to make regulations with regard to it. The treaty, section 26, says :

The navigation of the rivers Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine ascending and descending from, to and into the sea shall for ever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty and the citizens of the United States, subject to any law and regulations of either country, within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

And it is argued that this means that no regulations can be made which are inconsistent in the slightest degree with the free navigation of the river. There is no doubt about that. But, judging from our experience, judging from what the Americans are doing all along the border which separates Canada from the United States, judging from the policy they have pursued as against our workmen and labourers and against our professional men also, judging from the manner in which they have treated us when their interests are not such as to oblige them to give us as much as we give them, they can impose such regulations, such restrictions upon the transshipment of goods at Fort Wrangel as to make it cheaper for the miners who go into that country to buy their supplies at an American port and pay the customs duty when they get to Glenora or Telegraph Creek.

For these reasons I contend that this is not an all-Canadian route as claimed by the Government; and, therefore, one of the principal reasons for which we are asked to pass this measure at the present session falls to the ground. I say again that if the Government, instead of losing a good deal of time last season in the months of August, September, and even October, had gone into this question at the time, had studied the problem of which the Minister of Railways and Canals spoke the other day, if they had held out to the world inducements to contractors to build an all-Canadian route, we should probably have had before this House a proposal for a railway which really would afford an all-Canadian route from some port upon the Pacific Ocean to the Yukon gold fields. Though I am in favour of an all-Canadian route to the Yukon, though I think it is to the greatest interest of the trade and commerce of this country to have a route provided as soon as possible, I cannot help thinking that the Government has been remiss in its duty and that the advantages which are given to the contractors under the contract which is submitted to us are too great for the return that we are to receive for them.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) who has just taken his seat has a very great advantage over me in this discussion because he seems to have discovered some points in connection with the subject which have not been considered by hon. members on this side. One of the great difficulties I have had is that I have not found anything which has not merely not been touched upon but which has not been hammered out as thin as the gold-beater's leaf. Every possible aspect of this subject has been so thoroughly considered by previous speakers on both sides of the House, that it seems to me, that, so far as any hope of throwing new light on the subject is concerned, we might as well take the vote at this moment as to protract the discussion further. But notwithstanding this disadvantage—for it is a disadvantage to feel that every topic that could be discussed has already been fully considered, I propose to take up the consideration of some two or three of the points, particularly the legal points, and more especially, I may say, the international questions to which my hon. friend has latterly addressed his remarks. Perhaps I had better begin with the last part of his speech and pursue my course backwards to the first of it. He has undertaken to tell the House what was the condition of things with respect to the rights of navigation of the Stikine River at the time the Washington Treaty was negotiated through the instrumentality, to a great extent, of the late Sir John Macdonald. He has undertaken to show, if I apprehend his argument correctly—and as the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) as I partially understood him the other day also undertook to show—that the Russian Treaty by which subjects of Her Britannic Majesty had the right to navigate the Stikine and other rivers in Alaska had been abrogated, I do not know by what, but I suppose by the cession of Alaska at a subsequent date. Now I have a very strong impression, indeed I have an absolute conviction, that this was not the effect of the cession of Alaska by Russia to the United States. I may find it most convenient to deal at the same time with both the argument made by the ex-Minister of Railways and that made by my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain), upon this part of the case.

Through some inadvertence, I suppose, on the part of the "Hansard" reporters, and through some lack of sufficient attention on my own part, I did not hear and I am not able to find in the report, in the citation which was read from the speech of Mr. Sumner, the paragraphs which specially bear upon the subject now under discussion. Of course I assume that they must have been read in the hearing of the House, but I did not catch them, and the reporters of the House did not catch them. for they do not appear in the report of the speech of the ex-Minister of Railways, as published. I think if the House, possibly labouring under the same difficulties as myself, had been able to catch those paragraphs of Mr. Sumner's speech, they would have come to the conclusion that there was not very much controversy left upon the question as to whether the rights which were conceded by Russia to subjects of His Britannic Majesty, did or did not remain intact until the time when they were surrendered, if they were surrendered—which I think is yet an open question—by the negotiators at Washington. I distinctly admit that everything that could be done to surrender them, apparently, was done at the time, through the recklessness, and through the ignorance—but I do not know as to that—of our representative; for so far as it was possible for any statesman to give away the rights of this country, or the rights of Great Britain in respect to the navigation of that river, I think that it was done by the late Sir John A. Macdonald in the negotiations that led to the Washington Treaty. But I think he was overruled by a gracious and wise Providence, and I am inclined to think that we are still in possession—but I am not absolutely certain of that, not so certain as I would like to be—of those rights, and that the rights which were accorded to Great Britain by the treaty with Russia still remain intact and still can be insisted upon. I say that if there is any question about that at all it is a question which was created by the reckless surrender of those rights by Sir John A. Macdonald at the time the Washington Treaty was negotiated.

But let me go back to the question as to whether we did or did not, previously to the negotiation of the Washington Treaty, enjoy those rights, and let me read a passage in Mr. Sumner's speech which was not read, or at least was not heard by me when the passage was read by the ex-Minister of Railways. This speech of Mr. Sumner was drawn up with unusual care and accuracy, because it was made in executive session of the Senate, and therefore was not reported, and it was upon the request of Mr. Sumner's friends that he afterwards drew up in writing the record of his speech as he was willing that it should go down to posterity. Let us see what he said:

Thus we have three different stipulations on the part of Russia: one opening seas, gulfs and havens on the Russian coast to British subjects for fishing and trading with the natives; the second, making Sitka a free port to British subjects; and the third, making British rivers which flow through the Russian possessions forever free to British navigation. Do the United States succeed to these stipulations?

Now, my hon. friend the member for Montmorency says they did not succeed to those stipulations, because he cannot find in the treaty of cession from Russia to the United States that any mention is made of them. I suppose it frequently occurs that when a man sells his house and makes it over to his neighbour, he makes no mention of the mortgage that rests upon the property; but I never heard it suggested that for that reason he gets rid of the obligation of the mortgage. So the sole question as to whether that cession was made subject to this servitude, depends upon the question whether this was a real right or a personal right. If it was a real right, it remains upon the territory of Alaska in spite of the fact of its cession to the United States; if it was merely a personal right against the sovereign by whom the right was conceded, it could not be entailed upon his successors. Let us see what Mr. Sumner thought about that. I will read as far as the hon. gentleman read, indicating the point at which he stopped, and I will then proceed with the passage which I did not hear him read. Mr. Sumner said:

Among those I make a distinction in favour of the last,—

The ex-Minister of Railways read that fairly. —which, by its language, is declared to be "for ever"—

But he did not read that with very much emphasis.

—and may have been in the nature of an equivalent to the settlement of boundaries between the two powers.

Everybody knows that a treaty for the settlement of boundaries is not abrogated by cession. Everybody knows we depend now upon the treaties which fix the boundaries between Alaska and this country for the definition of the boundary line.

But whatever its terms or its origin, it is obvious that it is nothing but a declaration of public law, as always expounded by the United States, and now recognized on the continent of Europe.

At that stage it would appear from the report that the ex-Minister of Railways stopped reading, skipped the balance of the paragraph, and went on to what Mr. Sumner said about the other two branches. I will read the balance of Mr. Sumner's statement in reference to the third provision, which is the one in question:

While pleading with Great Britain, in 1826, for the free navigation of the St. Lawrence, Mr. Clay, then Secretary of State, said that the American Government did not mean to contend for any principle, the benefit of which in analogous circumstances it would deny to Great Britain. During the same year, Mr. Gallatin, our Minister in London, when negotiating with Great Britain for the adjustment of boundaries on the Pacific, proposed that "if the line should cross any of the branches of the Columbia at points from which they are navigable by boats to the main stream, the navigation of such branches and of the main stream should be perpetually free and common to the people of both nations."

I wonder that these very apposite observations of Mr. Sumner were not read to the House.

At an earlier day the United States made the same claim with regard to the Mississippi, and asserted, as a general principle, that "if the right of the upper inhabitants to descend the stream was in any case obstructed, it was an act of force by a stronger society against a weaker, condemned by the judgment of mankind." By these admissions our country is estopped, even if the public law of the European continent, first declared at Vienna with regard to the Rhine, did not offer an example which we cannot afford to reject. I rejoice to believe that on this occasion we apply to Great Britain the generous rule which from the beginning we have claimed for ourselves.

Now will anybody say that that was not an absolute and complete recognition by Mr. Sumner of the freedom of navigation of all rivers flowing through British territory, and through Alaskan territory, into the Pacific Ocean? It is almost inconceivable that this admission of Mr. Sumner was not known to the right hon. gentleman who assisted in the negotiation of the Washington Treaty—and I cannot understand why if it was known to him that right was ever given away, if it was given away, by the terms in which the Washington Treaty is couched. We do not need even to depend upon that, although it is of the very highest kind of authority to cite on a subject of this sort, in respect to the question whether we did or did not possess the absolute right of the navigation of the Stikine River, when we have the admission of so eminent a publicist and statesman as Charles Sumner, a man of such exalted position in the United States, and who was summoned by Secretary Seward to that very discussion, for the purpose of throwing such light as he was able upon that Alaskan transfer, when the measure was passing through the Senate—I say when we have an admission of that sort from Charles Sumner, we really do not need any higher authority, or any other authority, for the position that up to that time when these rights were surrendered, if they were surrendered, by the Washington Treaty, we had an unquestioned right to the navigation of the river. But there is other authority. There is authority which my learned friend will find in any book on international law to the effect that—

General compacts between nations may be divided into what are called transitory conventions and treaties, properly so called. The last are perpetual in their nature, so that being once carried into effect they subsist independent of any change in the sovereignty or form of government of the contracting parties, and although their operation in such cases may be suspended during war, they revive on the return of peace without any express stipulation. Such are treaties for the cession of boundary and exchange of territory, and those which create a permanent servitude in favour of one nation within the territory of another.

Showing that a servitude over the territory of another nation is put upon the same footing as a cession of boundary or exchange of territory.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman give the authority from which he has cited?

Mr. RUSSELL. It is American authority. It is cited by Sir Travers Twiss from "Wheaton's International Law," a very high standard authority, which has been re-edited over and over again by great Americans, such as William Beach Lawrence and Richard Henry Dana. This contention is made on behalf of the Dominion of Canada by Hon. Edward Blake. The hon. gentleman is perfectly familiar with that fact, no doubt; and he is also familiar with the case of Peter Martin, which shows how clearly this matter might have been established but for the negotiation of the Washington Treaty. The latter part of the 26th article of the Washington Treaty reads as follows:—

The navigation of the rivers Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine ascending and descending from, to and into the sea shall for ever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty and the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of either country, within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

Mr. Blake, after quoting that section, said:

At the time of the negotiations—

That is to say, of the Washington Treaty—

—British subjects had already the fullest right to navigate for all purposes all the streams flowing from the British territory in the interior through Alaska. The United States had no right to navigate any of these streams beyond the boundary of Alaska.

This is a very important consideration upon which in part depends the contention that in spite of what was done in 1871, it may still be arguable that the Washington Treaty has not abrogated the terms of the treaty of 1825.

We asked for and obtained as a concession a limited right to navigate three of these streams for certain purposes, conceding to the United States the right to navigate these three streams through Columbia on equal terms. Thus this so-called concession by the United States was in fact a concession by Great Britain to the former country, which gave nothing and got everything.

Mr. Blake then proceeded to say:

I have never been able to form a possible conjecture as to the reason for the action of the British commissioners.

I can hardly assume that they were ignorant of the rights of Great Britain under the St. Petersburg convention, or had satisfied themselves that those rights no longer subsisted.

Still less can I believe that they knowingly and deliberately determined to abandon those rights, not merely without an effort to defend them, but without the least indication that they were attacked by the United States.

And he might have added, after they had been fully and abundantly recognized by the highest American authority when the Alaska Treaty came before the United States Senate for ratification. If the hon. gentleman desires to pursue the subject further, he will find an excellent opinion given by Mr. Justice Crease in the same direction, which seems, to my mind, to furnish conclusive reasons why, notwithstanding the negotiation of the Washington Treaty, the rights we had under the Russian Treaty still remained. No thanks are due to the negotiators of the treaty if they do remain, because the subject never seems to have been discussed or considered. The clauses of the Washington Treaty are drawn in such terms that it is evident that this contention was not present to the minds of the otherwise astute authorities who were negotiating the treaty, and they worded the treaty in such language unfortunately that when it came before the Crown authorities in England they felt that they had to decide, and did decide, that the rights of navigation were wholly dependent on the terms of the Washington Treaty. But there again, I have to complain of the manner in which the hon. ex-Minister of Railways quoted his authorities.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before the hon. gentleman takes up that branch of the subject, may I ask him if, outside of the treaty of 1825, he agrees with the American view that has been raised, that England would have had the right of navigating the Yukon and Stikine Rivers?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is an absolutely unimportant matter.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman does not understand my object in asking it. I am quite candid, and I do not think it is an unimportant question.

Mr. RUSSELL. I only mean that my personal opinion is absolutely unimportant.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has given the House the well known views of American writers on international law, and he has cited them in connection with the treaty. But so far as I could gather, the hon. gentleman did not say that he did or did not agree with their views. I can assure the hon. gentleman that his opinion has weight with me and with other hon. members in this House on these questions, but he did not say whether he agreed with the views of the American writers on international law regarding the rights of the upper proprietors of a river through the lower portion of the river to the sea.

Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. RUSSELL. On a question of international law, a private opinion is quite unimportant. The question is, what is the opinion and the conviction of those with whom you are dealing. International law is not law, it is only international morality. There is no sanction for it, as has been stated over and over again by authorities on the subject. All you want to know in negotiations on questions respecting international law is the view you can estop the other side from disputing; and I am contending that the United States would have been estopped from disputing our rights in this matter but for the mixing and muddling of the Washington Treaty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is a pure question of morality. I do not know that I have any opinion. If I were living in the attic I would of course like to be able to get down to the street, but that would not bind the man on the ground floor to let me down. There is no law on the subject, and the question is simply what can you say that the other party is estopped from disputing.

After Recess.

Mr. RUSSELL. When the House adjourned at six o'clock, I was about to quote not the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, but the despatch in which that opinion is referred to. In connection with that, I wish also to say, that in presenting that part of the case, the impression conveyed by the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) to most persons who heard him, and to every person who may read his remarks in "Hansard," is, in my judgment, an entirely erroneous one. He was attempting to quote the despatch from Lord Carnarvon to Earl Dufferin embodying the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, that is, the result of their opinion, but not the reasons. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) was quoting this despatch, which purports to convey the decision of the law officers of the Crown on the question as to whether our rights depended on the Washington Treaty, or depended upon the status quo before the Washington Treaty had been negotiated. Now, if the House will bear with me while I read the citation as it appears in "Hansard," coming through the medium of my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart), and then while I read the despatch itself, I think it will be found that my remark is justified when I say that any person reading the despatch as it appears in "Hansard" and then reading the despatch as it appears in the records of Parliament, will come to the conclusion that the impression which would naturally be conveyed by reading the despatch as it was read to the House, is entirely an erroneous one. This is the way in which it reads in "Hansard":

With reference to my despatch (this is on the 16th August, 1877) and the previous correspondence on the same subject, I have now the honour to communicate to you the views of Her Majesty's Government, adopted after consultation with the law officers of the Crown, with reference to the case of Peter Martin, for whose release an application has been made to the Government of the United States. If the rights of free navigation depend upon the 26th article of the Treaty of Washington, which expressly states that navigation should be opened for the purpose of commerce, Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that a prisoner cannot be conveyed to Alaska by the Stikine River.

Referring to that despatch, as cited, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) said:

My contention is, although I may be wrong in my argument, that according to the opinion of the law officers of the Crown the treaties were all done away with and the only rights we have to the Porcupine and Stikine River are by the Treaty of Washington.

Just allow me to read the corresponding despatch, as it appears in the Journal, and it will be seen that a very small, but a very important, word is omitted in the last quotation, an omission which entirely changes the drift of the despatch as it reads in the official documents. The despatch is this:

With reference to my despatch of the 21st of March, and to previous correspondence on the same subject, I have now the honour to communicate to you the views of Her Majesty's Government, adopted after consultation with the law officers of the Crown, in reference to the case of Peter Martin, for whose release an application has been made by the Government of the United States.

Her Majesty's Government are advised that the demand of the United States for the release of Peter Martin cannot properly be rejected.

In communicating with the United States authorities, it should be stated, that Peter Martin is surrendered on the ground that he was a prisoner conveyed through United States territory.

The unauthorized conveyance of a prisoner through the territories of a foreign power is an infraction of the rights of sovereignty of such power, and entitles that power to demand the liberation of the prisoner, even after he has left those territories in which he was detained, and from which he has been taken without the authority and in violation of the law of the country.

This right to demand the liberation of a prisoner conveyed, without authority, through the territory of a foreign power is not affected by the question whether the prisoner is, or is not, a subject of the foreign power.

Now comes the crucial paragraph:

Being of opinion that rights of free navigation now depend upon the 26th article of the Treaty of Washington, which expressly states the navigation to be only for the purposes of commerce, Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that a prisoner cannot lawfully be conveyed through Alaska by the Stikine River.

I put it to any hon. gentleman of a legal mind or a critical mind of any cast, whether that is not a very clear suggestion that before "now," before the Treaty of Washington, the state of the case might have been entirely different.

Being of opinion that the rights of free navigation now depend upon the 26th article of the Treaty of Washington—

And why do they "now" depend upon the 26th article of the Treaty of Washington? Simply because of the difference between the terms of the treaty of 1825 and the terms of the unfortunate Treaty of Washington—unfortunate in this regard, that it may be contended, and is apparently held by the Home authorities that the earlier treaty was superseded by it. This is the article of the Convention of St. Petersburg:

It is understood that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty from whatever quarter they may arrive, whether from the ocean or from the interior of the continent, shall for ever enjoy the right of navigating freely and without any hindrance whatever, the rivers and streams which in their course towards the Pacific Ocean may cross the line of demarcation upon the line of coast described in article 3 of the present convention.

Nothing could be broader than that, nothing could be more comprehensive than that, nothing could give a more free and absolute right to the navigation of these rivers coming from the interior to the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. DAVIN. Would my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) read article 3, so that we may know what that strip of coast is?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, I shall read article 3; it is as follows:—

Commencing at the southernmost point of Prince of Wales Island, the said line shall ascend to the north along Portland Channel as far as the point of the continent where it strikes the 56th degree of N. latitude. From this point the line of demarcation shall follow the summit of the mountains situated parallel to the coast as far as the point of intersection of the 141st degree of W. longitude; thence to the frozen ocean.

Then, there is a limitation that the line is not to be farther away than ten marine leagues from the coast. That is to say, if the summit of the mountains is more than ten marine leagues from the coast, then the line of demarcation is to be ten marine leagues from the coast; and if nearer, then the summit of the mountain is to be the line. When you come to read article 26 of the Washington Treaty, you will see how seriously that extensive servitude has been narrowed down; that is, if the Washington Treaty has the effect of narrowing it down, as there is very great reason to fear that it has.

The navigation of the rivers Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine, and ascending and descending thereto, and into the sea, shall for ever remain free and open for the purpose of commerce to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty and the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of either country, within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

Any person will see at a glance, that if the effect of a proper reading of the Washington Treaty is to substitute article 26 for article 6 of the previous treaty, our rights have been very seriously curtailed.

Mr. DAVIN. Is it not possible that they were extended?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think it is possible that they were extended, though of course I shall be very happy to learn that they were. If any one can show in what respect scratching your pen through the expression "all the rivers" and putting in three rivers, and striking out the words "for all purposes generally," and inserting the words "for the purposes of commerce," are extensions I would be transported with joy, and so would every other hon. member of this House.

Mr. DAVIN. Then you will have a chance of being transported.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think any one has placed such a construction as that upon the change made in the Washington Treaty. The danger is that we have put a weapon into the hands of our enemy by the insertion of article 26 in the Washington Treaty, thus admitting that article 6 of the Russian Treaty is no longer in force. By a strained interpretation, that article 26 may be held to mean that though article 6 of the treaty of 1825 was in force up to the time the Treaty of Washington was negotiated, yet by that treaty we have practically admitted that it is no longer in force. I suppose that was the interpretation the law officers of the Crown gave to article 26 of the Washington Treaty of 1871, although I have not been able to see their opinion in extenso. It is probably in the archives of this Parliament somewhere, but I have not yet been able to lay my hands upon it. I would be very happy indeed to find that I am mistaken in supposing that it bears out the interpretation which I now place upon it, and which I assume we are bound to place upon it.

Mr. POWELL. May I ask the hon. gentleman what rivers are excluded by the treaty of 1871 which were included by the other—not in general terms, but specifically. What navigable rivers are excluded as a practical matter?

Mr. RUSSELL. As a practical matter I am not acquainted with the geography of the country. My whole contention has reference to what rights we had before on the Stikine River, and what rights we have now. If such a case as occurred before with reference to Martin were to occur again, we would in all probability find that we had not the right to take a prisoner down the Stikine River to jail in consequence of the change that was made by article 26 of the Washington Treaty.

Mr. POWELL. That is not the point to which I directed the hon. gentleman's attention at all. The hon. gentleman is making two points—first, as to the nature of the right, and second, as to the territorial application of the right. My question had reference to the territorial application, and I asked what rivers, as a matter of fact, were excluded by the Treaty of Washington which were included by the other?

Mr. RUSSELL. I was answering the suggestion of the hon. member for Assiniboin (Mr. Davin), that the treaty of 1871 had possibly enlarged the treaty of 1825. Let the hon. gentleman aid his friend from Assiniboia by telling me how it does so.

Mr. POWELL. That is another point.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have as much right to ask questions as my hon. friend, but I merely asked in reference to the hon. gentleman's question. I ask him how a form of words which expressed all the rivers in the country, was enlarged by a form of words which expressed only three of them. I think that was a fair answer to his question. The position of the matter is now that we shall probably find a difficulty in getting behind the expression of opinion which was given by the law officers of the Crown, and their ratio decidendi, which was embodied in the despatch from Earl Carnarvon. I feel in regard to that matter, very much like an old divinity professor, in reference to a text of Scripture which was attacked as spurious, and as to which a theological friend asked him what should be done. He sent a message in reply: "Probably spurious, but not to be given up without a struggle." So I think with reference to this matter, that our contention, though I will not say probably, but possibly unfounded, ought not to be given up without a struggle. I think it is just such a forlorn hope as the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) had last year, when he argued the case in reference to the German and Belgian treaties, which he very skilfully, very ably and very properly argued, and which it would have been a highly improper thing for him to have surrendered without the best argument that could have been made on the subject. I say that, notwithstanding the opinions of the law officers of the Crown and the despatch of Earl Carnarvon, it is the duty of this Government to continue to insist that there is still room for the claim that the treaty of 1825 is still in force, and that we still have all the rights of navigation which were given to us by that treaty. That claim should not be given up without a struggle. No Government of this country ought to give up any legal or constitutional or international right of the people of this country without saying the last word that can be said in favour of its being retained, and firing the last shot that can be fired in its defence.

The hon. leader of the Opposition was very greatly impressed with the difficulty of this matter. He saw that the argument was pretty conclusive that his late lamented and distinguished friend, Sir John Macdonald, had given up the rights of the people of this country in reference to the navigation of the Stikine River. What was his retort? He said: "I want to know if my hon. friend forgets that it was the Marquis of Ripon, a great Liberal, who was at the head of that convention?" What in the world has the Marquis of Ripon to do with the Liberal party or the Conservative party of this country? What connection is there between the Liberal party of England and the Liberal party of this country? The position of the hon. gentlemen opposite seems to be that if it was a wise, prudent, far-sighted and sagacious thing for Sir John A. Macdonald to get these provisions put into the Washington Treaty, then we have to give all the praise to the Liberal-Conservative party, during whose tenure of power that treaty was negotiated. But if, on the other hand, we find that that treaty from beginning to end was a blunder, and that those wise and sagacious negotiators gave away our rights, or did not know what our rights were under the previous treaty, and recklessly or ignorantly sacrificed them, then it is not the Conservative party or Sir John Macdonald that must have the blame, but the Marquis of Ripon, the great Liberal. I must confess that when I heard the praises so loudly sung of the sagacity and prudence and forethought of the deceased and lamented statesman and the great Conservative party, which possesses such supernatural omniscience and foresight—and who alone are endowed with the instinct of government—the reflection occurred to me, how was it that these omniscient authorities, these wise people, who could see so far into the future, did not foresee this little difficulty which has occurred in regard to the customs regulations and provide against it by appropriate stipulations.

Why might they not have just said: Let us just go back to this old Russian Treaty and re-enact this clause of it, or let us make it so broad and clear that there never can be any contention as to what the rights of the British Crown and subjects are with reference to these rivers Stikine, Yukon, Porcupine and any other rivers that may happen to be in this territory. Let us make it so clear that he who runs may read, and the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein. Let us make it so clear that there can be no question of the possibility of your establishing regulations which will hamper our commerce, which will worry us, which will prevent our enjoying to the fullest extent the privileges it is clearly intended we should have. Why did not these prudent, sagacious, omniscient framers of this Washington Treaty take the pains to make that matter so clear that there could be no difficulties such as those with which our hon. friends opposite are endeavouring to worry us at this moment?

But even supposing you may be driven, in the last resort, to depend on article 26 of the Washington Treaty, we have very high American authority to the effect that we need not apprehend any danger in working out our career and in making use of that river as an avenue of commerce—that we need not fear that we will be hampered with any unreasonable, improper, destructive regulations which will prevent our having free access, in and out, over the Stikine River, so far as it runs through American territory. Under this treaty we have the right to navigate the rivers named for the purpose of commerce, "subject to any laws or regulations of either country within its own territory, not inconsistent with the privileges of free navigation." Now, any regulation which unreasonably and unnecessarily hampers the commerce of this country—it goes without saying that anything which would render it impossible for us to enjoy free navigation for the purpose of commerce, such as those hon. gentlemen opposite are worrying their minds about—would be an absolute infraction of the plain terms of that treaty, as written upon the face of it, because it would, in the very terms of the treaty, be "inconsistent with the privilege of free navigation."

Mr. Caleb Cushing, who knew a great deal about the Washington Treaty, and wrote a book on the subject, and who appeared, I think, for the American Government, before the Geneva Convention, has interpreted for us what that means. He says, "that the reservation of the right to make regulations which are not to be inconsistent with the rights of free navigation, is simply a reservation of the rights of local police and regulation. 'Local police and regulation are reserved to each government.'"

Now, I do not think we need to fear any bona fide exercise of the right of local police and regulation by the United States Government in reference to the River Stikine, or any other river over which we might have the right of navigation under article 26 of the Washington Treaty. In any case, I contend that the Government were right in going ahead and assuming that we have the right of free navigation for commercial purposes of the Stikine River. But suppose that we have not, is it suggested by anybody what we should do about it? What is it that they now suggest we should do about it? I notice that our friends on the other side, in reference to all other subjects in which we come into collision, or conflict, or difference, with the United States, always assume an extremely lofty, patriotic, Canadian, national position. They are Jingo of the first water. But now, when it comes to this particular question—I suppose because it suits the exigencies of the argument in which they are engaged for the moment—they not only drop all their Jingo positions, abandon all their patriotic and national principles, but adopt a policy which can only be described as the “policy of scuttle.” Because there is danger of some regulations being made by the United States Government which would in some way hamper our commerce, make it less convenient than it was before or than it ought to be, they propose if I understand them, that we should abandon our rights over the Stikine River, and simply vacate the premises. Is that the position they take? Do they want us to abandon practically, to all intents and purposes, the right which is given us of free commerce over that river by article 26 of the Washington Treaty? I am at a loss to understand what is the force of the argument that has been made with reference to this branch of the question, on the other side, unless it comes to that. If their contention means anything, it means that, because there may be some risk, because we do not know just what sort of regulations the United States may make, because they may stretch the exercise of their authority and go beyond what they really have a right to do, and make regulations they have no international right to make, and which would be in practical violation of the treaty, it seems to be the suggestion of hon. gentlemen opposite, if it amounts to anything, that we should practically abandon the rights of navigation given us in reference to the Stikine River by the treaty. That is the logical, legitimate result of the argument on that branch of the case which has been made from the other side of the House. If that is going to be done, I do not see where you are going to draw the line, because, if we are going to assume that the United States will exercise a power which they have no right to exercise, and which there is, I trust, no reasonable probability that they will exercise, in a way which that treaty does not give them the right to exercise it, so as to practically nullify by their regulations the rights given us by the terms of the treaty itself, then I ask you where are you going to draw the line? Why might you not as well argue that there is no sense in our building a railway from Fort Simpson to Teslin Lake, because who knows but the United States may claim that their boundary is east of where we say it is, and may include in the Alaskan territory what we claim is in ours? Is it not a logical extension of the argument made on the other side, that because the Americans may exercise at Fort Wrangel a power which they really have not under the treaty, to hamper our commerce and prevent our enjoying the free navigation of the Yukon, we must abandon that project and build elsewhere, to go still further and say that we cannot safely exercise the right of building a railway within even what we consider to be our own territory, because these barbarous uncivilized Americans—for that is the argument—this people which knoweth not the law, which will not obey the law, which will not keep its treaties—this is the statement from the other side—not ruin—will claim the territory on which we have built as their own and nullify our action? It would be an act, I say, of poltroonery on the part of any Government to assume for a moment that we do not enjoy the rights of free navigation which the Treaty of Washington undoubtedly gives us on the Stikine River, or to act in such a way as to show a belief that we cannot safely exercise them.

I shall not offer any further remarks on that branch of the subject, except to summarize what I have endeavoured to say on the matter. There is no doubt in my mind that, previously to the negotiation of the Washington Treaty, there was every reason to suppose we could hold the United States to the declaration made by Charles Sumner, when the cession of that country was made to the United States—that, when the treaty between Russia and Great Britain constituted a servitude over the then Russian, and afterwards American, territory in favour of the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, that servitude continued, notwithstanding the cession. I say, that we were then in an undoubted and impregnable position to make that contention with reference to the rights of navigation, whether by virtue of the Russian Treaty itself or the general principle which the Americans themselves had insisted upon, as the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) explained, and as Mr. Sumner admitted.

I say we stood then in an impregnable position, a position which secured our right to the navigation for all innocent purposes of the Stikine River, which is the river in question, and any other river that flows from British territory through Alaska into the Pacific Ocean. It may by some be considered possible, and was, I believe, considered by the Crown officers to be certain that the effect of the Washington Treaty was to curtail the rights we possessed under the previous treaty, and that we must take what the Washington Treaty gives us and no more, and that our rights to-day are very different from what the original treaty, not mixed and muddled and interfered with by the Washington Treaty, would have given us. If that is the position of the matter it is the duty of this Government to do what they can to restore the condition of things that existed before the Washington Treaty was negotiated, or rather to have the Washington Treaty read, not as a substitution for the article of the treaty of 1825, but to have it read as an article which makes an affirmative statement, but contains no privative words to take away anything given us by the previous treaty. That is a reading that could have been given to the Washington Treaty, though it was never intended by the statesmen by whom it was negotiated. I have already said that this is going to be an uphill piece of work. But this Government is used to doing uphill pieces of work, and doing them well. There was a time when we thought the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties was an uphill piece of work. It could not be done at all when our friends on the other side were in power, but we find that things can be done now that could not be done before, and it is possible that a new turn may be given to this matter just as was done in the case of the German and Belgian treaties.

Now I come to a point not at all so interesting, to myself at any rate, as the matters I have been dealing with.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I would like to ask him one question. For the purposes of commerce what distinction does he make between the rights given by the Treaty of St. Petersburg and those given by the Treaty of Washington? It will come down to this, I think, whether or not the right to make regulations mentioned in the Treaty of Washington would not be as effectively implied in the Treaty of St. Petersburg. Of course, my hon. friend will understand I have no desire to interrupt his argument, but I am simply asking for information.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am not at all sure that, for the purposes of commerce pure and simple, the Washington Treaty is not as good as the other. But, for other purposes, such as sending in the mounted police or bringing down prisoners, as was the exact and specific question when the case was discussed by the Crown officers, I am afraid that there will be found a great, an alarming difference between the Treaty of Washington and the treaty that preceded it.

Now, I am not sure that I was able to follow accurately the argument of my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) as to some difficulties in connection with this contract. If I followed him correctly, he attempted to make the point that there was danger, under section 10 of this contract, that the contractors would be able to come in and demand back their $250,000 deposit before they had fully completed their work, when they only had the rails laid in such a manner as would permit the interim operation of the railway, so to speak, although the whole work was not fully completed. I think that contention will not be upheld by any person who reads the contract fairly. This is what it says:

10. The contractors shall, within ten days after the execution hereof, deposit with the Government, in cash or approved cash security, the sum of $250,000 as security that the railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake, hereby contracted for, will be completed and equipped in accordance with the terms hereof, and on such railway being completed and equipped and accepted as hereinbefore specified, the said sum or security shall be returned to the contractors, or to whom they may—

And so on. Now, what does that mean—"when completed and equipped in accordance to the terms thereof"? I should say that that means that when it is completed as described in the first part of section 1, viz.: "up to the general standard and gauge of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway in British Columbia, and according to specification to be approved by the Minister of Railways. Provided also that the said railway shall be the property of the contractor, but shall be subject to inspection and approval by an engineer to be named by the Minister of Railways and Canals before being accepted as complete by the Government."

I should say that all these things were conditions precedent to the right of the contractors to recover back their deposit. But the hon. gentleman says: Ah, yes, but then you read further:

Provided further, that for the purposes of the season of 1898 and of complying with the requirements of this contract in respect to the completion of the line on or before the first of September, it shall be sufficient if, on or before that date, the contractors have the rails laid in such a manner as will permit of regular and efficient operation of the railway, although the whole work be not fully completed.

Now, surely, any person reading that, I think particularly any legal practitioner reading that, would say that what it means is simply this: We say to the contractors: you are bound under this contract to have this road fully completed on the 1st September, 1898; nevertheless, we will excuse you if, for the purpose of the season of 1898, you have the rails laid in such a manner as to permit the regular and efficient operation of the railway, even though the whole work be not fully completed. In other words, if that railway is sufficiently equipped for the kind of operation we describe, though not a full performance of your contract, though not such as to entitle you to recover your deposit or to claim that you have earned the consideration named in the contract, nevertheless we shall regard that as sufficient fulfilment of the contract to excuse you from any action for default. I think that is the reading to which my learned friend and colleague from Halifax would give to the contract.

Now I believe that this was the only serious legal contention which my hon. friend made with reference to the contract and with reference to the contractors' company. But he went on to make some suggestions, that by virtue of the borrowing powers given in this statute it was quite possible for this company to get a large amount of money from English capitalists. Well, I am sure that I for one seriously object, in view of all the cares and responsibilities that members of this House have upon them in the discharge of their ordinary and extraordinary duties, I should seriously object to being asked to lie awake at night worrying my brain over the dangers to English capitalists who may be asked to put money into this enterprise. English capitalists are coming to learn how to look after themselves, and if they do not know how to look after themselves, I do not think that we need worry ourselves to take extraordinary measures to guard them from the results of their own indiscretion.

An hon. MEMBER. What about the monopoly?

Mr. RUSSELL. As to the so-called monopoly clause, so far as the hon. member refers to the power to build the road, I understood the Minister of the Interior to say that at present there is no monopoly, that there is already in existence a charter under which a road could be made substantially over the same ground as this very road which is being chartered by the Bill before the House. But what is the vice of a monopoly of that kind, a monopoly of carrying power? What is the essential, the cardinal, vice which attaches to a monopoly of that sort? I take it that the principal danger to be apprehended in creating a monopoly of that kind is the danger of extortion, and I utterly fail to see how it is possible for any railway company to be guilty of extortion if its rates are absolutely under the control of the Governor General in Council. The Governor in Council is absolutely under the control of this House, and this House is under the control of the people of this country, so that there is in the last analysis a controlling popular sovereignty with respect to the rates to be imposed upon the carriage of persons and goods over that railway; and under those circumstances I fail to understand where the word monopoly can be used in reference to this part of the contract. Now, as to the suggested land monopoly, I take my views in respect of that from the hon. leader of the Opposition, who gave them very distinctly and in a thoroughly statesmanlike manner, in an interview which I believe he has never repudiated, and from which I got my first impressions with reference to the merits of this particular transaction. The question of land monopoly was dealt with the other day by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), and he showed very clearly, and with great ability indeed, the marked contrast between this so-called monopoly and the kind of monopoly under which the North-west Territories and the interior part of this continent are suffering. He showed that there is an absolute and direct contrast between the two things. There, the labour of the person who cultivates the land, who puts his own brains, his own money, and his own toil into the development of the country, goes to enhance the wealth of the company to whom the monopoly is given. Here, the absolute contradictory of that exists. Everybody knows it, every hon. gentleman on the other side of the House sees it, that the Government lands which lie between the lands given to the company under this Bill, are the lands which are increased in value, the lands to which any possible value is given by the prospecting work of the company, and by the developing work of the company created under this Bill. The persons who put their money into the business of developing these gold areas belonging to the company, whether they be great or small, rich or poor, in that territory, are giving value to the Government lands. Therefore the very opposite exists with reference to this contract, to that which exists in the monopoly created by the railway legislation of past Governments.

Mr. DAVIN. Do I understand my hon. friend to say that there is a distinction between the way these sections are given in the Klondike and the way they are given in the North-west?

Mr. RUSSELL. No, I did not say that at all. I said there was all the difference in the world in the way they would work. If the hon. gentleman requires any further light upon that, I will refer him to the very admirable interview which was given by the leader of the Opposition to the representatives of Montreal and Toronto papers a short time ago, where he pointed out the very thing I am pointing out now. I have not the article under my hand and cannot quote it word for word, but he showed that one of the strong points about this contract was, that the Government lands lying between the areas which are given to the company, would be improved in value by the work which was being done by the company on their own lands, or by persons who lease or purchase lands from them.

Mr. DAVIN. I would like to have the hon. gentleman explain that. Does he say that any miner can go in upon land belonging to the Government and take it precisely on the same conditions that he can take land to-day?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, I presume he can. The hon. member who was mistaken for the ex-Minister of Railways the other day (Mr. Wallace), explained this to us thoroughly. He showed how, under the operation of this Bill, these contractors would be sending prospectors all over that country to discover where the gold was, to bring it to light and mine it, and by so doing they would develop these areas, would make that territory valuable which is not valuable now, because the values are concealed and not discovered. Every discovery they make will enhance the value of Government land alongside. I suppose that in a sense the Klondike is no more valuable to-day than it was a thousand years ago, although everybody knows that it is worth hundreds of thousands, I suppose millions of dollars more than it was a while ago. Why? Simply because gold that was always there previously has been brought to light. In the same way by the operation of this Bill, the hidden wealth of that territory will be still further brought to light, and brought to light at the expense of the company. Value will be given to it at the expense of the company and the Government, for every gold area which that company discovers, will have an area alongside of it three miles square, on which it can settle down, with which it can do, if it chooses, what any individual miner can do, mine it on its own account—though I do not recommend that, or, according to a suggestion which has been made, which may not be so objectionable as most people would consider it, can pay with the values thus developed our national debt.

Mr. DAVIN. Does my hon. friend not know that that argument is precisely the one that was used for giving land in the North-west Territories, namely, that the railway would go in, and that it would enhance the value of the land, that it would have an interest in settling this new land and thereby increase the value to the Government?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, but at the expense of the settlers.

Mr. DAVIN. This will be at the expense of the miners.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is exactly what I thought the hon. gentleman would say. It is at the expense of Mackenzie & Mann, is it not? Are they not the miners at whose expense this work of development will be done? My hon. friend surely will not shake his head at that. Yes, I do say that this is going to be exactly as it was with reference to those railway lands. These lands are going to be developed and made valuable at a tremendous expense which nobody that I know of is willing to undertake now, except Mackenzie & Mann.

There were one or two other subjects with which I intended to deal, but in the many practical speeches delivered on the subject it has been so thoroughly threshed out, especially in the masterly address made by the Minister of the Interior and the speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture, who explained thoroughly the working of the provisions as to the alternate system of blocks, that there is nothing left for me to add, even if I were capable of following in the steps of those hon. gentlemen who understand the matter so thoroughly and who presented it so fully and clearly to the House. I think the bonanza which the contractors are to receive may be very extravagantly overrated. Everything depends, as regards the result of this contract, upon the amount that can be realized from operating and developing the areas of lands obtained by the contractors. It is very easy to overrate that value. Any person who will visit the gold districts in the province from which I come will find there on a small scale a condition which it is entirely possible may happen here on a large scale to the contractors, Mackenzie & Mann. Every one knows something with respect to these speculative fevers which come over the financial world, like the South Sea Bubble, and schemes of that kind, which are liable to be entirely exploded in twelve or eighteen months, within which time the public mind is disillusioned. Let us conceive it possible that instead of Mackenzie & Mann becoming responsible and taking the risk of this Yukon undertaking, the Government had entered upon the work and built the railway at an expenditure of three or four million dollars—I do not know what the expenditure will be, but even this expenditure in my opinion may be enormously under-estimated, as in the case of a man building a house the total expenditure of which is estimated at $4,000, but the cost when finished reaches $6,000. It may very well occur, owing to the serious difficulties to be overcome and the fact that nearly every man going there to work on the railway will find something more attractive or will go into speculating on his own account, that enormously high wages will have to be paid and the work will be prosecuted amid constant strikes. When all these circumstances and conditions are taken into account, it would be altogether likely that the Government would find, as Mackenzie & Mann may before they complete the contract, that they themselves will be in a situation on a large scale similar to that which I have seen in various places in Nova Scotia on a smaller scale. In my province men have gone into districts where there were supposed to be enormously rich deposits, they have sunk shafts and erected large crushing mills with many stamps, and after running for some time the bottom has tumbled out of the whole enterprise, and a large and valueless property has been left on their hands, for which no return can be obtained in any market. Is it not possible that these contractors may meet with an experience on a large scale such as miners in my province have sometimes met with on a small scale, and may have a large and unproductive property on their hands? It is very much, as described by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a gamble, in which Mackenzie & Mann are bound to meet the loss, if there is any, and if a gain results, the Government cannot fail to reap the benefit of it.

Mr. McINERNEY. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to intervene in the discussion at this stage or at this time, but as no hon. member seems disposed to go on at present I will undertake to say what I have to say on this important subject now. I have said "on this important subject," because I am bold to state that I do not believe this Parliament will have under discussion and for deliberation any subject of greater importance than the one now under consideration. I may be permitted right here to congratulate the Government in one sense upon the introduction of this measure. It is not a new scheme when one is desirous of having his past record forgotten to try and obscure his surrounding by a grand boom; and this Government, anxious to destroy its record, and anxious to have its record forgotten on the free trade question, anxious to have its unfulfilled promises and broken pledges wiped out entirely from the minds of the electors, anxious to have the pledges that it made to the French people of the province of Quebec on the Manitoba school question forgotten, anxious to have that erased from the minds of the people of that great province and from the minds of the people of the Dominion of Canada—this Government has endeavoured in this matter to drag a red herring across the track and to seek escape in this way from all their broken pledges and unfulfilled promises. The line I intend to follow in the remarks I have to offer on this subject will be first to endeavour to discuss the speeches that have been made by hon. members on the other side who have preceded me, and some very important and very able and eloquent speeches have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have received a large amount of instruction, some amusement and considerable pleasure from the remarks which have fallen from those hon. gentlemen. But I was somewhat surprised, I must admit, at the speech we have just heard from the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). I had always understood, and the reputation that gentleman enjoys in the provinces down by the sea justified the conclusion I had held, that the hon. member for Halifax was a very distinguished lawyer in his own province, and I had hoped he would have given us some ground for that distinction in the speech he would deliver on the constitutional phase of the question now before the House. I understand the hon. gentleman is a professor of law in Dalhousie University; but it is the first time I ever knew a professor of law not to have an opinion on any question. Practising lawyers will sometimes tell you that they do not care about giving an opinion on every question asked them, but professors of law have always an opinion ready at hand on any legal question you may put to them; and I am free to say, while I never had the pleasure of sitting at the feet of the Gamaliel of Dalhousie University, those of us who have had the pleasure of listening to the Washburns, the Fosters, the Thomases, the Paynes in the great universities of the United States have always found them ready and willing to advance an opinion upon any question that might be asked. I am surprised, therefore, that the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Russell) has not ventured to give us an opinion upon the question that was asked him from this side of the House. He was asked the plain question: "Do you believe that the treaty of 1871, entered into between the United States and England, curtailed in any degree the rights that England had as to the navigation of the rivers flowing into the Pacific Ocean, as against the rights that England had in these same rivers under the treaty of 1895?" The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) was not prepared to give an opinion upon that question, in contradistinction to the Minister of the Interior the other night, who very innocently, it seemed to me, gave away the whole position. When the hon. member from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked the Minister (Mr. Sifton) the same question that was put to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) to-night, the Minister of the Interior, a responsible member of this Government, made the strange admission that the treaty of 1871 curtailed the rights that England had under the treaty of 1825. If that had come from an irresponsible member of this House—I mean by that a man who has not the responsibility of governing the country directly as a member of the Ministry has—it might be excused; but at this critical moment, at this crucial time, for a member of the Administration, and an important member of it such as the Minister of the Interior is, to make such an admission as that, is to my mind very unfortunate, to say the least of it.

In taking up the discussion of the question to which the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) directed his attention particularly, it will be wise in order to a proper and clear understanding, that the treaties should be in our hands. But, before I go into a discussion of that part of the subject I wish to call attention to an inconsistent statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell). In one part of his speech he said: "I am of the opinion that our rights to the navigation of the Stikine still remain in force, and can be insisted upon," and right afterwards he made use of these words: "The reckless abandonment of our rights by Sir John Macdonald in the treaty of 1871 is to be regretted." I ask my hon. friend how, if in his opinion our rights to the navigation of the Stikine still exist, and can be insisted upon, how he can blame Sir John Macdonald for the reckless abandonment of our rights in that same treaty? If our rights remain, how could they have been abandoned; if our rights to the free navigation of the Stikine under the treaty of 1871 still remain (and that is the opinion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell), then how can he blame Sir John Macdonald for giving those rights away? The inconsistent position of my hon. friend arises from this fact: he is anxious to make a case against the Conservative party; Sir John Macdonald was the respected leader of the Conservative party for many years, and so, on the one hand, my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) will argue that Sir John Macdonald, by the treaty of 1871, abandoned Canadian and British rights; while at the same time he (Mr. Russell) is driven to this strange inconsistency, that to support the position his Government must take on this question, he must hold that all the rights that England ever had upon these rivers with regard to navigation still exist. That is a strange inconsistency in the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Russell).

Now, to the proper understanding of the rights that England and Canada possessed in the Stikine and other rivers, of what was formerly known as Alaska, I have in my hand the different paragraphs of the treaties of 1825, the treaties of 1856 and 1859, and the treaty of 1871. The third paragraph of the treaty of 1825 entered into on the 28th February of that year, devotes itself entirely to explain the line of demarcation between the two countries, between Russian America, the possessions that Russia had on the north-western coast of America; and the possessions that England had in that vicinity. I must say, that so far the paragraph has not been read in full, and I think it should be on record.

Line of demarcation, commencing at southernmost point of the island, called Prince of Wales Island, which point lies in the parallel of 54° 40' N. latitude and between the 131st and 133rd degrees of W. longitude (Greenwich). The said line shall ascend to the north along the channel called Portland Channel as far as the point of the continent where it strikes the 56th degree N. latitude; from this last mentioned point, the line of demarcation shall follow the summit of the mountains situated parallel to the coast as far as the point of intersection of the 141st degree W. longitude (same meridian), and finally, from the said point of intersection the said meridian line, 141st degree, in its prolongation as far as the frozen ocean shall form the limits between the Russian and British possessions on the continent of America to the north-west.

The next paragraph, 4, is:

4. Island called Prince of Wales shall belong wholly to Russia.

2nd. That whenever the summit of the mountains which extend in a direction parallel to the coast, from 56th degrees N. latitude to the point of intersection of 141st degree shall prove to be at a distance of more than ten marine leagues from the ocean, the limit between British possessions and the line of coast which is to belong to Russia as aforesaid, shall be formed by a line parallel to the windings of the coast and which shall never exceed the distance of ten marine leagues therefrom.

Paragraph 6, which is very important, is:

6. It is understood that the subjects of His Britannic Majesty from whatever quarter they may arrive, whether from the ocean or from the interior of the continent, shall for ever enjoy the right of navigating freely, and without any hindrance whatever, all the rivers and streams which in their course towards the Pacific Ocean may cross the line of demarcation upon the line of coast described in article 3 of the present convention.

And, Sir, I make bold to give this interpretation of that clause: that the rivers that are included within the clause are the rivers that flow towards the coast, between meridian 141 and the lower point of the island mentioned as belonging to Russia. It is perhaps not wise for one to interpret matters of this kind and to make an admission that may be against national interests, but I do not think that in this case the admission will, because on other grounds we have the right that my admission in this instance might give away. I do not believe that article 6 of the treaty of 1825 gave us the right in itself to the navigation of the Yukon or the Porcupine rivers. Why? Because the Yukon River and the Porcupine River crossed the line of demarcation from the starting point of meridian 141 to the frozen ocean, more than half way between the Pacific and the Arctic Sea. But it does not cross the line of demarcation towards the coast; and the Porcupine, flowing from the water-shed of the Mackenzie in a south-westerly direction towards the Yukon, enters it after it passes the line of demarcation known as meridian 141. I wish to call attention to paragraph 9 of the treaty of 1825, because I think it is important, by which the liberty of commerce is restricted:

Liberty of commerce shall not apply to trade in spirituous liquors, firearms or other arms, gunpowder, or other stores.

So that, in the provisions of that treaty, liberty of commerce is restricted with regard to these articles. Now, Sir, I will place side by side with the paragraph of the treaty of 1825, which I have read, paragraph 26 of the treaty of 1871: and right here I want to make the statement that it seemed to me to be the height of the ridiculous that a young member of this Administration, a young man from the wild and woolly west, as he said himself, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), should undertake to charge with ignorance and negligence the men who were engaged in the drawing up of the treaty of 1871—Earl Gray, the Earl of Ripon, Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir Edward Thornton and Sir John Macdonald, men whose names have become historic. This hon. gentleman undertook to charge against their memory that they were negligent of the interests of their country, and surrendered the interests of England and the rights of Canada in that treaty.

Mr. DAVIN. He said they had not read the treaty.

Mr. McINERNEY. Paragraph 26 of the treaty of 1871 is as follows :—

The St. Lawrence River ascending and descending, from the 45th parallel north latitude, where it ceases to form the boundary between the two countries, shall for ever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of Great Britain or of the Dominion of Canada not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation. The navigation of the rivers Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine, ascending and descending, from, to and into the sea, shall for ever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty and to the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of either country within its own territory not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

Sir, I make this statement, that the treaty of 1871 gives us much larger rights on the rivers of Alaska than the treaty of 1825. It clears away, at least, any doubt that ever existed as to our rights on the Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine rivers previous to 1871, and that was the object of mentioning these rivers. These were the important rivers of the country. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) was asked by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) to name one other river that flowed across the line of demarcation along the coast from British territory into United States territory, and he was unable to do so. The map is here, and on looking at it I find rivulets and small streams flowing there; but up to the present time I have not been able to obtain any information that would lead me to the conclusion that any other river of any importance flows across the line of demarcation between the two countries. The Stikine River was the important river on the coast; therefore, if there was any doubt as to England, or Canada, having the right to navigate the Stikine River, that doubt was removed when the treaty of 1871 expressly stated that England and Canada should have the right to navigate that river, as well as the Yukon and the Porcupine. So I take this position, and I recommend it to the members of the Government, in opposition to the position of the hon. Minister of the Interior—that our rights on the Stikine River have not been curtailed by the treaty of 1871. I believe the members of the Government will take, and have already taken, that position, and I here challenge any of those hon. gentlemen to get up in this House from this time forward and repeat the words of the hon. Minister of the Interior. I challenge any one of them to make the admission that our rights in regard to the navigation of the Stikine River have been curtailed by the treaty of 1871. They will not do it; there is not a member of the Administration who will do it, and I believe in my heart that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) is not honestly of that opinion.

Mr. RUSSELL. What opinion do you mean?

Mr. McINERNEY. I mean that any of our rights with regard to the navigation of the Stikine River were not curtailed by the treaty of 1871.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would like to ask my hon. friend: Suppose Peter Martin had not been landed on the coast of what is now Alaska, from the Stikine River, whether, if it had not been for the Treaty of Washington, of 1871—

Mr. McINERNEY. My hon. friend has a peculiar way of answering a question. They say it is an Irish way of answering a question, to ask another. I have asked my hon. friend a question, and he turns round to ask me another one.

Mr. RUSSELL. I will answer. I say, without any hesitation at all, that my impression at least—I submit it with all modesty—is, that if the Home authorities had been acting independently of the treaty of 1871, and if it had not been for the accidental circumstance of Peter Martin being landed, instead of being carried down the Stikine River, they would not have recommended his surrender to the American authorities, because they would have claimed that they had a perfect right to navigate the Stikine River through American territory, and that the prisoner would not have become a free man by reason of going over American territory. But since the treaty of 1871, the right of navigation on that river was curtailed to purely commercial purposes, and consequently they were obliged to surrender the prisoner. That is my impression, which I give with all modesty.

Mr. McINERNEY. My hon. friend had, of course, previously expressed the opinion that our rights were curtailed; but I claim that there is no member of the Administration who will take that view with him hereafter. I think it is an unpatriotic and a foolish position for the Government to assume in the face of the enemy on an important question of this kind, to admit before the struggle begins, that any of their rights have been taken away.

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not admit that they had been taken away. I said that the Home authorities admitted that they had been taken away.

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not deny that there are certain rights which, I believe, we never possessed on those rivers. There was no doubt at all about that. The treaty itself limits some of them by stating distinctly what some of those are. We never had the right of going over the Stikine or Yukon or any of those rivers with an armed force.

Mr. RUSSELL. Have we the right to bring a prisoner down and try him ?

Mr. McINERNEY. Does my hon. friend believe we had the right of taking an armed force up those rivers before the treaty of Washington ?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is not the question. It is not the question of taking an armed force which I put to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. gentleman evades my question, although it is a simple one to answer. When he does get on his feet to answer a question I put him, I would like to have an answer to that and not have him evade it by putting another.

Mr. RUSSELL. I was asking a question.

Mr. McINERNEY. The treaty of 1825 was of course abrogated by the Crimean War, but the treaty of 1856—the treaty of Paris—renewed, at least, by implication, the terms and conditions of the treaty of 1825. However, the treaty of St. Petersburg, passed on the 12th of January, 1859, between Great Britain and Russia, renewed in article 19 fully and specifically all the rights held under the treaty of 1825 :

In regard to rivers, the navigation in the Russian possessions on the north-west coast of America, the convention concluded at St. Petersburg on the 16th February, 1825, will continue in force.

So that every right which we had under the treaty of 1825 was renewed by the treaty of St. Petersburg of 1859.

Now, I shall depart from that great question, which, after all, has become, in the latter part of the debate, of considerable importance, and proceed to make a few remarks upon some of the speeches made by prominent members of the other side. And the first gentleman that I shall speak of is the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher). That hon. gentleman, in reply to a question from the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart), said that the latter could not have read the regulation governing free mining in the Yukon, or he would have known that it was not necessary for a miner to go to a record office to get his claim recorded, but that any five miners could hold a miner's meeting, name a recorder, and have their claims recorded on the spot. The hon. gentleman stopped there, leaving the inference to be drawn that that could be done in any part of the territory. But that is not the case, because regulation 23 provides :

In the event of the claim being more than a hundred miles from a recorder's office, and situated where other claims are being located, the free miners, not less than five in number, are authorized to meet and appoint one of their number a 'free miners' recorder,' who shall act in that capacity until a mining recorder is appointed by the Gold Commissioner.

What is there to prevent Mackenzie & Mann from rendering that clause in the mining regulations entirely useless. You can place ten recording offices in the Yukon territory, and there will not be one of them which cannot be reached within a hundred miles from any claim ; and these contractors will see to it, I apprehend, that this Government will have recorders placed at such positions, that every free miner shall be within 100 miles from a recorder's office. In that way, while a free miner is wending his way on foot to record his claim at a recorder's office, perhaps nearly a hundred miles distant, these contractors, with superior facilities for travel, will have one of their agents cover the distance in half the time and get at the office and have the claim recorded before the free miner can possibly get there or know anything about it.

I began to think that the hon. Minister of Agriculture might be well fitted for the office when he began to talk about navigating and navigation laws. Why, for an hon. gentleman in this House to stand up and say that flat bottom barges, such as you can tow up the Stikine River—which at times during the summer season has a depth of not more than 26 inches, I am informed—when the hon. gentleman says that flat bottom barges which can be towed up a river of that description, can be towed from Vancouver or Victoria with perfect safety any time of the year—999 days out of a 1,000 some one behind him interpolated—

Mr. DOMVILLE. He never said that.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. Minister, if here, will not deny it, and I do know that the hon. gentleman who interrupts me was here when the Minister made the statement to which I refer.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I say in contradiction to my hon. friend on the other side, that what the hon. Minister said, was that it could be towed from Fort Simpson up to Wrangel.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. gentleman is mistaken because I took down the words of the Minister of Agriculture. What he said was this :

Flat boats and whalebacks can be towed from Victoria or Vancouver to Glenora without any transshipment at Wrangel.

These are the words of the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Not 999 days out of a 1,000.

Mr. McINERNEY. Somebody on that side said that. I think it was the Minister of Public Works.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He said it could be done at certain seasons.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville), who knows what a ship is and what the sea is, knows that that is a perfectly absurd statement. Any man whoever saw the sea or a ship, knows that statement is perfectly absurd. Why, to tell anyone engaged in commerce on the Atlantic Coast that they could tow a barge, drawing not more than 26 inches of water, from Pictou or Summerside or Charlottetown up through the Gulf of St. Lawrence into the St. Lawrence River, would be to cover yourself with ridicule. Well, there is not so great a distance between the most northern part of Prince Edward Island and the most southern part of Newfoundland as there is between Graham Island and Moresby Island and Vancouver. By this scale and on this map, I should say that the width of the sea between the most northern point of Vancouver and the most southern point of Moresby Island is about 150 miles, and the width of the sea at Dixon's Entrance, between the Prince of Wales Island and Graham Island, is about sixty miles. Nobody would deny that the distance between the most southern point of Newfoundland and the most northern point of Prince Edward Island is not as great as between Moresby Island and Vancouver. And there is no part of the Atlantic Ocean where the seas sweep with greater force than they do in that district. Any navigator of the Atlantic Ocean would simply laugh to scorn any man and would say he might make a fit Minister of Agriculture, who would dare to suggest to him that he should tow barges drawing 26 inches of water from Pictou or Summerside or Charlottetown to the Gulf of St. Lawrence and to the River St. Lawrence. I am informed that the Pacific Ocean, at that particular spot, is just as bad as the Atlantic. It is a wilder sea. It has been named the "Grave-yard of the Pacific," I know not for what reason. But along the outer coast of Graham Island and Moresby Island. I am told is the graveyard of the Pacific. One of the worst places to cross in the whole Pacific is Dixon's Entrance, which is only 60 miles wide. It would have to be crossed by these barges from Vancouver and Victoria on their way to Wrangel or Glenora.

There was one other statement worthy of mention—and only one other to my mind—made by the Minister of Agriculture. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) with keen criticism had shown that these contractors, under this contract, could get 24 miles along a fine mineral bearing stream. The Minister of Agriculture came down with a suggestion that he said had been proposed by the Government and agreed to by Mr. Mackenzie, that of the added blocks on either side, the alternate blocks should go to the Government. And so we have two amendments to this wonderful Bill before it has even got into committee. Under the criticism of the leader of the Opposition the Government have agreed that the contract shall be hedged about with such security that only British subjects shall remain in control of the monopoly. That is the first amendment. In the next place, in the case of the three blocks added on either side of a chosen block, the Government is to be allowed the alternate sections, just as in other cases.

Now I wish for a few moments to turn my attention to the speech which has been generally regarded as the strongest speech from the Government standpoint—that made by the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). When that speech was concluded one would have thought from the exultant looks on the faces of hon. members opposite, that the Government would rest its case there; and I am free to infer that that is what they intended to do. But from the renewed attack that was made upon their Bill, which is vulnerable at every point, they were forced to put up since that time three different members to defend it. The speech of the hon. Minister of the Interior was remarkable in some respects. It would have been strange if the Minister to whose department this matter particularly belongs had not made himself acquainted with the conditions of the Yukon district, and if he should not have found out more than other men who have only the ordinary avenues of information could possibly know on subjects relating to that district and this contract. He spoke for four hours and twenty-five minutes by the clock, and he devoted four hours to defending propositions that had not been attacked and twenty-five minutes to the Bill itself. He said that it was urgent that the contract should be made. Nobody has contended that there was not great urgency. He claimed also that the route was the best that could be chosen, a point that had not been very much questioned. And for four hours he devoted himself valiantly to defending positions that had not been seriously attacked; but in defence of the contract itself he only spent twenty-five minutes. As to the matter of urgency, I think that, even with all the time he took to defend it, he left it still open to attack. He told us that Mr. Ogilvie's report, received at the close of last session, had given some small and vague idea of the value of the gold finds in that country and had foreshadowed an influx of people into it. Now, Sir, I have here the report of Mr. Ogilvie issued in 1897, a report that came into the hands of this Government shortly after we left here last session—at least it was put into my hands shortly after the close of the session, and it is dated 1897. I lost the copy I had received, and I thought when I came to Ottawa to obtain another. I went to the distribution office and was told that there was none there, and was referred to the Department of the Interior. I went there but there was not a copy left. I have here a copy which I got from the library, the only place in Ottawa where you can get a copy of this wonderful report issued in 1897. A peculiar thing is, that in this book of 1897 every report from the Yukon is dated, whereas in the report which is put into our hands to-day there is not a date, and one is apt to infer that it is this report of Mr. Ogilvie upon which the Government is acting, issued in 1898 and received shortly before we came to Ottawa, and the report of 1897 is entirely ignored. Interlarded in this report of 1898 you will find views that were taken in 1898, and they are opposite text that relates to 1896, misleading and intended to mislead members of the House and the country into the belief that the information as to the vast gold-bearing areas of the Klondike and the Yukon district was only received from Mr. Ogilvie in 1898, when, as a matter of fact, the report which is like this in almost every particular was received in 1897, and I have a copy of it here.

Mr. DAVIN. The Minister of the Interior says that he gave one to the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) last session, and I got one in July.

Mr. McINERNEY. What does Mr. Ogilvie say in the report received twenty months ago about the richness of that country. From page 39 to the end at page 62, almost every line is taken up with expressions regarding the richness of every part of that country. At page 39, he says :

It is probable that we have not less than 1,400 miles of stream in our part of the district, on all of which gold can be found.

Then he refers to the Teslinto River :

Between it and Big Salmon River six other locations were met with. One of them, named Cassiar Bar, was worked in the season of 1896, by a party of four, who took out $6,000 in thirty days. They were working there when I passed in 1887, but stated that all they could get that season was $10 per day, and that it was then (3rd August) about worked out.

Then again, at page 40 :

I have heard the amount of gold taken off Stewart River in 1885 and 1886 estimated at various amounts. One estimate was $300,000.

On page 41, he says :

Big and Little Salmon rivers have also been prospected, with the usual result, that more or less gold has been found everywhere. I think it may with confidence be asserted that rich finds will yet be made of both coarse gold and gold-bearing quartz. It is not likely in the nature of things that such a vast extent of country should have all its fine gold deposited as sediment, brought from a distance in past ages of the world's development. If this is not the case, the matrix from which all the gold, from these streams has come, must still exist, in part at least, and will, no doubt, be discovered, and thus enrich this otherwise gloomy and desolate region.

At page 43 :

Stewart River was pretty well worked for two seasons, 1885-86, by about forty men, some of whom made at least $5,000. Assuming that they averaged half that amount, we have $100,000 of their earnings. The statement made by those of whom I inquired was that all who worked on the river for any length of time made a grub stake. Putting this at the lowest value I placed on it, $450, and assuming that 250 men made each this sum, we have $112,500 as the amount taken out on this stream. I have heard the sum placed at $130,000.

Then, a later report from Mr. Ogilvie, dated 4th September, 1895, says :

Coarse gold and excellent prospects have been found on the Hootalinqua and Teslin, and there will likely be a rush there next spring. I will report more fully on that in the future.

Here, on the 4th of September, 1895, Mr. Ogilvie reports that gold has been found as far down as the Hootalinqua, and found in paying quantities, and that there will be a rush there next spring. At page 51 he speaks of Miller Creek and Forty Mile :

These are two of the richest creeks yet found on the Yukon, and are both tributaries of Sixty-mile River. Both creeks are fully located and worked, each claim being 500 feet along the creek and the width of the valley or creek bed. There are nearly 100 claims, all of which pay well. One on Miller Creek, I understand, will yield $75,000 to $80,000 this season, and the owner will net, it is said, between $40,000 and $50,000.

On page 53 :

I am thoroughly convinced that the road from the coast to some point on the head waters of the river, preferably by the Taku—

And I call attention to this, that Mr. Ogilvie did not think the Stikine was the best route.

—preferably by the Taku, if at all practicable, would convert all our part of the river into a hive of industry.

In 1896 they had his report on that subject. Further on, he says :

I am very much pleased to be able to inform you that a most important discovery of gold has been made on a creek called Bonanza Creek, an affluent of the river known here as the Klondike.

That was written on the 6th September, 1896.

News has just arrived from Bonanza Creek that three men worked out $75 in four hours the other day, and a $12 nugget has been found, which assures the character of the ground, namely, coarse gold, and plenty of it, as three times this can be done with sluice boxes. You can fancy the excitement here. It is claimed that from $100 to $500 per day can be made off the ground that has been prospected so far. As we have about 100 claims on Glacier and Miller creeks, with 300 or 400 in this vicinity, next year it is imperative that men be sent in here to look after these claims. * * * I cannot here enter into reasons for it, but I unhesitatingly make the assertion that this corner of our territory from the coast strip down, and from the 141st meridian eastward, will be found to be a fairly rich and very extensive mining region.

Then he speaks of another creek, where he says :

On the same creek two men rocked out $75 in about four hours, and it is asserted that two men in the same creek took out $4,000 in two days with only two lengths of sluice boxes. They were new comers, and had not done much in the country, so the probabilities are that they got it on Bonanza Creek.

One man showed me $22.75 he took out in a few hours on Hunker Creek with a gold pan, prospecting his claim on the surface, taking a handful here and there as fancy suggested. The Indians have reported another creek, but farther up, which they call Too-much-gold Creek.

He says at page 58 :

In the line of these finds farther south is the Cassiar gold fields in British Columbia ; so the presumption is that we have in our territory along the easterly watershed of the Yukon, a gold-bearing belt of infinite width, and upwards of 300 miles long, exclusive of the British Columbia part of it.

He says this in a report dated in 1896. I am laying particular stress upon this, because I want to show that the Government had knowledge of the riches of that country long before they intimated to us that they knew that it would be urgent upon them to get some line of communication into it, as Mr. Ogilvie himself suggested over two years ago. He goes on to say :

Before closing, I may say that every report that comes in from Bonanza Creek is more encouraging than the last. Prospecting has only begun, and up to date of mailing, November 22, very rich prospects have been found on the few claims prospected on ; from $1 to the pan of dirt up to $12 are reported, and no bed rock found yet. This means from $1,000 to $12,000 per day per man sluicing.

On the 9th of December, 1896, he says :

Of course, that may be an exceptionally rich pan, but $5 to $7 per pan is the average on that claim, it is reported, with five feet of pay dirt, and the width yet undetermined, but it is known to be thirty feet even at that. Figure the result at nine to ten pans to the cubic foot, and 500 feet long ; nearly $4,000,000 at $5 per pan—one-fourth of this would be enormous.

On the 22nd of January, 1897 :

A quartz lode showing free gold in paying quantities has been located on one of the creeks, but I cannot yet send particulars. I am confident from the nature of the gold found in the creeks that many more of them, and rich, too, will be found.

On the 23rd of January, from Cudahy, he reports :

I have just heard from a reliable source that the quartz mentioned above is rich as tested—over $100 to the ton. The lode appears to run from three to eight feet in thickness, and is about nineteen miles from the Yukon River. I will likely be called on to survey it, and will be able to report fully.

Now, Sir, from all this I think it is fair to assume that in 1897 this Government was perfectly well acquainted with the fact that there was an enormous find of gold in the Yukon country, and that greater finds would likely take place in the near future, and it was important that they should have set themselves to work at once. My hon. friend from Assinibola (Mr. Davin) tells me that this report was in the hands of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), a supporter of the Government, during the session of 1897. I got it later on in the summer. Now, when the Government had this report in their hands at that time—and we do not know how long before—they come down now, in January, 1898, and say that they only found out a few weeks before the House met that there was an urgent necessity to build this road, and therefore they let the contract without tenders. I say that the Government is in a peculiar position in regard to that part of the case. Then, the Minister of the Interior made this peculiar admission. He said : How could I take Mr. Ogilvie's report at its face ? or words to that effect. How could Mr. Ogilvie, iced up in that northern country, know that there was going to be a rush of people in there in 1897-98 ? Well, the fact is, that Mr. Ogilvie did know : iced up there, as he was, thousands of miles from here, Mr. Ogilvie did know, and the Minister of the Interior, sitting in his office in Ottawa, did not know. The forecast of Mr. Ogilvie was proved by results to be substantially correct ; he knew what he was talking about, and the Minister of the Interior did not know his duty in that particular.

The Minister of the Interior proceeded, at a later part of his speech, to take the leader of the Opposition to task because he tried to point out to the Government some of the International difficulties in respect to the navigation of the Stikine that might confront them. The hon. Minister said that such a speech as that brought calamitous wars between nations. What is the conduct of this Government ? They have entered into a contract to build a railway, on Canadian territory it is true, the approach to which, however, is reached through American territory, and reached by a river the navigation of which is surrounded by a considerable amount of international difficulty ; and they have entered into that contract in such haste that they have not taken time to have a conference with the authorities at Washington to learn if some arrangement might not be arrived at by which all difficulties might be swept away. I rather think such conduct on the part of the Government is the conduct that courts international difficulties, and such speeches as that delivered by the leader of the Opposition are speeches that should warn the Government to avert such difficulties.

The Minister of the Interior made another strange, a miserable admission, I think, when he said that we could not have got into that country if the United States had not given us permission to send in the mounted police. That is a strange admission to come from a Minister of the Crown. Mr. Ogilvie's book is full of information regarding men who have gone from Edmonton, and who solitary and alone, have lived for over a year on the Mackenzie River, away from civilization. That country cannot be such a terrible country to live in or travel through as some hon. gentlemen try to make out it is. Then the hon. Minister, in defence of this measure, said that no Bill had been brought down by any Government since 1878 in which the railway rates had been specified. I know of no Bill—I may be wrong, but I make the statement—brought down since 1878 which has not been subject to the railway law of the country; but this Bill is particularly and specifically exempted from the action of the railway law by its provisions. There is a vast difference between Acts introduced since 1878, and which at the present time are subject to the railway law of the country, and a Bill like that now brought down which is rendered exempt and placed outside of the power of the railway law.

The hon. Minister then proceeded to devote considerable attention to the various routes to the Yukon country. I am not here to-night to advocate any particular route. I hold no brief in favour of any particular route to that country; but I must say this, that it has not been made plain to me by any evidence the Government have offered that such is the fact, and I think the burden of proof rests on them to show that the Stikine route is the best route into that country. I am not here to prove that any other route is better than that by Stikine River, but I hold it to be the duty of the Government, when the Stikine route is that chosen for their measure, to show that it is the best route that can be chosen. There are various routes; that by the Yukon River, which flows into Behring Sea; that by Dyea over the Chilkat Pass; that from Dyea through Chilkoot Pass to Lake Bennett; that from Skagway via White Pass; then the route from Takou Inlet to Teslin Lake; and the route by Stikine River. There are the further routes by Port Simpson and the Edmonton route, which have not received very much discussion and attention up to this time in the debate. I am not going to state here to-night that the Stikine River route is not as good as any of the others, nor argue that any of the others are better than that by the Stikine; but if we take up the report placed in our hands from the engineer of the department, Mr. Jennings, and the other report by Mr. St. Cyr in connection with it, because he went from Teslin Lake down the Hootalinqua to ascertain what the navigation was on that part of the route the Government had chosen, the facts will appear. Mr. Jennings made his report on the route from Telegraph Creek and the Stikine. It has been shown by the leader of the Opposition—although it has been stated that he has some interest in the Stikine River route, the hon. gentleman has denied the statement most absolutely, and has stated that he has no interest in any part of this scheme, and this is admitted by the Minister of Railways, and no responsible person has made any such charge without having to take it back—that according to Mr. Jennings's report there are many difficulties in connection with the navigation of the Stikine River. At page 8 of Mr. Jennings's report it is stated:

At times the river is too low for speed with a reasonable cargo, or, the stream may be very high and the riffles difficult to make headway against, with the additional danger of drift trees or snags getting foul of the steering gear or wheel. The latter danger is most to be feared where the channel is contracted, such as in Little and Klootchman's cañons, where, if any mishap occurred to the vessel's machinery, she would at once be carried against the rugged rock walls by the swift swirling, disturbed waters, and sunk by having her planking either torn out or stove in. The distance of 96 miles between Wrangel and Little Cañon can be made by a powerful steamer in one day, whereas by reason of the swift and difficult water above it takes two days more to reach Telegraph Creek, a further distance of only 54 miles or 150 miles from the sea; therefore, with these facts before one, it seems reasonable that on a route where safe and speedy transit is contemplated it is advisable to commence the railway section well down the valley at a point to be determined on below the Little Cañon, and on the left bank of the river, 96 miles from the sea.

I shall later call attention to the length, distance and probable cost of building the road as laid down in Mr. Jennings's report. The Minister of the Interior proceeded to say that everybody who knew anything about the country was aware that the Stikine is the best route and is in favour of it. If that is so, I want to make this one observation, and it is a pointed one in this respect: why was it that every contractor who tendered to build the road wanted it built by some other route? Did they know nothing about the Stikine and about the country generally? Why was it the Government took the credit for forcing the present contractors to build by the Stikine route, and not allow any other contractors who wanted the railway to go by some other route to make offers; and why did the Government bind them down to the Stikine route and to that alone? The hon. gentleman was not in a position to tell the House. He said he could give the House no positive information or opinion as to our rights of transshipment at Wrangel. Here is a Government bringing down to Parliament a measure of this importance, and after it has introduced it, forced to admit that they cannot tell us whether or not the citizens of this country have the rights to tranship their goods at Wrangel.

The Government make the boast that this is an all-Canadian route. I claim, Sir, that it is not an all-Canadian route. If it were an all-Canadian route, that fact would be some defence for it, and I am free to admit here, that I, for one, will forego a great many advantages in favour of another route, in order to find a route into that country that will be all on Canadian soil or through Canadian waters. This route does not offer such advantage as that, because for twenty-two miles from the sea the territory that the Stikine River runs through is claimed by the United States, and international complications may arise, and I am sorry to say I believe they will arise, in this connection. Only the other day, a United States Senator placed a resolution upon the Table of Congress in favour of pressing Canada in that respect. There is no doubt that the game the United States authorities are seeking to play at the present time is, that now having got the Canadian Government into the position of having submitted a contract to Parliament which the Canadian Government is pledged to carry out, and on which its existence depends, the United States authorities say: The Canadian Government cannot carry out their contract if we put difficulties in the way with regard to the navigation of the Stikine River and the transshipment of goods there, and we will wrench them with that power which we possess, into giving us on the Atlantic seaboard concessions such as they never would have given us under any other conditions. The United States authorities will ask this Government, and I am afraid they will force this Government, into the position that the Government will have to concede certain rights on the Atlantic seaboard, rights belonging to the Canadians alone, such as the bonded privilege for fish passing from our country into the United States, and other privileges which they have been seeking for many years.

One of the defences for this contract presented by the Minister of the Interior was, that this was a difficult line of railroad to build, and that the material would cost a great deal to the contractors. When the answer was made on our side of the House, that that road would be laid with rails not more than twenty-eight pounds to the yard, the response came back from the benches opposite: That is not so; the rails will be at least 48, or 50, or 60 lbs. to the yard. However, at the very end of his speech, and when the Minister of the Interior had put up what his party followers thought was a strong defence of this contract, the Minister was forced to admit that for the present year the Government would allow the contractors to put in rails of only 28 pounds to the yard. He was asked the question: If that would not be looked upon as a completion of the contract, and he boldly answered, "No." But, Sir, that is a question of law as to whether such is a completion of the contract or not, and the opinion of the Department of Justice will have to be taken upon it. I may remark, that there is considerable doubt in the minds of lawyers—just as good lawyers as the Minister of the Interior—that if the Government accept that road at the close of this year with 28 pound rails, it will be such an acceptance as will relieve the company from any forfeit.

I could not but be somewhat amused at the attitude assumed by the Minister of Railways, when he moved the second reading of this Bill, and his very different attitude when he moved the first reading. I have known the Minister of Railways for a great many years; it may be that there is no man in this House who is better acquainted with him than I am, and so the different positions he took upon these two occasions were rather amusing to me. On the first occasion, when he should have been calm, and courteous, and reserved, he was loud, and bolsterous, aggressive and contentious. He made a speech that at once called for attack and reply. He invited debate, and he got debate on that occasion. On the next occasion, when he was moving the second reading of the Bill, and when he should have been forcible and powerful, he was as mild as a cooing dove. He had learned his lesson. We have been told that several things took place between the first and the second readings of the Bill. We have been told that the Minister of Railways was about resigning his high and important position in the Government, and we have been told, and not without some show of reason, that a certain number of his amiable colleagues in that Government had made up their minds that the time had come when the Jonah should be thrown overboard. Why, Sir, it is a strange thing that a man who held power in the province of New Brunswick for over twelve years, a man who was able to obtain and to continue to retain the confidence of the people of that province, now, after he has been only fifteen months in the Government of Canada—it is a strange thing that, in order to bring ridicule and contempt upon the Administration of which he forms a part, you have only to mention his name in any audience in this country. And, Sir, the strange and unfortunate part of it is, that his defence comes rather from men who are opposed to him politically, and that his apparent friends sit by and see the knife put into him, and twist it after it is inserted. Now, Sir, I am not surprised at this. Any man who has studied the construction of governments in times past, any man who has turned his attention to the history of governments, knows, that when the right hon. the Prime Minister took into his Government men who looked upon themselves as demi-gods in their own provinces—that when these gentlemen came into office in this Government, they would seek to have their own sweet will, the same as they did when they were full masters down in their own petty provinces. Why, Sir, we have the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who holds down his seat with great weight, and, I think, is steady in the saddle. We have the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), whom I have already mentioned, and we have the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who, we have been told, on more than one occasion, has sulked, and sulked with considerable effect. We are told that he puts his propositions before the Government, asks them to be accepted, and if they are not accepted, he is prepared to walk out of the Government. All these rumours escape, notwithstanding the closed doors of the Privy Council, and we receive them, and they spread through the country.

Mr. DAVIN. There is Tarte.

Mr. McINERNEY. Mr. Tarte never occupied, as far as my knowledge goes, any responsible position in any government before he came into this one, and I do not think the Minister of Public Works has suffered in that regard. I believe that the Minister of Public Works sees to it pretty well—and, as a politician, I say it to his credit—that when he proposes a scheme, the majority in the Government are bound to see that it is carried out. I do not think the Minister of Public Works is going to get into any such position that he will be turned out of the Government by any faction in it.

After spending so much time—more than I intended—upon these preliminaries, I will now proceed to examine the contract which the Government have laid before us for our consideration. This is a contract under which Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann undertake to build a railroad about 150 miles in length from a point called Telegraph Creek on the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, and for which they are to receive as a consideration over 4,000,000 acres of mineral-bearing lands in the Yukon district.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Nearly 4,000,000 acres.

Mr. McINERNEY. I think over 4,000,000 acres, because I was going on to say that it will be plain that this railway will be 165 miles long, and will, therefore, take up 4,200,000 acres, and not 3,750,000. Mr. Jennings's report is that the railway from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake will be 165 miles in length, and if they build it further down, where he thinks it ought to be built, it will be 208 miles in length; but he says the distance from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake is 165 miles. I am going to calculate the consideration the contractors are to receive from Mr. Jennings's report and not from any declaration that is in the Bill itself, because the Bill does not limit them to a gift on 150 miles. It says 150 miles, more or less, which may run up to 200, or more, if necessary.

The standard of this wonderful road is to be the Kaslo and Slocan Railway, a mountain road, which I have heard from men who have gone over it is very dangerously built. I have nothing to say about it from personal knowledge, as I never was over it; but run-offs frequently occur upon it, and it is a very dangerous road, owing to the narrow gauge, the light rails, and the inferior way in which it is built, and the curvature and the grade are something extraordinary. And this is the standard that is laid down for the construction of this wonderful road of 165 miles. Now, we have been told that the report or the survey or the plans of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway are in the Railway Department. We have not seen them; I have not yet had my eye on them, and as I understand that road never received any grant from this Parliament, but is a provincial road, built by private enterprise, I do not know how the plans could be in the Department of Railways and Canals; and until they are produced here, I am going to assume that they are not there at all. The Minister of Railways has never said they were. He was rather surprised the other evening when the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) asked him whether they were not there, and he said: "I do not know that they are there at all." Here was the hon. Minister of Railways, having the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) affix his name to a contract for the construction of a railway the standard of which was the Kaslo and Slocan Railway, when he did not know himself what that standard was. Without any knowledge of those plans or of the curvature or grades of that road, or its general features or configuration at all, he entered into a contract to give this company 4,200,000 acres of land to build a railway on a standard of which he absolutely knew nothing, and admitted he knew nothing. The next clause of the contract provides that this railway when completed is to be owned by the contractors. There is nothing very strange about that, but the second part of the clause is a peculiar one:

Provided also, that the location of said railway between the points mentioned shall be such as the contractors may decide upon without filing plans thereof prior to completion, provided that the grant of land hereby contracted for shall not be made upon a larger mileage than the Minister of Railways considers reasonably necessary for traversing the distance between the terminal points.

The next clause provides that the Government shall submit this contract to Parliament and clothes the company with further and wonderful powers. It authorizes the company to extend this railway northward to Dawson City or thereabouts, and southward to a point in British Columbia to be designated by the Government. Then it charters them to build a railway from the waters of Lynn Canal to Fort Selkirk or thereabouts by way of Chilkat Pass, and branches from any points on the company's railways to any property owned by the company, also lines of railway from any navigable waters to any property owned by the company. Here is an omnium gatherum; here is a drag-net that takes in every road that can be conceived of in that country. It specifies in the first place where this company is authorized to build further roads; it then goes on and gives them this peculiar power to construct a railway wherever they see fit from any part of their railway to any part of their property. It must be over Government land, part of it, because the Government will own the alternate blocks, and the company's land will not, I fancy, be all in one block. It gives them the further power to build and otherwise acquire and operate docks, wharfs, and lines of steamers and other vessels in connection with its railways and property, also telegraph and telephone lines, also to carry on mining and smelting operations, and such other powers as may be necessary for the due operating and conduct of all business connected with an incidental to the development of the lands.

For five years this company is to have a monopoly:

4. For five years from the first of September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by Parliament to be constructed from Lynn Canal or thereabouts, or from any point at or near the international boundary between Canada and Alaska into the Yukon district, and for five years from said date no aid in land or money shall be granted to any person or company other than the contractors and the contractors' company to assist in building any such railway—

They are given a further monopoly, in that for ten years from the 1st of September no assistance in land or money shall be given to any other railway from the Stikine River to an ocean port in British Columbia. And then they are given with regard to tolls what I do not think was ever given to any company in this country before. It is admitted that the Governor in Council shall fix the tolls, but this company does not come under the railway law. After four years the tolls shall be reduced twenty-five per cent, and after seven years more they shall be further reduced twenty-five per cent, or after eleven years from the 1st of September, 1898, they shall be reduced in all fifty per cent.

That gives us an idea of what these tolls will be at the outset. If in ten years we are to reduce them by 50 per cent, they must be fairly large at the beginning. Some gentlemen ridicule some of the statements made with regard to these tolls. Some gentlemen have said that $100 was an excessive price for going over that road. I am free to admit that I believe it is. I will be willing to admit that this company would be in a fair way of making on each passenger over the road a profit of $10 and out of each ton of freight a profit of $10, and on that basis I think—although the calculation is made in another way—Mr. Jennings makes his report. If there are 50,000 people going into that country this year by that route—and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) estimates that there might be 250,000 people; he did not bind himself to any particular estimate—if there are 50,000 people going into that country by this road, then at $10 profit per head, that will give a half million dollars profit on the passengers alone, and estimating the freight at 50,000 tons, that will give a profit of half a million dollars on the freight. This will give a million dollars clear profit on both, on that basis of calculation, for working the road for one year.

This company, in the next clause, is exempted from taxation, and I call the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to this matter. I do not believe knowing the Minister of Railways and Canals, as I do, that, as a lawyer, he gave his consent to that contract before it was signed by the gentlemen who signed it in his absence. It is a contractor's contract. The Minister of Railways, no matter what other men may say about him, is too good a lawyer to sign a contract like that and come down to Parliament freely and voluntarily and ask this Parliament to pass it. Here is the clause:

The land granted to the contractors or contractors' company hereunder shall be free from taxation for ten years from the granting thereof—except municipal taxation by an incorporated city, town or village within the Yukon provisional district.

Sir, it is exempt from taxation entirely, I take that view because I know that, with the tremendous monopoly of power this company will have in that district, I would like to see any part of it which will be erected into a municipal city, town or village so as to have these people taxed, if they do not wish to be taxed. It is only by an incorporated city, town or village that any municipal tax can be recovered from this company. No other tax of any kind can be gathered from it. And with all the power vested in this company, does any man say that they will not have power to prevent the incorporation of any village, town or other place, if they desire to do so. They will be free of all kinds of taxation, municipal as well as others, on all their lands in that vast territory.

Then they are to build a sleigh road, but they would have to do that anyhow, as has been shown in this debate.

Here is another provision which I do not believe the Minister of Railways ever had his eye on before the contract was signed. Here is the strangest provision in the whole contract:

The contractors or contractors' company shall provide, or arrange with others to provide, steamboat transport of freight and passengers between the terminus of said railway on Teslin Lake, or other terminus northerly thereof, and Dawson City to and fro.

What is the limit to that provision. There is none. They need not do that this year or next or in twenty years. They need not do it at all. There is no time mentioned in that clause or any part of that contract that binds this company, this year or any year, to provide steamboat transport of freight and passengers on the Hootalinqua, the Teslin or the Yukon down to Dawson City. I ask the hon. Minister of Railways now if he thinks that that is a provision which ought to be in that contract. I ask him as a lawyer, and as a lawyer who has a reputation in this country, if he would submit for the meanest client that gave him his rights to guard, such a contract as that. I do not believe he would. To say that the guardian of the rights of a whole nation would allow such a clause as that in that contract, under his hand and seal, is to cast an imputation upon the Minister of Railways and Canals and his ability that I am not prepared to cast upon him. I want to draw the attention of the Government to that because I think it is important that a time limit should be placed in that provision. Only to-night the argument was used that the building of that railway was not the only consideration these gentlemen should give the Government of the country, but that they were bound to build steamers to navigate Lake Teslin and the Hootalinqua River and the Yukon down to Dawson, to carry passengers and freight, that it would cost a lot to get material to build steamers and get engines and make the water courses from Teslin Lake down to Dawson City navigable. That has been held up to us as one of the great considerations of the contract, but the contractors are not bound to do that under the contract. There is no lawyer who would stand up and say that in the next twenty years they are bound to have those rivers navigable under that contract. There is not a man who will give this Bill a fair common sense reading and say they are bound to make those rivers navigable in 15 or 20 years. That is one of the most difficult parts of the contract they would have to carry out, if they were bound to do it. I have seen men who have been up and down the Hootalinqua and have talked to them. We meet in the hotels and on the streets men who have travelled in that country, and who have come back and who tell us the truth. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) gets a varnished tale, from some officer or man who wants to please him and carry out his purpose, but from these other men we hear the plain unvarnished truth, and they tell us that the Hootalinqua River is totally unnavigable. One man told me that he was aground in one part of it for two days in a bark canoe. Imagine a man being aground in a canoe in a navigable river. He told me that he could not find a channel, that he could not find any deeper water than the place where he was aground. Mark Twain wrote something about piloting on a wonderful river, and it may be that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) got his information from that wonderful book. I would rather gather from his remarks that he has.

I wish to make one remark which escaped me about something the Minister of the Interior said with regard to Major Walsh. It struck most of us who have read of Major Walsh's appointment to the administration of the Yukon district, that he was to go to Dawson City, the capital of the district, and administer the government of the district there; and we were surprised when Major Walsh only got some hundreds of miles away from Dawson and lost some of his supplies, and could not get any further down the river to Dawson. But we were more than surprised, we were amazed when the Minister of the Interior stood up and informed us that Major Walsh had stayed exactly where he was sent to stay; that he had been sent to the summit to meet starving travellers from Dawson and furnish them with means of subsistence. I am going to say that the Minister of the Interior taxes our credulity to the utmost bounds when he asks us to believe a statement of that kind. I have it on the very best information that Major Walsh all through this winter has only given one meal to one man at the place where he has established himself near the summit. And that man said that he could have got as good a meal in his own shack. And moreover, Major Walsh told him that he was very anxious to get to Dawson and that he wanted him to tell McGregor to send in a dog team so that he could go down to Dawson at once. It was the day before yesterday that this was told to me. My informant is a man of some means, and he told me that he was willing to make a wager, notwithstanding what the Minister of the Interior had said, that Major Walsh is in Dawson at this hour. Will the Minister of the Interior take up this wager? He has offered wagers to members on this side, to the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) and others. He has told us that this whole thing is a gamble and he has offered wagers as though to prove it. I can tell him that I will find a man who will put up money against his that Major Walsh is in Dawson, and I ask if he will accept that wager.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). What is the amount of the stake?

Mr. McINERNEY. Almost any amount.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Say a dollar and a half.

Mr. McINERNEY. I remember the time when a dollar and a half would have been quite a considerable amount to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. But now, in the magnificence and opulence of office, he throws it at me, I suppose as a slur upon my poverty, and asks me to put up a dollar and a half.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You are making too serious a matter of it.

Mr. McINERNEY. I have seen the hon. gentleman take far more seriously, charges made against himself. I have seen him in this House of late, play altogether a new role. I thought the hon. gentleman was thick-skinned; I thought he could stand attack. But I have seen him writhe under the attacks directed against him by members on this side in a way that did not increase my admiration for him. I do not take anything too seriously, not even my betting proclivities. There is a wager that is open to the Minister of the Interior. There was a gentleman who once came from his part of the country—from Winnipeg. I believe—who, I think, would have taken it up, but the hon. gentleman does not appear to run in that line. He offers wagers, but he does not accept them.

Now, the selection of base lines under this contract is the next subject to which I had intended to turn my attention. But the Government have abandoned that part of the contract under the criticism of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. It is provided that the contractors shall have three years in which to select half of their land and six years in which to select the other half. Certain portions are barred from selection by the contractors, the beds of the rivers Yukon, Lewes and Hootalinqua and of Lakes Teslin, Bennett, Tagish, Labarge and Marsh (said lakes and rivers forming continuous watercourses) or of the banks thereof for 25 feet on each side of the high water mark. But it is not in such rivers as these that the gold is found in the Yukon district, according to the information we have received, but on the small streams that come in precipitous incline down the hills and empty themselves into the larger rivers; and not one of such creeks is retained for the Government or kept from the grasp of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, the contractors. The royalty which is provided under section 17 is also peculiar. The gold taken from the 4,200,000 acres of land granted to the contractors pays only one per cent royalty, while the free miner pays ten per cent. What sort of fair play is that? Is not this giving a tremendous advantage to these contractors over every citizen of this country or any other country who goes into the Yukon district? Why should these contractors pay less royalty to the Government than any other people? It has been said that this contract has been forced upon these men, and but for these rigorous provisions they would never have accepted it. I am amazed that a Government that is supposed to guard the right of the meanest as well as of the most important citizen of this country should have given under this contract a monopoly, a special right, a particular franchise to two men against every other citizen of the country, charging these two men one per cent royalty while the man who goes in to make a living for himself is compelled to pay ten per cent. When the contractors have completed ten miles of road they will be allowed to locate a portion of the land. And here comes in, as was pointed out by my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope), the genius of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, who has reserved for the people of this country the wonderful privilege of farming the arable lands of the Arctic circle, which are reserved to the people under this contract for all time to come.

It is declared that this grant shall be given in fee simple to these men, and that they shall have the title to this property as soon as the railway is completed; not when their contract is completed, not when they have put their steamers on the rivers and lakes and made these water-courses navigable, not when they have opened up communication from the Stikine River to Dawson—but as soon as the railway part of it is completed. That done they get 4,200,000 acres of land. What does that represent? Go to the common man throughout the length and breadth of Canada and tell him that 4,200,000 acres of the heritage of Canadians in the North-west have been given away and he will hardly realize what it means. But, Sir, it means as much arable land as there is in the whole province of Nova Scotia. By the census of 1891 there were not quite five million acres of land fit for tillage in the whole province of Nova Scotia. Go down and tell the people of Nova Scotia that land equal in acreage to all the arable land of their native province is to be given away to these contractors, and they will begin to realize what this land grant means. It means as much as all the occupied lands in the province of New Brunswick. By the census of 1891 there were 4,475,250 acres of land occupied in the province of New Brunswick, and there were only 1,018,704 acres of improved land, so that it means four times as much land as lies to-day improved in the province of New Brunswick. Sir, it is a tremendous gift, a tremendous gift of gold-bearing land, to be selected wherever these men may see fit out of the territory of the extent of the Yukon district. When these men get done with their selection, I am going to make the statement that there will not be a hundred thousand acres of gold-bearing land left in that whole territory between Mackenzie River and the 141st meridian.

They will have scooped it all in, they will have located it all, taking it all for themselves. Now it has been said that these men will be put to a terrible expense to build this railway; that it will cost them a tremendous amount of money; that you cannot suppose that men are going to be taken into the gateway of the Yukon and work for the same wages as men will work for in Ontario. I quite admit that, it will be difficult no doubt to keep these men at work on the route of this railway; but when contractors have found means hitherto of keeping men in their places, I have no doubt Mackenzie & Mann will find means of hiring men under the contract and of keeping them at work. Now, Mr. Jennings makes a calculation that the 165 miles of road which these men are to construct from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake will only cost $2,850,000, and that sum will build a first-class railway. But these men are to build a road with only a 28-pound rail, old rails at that, with a curvature as they like, with whatever grade they may choose, and for doing this they are to be put in possession of over 4,000,000 acres of picked gold-bearing land. Mr. Jennings has made a calculation, but on a different basis from the one I made here, by which he gave to these people, in a single year, a profit of $494,000. That was based upon a calculation of only 12,000 people entering that country in one year, by that route. But whereas an estimate has been made of 250,000 people on the one hand, and 50,000 on the other, going in there, if we take 120,000 as a moderate estimate—because in the medium generally lies the truth—you will arrive at a fair estimate. That will be ten times the number upon which Mr. Jennings makes his calculation of a profit of half a million dollars, which will place in the hands of these people for running the road alone for one year from the time of its construction, ten times half a million, or five million dollars of profit. That is what these men are to get outside altogether of the land grant for building this road, outside of the monopolies they will receive, outside the valuable charters given them, outside the payment for royalty, by which they have to pay only one-tenth as much as a humble citizen of Canada. Now there is another feature of this case that, up to the present time, has not been put before the House, and one which I think should receive consideration. We know that men who can see through a ladder have made application for timber limits in that country, and have paid large sums of money for timber limits there. I have been told by a man who has lived for a number of years on the Pacific Coast in British Columbia, that there are parts of the Yukon district that are valuable as timber limits alone. He was bold to state that some portions of that country would average eight million feet of lumber to the quarter section of 160 acres, and he was a man who knew what he was talking about. Well, if that average runs over the four million acres that these men are to get, and if these men, instead of taking gold-bearing lands, took timber lands in the southwestern part of the district, they would have four million acres of timber lands. Now, according to this calculation of eight millions to the quarter section of 160 acres, that would mean 50,000 feet to the acre, and 50,000 feet of lumber to the acre, taking four million acres would mean 200,000 million feet of lumber to be cut on all this territory. Placing the profit on this lumber at $2 a thousand, would give these gentlemen a profit on timber lands alone of $400,000,000. Why, Sir, there is no way in which you can calculate this thing but you arrive at a conclusion that must amaze you; there is no basis of calculation you may adopt but which shows that you are giving away to these men values that are simply astounding. You may, if you choose, be sophistical and stray away from a proper conclusion, but when you start from a right basis and argue correctly, you arrive at conclusions that are simply astounding. Now there is another point I wish to mention. There is no reason to mourn over these poor contractors in this matter. The Bill which was brought down to this House capitalizes this company with a capital of $10,000,000, and gives them moreover the privilege of extending their capital even beyond that figure. They can go into the money markets to-morrow and, authorized by this Bill, can capitalize themselves at $10,000,000 without ever building the railway, without ever doing a single thing—they can raise more than $10,000,000 upon their capital alone. They can do that and never strike a blow in that country. I understand that something like that has been suggested. I will assume that the contractors might put it this way: Well, we are not going to make anything out of the gold lands in the Yukon, there is not as much gold as Tom, Dick and Harry are talking about, we do not intend working the gold lands, at all. But the fools are not all dead yet, and we will take this project and finance it, and in that way we will make piles of money. This Government, Sir, puts the sign manual of their approbation upon such a procedure as that when they enter into a contract of this description. They authorize and allow these men to do that kind of thing, to hawk around in the capitals of Europe their stock list and sell their bonds and pocket a large amount of money, even though all this thing may turn out to be a myth. Sir, one of two positions must be taken by the Government. If this Yukon district, from the information they have before them, is not valuable, they should deter people from going there. If the Yukon district is a desolate region they should do all they can to stop people from entering that country, and they should not build a line of communication by which they advertise that country to the world, and allure a great many men to leave their homes to seek their fortunes there who would otherwise remain at home. Either that or the other proposition, that it is a valuable country, and if it is, they are giving away a tremendously valuable portion of the country's wealth.

The speculative instinct is alive to-day; it has been alive in all ages of the world. In every age there have been Jasons, with their faithful Argonauts, in search of the golden fleece, setting sail for the mystic strand of Colchos; and the boldest spirits of their time have, in the romantic quest, gone "sounding on their dim and perilous way." Their adventurous prowess have been turned to Cathay, to the island continent beneath the Southern Cross, to the California Sierras, to South Africa, and more lately to the ice fields of the far Canadian North. Their glowing vision has never failed to clothe the distant hills with fabulous Eldorados, in quest of some distant, unreachable land that hung like the fringe of God's garment over the very edge of creation. I trust, I sincerely trust, that it may be found in the Canadian Yukon. But, Sir, if it is so, that lying in the stream beds, in the rivers and gulches and the quartz rocks of that great territory, those immense riches are to be found sleeping there in their virgin beds from the first instant of creation, what a tremendous gift has been made these contractors by the Government of this free country. I remember, about twenty years ago, seeing one of the greatest actors that ever held the stage, Charles Fechter, playing his great dramatic adaptation of Alexander Dumas's immortal romance, "Monte Christo," in which the hero, thrown from the Chateau D'If, cuts his way out of the dead man's sack, having the secret of the hidden treasure, and standing on an island crag, cries: "Monte Christo is mine; the world is mine." And so, standing on some peak in Yukon, the contractors, seeing the midnight sun gleaming on some glistening peak, may cry out, in view of the millions this Government have given them: The Yukon is mine; the world is mine.

Mr. McCLURE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

Mr. McINERNEY.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 21st February, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 22) respecting the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Oliver.)

Bill (No. 23) to incorporate the Lewes River Tramway Company (Limited).—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 24) to amend the charter of the Union Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 25) to incorporate the Ontario and Quebec Bridge Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 26) to incorporate the Kettle River Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (No. 27) to incorporate the Cañon Railway Company.—(Mr. Frost.)

DEATH SENTENCE ON THOMAS NULTY.

Mr. LEMIEUX asked,

Whether petitions have been received by the Hon. Minister of Justice, praying for a commutation of the sentence of death pronounced against Thomas Nulty, who was found guilty of murder at the last assizes for the district of Joliette?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). No petition has been received asking for the commutation of the death sentence pronounced against Thomas Nulty.

INDIAN TITLE IN NORTH-WESTERN DISTRICT.

Mr. DAVIS asked,

Have any steps been taken by the Government to extinguish the Indian title in the Athabasca, Mackenzie and Yukon districts?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The question of the extinguishment of the Indian title in Athabasca and Mackenzie district is under consideration. So far as the Government is aware, there is no Indian title to be extinguished in the Yukon.

NAVIGATION OF CANADIAN WATERS BY UNITED STATES VESSELS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

1. Has the Government considered, or is it now considering, the question of Canada's right to exclude or regulate the passage of vessels registered in the United States through the territorial waters on the coast of British Columbia, to and from Alaska?

2. Has the Government any policy upon the subject? If so, what is it?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Government have had that subject under consideration, but they do not deem it expedient at the present moment, in the public interest, to make any statement on the subject.

EX-JUDGE J. P. WOODS.

Mr. ERB asked,

(a.) Has the Government granted a retiring allowance to Mr. J. P. Woods, late judge of the county of Perth?

(b.) If so, what is the amount of such allowance?

(c.) Has the Government received a petition praying for the granting of a retiring allowance to the said J. P. Woods?

(d.) If so, whose names were attached to the said petition?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The Government have granted a retiring allowance to Judge Woods. As to the second part of the question, the usual retiring allowance of a judge, being two-thirds of his salary, has been granted. The Government did receive a petition on the subject. The names attached to the petition were all the members of the county council of the county of Perth.

CUSTOMS COLLECTIONS IN THE YUKON.

Mr. WALLACE asked,

What was the amount of duties collected by customs officers in the Yukon district, giving amounts for each year separately?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The collections in Yukon were as follows:—Year 1894-95, $3,247.47; year 1895-96, $21,691.45; year 1896-97, $9,873.24; year 1897-98, $83,834.94.

PILOTAGE INVESTIGATIONS AT ST. JOHN, N.B.

Mr. ELLIIS asked,

How many investigations have been held, under authority of the Marine and Fisheries Department, in the matter of pilotage and pilot management at the port of St. John since the year 1887?

In what years were investigations held?

What has each investigation, including charges for printing, cost the public treasury?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Three investigations have been held under the authority of the department to inquire into pilotage matters at the port of St. John since the year 1887, namely, one in 1891, by William Smith, late Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries; second one in 1895 by Capt. W. H. Smith, Chairman of the Board of Examiners of Masters and Mates, assisted by Capt. Bloomfield Douglas, and third one in 1897, by Capt. Bloomfield Douglas. The first investigation, namely, that in 1891, does not appear to have been attended with any expense except that of travelling and incidental expenses of the Deputy Minister. The investigation of 1895 cost $1,888.60, and the investigation of 1897 cost $659.11, but all the accounts for this investigation have not been received. The charges for printing which are included in the above sums, cost $1,033.47.

GEORGIAN BAY DISTRICT—TIMBER SAWN IN MICHIGAN MILLS.

Mr. KAULBACH rose to ask the following question:—

Is the Government aware of the enormous output of logs cut in the Georgian Bay district the present season, to be sawed in Michigan mills, of which the following is a statement from Saginaw, Michigan, February 14th, 1898?

TO BE SAWN IN MICHIGAN MILLS—THE ENORMOUS OUTPUT OF GEORGIAN BAY LOGS THIS COMING SEASON.

Saginaw, Mich., February 14.—The Georgian Bay district will furnish Michigan mills with a large quantity of logs the coming season. A gentleman from that region states that loggers are experiencing trouble with deep snow, and slow progress is being made. He furnishes the following approximate estimate of the quantity of logs being put in this winter by the several firms operating in the Georgian Bay district:—Alger, Smith & Co., 8,000,000; Holland Emery Lumber Co., 20,000,000; Turner & Fisher, 20,000,000; S. C. Fisher, 1,000,000; Wm. Peter, 15,000,000; Saginaw Lumber and Salt Co. and Loveland, Rays & White, 16,000,000; Ontario Lumber Co., 8,000,000; Arthur Hill & Co., 15,000,000; McArthur Bros. & Co., 14,000,000; Spanish River Lumber Co., 15,000,000; Central Lumber Co., 8,000,000; Conger Lumber Co., 20,000,000; Hale & Booth, 30,000,000; Eddy Bros. & Co., 11,000,000; Moore & Glover, 4,000,000; Victoria Lumber Co., 15,000,000; Georgian Bay Lumber Co., 20,000,000; Union Trust Co., 14,000,000; Hardy Lumber Co., 10,000,000; Pitts & Co., 20,000,000; total, 328,000,000.

With such startling revelations before us, the desire to employ labour at home, and in view of the fact of the heavy restrictions placed on Canadian lumber going into the United States market, is it the intention of the Government to impose an export duty on logs crossing into American territory?

Mr. SPEAKER. In regard to this question, standing in the name of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach), if I were at liberty to follow English precedents, which I should like to see followed by this House, I would ask the hon. member to drop the long statement embodied in it; but such statements have so frequently been embodied in questions asked in this House in former years that the precedents are strong, and I cannot say it is out of order; but I hope hon. members will drop a practice of this kind. With respect to the last paragraph of the question, the first portion is argumentative, and I hope the hon. gentleman will put the question omitting it.

Mr. KAULBACH. I desire to ask, as follows:—

Is the Government aware of the enormous output of logs cut in the Georgian Bay district last season to be sawed in Michigan mills, of which the following is a statement from Saginaw, Mich., February 14, 1898.

I will not read the extract, as it appears in the paper. I would further ask:

Is it the intention of the Government to impose an export duty on logs crossing into American territory?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The Government has no information with respect to the subject mentioned in the first part of the question. With respect to the latter matter it is not one in respect to which it is expedient to make any announcement at this moment.

A. E. KILLAM.

Mr. McINERNEY asked,

1. What position does Amasa E. Killam hold on the Intercolonial Railway, and what salary does he receive?

2. Did this same Amasa E. Killam make a claim for damages against the Government for cattle killed or injured by accident on the Intercolonial Railway?

3. When and where did the accident happen? How many cattle were killed or injured by it? What description were such cattle?

4. If Amasa E. Killam made such a claim was the claim paid? What amount was given him for each of the cattle so killed or injured?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Amasa E. Killam holds the position of inspector of bridges on the Intercolonial Railway, and he receives a salary of $150 a month. 2. Yes. Mr. Killam made a claim for damages against the Government for cattle killed and injured on the railway. 3. The accident happened on the 14th of July, 1894, at Chandler's Cutting, so called, near Moncton. Two cattle were killed and three injured. The cattle were valuable cows of the Jersey breed. 4. Mr. Killam claimed $500, but the claim was finally settled by paying him $350.

EXCLUSION OF FOREIGN LABOUR ON YUKON RAILWAY.

Mr. MARTIN asked,

Does the Government intend to provide for the employment of Canadian labour only in the building of the Yukon Railway?

Does the Government intend to take any steps to provide that Canadian labour only shall be employed in the construction of railways receiving subsidies from the Dominion Government?

Mr. SPEAKER.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The necessity for constructing the Yukon Railway with the utmost possible speed rendered it inadvisable to insist upon the exclusion of foreign labour from employment on this work. In the case of the Crow's Nest Railway a clause was inserted in the contract, not only prohibiting foreign labour, but forbidding the railway company from contracting or subcontracting with foreign firms, companies or contractors on the works of the Crow's Nest Railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I call attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman has overlooked the second part of the question.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It has not been overlooked. I stated what the Government have already done.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The intention of the Government is asked here.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I take it that the fact that the Government have already in a Bill included a clause adverse to the employment of foreign labour is a fair indication of the Government's intention in that regard.

COLD STORAGE FOR P. E. I.

Mr. MARTIN asked,

Has the Government taken any steps to provide cold storage for Prince Edward Island?

If so, when is it to be provided?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Last year correspondence was entered into by the Department of Agriculture with various gentlemen in Charlottetown for the purpose of securing the establishment of a cold storage warehouse there. That did not succeed, and correspondence is still continuing with the hope during the coming season that it may succeed.

REGINA INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Was Dr. Willoughby, up to June, 1896, the medical officer employed by the Government to attend the Industrial School at Regina?

Was he dismissed? If so, when and why?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Dr. Willoughby was employed by the Indian Commissioner for Manitoba and the North-west Territories, with the concurrence of the Department of Indian Affairs, to attend the Industrial School at Regina up to the 31st of August, 1897. His services were then discontinued, a medical officer having been appointed by Order in Council for the district in which are situated the Muscowpetungs and Assiniboine agencies and the Regina Industrial School.

DISMISSALS IN INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Will the Minister of the Interior lay on the Table of the House a list of those persons whose services in the North-west Territories since June, 1896, have been dispensed with by the department, and the cause of dismissal in each case?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The information asked will be laid on the Table when the hon. gentleman moves for a return in the usual way.

DISPUTED YUKON TERRITORY—DYE AND SKAGWAY.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

In the recent negotiations with the United States authorities respecting customs regulations and the shipment of goods via Dyea and Skagway to the Canadian Yukon territory, was any precaution observed or provision made so that the negotiations proceeded without prejudice to the claim that Dyea and Skagway are in British territory?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I beg to say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that the negotiations referred to were unofficial, but notwithstanding that fact, as a matter of precaution, it was stated in all cases, that such negotiations were without prejudice to any claims that might be made in reference to the settlement of the boundary question.

FAST ATLANTIC MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) asked,

1. What information has the Government as to the steps which have been taken by Messrs. Petersen, Tate & Co., to carry out the terms of their contract with Her Majesty, bearing date the 24th day of March, 1897?

2. Have Messrs. Petersen, Tate & Co. commenced the construction of any of the steamers referred to in clause 1 (a) of their said contract, and has the Government taken any steps to obtain information on this point?

3. What period of time would, under ordinary conditions, be required for the construction of the two steamers first mentioned in clause 4 (a) of the said contract, and has the Government taken any steps to obtain information on this point?

4. At what date did Messrs. Petersen, Tate & Co. give and deposit the sum and guarantee referred to in clause 13 (a) and (b) of the said contract?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). With respect to the first part of this question, the Government have no special information as to the steps which have been taken by Messrs. Petersen, Tate & Co., except their general assurance that they propose to carry out their contract as agreed. With respect to the second question, the Government are not aware whether the construction has been actually commenced; the Government believe it has not been. With respect to the third question, the Government are informed that they can be constructed within the time limited. With respect to the fourth question, a sum of £10,000 was paid to the Bank of Montreal, at or about the 5th of October last; the £10,000 guarantee was executed at or about the 1st or 5th of January last.

UNITED STATES STEAMSHIP "YANTIC"—PASSAGE THROUGH RIVER ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) asked,

Was permission obtained from the proper authority for the passage through the River St. Lawrence of the United States steamship "Yantic"?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Permission was applied for to the Superintendent of the Welland Canal for the passage of the steamship "Yantic" through the canal, and he was authorized to grant the privilege. The "Yantic" passed through without any armament.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Might I call the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) to the effect that he answered only as to the Welland Canal? The question is: Was there permission asked for passage through the river?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is, of course, to be observed that the answer as to the canals is the only permission of which the Department of Railways and Canals has any knowledge.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). So far as the river is concerned, there never was any application made to the Department over which I preside, for permission. As my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) has stated, the "Yantic" came without any armament whatever and passed up as a commercial vessel.

Mr. WALLACE. Did they make an entrance and clearance at Montreal or any other Canadian port?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, at Montreal, having run down one of our ships in the meantime.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT CENTREVILLE, N. B.

Mr. HALE asked,

Was an investigation held in the case of Mr. T. Scholey, collector of customs at Centreville, Carleton County, N.B.?

If so, was the finding favourable or adverse to Mr. Scholey?

Has Mr. Scholey been dismissed, and if so, why?

For what number of years had Mr. Scholey paid superannuation abatement, and has any allowance been made to him on this account?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The answer to the first question is, yes; to the second question: The finding was adverse to Mr. Scholey. The answer to the third question is: Mr. Scholey has been dismissed. The reason for his dismissal was, that it was established on the investigation that he had taken an active partisan part in politics. The answer to the fourth question is: Mr. Scholey contributed to the Superannuation Fund for twenty-four years. He has been refunded the sum contributed by him to said fund, with interest thereon at 5 per cent per annum. The total amount of such refund was $146.95.

YUKON RAILWAY—MR. HAMILTON SMITH'S COMMUNICATIONS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask my right hon. friend the leader of the Government, if he has laid on the Table of the House the communications that he has received from Mr. Hamilton Smith in reference to railway construction in the Yukon.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). No; the correspondence has not been brought down yet, but it will be laid on the Table to-morrow.

CHEVALIER DROLET'S MINING LEASE—EXPLANATION.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton.) I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact, that the information furnished me from my department with which to answer a question which was asked in the House the other day, with regard to the mining lease issued to Mr. Drolet, was incorrect, and the answer given, therefore, was incorrect. I desire, at the earliest possible moment, to correct the answer given. The answer was, that a lease had been granted, and that it was in accordance with the terms of the public regulations. As a matter of fact, the lease given to Mr. Drolet was given before the regulations were adopted, and it varies in some small particulars from the regulations which were afterwards adopted. It was not given under the regulations, because there were no regulations at the time. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) who asked the question, desires to obtain the exact terms of the lease granted to Mr. Drolet, they can be obtained by moving, in the usual way, for the Order in Council relating to them.

CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Blair for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) an Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty the Queen and Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. Speaker, while it might very properly be said that little new can be presented to the House in reference to this question, it certainly cannot be said that the debate has been at all monotonous, for there has at least been considerable variety in the manner of attacking this measure by members on the other side of the House. I notice, and I think it must have been apparent to all the members of the House, that, during the last few days of this debate, there has been a very marked change in the tone of the criticism which has been directed against the Bill. I recollect very well, during the opening days of the session, that the hon. gentlemen on the other side could not find within the bounds of the English language words strong enough to utter their abhorrence, their detestation of this measure. They spoke against it with a vigour and a violence that seemed to indicate that there was in it nothing good whatever—from the classic statements of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), whose cultured tastes were offended by the piscatory effluvia which he found ascended from it, down to the more direct and positive assertions of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who most emphatically asserted that nobody could entertain a doubt but that there were large contributions to the Ontario election campaign in connection with this contract, every kind of corruption was charged against the Government in reference to this measure. The hon. gentlemen do right to be jealous in regard to public contracts. The sad experiences which this country had in the days when other gentlemen occupied these benches have unfortunately created in the minds of many people a suspicion with regard to any contract to which the Government is a party. But I ask hon. gentlemen to notice, as the country has already noticed, that there is a very marked difference between the charges of corruption which were once made against the Government of this country, and the charges which are made to-day. I recollect very well, as a student of the political progress of this country, the time when men stood up in their places in Parliament, and staking their political reputation upon the act, made charges against the Government of the day; but they did more than make charges: they demanded, they forced investigation, and they proved their charges. Not so the pure and holy gentlemen who to-day compose Her Majesty's loyal Opposition. They may make charges, it is true, but they give to this House another evidence of their angelic character, in that they are quite willing that others should rush into investigations where they do not care themselves to tread.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have no longer loud and violent denunciations of this contract. Within the last two or three days, hon. gentlemen who have assailed it have been compelled to resort to what I think may be properly called captious criticism of its various clauses. In fact, the last speaker who addressed the House (Mr. McInerney) felt himself at the outset driven into the unfortunate position of having to defend his own party before he started to attack the Government; and I propose to direct a little attention to the defence which he gave of his own party in connection with the historical events bearing on this question. My hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney) was very much disappointed with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). He regretted very much that he could not extract an opinion from that hon. gentleman on a point of law. Now, I think the House will bear me out in saying that in no part of the very able and lucid address of the hon. member for Halifax did he more clearly indicate his thorough grasp of the principles that govern international law than in his refusal to answer the question of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper); and I am quite confident that the hon. member for Pictou, being himself no mean authority on that subject, never could have proposed the question seriously. The question which he proposed, if it meant anything, simply meant this, that he would like to know what the opinion of the hon. member for Halifax was as to what the opinion of the United States ought to be—a question which the hon. member for Halifax very properly declined to answer. But my hon. friend from Kent made the very bold assertion that the treaty of 1825, the Convention of St. Petersburg, gave to Her Majesty's subjects no rights whatever on the Yukon and the Porcupine; and I notice that the press which supports him says that he proved it so conclusively that henceforth nobody will ever dare to make the contrary assertion again. Now, how does the hon. gentleman prove it? He proves it, in the first place, by quoting article 6 of the Convention of 1825; and, in order to be accurate in the matter, I propose to read that clause again. It is as follows:—

It is understood that the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, from whatever quarter they arrive, whether from the ocean or from the interior of the continent, shall for ever enjoy the right of navigating freely and without any hindrance whatever all the rivers and streams which in their course towards the Pacific Ocean may cross the line of demarcation upon the line of coast described in article 3 of the present convention.

Now, my hon. friend must admit, I presume he does admit, that these rivers, Yukon and Porcupine, in their course towards the Pacific Ocean, cross the line of demarcation. But he contends that they do not cross the line of demarcation upon the coast described in article 3. Now, the sole question is, what is the meaning of these last words in this article? The answer is found in article 3, which reads as follows:—

The line of demarcation between the high contracting parties upon the coast of the continent and the islands of America to the north-west shall be drawn in the following manner:—Commencing from the southernmost point of the island, which point lies in the parallel of $54^{\circ} 40'$ north latitude and between the 131st and 133rd degrees of west longitude (meridian of Greenwich), the said line shall extend to the north along the channel called the Portland Channel as far as the point of the continent where it strikes the 56th degree of north latitude. From this last mentioned point the line of demarcation shall follow the summit of the mountains situate parallel to the coast as far as the intersection of the 141st degree of west longitude (same meridian), and finally from the said point of intersection the said meridian of the 141st degree in its prolongation as far as the frozen ocean, shall form the limit of the Russian and British possession on the continent of America towards the north-west.

Clearly, beyond all doubt, "the line of demarcation between the possessions upon the coast of the continent," and "the line of demarcation upon the line of coast described in article 3," are one and the same thing. There is nothing in the wording of the article to suggest, and by no rule of interpretation can you get out of it the meaning that one part of the line is to be considered a line of demarcation, and the rest is to be considered a line of demarcation upon the coast. Look at the very wording of the article. It starts in its preliminary to say that the line of demarcation upon the coast shall be described as follows; and then it describes one line, not two, as my hon. friend would have us believe. But, fortunately for me, I am not in the position of having to place my interpretation of this clause against that of the hon. member for Kent. We have undoubted authority upon this point. Charles Sumner gave his opinion upon it years ago; and the opinion of Charles Sumner is of the first importance here, not only because he was a man of eminence whose opinion was entitled to weight anywhere, but because he represents the opposite party, as it were, on this question, with whom we shall have to contend for this right, if we ever have to contend for it. He says, referring to the treaty of 1825:

It is provided that the subjects of His Britannic Majesty shall for ever enjoy the right of navigating freely and without any hindrance whatever all the rivers and streams which in their course towards the Pacific Ocean may cross the line of demarcation.

He does not say which may cross a part of the line of demarcation; he does not say which may cross that part of the line of demarcation below Mount St. Elias; but the line of demarcation. Evidently Charles Sumner would look upon this wonderful discovery made by the hon. member for Kent as somewhat of a quibble. But the Hon. Edward Blake also held this opinion, for we find him writing of the treaties in this fashion :

At the time of the negotiation (that is, of the Washington Treaty), British subjects had already the fullest rights to navigate for all purposes all the streams flowing from the British territory in the interior through Alaska.

The United States had no right to navigate any of these streams beyond the boundary of Alaska. Great Britain asked for and obtained as a concession a limited right to navigate three of these streams for certain purposes, conceding to the United States the right to navigate these three streams through Columbia on equal terms. This so-called concession by the United States was, in fact, a concession by Great Britain to the former country, which gave nothing and got everything.

I feel confident that if my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney) were in a position to quote the opinion of Hon. Edward Blake against the Government, he would consider it of great weight; and I trust he will give some weight to it when it is against himself.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. gentleman says there is nothing at all in the two lines of demarcation. Will he then tell me why these men who made the treaty put in the words: "and the streams which in their course towards the Pacific Ocean may cross the line of demarcation upon the line of the coast"? Will he tell me why were the words, "upon the line of coast," added if they mean nothing?

Mr. McCLURE. Will the hon. gentleman tell me why they mention the line of demarcation on the coast at the opening of the description before they undertook to define it at all? Why is it they started out to define the line of demarcation on the coast and then went on to give a description of one line, if it was intended to be two lines?

Mr. McINERNEY. Then words do not mean anything.

Mr. McCLURE. I have other authorities which I would like to quote. I may say that the hon. gentleman's opinion would have been of immense assistance to the Conservative party, if he had been here to give it in 1872, when this matter was being discussed, for among all the learned men who then represented the Conservative party, not one seems to have stumbled across the wonderful discovery which my hon. friend has shown the House. The Hon. John Hillyard Cameron, who would be considered in this House or anywhere else, considerable authority on such matters, and who made an argument in vindication of the Treaty of Washington, claimed that all the rights we had under the Anglo-Russian Treaty became abrogated by the cession of Alaska to the United States, but it never seemed to have occurred to his acute mind that there was any difference between the Porcupine, Yukon and the Stikine rivers, although such an argument would have been of immense value to him if he had been able to maintain it. But unfortunately for my hon. friend opposite, I am able to quote an opinion which he will not venture to dispute—the opinion of the great patriot and perfect statesman who led the Conservative party, and the man who made the Washington Treaty. I refer to the late Sir John Macdonald. That gentleman made a speech in the course of the debate, and in that speech he said, referring to these three rivers by name, and especially mentioning the Yukon—and his statement is very clear and emphatic, as his statements generally were:—

Sir, I am not unaware—

No doubt he became aware after the event, because there is not the slightest indication that he knew it before.

Sir, I am not unaware that under the old treaty entered into between Russia and England, the former granted the latter free navigation of all the streams in Alaska.

Is there any doubt about that? There is an opinion which I do not think the hon. gentleman will dispute. But perhaps in that I am mistaken, because if I read the history of New Brunswick aright, in the days when Sir John Macdonald led the Conservative party, my hon. friend did not give it a very loyal or earnest or enthusiastic support.

Now, what have we on this question. On the one side, we have the opinion of my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney), very emphatically and ably expressed, and we must give him full credit for the weight of his opinion. On the other hand, we have the opinion of the Hon. Chas. Sumner, the Hon. Edward Blake and the Hon. John Hillyard Cameron, and the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald. I do not wonder, therefore, very much, that when my hon. friend undertook to press his opinion on the House, he felt it necessary to present his credentials as having been a pupil of Washburne and a number of other distinguished authorities. I think the opinion of these gentlemen I have just named makes it plain beyond doubt that in the treaty of 1825, the subjects of Her Majesty were granted the right to navigate the Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine rivers for all lawful purposes. Just here I might be permitted to say that, according to the doctrine as stated in the House the other day, emanating from the Hon. Chas. Sumner, it would have been open to this country to contend against the United States that even if the Treaty of St. Petersburg had never been negotiated, we could claim the free navigation of these rivers, under the doctrine of public law, annunciated by Chas. Sumner and always contended for and conceded by the United States. So that even if the treaty were not there, we might claim the right to navigate these rivers just as fully as we claim that right now. But under the clause of the treaty, there cannot be the shadow of doubt that we had the right to navigate the Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine for all lawful purposes. My hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney), however, says that the Treaty of Washington gave us wider rights than we previously enjoyed. I contend on the contrary, that it narrowed our rights, that it took away rights we had by the Treaty of St. Petersburg. Fortunately, there need be no discussion on this point. You know, Mr. Speaker, that there is not much use arguing the case after the court has decided against you. Well, on this point we have an authority we are bound to accept. We have the decision of the law officers of the Crown, which must be conclusive, in the case of Peter Martin, already quoted in this debate. Referring to the right of free navigation of rivers flowing through American territory to the sea, they said :

Although Russia could not voluntarily and without the consent of Great Britain withdraw, the rights conferred by that convention, that right, whatever may have been the nature of it, has been lost by the negotiations which led to the Treaty of Washington and by that treaty itself.

This statement proves both branches of my contention. First, it shows that the rights given by the Treaty of St. Petersburg were not extinguished by the cession of that country to the United States and could not be extinguished without the consent of Great Britain. In the second place, it shows that the rights given under the Treaty of St. Petersburg were extinguished by the Treaty of Washington. Therefore, for this reason, Lord Carnarvon says :

Being of opinion that the right of free navigation now depends on the 26th article of the Washington Treaty, which expressly states the navigation to be open for purposes of commerce, Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that a prisoner cannot lawfully be conveyed through Alaska by the Stikine River.

Mr. HAGGART. Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to tell us where the first quotation, just before the one he is now giving us, is from. I refer to the opinion of the law officers of the Crown. The latter quotation I know is in Lord Carnarvon's despatch.

Mr. McCLURE. It is from the decision in the case of Peter Martin. I cannot give the exact reference.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I think it was in 1875, during the time that Mr. Blake was Minister of Justice.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Lord Carnarvon's despatch was in 1877, and is in the journal of 1878. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him whether the statement he gave of the opinion of the law officers of the Crown was really a quotation or whether it was part of Lord Carnarvon's despatch ?

Mr. McCLURE. It is an exact quotation. You will find it in the sessional papers, Vol. XI.

Mr. HAGGART. That is Lord Carnarvon's, but we are asking about the other part.

Mr. McCLURE. The hon. gentleman will find the other part there too if he will look.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. McCLURE. If the hon. gentlemen desire very much to get the information, they can get it in the same way that I got it—by looking for it. And, if they are able to show that I have made any quotations that are inaccurate, I will be the first one to acknowledge it. But I challenge them to do so. Now the hon. gentleman made another statement in regard to the treaty of 1825. He asserted that this treaty really restricted the commerce, because there were certain articles that we were not allowed to take into that country. We were not allowed to take liquor, gunpowder, or firearms up that river. To be perfectly fair, the hon. gentleman should have told the House that there was a reciprocal agreement between the parties, that none of these articles should be sold to the natives of that country ; and I am not so sure that we should not generally agree that it would have been as well had such an excellent provision been included in the Treaty of Washington as well as in the treaty of 1825. There is no doubt that under the treaty of 1825 wider rights were given us than were given under the Treaty of Washington, and that these wider and more valuable rights were narrowed or taken away by the men who negotiated the Treaty of Washington at a later date. I do not propose to discuss longer this purely legal phase of the question. I think it has been abundantly proven that we had rights, previous to the Treaty of Washington, that were wider and more valuable than the rights we got by that treaty, and that the rights which we got by the previous treaty or that we had by public law, or by whatever means, previous to the Treaty of Washington, were taken away and narrowed, and to-day we must base our contentions entirely upon the Treaty of Washington—barring, of course, the possibility of being able to argue—a question I do not enter into at present—that the Treaty of Washington could not take away those rights. We have the decisions of the law officers of the Crown on that point, and for the present that must be conclusive.

Passing from this legal view of the question, my hon. friend had a number of objections to urge to this contract. In the first place he undertook to argue—referring to the question of urgency—that the Government was not obliged to proceed with great haste, because he was able to show from the reports of Mr. Ogilvie that the Government knew as early as 1896 that that country was rich in gold and that there was a probability of a great influx of immigration into it. So far as that is concerned, the late Sir John Macdonald knew, as far back as 1872, that the country was valuable, for he says so in his speech. Why did he not go ahead and build a railway then? I do not say he should have done so. The mere fact that the country was rich in gold or had vast resources is not the justification of this Bill. The justification of it is that the Government has forced upon it a certainty that, whether it is in the interest of the country or not, in spite of all warnings, there is bound to be in the next few years an enormous immigration into that country. It is the business of the Government to see, first, that law and order are maintained there, and they must therefore have ready access to the country; second, they must guard against the possibility of famine and disaster; and in the third place, they see that the indirectly stimulated trade of that country shall enure to the benefit of the people of Canada, and for these reasons and for these reasons alone they are justified in entering into the present contract. But the hon. gentleman says that this is not an all-Canadian route, and he says that it is not the best route, that the river is not navigable. But he does not undertake to tell us where the best route is. I would advise him to take the opinion of his chief in this House, who, inside the House and outside of it, has declared, with an authority that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) cannot have, as the spokesman of his party, that the Government had selected the best route, and not only that, but the only available route into that country. I understood the hon. member for Kent to say that before the Government rushed into this contract while doubts existed, they should have had some conference with the authorities at Washington and thus have secured a settlement of our rights. I take direct issue with the hon. gentleman there. I say this Government has no right to suppose for a moment that there is any doubt as to our rights on the Stikine River. We have a solemn treaty between the parties interested, in which it is agreed that we are to have the free navigation of this river for the purposes of commerce; and dealing with a free Government and a civilized people, we cannot suppose that "free navigation" means anything but free navigation. It is the duty of this Government to insist that every right we have to that river shall be maintained, and not cast doubts upon it by having any conference. We have not the broad rights we once had, and the day may come when we shall regret the sacrifice of those privileges; but the rights we have this Government have a mandate from the people of Canada to stand by, and the man who casts doubts upon them is no friend of Canada.

The hon. gentleman fears that this company cannot be compelled by the terms of their contract to put steamers on the river and lake. But if they do not put on these steamers, of what benefit will their railway be to them? How are they going to accumulate this vast store of wealth that the hon. gentleman says they are going to get out of the country? How are they going to get the vast wealth of timber, of which he speaks, down from its place of growth unless there are steamers on the river?

An hon. MEMBER. To make that $400,000,000.

Mr. McCLURE. I am coming to that.

Mr. McINERNEY. Timber is not usually taken down in steamers.

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta). He is going to float it down stream.

Mr. McCLURE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) will find that there are great difficulties in the rafting of logs in the Yukon country that do not exist in New Brunswick. But what about this wonderful story? The hon. gentlemen seem to fear that these men were going to become immensely wealthy by manufacturing lumber in that country. What authority did he give us for his statement? I noted the words as they fell from the hon. gentleman's lips, and they were these: "I have been told by a man who has lived for a number of years on the Pacific Coast in British Columbia that there are great lumber resources in that country." Coming from a lumbering country, my hon. friend ought to know that the gravest doubt and suspicion rest upon the information of any man who undertakes to speak as to the lumber resources of any country unless he has gone carefully over the territory instead of looking at it from a distance. The hon. gentleman quoted the opinion of Mr. Ogilvie in his opening remarks. He had so much faith in Mr. Ogilvie that he thought, that because, in 1896, Mr. Ogilvie said that country was rich, the Government should have got ready at once to build a railway into it. Will the hon. gentleman accept the opinion of Mr. Ogilvie as to the lumber resources of that great country? On pages 63 and 64 of the Official Guide, I read under the heading: "Timber for Use in Building and Manufactures," the following:—

The amount of this class of timber in the district along the river is not at all important. There is a large extent of forest which would yield firewood and timber for use in mines, but for the manufacture of lumber there is very little.

To give an idea of its scarceness, I may state that two of my party made a thorough search of all the timber land around the head of Lake Bennett, and down the lake for over ten miles, and in all this search only one tree was found suitable for making such plank as we required for the construction of our large boat.

Mr. FRASER. That is the tree the man from British Columbia saw.

Mr. McCLURE. But, fortunately, he did not cut it down, for if he had, perhaps Mr. Ogilvie could not have got his boat built.

This tree made four planks fifteen inches wide at the butt, seven at the top, and thirty-one feet long. Such other planks as we wanted had to be cut out of short logs, of which some ten to fourteen inches in diameter and ten to sixteen feet long could be found at long intervals. The boat required only 450 feet of plank for its construction, yet some of the logs had to be carried nearly 200 yards, and two saw-pits had to be made before that quantity was procured, and this on ground that was all thickly wooded with spruce, pine and some balsam, the latter being generally the largest and cleanest trunked. These remarks apply to the lumber until we reach the lower end of Marsh Lake. On the head of the river, near the lake, some trees of fair size, twelve to fourteen inches in diameter, and carrying their thickness very well, could be got but their number was small, and they were scattered.

Then, after some other remarks of a similar character, he concludes :

To estimate the quantity of timber in the vicinity of the river would be an impossible task—

And yet the hon. member for Kent, with the assistance of this British Columbia man, would undertake the impossible task.

—having only such data as I was able to collect on my way down.

That is where Mr. Ogilvie made his mistake. He should not have got any data coming down the river, he should have stayed in British Columbia, and then he would have known all about it.

I would, however, say that one-fourth of the area I have given as agricultural land would be a fair conjecture. This would give us two and a half townships, or ninety square miles of fairly well timbered ground, but it must be borne in mind that there is not more than a square mile or so of that in any one place, and most of the timber would be small and poor compared with the timber of Manitoba and the easterly part of the North-west Territories. At the boundary line I required, as I have already explained, a tree twenty-two inches in diameter at the ground, on which to erect my transit. An exhaustive search of over three square miles of the woods there, though showing many trees of convenient size for house logs and many for small clean planks, showed only one eighteen inches in diameter five feet above the ground.

It may be said that the country might furnish much timber which, though not fit to be classed as merchantable, would meet many of the requirements of the only industry the country is ever likely to have by mining.

So I do not think these people are going to make a fortune out of lumber. Four hundred millions is the amount they were estimated to make. With a profit of $2 on a thousand, they were going to make four hundred million dollars out of the lumber alone. Now, that was a gigantic calculation to base upon the information of an unknown man in British Columbia. I do not know whether he was a white man or not. I have a suspicion that he is very much like the story which the ex-Minister of Railways told us the other day, about the President of the United States having been reported to have said to somebody else, who said to somebody else, that reported it to him that he thought so and so was the case. In this case probably the man out in British Columbia had been told by some other Indian chief up the river that his forefathers were all of the opinion that there were great lumber reserves somewhere, but he did not know where they were. Possibly my hon. friend will find when he makes close inquiries from this very intelligent authority that the lumber has all been washed away by Noah's flood.

Mr. McINERNEY. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to set him right? I do not like to see him wander so much. Let me read to him from Mr. St. Cyr's report, which has been made since the flood :

Timber of good quality was seen at several places along the Hootalinqua River. It is mostly spruce of eighteen to twenty-four inches in diameter. It grows on the islands and the flats adjoining the stream. Some pines and cottonwood of large size were also noticed.

Mr. McCLURE. Exactly. Mr. Ogilvie told us the very same thing, that from a distance these things looked very well, but when you came to examine them, they did not pan out as they were expected to do. My hon. friend should know, coming from a lumber country, that experienced men who have gone out to hunt for lumber have got to examine the trees closely in order to know the character of the lumber. Mr. Ogilvie does say that on some islands in the river there were trees of fair size, but they were confined almost wholly to the islands, and he gives the reason for it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman any further. I do not know that I can say anything new in reference to this contract; but it is perhaps only right that, coming from a province far from the scene of action, I should undertake to express the views which I think the people of eastern Canada will take on this question. We have to-day a great mining boom on in this Yukon country. I want the hon. gentleman to remember that this is not the first time the world has had mining booms. I want the hon. gentleman also to notice that there is this marked distinction, this marked contrast, between the Yukon country and every other country in which great mining booms have taken place: That the Yukon country has absolutely no other resources except mining. This is a distinction which should be borne in mind. Years ago there was a mining boom in California. At a later date there was a great mining boom in Australia. To-day we have no mining booms in those countries. The eyes of the world are not attracted to California as they were once; men in all corners of the earth are not selling their possessions and rushing to Australia for gold as they once were. The mining boom has died out of those countries. But fortunately for Australia and for California they had vast resources of another character. They had agricultural resources, they had ports open to commerce, they had the finest climate in the world, and when the mining boom died out, they felt its indirect benefits in the stimulus that was given to other industries. We have a mining boom in the Yukon to-day. The history of the world leads us to believe that the probabilities are in favour of that mining boom dying out. Such are the probabilities, perhaps it will not, but all the chances are in favour of the mining boom dying out. And what position will the Yukon country be in then? Let the mining boom burst, and that country, having no resources of its own to fall back upon, the soil producing no food for man and little for animals, what is going to become of it? Therefore the Government have a right to look at that possibility in making their contract. I grant you they have a grave duty to perform. This stimulus that is being given to the trade of the country by the influx of miners to the Yukon district, is going to be of immense value to us. I believe that during the coming years we shall feel the pulsations of a larger life in every artery of commerce in this country in consequence of this mining boom. I believe that capital will be attracted to our country. I believe also that many hopes and many fortunes will be buried in the snowdrifts of the Yukon. But in the meantime the Government has a duty to perform. Above all others it is their duty to see that the government of the Yukon is conducted in such a way as to preserve peace and order, and secure the protection of property there. To that end it is necessary that we have an all-Canadian route into that country under our own control, for the purpose of properly governing that country. It is the bounden duty of this Government, and future generations will hold them to account if they do not perform it, to see that the barest possibility of the disaster of famine in those regions is dissipated by providing proper facilities of getting in there, of taking supplies into that country and of enabling immigrants to go in and to get out. Thirdly, it is the duty of the Government, a duty to which the people of this country will hold them, that they should take advantage on behalf of our people, of the present situation of affairs to secure, if possible, for Canada, all the benefits that arise from the stimulus to commerce. This, I believe, they are doing, but mark you, they can go no further. I believe that the people of eastern Canada are prepared to bear their fair share of the burdens in developing the North-west. I know some of them think that we have already borne enough, but I believe if it were necessary to bear more they would do it. But mark you, the people of Canada will never authorize this Government, or any other Government, to invest the public funds of this country in a gambling speculation. When the people of Canada invested their money in the Canadian Pacific Railway they thought they paid a big price, but they were building a railroad through a country which, as time goes on, will increase in value, and the resources of which can never be exhausted. But when we build a railroad into the Yukon, the experience of the world leads us to believe that a few years hence the mining boom will be over, and that country will be practically of no value. The work of constructing a railway to the Yukon is unquestionably a speculative enterprise, and I believe therefore that this Government have taken the only course which prudence would indicate. They have assumed their responsibility, clearly and openly, and have definitely announced their policy, which will find a warm response in the hearts of the people—that the Klondike must for ever pay for the Klondike.

Mr. MACLEAN. Mr. Speaker, the Yukon railway proposition now before the House ought to be condemned here, ought to be condemned everywhere else, as indeed it is to-day condemned in this Canada of ours. Furthermore, I believe it is condemned by all thoughtful men throughout the country, who hope that the time has come when the great monopolies must be regulated, when the supremacy of the state over the great corporations must be vindicated, and when an end must be put to those monopolies under which we are to-day if we are not to become the slaves of those great monopolies. I am here to give a very simple reason why I am opposed to this contract, and my reason, I hope, will be on high grounds. I will try to express the opinion entertained by those people in this country and other countries who think that the time has come for the regulation of monopolies, for a new departure in respect to the transportation problem, and I hope yet to see something done by this House in that direction.

When confederation was inaugurated in this country the main question before the people was the interpretation of our constitution and the building up of the country by the introduction of new provinces. That has been accomplished. The next question which came up in connection with the constitutional question was the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. After that there was the trade issue; and that was settled by the adoption of the National Policy, introduced by the Conservative party, now taken over by hon. gentlemen opposite. The constitutional question has in the main been settled. The great question to-day is the transportation problem. The great purchasing centre of the world is the British market. The countries who desire to get there are Russia, North America, including Canada and the United States, Argentina in South America, and Australia. These five great countries are trying to get produce there by paying the lowest possible freight rates, and only such countries will get there as are able to obtain the lowest freight rates for their produce. The time has come when the question should be determined: what should be the policy adopted in order to get produce there at the cheapest possible rates? That is the whole question and it is before us to-day, and hon. members and the Government are bound to take some position in respect to the solution of this problem; they are bound to do something to regulate the transportation monopoly that exists to-day. We find, however, that instead of regulating this monopoly, the Government are strengthening it and even building it up. If that is really the case, and I shall endeavour to show that such is the fact, hon. gentlemen opposite are to be condemned for the position they have taken and to be condemned for the legislation they have introduced in this House. No doubt a monopoly is created by this legislation proposed. That is apparent from the contract, and it has not been denied. It has been stated that there will be a competing road, and indeed that roads may be chartered by British Columbia. That may be so, but the fact is this, that a provincial charter has been acquired by Mackenzie & Mann including a large provincial land subsidy, and that firm is now obtaining a Dominion charter with a large Dominion land grant with it; and thus a vigorous monopoly has been created which will rule that country and which will enable the company to make their own tariff rates and in fact do as they please. Hon. members, out and out Reformers, coming from the North-west, raised the cry in this House from year to year that there was a monopoly created in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Those members from the North-west Territories who thus condemned that railway monopoly, are here to-day to propose that a monopoly in regard to freight rates shall be placed on the miners of the country. If it were wrong to create a monopoly in case of the farmers of the North-west, is it not equally wrong to create a monopoly against the miners? That is what is done by the contract—it creates a monopoly in the carrying trade in which the miners of the Yukon are interested. Hon. gentlemen opposite profess to be progressive, to be in favour of progressive legislation; but so far as I can gather they are reactionists. Max Nordau has told us about the decadents of the present day, but he would find a good example on the other side of the House. They are not progressive, they are degenerates, at all events so far as the present question is concerned. They are not attacking monopoly, but strengthening it. Speaking for myself and for a large section of the community, I make bold to say that we must restrain those monopolies and declare in favour of the supremacy of the state over them; we must do something to minimize their strength and importance and not increase and strengthen them, as hon. gentlemen opposite are now doing. The last speaker (Mr. McClure) discussed the question from the legal standpoint. I can only discuss it from the standpoint of the ordinary thinking man. Viewed in such light, I say the contract is bad because its terms are bad. Because there may be urgency, is that any reason why a monopoly should be created? If there is urgency, is it wise to seek to relieve it by adopting a measure that is wrong in principle? Hon. gentlemen opposite contend that it is necessary in order to build this railway to give Mackenzie & Mann over 4,000,000 acres of most valuable mining lands. It is not necessary to do so. The Government have to-day a proposal which is a much better one for the people of this country than that accepted from Mackenzie & Mann, and I will read it to the House before I conclude. The people of the country are watching hon. gentlemen opposite to see if they carry out their promise to protect the public interest, and how can they say they are protecting the public interest in view of the large land grant proposed to be given to these contractors, and this in face of the proposition submitted by Mr. Hamilton Smith. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I now propose to read that proposition to the House, and I ask my hon. friends from British Columbia and the North-west to see whether with their votes they can justify this proposition of the Government in the light of this offer from Mr. Hamilton Smith.

An hon. MEMBER. Who is he?

Mr. MACLEAN. He is a representative of large capitalists in Great Britain, and his credentials are undoubted. He has presented his credentials to the Government, and if they care to wire to London, as he says in his letter, they will find that his credentials are as good as those of the Rothschilds themselves. His proposition is as follows:—

To the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, G.C.M.G., Premier:

Sir,—In view of the strongly expressed opposition to the subsidy of mineral lands, with power to the concessionaire of selection in very many different localities, I beg leave to amend my proposition of the 14th inst., as follows:—

If a charter is granted to myself and associates not later than the 10th of March next, we will agree in the present year to build a substantial railway of three feet gauge (so constructed that it can afterwards be easily changed to a standard gauge), from Pyramid Harbour to the foot of Rink Rapids, a distance of about 288 miles, on condition that the Government will give no new charter for railways from Lynn Canal in the next five years; will authorize for that term proper traffic rates, and will give us a grant in fee simple (covering mineral rights) of alternate sections of one mile square for a distance of ten miles on each side of the railway from the 60th parallel of latitude to the northern terminus at Rink Rapids; this grant would embrace a length of about 195 miles, and, being at the rate of 6,400 acres per mile of railway, would amount to say 1,248,000 acres.

In this connection I may state that very little prospecting for gold has been thus far done in this locality.

Permit me again to call your attention to the fact that the ocean terminus of this Dalton line is nearer Dawson City than the northern terminus of the proposed Stikine line.

If Mr. Jennings's advice be carried out that the railway should be extended ten miles north of end of Lake Teslin, the distance from inner terminus of Stikine line to Dawson would be 550 miles, or thirty-seven miles farther from Pyramid Harbour to Dawson.

Versus Mackenzie and Mann.

Or, if Government still insists on Stikine line alone, we will build that on same general terms as the provisional contract with Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann for 1,000,050 acres, but without the right of lateral or end extension of the blocks of land.

The Government is, I believe, informed as to our financial ability to execute such work, but if there are any doubts to this, a cable or so to London would speedily give the desired information.

I have the honour to remain,

Yours very respectfully,

Mr. MORRISON. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean), what is the date of that letter?

The PRIME MINISTER. It is the 18th February.

Mr. MACLEAN. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) doubt it? It was put in the hands of the Government.

Mr. MACLEAN.

Mr. MORRISON. On the 18th February. The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Saturday last.

Mr. MACLEAN. Yes; Mr. Hamilton Smith put his proposition in on the 14th, and this letter is subsequent to that. He is prepared to execute this road in the same time as Mann & Mackenzie, and he is prepared to execute it for one-fourth of their land grant, and without any monopoly. That is the proposition before the people, and it is on that and on similar propositions that the Government will be judged. It is on the right of all contractors to bid for this work; it is on the record of the Liberal party that no contract should be granted unless all contractors had a chance to tender for it; it is on these propositions that hon. gentlemen opposite will be tried before the country, and will be condemned before the country, if they do not retrace their steps. If the Government opposite are condemned, they will be condemned effectually, and it will be found, as it was found after four years' trial of Liberal Government in 1873, that—as my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) said here the other day, and for which he was ridiculed—that the Liberal party have not the gifts of magistracy, and have not the instincts of government.

This proposition of Mr. Hamilton Smith is to build a railway beginning at Pyramid Harbour, and I stand here to-day to contend that Pyramid Harbour is in Canada, that the road from Pyramid Harbour right into Dawson City is entirely in Canada, and that it is a better Canadian route than the one the Government proposes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Whose possession is it in?

Mr. MACLEAN. It should be in ours, and if the hon. gentleman raises the question, then I say it is his (Sir Louis Davies) fault that it is not in our possession.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not ask if it was ours, but I asked in whose possession it was.

Mr. MACLEAN. It should be in ours, and you are responsible that it should be in our possession.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MACLEAN. I do not wish to trespass on the rules by addressing the hon. Minister directly, but I say the Government is responsible if it is not in our possession. I contend that Pyramid Harbour is in Canadian territory, and that the line should be built from there.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I just ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean), if he knows whether or not this harbour has been in possession of the Americans for a number of years back —before this Government came into power at all.

Mr. MACLEAN. I know that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Away back fifteen or twenty years ago.

Mr. MACLEAN. I do not deny that for a moment.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then, how does the hon. gentleman contend that this Government, which only came into power in July, 1896, could at all be responsible for the fact that the Americans held possession of it for over twenty years before this Government came into power?

Mr. MACLEAN. The hon. gentleman will be held responsible for refusing this offer. He and his Government will be held responsible if they do not occupy that territory, and if they do not maintain the rights of Canada, whatever they be, in connection with it.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Next week we may have a better offer.

Mr. MACLEAN. Yes, it is altogether likely that you will, and there is where you stand convicted that you did not notify contractors, for the moment that this Government contract becomes widespread, men come in and offer to take it up at much better terms for the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the rise of monopolies is the most dangerous thing to the world to-day. The influence they exercise on legislatures, and the shackles they forge on the people in every direction, is exciting widespread interest all over. If, as they say, a revolution is threatened in the United States, it is because the growth of these monopolies which are getting stronger and stronger every day, and which have now become so powerful that the people of the United States have lost faith in their representative institutions. Representative institutions are to-day almost a failure in that country, and they soon will be a failure in this country, if these enormous monopolies are created and allowed to rule and dominate Canada. Sir, they, and not the Canadian Parliament, will soon be the masters of Canada. I make bold to say, that it is not Mann & Mackenzie that are here, but it is that monster monopoly, the Canadian Pacific Railway. That is the corporation that this Government are building up. True, they deny it; but I believe there was an option at the time of this proposal, and if this railway proposition goes through, it will not be many moons before the time-tables and everything else in connection with the Yukon road will be signed by Sir William VanHorne, and not by William Mackenzie. Not only do these railway monopolies threaten our representative institutions, not only have they brought the people of the United States to think that representative government has been a failure, but they have caused the people over there to clamour for direct legislation by the people themselves. In the United States the people are to-day demanding that such matters as this should be submitted to the popular vote, and, Sir, if this Yukon Railway contract were submitted to the people of Canada, it would be condemned from one end of the country to the other. I only hope that this Government will take this question to the country; I only hope that this Bill will meet with defeat in some other quarter, and that the Government will go to the country on it. I would like to see them ask the electorate of Canada to endorse a proposal such as this, not only on its merits, or rather demerits, but in the light of this other proposal that has been made by Mr. Hamilton Smith. Let me ask: Who are bringing forward all these propositions in the country? I ask my hon. friend from North Brant (Mr. Somerville) to pay a little attention to what I have to say in this respect, for he has had some journalistic experience, and so have I. Both the Yukon Railway proposition and the Crow's Nest Railway proposition of last year were brought before the people of Canada in a very mysterious way. They were first announced and the way paved for them in the columns of the Toronto "Globe," a newspaper well known to hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, I have no objection to the "Globe" newspaper, as a newspaper. It has been the Liberal organ, and it has been a very good paper for the Liberal party in this country; but something has happened within the last few years, and hon. gentlemen on the opposite side ought to know it, and probably do know it. The "Globe" has passed into the control of monopolists. Instead of being the conscience of its party, as it ought to be, it is the organ of railway exploiters, who are taking advantage of the position the "Globe" stands in to its party, and are using it for their own ends, and are using it for the ruin of the Liberal party. Let the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—let these monopolists—go into the newspaper business, if they wish, but let them go into it openly. If hon. gentlemen opposite have any interest in their party, if they have any interest in their chief organ, they will say that the day has come when the paper that professes to be their organ and to speak for them and to keep the conscience of their party—the day has come when that newspaper must pass out of the hands of these railway exploiters.

Now, all these propositions have come forward in this way. You see them hinted at in the "Globe" newspaper and other papers friendly to the Administration, and especially to the railway monopolists. This proposition has not emanated from the Government; it is not a Government proposition, as a matter of fact. It is a proposition which was brought forward by railway exploiters, submitted by them to special members of the Cabinet, and by those special members introduced into this House. It is not a Government measure at all, but a measure submitted by these railway exploiters, and the Government was induced to take it up, especially through the agency of the Toronto "Globe." There is another feature of this monopoly which will come out in a very few days. The gentlemen who have made this proposition are very enterprising men, who are looking for good things all the world over. They have acquired the street railways in most of the cities of this country. They acquired the street railway franchise in the city of Toronto, for which they paid very little; and what they did was to issue bonds to pay for the entire cost of that road, and on these bonds they issued $6,000,000 of stock, divided it among themselves and sold it to the public; and to-day that stock is at par. They have done the same thing with many other street railway franchises in this country, and with certain electric plants; and now they propose to do it with this project. I believe there is a statement in the papers to-day that within twelve months, if this project goes through Parliament, these gentlemen will be able to bond it to the extent of fifteen or twenty million dollars. And, Sir, there is another thing in the wind. If there is one thing that will help to settle the transportation question in this country—and again I appeal to my hon. friends from the North-west and British Columbia—it is state control of a railway from Port Arthur to Winnipeg. That is the key to the situation; that is the key that must be saved at any cost to the people of this country. But what are the facts, so far as hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends in the Ontario Legislature are concerned? The charter for the Rainy River Railway and the provincial subsidy that goes with it have passed into the hands of Mr. Mackenzie. Mr. Mackenzie, as the papers tell us—and I presume they tell the truth—has been in Winnipeg negotiating with Mr. Greenway, the Premier of the province of Manitoba. Mr. Greenway is staking his political reputation upon securing a railway that will guarantee a low rate for the transport of wheat from the province of Manitoba to Lake Superior. He threatened at one time to take the railway to Duluth; but I understand that his friends here asked him to abandon Duluth, and go to Port Arthur or some other Ontario port. I believe he has that end in view; but Mr. Mackenzie being in possession of the charter of that railway, without being required to make any terms as to rates or running rights over it, will have in his hands a monopoly which will have cost him little, but which he can sell for millions to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. We know that hon. gentlemen opposite are to be asked to subsidize a rival railway from Port Arthur to Winnipeg; but if they cannot take a stand in regard to the Yukon Railway, how can they be expected to take a stand in regard to the Rainy River Railway? I know what they are going to do; I can forecast it, as I correctly forecast some other things that have happened. They will do as they have done on other occasions, make a pretence of regulating that railway; but the end will be that it will pass into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west will continue to be under their thumb. The day has come to declare for a Government railway, the day has come to declare that this Yukon Railway should be a Government railway, on which the Government should regulate the rates, not once in four years, but every day in the week. Hon. gentlemen may not take the advanced line I take for the complete Government ownership of railways; but the day has come for the complete control of railway rates by the Government, and the granting of running rights over the railways of the country to anybody who may apply for them. These are the principles that ought to govern railway legislation to-day; but they are being abandoned by hon. gentlemen opposite. The people of the United States are alive to this question. They are under railway monopolies there, but what is the proposal of one of their ablest thinkers in regard to the transportation problem as set out in the "North American Review" of this month?—and I advise hon. gentlemen to read it. This well informed writer shows the necessity of regulating railways and controlling their rates, and his proposal is to nationalize every road west of the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean. He says that will be the one cure of the evil; and we in this country must do the same thing. We must nationalize the railways, I do not care how large or how small they may be. We must keep Parliament supreme over them; we must control their rates, and we must give running rights over them to any railway that may require them. But hon. gentlemen opposite are not taking one single step in this direction. They are simply doing their best to create a new monopoly, and to allow it to be absorbed by the greater monopoly, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. FLINT. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Is it his opinion that Government should have built this Yukon Railway as a Government work out of borrowed or other money?

Mr. MACLEAN. That is my view, decidedly. The Government should have built this road out of Government money, and kept it in our own hands. The people would vote the necessary money for that purpose to-morrow. If you bring down a proposition to build that railway, for which I admit the urgency, with Government money, though I cannot speak for the Opposition, I believe every man on this side of the House would vote for it. It is not the members on this side of the House, but their own friends who may not have enough confidence in them to support such a proposition, that they need to convert. Hon. gentlemen were very careful last year in the Railway Committee to put a certain clause in all railway bills which went through that committee. There was a company chartered last year under the name of the British Yukon Company, and in that charter there is this clause :

Any Act hereinafter passed for the purpose of controlling railway companies incorporated by or subject to Parliament as to the issuing of stock or bonds, and as to rates or tolls and the regulations thereof, and as to running powers over or other rights in connection with the railway of any company by any other company, and the exercise of powers conferred upon railway companies, shall apply to the companies from the time such Act goes into effect ; but this section shall not be construed to imply that such Act would not apply to the company without the enactment of this section.

Why did they not put that clause in this railway Bill ? If they are to have a railway commission, as is hinted in the House and in the country, why do they not retain some right over this railway by that railway commission when it does come ? An honest railway commission could do a great deal to ameliorate transportation difficulties in this country, and this road above all roads, this road which is to be built entirely by means of the land of the people—for it is the people who are building the road and giving Mann & Mackenzie the monopoly of an immense quantity of land—this road above all others requires to be controlled by a commission in the interests of the people. Do hon. gentlemen opposite say that Mann & Mackenzie are building this road ? I say it is the people who are building it and who ought to own it and control it and regulate its rates and be in a position to give running rights to any other railway to whom they may see fit. The Government have not even retained the right to submit these matters to arbitration. They provide that in four years, in ten years—different times—the rates shall be reduced, but they should retain the power to regulate these rates from the start and compel the company to accept reasonable terms. But hon. gentlemen opposite, despite all their protestations out of office, are now doing everything in an off-handed, ill-advised way. Every proposal in that Bill is in direct antagonism to the public interest, to recognized principles of modern railway legislation, and especially to the principles that these hon. gentlemen advocated when in Opposition. They then clamorously contended for the submission to tender of the construction of all public works. They then declared that no public work of any importance should be constructed without everybody having had a chance to compete. But here to-day we have them calmly ignoring this cardinal principle of their faith in Opposition and making a private treaty for this most important and expensive undertaking without the slightest pretense of having invited tenders. Had they invited competition, they would have had, inside of three days, a proposal at least just as good as the one offered to them. But instead of inviting competition, they made a secret contract, and now must take the consequences.

I hope the Bill will be defeated, first, because it is wrong in itself ; second, because it is against the principles of progressive railway legislation ; third, because it is opposed to the true interests of the people.

It only requires a few independent men to stand up on the other side and state boldly what they think and this Bill will not go through. A cove of five men on the other side would upset this proposition. If the men of the North-west are true to their principles and provinces, they will stand up in opposition to this iniquitous measure ; and if only four men on the other side rose and spoke against it, that would be sufficient to defeat it. The men from the North-west cannot sit there quietly and vote for a monopoly of this kind ; they cannot vote for this squandering of the public land of this country. The people of the North-west want to see the railway legislation of this country established on a better basis. There is not one of the representatives in the North-west who dare get up in this House and vote and support the shackling of the miners of Yukon in the way proposed by this contract and then justify their claim that the farmers of the North-west should have the shackles that have been put on them by the Canadian Pacific Railway broken. If the North-west claims that she has been badly treated by the Canadian Pacific Railway, then her representatives cannot with any grace support the putting of similar shackles on the miners of the Yukon. I believe that the public opinion of the North-west and that the public opinion of British Columbia—outside from the feeling among the merchants in the two large cities out there—is against this proposition.

Hon. gentlemen opposite claim that we must have the road and that it must be built this year. I do not deny that, but I object to the monopoly, I object to the land grab, and I say that for one-fourth of that land grab you could get the road built and keep the control in the hands of the Government. If that be the case, the representatives of the great west and British Columbia must, as honest men, oppose this measure.

Mr. MORRISON. As far as the remarks of the hon. gentleman refer to British Columbia, may I tell him that he is talking twaddle.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should not make use of that expression.

Mr. MACLEAN. I am not talking twaddle, and I will go out to the hon. gentleman's country—I hope to be there this summer—and if he will call a public meeting, I will attend it and tackle him on that question, and we will find out where the twaddle is. Can these hon. gentlemen stand up here and justify this land grab? Can they go back to their people and justify such a proposition in the face of all their pledges and in the face of the new offer just read to the House? If hon. gentlemen will stand up here and condemn the Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly which has been fastened on the farmers of the North-west, I do not see how they can consistently justify this monopoly which is being put upon the miners of the Yukon.

I may have wearied the House, but I think I am speaking for the progressive public opinion of this country. I know that there is a party in this country, a progressive party—perhaps I will call it the Forward Conservatives of the country—who recognize the fact that the transportation problem is the one, above all others, which we must solve, and that if we do not approach it in the right spirit and in the right way, we shall do the country incalculable damage. But if we start in now to get on the right line, if we now regulate every railway, as it comes up, and keep control over its running rights, we will have gone a long way to improving the position. I appeal to hon. gentlemen who form the Government to withdraw this proposal or at least to modify it. But if they choose to go on and refuse to withdraw or modify the Bill, the sooner they go to the country and ask the people to approve this iniquitous measure, the sooner they will find out that they stand condemned by the people as a whole.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I wish to address a few remarks, Mr. Speaker, to the House upon this measure, and in doing so I desire, in the first place, to make a few references to those which have just fallen from the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean). I think that hon. gentleman was very much mistaken when he said that the people of British Columbia were opposed to this measure; and as his appeal was especially directed to the people of British Columbia, Manitoba, and the North-west Territories, I would advise him to read the organs of both parties in British Columbia and he will find that there is a consensus of opinion in that province, amounting to a unanimity, in favour of the Government's action. There may not, I admit, be the same unanimity after the hon. gentleman invades that country and calls those meetings, but in the meantime we must take the facts as they are.

The hon. gentleman's whole address was directed to three points, and what they had to do in many respects with this particular contract, I am at a loss to understand. He spoke about monopolies generally—not the monopoly of this particular company—and the public ownership of railways, and the appointment of a railway commission. Now, I admit that there is much to be said in favour of the three matters to which the hon. gentleman referred. There are thoughtful men who think that the railways of a country ought to be owned by the Government, and there are thoughtful men who think that a railway commission should exist in every country, and I am sure there is not a thoughtful man in Canada who does not believe thoroughly that the continuation of extension of monopolies is not in the best interests of the country. But what have these matters to do with this question? The Canadian Pacific Railway is a monopoly, so the hon. gentleman says. When did this new light dawn upon him? What has he been doing all these years, when, as the proprietor and publisher of a Conservative paper, he stood by the men who were the authors of this monopoly? Is his new-born zeal now going to atone for his conduct in the past? But even now he has not sufficient strength to say it is a monopoly. He hints, he says: "If it is a monopoly," and I would have listened to my hon. friend's remarks with a great deal of pleasure if he had said that from the darkness in which he had groped formerly he had now emerged, and that having seen the light he is opposed to all monopolies and is sorry he ever stood by this one. But no such thing did he say. He says the "Globe" is a monopoly, and Mackenzie & Mann are a monopoly; and he mentions frequently that Mackenzie & Mann were monopolists because they own the Toronto Street Railway. That is unkind of the hon. gentleman because he did all he could to fasten that monopoly upon the people.

Mr. MACLEAN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. FRASER. In every issue of his paper, until at last he succeeded, he called upon the people of Toronto to have the cars run on Sunday, and thus make all the greater monopoly—

Mr. MACLEAN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me a moment. I advocated in my newspaper the municipalization of the Toronto Street Railway franchise and the management of it for the benefit of the people.

Mr. FRASER. I do not refer to the handing over of that franchise to the present holders.

Mr. MACLEAN. But that is my record.

Mr. FRASER. But I wanted to show the hon. gentleman's consistency. When these gentlemen held this monopoly, he did all he could to have the cars run on Sunday and so assist the monopolists to make more money.

Mr. MACLEAN. I wanted the cars to run on Sunday for the benefit of the people.

Mr. FRASER. As to this matter of "shackling the miners," can the hon. gentleman be serious? Is he discussing the question having in view the nature of the country through which the railway goes, or does he regard it as a fine country with every advantage of Ontario or the Northwest? He says that a new offer was put in on Saturday to build for half the land. It is only, then, the difference between one-half and the whole. But, if only half the land is given, the hon. gentleman is quite ready to have this line of three-foot gauge so graphically described by hon. gentlemen opposite.

An. hon. MEMBER. It is only one-quarter the land.

Mr. FRASER. I think the hon. gentleman said 1,800,000 acres.

Mr. McALISTER. No, 1,000,000.

Mr. FRASER. I distinctly heard the hon. gentleman speak of 1,800,000 acres, but perhaps, that was for the other road?

Mr. MACLEAN. Yes.

Mr. FRASER. I will accept the hon. gentleman's statement that it is only one-quarter of the land. Then it becomes only a question of quantity. What noble consistency, to say that with four acres a monopoly is infamous, but with only one acre it is all right.

Mr. MACLEAN. I did not support the new proposition.

Mr. FRASER. Then there is no point in what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. MACLEAN. There is a point of public competition.

Mr. FRASER. Then, the hon. gentleman is not in favour of giving an acre of land?

Mr. MACLEAN. No.

Mr. FRASER. Then there was no need to urge the difference in quantity. But, after all, what is this new-born monopoly that the hon. gentleman has spoken of? Does the monopoly consist in the granting of subventions to railways in any case? If so, all the Governments in this country, and in every country in the world in the early history of railways have been wrong. But in railway monopoly that will really injure the people is one in which a railway has an advantage in a country which, by settlement, will be an advantage for all time. This is not a monopoly according to those terms.

Now, let us know where we stand. There are three things on which we are agreed, and, if we state these clearly and set them aside, we can reach a basis for argument. First of all, it is agreed by both sides that the urgency is great, that it is absolutely necessary that this road should be built this year. Secondly, the route decided upon, according both to the Government and to the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Maclean's) leader, the route which has been chosen is the best route. The hon. gentleman is sometimes strong enough to say that he has no leader. Be that as it may, I accept the sanction of the leader of the Opposition when he agrees with the Government as to the route. The third thing that we were agreed on is that the road ought to be in British territory. If it is urgent that the road should be built this summer, and if it is true, that in respect to this road days are of more value than months would be in the case of another road, then the Government is right in taking steps to save every possible moment. Then, if the route is agreed upon, the Government cannot be blamed for having chosen this route. If we all agree and we do, I trust, that in building that road, whether for purposes of peace, whether for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants with all that is necessary to prosecute their labours in that country, or to defend ourselves against lawlessness there, we should go through British territory, then we have eliminated from the discussion all that appeared at first to be the strong point raised by hon. gentlemen opposite. This leaves us but little to discuss. The question is simply whether the Government are giving too much to these contractors. But, before going on with that, I must refer to one matter that has struck me as peculiar during the days we have spent in debating this question. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) in his first interview, gave the Government credit for acting as it had acted. I was prepared to find the hon. gentleman patriotic when he was not surrounded by small souls and small minds, though his opinion that the Government had acted rightly might well cause me to doubt the fact on my own account. But when my hon. countryman came here he was at once arrested. It was a case of York, and York and York. The gentlemen from York determined that the leader should be throttled. I will not use the term applied by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) when he spoke—I will not say that these hon. gentlemen were cut-throats; I will not say that they were determined to cut their leader's throat; that would be inelegant. But these three giants decided that, in the interests of the Conservative party this man must be stopped. The sinister motives they may have had I have nothing to do with. They were hinted at by the hon. member for North Victoria. He said the object was to depose the leader and gain his place. And when these giants of the Conservative party united, I think I can hear a member of the party say: Now is the winter of our discontent made glorious summer by three sons of York. These men came and they succeeded. For a number of days I have sat here and watched the hon. leader of the Opposition and the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) as they sat together. It was almost a representation without words of the song: "We never speak as we pass by." It was very amusing to see. There was a jerkiness to the conversation; there was a lack of sympathy in the tones of the voice; there was everything to indicate that matters needed setting right. I congratulate the leader of the Opposition upon one thing—that he has so far laid aside his own opinion for the sake of harmony that he has yielded; that he has not caused another strike on the part of the Conservative leaders such as was seen previous to his own advent to power. But a flood of light is thrown upon the whole transaction. In his better moments the ablest man in the Conservative party declared that this contract was all right. I am sure that at this moment the leader of the Opposition feels—if I may be allowed to say so—that he made a mistake in his retrograde movement, for, after all, when a great emergency arises, nothing so exalts a man as to rise above minor considerations and approve the wise and patriotic plans of those who are opposed to him.

I do not wish to speak on the question of boundary. I have little to say upon that subject, for I feel that the less we say about what we own and what we do not own there, the better. Even the opinion of the humblest member may be quoted against this. But this one thing is plain: We can in no way get more than we have. If the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite is correct, that the treaty of 1871 gave us as much right as the old treaty that we had with the Russians, then there is no need of any further discussion, because we have the rights there, they were given under that treaty. But I am not going to discuss the question, even as to the rights we have. We are now face to face with the question of getting into the Yukon; and I agree with my hon. friend the member for Colchester (Mr. McClure), that in the meantime we should hold to all we have. Sir, I did much regret that there should be found any member of Parliament who would say—I have no doubt he did it in an unguarded moment—who would even hint here, that there should be an attempt made by this Government with the Government of the United States, to go a-begging to find where we are. Would we not be in a nice position, if that was done? Would they not say at once to us: Well, we will see about that. We claim this, and we claim that, and we claim the other thing. If you come here, you are not sure of your ground. That is what they would say. Surely it would be very bad policy for a man wishing to submit a question to arbitration, who had a difficulty with his neighbour as to the ownership of an adjoining piece of land, to go to him and say: Where is my line? and that in a case where he was bound to bring an action. It would be the worst policy in the world, because he would be estopped afterwards; he would be told: You did not know your own line, and you came to me to find out where your line was. That meeting would be brought up against him. No; the Government took the only dignified position that any Government could take. They said: Whatever rights we have there we are going to maintain. It was very amusing to hear the hon. gentleman opposite actually blaming the present Government. What would he not blame them for, in all his zeal against monopoly? He blames them because a port was occupied by the United States under the eye of the chief that he loved and served, served too faithfully, if not too well, for eighteen years, and he blames the present Government because they have not wrested the port from the Americans. In what way are you going to put those people out of possession? I suppose the hon. gentleman would be ready to join a filibustering party to go up there and throttle the Americans and put them out. We cannot put them out; Canada can do nothing. It is British territory, and the whole matter must be decided by the British Government. You cannot do it. Would not the very fact of raising this objection and going there to-day, so irritate the people of the United States, that nothing could be done? Now, then, if I am right, we have agreed upon the essentials of the question, namely, the urgency, the route and the territory. Then, I think the discussion is reduced to a very small issue. Now, if it was urgent, it was urgent for some purpose. I have listened to the comical exhibitions of hon. gentlemen opposite, who think that land is so filled with gold that any man can go there and walk out with his pockets full. We are agreed upon one matter, that is, that for every dollar's worth of gold that ever was mined in the world, a dollar's worth of labour, so far as we can find out, has been given. That is what gives permanency to gold, that is what makes gold the best circulating medium, because it is something for which we give an amount of human labour, as much human labour as the value that is given to it as a circulating medium. That is the reason. Now, these hon. gentlemen think that they are going to make rich finds out there. Well, I go so far as to say this, that, even if I knew that these men were going to make fifty millions out of this contract, I would still vote for it, and I will tell you why. Suppose a man has a valuable farm or a valuable mine anywhere; say, it is worth $100,000, and there is no access to it, he cannot utilize it or get anything out of it, and he has no money. Now, the Government have the money, but they are in this position, they have the mines there, the people of Canada have. Then, I say, it pays that man to give half the value of the mine, or the land, to get $50,000 out of it, in order that he may get half its value. So it pays the country to give a subvention to a railway in order that the people of the country may get less than the whole value, by giving the balance of it. How, otherwise, are we going to get there? That is the principle upon which subventions are granted, that is the only reason that can be given for subventions. We hear the stories of gold. Why, every day, as I came back here when the House met at three o'clock, I expected to see a number of hon. gentlemen opposite away, flying to the Klondike, allured by the stories of gold. I understand that, at the little conference to which I referred a moment ago, a song sung by the hon. member for West York fixed the matter. I understand that, as they were attempting to get their leader into line, the point was raised: Well, perhaps the gold is not there that you speak about. Then, I understand, he sang this song, and that brought them all round:

The gold is there most everywhere,
And they dig it up with an iron bar;
And where it's thick, with spade and pick
They dig up junks as big as a brick.
Then ho! boys, go to Yukon City, go!

That settled the matter at once. That is just the view the hon. gentlemen have of it. That is the cry that may take hundreds and thousands into that gold country and send them back home poorer than they went. The fact is, that there is gold there, there may be much gold there. But it is in a country where, for months and months, nothing can be done. Hon. gentlemen speak of it as if it was a sunny climate. This railway itself can only be used for a short time, not more than half the year, at most; that is all the time it can be used to any advantage. But to get at the gold we must, as I said before, have this railway. Now, if it was urgent, I thought I could picture to myself the hon. leader of the Opposition and the position he would take. Suppose we said: Well, we will look round a little more, we will ask for offers, and perhaps by fall we will find out what we can do. I think I hear him rising and denouncing the Government for failing to give protection to life and to property. Here are people going in there by the thousands, with no opportunity of getting lumber to build their houses, with no opportunity of getting food, and they will starve. The plains will be covered with their whitened bones. The great desert in which the people of Israel wandered, will be nothing to it. I think I hear him pleading for his countrymen, going to the wives and mothers after the death of their beloved ones, and talking to them as no one could talk with greater ability—not to soothe them, not to awaken too much anger, but to show them all the difficulties. A poor mother is found whose son was lost. "Where was he lost?" asks the sympathizing leader of the Opposition. "Lost," says she. "lost here, near the Big Salmon. And I think, as there was another river near by, called the 'Little Salmon,' that at least he could have caught fish to keep himself alive." "Ah," says the leader of the Opposition, "there is where your beloved husband fell. I know your story. I feel for you, but I must tell you that you must blame the Government, who left that country without any means of access or egress. I call upon you now, madam, to make a vow here, before me, that you and all your kin will wage a war against the Government that left that country unoccupied." Along comes a maiden fair whose lover went out there to better his condition. She is weeping for "one who returneth not," whose chamber lamp burneth—no more." Where did he die? "At the White Horse Rapids," says the almost fainting maiden. A suitable place—Death, on the White Horse, met him there. There he laid him down to die.

I charge you to say that you will never forgive the Government that so neglected its duty. Is that a fancy picture? I tell hon. gentlemen that there is not an hon. member opposite—if he is a man, as I think he is—and I know them and give them credit for heart, who would not declare, if the Government had left the country during the present year without a railway, they were justified in speaking in that way. Do hon. gentlemen not think that the Government have not the right to say that the people under their charge should not be left without being guarded. Do hon. gentlemen think about the wild rush into that country. In view of immense gold discoveries men almost lose their reason; their only thought is how to get into the country, they are prepared to spend their money or borrow money on their property to secure transportation to the place where gold is. Hon. gentlemen opposite think that gold is in the Yukon. Many people are undoubtedly leaving for that country. Was this undertaking, therefore, not urgent? If the Government had left that country as it is now, in view of the thousands going in there and the many thousands that will go in during the year, I feel they would not be entitled to our sympathy and support. When this railway communication has been gained without any expenditure of money, and when the principle that the people of the country who receive the advantage should contribute to it has been established, I wonder that hon. gentlemen opposite can oppose it. The Government were not confronted with the circumstances surrounding an ordinary transaction. It was not a time to reason after the method of building a road to a back concession, or carrying a road through any of the well-settled parts of any of the provinces of Canada. They were met with a condition, not a theory. The condition was this, that there was a country, and the only way of getting there was over trails or by way of the Yukon River, and the Government had to view the situation and act accordingly.

A new proposition is made. That is the easiest thing in the world to do. I have been in the same position; I have been at an auction room where articles sold at a certain price, and I would have willingly given double the amount had I known their value. Why were these gentlemen not so willing to make such propositions before, I should like to know. Any man when he becomes satisfied that a scheme is a good thing, is willing to underbid; but the men now submitting this proposition are making it on one of two grounds: they are either making it on the strength of the wild statements of members of Parliament as to the great value of the mineral wealth of the country, or in the interest of hon. gentlemen opposite. They were not so ready before. During the few days that have elapsed between the two propositions, they have shown they were changing their opinions. The Government had no option, with the information at their disposal, than to make this contract and carry it out, and if to-day parties come forward and offer to do the work at one-half or one-quarter the price, I would say that we should lose three-quarters of the amount rather than give the work to them. The Government cannot afford to do so. It is very well known that this offer is made within about ten days of the time when the winter road must be finished; and this is another point that the Government had to take into consideration. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) has stated that this is not the Government policy, but the Government are in the hands of a lot of men, that lack of them are the contractors who are moulding their actions, and that the Government have nothing to do except what is ordered by those behind. I do not believe it for one moment. This new offer, coming as it does now, is in itself suspicious. But if the Government had done nothing until Parliament met, as the hon. gentleman claimed they should not have done, what position would they occupy? An hon. gentleman rose in the course of this debate on the Opposition side of the House and said he was ready to fight out the question on that line if it took all summer. Hon. gentlemen opposite are well aware that the Government would have been placed in a fix; no road would have been built this summer, and then when anarchy and want of food prevailed, they would have accused the Government of being responsible for this condition. Does not history prove that such is the case. I would not blame them for taking that advantage simply on party grounds. But the Government have anticipated their actions. At this time, when we are within ten days of the date when the winter road must be built, a new proposition is submitted. I will yield to no man in my view that the land should be for the people, pure and simple. I believe the land belongs to the people and I believe in the right of the people to own the land; but I believe just as fully that in order to give them access to land and to increase the value of the larger quantity, Parliament can be utilized to bring a larger benefit. It is a simple proposition. Would not the hon. gentleman and his leader—now that cordial relations have been re-established between them, for I think his leader said “hear, hear,” when the hon. gentleman announced how he would vote—if it became known that the Government had granted three or four millions for the construction of the road, have been among the first to declare that the road should have been built by a land grant, that 100,000 acres a mile would have been nothing because the land possessed no value until a railway was built. The hon. gentleman would have risen in his place in this House and have declared that the poor farmers and the poor fishermen were thus called upon to pay for the construction of the line. Is there a farmer or fishermen in Canada who would not be prepared to say frankly that they knew nothing of the Yukon country, but had heard of its mineral wealth, and if it was desirable to develop it by the construction of a railroad, it should be built from money derived out of the land. It must be remembered that there is no such thing as obtaining gold—save in a few instances—except by labour. When the people find that the Government equally with the contractors will benefit by the land grant, they will come to the conclusion that it cannot be a very bad bargain, for the Government will have alternate blocks with the contractors and will join with them in the advantages derived. Gentlemen opposite are agreed that the building of this road was urgent, and that the route selected is the proper one, then let me ask them is it not of great advantage that there should be a Canadian route. There are some members on the Conservative side who will argue when it suits them, or when they think they can make a point against the Government, that the road should be built through the White Pass and through American territory. Now, Sir, I claim that the advantages of this route selected by the Government are three-fold. First, from a commercial point of view; second, that we shall at all times have the sole right to go on that road, and, third, because on that road our supplies can never be interfered with. Suppose, for example, the Government had given a contract to build a road partially through American territory, as some have offered to build it, I think I can hear the full-blooded Britishers on the other side of the House rising in their places and saying: That is always the way with you over there; you are always giving privileges to the Americans; why did you not build the road through British territory. When these hon. gentlemen were in power we heard a good deal from them about British ideas, but now that they are in Opposition, some of them—with a few exceptions, I must say—are ready to throw away this great boon of having a railway through Canadian territory if they think, by arguing so, they could hurt the Government. It is of incalculable benefit to Canada that we should own this railway in our own country. If within the next year or two the Americans raise any of the difficulties which hon. gentlemen opposite seem to fear, then we can go right to work at once, and almost before they have time to turn, we can complete this road all through our own territory to the Pacific Ocean. Hon. gentlemen opposite say a great deal about the vast value of the land grant, but they know as well as I do that that is all problematical, and even if the grant should become valuable to the company, I am still in favour of this contract because through it the wealth of that country will be opened up to others to participate in. I am in favour of this road because without it the people of Canada cannot share in the riches of the Yukon. What is the use of quantities of gold lying in the gulches and in the mountains if we cannot get at it and take it out. Let it not be forgotten that in less than two years if we do not now command the situation by building that road, the Americans could get up the Yukon River and swarm over the whole country. And, Sir, if we had not law and order there, and the means of enforcing law and order, they would own the country. I shall not enter into the question as to the privileges which we are giving American miners in that country. For my own part, I believe that every decent citizen that goes into a country like that to add to its wealth ought to be treated fairly, to say the least of it. I sometimes think when I hear of narrow and contracted legislation being passed in the United States that we ought to retaliate; but upon that I shall offer no opinion just now. I am in favour of the railway because it is going to give Canadians an opportunity to get at the riches which may be stored in the Klondike. Many, very many of our young men will go there; some will make money and some not, but be that as it may, in going there they can feel that all the time they are on Canadian soil. I am in favour of this railway because by it, the men who go there can obtain supplies of food and clothing and the materials necessary for prosecuting their undertakings. What is the use of gold unless men are able to utilize it? And if our Canadians could not get at the wealthy store in this country, as they could not without a railway, what would the riches be to us? Another great advantage which this railway would give is that it will enable Canada to send out the necessary number of men to enforce law and order. What was it that for twenty or thirty years made the western states a lawless country and prevented the best elements of the population from going there to prosper? Sir, it was the lawlessness which prevailed in that country, and I may say that in my travels through Canada to the Pacific Coast and through the western states of the Union, I was glad to see the great contrast which was manifest between our country and theirs. They sent out speculators and desperadoes to their western territories, while we sent out messengers of peace. We in Canada opened up the school and the church for the pioneer, while there people depended upon the revolver and the shotgun. And to-day life and property in the far west of Canada is as secure as it is in the old and settled provinces of the east. I want, Sir, that in this new country which we are now called upon to govern, steps shall be taken to make law and order supreme. The best way to insure that is by providing at once for the civilizing influences of a railroad. I want to see it provided that when thousands of our best young men, the hope and pride of our country, enter into that country, they shall feel that the protecting influence of British law is around them as it was at home, and that they shall not be in danger of losing their lives at the hands of outlaws. The railway will secure that, and to my mind it is one of the strongest points in its favour.

Again, Sir, I am in favour of this railway because it secures the trade of that country for Canadians. Hon. gentlemen opposite for eighteen years have been talking Canada for the Canadians, and here is an opportunity for them to carry out that principle. I am in favour of getting as much for Canada as possible, and I am for allowing other countries to help Canada in her march of progress. I say that to secure the trade of the Yukon for Canada at the earliest possible moment is of vast advantage to us. Let not hon. gentlemen opposite think they are rousing the country in this matter; let them not think that from one end of the Dominion to the other, as they say, the people denounce this scheme. I tell these hon. gentlemen that when the farmers and the merchants find that that rich country is going to be opened up by railway communication, and that the Government is providing means by which their sons and their neighbours can reach the wealth of that country, hard as is the position of our people, and heavy as are the taxes they have to bear, be they Liberals or Conservatives, they will hold up their hands in thanks and praise to the Government that not one cent of additional burden will be placed upon them in connection with the building of that road, and that the country through which it runs will bear whatever expense there is in connection with it. He will listen to the idle bickerings of hon. gentlemen opposite; and he will smile and say, "What a curious change has come over these men!" Strange indeed that the men who were ready to vote away millions and millions of acres of as good land as the sun shines on—land that must continue to increase in value as the days go by—called upon the people to hurl a Government from power because they utilized a rocky and untimbered country, whose wealth was problematical, to open it up at least to fair competition to all the people of Canada to get what was there. That country may prove to be of more value than is generally supposed; but I am satisfied of one thing: if this mining excitement is over in a year or two or three years, hon. gentlemen opposite will want to erase every word they uttered when they come to meet the fact that the company who built this railway got no money from the Government for the work. But if that country proves to be a source of wealth for many years to come, I am satisfied also that the Government did well, for they laid the foundation of its future success. For these reasons I am in favour of this measure, irrespective of the cry raised by the member who spoke last for the members from the North-west and British Columbia. He seemed to think that he was a missionary at large to call these men to repentance. I suppose he thought there was no hope for others, like myself, who are just as radical as he is. I am afraid, however, that he did not want their repentance on account of the good it would do them, but that those words were uttered because they would be published in the west, and the people there would say to their members, "You had a chance for repentance; the hon. member for East York showed you where you were wrong and called on you to repent and stand up for the good of the country, and you did not do it." Sir, I would have no quarrel with any Government for dealing with an emergency before Parliament met. There are occasions when a Government must act, and act promptly. Matters of that kind disturb me very little. I am in favour of this measure because whatever the result may be, whether these men make or lose money, the Government lose nothing. It is a speculation which may prove successful to these men, and if so it will prove successful to Canadians. One of the leading Conservatives of the county of

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough).

Pictou, a man whose name, if I mentioned it to the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tuppert) would show his words to be entitled to a good deal of consideration, in a letter received last night, said that there were two or three things he would like to see added to the contract, yet it appeared to him to be the very best that could be got, and the Government were to be congratulated for it. I am sure that will be the feeling of the people of this country generally when this little flurry is over, and men have time to sit down and think; and before we meet again next session, you will hear as little about this question from hon. gentlemen opposite as you do now about the Remedial Bill. They will be just as anxious to bury all recollection of their opposition to this Bill, as they would now be to obliterate almost everything they said and did upon that equally disastrous occasion.

After Recess.

Mr. WALLACE. I am sorry the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) is not in his place, because I wish to compliment him as strongly as I conscientiously can. We are always delighted to hear the hon. member for Guysborough on account of his eloquence and the force with which he expresses his views, and also because he is generally pretty well informed on the subject on which he addresses the House. But, Sir, on this occasion there were many things lacking. Our good friend lacked that fire and enthusiasm and earnestness which have always characterized him; and we could hardly distinguish when he was drawing upon his imagination or when he was reciting fact. When he came down to that touching story about the white horse and the maiden fair, we realized that he was on familiar ground; but when he undertook to criticise the speech of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), he was not so sure of his ground. He started out by saying that the hon. member for East York had been in the past an advocate of the Toronto street car monopoly and in favour of its being handed over to a company. When he was contradicted in that, which many members of the House could verify as well as the hon. member for East York, he was a little staggered. When he undertook to say that the hon. member for East York approved of the Rothschild's or Hamilton Smith's recent offer, he was also contradicted; because every member of the House who heard the hon. member for East York knew that he did not endorse that proposal at all, but was consistent throughout in his opinion that there should have been no grant of those valuable mineral lands for the purpose of constructing the railway, but that it should have been built either by a company, or, as he preferred, by the Government undertaking the work itself, and getting a vote of money from this House for the purpose. When he was alluding to the conspiracy of the three Yorks, the hon. member for Guysborough was equally drawing upon his imagination; for I could assure him if he were here that so far as the hon. member for East York is concerned, I have neither seen him nor corresponded with him in any way from the time this contract between the Government and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann was announced till we came to Ottawa. I might say the same thing with regard to the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), only that the statement, instead of being made for some days, could be made for more than as many months. So that when the hon. member for Guysborough made these statements, imagining they were true, they were of no more substance than the other tales he was telling to this House. But the hon. member used the argument which was used by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), which has been used by almost every member who has addressed the House on this subject, that is, that every dollar's worth of gold costs a dollar to take it out; and therefore if the Mackenzie & Mann Company take out a large quantity of gold, there cannot be a very large profit in the transaction. Well, I do not think anything more misleading could be presented to the House. If that statement is true, which I do not affirm or deny, what does it mean? It means that some men are fortunate in their search for gold and some are not. It does not prove that every man who goes in and spends a dollar in labour or money gets a dollar's worth of gold in return, but it means that there has to be an average dollar's worth of work for a dollar's worth of gold. But in this case, knowing, as we do, that these gentlemen have the selection of all the lands, they get a hundred dollars' worth of gold for ten dollars' expenditure, while the other men, who are not so fortunate, because they only get second, third or fourth choice, will expend a hundred dollars and perhaps only get ten dollars' worth of gold. It may be true that the average all round is dollar for dollar, but one man gets one hundred dollars for ten dollars and the other ten dollars for one hundred dollars. I might call attention to the fact that there are mines in British Columbia of which we hear reports, from time to time, which are yielding immense returns. Take the Le Roy, which has paid out, I am told, a very large amount in dividends, nearly a million dollars. There is a silver mine in the Slocan district, which, on a capital of less than a quarter of a million, has paid $1,250,000 profits to its shareholders. Of course the owners of these are the fortunate ones, the ones who had the first choice, and were fortunate enough to strike the rich veins.

Mackenzie & Mann will have that opportunity, for reasons that I shall explain later; but before I do so, I wish to make reference to comments made in the House with regard to what I had said, by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair). I may say that, long as I have been in the House, I think I have never wilfully misrepresented anybody, and I have no desire to do so in this case. I think that there are fair and legitimate grounds for criticism of the proposal to the House without attempting any misrepresentation. But the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), the other day, made the charge that I had misrepresented him. He said:

The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) made a similar statement as follows:—
“The Minister of Railways and Canals had to confess that if transshipment took place at Fort Wrangel, the American duties would have to be paid.”

Well, Mr. Speaker, I did make the statement. I listened carefully and attentively to the Minister of Railways, and thought he had made the statement which I attributed to him. Of course I shall accept his correction without any qualification. The “Hansard,” too, shows that he did not make any such statement. But if I did misrepresent him, I had no “Hansard” to guide me and evidently misunderstood him, but surely when I was addressing the House, an hour or two afterwards, and when the hon. Minister was in his place, he could have easily corrected me, and I would have been very happy to accept the correction. Instead of that, however, I find by the “Hansard,” that on Tuesday, when I was not in the House, he spent nearly the whole evening doing what is popularly described as “chewing the rag,” because I had attributed to him the statement I did. I have read what he did say, and if I had understood it, as he said it, I would have made different remarks, but they would have been equally condemnatory of the hon. gentleman. He made this statement, according to “Hansard”:

I presume that if an ocean steamer proposed to land at Fort Wrangel and tie up at the wharf there and unload goods at that port, they would be subject to the customs authorities; but I know of no reason myself why a craft such as is used, or any other small craft available for the transshipment of this freight by the Stikine River should not be alongside a steamer which carries freight from our own ports to Fort Wrangel, or to that locality, and transfer the freight from the larger to the smaller vessel and the latter then might pass on its way.

I presume the hon. gentleman meant pass on its way without regard to the customs, because otherwise there would be no object in adopting that method. I presumed that these gentlemen, when presenting this contract to the House had made some arrangements and considered what was an exceedingly important matter—first, the selection of the route, and secondly, that it was what the "Globe" proclaimed it to be—and the "Globe's" statement was declared an official one by the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton)—undoubtedly and undeniably an all-Canadian route. The hon. Minister of the Interior practically said that himself, but if the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) had read anything of the Canadian Customs Act, or had he consulted the Controller of Customs, or if the hon. Minister of the Interior had done so, these gentlemen would have known that this transshipment from one boat to another would not evade the customs and would not be permitted, at any rate, because the Customs Act of our own country—which is very much on the lines of that of the United States, with this difference that where there is any variance, the United States Customs Act is a great deal more stringent than our Canadian law, says :

The expression "port" means a place where vessels or vehicles may discharge or load cargo.

No goods shall be unladen from any vessel or bulk be broken within three leagues of the coast. Entering unloading the same.

So that the proposal made by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals was, in the light of the customs laws of our own country, and the customs laws of the United States, I believe, are similar in that respect—simply absurd. We could not undertake to unload out on the river or ocean within three leagues or nine miles of the coast. But in addition to that the following also is the law :—

All goods imported in Canada, whether by sea, land, coastwise, or by inland navigation, whether dutiable or not, shall be brought in at a port of entry where a custom-house is lawfully established.

Mind you, Mr. Speaker, they say : We claim equal rights on this river ; we claim the free navigation of it ; but here is the case of goods entering coastwise—which means in American vessels, vessels coming from one American port to another, and doing a coasting trade—and we will regulate as to that. Canadian vessels in this case, and the American vessels in the case of Fort Wrangel or these other places on the Pacific Coast, and vessels belonging to the country in possession of the port, would have to report, too, so that none of this transshipment that the Minister of Railways indicated could be done from one vessel to another without reporting to the customs authorities. And it says further :

Vessels may be boarded when within three miles of anchorage and report demanded. Officer may remain on board.

THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). What is my hon. friend quoting from just now ?

Mr. WALLACE. The Customs Act of Canada, and I made the statement that that Act was similar to the Customs Act of the United States, with the exception of some places where the Customs Act of the United States was still more stringent.

If any vessel enters any place other than a port of entry, unless from stress of weather, &c., the goods may be seized and forfeited, and the vessel, according to its capacity, fined a penalty of from $400 to $800.

So that the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways with regard to this important question of how the goods are to be brought in, is a most misleading one. But the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) has told us, as also have other hon. members : Oh, but the goods can be transhipped at Port Simpson. We find that Port Simpson is 170 miles from Fort Wrangel, and we find also that this includes sixty miles of open sea navigation—open to the whole force of a western storm. Men with merchandise may risk that merchandise as they please, and insurance companies will, of course, insure it, if they get sufficient premium. But I venture to say, that neither the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) nor any of his Ministers will dare to give a certificate to any of these flat-bottomed river vessels to carry a single passenger from Port Simpson to Fort Wrangel. That being the case, all this talk about the business being done from Port Simpson and thence to Fort Wrangel and up the Stikine River in these boats is nonsense, so far as the carrying of passengers is concerned. Now, I have stated my point with regard to what the Minister of Railways complained of as misrepresentation. But what have we to say with reference to the Minister of Railways himself ? He is quick to call attention—and very properly ; I do not find fault with him—to any misrepresentations of his utterances. That being so, however, we might expect that that hon. gentleman, when he addresses the House, would be strictly fair in his representations of the statements of other members. But I have to charge him with more than one case of—I will not say, wilful misrepresentation, for that would be an unparliamentary expression—but I would like to say, of deliberate misrepresentation, which, I think, would not be going out of the way, seeing that he had before him the report of what I said when he made this misrepresentation to the House. He said :

I can, however, say that it was made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace)—that $100 per passenger would be a reasonable sum, would be even less than ought to be allowed for the carriage of a passenger over this railway. Well, according to the hon. gentleman's ideas, it appears to me that the company would find him a very desirable person to deal with in regulating the rates.

You know, Mr. Speaker,—for you were listening at the time—that I never made any such statement or any that could be construed into one having such a meaning. But, as if it were not enough to have one Minister put it in my mouth, the Minister of the Interior repeated it, and I think the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) did likewise. Of course, I never said that for passage over this 150 miles of railway they would charge $100. That would be at the rate of 66 cents per mile. In order that there may be no dispute, I will read briefly to the House what I did say. I spoke, firstly, as to the cost of the road, and, secondly, as to the cost of the steamers that would navigate the rivers and lakes, and, thirdly, as to the cost of operating the railway and steamers. I will read from "Hansard" what I said :

I had referred to the fact that the cost of the road, 150 miles of construction, would involve an expenditure of $15,000 per mile, and I assume that as an outside estimate for this narrow-gauge tramway which has been proclaimed by the Prime Minister himself as only a temporary structure. Taking the cost at $15,000 per mile, the total expenditure thereon would be $2,250,000, and, allowing a very large margin indeed, the cost of the cheap flat-bottom steamers for river service might be placed at $1,000,000, making the total expenditure for railway and steamers $3,250,000. The cost of operating the road for one year might be placed at $750,000, which is also a very extravagant estimate ; and this would place the cost of road construction, steamers and operating expenses for the whole of one year at $4,000,000.

That is the statement I made of the cost. Then I referred to what the receipts might be and in doing that I assumed a rate of $100 for passengers over the whole of the route steamboats and railways. By way of showing the total receipts I said :

But looking at the other side of the picture, and taking the figures which the Minister of Railways has given as a conservative estimate, and not taking 250,000 people as the number that will be transported, according to the estimate of transportation companies, into that country during the present year, 1898, but reducing the number to 100,000, how do the figures stand as to receipts from the railway and steamboats after they have got into operation ?

In the first instance I give what I estimate as the cost of the road and the cost of the steamboat, making a very extravagant estimate of $1,000,000 as the cost of the steamers. Then I said :

How do the figures stand as to receipts from the railway and steamboats after they have got into operation ? The result will appear like this. One hundred thousand passengers will pay $100 each, and I am very much below the mark in placing it at that figure.

I referred in other places in exactly the same way to the cost of passengers, giving it as $100 for passengers with $50 per ton of freight, not over 150 miles of road, but over the whole route, including the line of steamers that will be run in connection with this road, without which the road scarcely would be of any use, if of any use at all, because, if passengers were landed 600 miles above the gold region, as they would be at the head of Teslin Lake, there would be no particular object in leaving them there, unless there were steamers which would carry them to their destination. The owners of the railway will have these steamers in operation the first day the railway is opened for traffic. So the statement made by the hon. Minister of Railways, and repeated by the Minister of the Interior, that I said that the sum of $100 would be a reasonable one for the carriage of a passenger over this railway, has not a scintilla of truth to justify it. They cannot quote one line of my speech in order to justify that statement. But they were not satisfied with misrepresenting my statement in that regard, as to what fare would be paid over the railroad and on the steamboats, but the Minister of Railways misrepresented what I said as to the number of passengers. The Minister of Railways said this :

Then, in the same connection, that hon. gentleman represents that I stated to the House that in my judgment and from the information that I received, there would be at least 250,000 people using the railroad during the present year.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I never made any such statement ; I never made a statement as to what number of people would use the railway and steamboats. What I did was to take the figures as given by the Minister of Railways himself, and I did not take 250,000, I boiled it down to one-fifth of that number. In the first place, the Minister of Railways indicated that there would be 100,000, but I did not accept his figures. Then I said : Suppose there would be 100,000. I will read what I said in that regard, so that I cannot be accused of making another statement here to-day :

But looking at the other side of the picture, and taking the figures which the Minister of Railways has given as a conservative estimate, and not taking 250,000 people as the number that will be transported, according to the estimate of transportation companies, into that country during the present year, 1898, but reducing the number to 100,000 how do the figures stand as to receipts from the railway and steamboats after they have got into operation ?

Then I go into his figures as to that in another place :

When I place the rates at $100 per passenger and $50 per ton for freight, I am placing them much below the figures charged. Taking, then, the receipts as $10,000,000 from passengers coming in, and $5,000,000 from passengers going out, taking the freight at 100,000 tons at $50 per ton, the receipts during 1898 would reach $20,000,000. The total expenditure for the construction and operation of the road for the year and the building of the steamers and all expenses I place at $4,000,000, leaving an enormous profit for the contractors. But supposing that instead of 250,000 people, which the Minister indicated as the number likely to go into the country, we take the lower number, 100,000, upon which latter number I have made this calculation, and cut that number in two, let us make a calculation on the basis of 50,000 passengers, which is a lower estimate than is made by the Minister or any competent authority. The receipts from 50,000 passengers on the basis of $200 each would be $10,000,000, as against a total expenditure of $4,000,000, leaving for the one year a net profit of $6,000,000 over all expenditures.

I estimated the whole cost of the road and steamers for the lakes and rivers and the cost of operating them for one year at four million dollars. I said if these people went in that the Minister tells us will go in, and according to his estimate of $100 per passenger both on the railways and steamers, there would be ten million dollars receipts, or six million dollars clear profit. They may say that is an extravagant estimate. But the Minister of the Interior does not say that it is an extravagant estimate. In his speech, he quotes it with approval, or else he should not have quoted it at all, he should not have quoted to mislead the House. What does he say with regard to the numbers going in :

It seems almost inconceivable to us to hear and to read the figures that are presented to us. I saw the other day in the New York "Herald" a statement like this :

The statement that a quarter of a million gold-seekers will go from Seattle alone this year, seems to be well founded, in view of the "Herald's" despatches to the effect that 7,000 have sailed in the last eight days, and that 1,000 are arriving there daily.

He says further, in commenting on this :

It is such facts as these that we have to deal with.

Now, he endorsed the New York "Herald," that there will be 250,000 people going in. He mentions the further fact that 7,000 have sailed in eight days, and that they are arriving at Seattle at the rate of 1,000 per day. The Minister of the Interior goes on to say :

We are told, too, that the transportation agencies in Europe are booking tens of thousands of people for the Pacific Coast, and that the immediate object of these people is to procure transportation to the Klondike district. We know, too, that the officers of the Canadian railways have made immense preparations for this trade ; and while no person can say exactly how much of it will materialize, everything points to the fact that the greatest rush that has been seen for many years upon this continent will take place during the next few months towards the Klondike district. It has been estimated, and the estimate does not seem to be unreasonable or extravagant one, that from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000 will be spent in outfitting and in transportation by these people ; and it does not require any lengthened argument on my part to show that a volume of trade of $50,000,000 or $75,000,000 is a thing to which the Government of this country should devote a large amount of attention when it is possible to secure it for Canadian merchants and Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. Speaker, I regret very much, as I am sure the whole country will regret, that these gentlemen have not taken more vigorous and active measures, that they had not realized the situation until the 25th of January, or a few days before the meeting of Parliament. All they had done was, so far as transportation was concerned, to send Mr. Jennings out there, and to send Major Walsh with a detachment of mounted police, with instructions to organize for the government of the country. But they had taken no steps to meet this immense commercial business that was right at our doors, and that they must have known long before was right upon us. Therefore, I say that I think I have a fair ground of complaint against the Minister of Railways and Canals as well as the Minister of the Interior, inasmuch as they have done two things : They first quoted me as stating that there would be 250,000 passengers. I mentioned no number, but I based my estimate of six million dollars profit on 50,000 going in and 25,000 coming out. That is the lowest number. The Minister of the Interior himself quotes with approval the estimate of 250,000, or five times as many as I had estimated, taking the lowest estimate they had considered at all. I have reason to find fault with them also in charging me with fixing a rate, and they seem to have taken a great deal of amusement out of the charge that I had fixed a rate of $100 for travelling 150 miles on this tramway. I hope they will correct the statements they have made. At any rate, I have drawn the attention of the House to it. In my statement of the 8th of February they charge that I exaggerated the cost of the railway. I said at the time that it was an exaggerated estimate, because Mr. Jennings, in his report, which is in the hands of all the members of the House, speaks of a railway, a completed railway, a first-class railway, as costing $19,000 per mile for 208 miles. But that extra road would cost a larger amount than the 150 miles that the Government propose Mackenzie & Mann should build. So that you can cut this estimate of $19,000 per mile straight in two for a three-foot gauge railway, for a railroad that is made with second-class rails, with everything about it second-hand from start to finish, so I am informed. Made as a three-foot gauge road would be made, climbing the hills, and taking Mr. Jennings's statement all through the report, that there are very few engineering difficulties, that the road can be quickly and cheaply built, the estimate I made of $15,000 can be easily reduced to $10,000 per mile for the construction of that railway. I will not refer to these matters, but will present some other views that have occurred to me in regard to this subject. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) before six o'clock stated that the policy of himself and of the Government was Canada for Canadians. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that we on this side of the House have good ground for complaint. Almost every plank in our platform has been appropriated by

hon. gentlemen opposite, and without acknowledgment. We have no objection to this course, for we are glad to know that hon. gentlemen opposite are abandoning errors and are setting out on the right path in adopting the policy of Canada for the Canadians. But we can all remember that not many years ago they were advocating a policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and the hon. member for Guysborough was in the very front as an advocate of that policy, under which American goods would have to come into Canada without paying duty, and would have entered this mining region, which we are endeavouring to protect, without paying any duty whatever. And what would have become of the policy of Canada for the Canadians if unrestricted policy had been adopted? The Americans would have controlled the whole business of this country; although we had incurred enormous expenditures in administering our laws in the western region, they would have secured all the business. So the National Policy, a policy of protection for Canada, is the one that is to preserve this country, and to protect that portion of Canada for Canadians which lies in the west, and not the policy of which the hon. member for Guysborough was perhaps the most ardent advocate in this House in the days gone by. An argument used by many hon. members, including the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Railways and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) and a number of others was that these mineral lands were of no value unless railway construction is proceeded with, and that all the value given to them will be by the exertions made by the company. I deny that proposition. I maintain that the mineral lands acquired by the company are valuable, but not through the exertions of the company, for they do not need to exert themselves in any particular. They have great advantages to offer the prospector and miner; and it must be remembered that there are from 5,000 to 10,000 prospectors and explorers in British Columbia today traversing the mountains and valleys searching for the precious metal, and that body of men will be as nothing compared with the number in the Yukon district during the present year. Five thousand or ten thousand may be multiplied by two, three or five and not exceed the number who will be in that district searching for gold during the coming summer. Suppose they find gold, what will occur? One of two things: either they will make an entry and pay ten per cent royalty, or they will give information to Mackenzie & Mann, who will take up the property, and a royalty of one per cent will then be paid. Suppose Mackenzie & Mann say: You are going out exploring, and if any of your party find gold, come in and let us know; we will give you your claim, you will then have to pay only one per cent instead of ten per cent royalty; if the expense of working is $60, you will have $39 clear profit as against $30 if you enter the claim with the Government. The miner will not hesitate long. In addition, Mackenzie & Mann may say: You have filed a claim in a square of land taken up by us; however, if you will let us know the results of your prospecting, we will not only give you the advantage of nine per cent on the royalty, but other advantages as well; for instance, you pay $15 for a license, and we will give you a deed for the land for ever, so that no one can ever disturb you. Therefore, instead of the statement made by hon. members that these contractors are going to spend money in opening up and developing that country being true, they are going to fold their arms, and allow those 10,000 or 20,000 prospectors to work, knowing that it will be to their interest to go to Mackenzie & Mann rather than to go to the Government and make their arrangements. But supposing those men have not made any arrangements with Mackenzie & Mann, what then? The men will go to make their entries, and will find that Mackenzie & Mann have taken up the location a week or two ahead of them; the prospectors will find they have no right to their claim, and that Mackenzie & Mann own three miles by six of that district. The men will ask what they can do. The reply given will be that they had better see Mackenzie & Mann; in fact, they will have to make a bargain with Mackenzie & Mann. Suppose, again, that men have found a rich deposit and they have taken out $50,000 or $100,000 of gold, and that this has occurred on land claimed by Mackenzie & Mann. The contractors will turn around any say to the Government, that it is the duty of the Government to protect their property, that they hold their property by deed, and they will call on the Government to recoup them for the value of gold taken out. They will argue that the Government are bound to protect any citizen in the enjoyment of his property, more especially when the Government has handed over the property, in this case, to Mackenzie & Mann. At every turn Mackenzie & Mann have the advantage. They can demand the protection of the Government for every foot of this mining property which is given to them in fee simple, and if the Government does not secure them in peaceful possession, or if somebody takes it or any part of it away from them, they have a claim in equity against the Government. The other night the Minister of the Interior said: I defy any one to show me a single line in the contract that gives a monopoly. Well, that is only trifling with words; there is monopoly written in it from beginning to end. It is monopoly and nothing else. The Minister (Mr. Sifton) told us, that there was another charter for the Cassiar and Cariboo, and that there were grants of land and money from the British Columbia Government, but he answered himself when he said nobody would accept it. What is the use of making such comparisons when we all know that this is a huge monopoly. Did not the Minister himself tell us that never in the history of the world have mines been known so rich in gold, and did he not quote from the New York "World" with approval, the statement, that from the city of Seattle alone 200,000 people were going into this mining region, and that tens of thousands are being booked in Europe by the transportation companies for the Yukon gold fields. Here is a position of affairs never before paralleled. There have been wonderful strikes of gold and stampedes of people in Australia and South Africa, but nothing has ever been heard of to equal the movement of people in all countries towards this famous gold region. Is there no monopoly in it? Why, these contractors will have the rivers full of steamers before anybody else can get there. They will have their line of railway all but completed, and they will push in their material necessary for the construction of those boats. They will have a practical monopoly for they will have the only railroad going in there, and probably the only line of steamers. The Government have given these men a property that may turn out fabulously wealthy, beyond anything the imagination can picture. It has been stated that Mackenzie & Mann can go to England and in 24 hours bond these lands for $20,000,000. I believe that to be correct, in view of the present state of English feeling and the excitement that exists there. After all, people cannot shut their eyes to Mr. Ogilvie's report. Here is a little bit of a valley which Mr. Ogilvie told us in his lecture the other night, contained from sixty to seventy million dollars of gold; and yet Mr. Ogilvie is a most conservative, careful man, and is the only man we know of who has not lost his head in connection with these discoveries. As the Minister (Mr. Sifton) stated, he is the only man who could walk over these gold beds without having even a desire to possess them. But this little valley with sixty or seventy million dollars in it is not the only gold location there, and if this contractors' syndicate only secures one Bonanza Creek, with its sixty or seventy million dollars, what wonderful wealth will accrue to them? Suppose they only get half of it—although as we have shown from the map they can well manage to get the whole of it—suppose they only get the half of this, or $35,000,000, that in itself is a pretty comfortable amount. I may say that to get that gold out, it does not cost dollar for dollar, nor 95 cents, nor 50 cents for a dollar, because we know that out of such creeks as that they can get hundreds of dollars a day per man, while the other poor chaps are climbing the mountains prospecting and spending their money and getting nothing in return.

The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) also asked us: why do not others go in, and he told us that there was no one to-day who would make a better offer than the present contractors. Well, Sir, the most objectionable feature in the whole transaction is that no one else was asked to make an offer. This Government had plenty of time to ask for offers, and they did not do so. The customs returns tell us that there were $21,000 in duties paid on goods going in there in the year 1895-96. There were thousands of people in there then, and they were there because gold had been discovered, and they were paying $10 a day for labour, because a man could get out sufficient gold to make it profitable to give that wages. We are told that miners who could not get an ounce of gold per day, felt inclined to go somewhere else where they could get a large amount. It was known to the Government long ago that this was a rich mining centre. But last July Mr. Ogilvie's report was published, the miners came out with gold, there was undoubted proof in every way that this was the most valuable gold discovery that perhaps the world had ever seen; the Minister himself went up there and found ten or twelve thousand people at Skagway and Dyea, and thousands of others in the coast cities, and how then could he disregard those signs. Why was nothing done by him then to provide for transport? Why did he not let the people of Canada know that he was going to build a railway? Why did not he and the Government let the people know what their programme was? If he had done so, I venture to say that without going outside the confines of Canada, scores of responsible contractors would have tendered. All the genius of this country is not confined to Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie—although genius of a certain kind may be attributed to them above any others—and there are plenty of contractors in Canada who are just as able as these two gentlemen to push that work to a successful and rapid conclusion. But, Sir, the people of this country did not know that the Government intended to build the railway; they did not know the plans of the Government. If the Government had put six lines in the "Globe" newspaper, or in the Toronto "World," or in any of those great journals, every man in Canada who felt disposed to go into that enterprise, and every combination of men would be planning to accomplish the work, and the Government would have had scores of offers. Instead of that, in secret conclave, they had been in private negotiations with Mackenzie & Mann for a long time, and they had been in secret negotiation with this Mr. Hamilton Smith for quite a time.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. On what authority does my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) make that statement?

Mr. WALLACE. Were there not negotiations before the contract was signed?

The Minister of the Interior says there were.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Not with Hamilton Smith.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of the Interior, I understood, read a letter from Hamilton Smith.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman is thinking of Mr. Kersey, quite a different man.

Mr. WALLACE. I confounded the two names; I supposed they belonged to the same firm. Very well, Mr. Kersey, a New Yorker, had been in communication with the Government. Mr. Hamilton Smith came in at a later period—I do not know whether before this contract was signed or not. But Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann did not come in at the last moment, because the Minister of Railways and Canals told us that day after day a large committee of the Privy Council had met those gentlemen, and had fairly gone down on their knees and begged them to take less land, but that they were obdurate and refused to do so. How long these negotiations were going on with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann I do not know. I do not see either the Minister of the Interior or the Minister of Railways and Canals in the House, and I think that is a fair cause for complaint. We are discussing a most important contract, to which the names of these two gentlemen are signed; we are making statements and asking questions, and we want full information about these matters; and these two Ministers, who are the ones specially charged with the conduct of this agreement, are not here. We are the representatives of the people of Canada; I represent 42,000 constituents, large and small, and when I ask these Ministers a question about this matter, neither of them is in the House, nor have they been here during a large part of the time that this matter has been under discussion. I am delighted to see that my few words of admonition have had some effect. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), who has just come in, has quite an innocent look on his face, as if he did not know what was the matter. I will just inform him that I was commenting on the fact that throughout this very important discussion upon a document which has been laid before the House for its consideration, signed by the Minister of Railways and Canals, or by some gentleman on his behalf, and the Minister of the Interior, we have been very seldom favoured with the presence of these two gentlemen in the House. I was referring to the fact that he had deliberately misrepresented what I said in the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Deliberately?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must withdraw that remark.

Mr. WALLACE. He deliberately stated something, Mr. Speaker, which I proved was a misrepresentation. He stated that I had made the assertion—and I must apologize to the rest of the House for going over the matter a second time for the benefit of the hon. Minister—that the contractors were going to charge $100 on this railroad. Mr. Speaker, I never made any such statement. I have just read what I stated, and I would invite the hon. Minister of Railways and tramways—because he will have to be the Minister of tramways after this is built—to read over my statement, and he will find that I said nothing that could be construed into the statement he made. I know that as soon as he makes that investigation, he will jump up and apologize; but I am not asking for an apology; I am making my statement to the House. Another statement made by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals was this. He said that I made an estimate of 250,000 people. Well, that showed that he was a very bad arithmetician, because if I had made an estimate of 250,000 people at $100 a piece, that would come to $25,000,000. If, however, half that number went out, that would make $12,500,000. If 250,000 people went in—and according to the Minister's own estimate each person would require a ton of provisions—and suppose each had to pay $50 a ton, that would amount to $12,500,000. The total receipts would be $50,000,000 in one year if the number attributed to me were correct. But I did not state that number. I just made it one-fifth of that number or 50,000. I first said that if 100,000 people went in and 50,000 came out, the receipts from passengers and freight would amount to $20,000,000; and then I said that if half the number went in, the receipts would be $10,000,000, as against a total expenditure of $4,000,000 on capital account for both steamships and railroad, and the operating of both steamships and railroad. That was the point I made, and I call it to the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and tramways.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in response to the challenge of the hon. Minister of the Interior, here is a letter from Mr. Hamilton Smith, which I am told is published in the newspapers this evening. I have a copy of it here, which was read in the House this afternoon by the hon. member for East York, and here is one clause of it:

If the Government still insists on Stikine line alone, we will build that on same general terms as the provisional contract with Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, for 1,000,000 acres, but without the right of lateral or end extension of the blocks of land.

The Government is, I believe, informed as to our financial ability to execute such work, but if there are any doubts as to this, a cable or so to London would speedily give the desired information.

I would ask the right hon. First Minister, when laying on the Table the letters from those gentlemen which he promised he would do to-morrow, to lay also on the Table the credentials which those gentlemen have presented, accompanying their letters.

The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) challenged this House—I do not know why he challenged us—and challenged the whole country to bring forward a man who would undertake this contract on the same terms. He said :

There is not a man to-day who is prepared to make this offer or a better one.

Well, here is a company of men of the highest repute—the Rothschilds, we are told, which is but another name for vastness of riches and responsibility—who say that for one million of acres—not three and three-quarter millions—they are prepared to accept the contract which Mackenzie & Mann have made with the Government. I say to the Government: What are you going to do about it? I would say to the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who is not here, who gave the challenge the other day to which I have referred, and which challenge meant, if it meant anything: Bring on your offer; if you do, and it is a bona fide one, we will accept—I would say to him: Well, here is the offer you challenged the world to produce; what are you going to do about it? The Parliament of Canada is not committed one particle to this contract. We ought to have been consulted. We were told all along by organs of the Government, that Parliament was to meet about the first of January. With these matters right on deck, Parliament might have met the first of December. Here is an important, an unprecedented matter. This whole session is apparently going to be spent considering the Yukon matter. It is evidently going to be a Yukon session. Why not have called Parliament together on the first of December, or first of January, and have consulted us before making this agreement? Now, I ask the Government, in view of the challenge thrown out by the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), what are they going to do about this offer to construct the work for a million acres instead of 3,750,000?

The hon. Minister of the Interior read an article in some New York commercial journal, the other night—and it was a gem. Mr. Speaker, that article was not written in New York, but in Ottawa.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. By "Onlooker," or another onlooker.

Mr. WALLACE. It could not have been written by "Onlooker," because his views are different.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. He may have changed them.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. WALLACE. This article from the New York "Commercial Advertiser," in its edition of February the 4th, under the heading of "The Klondike Railway," was read by the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). I find this stated in it:

The thrifty Canadian Government is not risking any money on the projected road. The contractors clamoured for a subsidy, and insisted that they could not be expected to construct the road without one.

Where did the New York "Commercial Advertiser" get that information? I have read over the official information, I have read the "Globe" manifesto, which the hon. Minister of the Interior declared was an official statement of the case, and there is not a line in it to that effect. Where, then, did the New York paper get that information? It could only have got it from two parties—the Government or Mackenzie & Mann. They are the only parties who could have given this information which was not given to the public. Where, then, did the New York "Commercial Advertiser" get it? It is just as I said: this article must have been written by either the Minister of Railways or Mackenzie & Mann. The writer goes on to say:

But Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues stood firm, and all that the contractors received from the Government is a land grant along the route.

Well, that is not correct. They do not receive a land grant along the route. They do not receive a single acre along the route. Their land grant, or rock grant, is hundreds of miles away from the nearest portion of the railway. Yet this was quoted by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) as a correct statement of the case and of what the Americans thought of it, and it showed, he said, that sometimes an outsider finds out things which the people at home do not know.

The bargain is considered the best one that Canada ever drove in a railway negotiation.

That settles it. It must have been written by the Minister of Railways. He is proud of his work.

The new railway will be a short one to be sure, but to get it built without spending a cent of public money upon it is a great contrast to the prodigality of Sir John Macdonald and his colleagues in times past. But as the land never will be worth anything without the railroad, and cannot prove very valuable with it—

Who wrote that? I think it must have been Mackenzie & Mann.

—unless some expected mineral resources are discovered.

There is no railway there now, Mr. Speaker, and yet Bonanza Creek would sell for many millions of dollars to-day. Yet the writer of this article says—and the article is quoted with approval by the Minister of the Interior as showing that strangers could find out the truth which we could not find out ourselves :

As the land will never be worth anything without the railway it cannot prove very valuable with it—

Why not ?

—unless some unexpected mineral resources are discovered.

Why, we have discovered them. This matter has gone beyond the region of doubt, the railway is to be built, we have Ogilvie's reports, and we have the fact that millions of dollars have been gathered in a few months out of these valleys. Yet this New York paper, which is quoted by the Minister of the Interior to enlighten us Canadians, says :

Unless some unexpected mineral resources are discovered.

Then, to make us proud of the great bargain we have secured, the writer goes on to say :

An Ottawa Government organ exultingly remarks that Canada now has the key to the gold fields in her own hands, and can deal with the Americans as she sees fit. This boast might have been withheld until the road was finished. Physical obstacles or excessive cost may prevent the contractors from building it at all under the terms of the contract.

Why, we have the whole information today. We have Mr. Jennings's report over the whole line. There is not a portion of it that he has not reported upon, and all the difficulties connected with it, and he has made an estimate of the cost for building a first-class road. We are not, and the contractors are not, proceeding in the dark. They will build it, never fear, Mr. Speaker; they have such a bonanza that they will build it pretty quickly. I have not the slightest doubt that they could sell what is practically a monopoly in the cities of the United States on the shortest notice. They could sell that out, they could build that road, they could build those steamers, they could capitalize the whole thing for eight times the cost, and make money out of it then. Now, I would like this Government to take this matter into their consideration. They have discovered, I have no doubt, that they have been proceeding precipitately—not too hastily, in the proper sense of the term, because they have not been proceeding hastily enough.

As I have pointed out, they knew the exceeding richness of this country seven months ago. In the month of July we had reliable reports of the millions of dollars of gold taken out of that country, not only from Mr. Ogilvie, but from what had been announced before his reports were received. Did not we know that all the people were making their preparations for going on to this wonderful or auriferous region? But the Government folded their hands. There was scarcely a Minister in Ottawa; there may have been one or two. They had gone to the four corners of the earth. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) was down at the seaside; the Minister of Railways was, I do not know where; but this matter which should have engrossed their attention and claimed all their time and talents was not dealt with. The Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), of course, as we all know, was in the old country, in the Imperial service for the time being, and could not be here. But we had in his place, I was going to say a better man, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), an experienced statesman, an experienced man of business. I regret that he was, physically, not up to his usual standard, or I think we might have had different results in this matter by having the questions brought to the attention of the Government in a practical way and the Government directed to some practical conclusion. They might have informed this country in August or September last that they proposed to build a railroad, if one could be built, that they proposed to open up communication with that country at the earliest moment that energy and money and talent could do it. But this was not done. The Government say they were vigilant and active. They were not. They arranged, it is true, for the administration of justice in that country, and so on; but so far as the commercial side of the situation was concerned they were not equal to it at all. Even as to the matter of administration, what did they do? We heard it announced that they had adopted a set of regulations by which alternate plots were to be given to miners and to the Government. We were told a little later that these regulations were abrogated. Still later we learned that new regulations were adopted providing for larger alternate blocks for the miners and the Government. I am glad to see that the other member of the Government (Mr. Sifton) whose name is to this contract has entered the Chamber. Not only do we complain that the Government did not realize the urgency of this case, but we say that when they did realize it in part, they acted directly contrary to all the principles that should direct a government. We find now that Mr. Kersey, Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and Mr. Hamilton Smith, representing the Rothschilds—the last perhaps, not until the contract was signed—knew about this matter. But nobody else knew of what was proposed. Why not have let every citizen of Canada and everybody else know, so that those who were enterprising enough to go into a syndicate to take part in this work might do so. I say that if Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann were to step out to-morrow there would be scores of men and combinations of men who would take their places at one day's notice. Why, Sir, they have the richest thing that ever was given to any company in any place. You may say that the riches in this contract have yet to be determined. Not a bit of it. The people are ready to-day to buy these properties. We have been told that those who were fortunate enough to get the privilege of dredging the rivers, have already financed—that is, they have been paid large amounts of money for claims they got from the Government. But, as I have pointed out, with the facilities Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann are getting, with the choice of lands, it will be to the interest of any miner in that country to deal with the company instead of the Government to give their knowledge of discoveries to the company, which can make it worth their while. The Government is not in it in competition with this company. These contractors could sell these properties for an enormous amount to-day, whether they are worth much or little. Therefore, I say, the Government have not been true guardians of the interests of the people of Canada. They have given the greatest heritage in small space that has ever been discovered in Canada. I contend that new arrangements should be made and better terms should be secured in the interests of the people of the Dominion.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Mr. Speaker, I am sure you agree with me that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has devoted as much time to this question as any other gentleman on the other side of the House, or, perhaps, on this side with the exception of a few. The hon. gentleman's criticisms are generally such as to be worthy of respect and to call for a reply. But I think the hon. gentleman himself is conscious that his case as presented was rather weak. He had spoken before on the question and I find no fault with him for setting himself right on some points on which he had not been correctly understood. I think he is right in making the correction, and gentlemen who understood him differently have accepted his statement. But, as a business man, I am sure he could hardly keep his face straight when giving the figures he has indulged in. You would hardly think that an hon. member would make use of such figures solemnly in a deliberative assembly. To say that on this contract for what he calls a tramroad, the rates of which have not been fixed by the Governor in Council, the contractors will clear $6,000,000 upon an expenditure of $4,000,000 in one year is rather more than he himself is prepared to believe, I think; though I have no doubt that he has perfect faith in the veracity of statements he makes when speaking seriously. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), as well as the hon. member who has just sat down, think they have introduced a new feature in this debate. They have quoted an offer which they allege has been made, as it appears in the "Journal" of to-night, by a Mr. Hamilton Smith, who offers to build this road for a much smaller quantity of land—some 1,000,000 acres. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), told us, I think, before the "Journal" was published, that it would appear in the "Journal" to-night.

Mr. MACLEAN. I read it from the "Journal."

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I was not aware the "Journal" was out that soon. I was going to ask the hon. gentleman if he had any idea how the "Journal" got that information.

Mr. MACLEAN. That is a newspaper secret. Send down and ask the editor.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can enlighten us a little further. Who helped Mr. Hamilton Smith to get up that letter?

Mr. MACLEAN. Ask Mr. Hamilton Smith.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. This gentleman said, as well as the hon. member for East York, that he represents the Rothschilds. We do not very well understand that. This is an offer made after the contract is signed, made after it is published to the world. I understand the Rothschilds to be an honourable firm. Mr. Maitland Kersey, to whom the hon. gentleman has alluded, stated that he represented the Rothschilds. We have no more reason to doubt his word than we have to doubt the word of this gentleman. Now, then, Mr. Kersey, so we are told, and it has been used as an argument by the Opposition, offered to build this road for $6,000 cash per mile, with an addition of $1,000 per mile for a sleigh road that was to precede it, expecting to have that supplemented by the British Columbia government. That offer was not accepted. The Government, as they thought in the interests of the country, determined that they would not pay public money for the construction of this road. That fact was communicated to Mr. Kersey, time was given to Mr. Kersey to consult with his principals, those whom he represented, whom he stated he represented, and among them were the Rothschilds. Before that contract was signed that gentleman sent a letter stating that after consultation with them—for he had been in England and had laid the scheme before them—they declined to touch it upon the grounds of a land grant alone, though he was given to understand that it might run somewhere in the neighbourhood of 25,000 acres per mile. And yet these gentlemen bring before us to-night an offer that they say has been made by a gentleman who represents, or is backed by the Rothschilds, in which he offers to take 1,000,000 acres instead of 3,750,000, when Mr. Kersey, as the representative of the Rothschilds and others, stated that they declined to accept it at 3,750,000 acres.

Mr. MACLEAN. I did not say that Mr. Hamilton Smith represented the Rothschilds. I said he represented people who were as good as the Rothschilds, and he had given his credentials, and if the hon. gentleman will present his credentials, he will add much to this discussion.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I am not alluding distinctly to what he said. I fancy the hon. member for West York won't rise and say that he did not represent him to this House as representing the Rothschilds, for he told us that more than once in the course of his speech. We are not denying it. What I want to understand is how Mr. Kersey, representing the Rothschilds, as he said he did, communicated with them and gave them to understand that the Canadian Government were prepared to give something like 3,750,000 acres of land for the building of that road, before the contract was signed, and time was asked to consult with them, and the Government gave the necessary time, and they declined to accept it, and then another gentleman comes and represents himself to be backed by the Rothschilds after the contract is signed, saying I will do it for a million. I think there is not much in that last offer of Mr. Hamilton Smith's. I wonder if the hon. gentleman could give the "Journal" any further information in this matter. However, if the hon. gentleman or any one else associated with him will be powerful enough to get some other gentleman to write a letter and make an offer, now when the contract is signed—

Mr. MACLEAN. Will you accept it if it is a good one?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. We may perhaps get this gentleman to make an offer of what he will give for a million acres of land, without going to the expense of spending a dollar on building the road. Let us have an offer of what he will give for a million acres up there, and then we will ascertain what is the value of that land. Will the hon. gentleman undertake to do that? I dare say he is very familiar with this Mr. Hamilton Smith. Will he get us an offer for a million acres of land at so much per acre without the expense of a dollar on the railway? The Government will consider it, Parliament will consider it. We would like to have an offer of that kind. It would be much more business-like than coming in with this offer now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask the Minister of the Interior if he had not any communication with Mr. Hamilton Smith before the contract was signed? I am in a position to say that I have seen the credentials of Mr. Hamilton Smith, and I am prepared to state that he represents half a dozen of the most powerful financial corporations and gentlemen in London.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr Sifton). I have the greatest possible pleasure in answering the hon. gentleman, and saying in the most unqualified terms that I had not any communication with Mr. Hamilton Smith, nor was Mr. Hamilton Smith in communication with me, before the contract was signed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Directly or indirectly?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Directly or indirectly. I may add that a gentleman said to me upon one occasion in the course of a casual conversation, that there was a gentleman named Hamilton Smith who was prepared to call upon me for the purpose of discussing the question of a railway to the Yukon. But Mr. Hamilton Smith never called upon me, and never communicated with me—that is to say, until after the contract was signed.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. A question has been asked and answered. The hon. gentleman who has taken his seat has also alluded to a fact that has been mentioned by so many, and I am sorry to see him taking that ground, casting doubts upon the route that has been selected for this railway. A very strong reason for insisting upon the route that has been chosen in this contract is that we consider it to be virtually an all-Canadian route; and it is a pleasure to me to know that the leader of the Opposition who, while he saw reason to change his view with reference to the contract as a whole, unhesitatingly declares his belief that the route chosen is the one, pre-eminently the one, that absolutely ought to be chosen by the Canadian Government as the all-Canadian route, and as such I prefer to consider it yet, notwithstanding that I think statements have been made on the other side of the House that it is undesirable should have been made in the peculiar position in which we stand with the neighbouring nation in reference to this matter. We have the right to navigate the Stikine River by treaty, as the hon. gentleman knows, and we proceed on the assumption that that nation, being an honourable nation, we have no reason to doubt that they will recognize treaty rights. Hon. gentlemen tell us that it will be necessary to report at customs, that we will not be at liberty to tranship, that we will be made to pay a duty—all these objections they urge against this route. They advocate another route that undeniably runs through territory that at the present time—though we do not allow their claims to be valid—is in possession of the nation to the south of us, where hon. gentlemen know that we could not have direct communication except that arrangements were made with them in which treaty rights do not apply, and where boundaries would have to be settled before any possession could be taken. We have adopted a route which we believe we have a right as Canadians to traverse, a perfect right to traverse, and in which, if necessary, to make transshipments, the neighbouring nation would never refuse by customs regulations facilities for that purpose. The route advocated by the hon. gentleman and other gentlemen opposite who differ with members on this side of the House is by the Dalton trail, a route by which, if it should appear that the American contention is right and that the territory belongs to them, it would be impossible to ever establish a wholly undisputed Canadian route. But in settling the route we have adopted, if trouble should arise, which I do not anticipate, in regard to the navigation of the Stikine River, and if it were deemed advisable that Canada should have an all-Canadian ocean port, this route is the only one by which we could attain that result. We have already received the regulations made by the United States Government with respect to the navigation of the Yukon. They have made regulations that allow transshipment on the Yukon; and in view of such regulations, we have no right to assume that any trouble will arise in regard to the navigation of the Stikine which is covered by treaty, and I am not prepared to admit that objection will be taken in regard to that river. I have no doubt that a steamer sailing for the Stikine, reporting at Wrangel, would, under the supervision of the Customs officers of the United States, be permitted to tranship, be permitted to unload from the ocean vessel to a river steamer and then proceed up the river, making it may be an inward and an outward entry and that would be all they required. I anticipate not the slightest trouble or difficulty in that direction. In speaking of an all-Canadian route the reference must be made in connection with the route under consideration, that route which the Government has asked Parliament to adopt.

With respect to the cost of the road, the hon. member for West York, when speaking on a former occasion, estimated the value at $15,000 per mile. To-night he has revised his figures, and has declared that it can be built for $10,000 per mile. Yet the hon. gentleman well knows that it is specially provided in this contract that the road must be up to the standard of the Kaslo and Slocan. I will read a letter from the Ottawa "Citizen" of the 15th of this month, signed by William Baillie. It is as follows:--

THE KASLO-SLOCAN ROAD.

Editor Citizen,—An editorial paragraph in your issue this morning concludes as follows:—"Those who know the Kaslo-Slocan mineral railway must know that it is unduly flattered by its selection as the standard for the passengers and freight road like the proposed Stikine-Teslin line."

Mr. PATERSON.

Respecting this matter, the inference to be drawn from your comment is that the Kaslo-Slocan is an illy-constructed and inefficient road. During a considerable portion of the period of construction of that road I was secretary of the company, and know something of the character of the work done. The road bed is not difficult, except for three or four miles of the whole length of about thirty miles. The total cost of construction was in the neighbourhood of $600,000, or $20,000 per mile, which for a narrow gauge road over comparatively easy road bed is a high cost, and as not a cent of money was misspent in the work it will be seen that the road must be an example of high-classed railway construction. There is no more thorough piece of mountain railway work in North America. The railway has given the greatest possible satisfaction to the people it serves, its management is extremely popular in the district, and if the Glenora-Teslin road, when finished, should meet the public demands as efficiently, both in passenger and freight services, it will meet with a success very rarely achieved in railway construction and management.

Yours, &c.,

WM. BAILLIE.

The gentleman who wrote that letter, who, from what he says himself, is in a position to know the character of the road, which is taken as the standard for the Yukon road, points out that although built with great economy, it cost $20,000 per mile.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the hon. gentleman know that bonds were given to the contractors, and they were sold at very much less than par, thus reducing the cash cost of construction down to a very small sum?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am not aware of it. I have read a letter written by a good authority, for the gentleman was secretary of the company. Hon. gentlemen, moreover, may take the estimate of our engineers, and they will find the cost is not placed so low as $20,000.

Mr. WALLACE. Why does the hon. gentleman take the estimate of Mr. Jennings? Why does the hon. gentleman discredit an estimate made by Mr. Jennings, who made a report to the Government and who has a high reputation?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. We would not discredit Mr. Jennings. But here is a road built not under such exceptional circumstances which cost $20,000 per mile. The hon. member for West York is well aware that in the case of the present undertaking time is the essence of the contract, and the road must be finished by the 1st of September, and that under such circumstances there will be extra charge for freight, and higher rates paid than perhaps ever before.

Mr. WALLACE. Why?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Because the hon. gentleman must know that thousands of men will be required to build the road and when they get into the country they will need to be paid high rates to keep them on the work, greater perhaps than have been paid in any other case. With the excitement now existing and men rushing to the gold mines by thousands, surely the hon. gentleman does not expect that labourers will remain there at $1 or $1.50 per day? He no doubt well knows the great expense of freight and the contractors will be working with a quarter of a million dollars liable to be forfeited. He is no doubt also aware that Mr. Mann has been totally unable so far to transport his men and material on account of the rush on the Pacific Coast, and there is every reason to believe that during the greater portion of the summer there will be difficulty in securing any thing like reasonable freight rates. But under ordinary conditions a railroad of the standard fixed for this road cost over $20,000 per mile, and yet the hon. gentleman has fixed the sum at $10,000 per mile. The question arises as to whether any sacrifice has been made by the Government in the terms they have offered. Let us take the cost of the road at $25,000 per mile, which I venture to say is under the mark—I am speaking of the road as completed, I am not speaking of a second-hand road, a reckless assertion made by an ex-Minister of the Crown—I am speaking of a first class road, or at least a road up to the Kaslo and Slocan standard.

Now, Sir, what are we giving this road? Twenty-five thousand acres of land per mile, which if you take the road at 150 miles gives you three and three-quarter million acres. What is that land worth? Who can tell? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) ventures the statement that the contractors can place it upon the market for an immense sum of money and make themselves rich. Suppose they do that, and men are found to buy, what will the men who buy realize out of it? Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) follow out that argument? What the Government are concerned with is: what is that land worth to the country if it remained in the hands of the Government of the country? That is what we have to consider. Now, then, let us apply a test.

Mr. WALLACE. What you are giving the contractors is the test. What they can make out of it is the test.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) take the ground that if they form a company and raise millions of dollars, the Government can operate in the same way. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) say that such would be a proper course for the Government to follow?

Mr. WALLACE. The contractors get what they can sell that land for, and they can sell it to-morrow for a large sum.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The Government and the Parliament of Canada are here to look after the interests of the country, and it is the interests of the country that we must discuss this matter. Now here are three and three-quarter million acres of land out of seventy-six million acres in that country. How shall we ascertain what it is worth? The hon. gentlemen opposite cannot tell and no one pretends to know. But here is one test which I will give. Mr. Kersey made an offer on behalf of an English syndicate, representing the Rothschilds and others, and his offer was for $6,000 per mile cash for the railway and $1,000 cash per mile for the sleigh-road, hoping at the same time that this would be supplemented by the British Columbia Government when he would construct the road. He, therefore, expected to get from the Dominion Government $7,000 per mile cash or $1,050,000. But that gentleman and the company he represented declined to accept this land grant, and to build the road for it, and the inference is inevitable, that in the opinion of that gentleman representing English capital and the Rothschilds, he and they did not value this three and three-quarter million acres as worth $1,050,000 in cash. They offered to take the cash on the one hand and they declined the land grant in the other, and so I think it is a fair inference to draw that they did not think the land grant worth the $1,050,000.

Again, the "Mail and Empire," which is the chief Conservative organ had an article the other day, not dealing with this subject specially, but dealing with mineral lands, and that article has a bearing upon a point which I wish to bring forward now, in order to see if we can form anything like an estimate of how responsible parties value the land grant we have made to this railway. As is well known, the "Mail and Empire" condemns the bargain that has been made by the Government, pronounces it improvident, has used strong language in denunciation of it—not as strong perhaps as has been used in this House, or as has appeared in other papers—but denouncing it as giving away the wealth of the country. Well, Sir, in its issue of the 9th of this month, the "Mail" had an editorial in which it was dealing with what it termed the bad mining policy of the Ontario Government. It speaks of the Ontario mining regions as being very valuable—it is claimed they are as valuable as any that can be found in British Columbia, not in this article, but that claim has been made for them—and the "Mail" proceeds to discuss the conditions imposed upon prospectors by the Ontario Government, and condemns them. After reciting the difficulties that surround the prospector, it winds up by saying:

Further, after getting the location surveyed, his claim is liable to be disallowed, if he does not file the plan immediately, and when he has secured it it may turn out not to be worth working, as nine hundred and ninety-nine claims out of every thousand do turn out.

Not "may" turn out, but "do" turn out. Now, there is the estimate of the "Mail and Empire" as to the value of mineral lands in that which it pronounces a rich mineral district, and it says that only one claim out of every thousand is worth the working there—not only "may" be, but is actually worth the working. Well, Sir, apply that same principle to that territory out of which this grant of land is to be made. Take it in the large blocks in which the contract requires it to be taken. What better assurance have we that paying claims in the Yukon will be found in any greater relative abundance than in the rich territory that is described in the "Mail" If it be a fact, as the "Mail" asserts, that only one claim in every thousand pays for the working, then divide this land grant of three and three-quarter million acres by a thousand, and you have got the result that this Government has given, so far as paying claims are concerned, simply 3,750 acres. That is, according to the "Mail," there would be 3,750 acres of paying claims in this three and three-quarter million acres, and for that you get this railway built without a cent of cash. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) gave us instances, or an instance rather of the wealth of the Yukon mines. He told us that Mr. Ogilvie mentioned two or three creeks out of which $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 might be taken. I was at the lecture and I think the hon. gentleman is right that Mr. Ogilvie said so, but if I remember well—and I speak subject to correction—Mr. Ogilvie also said that in these rich pay mines it would take 60 per cent to work them. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) did not figure on that. Coming down on the cars the other day, I met a very intelligent gentleman who had been some years in that country; the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) were with me and we were very much interested in the conversation with this gentleman, because he was an educated man and had a knowledge of the country. He told us there were undoubtedly rich claims up there but he feared there would be great disappointment on the part of very many, and he said: You must not expect that every spot you prospect is a gold mine. The question was asked him, "Did you do any mining on your own account?" "Yes," he said, "I worked a claim, and I had $13,000 out of it." That looked pretty well, if he had stopped there; but after a short pause he added, "It cost me $18,000 to take it out." Hon. gentlemen do not take this into their consideration. My hon. friend speaks of the Le Roi mine. He has mentioned a good mine. How did he happen to give us the Le Roi mine as a fair sample of the mineral lands that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann might get?

Mr. WALLACE. I gave it as a sample of the good mines.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Then, the hon. gentleman admits that all that

Mr. PATERSON.

Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann get are not good mines; I have got that much from him, at any rate. Then, he mentions this Le Roi mine as a good mine. Will not the hon. gentleman be equally frank and tell this House how much he has got out of his mine? How is it paying?

Mr. WALLACE. Whose mine?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The mine the hon. gentleman is connected with—I do not know whether he is the president or not. How has it paid?

Mr. WALLACE. A very handsome profit.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. How much? Will the hon. gentleman give us an idea?

An hon. MEMBER. That is private business.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It will only boom the stock.

Mr. WALLACE. You could not buy any stock; it is not for sale.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman, being actively engaged in mining, knowing whereof he speaks, no doubt with a strong company behind him—

Mr. WALLACE. A small company.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. A small company; but he can make it larger, as he has the confidence of a good many people in the country.

Mr. WALLACE. We do not want it larger.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If the hon. gentleman believes one-tenth of what he says about this Klondike region, why do not he and his company go and operate there?

Mr. WALLACE. How do you know but they are?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If they are, they are months ahead of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, with a chance of snapping up all there is there. So that his righteous soul need not be vexed; and, if his company is not in there, if the strong company represented by the hon. leader of the Opposition is not in there, and if Mr. Hamilton Smith, with his company, his millions and his Rothschilds, are not there, they can go in or send in their prospectors, by the thousands, weeks and weeks before Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann can select one particle of the land. I was going to say, what utter nonsense; but that would be wrong. If I were not in the House, would it not be right to say, what utter nonsense it is for these gentlemen to come here and talk in this way, when they can go into the country and make their selection of the lands, and make their fortune, if they believe what they say? What did the Government do? The House recognizes that there are in this contract conditions which these gentlemen would not have thought possible, if it had not been announced to the House—that these men, without being paid a cent of money, but merely on the chance of what they could make out of the lands, knowing that rich placer claims had already been staked, and knowing that thousands, and tens of thousands, of people were at Dyea and Skagway, and on the Yukon and the Stikine, making their way into the country, and free to locate mining claims wherever they pleased, and, when they located, knowing that the Government of Canada would see to it that their claims would be recognized—that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann would have to make their selection bit by bit, as they completed their railroad, and would not be able to make their total selection till the last ten miles of the railway was built, near the 1st of September next. And yet hon. gentlemen speak as if the Government had given away the inheritance of the Canadian people. We do not want to lose sight of this fact. This is a business question, in which the whole of the people of Canada are interested. The way in which the whole of the people of Canada will be benefited by this project will not be so much by the gold that is taken out. It will be by the trade that is created by the men who dig and delve for that gold; and this Government were determined that they would do all that was in their power, if Parliament would sustain them in it, to see that the vast trade that would be developed in extracting that gold, should go to benefit the people of Canada, who own the land. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about our mining regulations and our 10 per cent royalty. They say the Government will be forced to change it. Well, the Government will do what they consider right and proper; but the Government said, when the people were flocking into that country, that it belonged to the people of Canada. When the people were flocking in there, as the hon. leader of the Opposition said, fifty Americans to one Canadian, taking the gold that belonged to the people of Canada, the Government said: We will not shut these Americans out, but we will not allow them to take that gold out without paying a substantial royalty to the people of Canada, whose money is to be expended in opening up and administering the country. If, in the course of time, after the people of Canada have gone in and have secured the trade of the country, it should be deemed advisable to reduce the royalty, we shall be at liberty to do so. But, meanwhile, where is the Canadian who will say, while these foreigners were going in, as the hon. leader of the Opposition said, fifty to one, that we did wrong in not seeking to exclude the Americans in return for their exclusive policy, but in asking them to contribute one-tenth of what they took out? Leave the question of foreigners out of the question altogether, if you will; what great general benefit to Canada would it be if ten, fifteen, twenty, aye, or a hundred or more, of Canadians should accumulate vast wealth by lucky strikes in that territory, good as far as it goes? I would be glad if the money were in the pockets of Canadians. There would be a hundred individuals benefited, and they might be able to expend somewhat more in their living; but the benefit would be limited. That is not where the interests of Canada, as a whole, come in. But, bearing in mind the fact, so truly stated by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and which every one knows, that it costs a dollar in gold to produce a dollar in gold, the people of Canada are interested in having the trade of those men who are expending a dollar for every dollar they take out; for what does that mean? It means not a fortune to one hundred or two hundred, but it means to all the cities and towns throughout this Dominion, to every warehouse, factory and workshop, to every farmer and artisan, benefit from that trade owing to the policy adopted by this Government. It is the trade we want, it is that we are after, and the Opposition, in their unpatriotic stand, are working against the best interests of the country. And they are pursuing this unpatriotic course at a moment when the Government are bending every effort to secure a fair share—and a fair share is a large share—of that trade in this country. The trade will, at any rate, be a large one for a year or perhaps two—I hope for many a year—but we want to benefit by it just as soon as we can. We want to benefit by it this year, and we are getting it in part. But if we had that road completed to-day, who will say what the benefit would be to the people, east, west, north and south, in all the factories, workshops and warehouses of this Dominion? Yet these gentlemen are finding fault with the Government. They have not hesitated even to insult members on this side by suggesting that we are supporting a scheme which does not commend itself to us as in the best interests of the country. The Government have had exhibitions of party fealty, there is no doubt about that, and I believe they have the confidence of their supporters. But the Government does not rely on party fealty or party feeling. It relies on the merits of the question itself, it relies on the men of this House determining that this matter, on its own merits, is in the best interests of the country. And there are hon. gentlemen on the other side who, if they would speak out their minds, would give expression to an opinion favourable to this scheme.

And what more, Sir? We have had an insult cast at another Chamber, to which I would not allude, if it had not been cast so openly. When hon. gentlemen opposite know that the people's representatives, elected directly by the people, who are not bound by anything except what is due to the public interests of their constituencies—when they know that the representatives of the people will pass this bargain on its merits, what do they do? They make appeals to another branch of this legislature to throw the measure out. I say, Mr. Speaker, that in so doing they insult that branch. Even if the members of that Chamber are not responsible to the people as are the members of this House, there are business men in it, there are men in it keenly alive to the interests of the country, men who are supposed to occupy a judicial position, and these men, when called upon by the Opposition in this House to throw out the Bill, which the people's representatives, directly responsible to the people, in this House, are going to pass, I think that that Chamber will be prepared to resent the insult when the time comes for them to act.

Mr. DAVIN. Who is it that first in the debate referred to the second Chamber?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not know that it was the hon. member for Assiniboia, but it was from that side of the House, I believe.

Mr. DAVIN. No, the first one to refer to the Senate was the hon. Minister of the Interior, and he concluded his speech with a threat against that Chamber.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Is the hon. gentleman referring to my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think the hon. gentleman is wrong. My hon. colleague the Minister of the Interior pointed out that the members of the Opposition were assuming a great responsibility if they refused their assent to this Bill, and if it was defeated here or elsewhere the responsibility would be on them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I think that is correct. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that that was the first time that that Chamber was mentioned.

Mr. DAVIN. In this House?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. Certainly, it was not mentioned from this side before.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Had it not also been mentioned in their papers?

Mr. DAVIN. It is mentioned in the "Globe."

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Why, we know that hon. members have called upon the Senate to throw out the Bill. To-night we have heard the appeal made. We have heard in this debate appeals made to the Senate to do this. Not only that, but in almost every issue of their press there are similar appeals, and all that the hon. Minister of the

Mr. PATERSON.

Interior did was to point out that whoever would be responsible for the rejection of this measure, under all the circumstances surrounding it, would incur great responsibility. I do not view that as a threat at all, but as a statement which is perfectly correct, for I do believe that hon. gentlemen opposite would incur great responsibility if by any means they succeeded in frustrating the building of this road in the time mentioned.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As the hon. gentleman has raised, and I think myself improperly raised this point, and made statements in reference to another branch of the legislature and the actions of hon. gentlemen in this House, I think, perhaps, I had better read what his colleague, the Minister of the Interior, really did say:

It would remove the danger of the country being, not in the hands of our officers, but in the hands of an alien population who would condemn this Government. This I look upon as important. Let my hon. friend understand that if this railway project is obstructed, if it is stopped here or elsewhere—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (reading)—

—and if that territory passes from the control of Canada by reason of their being no railway communication, the people of Canada will hold them to a bitter account for it.

Now, there is a statement coming from the Minister of the Interior declaring that the people of this country will hold another branch responsible for serious consequences if they do not pursue the course he indicates. Under those circumstances, I regret the attack which the hon. gentleman has made here, and the freedom with which he has dealt with another branch of the legislature is entirely unwarranted.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I suppose the hon. gentleman takes the ground that when we hear in this Chamber hopes expressed that another branch will defeat the Bill, which they admit this House will pass, it is not proper for me to point out that in so acting they are casting an insult at the other Chamber.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is not so serious an impropriety or as unparliamentary as for a Minister of the Crown to utter a threat against another branch of Parliament.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am uttering no threat.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, but the Minister of the Interior did, and I read the threat he uttered.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Does the hon. gentleman consider it is a threat to say that a legislative body will be held responsible by the people of Canada for what it does?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say that no other construction can be put upon it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I gave from my recollection what I thought my hon. colleague the Minister of the Interior said, and it agrees with what the hon. gentleman quoted. As I have said, the Government are in the judgment of the House and are prepared to abide by its decision. We have done what we considered was in the public interest in this matter. I need not enter into all the details. I need not attempt, at this stage of the debate, to go over that contract line by line and section by section. That has been clearly discussed by the members who have preceded me. But in addition to the trade that we are trying to secure for this country—which, after all, is a valuable thing for the people of this country, because it means not wealth to 100 or 200 men but to every hamlet and village throughout the country—in addition to that, there is another duty and responsibility which the Government felt. It was their bounden duty to take steps, so far as was in their power to preserve law and order in that country, to see that the safety of the people who went into that country was assured. And, in order to accomplish that in the rush that is being made in the excitement that has been manifested, extraordinary measures had to be taken. And when hon. gentlemen opposite say that we did not start early enough, I ask them to read the remarks of the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) and to take their answer from him. We know how he laboured, how he bent himself to the task of the management of the Yukon country, and you heard his statement that as soon as he had ascertained positively from the report of his officers that it was possible to have uninterrupted navigation from the foot of Teslin Lake to Dawson City, we acted immediately. As he said, it would have been premature to have acted sooner. Acting promptly, the Government made this contract; they made it with men who, as everybody in this House admits, are able financially to carry out their contracts, men who have shown by their work on other contracts that when they say they will finish a road by the 1st of September they are ready to carry out their agreement. In view of the tens of thousands of people who are rushing into that country, none can doubt that there is an absolute necessity that every means should be provided in order that supplies may be carried on for their use, and also to place the Government in a position to restrain lawlessness should it appear and to retain that country to the Dominion of Canada, with all the benefits to the people that we hope for from its occupation. The future wealth of that country is problematical. I am sure that hon. members irrespective of party, desire that it may prove rich in mineral, that for years and for years wealth may be extracted from those rocks and hills and valleys. But we know that it would be contrary to all experience for placer mining to last for a great number of years. We hope, however, that as in the Kootenay, rich quartz mines may be found. That would mean permanent settlement and the employment of machinery. That would mean towns and villages. But it would mean also that those who are to develop wealth there, to crush those rocks and extract the gold must have capital by the million. And, having a strong company there whose interests must lie largely in rock-mining by reason of the way in which they select their land, we have an earnest desire that a determined effort will be made to learn whether there is gold-bearing rock there or not. And if such should be found to be the case the people of Canada will enjoy the benefits and will share the wealth that is developed.

So, looking at the safety of the country, looking at it as a duty of the Canadian people to see to it that means of access are provided for taking in provisions and supplies to the people who go in there, having regard to the fact that it is above all things necessary that the Canadian Government shall be in a position to maintain law and order in that country, having regard to the vast trade that we hope will be developed in the mines there, we have undertaken to provide direct communication to that country by an all-Canadian route. The Government have submitted their proposition to Parliament, and on the judgment of Parliament upon this measure as a business measure, standing upon its merits alone, they challenge the House to pronounce a verdict.

Mr. MONK moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Bill (No. 35) to incorporate the Miles Cañon and White Horse Tramway Company.—(Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (No. 36) to amend the Act respecting the sale of railway passenger tickets.—(Mr. Beattie.)

ADJOURNMENT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I gave notice a few days ago that I would move :

That when the House adjourns this day, it do stand adjourned until Thursday, the 24th.

It has been represented to me by several members on both sides of the House that the attendance, which is noticeable to everybody, is very thin to-day, and is likely to remain so on account of the storm for the present week, and therefore it is advisable to adjourn not until Thursday but to Tuesday, 1st March. I, therefore, amend my motion, and accordingly I move :

That when the House adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 1st day of March.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I would press on the leader of the Government the desirability of extending the time until Wednesday. We wish to stay at home until the election is over.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Until after the storm is over.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). We want to know the result. I suggest that an adjournment be taken until Wednesday.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think the proposition is the best answer to the suggestion now made, and that the motion as it stands is expedient in the interest of the public service. Perhaps some of our friends from Ontario may not be back on Tuesday, but they ought all to be back on Wednesday morning, and members from the other provinces will be here on Tuesday.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY— MR. HAMILTON SMITH'S PROPOSAL.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the Table of the House the papers which I promised to my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) the other day, respecting the proposal made by Mr. Hamilton Smith, and, as one of the letters from that gentleman has already been placed on the records of the House by an hon. member, I propose, with the permission of the House and your permission, Mr. Speaker, to present the whole of these letters and to read them to the House. They are as follows :—
Mr. PATERSON.

Ottawa, 14th February, 1898.

To the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, K.C.M.G., Premier :

Sir,—In connection with several London associates, we have made application to the present Parliament for a charter for a railway from Lynn Canal by the Chilkat Pass to a point on the Lewes River just below Rink Rapids. As I find, upon my late return from London that your Government has made a provisional contract, which, if carried out, would prevent any charter being granted to myself and associates, I beg leave to submit the following statements and propositions :—

My associates and myself have for many years been connected with the Treadwell mine and other gold mines on the coast of Alaska, so that we have been specially familiar with that northern country. Last year, at our instance, Mr. Henry Bratnober was sent on an exploring expedition from Lynn Canal to Dawson, with instructions to see what route was best adapted for the construction of a railway from the coast to the unobstructed waters of the Yukon. He returned via the so-called Dalton trail from Rink Rapids by Hootchei and Dalton's Post, to Pyramid Harbour, noting elevations, distances and the character of the country. He was, we are informed, the second white man who had passed over the entire length of this line. His report to us was so favourable as to the many advantages of this route that as soon as your Minister of the Interior returned from the west, I approached him through a mutual friend, offering to build in the year 1898 a substantial railway from Pyramid Harbour to Rink Rapids, with no cash subsidy, but with a reasonable land grant covering mineral rights. At the time, I referred, by authority, to several of the largest financial firms in London, showing that our ability to build such a line was beyond question.

The answer I received was, that the Government might prefer the Stikine-Tealin route ; to this I replied that, in my judgment, which I felt sure, from my familiarity with the country, was correct, the Stikine line had practically no value as a commercial route, and that no sane capitalist would invest a penny in it, but, of course, if the Government would give the right assistance we would build the line, while disclaiming any responsibility for its value when constructed.

Doubtless, these informal negotiations were communicated to the Cabinet.

In this connection allow me to state that no offer to build the line was made for the house of N. M. Rothschild & Sons, as has been stated in the House of Commons.

I was then compelled to go to London, and just before leaving on my way back to Canada, was surprised to hear by cable that a contract was being arranged with other parties, and that myself and friends were not offered the opportunity of making a tender. This seemed to us strange, considering the financial strength of the names I had given as being shareholders of our proposed company, and as we were the pioneers of the Dalton route and had given the Government full information as to its advantages.

It is now, I believe, admitted by almost all persons conversant with the subject, that the Dalton line is the most favourable of any route yet proposed, but with your permission I will contrast it with the Stikine-Teslin line.

The Stikine line commences at Fort Wrangel, on acknowledged territory of the United States, but with certain treaty rights as to the navigation of the Stikine; thence about 150 miles up that river, which sometimes from low water and other times from floods is difficult of navigation, so much so that your engineer, Mr. W. T. Jennings, in his report of 11th January, 1898, advises the construction of a railway from Little Cañon up the Stikine 54 miles to a point where the line will leave the river. The Stikine, he states, is generally open for navigation 5½ months; my information is that in some seasons it is closed fully 7 months.

I gather from Mr. Jennings's report that he advises the following route:—

	Miles.
Fort Wrangel by boat to Little Cañon on Stikine.....	96
Little Cañon by rail up Stikine.....	54
Stikine Crossing by rail to Koketsi.....	59
Koketsi by rail to Lake Mo-a-de-le (crossing divide 3,840 feet above sea level)....	14
Lake Mo-a-de-le by rail to southern end Lake Teslin (lake 2,400 feet above sea level).....	118 or 124
Along Lake Teslin to deep water by rail..	10
From deep water, Lake Teslin, to its discharge, by boat.....	50½
Teslin Lake to junction Hootalinqua and Lewes, by boat.....	139½
Down Lewes from junction Hootalinqua to Rink Rapids, by boat (elevation, Rink Rapids, 1,600 feet above sea).....	135

Total distance..... 676

Of which 96 miles are by boat up Stikine ;
255 miles are by rail to Lake Teslin ;
325 miles are by boat to Rink Rapids.

My information is, that at times in certain seasons the Hootalinqua is not navigable for steamboats of any size, and so occasionally portages would have to be made. Lake Teslin is not open for more than about five months, owing to its elevation of 800 feet above Rink Rapids; it, doubtless, is not open as long as the lower part of the Lewes River. Below the junction of the Hootalinqua with the Lewes boats must pass through the swift water of Five Finger Rapids, and also through Black Rapids.

Now contrast such a route, involving at least two breaks of carriage, with our proposed Dalton trail. In the latter, we start from a point on deep water, at an admirable harbour, open at all times to the largest steamers afloat, where the ships will be moored at a pier alongside the railway train; this harbour, very possible, may be in Canadian territory; then, with a grade which can be kept at 2 per cent to the coast range summit, 3,070 feet above sea, and then with easy grade and lower elevation, to the Lewes River, where boats drawing five feet can go down at all times, when the river is open, to Dawson City, or even to near the Yukon Fiats.

By the Stikine-Teslin line the distance is 676 miles, open only five months in the year, and uncertain at that. By the Dalton line, the distance by our survey is 288 miles all rail, and the line can be kept open the year through. (Mr. Jennings states this distance to be 245 miles.)

On behalf of my associates, I now offer to build a well equipped narrow-gauge line on the Dalton route, to be completed during the present year, and so constructed that it can be readily changed to a broad-gauge line in the season of 1899, upon the condition that the Government will give no new charter for railways from Lynn Canal in the next five years; will authorize for that term proper traffic rates, and will give us a subsidy of 1,000,000 acres of land on the same general terms as the provisional contract before spoken of.

Or, if the Government insists upon the Stikine line also, we will build a light railway for the Stikine and a substantial one on the Dalton line for a concession of 2,000,000 acres. From Mr. Jennings's report one infers that the land grant in the provisional contract will be from 4,500,000 to 5,000,000 acres for the Stikine line alone.

We have devoted much time and considerable expense to this affair, having had a detailed survey made of our proposed line up to the coast summit. The standing of the London gentlemen I represent is also, as you doubtless have been informed, of the very highest. So I hope this communication will meet with the careful attention of your Cabinet.

I have the honour to remain,

Yours very respectfully,

(Sgd.) HAMILTON SMITH.

I inclose a copy of our first map which was shown to the Minister of the Interior last year.

(Sgd.) H. S.

On the 18th, that is on Friday last, I received an amended proposal in the following letter, which was read yesterday by my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean):

Rideau Club,

Ottawa, 18th February, 1898.

To the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, G.C.M.G., Premier:

Sir,—In view of the strongly expressed opposition to a subsidy of mineral lands, with power to the concessionaire of selection in very many different localities, I beg leave to amend my proposition of the 14th inst., as follows:—

If a charter is granted to myself and associates not later than the 10th of March next, we will agree in the present year to build a substantial railway of three feet gauge (so constructed that it can afterwards be easily changed to a standard gauge), from Pyramid Harbour to the foot of Rink Rapids, a distance of about 288 miles, on condition that the Government will give no new charter for railways from Lynn Canal in the next five years; will authorize for that term proper traffic rates, and will give us a grant in fee simple (covering mineral rights of alternate sections of one mile square for a distance of ten miles on each side of the railway from the 60th parallel of latitude to the northern terminus at Rink Rapids; this grant would embrace a length of about 195 miles, and, being at the rate of 6,400 acres per mile of railway, would amount to say 1,248,000 acres.

In this connection, I may state that very little prospecting for gold has been thus far done in this locality.

Permit me again to call your attention to the fact that the ocean terminus of this Dalton line is nearer Dawson City than the northern terminus of the proposed Stikine line.

By Dalton Route.
	Miles.
Pyramid Harbour to Rink Rapids by rail..	288
Rink Rapids to Dawson by large boats...	225
	513
By Stikine Route.
Southern end of Lake Teslin to mouth of Hootalinqua	60½
Hootalinqua River to its junction with Lewes	139½
Lewes River from Hootalinqua to Rink Rapids....	135
Rink Rapids to Dawson City.....	225
	560

If Mr. Jennings's advice be carried out that the railway should be extended ten miles north of end of Lake Teslin, the distance from inner terminus of Stikine line to Dawson would be 550 miles, or thirty-seven miles farther than from Pyramid Harbour to Dawson.

Or, if Government still insists on Stikine line alone, we will build that on same general terms as the provisional contract with Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann for 1,000,000 acres, but without the right of lateral or end extensions of the blocks of land.

The Government is, I believe, informed as to our financial ability to execute such work, but if there are any doubts as to this, a cable or so to London will speedily give the desired information.

I have the honour to remain,

Yours very respectfully,

(Sgd.) HAMILTON SMITH.

It is to be noticed that in this first communication it is stated by Mr. Smith that doubtless these informal communications, which are here detailed, had been communicated to the Cabinet. I must say to the House that no such communication had ever been made to me or to the Cabinet by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior. Upon the receipt of this letter, therefore, I called the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior to it, and he there and then stated to myself that he had never received any such communication either directly or indirectly. I thereupon wrote a short letter to Mr. Hamilton Smith acknowledging the receipt of his letter, and asking him to meet me in my office on Saturday last at 10.30 in the forenoon, which he did. With me at the time were some of my colleagues, that is to say, Sir Richard Cartwright, Sir Louis Davies, Mr. Blair and Mr. Sifton. Thereupon Mr. Smith declared that the mutual friend through whom the offer had been made to Mr. Sifton was Sir William Van Horne. It so happened that on that day Sir William Van Horne was in the city, and I therefore immediately wrote to him as follows:—

Privy Council, Canada,
Ottawa, 19th February, 1898.

Dear Sir William Van Horne :

On the 15th instant, I received from Mr. Hamilton Smith a letter as to the statements of which I would desire to communicate with you.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. Smith, in his letter, makes the following assertions:—

"My associates and myself have for many years been connected with the Treadwell mine and other gold mines on the coast of Alaska, so that we have been especially familiar with that northern country. Last year, at our instance, Mr. Henry Bratnober was sent on an exploring expedition from Lynn Canal to Dawson, with instructions to see what route was best adapted for the construction of a railway from the coast to the unobstructed waters of the Yukon. He returned by the so-called Dalton trail from Rink Rapids by Hootchie and Dalton's Post, to Pyramid Harbour, noting elevations, distances and the character of the country. He was, we are informed, the second white man who had passed over the entire length of this line. His report to us was so favourable as to the many advantages of this route, that as soon as your Minister of the Interior returned from the west, I approached him through a mutual friend, offering to build, in the year 1898, a substantial railway from Pyramid Harbour to Rink Rapids, with no cash subsidy, but with a reasonable land grant covering mineral rights. At the time, I referred, by authority, to several of the largest financial firms in London, showing that our ability to build such a line was beyond question.

"The answer I received was, that the Government might prefer the Stikine-Teslin route. To this I replied that in my judgment, from my familiarity with the country was correct, the Stikine line had practically no value as a commercial route, and that no sane capitalist would invest a penny in it; but, of course, if the Government would give the right assistance, we would build the line, while disclaiming any responsibility for its value when constructed.

"Doubtless, these informal negotiations were communicated to the Cabinet."

The Hon. Mr. Sifton, to whom I gave immediate communication of this letter, stated that the above assertion was altogether untrue. I thereupon invited Mr. Hamilton Smith to meet me this morning in my office, and he accordingly met me there in the presence of a few of my colleagues, and then, in answer to our inquiries, stated that you were the mutual friend who had communicated between him and Mr. Sifton.

Under such circumstances, I would feel obliged, if you would let me know at your earliest convenience whether, as is claimed by Mr. Hamilton Smith, you can corroborate his statement.

Believe me, dear Sir William,
Yours very sincerely,

(Sgd.) WILFRID LAURIER.

Sir William Van Horne,
General Manager, C.P.R., Montreal.

On the same day I received the following answer from Sir William Van Horne:

Rideau Club,
Ottawa, 19th February, 1898.

Dear Sir Wilfrid,—In reply to your inquiry of this date, I beg leave to say that I have never communicated to the Hon. Mr. Sifton or anybody else any proposition from Mr. Hamilton Smith concerning the building of a railway towards the Yukon district, nor had I authority from him to make any proposition.

Faithfully yours,

(Sgd.) W. C. VAN HORNE.

Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, G.C.M.G., Ottawa.

E. LALONDE, MESSENGER.

Mr. WILSON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Government if they are aware that E. Lalonde, a messenger of this House, has been or is canvassing in the county of Russell?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I do not know whether the Government are informed of the doings of the messengers of this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose the Speaker has more direct control over the messengers of this House than even the Government; and, for the information of the hon. member, I would say that so far as I am concerned, I have not heard of any sessional messenger being engaged in the canvass. If the hon. gentleman has any facts in regard to anything of the kind, and would be good enough to communicate them to me, I will have the matter looked into.

Mr. WILSON. Has any messenger been given leave of absence?

Mr. SPEAKER. Not that I am aware of. Of course, I suppose the head messenger might give a short leave of absence without communicating with the Speaker. I am not aware that the messenger referred to has obtained leave of absence; but I may say that whenever any messenger of this House desires to go away and vote, no matter on which side he wishes to vote—and there are, I understand, messengers on both sides of politics—he gets leave to do it, if it can be done without inconvenience to the business of the House. Canvassing, however, is a different matter.

CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Blair for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty the Queen and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company.

Mr. MONK. Mr. Speaker, I regret to have to trespass upon the attention of the House in regard to this Bill. I feel that we have much yet to learn in regard to it; but, with the elements at our disposal, there remains but very little to be said. Nevertheless, the measure is one of so much importance, the legislation which we are called upon to enact is in a certain sense so new—for we are called upon to legislate, for the first time I think in the history of this Dominion, for a great mining country—the enterprise covered by the provisions of the Bill is so great, and the grant of land is so large and important, that I feel it my duty to say a few words on the subject. Down in the province of which I have the honour to be one of the representatives, a man on this side of the House who would remain silent and yet cast his vote against this measure would be taxed either with a semi-acquiescence in it or a total indifference to its results on the country at large. This, Sir, is my excuse. I listened last night, with some degree of amazement, to the speech delivered to this House by the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). It is fair to say that he absolutely went the length of shedding crocodile tears over the fate of these two contractors. He went into rhapsodies over their patriotism, and enthused over their energy in a very loud voice. We had something of a similar character from the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), and this led me to ask myself: what is the trend of public opinion in the great province of Ontario with regard to this measure? For, Sir, in the province of Quebec many views have been expressed, but I have heard none in the direction of sympathizing with the two men who have been so prominently mentioned in this debate. There is, I venture to say, without fear of contradiction, a very different feeling in my province. The feeling there, is—and I think it is justified—that this is a very rich country, and that if, for the construction of this railway, we are, as we have been told time and again by the Government organs, giving no money, we are giving a very large quantity of gold. That is the opinion in the province of Quebec, and the opinion is there also—and it is very general among men of every political shade of opinion—that these two contractors have been singularly fortunate, and in some way, which the people cannot understand, have obtained great advantages which would not accrue to them if the Government had carried through this transaction according to the ordinary principles of parliamentary government. The fact is, Sir, in the province of Quebec—and I know there is no member from that province who will contradict me—the opinion is that, in the language of a local poet:

The largest-sized pebble to-day on the beach
Is that road to the Klondike, away out of reach,
And all of the women—and many a man—
Would be pleased to shake hands with that fellow called Dan;
For every man that you speak of looks pale Beside of that Mann on the great Golden Trail.

That, in a few words, expresses what the general opinion is in my province, and it is not astonishing, under those circumstances, that we should have awaited with the greatest expectancy the explanations to be given us with regard to this measure, when introduced into this House. Well, we had the explanations from the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), and I must confess that, for my own part, he surprised me more by the large, massive and majestic way in which he refused any information than even by the paucity of the information which he did give. As I have said, there was something sweeping about the way in which he brushed aside all attempts at inquiry; and if I were to borrow from my classical recollection, I would say he reminded me of the old Roman who declared:

Sic volo, sic jubeo; stet pro ratione voluntas.

But when the hon. gentleman who more particularly had charge of the Bill—although nominally it was in another name—when the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) rose to explain its provisions and give us the information which we could only have reaped scantily out of the Government reports and books which, but a few hours before, had been laid on the Table, we all pressed forward to listen. Here was a man, we thought, surely qualified to instruct the House and satisfy the legitimate curiosity of the country. Here was a man who, but a short time previously, had travelled into that great and mysterious country, about which we know so little; here was a man who, not as an ordinary tourist, but assisted by all that his position in the Government could give him, had gone right up into the White Pass, had come back along the coast, and had had occasion, with all the authority with which he was invested, to acquire information from all sides; who had actually travelled down, if I am not mistaken, from the White Pass with Mr. Jennings himself, who had gone over that country and examined it and had gathered together all items of information. My hon. friend, the member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) has adverted to what took place. Why, we waited for an hour, while the hon. Minister spent his time attacking the leader of the Opposition, for the information we all desired. Now, I do not claim—I know my position in this House—to lecture the hon. gentleman, and still less do I claim to defend here the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper). But whatever fault may be found with the leader of the Opposition, I think, Sir, that every one on both sides will give him credit for being a man well able to take care of himself—able, willing, and, I believe, even anxious to demonstrate that fact on every occasion. I have seen him do so under trying circumstances in my own province. But I will say this. I shall not go the length which the hon. Minister of the Interior went of saying that there might be in his manner something of the wild and woolly west, but I will say that the mode of his abuse and of his invective conveyed to me, to use a more oriental expression, something of the breeziness of the prairie. I may say that I am not aware that the leader of the Opposition ever attempted to wag me as one of his followers, and I have never attempted to wag him. He is in the chair which he occupies to-day, by the will of the members of his party. Sir, speaking more particularly for my colleagues from the province of Quebec, with whom I am in perfect unison. I can tell the hon. Minister of the Interior this, that we have passed to our leader our word, and that our word is as good as the best gold in the Yukon. If there are traitors in our party, Sir, we have no use for them. Well, if the hon. Minister will allow me, without pursuing any further this branch of my remarks—he occupies a far more exalted position in this House than I do, but I have over him the doubtful advantage of years—let me tell him this, that if he may not always be able to obtain the adhesion of members on this side, yet if he will, to some extent, moderate his mode of criticism, he will secure to himself what is, to a certain extent, far better, and that is the esteem and respect of all the members of this House.

When the hon. gentleman came to give us that information for which we were thirsting, I listened to him with a great deal more interest. I admit that he marshalled his facts ably, skilfully; but, though I listened to him with great attention, though I read his explanations carefully afterwards, he failed to satisfy me, and I am convinced that he has failed to satisfy the country at large upon some of the cardinal points on which we must rest our decision in regard to this matter. And these points are the following:—The hon. gentleman gave me no satisfaction in regard to the conditions upon which we shall be permitted to navigate the territorial rivers of the United States upon the Stikine River. He totally failed upon that subject to give me anything else than those suppositions which I had myself already. He failed also—and this is a point which, I think, will attract the attention of the country—to give any certainty as to what tolls were to be charged, what the cost of transportation was to be for those in whose behalf we are building this railway. I will say at once that I am prepared to admit the principle that this Parliament, in incorporating a railway, will not at once fix the tolls to be charged upon it; I admit that we are governed by the Railway Act and that we have a control exercised through the Government and through the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. But I say at once that the conditions in the present case are exceptional, and that, unless we obtain from the Government some certainty as to the cost of transportation, we shall be voting in the dark, if we vote this large grant. We are building this railway for a special set of travellers, who will probably go over it only once or twice. From what I have heard of the railway and of this route, I believe that the railway will have only an ephemeral usefulness. It is made to satisfy the wants arising during this year, and next year, and perhaps the year after. It is made to carry the immense caravan of gold-hunters who will arrive in that region within the next few months. These are exceptional conditions, and if we want to meet these wants effectually, we must know what will be the cost of transportation over that railway. This takes this road out of the conditions of ordinary railways altogether. There is another point, and one most vital, on which the Minister of the Interior gave us no satisfaction whatever, and that is as to the value of the land grant which we are making. This is one of the foremost points in this controversy. Although I am at once prepared to admit—and I shall refer to this matter in a few moments—that it was impossible to give us the absolute value, still, with the means the Government had, it would be easy to give us the approximate value of that large territory which we are conceding to these contractors. Another point, and one because of which I shall give a vote dissenting from the second reading of this Bill, is that the Government failed to satisfy us as to the reasons why tenders were not asked for the construction of this work. And, as we advance in the discussion of this matter, it becomes more and more evident that it would be impossible for the Government to give us any valid reasons why this great undertaking was not set up for public competition, as it should have been. Nor did the hon. Minister in his speech give to me, at any rate, any satisfaction as to the reason why this land grant, which was exclusively under the control of this House, was not submitted to us in the first instance. These are the points on which I found the speech of the Minister of the Interior meagre to a blamable degree, and I venture to say that the country at large, at least that part of it from which I come, upon examination of the hon. gentleman's explanations, will arrive at the same conclusion.

My own reasons for dissenting from the majority in this House and for voting against this measure are manifold. But there are three principal reasons. The first of these is, that Parliament should have been consulted in the first instance. I will not take up the time of this House in going into the discussion of the principle which underlies my argument in this regard. We all know—there are few members of the House, perhaps, who are not better aware than I am—that the primary control of Parliament in all matters of grants is a principle which has been fought for during hundreds of years in England before the political institutions of that country were brought into operation here. In fact, Sir, it is a principle, as we all know, that was in operation among the Anglo-Saxon races long before the British constitution had assumed any co-ordinate form. And, though for five or six hundred years that principle was trampled under foot, that usurpation gave rise in England to struggles which filled the pages of English history. The Commons fought incessantly and courageously for the primary and exclusive control in matters of grants, until finally they obtained the victory and the principle was consecrated in the Revolution of 1688 and proclaimed in the Bill of Rights. From that time down to the present day, I am not aware that in England it has been departed from to any considerable extent. It is a cardinal point of our constitution. The idea that our Executive should in the slightest degree take upon itself, outside the control of Parliament and in advance of those discussions which must precede the final settlement of all grants, to make these grants, is one which we cannot too strongly condemn. We have brought into operation in this country the principles of the British constitution. I heard the hon. leader of the House tell us, in glowing language, what he witnessed while in England, and I heard him say that the pageant which he saw there was a pageant of different peoples representing many varieties of race and religion, but it was a procession of free people. Well, the right hon. gentleman must remember that the forces which have made the British people, and the British dependencies all over the world, great and free depend upon the conservation of just such principles as that which I am contending for in this instance.

It seems to me, therefore, that having here, in one of the British dependencies, consecrated that principle, we seem to depart, as we have departed already during the existence of this Parliament, from that principle, that first and foremost all grants must be considered by Parliament. If we depart from that principle we will slowly drift into the condition of many nations just as democratic in principle as are the nations governed in accordance with the British constitution, but among which this cardinal principle is not observed. Party spirit triumphs over these free deliberations which ought to take place in our Parliament. In this instance the violation of that principle is a flagrant one. Last year we had the consummation of the contract for the Drummond County Railway, before Parliament, and we discussed that measure. This year we have the Government of the country entering into a contract involving precisely a violation of that principle which underlies free parliamentary government in its truest sense, we have the Government entering into that contract, not a long time, but a few days before Parliament assembles; yes, I may say, even at the very moment when the House, having been summoned, probably many members of this House were on their way to the capital. This seems to me to be a most flagrant violation of the principle that in all matters of grants and expenditures of money, as it is laid down in the permanent rules of the House of Commons in England, this House of Commons must in the first instance take up the matter and consider it. Now, Sir, what is the condition of things in this country? We all know it, and we see it operating in this very Chamber. We have party spirit in this country strong and operating continually, party lines are tightly drawn. And what does the Government do? The Government concludes a contract involving a large grant of land, before the opening of Parliament, and places that contract upon its ministerial programme in the Speech from the Throne, and brings that grant into this House in the shape of a Bill. And where are its followers? What is the position, in other words, of this House? Is it, Sir, as a matter of principle, able to deal with perfect freedom, as we should be able to deal with a subject of this kind? It is evident that the majority of this House have not that freedom, that is, it is impossible for members belonging to the majority of this House, to condemn the grant. And why is it so? It is because, as we all know, in condemning the grant they condemn the Government; in other words, the life of the Government depends upon the sanction of this very grant, and hence it is impossible for those who sit behind the Treasury benches to discuss this matter with perfect freedom. The role of members of Parliament under these circumstances becomes, you may say, of no importance, their hands are tied. The House of Commons is left with the right of veto, undoubtedly, we can veto this measure. But for my hon. friends opposite, what does that veto mean? It means the death of this Government—I am placing myself in their own position; it is a step the gravity of which may cause them to hesitate, and reasonably so. Here are men, some of whom have fought for years for the triumph of the policy defended by this Government; they have fought for years to put in power the men in whom they place their entire confidence. Now they are brought suddenly face to face with a grant of this kind. They are told that they are free, and so they are. They may exercise that supreme power which the nation has confided to them, just as they think fit. But is it surprising that under these circumstances they should hesitate when they know that an adverse vote will sweep the Government from power, will destroy some of their fondest hopes, and put in power men in whom they have no confidence at all? There is nothing surprising in that. A consequence of this is, and I think it is a consequence which cannot be brought too strongly before this House, and before the country at large, that while we are here to exercise the right of veto, nobody has any doubt as to the result beforehand. The Government, which after all is simply a grand committee of this House, called upon to carry out the resolutions of this House, should have placed the matter in the first instance before us and allowed us to deal with it freely, in an unharpered way, and then carry out the will of the House, without placing its own followers in that position. It should, allowing them the opportunity of free deliberation, without risking, as it has done in this instance, and must do in every similar instance, its own life in regard to the wisdom of this grant. I consider that our institutions are in peril by this system of procedure. I deem that we are wandering from the practice which exists in England. I know there are some instances in which governments in England have taken upon themselves the expenditure of money under peculiar circumstances, without the sanction of Parliament, but these instances are extremely rare. We are establishing here a dangerous precedent, and for this reason, if for no other, I should be inclined to discountenance this measure. Now, Sir, there is another point, it is that which regards the taking of tenders. The hon. Minister told us that he was pressed for time, he told us that the need was great, and that he was obliged to proceed rapidly. But what are the facts? We have much more than the admission of the Minister of Railways. The Minister of Railways told us what we all know perfectly well, that even before this House adjourned last year, the question of the Klondike was before the country. It is a matter of public notoriety, that during last summer the newspapers of this country, aye, and of every other country, were filled ad nauseam with all kinds of articles in regard to this gold country. We were told of expeditions, we were told of gold found there, we were told of rich gold-bearing creeks; in fact, every circumstance which we are aware of to day, we were aware of last autumn. And, Sir, what do we find? The Minister himself was in Victoria on 1st November. He came down from the White Pass on board a steamer with Mr. Jennings, and he had opportunity to get from that gentleman any information which would enable him to call for tenders. If on his arrival in Victoria the hon. gentleman had taken the necessary steps to call for tenders, he would have had many offers. However, I listened to the hon. gentleman when he taunted hon. members on this side of the House with not being able to furnish him with the names of parties who would be able to make an offer in connection with the construction of the work—a very idle taunt, to my mind, because the hon. gentleman well knew that when we met here his hands were tied, and he himself up to the present moment has not accepted, and cannot any more accept, the most advantageous offer. But the hon. gentleman surely does not do this, country the injustice of thinking that there are only two men here capable of carrying out this undertaking. Why, the hon. gentleman knows very well, whatever may be the qualifications of those two men, that they have their equals in every one of the provinces of this great Dominion, and I speak particularly in regard to Montreal. It is not an agreeable thing to throw the names of contractors across the floor of this House, but if the hon. gentleman will come down to Montreal, he cannot, on passing through the business streets of that city, fail to meet within two or three hours scores of men quite as capable as those two men of carrying out this undertaking. After all, this is a construction company, as I understand it, and we have construction companies in Montreal which have undertaken works of this kind, and such a company might be formed there in the space of twenty-four hours that would look upon it as a mere trifle to make the necessary Government deposit, and would be able to carry out the work just as well, if not better, than those two men. And what I say in regard to Montreal is equally applicable to the large cities of Ontario. Why, in my own rural constituency, which is in the neighbourhood of Montreal, I venture to say that if this contract had been set down for public competition, as it should have been, you would have found several men who would have tendered, and who would in all probability have been able to carry out the work under better conditions than the contractors mentioned in the Government proposal. But what is the use of talking? It is idle to say that better conditions could not be obtained. The proof that the conditions are not the best conditions available is shown by the Government not following the course of throwing open the work to all contractors and then coming to Parliament and saying, here is the lowest tender. I heard the leader of the House to-day read a proposition; and it seems to me that although the object of the right hon. gentleman was no doubt to remove any blame that might attach to his colleague the Minister of the Interior, still it is clear from that correspondence, so far as I understood it, that we have a proposal from men who are reliable and willing to execute the contract on more favourable terms. What better proof can we have of the laches of the Government in not calling for tenders? Last year we had the Drummond county deal. It was a question of carrying the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal. I venture to say if the Government at that time—we all know the circumstances connected with the project—had called for tenders for the prolongation of the Intercolonial into Montreal we would have had three or four proposals far more advantageous than the terms laid before Parliament by the Government. We would have been able, without in any way weakening the confidence which the House has in the Government, to deal with the question in such a way that we would have had the Intercolonial Railway carried into Montreal before this time. What happened? The Government chose to deal secretly, as in this case. The measure was rushed through this House, and the members from the province of Quebec did not take any interest in it beyond voting. I commend them for it, for after all they have nothing to do but to vote under this system. The measure was defeated in the other Chamber, and if we take cognizance of some of the arguments from the Government press in our part of the country, we would have supposed that the work of Guy Fawkes was going to be repeated, and the venerable gentlemen in the next Chamber would have been blown up this year. Nothing has happened, and I do not know what has become of the measure, and in fact I do not believe it will ever again come before this House in the same shape. I believe more money has been lost to the people of the country by this system of contracting secretly and without public tender than any one has any idea of. I believe, furthermore, that more Governments have been wrecked by dealing secretly and not openly with the Government than we have any notion of. I believe, furthermore, that until a set of heroic men, because the abuse has become so great that the time has arrived to make a vigorous stand against it, undertake the task of ridding the Governments and the country of these men who are regularly in the habit of contracting with the Government without that system of public tender which is the only safeguard possible to the public funds, the country will continue to lose money and Governments will continue to be weakened. Of course, Mr. Speaker, if the principle which I am advocating had been followed, Parliament would have been called in January. Six weeks' notice could easily have been given of the works that were required to be executed in that western country, and we could have dealt with the contractors in the open light of day, and Parliament would have been filling its true role, whereas we meet at great inconvenience and merely for the purpose of registering our votes, and registering our votes on matters of most vital importance, whereas in the general discussion of the estimates Parliament still retains its free legitimate and unfettered control.

It is only when we come to these great transactions involving large sums of money, that practically the hands of the House of Commons are tied, and despite all the debate that can take place, we become merely machines for the registration of the acts of Government. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I notice from the language of the Minister of the Interior—and I think it is good to call the attention of the House to it—that the negotiations were very protracted. I notice that Mr. Maitland Kersey was in communication with the hon. the Minister some time ago, and the Minister (Mr. Sifton) said the other night:

The papers on the Table of the House will show that Mr. Kersey had made a proposition a considerable time ago, for the construction of a railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake, for which he asked a bonus.

Further in his speech, the Minister said :

I informed Mr. Kersey that we were prepared to give a considerable amount of land. Mr. Kersey knew that 20,000 or 25,000 acres of land was under discussion, and I told him we were prepared to give a liberal amount of land, aggregating something in that neighbourhood.

Now, Sir, why was not that knowledge conveyed in a general way to all the people of this country capable of making a contract and a tender? That is a question which is agitating the public mind in my province, and it is the reason why much of a disagreeable character has been said in regard to the Government's action in this matter, and for that they have only themselves to blame. I consider these two points of great importance in the discussion: first, the fact that this grant of land was not brought before us in the first instance, and second, the fact that public tenders were not called for.

There is another point on which I am inclined to look unfavourably upon this project, and it is because the road is not what the Government has held it up to us to be, namely, an all-Canadian route. Here, perhaps I am not in accord with the hon. the leader of my party, but be that as it may, this objection which I make to the route seems to me to be of great weight. It is not an all-Canadian route, and in this connection in order not to pass on beaten ground, and to perhaps say something which may be of interest to the House, I desire to advert to our rights upon the Stikine River. I was for many years engaged in the teaching of international law, I have abandoned that branch, and as hon. members know, in our profession, we are not called upon very often to examine questions of this kind. Although I may have become rusty, still the questions involved in the discussion of this measure brought back to my mind something of what I studied in past days, and I have examined the question and wish to lay my conclusions before the House.

It may be proper, Sir, in the first instance to examine what our position would have been outside of the operation of any treaty at all. In other words, given the situation of the Stikine River, and all other rivers, flowing from British territory through Alaska into the Pacific Ocean irrespective of any treaty rights, what would our position be? There is not in international law, as we have in private law—at least in our province where the French civil law prevails—servitudes existing by the mere situation of lands. The fact that a river like the River Stikine, from British territory flows down to the sea through the territory of a foreign country, would not give us any "perfect" right to the navigation of that river, but there are "imperfect" rights upon which all authors are not agreed. It is pretended by some authors that the situation, more particularly of the Stikine River which we are now discussing, would give us an imperfect right to the servitude, a right to ascend from the sea to our own territory and to descend from our own territory to the sea, even through the territorial waters of a foreign country. French authors contend for that view. Mr. Wheaton, an American writer upon international law, of great repute is also of that opinion, but other authors hold a different view. Kluber is of opinion that there is no such imperfect right, that under such circumstances we cannot ask for the right to navigate that river, or that the state upon whom that demand should be made, under the principles of international law could quite reasonably refuse it. Heffer holds to that view also, and if I am not mistaken, though I have not verified the fact, it is the view of the English writers Phillimore and Sir Travers Twiss, and it is the view to which England has held down to most modern times. The English Government does not admit the principle of an imperfect right; that is the right to demand a right of way through the Stikine River under the circumstances which I have indicated. Of course within quite recent times, in 1884 or 1885, England took part in the Berlin conference; that great conference which had for its object the free navigation of the Congo and Niger rivers in Africa, and what is undoubtedly of interest to us, the United States of America were a party to that conference by which the navigation of these two arteries of African commerce was thrown open to the whole world, and England and the United States were a party to the important declaration made by that conference: that it was a principle of modern international law that under the circumstances in which the Congo and Niger rivers flow through the continent of Africa, all nations could use these rivers who had any interest there. The United States of America adhered to that principle, and the navigation of those two rivers is to-day entirely free to all the nations of the world. I have no doubt that if ever we come to discuss the question of regulations with the United States, the work of that conference will be of great benefit to us.

But, Sir, we are dealing here with a servitude created by treaty, and it was created in the first instance by the Treaty of Russia of 1825. I shall read the article of that treaty which provides for the free navigation of the Stikine. Article VI says :

It is understood that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, from whatever quarter they may arrive, whether from the ocean or from the interior of the continent, shall for ever enjoy the right of navigating freely and without any hindrance whatever, the rivers and streams which in their course towards the Pacific Ocean may cross the line of demarcation upon the line of coast described in article 3 of the present convention.

Now, what was the nature of that servitude? The servitude created by this article was a conventional affirmative servitude giving us the right to navigate all these streams which are situated in a position similar to the Stikine River. The nature of that right is not a subject of much controversy in international law. It is a servitude, as I understand it, which adheres to the territory; it is a perpetual servitude. Its operations may be suspended by war; but, different from what exists in the case of treaties, its operation revives. All treaties are broken by war, but the servitude of this kind revives after the war "pro proprio vigore." Thus, if the Crimean War terminated the Treaty of 1825 between Russia and England, this servitude of itself revived after the war. The treaty made at Paris after the war between the parties who participated in it revived impliedly all previously existing treaties at any rate. But there is more, Sir. As I understand it, the servitude in question is a servitude which adheres to the territory; and, after the cession of Alaska from Russia to the United States it continued in our favour. That is, if I mistake not, the opinion of writers of any authority upon international law. A passive servitude of that kind passes. But, Sir, the Minister of the Interior appeared to me to have a very limited appreciation of what the value of that servitude is. I must say I was amazed at his position. As I understood him to explain our rights under the treaty of 1825, a British vessel arriving at Fort Wrangel at the mouth of the Stikine River, under the beneficent stipulations of this article 6, would have a right to go quietly up the river without any hindrance of any kind whatever—without submitting to any regulation, or being controlled in the slightest degree. This of course is a gross mistake; there is no doubt about that. Why, Sir, if that were the case, our own vessels under the treaty would have been placed in a better position than the American vessels themselves. But that is a mistake; I say it without any fear of contradiction.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). A mistake in the understanding of the hon. gentleman, not in the expression of the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. MONE. The Minister of the Interior may not have used the words which I am using; but I leave it to the members of this House if he did not draw a startling contrast between our position under the Treaty of 1825 and our position under the Treaty of Washington; and he blamed the members on this side of the House and the party to which I have the honour to belong, as having been a party to the sacrifice of our rights in the latter treaty. In vehement language which I trust he may modify, he laid the blame principally upon my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in this House.

There is no such thing as free navigation such as the hon. Minister of the Interior held out to us. There is no doubt whatever that a British vessel arriving at Fort Wrangel, even under the stipulations of the Treaty of 1825, would have had to submit to a number of inconveniences which are just as great as the inconveniences which we may have to submit to now. A steamer entering the territorial waters of the United States would have to submit to the navigation laws of the United States. It would have to report. A vessel entering the mouth of the Stikine River, even under the sweeping clause I have read to the House, would be subject to the regulations of the United States in regard to police, anchoring, navigating at night and during fogs, and above all things in regard to customs. Does anybody imagine that the American authorities would allow a vessel, even under the clause of the original treaty which I have just read, to pass into the river without submitting to their customs regulations? The thing is perfectly absurd. And let me say here, once for all, that the Minister of the Interior seems to me to have gone very far when he taxed the leader of the Opposition with a desire to make war between the United States and ourselves, because we are discussing what every nation is entitled to discuss—the inconveniences which a change of territory in this route may cause to us. Why, Sir, the position taken by the Minister of the Interior is to my mind a ridiculous one. In Europe they have rivers which traverse several countries. They have the Danube, the Rhine and other rivers about which nations have been obliged to come to some understanding. But will anybody get up in this House and pretend that we are going to conclude this immense transaction, charter this railway and undertake to send our vessels through American territorial waters, without being able to discuss and examine what inconveniences that course presents? And because we do discuss these inconveniences, the hon. Minister says we are anxious to plunge the country into a bloody war. It is an absurd position to take; it is childish; it is puerile. This is a matter which we ought to discuss. It is a matter which our American friends would themselves discuss if they were placed in a similar position. They would look upon us, and rightly look upon us, as men without a knowledge of business, if we rushed this matter through without considering what inconveniences might meet us when we came to enter the territorial waters of the United States in the River Stikine.

I have indicated to this House what in my mind was the position of this country after the provisions of the Treaty of 1825 were enacted. The Treaty of Washington contains a clause which to my mind, as regards the River Stikine, is practically the same as the clause to which I have just adverted; but that clause in the Treaty of Washington modifies the nature of our servitude. I had not the advantage of being in the House, I regret it very much, when my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney) discussed this question. I have not been able yet to see what his line of reasoning was, but I will do so. But it seems to me that this clause in the Treaty of Washington limits our servitude. I will read it. Clause 26 reads as follows:—

The navigation of the rivers Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine, ascending or descending from to and into the sea, shall for ever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty and the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws, or regulations of either country, within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

Now, as I understand the operation of that clause, it impliedly restricts a servitude. We have no longer the right to navigate upon any of the other rivers but the three mentioned in this clause, and we have given furthermore to the citizens of the United States themselves a servitude which did not exist before. We have established a servitude upon our own territories with regard to these three rivers. Of course, as my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Russell) has said, everything in international law is extremely doubtful, because there is no sanction and no code. But that is the way I understand the clause. We have limited our rights to those three rivers; but, as I have said before, I do not see that our rights are very different upon the Stikine River from what they were before. There is no doubt that had we dealt with Russia or the United States after the cession of Alaska, we would have had to submit to regulations with regard to traversing foreign territory or foreign territorial waters. We have to submit to regulations also under this treaty; and I fail to see why the Minister of the Interior or why the Government did not take the trouble to find out, as they should have and might perfectly well have done, under the comity of nations, from the American authorities exactly what our position would be on that river. There is no reason why that should not have been done. There is a comic writer—a French writer, in our province who says that the principal occupation of Ministers is to conjugate the verbs “to arrive” and “to leave”—meaning that they spend most of their time travelling. These hon. gentlemen conjugated these two verbs repeatedly during recess. They went down to Washington. We were told that they went there to obtain a great many things, which they certainly failed to obtain; but it seems to me, at any rate, that if they had taken the trouble to inquire diplomatically what we might expect with regard to regulations on the Stikine River, the information would have been accepted with much satisfaction, and I think they might have obtained it without any great trouble. Because, although as has been said from the other side of the House, the right of the American authorities is limited to making regulations, it has been the experience in Europe, in cases similar to this, and even in America with regard to the navigation of the Mississippi and some rivers in South America, that the regulations may be made to bear heavily or not to bear heavily, and may be carried out, even when they bear heavily, in such a way as will not be too irksome on those who have to submit to them. I think this might have been made the subject of diplomatic action on the part of these gentlemen, with very great advantage. Of course, when I say that the Treaty of Washington restricted our rights in that direction, I would not like the House to understand that I consider that that treaty was unfavourable to us in any respect. We all know it was a treaty of compromise; we all know that it secured to us some rights of very great importance. It is sufficient to read the treaty to see that. It gave us bonding rights and rights on Lake Michigan which we had not before; and speaking far more generally, the treaty was a solution which England was prepared to accept of the great Alabama claims difficulty. So that it was a compromise all round, and I am not in a position to say whether it was advantageous or otherwise, upon the whole, for us. At any rate, I do not see that it was a sacrifice, in any way, of what our rights were before on the Stikine River. Now, with regard to this branch of the matter, upon which I have, perhaps, taken up too much of the time of the House, what are the conclusions at which I arrive? I arrive at these conclusions. First, that article 6 of the Anglo-Russian Treaty and article 26 of the Washington Treaty do not greatly alter our position on the Stikine River. Second, I find that this so-called all-Canadian route is situated partly in American territory, and is open to all the objections which are incidental to the mere right of way. It is open to the objections which may arise from such regulations as may be made or the surveillance which foreign authorities have to exercise, and from their control generally, and it is open—for we must consider everything in a transaction of this kind—to the danger of complete stoppage in case of war. I consider that, under the circumstances, it would have been better for the Government to have made it an all-Canadian route; and if the route selected is the best route, it would have been better for the Government to prolong the railway from Telegraph Creek to Glenora and down to Observatory Inlet or Port Simpson. I need scarcely say that I am of opinion that for what we are now giving, we could have had that prolongation.

Now, as regards the monopoly, there is no doubt in my mind that the five years clause contains a monopoly. Of course, as the hon. Minister of the Interior pointed out, we cannot interfere with the right of British Columbia to incorporate railways. That province may incorporate a railway tomorrow; but what I understand to be confirmed by the words of the contract in connection with the five years clause, is that we undertake that for five years we will not incorporate a railway running from the Alaskan boundary line into the Yukon country, where we have jurisdiction. I may be mistaken, but that is my interpretation. Nor will we confer any benefit upon any railway running in that direction. That is a monopoly and a very valuable monopoly with regard to that territory. I am prepared to say this, that if, in every respect, the contract was satisfactory, I would be prepared to accede to that monopoly for five years, because I think, if in every other respect the contract was satisfactory and the contractors carried it out, they should not be hampered by competition in that direction. But I will not say the same thing with regard to the ten years clause, by which we are made to say that if we prolong the railway down to Observatory Inlet or Port Simpson these men shall absolutely have the preference. I dissent from that entirely. I do not think we should bind Parliament in that way. We are dealing with these men for the first time, and should first see what they are going to do, and should preserve our liberty. If everything be as satisfactory as it should be and we prolong the road in that direction, we will, as the Minister of the Interior said, probably give them the preference, but if these men do not give us satisfaction, why should we beforehand bind ourselves to them for ten years. I find that that clause by which we bind future Parliaments is not a proper one, and I dissent from it. As regards the exemption from taxation, I am entirely opposed to it. I object to exemptions on principle; moreover, I think that this land grant is quite sufficient, and that we should not add to it by giving them exemption. Taxes such as it is intended by this contract to free these contractors from are taxes which may be, and probably will be, imposed to maintain law and order in that country. I hold that these people should bear their share of any such burden. Under this Bill, they will become possessors of an immense mining estate, an immense mining region, in fact; and they should not be exempt from bearing their share of the burdens which are necessary in order to protect their own wealth.

Now, Sir, I adverted, when I began, to the question of tolls. We were asked here to confer a monopoly on these two gentlemen, and for the railway which they are going to construct we are asked to give a very large area of mining land. And what is the purpose of this railway, as a matter of fact? It is to meet the needs of the hour; it is to afford means of transportation for a number of people, estimated at from 75,000 to 100,000, and a very large quantity of freight, which will be necessary for their use and maintenance. It is to preserve for Canada the trade and commerce which will result from the traffic. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that we should know, before closing with these men, what their rates are to be. This is not the case of an ordinary railway, and I am not prepared to trust the Government on this important point of rates, any more than the Government was prepared to trust me upon the subject-matter of the contract. I am prepared to deal generously with these men, but, at the same time, to give them almost a free hand in the matter of charges, it appears to me, is to defeat the purpose we have in view. They do not have to cater for these people: they know that the people cannot do without them, in order to get into the Yukon with their freight, and they know that those who pass over their railway will probably never pass over it again, and thus they are more likely to abuse any power that may be given them, to overcharge them. Besides the many ne'er-do-wells that are going into that country under the policy of the Government, I hope that some of our Canadians are going up also to get a share of this gold, and if that is so, we want to know what they are to be charged upon this route. I protest strongly, in the name of all those who are going to avail themselves of this route, either to travel or to send freight, against leaving the matter of toll entirely in abeyance. If we have to give these men a large territory, we should know what we are going to get, and we cannot know this unless the tolls are fixed.

As to the route, I stated, a moment ago, that I found it a very great objection that this is not really an all-Canadian route. It goes through the territorial waters of the United States, and, in that respect, it offers to my mind very serious objections. If this Teslin Lake route is really the best, we ought to take measures at once to make it an all-Canadian route by prolonging the railway to Observatory Inlet or to some port in British Columbia. But, I regret to say, the information that has been placed before us does not enable me to make up my mind fully as to which is the best route. I heard a letter read here, this afternoon, by the right hon. leader of the House, which contains information which I do not find in the report. I do not find fault with the reports, because, I suppose, the men who prepared them were pressed for time. But I question whether this is really the best route from the Pacific Ocean and whether the Dalton route is not the best. But the information laid before us is so meagre, and we are called up at such short notice to give a decision, that it is difficult really to speak with any degree of certainty. I take the liberty, however, of calling the attention of the House to an opinion expressed in regard to the merits of this route by a gentleman who has just returned from that distant region, of which we know so little. He gives an interview to the Montreal "Daily Witness." I refer to Mr. Stevens, one of the pioneers of that country, who has acquired claims to the value of two millions. He certainly knows a great deal about the country, and, I may say, he is of opinion it is a country of great wealth, that we can pay our debt with the gold that is there. According to this report in the "Witness":

Mr. Stevens is opposed to the route chosen by the new railway to the Klondike. He says that it will involve in all seven changes, before the end is reached, and he particularly points out that new steamers will have to be built for Lake Teslin, the seas on which are exceedingly rough.

I may say that, for my own part, I was struck at first with the number of changes that this route necessitates. I am prepared to admit, Sir, that perhaps the railway will suffice for the 60,000 or 75,000 people who are going into that country; but I seriously question whether there will be boats to carry them down Teslin Lake, through the Hootalinqua River and on to the Yukon country. I cannot readily imagine that it will be possible to have boats there to convey such a vast number of people down the waterways. I think it would be with the greatest difficulty that they would get enough boats there to transport even 20,000 people, and that those who arrive at Teslin Lake, if they arrive in such vast numbers, will be left in the lurch, and will be obliged to go as best they can. I lay these views before the House, because it seems to me that we have had no information from the Government with regard to the steamer facilities that are to be afforded when these people leave the railway. For my own part, I say frankly, but always with the reserve with which I began, that my knowledge is very limited, thanks to the Government, in regard to this country, I would be inclined to think that the Alberta route, by Edmonton, is the best. I believe that it offers many advantages. In the first place, it is an all-Canadian route; it does away, at one stroke, with all these objections which the other routes present, objections requiring to be carefully weighed in this House. There is gold in the Klondike, I think, in very large quantities. But that is a matter of speculation—as the Minister of Railways says, it is a huge gamble. But there is no doubt that there is gold in the rich soil of the North-west, and the greatest advantage of this Edmonton route, as I understand it, is that it opens up a fertile country for settlement in the early stages of the route from Edmonton to the Peace River. Of course, I speak subject to correction, because I do not know very much about that country. I hope the Government will carry out the proposition, which I heard informally, that we should all be taken up to that country to visit it.

I would be inclined to favour that route, because it is wholly Canadian, because it contains many less changes, and because it opens up a rich agricultural country. I think also it is a more favourable route for the trade of this country. Of course you can readily imagine that if you have to tranship three or four times goods going to the Yukon via this route, the expense will be greater. Also I think transhipments would be less numerous here. By the by, in regard to transhipment, let me state that one of the rights concomitant to the right to navigate, is the right to break bulk and tranship. The hon. Minister of the Interior did not seem to know whether, under the treaty, on arriving at the Stikine River, we would be able to break bulk. Of course I am not laying down the law, but under the principles of international law the right to navigate includes with it the right to anchor, the right to tranship, and to break bulk, subject, of course, to customs regulations. Still, I am under the impression, for the reasons that I have stated, and with the very limited material at my disposal, that the Edmonton route would have been better. As regards the royalty, I must confess to you that I do not see why any difference should be made between this company and the miners. For myself I do not believe in the system of royalty, I do not believe that it is a system that can be executed easily. I think that its proper execution will necessitate an enormous expenditure of money, with very poor returns, and with a great incentive to dishonesty, and I do not believe in it at all. I think another system of taxation more equitable could be adopted. But if we are to have royalties, I say that the royalties of these great railway magnates should be exacted upon the same basis precisely as those of the poor miners. Now, Sir, I come to the land grant, which is a vital matter for us to consider in regard to this Bill. I cannot emphasize too much my regret that none of the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches have been able to tell us what the Government's conclusion is, upon the reports, as to the value. I regret that they are not able to tell us what they value this grant at. These gentlemen made the contract; they did not know when they stipulated in regard to such an important matter, what they were giving to these men, and they do not seem to wish that we, who are, after all, the masters in respect to giving away this large amount of land, should have full and entire information. That is the position, as I understand it. I regret that the Government has not been able, I do not say to locate exactly, but to locate to a certain extent, this grant. I believe that the freedom of choice is very large which is given to the contractors in the selection of this land, and it is undeniable that they will be able to exercise that choice better and sooner than most other people; they can send in engineers in advance, and they can secure the best land. Of course, the hon. Minister of the Interior invited us to go up there and see for ourselves; he said the land was free, and we had only to go up there and we would get our share like the rest. Well, Sir, I am not prepared to leave for that region to-day; I think our duty at present is to remain here, in order to prevent the whole of those lands from being spirited away. Besides, I consider that nothing but fine talk. There is no doubt that these men are there now, if I am rightly informed. I heard the other day they had secured a very competent engineer, and there is not a man in this House or in the country who has any doubt but that they are placed in a more favourable situation to select the lands than we are, or than are the people of this country generally. But the position they occupy is very much better described by an article which appeared in a paper which is generally not unfavourable to hon. gentlemen on the Government benches, and which exposes that situation much better than I can. This article was quoted by the Minister of the Interior, but he failed to read on when we asked him to do so, in regard to the position of the company. I will read from the "Daily Witness," of February 11, a very good paper, published in the city of Montreal. This is what it says:

There would seem, at all events, to be every probability that if there is really any great wealth in the country the syndicate will have no difficulty in reaping the first-fruits of it. It looks as though they would be likely to acquire for themselves or to make a profit on almost all the gold lands discovered up to the amount of their available grant. With the power of laying down a base line as may best suit their own advantage, and with the power of securing an uninterrupted territory twenty-four miles long by three miles in breadth, it looks as though the syndicate could secure the best of the land without sharing on equal terms with the Government. Their interests and privileges are so large as compared with those of individual prospectors and miners, that the latter will find it always to their own interest to form a sort of partnership with the syndicate, or at least to "stand in" with it against the interests of the Government, and even of those of other miners, friends or partners.

The article goes on to point out in what way this syndicate will become a kind of octopus, extending its arms in every direction and swallowing up the best of those mining lands. Now, Sir, it is very difficult, I admit, particularly with the knowledge which we have at our command, to value this grant. I may perhaps awaken the attention of hon. members on the other side, by stating that it has been valued at eighteen billions seven hundred and fifty millions. I do not know if the Minister of the Interior finds that valuation excessive, but I may tell him that I do. At any rate, it is the value which has been put upon this land grant by a Mr. Bellew. It is curious to note upon what grounds he bases that valuation. He is a practical miner, and he gives to a French newspaper in Montreal, the ground of his valuation. The report of an interview with Mr. Bellew is given in the following words:—

As to the data upon which he based his assertion that Canada would lose eighteen billions if the Government confirmed the contract with Mann & Mackenzie for the construction of this railway, Mr. Bellew answered: "I base my assertion upon the declaration of Mr. Ogilvie, who is, as everybody knows, an authority in Canada in everything that concerns mining matters. He has declared positively, and that declaration has been made public, that gold can be found in quantities, more or less large, in all parts of the land which extends from the Yukon to the Mackenzie River. That is the first point upon which I base my assertion. Then, I take into consideration the fact, undisputed, that enormous quantities of gold have been found everywhere where prospectors have worked upon the upper strata of land. Then I arrive at the following deduction: The Government has undertaken to give 3,750,000 acres of land to this syndicate. Divide this land in claims of five acres each, and you have a total of 750,000 claims."

Some claims have already been sold at from $50,000 to $200,000 and one of those claims has reached the value of $1,000,000. Taking the lowest figure, says Mr. Bellew, and dividing it by two, we have a value of $25,000 for each claim; of course it is possible that some of these claims will not be worth that amount. But after this explanation, says the writer, it does not require very much common sense to understand that the value of a claim may be placed at $25,000. In this way M. Bellew arrives at a valuation of $18,000,000,000, which is sufficient to pay the whole debt of the world.

If there is anything of accuracy in that gentleman's calculation, it is a pity the Government have lost the opportunity not only of discharging the whole debt of the world, but of reducing our own indebtedness which has swollen to a considerable degree.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). If that calculation is correct, and this amount would pay off the whole debt of the world, what would the remaining 65,000,000 acres be worth?

Mr. MONK. It would make us all rich, and that is very much wanted. I have given this calculation because I thought it would be of interest to the House. But for the purpose of valuation I would be more moderate, I confess. I find in Mr. Ogilvie's report, which is marked by great moderation, at page 92, something which will help us to form a very reasonable idea of the value of those lands. He says:

Attention may be directed to the fact that the whole of that vast district owes its now world-wide reputation to the richness of 140 claims in the Klondike division. One hundred of these are on

Bonanza Creek, and about forty on Eldorado. To use a mining term, many of those claims are "world-beaters," and if the indications now known are worth anything at all, they are worth from sixty to seventy millions of dollars in these two creeks.

Taking this division as a whole, including the three creeks named, affluent to Indian Creek, a district some thirty-five miles in length and twenty-five or more miles in width, if the indications can be relied on, there are one hundred millions of dollars in sight in that area. No one can guarantee this amount, but the prospects so far developed point to that sum pretty conclusively. This district is exceptionally rich. Nothing has ever been found like it heretofore in that country, in fact, in very few countries has anything been found like it, and while we cannot confidently assert that other finds as valuable as it will be made, it is altogether improbable that gold is scattered over such a vast extent, and only rich at a point which is less than the 140th part of the total area.

Mr. Stevens, who has just returned from the Klondike, maintains that there is there of placer gold ready to be cleaned out in the streams $10,000,000 worth, and I believe there are not 4,000 men now mining in the Klondike. These data give us some idea of the richness of that land. If there are $10,000,000 waiting to be taken out when only 4,000 miners are there, what will be the development when, according to Mr. Ogilvie, there will soon be 20,000 or 30,000 men mining there with improved machinery?

However, to come down to figures. I have taken Mr. Jennings's estimate of the cost of the road. I find, according to his estimates, which appears on page 27 of his report, the cost is placed at $3,657,000. The Minister of the Interior told the House that this road was going to be built under abnormal conditions, and that the estimate submitted was for normal railway building. That is true; but at the same time, if I mistake not, Mr. Jennings's calculations are for a better road than that contracted for, for a first-class road. In the next place, I am informed there is not a great deal of difference between building a railway promptly and otherwise, that it is merely a question of additional men. However that may be, I know not.

But after considering this statement of what the contractors are going to spend, let us see what they are going to receive. They will obtain the ordinary subsidy of $3,200 per mile from British Columbia, making a total of $385,000. The monopoly which it is proposed to confer on them is of great value. The letter we have heard read to-day is proof that the monopoly is of great value, and I place its value at $1,000,000. The value of the railway property may be placed at $4,000,000. As regards the land grant, I am not going to place the value at $25,000 per acre, but I think $5 per acre would be a very low valuation. If that valuation is too high, the Government have only themselves to blame for keeping us in ignorance of its true value, and it is already reported that some claims have been sold for $200,000 each. The quantity of land obtained by the contractors will not be 3,750,000 acres, but taking a mileage as 208 miles, it will be 5,200,000 acres. But taking the acreage at 3,750,000, the value at $5 per acre would be $18,750,000. These items in all make up $24,135,000, which, if you subtract the cost of the road, $3,956,000, leaves a balance of profit of $20,178,000.

Mr. Jennings's calculations in regard to the profit from the operation of the road are most moderate. He calculates a profit of $209,000 a year; but that is on the supposition that only 12,000 passengers would be carried and the tolls will be very reasonable. We are informed that the company will have a much larger number of passengers than that estimated by Mr. Jennings, but the contract does not state the rates to be charged. From all these facts I conclude that there is no special ground for sympathizing with these two gentlemen. I believe if we pass this Bill we shall make them very wealthy men, wealthy far beyond the dreams of avarice, and we shall be conferring on them very great favours—in fact it is proposed to give them a great deal too much.

In conclusion, let me point out that the policy of the Government, which is bound up with the consideration of this railway scheme, is a mistaken one in regard to this great country. We are living in a country of great possibilities, but this Dominion is inhabited by people who are not rich; we are a poor people and we have been called upon to make untold sacrifices for the development of Canada. Long before confederation, the people settled in this country, whether French or English, performed great sacrifices, did wonders for the establishment of this country and for its development. And, Sir, since confederation, since that remarkable event which made our people one nation—and, Sir, we are fortunate to have here to-night one of the chief men who carried out that great scheme—since confederation we were called upon to make still greater sacrifices. We made them willingly, we entered into enterprises for the development of the country; and in the prosecution of these enterprises the people of this country without any distinction, have spent an enormous amount of money and swollen the national debt to a limit which alarms many thoughtful men. Under these circumstances, what is the course which the Government has adopted in respect to that great country recently discovered, and which seems to me to have been laid open to us by Providence in order to recoup us for these immense sacrifices which we have made in the past? The Government has seen fit to throw open that great region, which is properly our own inheritance, to all the nations of the world. The Government might, it seems to me, with great advantage, have taken a leaf out of the book of our neighbours and kept that country for the Canadian people. But instead of that they are inviting all the people of the globe to come there, and to take away that gold which in my opinion should have been reserved for ourselves. Sir, this view is not mine alone, for I find that the English papers have called attention to the fact that there will be a rush of people to the Yukon who will come merely to take the gold away. I quote from the London "Sketch" of February 2nd, 1898:

The news which reaches us that the Canadian Government has entered into a contract with a leading firm of engineers for the construction of a railway over the most difficult country between the seaboard and the Klondike Eldorado shows enterprise, and will probably hasten the stampede towards the Arctic Eden. The work is, I understand, to be put in hand at once, and to be opened for traffic in September this year. All things considered, there appears a very good prospect of the new gold fields becoming, for a time at least, a veritable sink of humanity, the favoured resort of all the loafers, adventurers, and ne'er-do-wells whose dream is to attain wealth without proportionate toll. The same thing has been seen more than once. It occurred in California, in New South Wales, in South Africa, and in Queensland.

I desire, Sir, for a moment to advert particularly to this feature of the matter. Of course, if members on both sides of the House are agreed that it is essential for us to open that great country at once, I for one would feel, in the presence of an accord which is so rare, great diffidence in offering my opinion, but, were it not for that circumstance I would be inclined to consider that the Government have recklessly sacrificed that great region in opening it up to all the world. A section of the press in my own province has pointed out that defect in the policy of the Government, and has asked why, in view of the circumstance which I have just indicated, and of the great need we have ourselves for the wealth of that Providence seat country, the Government have not reserved it for ourselves and for our children. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) reminds us at every session that he has sons.

Mr. DAVIN. He need not remind us of that; we know it to our cost.

Mr. MONK. Well, he is not the only man who is favoured with these burdens, if I may use the expression. The province from which I come is a province where there are men who have many sons, and why have not the Government seen fit to inclose that region and keep it for these young men who would seek fortune there. The only possible reason given for such a policy would be, that it would retard the development of the Yukon, and that it would perhaps mar the feverish trade which may be developed—although I think the volume of that trade has been exaggerated—during the coming year or two. Sir, the trade might have come more slowly, the country might have developed more slowly, but we would not have had the spectacle of thousands of foreigners taking the gold out of that country and carrying it to a foreign land. It would have been kept for our own people, it would have been spent in Canada. It is useless for the Government to tell me that that country is at present open to our people. The people who are going there at the present moment are people of money. The young men of this country who have not capital are not going there, although no doubt they could go later on. I am not going to be told that it would not be possible for the Government to elaborate some system of legislation by which that great boon would have been kept for our own people. Upon that ground as well as for the other reasons which I have given, I am not in favour of the second reading of this Bill.

Before I close, Mr. Speaker, I desire to refer to a point on which the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) expressed opinion yesterday. He told us that the time would come when we would be ashamed of the opposition we are offering to this measure as we are ashamed to-day of the position we took upon the Remedial Bill. It is, I believe, a pity that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) imported that question into this discussion. I have been silent in regard to the subject-matter of that Remedial Bill, but I am not ashamed of the position I took in regard to it, no more than I am ashamed of the position I have taken to-day in regard to this measure. What the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) has taken for shame, is for me and for many of those who sit on this side of the House, a sentiment of propriety and nothing else. We believe now—at any rate I do—that the cause we advocated and the manner in which we advocated it was a just cause, and we believe that we defended it in a just manner. The settlement of the difficulty connected with the grievance of the minority in Manitoba has devolved upon hon. gentlemen opposite. We have not the responsibility of it now. The responsibility belongs to the right hon. gentleman who leads this House, and who, during the last election, came into my own county and stated that the Remedial Bill did not go far enough, and that he would do full and ample justice to the minority. To-day, to redeem his promise—

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose, the hon. gentleman is only introducing that subject by way of illustration, because it is not particularly germane to the subject under discussion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) brought it up.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not hear the hon. member for Guysborough bring it up, or I would have taken the same ground. I could not have been in the Chair at the time. So that the hon. gentleman will not proceed to any great length in that line.

Mr. MONK. I was only speaking by way of illustration. I assure you, that I am not going to drag this question into the domain of politics. I wish to tell the hon. gentleman, that neither the leader of our party nor any one of us is ashamed of our position on that question; and, when the history of this country comes to be written, I believe that the position taken by the leader of our party in regard to that question will be found to be the true and proper position. In the meantime, I am a believer in the justice of that case, and, as justice is eternal, I prefer to leave it to the treatment of hon. gentlemen opposite. I am not ashamed of the position I took upon that question, nor am I ashamed of the position I take on this question. The hon. Minister of the Interior told us that the country would call us to a bitter account for the position we have taken in regard to the opening up of this so-called all-Canadian route. I venture to tell these hon. gentlemen that, in my opinion, the policy they have adopted in regard to that great northern country is a policy of which the people of this country will disapprove. They have carried it out in a way that is at variance with parliamentary principles. They are going to be obliged to spend, if what I hear is true, an enormous sum of money to maintain law and order in that country. We are going to be called upon to make immense sacrifices to protect the vast horde of strangers who are going there, and, when all is finished and the account comes to be rendered, I believe it will be the hon. gentlemen opposite whom the country will call to a severe account for the careless way in which they have proceeded to the development of that great country, which is our own inheritance.

Mr. SEMPLE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. SCRIVEN. With the permission of the House, I desire to make the following motion:—

That the time for receiving petitions for private Bills, which expires on Thursday, the 24th instant, be extended until Thursday, the 10th March next.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year ended June 30, 1897.—(The Minister of Trade and Commerce, Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Mr. MONK.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 5.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 1st March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY— REPLY TO ADDRESS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I have received with much satisfaction the Address adopted by you in reply to my Speech at the opening of the Session of Parliament, and I rely with confidence upon your assurance that the measures submitted to you will receive your earnest consideration.

Government House,

Ottawa, 23rd February, 1898.

CERTIFICATES TO MASTERS AND MATES OF SHIPS.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 37) further to amend the Act respecting Certificates to Masters and Mates of Ships. He said: There is no very radical change contemplated. The Bill proposes merely to extend to masters and mates the same principle which we extended last year to engineers, allowing temporary certificates to be issued.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GOVERNMENT HARBOURS, PIERS AND BREAKWATERS.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 38) to amend the Act respecting Government Harbours, Piers and Breakwaters. He said: The object of the Bill is to meet a suggestion made by the Auditor General. Hon. gentlemen know that the wharfingers are paid a commission of 25 per cent out of the wharfage fees they collect; and it has been brought to my attention by the Auditor General that we are not allowed by law to let them deduct the commission from the receipts. As the law now stands the whole of the receipts should be paid into the consolidated revenue fund, and then an appropriation made in the ordinary way to cover the commission. That has been contrary to the practice heretofore existing, and the Bill is to provide that the collections made by the wharfingers may be paid into the consolidated revenue fund after they have deducted the 25 per cent commission to which they are entitled.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I suppose the Bill relates to Government piers only?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INSPECTION OF STEAMBOATS AND LICENSING OF ENGINEERS.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 39) respecting the inspection of steamboats and the examining and licensing of engineers employed on them. He said: The Bill is really a consolidation of all the existing statutes on the subject. The main Act has been amended from time to time until it is difficult, if not almost impossible, to discover what the law is. This Bill will simplify it by codifying it. Amendments are proposed to different sections suggested by the departmental officers. There is no radical change of any importance. The changes will be more conveniently taken up when the House goes into committee, as they are chiefly departmental and technical.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE LATE MR. PERRY.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It is my sad duty, Mr. Speaker, to have to announce to the House that, during the short recess which has just taken place, we have lost one of our colleagues—an old and experienced member, much respected by both sides—in the person of Mr. Perry, the member for West Prince. P. E. I. After a somewhat protracted illness, he quietly and peacefully departed this life last week. With his life was closed a very useful and honourable career. He had been connected with the public service from the early days of his manhood. Previous to the admission of Prince Edward Island into confederation, he occupied several positions of importance in the legislature and government of that province. He had been at one time the Speaker of its local legislature. At another time, he held the portfolio of Minister of Crown Lands of Prince Edward Island, and discharged the duties of the several offices he held with great credit to himself and advantage to the community. Since confederation, his services were chiefly confined to this House, and, though acknowledged by everybody as a strong partisan, everybody will agree that he was always a fair opponent. Though a hard hitter in debate, he was never offensive. I do not believe that he ever gave cause for offence to any of those with whom he crossed swords, and I believe I express the sentiments of his opponents, as well as his friends, when I say that all those who were associated with him, either as rivals or partisans, in the heat of contest on many and many an occasion, share in the sympathy felt for his family by his friends at large.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I cannot add anything to what has been said, and so well said, by the right hon. leader of the Government. My right hon. friend's acquaintance, of course, with our late lamented friend and colleague was much more intimate than my own; but I can certainly bear witness to the uniform assiduity and devotion of Mr. Perry to the duties with which he was charged in this House, and to the efficient and kindly manner in which he discharged them. There certainly never was any occasion on which those who differed strongly with him had reason to complain of the manner in which he advocated the views he so sincerely held. I am quite certain that every hon. member on this side will join most cordially with the right hon. gentleman and his friends behind him in deploring the loss this House has sustained by the death of our lamented friend.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I have been so many years intimately associated in friendship and politics with our late lamented friend, Mr. Perry, that I would ask permission of the House to add a few words to those said so kindly and well by my hon. friend the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition. Mr. Perry was a very close political and warm personal friend of mine, and as far back as I can recollect, he was one of the most active workers of the Liberal party in the province from which I come. He entered public life in 1854, when he was elected a member of the provincial legislature for the district in which he lived, and from 1854 until confederation he remained almost uninterruptedly a member of that legislature. As my hon. friend the leader of the Government has said, he filled at times several important and responsible positions. When we entered confederation, he was Speaker of the local legislature of Prince Edward Island, and there discharged his duties so fearlessly and well as to thoroughly gain the confidence of both parties. From that smaller sphere he passed to the larger arena of Dominion politics, and I am rejoiced to know that both sides of the House can bear testimony to the kindness, as well as ability, with which he discharged his duties as representative here, where, as in the local House, he was ever a loyal supporter of the party to which he belonged, and never shrank from any opportunity of enforcing his political convictions. He was a man of the people—one of those men who grow up among the people and are believed in by them because of their deserving qualities. He embodied in himself those qualities which are peculiar to the French Acadian race in the maritime provinces—simple as a child, true as steel, loyal and honest to those with whom he was associated; and I am sure he would desire no monument but that which the good will and affection of his fellow-citizens will build for him. I remember, some years ago, after a rather trying political ordeal through which he had passed, and when he was surrounded by a great many of his friends, he said that he felt he was drawing to the end of his life, and he wound up by saying that he wished no better epitaph to be placed on his tombstone than the one he hoped would rise to the lips of those who bore him to his last resting place, that there lay the remains of a truly loyal man. Although he was at all times a strong supporter of the Liberal party, and never swerved from his political allegiance from the time he entered political life until borne to his final rest, I think I can truly say that in all the bitter fights which took place in the smaller arena of politics in Prince Edward Island, as well as in this Parliament, he always so conducted himself as to leave behind him not one personal enemy, as he was carried to his last resting place amid the tears of his constituents whom he so long and ably represented; and I desire to take this opportunity of saying these few words of praise of the man I respected so much and loved so well.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY— MR. HAMILTON SMITH'S PROPOSAL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the right hon. leader of the House if he would be good enough to lay on the Table a copy of the telegram which was sent to Lord Strathcona in reference to Mr. Hamilton Smith. The answer of Lord Strathcona having been given to the public, I think it is very desirable that we should have the message that was transmitted to him.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have no objection, and shall lay it on the Table to-morrow.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COM- PANY.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Blair for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty the Queen and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company.

Mr. BOSTOCK. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to address the House a few minutes on the question now before the Chair, as it is one of great importance to that part of the Dominion of which I have the honour to be one of the representatives. I think I only express the general opinion of this House and country, when I say that there is absolute necessity at present for the building of a railway into the Yukon region. The enormous rush of people going in there, the enormous quantity of supplies that will be required by these people, when they get there, to sustain existence, and the absolute necessity for the Government to be in a position to maintain law and order in that country, so far removed from the central authority—all these point to the immediate building of a railway into it as a line of policy from which we cannot escape. We are all aware, through the newspapers, of the trouble experienced owing to the necessity of going over this strip of land which at present is in the hands of our neighbours to the south of us, who, in their anxiety to look after their own interests, have put certain difficulties in the way of our supplies and people getting over that section. And therefore it is with a feeling of great satisfaction that I see this proposition presented by the Government for the opening up of a serviceable route, which, I think, will not only benefit the Dominion at large by opening up a way into that part of the country, but will ultimately have the result of opening up and developing a great part of British Columbia itself. Hon. members who look at the map will see that the route which has been chosen by the Government, starting in at Telegraph Creek and going up to Teslin Lake, will eventually become a link in the line of railway that must some day be built starting from Ashcroft or Kamloops or some other point along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which will tend to open up a very rich mineral country lying north of the present main line of the Canadian Pacific and south of the Yukon territory. We have complete proof of the richness of the mineral deposits in this country in the reports of the Geological Department, which reports show that large quantities of gold have been taken out of the various parts of this territory. Years ago when the excitement first occurred in Cariboo and along the Fraser River it caused an enormous rush of people to British Columbia. But, owing to the exceedingly great difficulties that the newcomers found in getting into that country, though a great many came up from the south and went in there at the start, a large proportion of them came back and went away, saying that practically the country was no good. Now I do not think that any hon. gentleman in this House would be satisfied, or that the people of the country at large would be satisfied, if those who go into this Yukon country are not afforded greater facilities than those that prospectors of the Cariboo country had to put up with. The difficulties experienced in the Cariboo certainly tended to keep back the development of that portion of the country; and it was only by the enormous pluck and energy that the people manifested that the Cariboo country was opened up at all. We find, from the geological reports that the gold diggings on three creeks in the Cariboo which yielded the greatest amount of gold far and away surpassed anything that reliable information shows to have been found in the Yukon country. The returns which were obtained from Lightning Creek, Antler Creek and Williams Creek, in the first great rush in 1862 and 1863, were very much greater than anything we have heard of from Hunker Creek, Eldorado Creek, or any of the other creeks in the Yukon country reports of which reached us last year. In looking through the reports of that time, I find that on one claim on Lightning Creek, a man in one day took out as much as $15,000 in gold. It is true that that was not repeated, but there were cases in which as much as $8,000 and $10,000 were afterwards taken out of the same claim. Looking through Mr. Ogilvie's report on the Yukon, I have not been able to find that anything like these amounts have been yielded by any of the creeks there that have been worked up to the present time. Therefore, we have not up to this time the same inducements to offer people that there were in the Cariboo country.

So far as the opening up of this country is concerned, we know, that the region north of the Canadian Pacific has yielded a considerable amount of gold, even if we leave the Cariboo out of account altogether. For instance, the Cassiar, between 1874 and 1888 yielded a total of $4,299,394 worth of gold. The Omenica country between 1874 and 1887 yielded $296,570 worth of gold. We find from the reports of Professor Selwyn that this country is also rich in quartz leads, which, so far, it has not been possible to develop on account of difficulties of transportation. As I say, the railway which it is now proposed to build will form a connecting link between the Canadian Pacific on the south and the Yukon country on the north, and will have the effect of introducing the country or private capitalists to build a line from Ashcroft or Kamloops. As soon as this country has transportation facilities, I am sure rich mineral deposits of various kinds will be opened up. I believe it will be shown to be as rich, not only in gold but in silver and lead, as is the Kootenay country to the south. The returns that have been received indicate that the Cariboo country will prove of very great value to the province of British Columbia. Now, at the present time, we have, running from Ashcroft to Quesnelle, a good wagon road which is used all the time and which is in good condition for the purposes of trade. From Quesnel to Hazelton is a good trail which can be used for pack animals. From Hazelton to Telegraph Creek there is a trail which is not in as good condition as the other, but which, I suppose, the provincial government will be looking after in order that people who go in from Ashcroft and that part of the country may be able to use it to reach Telegraph Creek, and so to the Yukon country. I am informed that quite a large number of people propose to go by this overland route to the Yukon, because they feel that there is more chance of a prospector being able to find gold on the way up; and besides, he will be able, if he so desires it, to turn off at any point. He can get his outfit set down at Ashcroft or one of these places, and, by going overland, he has a chance of striking something good at any time on his way up into the Yukon country.

When he gets up to the Teslin Lake he will be able to get rid of his outfit there, and take boat and go on down the river. This is, to a large number of people, especially prospectors who are accustomed to this kind of life, the best and most convenient way of travelling. It will be a great help to them if, when they get to a point such as Telegraph Creek they can take a railway and go on to Teslin Lake. With regard to the point that has been raised as to the navigation of the Stikine River, I do not propose at the present time to go very deeply into that matter, because it has been thoroughly discussed by lawyers who have considered the matter, and in a better way than I feel myself able to discuss it. But I will say this about it, that of course it is quite possible that our neighbours to the south may, if they see fit, put obstructions in the way of our getting into the Stikine River. But I do not think they will find it in their interest to behave in an unfriendly way, especially as it will have the ultimate result of compelling our Government to continue the line down to a more southerly point in British Columbia which will bring the railway into close connection with steamboat navigation. Consequently, I think that the better sense of our neighbours to the south will eventually prevail, and that they will see that although they have it in their power at the present time to put certain obstacles in the way of our navigating that river and making it inconvenient for steamboats to go up there, still they can do that for only a short time; and the fact that we can continue this railway down to a point where we can have communication by sea in our own territory will prevent them doing what they might be disposed to do if the Government had decided on building a line from somewhere on the Lynn Canal, where it would be very difficult for us to have any communication with navigation in our own territory, or with any other line of railway at present. Now, a point that has been raised in opposition to this contract is the allegation that it is going to give this company a monopoly over freight and passengers taken into that country. But I think those who have discussed this matter, and possibly the public generally, have forgotten that at the last session of this Parliament two charters were granted, which are now in force, and under both of which it is possible for a company to go ahead and build a line into that country. One of the papers supporting hon. gentlemen opposite came out the other day pointing out under large headlines that this monopoly was going to be broken after all, and stating that a company in England was prepared to go in and build a railway over the White Pass. Now, I am sure there was no idea on the part of the Government of giving this railway a monopoly such as would be detrimental to the public interests. The fact that at the time the Government made this arrangement they knew these two charters were in force under which railways could be built, is evidence that they had no idea of granting any monopoly to this company. A question has also been raised with regard to the method of the construction of this road. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) thinks this railway ought to have been built by the Government itself; but although personally I am in favour of the Government ownership of railways, and while I think the time will soon come when this matter will have to be considered very seriously by the country, still at the present moment I do not think that we are in Canada in a position to take hold of that question. I would very much deprecate any hasty action on the part of this or any other Government in legislating towards the Government construction and ownership of railways. In the present case we are brought face to face with the necessity of constructing this road as early as possible, if it is going to be done at all. An important consideration in connection with this Bill is that the work has to be done in a hurry. It is not an ordinary question of railway construction where it can be proceeded with leisurely, and finished within a not unreasonable time, but the road has to be built in a hurry for the purpose of meeting conditions which will exist there during the coming winter. The question has also been raised of building this road by means of a Government subsidy of money. In the present case the Government would have to expend a large amount of money for building a railway into a country which we do not know at the present moment for a certainty is going to prove exceedingly rich. We have every reason to believe that there is a large amount of gold in that country; the geological reports state that gold has been found there. But every one who has studied mining development, and who has had anything to do with mining, knows that it is a very uncertain industry, and that although at the present time excitement runs high and a large number of people are going in there, we do not know for a certainty that any other very rich diggings will be found in that country. In the case of the Cariboo country to which I have already referred, although rich mines were found in Lightning Creek, Antler Creek and Williams Creek in 1860 and 1862, since that time, although a large number of prospectors have been exploring that country, no very rich diggings have been found, and what gold has been found there has apparently been in small quantities compared with what was found in the years mentioned in those three creeks. The same condition, if our information is correct, prevails in the case of the country north of us. So far as we know, there has been only one exceedingly rich gold-bearing creek found in the whole territory. Until that condition is disproved, we are in the position of investing money in a railway when we do not know how long the mining, which is the cause of building the road, is going to continue. In a country where the difficulties are so great as on the Yukon, where the temperature is unpleasant to the ordinary individual, and where for a portion of the year, six months at all events, there is a very small amount of daylight, which has a depressing and very bad effect on men going there from warmer and more pleasant climates, many people, so soon as they realize the conditions under which they will have to live, will return. Gentlemen who were in Victoria and Vancouver last season remember the rush then setting in towards the Yukon, people starting out with the idea that they would become rich in a few days, without taking into consideration the difficulties and obstacles which they must overcome before they could even reach there. The same rush that occurred then, prevails at the present time. A large number of people are starting for that country--men who have been brought up under very different circumstances, and who have not been accustomed to roughing it and enduring hardships and overcoming difficulties such as those with which they will have to contend. Many of these men will return broken down not only in their finances but also as regards their health; and it is a very serious matter that a large number of people should be going out there, many of whom will be probably stranded in that country in the way I have been endeavouring to show. For that reason alone, it is necessary that all possible means should be taken to gain entrance into that country, in order that those people may be reached, if necessary, and that we may prevent, as much as possible, hardships and difficulties to which those people will be exposed.

Questions have arisen with respect to the land grant proposed to be made under the contract to Mackenzie & Mann. Although I am very much opposed on general principle to the granting of large quantities of land to any railway company or to any company which will tie up the land in any shape or form and prevent the ordinary prospector and free miner from going in, in this case it is absolutely necessary that this land subsidy should be granted to the contractors who are risking a large amount of capital for the purpose of building a railway into that country, which in a short time may prove not to be so valuable as at the present moment we are led to suppose. The construction of this line will undoubtedly be conducted under very exceptional circumstances. The contractors will have to meet with difficulties probably in excess of those ever contended with by railway contractors in this country, and they certainly are deserving of receiving an adequate return for the energy and capital they are prepared to risk in a venture of this kind. Hence the Government should be prepared to make full remuneration to the contractors, who are at the present time willing and able to risk their capital in an enterprise in which Canada is not prepared to invest; and I think under the exceptional circumstances of this case, the contractors are entitled to receive a bonus such as they will receive if they carry out the provisions of the contract as they stand. Of course I take it for granted that the conditions laid down in the contract by the Government will be strictly adhered to, and that the land grant provided for in the contract will only be handed over if the contractors carry out strictly the terms of the undertaking. The first section of the contract is as follows:—

1. The contractors covenant with the Government to lay out, construct, equip and fully complete a line of railway with proper terminal facilities from the navigable waters of the Stikine River in British Columbia, at or near the mouth of Telegraph Creek, Glenora, or the mouth of Clear Water River, thence running northward to the navigable waters of Teslin Lake, a distance of about one hundred and fifty miles, more or less, on or before the first day of September, A.D. 1898.

The main object of the Bill and the contract entered into by the Government is to secure the complete construction of this road by 1st September; and if that is carried out, the contractors are deserving of the grant which they will receive. At the same time the Government should be very particular about enforcing the provision connected with the grant of this land, and if by any chance the contract is not carried out and the road completed by 1st September, most certainly this land grant should not be given; because it would be tying up a large amount of land in the hands of these people. But if they do carry out the terms of the contract, then I think they are deserving of the recompense which they are to get under the contract as it stands at present. Now, the great necessity of having communication with and administering the government of that part of the Dominion is the principal reason why we want to see this railway built at once. On an occasion of this kind, I think one should be prepared to stand by and support the Government in carrying out a measure for this purpose under conditions such as do not arise every day, but are most exceptional in every way. I do not suppose any one can point to an instance of such a rush of people to any country as will probably take place to this Yukon country during the coming summer. Letters which we receive from England and from the United States indicate that people are going there in greater numbers than was anticipated even by those who have had the best means of obtaining information on the subject; and I think the Government would have been very remiss in their duty to the best interests of Canada if they had failed to take up this question of providing a means of communication with the Yukon country. It has been suggested that the building of an ordinary wagon road would have been sufficient. I do not consider that that would have been sufficient for the development of the country or for the enormous traffic which will require accommodation, and the Government would have certainly been very remiss if they had sat still and done nothing to open up and develop the country where so much is at stake, and where it is so essential to control the trade between Canada and that part of the North-west Territories. The cities on the Pacific Coast are at the present time benefiting very largely from this Yukon trade, and they are of course anxious to obtain and keep control of as much of that trade as they can. If the Government had been neglectful of the demands of the occasion, a large amount of trade would have been lost, not only on the Pacific Coast, but also to the eastern portions of this Dominion, because the merchants in the west naturally draw their supplies from the merchants in the east. Therefore the trade of the Dominion would have been very materially injured if we had allowed the trade of that country to pass out of our hands and go to the Pacific Coast cities on the other side of the line. We have been doing all we could in the west to control this trade and to induce people to come our way; and if the Government had failed to take hold of this matter and deal with this railway question, the country would have had a very serious charge to make against them of neglecting the interests of the people and the commercial interests of Canada.

In these few words I have tried to place before the House what I consider to be the position of this question at the present time. I do not desire to detain the House any longer, as this discussion has now gone on for some time and we have threshed the matter out probably as fully as possible. But I think the results will show that the Government, in the action they have taken, have done the best they could at the present time in the best interests of the country.

Mr. IVES. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to go over the points which have been several times most ably and clearly put from this side of the House. Nor do I propose to consider and discuss the many objections that have been raised against this Yukon Railway scheme. There is, however, one objection against this proposition which has not perhaps been very fully dealt with from this side of the House, to which I have given a good deal of study, and which to my mind is even more serious than any other single point which has been raised as an objection to it. Now, what do we find? We find that the Government propose to give the contractors 25,000 acres per mile of gold-bearing lands, to be selected by the company as they see fit, on certain conditions. In other words, in a mileage of 150 miles they will have somewhere in the neighbourhood of 4,000,000 acres. We will suppose the minimum mileage to be 150 miles. There would then be 3,750,000 acres or 87 blocks of 21 square miles each to be selected. Now, that country is either a gold-bearing country or it is not. If it is not, then I do not think that we need any railway into it at all. I do not agree with the last speaker (Mr. Bostock), who urges as one of the reasons why this railway should be built, and built quickly, that there will be a great many people going in there who may become dead broke and that the Government ought to build a railway to bring them out as cheaply and expeditiously as possible. I do not think that that is any reason why we should build a railway. But I think that the Government, by pushing through this extraordinary scheme, as they are doing, are advertising this region to the whole world as a very rich gold-bearing country. The Government then must not be surprised if thousands of individuals decide to sink their fortune out there simply because of the great advertisement which the Government, by this action, have given this country; and if, as the hon. gentleman thinks, a large proportion of these people will become broke and have to be brought back by the Government for charity, the Government themselves will be largely responsible. That is, however, apart from my argument. What I ask is that if this be not a rich gold country, why should we build a railway to it. Why should we induce thousands of people to leave their business occupations and break up their homes and go out there, as the hon. gentleman says, with great danger to their health? But if it is a gold-bearing country—and I may say the evidence points very strongly in that direction—it is impossible to conceive that in making 87 locations, in laying down 87 base lines, either in the general direction of the streams or due north or south or east or west, these contractors will not succeed in locating some of the richest mines to be found. I do not say how much gold they will find, but I say it is against all probability to suppose that in making these 87 locations, with the facilities they have for choosing their time and place to lay down these base lines, and with all the conditions in their favour, that these men will not get the lion's share of what gold there is in the country.

I put to the Government this question. In proposing to give these contractors some of the richest placer mines in the Yukon country and in leasing the dredging privilege on these rivers to their friends for the nominal consideration of $100 per mile, what do the Government consider is likely to be the outcome of such a policy? The position I take is this. I say that if you carry out this contract and give Mann & Mackenzie these special advantages and privileges, you will array the miners to a man against these monopolists. The distinctions and differences between the way in which the Government propose to treat these contractors and the way in which they treat the ordinary miners, will have the effect of putting the contractors on the one side and every free miner in that country upon the other. Every free miner will consider that he is not in any way bound to protect the interests of these contractors as he feels bound to protect the interests of his brother free miners. It is the experience of all placer mining countries that vigilance committees, if necessary, are organized by the miners themselves to prevent claim jumping and claim robbing and to enforce justice—of a rough and ready kind, if you will—but still justice between miner and miner; and no matter how rich the claim, the man who makes the discovery and locates the mine is protected in his rights by the great body of free miners. That is the history of California and of all other placer mining countries. But every feeling of the free miners will be one of hostility to these monopolists—whether the monopolists be Mann & Mackenzie or Mr. Mercier who, I believe, had a grant of the dredging privilege for a large number of miles on the Yukon. Every man's hand will be against them. Now, supposing Mann & Mackenzie succeeds in locating a rich claim among the 87 locations which they may make, on the shortest railway mileage, and supposing some free miners poach on this particular location, what is going to happen? What is sure to happen? There will be a rush of miners to the location; that section will be covered with men who will mine there in spite of all the Government can possibly do to prevent it. Will you tell me, Sir, how 150 or 1,500 mounted police are going to protect the property of Mann & Mackenzie from the poaching of free miners—men who will not have the slightest consideration for these monopolists but consider that they are free plunder for everybody. Why, when it has taken you months to get Major Walsh himself into that country—

Mr. MACLEAN. He is not there yet.

Mr. IVES. And he is not there yet, when the Government forces are scattered a few here and a few there and a few somewhere else—and when these miners are in there by the thousand, every man with a revolver in his belt and a Winchester rifle in his shanty, how are you going to enforce law and order and protect the claims of Mann & Mackenzie? You cannot do it. The whole force of Canada could not in six months restore law and order in that territory. You could not get sufficient transportation facilities to send out the number of men required to enforce law and order there, under the circumstances. And suppose these rich claims are mined under mob law, and in defiance of law, and Mackenzie & Mann are defrauded, what will happen? They will come to this Government and say: You gave us that territory where we made our locations, you gave it to us for the consideration of building a railway, which we have built, and you are bound to protect us, as well as every other individual, in the enjoyment of our rights and privileges. By your failure to do that, we have lost a million or two or three million dollars, which we can show were illegally taken out of our property, and we ask you to reimburse us to that amount. Could the Government resist payment? Can you put any clause into this contract which will excuse you from protecting the rights and property of individuals in that country? You cannot do it. Such a clause would be immoral and inoperative. Supposing you were to insert a clause into this contract to relieve you of such a responsibility, it would be illegal as contrary to public order.

I make this distinction between giving subsidies of gold lands and subsidies of agricultural and timber lands, that whereas in the case of agricultural and timber lands there is not such value as to excite covetousness, and so they are not likely to be poached upon. I say that it is different with gold mining lands. And these contractors, being looked upon as monopolists, regarded as having no rights that free miners are bound to respect, the rich portions of their lands will be mined out in spite of all you can do, and you will have to pay year after year to meet claims made by these contractors for gold taken out of their lands by the free miner. What will the free miners say? They will say: Look at the distinctions that the Government makes between these contractors and us. They charge us $10 a year for a free miner's license, while they charge these people nothing. They charge us $15 when we register a claim, and not only that, but we must pay the same amount for a license every year; while these other people pay nothing; they get their land in fee simple. The Government charge us 10 per cent royalty, while they charge these people only 1 per cent royalty. We forfeit our claim if we do not pay the royalty, while these people may hold their claim for years without paying it, and the royalty may be collected from them as an ordinary debt or not at all. Why, if we do not absolutely work our claims, if we allow seventy-two hours to elapse without putting a shovel or pick into the ground, our claims are liable to forfeiture, while these men may tie up their lands for ever, and though they never work them they do not forfeit them. They may choose the best season of the year, the seasons when they can mine most cheaply, while we have to work even with the thermometer 65 or 70 degrees below zero, and, even though sick and really unable to work, if we allow seventy-two hours to elapse without working, our claims may be forfeited. Then, if we organize a company, we must pay $100 a year as a license, and every individual who works for us must be a free miner and pay $10 a year. These people may have their claims worked by Tom, Dick or Harry, people who are not free miners, and pay no fees. Do you suppose the people are not going to note these distinctions, and, yes, I will add, these partialities? Do you suppose they are going to respect the rights and privileges thus granted? By no means. They will take the richest claims they can find, and mine them out; and the Government of this country will pay for it in years to come. Now, I do not propose to waste the time of the House in the reiteration of this proposition, but, on the strength of my experience in this House and in business in this country, I venture to predict that if you go on with this policy, if you continue to lease these rivers for a mere bagatelle, some of which will be sure to contain rich bars, the free miners will mine out those bars in spite of all that Mr. Mercier or Mr. Drolet or anybody else can do, and you will be called upon to make good these losses. The mere bagatelle of $100 a mile which you are getting will be lost in the thousands which this country will have to pay as compensation to these people for failure to protect them and maintain their rights as proprietors.

There is only one more point in this matter which I desire to refer to, and that is the question of the route. Now, to my mind, the bonding privilege that we should enjoy in passing through that strip of Alaska over the Dalton trail or White Pass is a more reliable and more certain privilege for us to rely upon than the privilege of the navigation of the Stikine River under the Treaty of Washington. I do not mean to say that the treaty which gives us the bonding privilege is any more likely to stand and not be revoked than the other treaties, but I do mean to say—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). There is no such treaty.

Mr. IVES. There is no bonding treaty affecting the Pacific Coast—I am quite aware of that. But I understood that the Minister of the Interior was negotiating that arrangement as well as the other, and that he is as likely to get that as the other.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That has not been a question of treaty.

Mr. IVES. But I think it is quite as easy for the Government to secure from the Americans an extension of the bonding privilege to those parts as it is to make terms under their coasting laws which would not be a serious inconvenience in the navigation of the Stikine River. There is no use in closing our eyes to the fact that, at the present moment, all the cities of the western coast of the United States, as well as all the railways of the west, are taking the most lively interest in this outfitting business and are urging the Government of the United States unitedly and without distinction as to party to do something which will in a still larger degree give the outfitting business to the coast cities of the United States. Now, I do not think there is any use of our spending a single dollar expecting to obtain privileges at the present moment from the United States that would enable us to tranship at Wrangel—any concession that would not be particularly onerous. The authorities there are being urged and begged and called upon to kill this route. Before you have got your first sod turned, they are after it with a hatchet to kill it, and they are bound to kill. And, so far as this route succeeds, in so far as it diminishes the outfitting trade of these American coast cities, and gives the business to Canadian cities, so much the stronger will be the pressure. The Government will find that success means failure in this case, that any considerable measure of success means certain obstruction and failure. The Hon. Minister of Agriculture the other night proposed transportation by tug-boat and barges. Well, unfortunately, that is nonsensical and out of the question. If it were not so, if you could load vessels at some Canadian port and get them to the mouth of the Stikine River without lightering; then, of course, your treaty rights to navigate the Stikine would be of practical value, and you could use this route. But the information we get from all well-informed sources is that it is impossible to do this except in most exceptionally calm and quiet weather.

Mr. MORRISON. May I interrupt the hon. gentleman to inform him that, at the present time, the Canadian Pacific Navigation Company of British Columbia are putting on three or four of their boats to run from Port Simpson to Glenora. My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Prior) knows what kind of boats these are.

Mr. IVES. They may be doing it, but what measure of success have they had in it?

Mr. MORRISON. The "West Slope," another well known boat, has been plying there for a number of years.

Mr. IVES. As I understand it, they are proposing to do it, and they may probably try it, until they lose their few boats in the open water, and then they will give it up. The reports we have from navigators for the last one hundred years, covering that coast, describe conditions which would make navigation by tug-boats and barges exceedingly dangerous and risky. It is ridiculous for us to make an expenditure of three or four million dollars on the chance of being able to carry out the proposition of the Minister of Agriculture, of doing this business by tug-boats and barges. It cannot be done; it is senseless to make an expenditure with such an idea in view. What remains? The idea that we may be enabled to induce the American Government not to make regulations—because it must be admitted that they have a right to make any reasonable regulations—not to make regulations which will be too onerous to enable us to do the business. How easy it would be for them to establish regulations which, while not being considered as forbidding the free navigation of the Stikine River, would be fatally obstructive. For instance, they have a right to say: We cannot allow those goods to be lightered excepting in the presence of our officers, we do not know but that they may be sold in our own territory, in our own strip of Alaska. We must not only have our own officers on hand when these goods are lightered, but we must examine them and see what they are, the parcels must be opened and inspected, and they must be carefully inspected. We must then follow these parcels and packages until they are entirely out of our territory and up the river beyond our limits, and then we must have a bond that they will not be returned, because we cannot maintain customs posts up there.

Now, I do not say they would put these obstructions upon our business. but I say that, if they did so, they would effectually prevent that route from being used. Now, my own idea has been all along in favour of building a Government road through the Peace River district. In view of the exceeding richness of the Yukon district, and in view of the great agricultural resources of the region around the head waters of the Peace River, and the probabilities which the last speaker gave us of further rich finds being made in the Omenica and Peace River country, I think the people of Canada would be prepared, notwithstanding all that has been said about the increase of public debt and the increase of taxation, to sanction the expenditure that would be necessary to open up the Peace River country, to open up the Omenica and Cariboo country; and, if the Yukon proves to be as rich as we now think it is, to extend the road by water stretches and by railway, so as to accommodate that country. Of course, I am only speaking for myself. but, for my own part, I would support an undertaking by the Government to make a route into that country which would be entirely upon Canadian territory, and entirely free from any possibility of obstruction or interference by the United States. In that way you would tap the centre of Canadian trade, you would open up for all time a country which, in my opinion, will be rich and which will support a large population. Referring to the Peace River country in particular, I believe it is as good as the average Alberta country all over that territory; I believe it is better than the southern portion of Alberta, agriculturally speaking. I believe that this country would support the Government much more heartily and warmly—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Does my hon. friend refer to what is usually known as the Edmonton route, or the Ashcroft route?

Mr. IVES. I am referring to the Edmonton route. The engineers are, I believe, fully satisfied with the feasibility of getting from Edmonton to the head waters of the Peace River through the Peace River country, to a point where you can get west of the ridge and reach lake navigation, or the waters that you are now proposing to utilize. I think this route would be safe, it would be secure, it would be free from obstruction, and would open up a splendid agricultural country, would open up a mineral country which has proved its value by the fact that millions have already been taken from it. My information is, that the chances of quartz mining in the Omenica and Cariboo country are as good as they are in any portion of British Columbia. I do not believe that a little talk in the newspapers about increasing the public debt and increasing taxation, in view of the good times that we are enjoying, in view of the enormous rush of people into that north-west country—I do not believe that that ought to deter the Government from taking this matter up and putting it through as it ought to be put through. I am opposed to the scheme now advocated, for the reason that I think it will lead to interminable claims being made upon the Government of this country in years to come, from the fact that they will be utterly unable to protect the grants that they give from being poached upon by free miners. I believe that we would lose more in that way alone than it would cost to complete the larger scheme.

Mr. DOBELL. I hardly expected to take any part in this debate, and I fear now that I can add very little to the very exhaustive discussion which has already occupied this House. But I feel some satisfaction at being able to accept the challenge which the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) made to me, a few nights ago, asking me, as a business man, what I thought of this contract from a business standpoint. I shall endeavour, as briefly as possible, to reply to that question. I shall avoid entering at all on the intricacies of international law, but I will endeavour, as simply and as concisely as possible, to enumerate the various points on which the hon. Opposition are in accord with the Government. Now, Sir, I may say that they are, as we are, quite impressed with the great value that exists in that extensive gold-bearing area which we know as the Klondike. They have knowledge, as we have also, that there will be this year an immense influx of mining population from all parts of the world, and that among these miners there will be many wild and turbulent spirits which it will be very hard to keep in order, although they are the class of men who are generally pioneers in any newly discovered gold country. The numbers likely to go in there are variously estimated at from 100,000 to even as high as 250,000. Now, the Government realizes that it is their duty to secure the maintenance of law and order and to take such steps as will ensure the supply of such food and protection as may be necessary for such a large body of people. If, after reaching any central point, say Dawson City, they should not meet with the success they anticipated, and find themselves without food, it would be necessary for the Government to look ahead and to make some provision for such a state of things. Therefore, we admit a distinct obligation upon the Government to guard against either riot or starvation, or even against a still more dangerous contingency, namely, a conspiracy that might possibly arise there to wrest that country from the Dominion. The Government, therefore, have to take prompt measures to provide against these possibilities. To this end they have decided that a railway must be built to facilitate the shipment of food supplies and, if necessary, to send in armed men at the earliest possible date and as quickly as practicable; and in this respect I am quite sure the Opposition are with us. Now, the question was put, I think, by the late Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart), why this railway was not begun last August; and I think another hon. member suggested that it might have been begun even earlier than that. But I do not think the Government have been either indifferent or dilatory. On the contrary, the Minister of the Interior left for that country early in the fall, and remained there until some time in December, visiting many of the principal points. Indeed, he went up the White Pass from Chilkat, he sent his surveyors into other quarters, and he took every possible means to ascertain what was the best and quickest possible route of reaching the mining district, and saw for himself the requirements necessary to be carried out and the difficulties which had to be provided against. He devoted much time in arriving at what he thought best to be done, and the decision he came to was that the road should be an all-Canadian road, that the first portion of it should be built from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake; and in this, I think, from the discussion that I have heard, the Opposition are still with us.

You can readily realize, Mr. Speaker, that to build a railway through an unknown region, far from the base of railway supplies, and with labour abnormally high on account of the fabulous reports of the money to be made there by mining, was an obligation which the Government naturally shrank from undertaking, and they preferred, even at a great cost, to hand over the obligation to a company, which I am glad to know possesses the confidence not only of this House but of the country at large. I think the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) bore testimony that this company had genius for railway construction greater than any other contractors in the country. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the Opposition would have had us begin this work last August, it is quite evident we had not a day to spare in January. The moment the Government came to a decision and approved of the suggestions which the Minister of the Interior brought back with him from the coast, we determined to carry out the work and entered into the contract now before the House for the acceptance of Parliament, and I believe it will receive the hearty approval of the majority of this House, and when it is properly understood, the approval of the people throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion.

The details of this contract I need not enter into. Much misconception has prevailed respecting it, many erroneous and misleading statements have been made; but on the whole I believe it will prove a judicious, prudent and satisfactory contract. It is quite possible that by delaying and calling for tenders we might have made an agreement for a less grant of land; or the Government might possibly have undertaken the work itself, and it might have proved that the cost would have been less; but we would not have had the work completed by 1st September, a provision which this contract covers. And, Mr. Speaker, that was the great point to be attained. Who is there in this House, Mr. Speaker, who would haggle and bargain over the cost of a road like this when there is possible danger of bloodshed and suffering? I would not for one, even if I stood alone on that ground. But I claim, contrary to the words that have fallen from the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives), that there is great advantage in having a large area of the country which we have given to the contractors for this work controlled by Canadians, and working with the Government on alternate blocks, and I hold that that will be a great help to the Government to maintain their rights to property there and aid in maintaining order—that it will prove a very great factor in helping the Government, while the Government can help the contractors in return in maintaining the rights of property.

I might direct attention to the fact that a railway could have been built, and the Government could have found contractors to undertake it, at a far less cost through Chilkat Pass, but the Government decided that a road from Glenora to Teslin Lake would be the best for Canada, that it would be an all-Canadian route and would carry trade into Canadian channels. I might ask what was our object when we built the Sault Canal, at a cost of nearly $3,500,000? We did not need it at the time, but we wanted it so as to be perfectly independent of our neighbours; and while we are doing, and while I hope we will always do in the future everything in our power to establish and maintain most friendly relations with the United States and by all means to cultivate feelings of amity towards them, I hope we will always make every effort to secure our strict independence and not place ourselves under obligations to them.

The late leader of the Opposition asked, in very emphatic terms, how the Minister of Railways dare make such a contract as this now before the House. Why, Sir, though the most insignificant member of the Government, and certainly the one least experienced, I would say we dare do anything we believe to be right and which will tend to the development of this great Dominion, and that we dare not do anything in the direction and in line with the action of the hon. members of the Opposition, which we believe is not right, to stop this work and endanger those pioneers who have gone into that country and who do pend on us to protect them in case of need.

The leader of the Opposition also raised a point respecting the provision for alternate blocks, and he made the statement in so grave a manner that I began to think we had neglected some great interest and had not sufficiently safeguarded the provisions covering this particular division of the contract. But I am happy to assure the House that neither the Government nor the contractors have the slightest hesitation in accepting this contract as covering and embracing simply a fair division by alternate blocks, and that principle will be literally carried out and strictly followed on both sides. As regards the preference given to the contractors in the event of an extension of the work, to which many hon. members have offered objection, I reply that if any contractor builds a portion of a road, he is usually given the preference when additional works are carried out. He has nothing more than a preference. The Government would not have to pay any more to these than to other contractors if it were desired to extend the road to Portland Inlet or Dawson City; but all that is asked is that the contractors in such an event should be given the preference. It is unwritten law, it is commonly so understood whether expressed in the contract or not. It is not consistent for any Canadian to run down the value of this great gold-bearing country, but I was startled at times during the debate with the way in which the Opposition have valued these 3,700,000 acres, and none more so than the leader of the Opposition. That hon. gentleman laid great stress on these 3,700,000 acres being rich gold-bearing rock. Why, how can any one tell what the land may consist of. The contractors have to take alternate blocks. They may in some cases receive 24 miles of freestone or some other rock—of course I do not know the geological formation of the country—but there is no man living to-day who believes there is gold running through the whole of that country.

Another very wild statement made, and it is one on which I can speak with more assurance than I can in regard to gold, was that timber to the value of 400 million dollars was being given away to the contractors. That is more than a misleading statement; I was not surprised that the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) was himself amazed and astounded when he found his calculations left such a result. I think he must have been very much like the small store-keeper who included the year of Our Lord when he made up the addition of his profits, and was a little startled at the result. The contractors, I fancy, will be very glad indeed to have some of the statements of members of the Opposition if they have occasion to go to London to float their bonds. I do not think anything could be of more service to them than some of the statements made by some of the Opposition speakers in regard to the value of their lands. If all the wildest imaginations of these hon. gentlemen should be crystallized into fact, I think we should have no reason to begrudge the immense fortune which the contractors may make, because the Government will have the alternate blocks and the country will be benefited by the indirect advantages of having it opened up for trade. The president of the Toronto Board of Trade, in a deputation consisting of delegates from Quebec, Montreal and Winnipeg, stated he cared little for the gold, but they wanted the indirect trade which would be brought by opening up that country. We ought to rejoice that we have Canadians capable of entering into such a contract. If these Canadians have a genius for railway building greater than other contractors of Canada—and I do not say it with any want of respect to other contractors—we should be gratified that we have such men among us. Would any one say that England should not honour a man like the late Mr. Brassey, who made a great deal of money out of English and French contracts, and was able in the first line of his will to leave £4,000,000 sterling? We ought to be glad that there is a field in this country for contractors to make money and do well.

I was very much surprised to hear the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) advancing, as a serious plea against this contract, the fact of another offer having been made since it was entered into. The contract with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann was completed on the 25th of January, and on the 21st of February the hon. gentleman rose in this House and told us that another firm would have built the road for 5,000 acres a mile, and that they had made that offer on the 18th of February, just a month after the contract was completed.

Mr. MACLEAN. I would like to ask the hon. Minister, was not that a provisional contract, subject to all sorts of changes?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). No.

Mr. MACLEAN. Then hon. gentlemen say it is not a provisional contract?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is subject to the ratification of Parliament.

Mr. MACLEAN. It is a provisional contract, then, and that is where hon. gentlemen are making a great mistake.

Mr. DOBELL. Not only was there no royalty attached to that offer, and I do not know what other details may have been wanting in it, but I believe that it was nothing more than an idle effort to disturb the public mind. We all know the kind of estimate we put upon a man who comes after a transaction is closed and offers better terms. We look upon him as a wrecker—a sort of moral wrecker who goes about the world to make people unhappy, but is never prepared to carry out any practical work. If any member of the Opposition knew of a contractor who was willing to do this work, I am satisfied that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) would have been very glad to have seen him and have talked over the matter, and given him every opportunity of making an offer to construct the road.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) stated that the province of Quebec was decidedly against this contract. On that point I unhesitatingly join issue with the hon. gentleman. I maintain that both in Quebec and in Montreal, as well as in other cities of that province, the consensus of opinion is that the Government have acted wisely and well in undertaking this contract.

I must again refer to what I think was the very unfair criticism made by the hon. leader of the Opposition against our Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair). The hon. gentleman dwelt at considerable length upon an extinct body in the United States who are commonly known as Know-nothings. I was really amazed at the hon. leader of the Opposition, because his attacks are generally pretty direct. I looked into the matter and I found that every question the hon. leader of the Opposition asked the hon. Minister of Railways it was simply impossible to answer. The hon. gentleman only showed how quickly he could pick up conundrums which had no answer. I will read two or three of them to show that even to-day, after a discussion of the matter for over a week, we have arrived at no better conclusion in regard to them. He asked what would be the cost of the road. I say that no one living can tell what that road will cost. Our surveyor estimated it at about $25,000 a mile; but he was careful to protect himself by adding that it might come to $40,000 a mile. He had really no idea of what it would cost, as he did not know the nature of the route. Then the hon. gentleman asked the value of the 3,750,000 acres of land. If it is all rich gold-bearing land, it would take a long calculation to get at its value; but with regard to a great deal of it we do not know where it is or what it is, and therefore it would be quite impossible for our Minister of Railways to answer that question. The last question was one still more difficult—whether there was likely to be difficulty with the United States in regard to transshipping. Well, we do hope that we are going to be on better terms with the United States than we ever have been. I believe myself that we shall be when they come to understand us. We need simply straightforward, honest talk, and no brag. These questions recall to me—if I may trespass on the good nature of the House so far as to present it to them—a picture which came to my mind on the first or the second evening I had the honour of entering this House. It was during a discussion in which the hon.

leader of the Opposition charged our Premier with a grievous crime. It was not with "knowing nothing," as he charged our Minister of Railways, but it was with "saying too much"; and his words made a great impression on my mind. He said our leader was wearing his "heart upon his sleeve." I turned this expression over in my mind, and wondered what it could mean. Looking it up, I found that to wear one's heart upon one's sleeve meant honour bright, frankness, candour, honesty, simple-mindedness, veracity, bluntness, to speak one's mind, probity, a gentleman of his word, bonhomie, openness, sincerity, to be artless, above-board, straightforward, truthfulness, plain speaking, to think aloud, uprightness, chivalrous; and if the hon. leader of the Opposition discards this picture, I suppose he is compelled to support the second one which I present: knavishness, truthlessness, prevarication, misrepresentation, double-dealing, pretending, equivocating, garbling, to put a false colouring, make-believe, to throw dust in the eyes, diplomacy, politic, to play false, double-tongued, fencing, duplicity—but I will not go on. I thought myself if we were going to make a picture to put at the figure-head of our ship of state I would leave it to the House which they will choose.

Mr. FOSTER. Take both.

Mr. DOBELL. I do not think I need detain the House longer. I merely wish to add a word or so. I was very much surprised indeed to find that my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives), after he pointed out all the advantages these contractors were getting, should have entirely overlooked the fact that they were bound to the expenditure of the entire cost of this railway, and the interest on that, I think, will amount to a great deal more than any sum they might save through paying the one per cent royalty instead of 10 per cent on which he dilated at such length.

With regard to the Edmonton route, that is a matter which the Government will have occasion to look into, but we could not make the Edmonton road in less than four or five years, and in the meantime we might have 100,000 people out in that country starving. I see that the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) shakes his head. I believe we could not have the road built in less time, doing our best, but in any case it would not give us what we require and are attempting to carry out, and what I hope the country will enable us to carry out, and that is to give immediate access by railroad to that district so as to guard against the possibility of a large body of miners getting in there in the expectation of finding the rich deposits of gold, to which the Opposition called our attention, and then becoming disappointed and sinking into despair, and dragging themselves back to Dawson City, without our being in the position to get there and afford them relief. Mr. Speaker, as a business man, I have no hesitation in claiming for this contract the hearty approval of this House. It will form part of a line that can be extended at one end to Portland Inlet, and at the other to Dawson City. In the meantime, without a dollar of cash being advanced by this Government, we secure a means of transport into one of the wildest places in the world, and the immediate construction of a sleigh road which, according to the terms of the contract is to be completed "not later than six weeks from the execution of this agreement."

Mr. McDUGALL. The hon. Minister (Mr. Dobell) who has just taken his seat told us, in his opening remarks, that he was about to address the House from a business standpoint in relation to this question. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that, in my humble way, I shall be able, to some extent at least, to address myself to the question from a business standpoint. The hon. gentleman told us of the immense number of people whom the Government expected to enter that country during this year and of the necessity therefore of providing sufficient means for getting them in and sending out a sufficient force of mounted police to maintain law and order. On this side of the House, we admit that great necessity not only exists now but has existed before for the construction of some better way of getting into that country than we have. Our first object should be therefore to see what best means there are of meeting that urgent necessity; and from a business standpoint, it is our duty to examine the proposition now made by the Government and see how far it meets that necessity. Having done so, we have to consider whether or not the measure of work that we are getting and the measure of convenience that we are placing at the disposal of the people is sufficient compensation for what we are now asked to pay.

At present to get to the Klondike region from the Pacific coast, we first have to go by steamer to Fort Wrangel, a distance of seven or eight hundred miles, over territorial waters partly controlled by the United States and partly by Canada. After getting to Fort Wrangel, which is a port of entry on United States territory, we are subjected to customs regulations, and are then obliged to seek other means to get to the head of the Stikine River. We have to transfer our cargoes and passengers at Fort Wrangel into a small class of steamers or boats in order to get to the head of the Stikine River, and on arrival there, we are just at the place where we must begin to look for the benefits that are to accrue from the measure now before Parliament. The contractors undertake to build this line of railway from the head of the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, a distance, according to the papers now before the House, of 150 miles. But there are other evidences before the House which make the distance 200 miles and 165, and so on. Taking, however, the mileage that is embodied in this Bill, the contractors are undertaking to build this 150 miles from the head of the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, and the character of the road, we are told, is to be the same as that of the Slocan and Kaslo Railway, though, according to the reports before the House, it would be quite possible to build a road very much superior to that.

The standard of the Kaslo and Slocan road was discussed between the late Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). During that discussion a dispute arose as to the time required to travel over that road. The Minister of the Interior said that he went over the road, 31 miles, in one hour. I went over that road on the 28th of June last. I went over it by the regular train that was run on the regular time table, and that time table allowed two hours and fifty minutes for the trip. And, let me tell you, we did not get over the road that day in the time provided in the time table, but were some minutes late in reaching the terminus. Therefore, I am not inclined to credit the statement of the hon. Minister of the Interior when he says that it is possible to go over that road with safety in the time he says he was carried over it. It may not have been by the ordinary engine or the regular train that he was taken over it. I consider it would be dangerous to undertake to drive over that road in a very much shorter time than it took the day I went over it. We went over bridges about 200 feet; we went over grades 170 feet to the mile, and curves of 30 degrees. I take it that it would be impossible for the Minister, unless he was willing to leave this world at short notice, to allow trains to run with him as rapidly as he indicates over a road of that character. I remember at one place where the train stopped for two or three minutes to allow the passengers to see how the road was built, that the track run along a shelf of rock with a perpendicular drop of 950 feet to the bottom of the ravine.

Suppose that this new road is complete to the head of Teslin Lake, on the date provided by the contract, what benefit are we to receive from it during the present year? We are told in the reports that are before the House that ice forms on the Teslin Lake and Lewes River as early as the middle of October, sometimes a little later, say the 20th of October. Now, while I fully realize that it is my duty to regard all measures coming before the House as to their effect upon the welfare of the Dominion at large, I realize no less that it is my duty in a special manner to consider how any measure affects the interests of the particular constituency I have the honour to represent. Now, let me take the case of a miner or prospector leaving my constituency intending to get the benefits that will accrue from this undertaking on the part of the Government. He travels nearly four thousand miles to Victoria or Vancouver. None of the considerations provided in the measures now before the House will add one iota to the comfort of the man travelling from the far east over this distance. Having got to Vancouver or Victoria he has to go, I suppose, 700 or 800 miles by steamer to Fort Wrangel. There are none of the benefits of this measure for him so far as that part of the route is concerned. To reach the point on the Stikine River from which this road starts would occupy, I figure, 14 or 15 days, and in all that travelling there is not a single iota of benefit to him from the subsidy here provided or in the measure now before Parliament. But now they begin to get the benefit of this road. According to the hon. Minister of the Interior it will take just five hours to go from one end of the road to the other. This over, the prospector from Cape Breton is landed on the banks of Teslin Lake. He is still a long distance from the mining regions or, at least, from Dawson City. This Bill does not provide at all that Mackenzie and Mann shall provide any means either of going from Victoria or Vancouver to Telegraph Creek or from Teslin Lake to Dawson City.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Yes, it does.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Not a line of it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman could not have read the contract.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would like the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to point out where there is any line or clause of this Bill or contract which compels Mackenzie & Mann to provide any means of communication at either end of this road.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is specially provided.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is not, Mr. Speaker, or I do not understand the English language. I find that where this service is referred to, the Bill simply says that Mackenzie & Mann "may" engage in such an undertaking. They are not compelled to do it and there is no security that they will be compelled to do it. My poor friends come from Cape Breton and spend 16 or 17 days in reaching Teslin Lake, and there is no provision—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Now, will the hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall) look at clause 9, and see if the word "may" is there. It says:

9. The contractors or the contractors' company shall provide or arrange with others to provide steamboat transport of freight and passengers between the terminus of said railway on Teslin Lake or other terminus northerly thereof and Dawson City to and fro.

Mr. McDOUGALL.

They must provide this means for transport or get others to provide it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. "May" is the word in the Bill. Admitting "shall" is in the contract, of what effect is it? There is no guarantee they shall. But to what extent and of what kind even if they do?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). And for how long?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And under what penalty?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And what is to be the size of the boats, and how many sailors is each to carry?

Mr. McDOUGALL. Now, Mr. Speaker; here is the standpoint from which it is the duty, not only of myself, as a humble member of this House, but the duty of all hon. members, to view this contract. Here is the position that our people will find themselves in who wish to take advantage of this proposed railway. According to the estimate of the Minister of the Interior, they would go over this 150 miles of railway in five hours—that is, five hours out of seventeen days—and without any definite certainty of ever getting over the remaining 600 miles to Dawson City. There is an undertaking provided for in this contract, and it is in plain words. It is to the effect:

The contractors shall immediately construct a practicable sleigh road from the mouth of Stikine River to Teslin Lake, and shall provide suitable shelters and stopping places for travellers at intervals of not more than twenty-five miles along such road, such road and stopping places to be available for use at the earliest possible moment, and in any event not later than six weeks from the execution of this agreement.

Now, will the hon. gentleman who has charge of this Bill tell me whether one dollar has yet been spent in building this railway, and will it be ready by the 8th of March?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is doing his best to prevent it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. No, it was quite understood that this work should go on, regardless of what this House should do about it. The contract specifies the road must be built at once. My point is this, that the Government, in endeavouring to perform this piece of work, is at the same time trying to make the people believe that they are doing a great thing for the country. Sir, that is not the case; but they are giving a great deal of the country away for the purpose of getting this small piece of work done. Taking it for granted that the services will be supplied, either by Mackenzie & Mann, or by any other concern, on the Teslin Lake and Hootalinqua River, with a view to the continuation of the voyage to Dawson City, I estimate that between twenty and twenty-two days will be consumed in journeying from the eastern part of Canada to Dawson City, under the most favourable circumstances. Well, now for completing this road to Teslin Lake, 150 miles long, we give 3,750,000 acres of the choicest gold lands, including the fuel on that land, whether it be coal or timber. And this fact must not be forgotten, Mr. Speaker, that these contractors are getting, not only the gold, a fee simple of the property containing all the minerals, whether gold or coal, but they are getting also the timber that is growing on any part of this land that they choose to select. And all the miner or prospector gets who chooses to come from Cape Breton to the Yukon, and who is obliged to consume twenty-two days on the journey—all he gets is five hours' ride on 150 miles of road provided for under this contract. Now, the passengers and freight having reached Teslin Lake after the 1st of September, I would like to know what means of communication it is possible for Mackenzie & Mann, or for any other concern, to place on Teslin Lake and the Hootalinqua and Lewes rivers down to Dawson that will be able to carry anything like the number of people that is expected to pass over that route during the coming season, during the four or five weeks, or even six weeks, if you choose to say so, before the close of the road by winter. In my opinion, the number of people that can possibly go over that route, and the quantity of freight that can be carried, after that date to close of navigation, will be very small indeed. Suppose we make a calculation of the quantity of freight that can possibly be carried over that railway. According to my humble way of judging this matter from a business standpoint, about 100 tons of freight per day and about 100 passengers per day are as much as we can expect Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, or any other company, to undertake to transport between Teslin Lake and Dawson. To carry that quantity of freight and that number of passengers would require two or three steamers going from Teslin Lake every week. I do not believe we can possibly expect that any company are likely to put a boat on Teslin Lake to run down to Dawson, through the dangerous channels and shallows that are known to exist on that route, of a greater capacity than about 250 tons of freight and 250 passengers. Now, at this rate, it would take about five months to carry 15,000 passengers and 15,000 tons of freight. Under these circumstances, I think we have a right to inquire what benefit we are going to derive during the four or five weeks that navigation will be open between the 1st of September and the closing of navigation next winter. What benefit are we going to get for the immense grants of valuable land we are asked to make to this company? Sir, rather than support any measure of this kind that only gives us transportation, at the most, during five or six weeks over this route in the sixteen months to come, I would go to work immediately, and would have done so before now, if it was my own private business, and I would build a good wagon road over that route, and have it completed by the time navigation opened on the Stikine River. During the five months of open navigation we would be able by this wagon road to carry 15,000 tons of freight and 15,000 passengers, and that traffic would tax any means of communication possible during the next twelve, fourteen or eighteen months on Teslin Lake or the rivers to Dawson City. I may be told that this would not be a feasible and practicable plan; but in my humble judgment it would be. It would be more in proportion to the benefits we have received, or have any reason to expect to receive, from this measure now before Parliament outside of the 150 miles of railway. The estimates of Government engineers show that it is possible to build a wagon road in that country at a cost of $1,400 per mile, so the total expenditure necessary for the road itself would be $210,000. In order to carry 15,000 passengers and 15,000 tons of freight during five months over that road, there would be required 1,000 horses, wagons, and a complete outfit of men, &c., for the work. This outfit, I estimate, would cost about $200,000 more. In order to have the road thoroughly equipped with men to handle the traffic in addition, I would allow $75,000 for maintenance during the season of travel. I would further provide $15,000 for management, clerks, etc. Thus, the road would cost at the most $500,000, and these figures are based on the estimate of the Government engineer as to the cost of building good wagon roads in that country. We would in this way provide for the conveyance of 100 passengers per day for five months over a distance of 150 miles, and I consider that number represents as many passengers as would be likely to go over the Stikine River from Fort Wrangel, and could possibly be carried over Teslin Lake to Dawson City, with any means of communication that could be provided in that time. Now we must consider the revenue that would be derived from this source. Fifteen thousand tons of freight carried over 150 miles by horses, at a rate of $20 per ton, would realize $300,000. Fifteen thousand passengers at $10 each would bring $150,000. Calculating that 3,000 people, without freight, except ordinary baggage, should return by this route, at a cost of $10 each, there would be $30,000 additional receipts. The whole of the revenue derivable on this basis during five months would amount to $480,000, or in one season a revenue within $20,000 of the whole cost of the road. We may be told that these rates are high. They are not much higher than the rates at which freight is carried in countries that are largely populated, and that have been opened for one hundred years, and which possess railway and other transportation facilities. Viewed from a business standpoint, I hold that for the purpose of accomplishing the transportation necessary to supply the full capacity of the expected communication beyond the railway to Dawson for the next sixteen months, it would be far better for the Government to undertake to build a wagon road—and such a road could be built by the time navigation would open on Telegraph Creek, on Teslin Lake and the Hootalinqua River. But even if the railroad was built on 1st September, it would not be of any important advantage during the coming year to our people, for it is absurd to suppose that prospectors and miners would go over it in winter; that we would convey that traffic by steamer over the Stikine from Telegraph Creek or Glenora and also across to Teslin Lake, and that people going into the country would take that route and incur the risk of being shut in on Teslin Lake. It is absurd to undertake the work provided for under the contract, and especially at the sacrifice which the people of Canada are asked to make by the Bill now before the House.

Some hon. members have attempted to make comparisons between the present contract and the contract for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1880 and 1881, it is unnecessary for me to enter into particulars with regard to that contract, because many hon. gentlemen who are now members of the House heard or have read the arguments adduced at that time, and are aware of the benefits that have accrued to the country from the building of that great work. In my opinion there is no comparison whatever between the plan adopted by the Government of that day and the plan adopted by this Government in regard to the work covered by the present contract. Some hon. members have, however, gone so far as to say that the plans are precisely alike. In 1874 the Government advertised not only throughout Canada but throughout the world for tenders for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Government from 1874 to 1878 undertook to spend $10,000 in advertising for tenders for the building of that road. In 1874 they placed an Act on the Statute-book giving the Government power to enter into a contract, after calling for tenders for the building of the road.

They failed to get any satisfactory offer for the building of that road. Various methods were resorted to by the Government of that day, as well as by the succeeding Government, with the view of securing its construction; and finally, in the session of 1880-81, a measure was brought down to this House for the building of that railway by the present Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That measure was attacked by the Opposition of the day, and I am astonished to find, when I look at the arguments they used on that occasion, how far hon. gentlemen opposite have forgotten them to-day, when they come before us and ask us to agree to a measure on similar lines, with this exception, that the Government of that day, before presenting the contract to Parliament, had received the authority of Parliament to proceed with the building of the railway. There is that difference between the two cases. The present Government had no authority whatever from Parliament to proceed with this undertaking in the manner in which they have proceeded with it. I do not question for a moment that it was their duty, as far as possible, to ascertain the advisability of providing for the construction of a railway or some other means of communication into that country. But, without any authority from Parliament or the people to enter into a contract, they not only undertook to do so, but they entered into this contract within a few days of the meeting of Parliament. There is this further difference between this present contract and the contract made in 1881, that the Government of that time signed the agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, subject to the approval of Parliament, and the company were not allowed to proceed with the work till the contract received the sanction of Parliament; whereas, in the present case, Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie received authority from the Government to proceed with the work before the contract received the sanction of Parliament. During the discussion which took place on the Canadian Pacific Railway contract in this House in 1881, I find that the right hon. leader of the present Government spoke as follows:—

The ground taken by the Conservative party was this: the railroad should be built immediately and without interruption till finally completed; whereas the policy of the Liberals was that it should be built gradually as the wants of the country should require and its resources permit. The reason urged by the leader of the Conservative party for the immediate completion of the road was that it was a necessity of confederation, which would otherwise remain incomplete.

Is the right hon. leader of this House prepared to take this same position to-day?

What are the reasons they gave their supporters for voting in favour of this contract? What was the answer they gave to the numerous objections raised against it? It was simply this: Do not criticise, but simply accept the contract; it is the best we could get.

That is just what the Government of the day are asking this House to do: Do not criticise this contract, but accept it, as it is the best we could get. The best they could get, in face of the fact that they made a secret bargain: that they never asked any one to tender except Mackenzie & Mann. I was amused the other night when the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), in replying to a statement made by a member on this side of the House in reference to the offer of Mr. Hamilton Smith to build this railway for one-fourth the amount of the contract, told us that he had some experience of going into an auction room and seeing some goods offered for sale for which he would be glad to give double the price. Well, I would like to know who was in the auction room of the Minister of the Interior at the time this contract was made. Mackenzie & Mann were the only persons there; we heard of no one else. The hon. gentleman proceeded:

What has seized the Government of this country, that they have been compelled to accept this contract from the syndicate? Who in the world compelled the Government to negotiate with the syndicate? What great calamity has befallen this country that the Government should be compelled to surrender unconditionally to the syndicate? If there had been a war and we had been defeated, and the Government forced to accept from the victor such terms as suited him to enforce, and if the Government came here to have the treaty ratified, would their language have been different to that used in order to induce their supporters to accept the contract?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Who was it said that?

Mr. McDOUGALL. This statement was made by the right hon. the present Prime Minister on the 21st of December, 1880, and will be found on page 191 of "Hansard" of that date. He proceeded further:

What is the safeguard, what is the guarantee that we have against the possible, I should rather say, the certain evils of the proposed system? We have, as a guarantee, only the good will of the company itself. It has been asserted on the other side that the present members of the company are men of the highest character, and certainly every one may assent to this; but if the men who now constitute the company are men of the highest character, who knows who will be the members of the company ten years hence, five years hence, or even six months hence? Who can say that six months from to-day this company will not have gone to New York, and for a money consideration bartered its interests to foreign capitalists?

I had no idea that these hon. gentlemen had made their own answer to their proposition of to-day, so far back as seventeen years ago; and a more complete answer could not be made. What is in this contract to prevent Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann going to New York and disposing of all the franchises and concessions they are getting under this contract to foreign capitalists? What guarantee have we that the necessary facilities will be provided for traffic on these 150 miles of railway? None whatever, notwithstanding the statement of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies). The people who want to take advantage of that 150 miles of travel are at the mercy of all those who choose to put on steamers and who can charge what they like. There is nothing in the contract which can put a limit on the exactions of the company for the transport of people and supplies over their road. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 6 o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 2nd March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. SCRIVER moved:

That the time for presenting private Bills be extended to Thursday, the 17th March instant, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, as contained in their third report.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 40) to incorporate the Pacific and Eastern Railway Company.—(Mr. Fraser, Guysborough.)

Bill (No. 41) respecting the Dominion Building and Loan Association.—(Mr. Maclean.)

Bill (No. 42) respecting the Canadian Railway Accident Insurance Company.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

Bill (No. 43) respecting the Board of Trade of the City of Toronto.—(Mr. Maclean.)

Bill (No. 44) to confirm an agreement between the St. Stephen and Milltown Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Wood, Hamilton.)

Bill (No. 45) respecting the British Columbia Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 46) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 47) respecting the Brandon and South-Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 48) to incorporate the Cowichan Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. McInnes.)

Bill (No. 49) to amend the Canada Temperance Act.—(Mr. McClure.)

UNITED STATES RELIEF EXPEDITION —MILITARY ESCORT.

Mr. McINNES asked,

1. Has any application been made to the Government to allow an escort of the United States militia or police to accompany the so-called relief expedition—gotten up in the United States—while passing through Canadian territory, into the Yukon mining districts?

2. Has any such application been granted, and, if so, under what, if any, conditions?

3. Will the provisions and equipage of this so-called relief expedition be allowed to enter Canada free of the regular customs charges, and, if so, under what, if any, conditions?

4. Are the provisions of the so-called relief expedition to be sold in the Yukon districts in competition with resident merchants, or are they to be distributed to all, if any, in need? If the latter course is contemplated, has the Government insisted on assurances that Canadians will receive consideration in such distribution equal to Americans?

5. Is any such expedition necessary for the relief of the population in the said districts? If it is, is it the intention of the Government to undertake one? If it is not, does the Government propose the farce to be carried on by foreigners within our territory, and in a manner that will injure our commercial standing with intending Yukoners and otherwise belittle our country?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I beg to say, that such an application as that referred to in the question has been made. There has been correspondence with regard to it, which it is not deemed in the public interest to bring down at the present time. As I have already intimated, in answer to another question, leave has been given to the United States authorities to conduct their expedition through Canadian territory, but I understand that the expedition has been abandoned.

NORTH-WEST LANDS RESERVED FROM SETTLEMENT.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

How many acres of land in Manitoba are reserved from settlement?

How many acres in the North-west Territories are reserved from settlement?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I beg to say, that the number of acres of land in Manitoba reserved from settlement is 18,386,562. The number of acres of land in the North-west Territories reserved from settlement is 83,170,228 acres. I ought to say, in explanation of this answer, that it is possible that the hon. gentleman has not put the question in such a way as to get the information which he really wants. If he wants to get the information as to the number of acres reserved of railway land grants, he should have so put the question, and the answer in that case would have been different. I simply make this explanation to avoid any misunderstanding.

TORONTO HARBOUR DREDGING.

Mr. CLARKE (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

1. What is the amount of the liability incurred for work done or material supplied, in connection with the dredging or improving of Toronto harbour, between the dates of 1st January, 1897, and 1st January, 1898?

2. What was the total amount of moneys paid between 1st January, 1897, and 1st January, 1898, for dredging or any other improvement, either work or material, in connection with the Toronto harbour?

3. What are the names of all parties to whom such moneys were paid, and dates when paid?

4. What are the names of all parties to whom any moneys are still owing? What are the amounts in each case for either work done or material supplied in connection with the Toronto harbour?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. The liabilities were $16,936.34, and they have all been paid. 2. $16,936.34. 3. The list of names, with dates of payment, will cover several pages, and I ask that my hon. friend should move for a return. 4. No moneys are owing.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. The liabilities were $16,936.34, and they have all been paid. 2. $16,936.34. 3. The list of names, with dates of payment, will cover several pages, and I ask that my hon. friend should move for a return. 4. No moneys are owing.

REPAIRS TO L'ARDOISE BREAK-WATER.

Mr. GILLIES asked,

1. Whether the Minister of Public Works is aware of the fact that the sum of $2,000 was voted by Parliament during the last session for repairs to the L'Ardoise breakwater in the county of Richmond, Nova Scotia?

2. Why was not this sum, or any portion thereof, expended during the past year in the repairs for which it was voted?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Yes. 2. It was not expended, because the amount was too small to complete the whole of the work intended, and, in the opinion of the chief engineer, it would not have been safe to do only a portion of the work.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—RAILWAY FROM SOUTHPORT TO MURRAY HARBOUR.

Mr. MARTIN (by Mr. McDougall) asked,

1. Has the survey for the proposed railway from Southport to Belfast and Murray Harbour, in Prince Edward Island, been completed?

2. Has the survey been merely preliminary, or has any part of the said line been located?

3. Has the Government an estimate of the cost of the proposed road? If so, what is the estimate cost per mile, and what is the length of the proposed line?

4. Has the Government decided to proceed with the construction of the said road next spring? If so, will tenders be called for?

5. Has the survey for the proposed bridge across the Hillsborough, in Prince Edward Island, been completed?

6. If so, has an estimate been prepared?

7. Has the Government decided to proceed with the immediate construction of the bridge? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The survey for the proposed railway from Southport to Belfast and Murray Harbour has been completed. The survey was a close preliminary one, from which location has been made on paper, but no permanent location has been yet determined on. The estimated cost of the proposed railway is about $9,000 per mile. The length of the proposed line is about 40 miles. It has not been decided when the construction will be proceeded with. The survey for the proposed bridge across the Hillsborough, in Prince Edward Island, has been completed, with the exception of a few test borings, which are now being made. An approximate estimate of the cost has been made, but it has not been decided when the construction of the bridge will be proceeded with. Negotiations are now pending with the local government as to the proportion of the cost they are prepared to assume.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE CLASSES.

Mr. PRIOR asked,

1. Has the class of cadets which joined the Royal Military College in 1896 been amalgamated with the class which joined the college in 1895 ?

2. Will any cadets of the class which joined in 1896, who may not at the close of their graduating year, 1899, have then taken higher standing in the amalgamated class than cadets who joined in 1895, have precedence of these in the bestowal of Imperial commissions ?

3. Under what regulations are the several Imperial service commissions, which may be assigned to the graduates of 1899, to be allotted to the amalgamated graduating class of this year ?

4. How many cadets passed into the graduating class of this year ?

5. How many and what Canadian Government appointments are offered to the graduates of this year ?

6. How many and what Imperial service appointments have been made available for the cadets passing out of the college during the current year ?

7. How many and what Canadian Government appointments are to be offered to the graduates of 1899 ?

8. How many and what Imperial service appointments will be made available for cadets passing out of the college in 1899 ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. Yes. 2. Yes. The standing of the two classes is kept entirely distinct. Although they are taught together and given the same examination papers, cadets who joined in 1896 do not compete on the same list with cadets who joined in 1895. 3. There are no regulations to suit this especial case, but as the Imperial authorities granted extra commissions for 1899 especially to meet the case of the amalgamated class, four commissions will be offered to the 1895 class and four to the 1896 class. 4 and 5. Ten. Of these, two have already been offered commissions in the Royal Artillery; four others have intimated their wish to take commissions in the Imperial Army; the remaining three are entering into civil life in Canada, and do not desire to follow a military profession; they have all been asked whether they wished for a commission in the Permanent Corps; but the class is so small, there are none who are not provided for. I do not consider that, with the large classes now joining, this is ever likely to happen again. 6. Seven—Royal Engineers, 1; Royal Artillery, 3; Infantry or Cavalry, 2; Indian Staff Corps, 1. 7. It is intended, after the 1st July next, to offer all vacancies occurring in the Royal Canadian Artillery to graduates of the Royal Military College. 8. Eight—Royal Engineers, 2; Royal Artillery, 2; Infantry or Cavalry, 2; Indian Staff Corps, 2.

DATES OF MR. OGILVIE'S REPORTS.

Mr. McALISTER asked,

On what date or dates did the Government, or any officer thereof, first receive William Ogilvie's reports, sent from the Yukon District, dated 18th August, 1896; 6th September, 1896; 6th November, 1896; 9th December, 1896; 11th January, 1897, and 23rd January, 1897, respectively.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The report of the 6th September, 1896, was received on the 19th October, 1896. The report of the 18th August, 1896, on the 22nd October, 1896. The report of the 6th November, 1896, on the 16th February, 1897. The report of the 9th December, 1896, on the 27th February, 1897. The report of the 11th January, 1897, on the 16th March, 1897. The report of the 23rd January, 1897, on the 16th of March, 1897.

COLLECTOR HAGER, OF HAGERSVILLE.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked,

1. In what amount was C. E. D. Hager, collector at the port of Hagersville, indebted to the Customs Department at the time he absconded in the month of November or December, 1893 ?

2. Who were sureties to the department for said Hager ?

3. Is the department aware of Hager's present place of residence, and what steps, if any, have been taken against such sureties to recover the amount of his defalcation ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1st. The amount of the indebtedness of Mr. C. E. D. Hager, formerly collector of customs at the port of Hagersville, to the Customs Department, as ascertained by an inspector of the department and set forth in a report made by such inspector, dated January 6th, 1894, is $2,492.04. 2nd. John H. Scott and Erastus Hager. 3rd. The department is not aware of Mr. Hager's present place of residence. No legal steps were taken against such sureties to recover the amount of Hager's defalcation. The case was placed in the hands of the Department of Justice by the Department of Customs on the 12th January, 1894, with a view to the prosecution of Hager for the recovery of the amounts embezzled by him, and on the 26th January the Department of Justice was instructed by the Customs Department to prosecute Mr. Hager for embezzlement in addition to taking the necessary steps to recover the amount of his shortages, but before any legal steps had been taken all proceedings were suspended at the request of the Department of Customs conveyed in a letter to the Department of Justice under date 2nd February, 1894, the reason for this suspension of proceedings given in such letter being that information had been received that satisfactory arrangements would at once be made for the payment of the amount of the defalcation. It does not appear, however, that such payment has been made, and the matter is now engaging the attention of the department.

EXPEDITION TO HUDSON'S BAY.

Mr. RUTHERFORD asked,

1. Is the report of the recent expedition to ascertain the navigability of Hudson's Bay and Straits, now ready?
2. When will it be placed in the hands of members?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The report of Commander Wakeham, who was charged with the Hudson Bay expedition, was presented to the department some two weeks ago, and after being read by myself, was immediately placed in the hands of the Queen's Printer with instructions to have it printed as quickly as possible. As soon as I get it from the Queen's Printer, I will have it distributed amongst the members.

PIERS OF BRIDGE OVER BEAR RIVER.

Mr. MILLS asked,

1. Has the Government obtained a report from its engineer respecting the remainder of the piers of the old bridge in Bear River, between Annapolis and Digby counties, Nova Scotia?
2. If so, what is that report, and does the engineer consider these remains of piers an obstruction to navigation?
3. Has it yet been determined which Government, federal or local, is responsible for the removal of these remains of piers?
4. If not, does the Government intend to allow these remains of piers to stand as they are until it is determined what Government is responsible for their removal?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. The agent of this department reported in 1890 that the remains of the old bridge were an obstruction to navigation and the department has received several reports since to that effect. 2. No special report has been made by an engineer, but the department is fully aware of the existing obstructions. 3. No, it has not yet been finally determined. 4. There is no appropriation out of which this expenditure could be paid. A special vote would have to be made as these obstructions do not come within those enumerated in the statute.

Mr. MILLS. The question is not fully answered. Does the Government intend to allow the pier to be an obstruction until it is determined which Government is responsible?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman sees that it has not yet been determined whether this Government is responsible or not. Communications have taken place, as I answered the hon. gentleman last year, with the Nova Scotia Government, with the view of inducing them to take up this subject. They did not do so, and the matter has been under the consideration of the Department of Public Works and of my department for some time back. If it is finally determined that it is within our jurisdiction, the matter will then come before Council to see if the necessary provision will be made. Under the statute we have no money to do it; it does not come within the words of the statute, and a special appropriation must be made for the purpose.

PRIZE WON IN THE TERRITORIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. DAVIN (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

Whether N. R. J. Cameron won a prize of $20 in connection with the Territorial Exhibition? If so, when will it be paid?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I may say that there is no bill from any man called Cameron, but there is a bill from a man called N. R. J. Cuneman, who won a prize of $20 in connection with the Territorial Exhibition. There are a large number of these accounts which have to be inquired into, and the inquiry was not finished before the time for the payment under the vote of last session had lapsed. A vote will be asked this session to a re-vote of the amount required to pay these bills. The bill of Mr. Cuneman is approved, and will be paid when the House votes the money for it.

LIGHTHOUSES BETWEEN VANCOUVER AND THE STIKINE RIVER.

Mr. MAXWELL (by Mr. Morrison) asked,

Is it the intention of the Department of Marine and Fisheries to provide additional aids to navigation in the shape of lighthouses along the coast between Vancouver and the Stikine River? If so, can the Minister give any information on the subject, and what steps are being taken to ascertain what lights are required?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). It is the intention of the Department of Marine and Fisheries to provide extra aid to navigation, in the shape of lighthouses along the coast between Vancouver and Stikine River. The department is fully alive to the importance of this question, and the engineer of the department will proceed on board the "Quadra" up that coast at the earliest day after the agents report that the fogs along the coast permit of his doing so effectively. I expect he will leave about the 15th of March, and the "Quadra" will then proceed along the coast for the purpose of ascertaining the points where these aids to navigation are required.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. DAVIN (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

Whether the attention of the Minister of the Interior has been called to the following correspondence:—

Prince Albert, 20th October, 1896.

A. E. Forget, Esq., Regina.

My dear Forget,—I have a letter from Geo. S. Young, M.D., a good Liberal, from Gladstone, Man., who wishes to locate in Prince Albert if he can get the Government work. It is not necessary for me to inform you that a doctor is a very necessary thing for us to have, as they are continually travelling through the country and can do us a great deal of service, more especially as there is (when a certain amount of your work is given them to do) a lot from the poor in the district gratis. Please let me know about what a doctor can expect from the department by the year.

Respectfully yours,

(Sgd.) THOS. O. DAVIS.

9th November, 1896.

Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 25th ult., relative to the wish of George S. Young, M.D., to locate in Prince Albert, and in reply beg to state if Mr. Young, besides being a good Liberal, is a good medical man, he can count on getting a liberal share of the Government patronage.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) A. E. FORGET.

T. O. Davis, Esq., Prince Albert.

Winnipeg, 17th August, 1896.

A. E. Forget, Regina.

Orton starting on six weeks' trip among Indians. I think he should be stopped.

(Sgd.) JOSEPH MARTIN.

Mr. Forget was only too willing to oblige Mr. Joseph Martin, as the following answer indicates:—

Regina, 17th August, 1896.

Hon. J. Martin, Winnipeg.

Understand Orton appointed by Order in Council, therefore beyond my jurisdiction, but, if not, Leveque hereby authorized after consulting with Government to send another medical man.

(Sgd.) A. E. FORGET.

Whether the above-named Thomas O. Davis is the Thomas O. Davis who represents the constituency of Saskatchewan in this House? Whether the A. E. Forget, the writer of certain of the above letters, is not the gentleman who was made Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs by the Government of Sir John Macdonald and Commissioner by the Government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell? Whether the Minister of the Interior approves of making appointments on the principles indicated by the above correspondence? Whether George S. Young was appointed as suggested by Thomas O. Davis, or received any appointment? Whether Dr. Orton is still in the service of the Department of Indian Affairs? Whether the Mr. Leveque mentioned in A. E. Forget's letter of 17th August, 1896, is not a Liberal who, like Mr. A. E. Forget, was kept in office by successive Conservative Governments? If Dr. Orton was dismissed, why was he dismissed?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I propose, Mr. Speaker, at the outset to call your attention to the fact that this question resembles a stump speech more than a question which should appear on the Order paper of this House; but at the same time, I shall endeavour to give the hon. gentleman the information he asks, to the best of my ability.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman call my attention to the form of the question?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER. With respect to this question, if I were at liberty to follow English precedent and my own judgment in the matter, I would rule that long statements of circumstantial and outside matters like this, in the form of this question, were not in order; but the practice has prevailed in this House for a number of years, and I am bound by the precedents and cannot rule the question out of order.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Let me say, in reply to the question, that my attention has been called to the publication of what, to the best of my recollection, is a copy of the first letter, which appeared in a newspaper known as the Winnipeg "Nor'-Wester." My attention has not been called to the rest of the correspondence, so far as I can remember. I have no knowledge whether such a letter was actually written by a gentleman named Thomas O. Davis or not; and if it was, I am not in a position to state whether he is the gentleman who represents Saskatchewan or not. The gentleman is a member of the House, and can probably give the hon. member the information he asks.

As to the question respecting A. E. Forget, I have no information as to whether A. E. Forget, the Indian Commissioner, wrote such a letter as that published in the question; but no doubt if such a letter was written the A. E. Forget referred to is the Indian Commissioner, and he is also the gentleman who was made Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs by the Government of Sir John Macdonald and Commissioner by the Government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

As to the next question, which reads as follows :—

Whether the Minister of the Interior approves of making appointments on the principles indicated by the above correspondence ?

I beg to say I have some difficulty in ascertaining what the question is ; but if the question is desired to elicit the information as to whether I approve of the appointment of a good Liberal to office when a vacancy occurs under this Government, I have to say that I do so most emphatically.

George S. Young was not given any appointment by this Government, so far as the records show. He was not in the service of the Indian Department. I have no information of the political predilections of Mr. Leveque. Dr. Orton was dismissed because he was considered unfit for the position he had.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY CONTRACT—MR. HAMILTON SMITH'S PROPOSAL.

Mr. SPROULE (by Mr. Maclean) asked,

On 21st February (see "Hansard," unrevised ed., p. 924) the hon. the Minister of the Interior said : "I had not any communication with Mr. Hamilton Smith, nor was Mr. Hamilton Smith in communication with me, before the contract was signed."—Sir Charles Tupper : "Directly or indirectly ?"—The Minister of the Interior : "Directly or indirectly. I may add that a gentleman said to me upon one occasion, in the course of a casual conversation, that there was a gentleman named Hamilton Smith who was prepared to call upon me for the purpose of discussing the question of a railway to the Yukon." Who is the gentleman who "in the course of a casual conversation" gave the Minister this information ? Did he go into particulars ? At what date did this casual conversation occur, and where ? Did the gentleman discuss the merits of Mr. Hamilton Smith's proposal ? What subject or subjects were under discussion in the casual conversation ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that the gentleman who in course of casual conversation gave me the information referred to was Sir William Van Horne, the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He did not go into particulars. The conversation took place—I have some difficulty in fixing the time, but I have no doubt I am correct—between the time that I returned from the west and 20th December last. The conversation took place in my office in the Langevin Block. The gentleman did not discuss the merits of Mr. Hamilton Smith's proposal ; no proposal was made, no proposal was known at the time ; therefore no discussion of it took place. The next question is : "What subject or subjects were under discussion in the casual conversation ?" There were no subjects under discussion in the casual conversation other than that stated, which affect public business in any particular, and therefore I do not deem myself under any obligation to answer that portion of the question.

MR. HAMILTON SMITH'S OFFER.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Opposition asked me to lay on the Table a copy of a telegram sent to Lord Strathcona respecting Mr. Hamilton Smith. I find in the records no telegram which can be laid on the Table of the House. The telegram from Lord Strathcona, to which the hon. gentleman alluded, was the result of a private, confidential communication from me to Lord Strathcona, asking him to ascertain what was the alleged agency of Mr. Hamilton Smith as regards the Rothschilds, and if any such agency existed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the right hon. gentleman should say who made any such allegation. The Minister is aware that Mr. Hamilton Smith stated in his communication to the Government that no application had been made on behalf of the Rothschilds ; and therefore, when a telegram sent to the Government was given to the public intimating that the Rothschilds had not authorized Mr. Hamilton Smith to make any statement in their behalf, I naturally asked, what every fair-minded man in this House would say was a proper question, that we be furnished with the question that was asked ; and the right hon. gentleman gave a pledge to me across the House that the telegram would be laid on the Table to-day. I asked that the pledge be implemented. The right hon. gentleman is bound in honour to do so, and in the discharge of the pledge given to the House yesterday in regard to what appeared on the face of it to have been a misrepresentation on the part of this Government to the High Commissioner in London. Mr. Hamilton Smith had asked the right hon. gentleman if—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will conclude with a motion, if you, Mr. Speaker, think it desirable, because this is a matter of importance. Mr. Hamilton Smith is a man of the highest standing in this country and in Great Britain. He is a gentleman who, in his application to the Government showed he is associated with a half dozen of the most able and influential financial houses in London. That is Mr. Smith's position, and under these circumstances the attempt made on the part of the Government to show an apparent contradiction or something derogatory to that gentleman was at variance with everything that any hon. member would think fair and honourable treatment towards a gentleman who approaches this Government with a proposition.

Now, Sir, under these circumstances, I ask the right hon. gentleman to put on the Table of this House—as he pledged himself to this House yesterday that he would do—the message which extracted an answer from the High Commissioner utterly at variance with anything it was necessary should be given. What the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was asked by Mr. Hamilton Smith to do was this—and he knows it right well—he was asked if he had any doubt as to Mr. Hamilton Smith's position and as to his responsibility as a man who was entitled to claim the respectful consideration of this Government in relation to the construction of an important public work, that the right hon. gentleman could by a cablegram to London ascertain Mr. Smith's standing. If the right hon. gentleman had sent a message to the High Commissioner asking what is the financial standing of Mr. Hamilton Smith in London, and if in reply to that message he had received an answer that Mr. Hamilton Smith's standing was not such as he had represented it to be, there would be some reason for the refusal to lay the question cabled on the Table of the House. But, Sir, what has the right hon. gentleman done? Mr. Hamilton Smith is a gentleman of the highest standing and character, a gentleman whose financial position challenges the utmost scrutiny from the members of this Government and of this House. He is a gentleman upon whom the Government press of this country have attempted to throw discredit, but he is a gentleman who is known both in the United States of America and in England where he has spent the last fifteen years, to be associated with gentlemen of very high standing and of very high character in connection with the most important enterprises. Why, Sir, probably the richest firms in England to-day are associated with Mr. Hamilton Smith in the application to the Government for this work, and yet we have an attempt made to discredit that gentleman in the estimation of the people of this country and the members of this House, by sending a question for which there was no foundation—the answer shows that there was no foundation for asking such a question, because Mr. Smith had given the answer to that question himself when he stated to this Government, that so far as he was aware the Messrs. Rothschild had authorized no person in this country to make an application to the Government on their behalf.

Under these circumstances, I say that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) falls in what he owes to himself if he does not put upon the Table of this House the message which extracted such a statement from Lord Strathcona as was calculated to discredit Mr. Hamilton Smith, and to lead the people of this country to believe that Mr. Smith—who had gone out of his way to tell the Government that he did not represent the Rothschilds—had made misrepresentations. I say that the right hon. gentleman went out of his way to get a contradiction of something that had never been said by Mr. Hamilton Smith. As the matter stands, the right hon. gentleman owes it to himself, he owes it to the House, he owes it to Mr. Hamilton Smith, a gentleman of the highest character and standing, backed by an amount of financial aid such as no person who has approached the Government in connection with this work possesses; I say, Sir, that the right hon. gentleman owes it to himself, to the House, and to the country, to put on the Table the message that has extracted an answer of such a character from Lord Strathcona, an answer which is calculated to throw discredit upon a gentleman of very high standing who approached the Government in regard to a very important work.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon gentleman conclude with a motion?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I move, Sir, that the House do now adjourn.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) is getting into the unfortunate habit of moving the adjournment of the House whenever he has a stump speech to make to his followers. Sir, I have no objection at all to give him an answer to all the questions he has put to me. The first question he asks me is: Who was the first to allege that Mr. Hamilton Smith was the agent of the Rothschilds; where did the allegation come from? My plain and simple answer to that question is: That the allegation came from the whole of the press which supports the hon. gentleman—the Ottawa "Citizen," the "Mail and Empire," the Hamilton "Spectator," the Montreal "Gazette," and every other opposition newspaper which stated that Mr. Hamilton Smith was the agent of Lord Rothschild. Nay, more; not only was the statement made in the press which supports the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), but I venture to say that I place myself within the judgment of the House when I state that three-fourths of the gentlemen upon the other side who addressed the House upon this subject made the same statement, namely, that the Government had received an offer from no less a person than Mr. Hamilton Smith who was the agent of Lord Rothschild. That was the reason why I wanted to know at headquarters whether the statement was true or not. The Government had not any such information before it but finding that statement repeated day after day in the press, and repeated day after day upon the floor of this House, I thought I was justified—and so do I yet believe—in ascertaining whether or no the statement made, not so much by Mr. Hamilton Smith as by gentlemen opposite, was true or not true. I inquired; I did not inquire officially, I inquired privately; and, Sir, if I do not choose at this moment to lay upon the Table of this House a private communication confidentially sent by me to Lord Strathcona, I have—if indeed I need any authority or support for that course—I have the authority and precedent of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) himself, who when leading this House not later than the first session of 1896, having sent commissioners to the Government of Manitoba to make certain proposals to that government in reference to the school question; read here the answer made by the Greenway Government, but refused to bring down the communication which had brought that answer forth.

In the face of such a precedent, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), forgetting his position, dares to say that I owe it to my own honour to bring down a certain communication. Sir, I am here to say that I am the guardian of my own honour. I am willing at all times, upon matters political to receive advice upon any question which affects my own honour, but I have no lesson to receive from the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper).

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to get into any heated state of argument, or to show any temper as my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) undoubtedly has. Why has he shown that temper? It certainly was not because—for if it be it is groundless—my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) asked a question which he had a perfect right to ask; a double right to ask, because yesterday before this House the right hon. gentleman himself (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) promised to lay that telegram upon the Table. Mr. Speaker, will that right hon. gentleman induce this House or this country to believe, that he did not know yesterday as well as to-day whether that was a private telegram or whether it was a public telegram?

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that a few evenings ago, a certain member of this House, the Minister of the Interior, attempted to read somebody a lecture upon manners, saying that in the wild and woolly west from which he comes, certain things would not be allowed. I think, Sir, that in the wild and woolly west or anywhere else, when I am addressing myself to the right hon. the leader of the House, it would be just as well for the Minister of the Interior not to intervene his bulky form between the ear that I am trying to gain and my own weak voice.

Now, Sir, I put that question, and I ask my right hon. friend to get out of that difficulty if he can. Did he not know yesterday when he promised to bring that telegram down, that it was a private telegram sent by himself? He promised it then; he has taken counsel since. And why does he not bring it down to-day? Because, Sir, I believe he has conned over the wording of that telegram and he fears to bring it down. My right hon. friend tried to squirm out of his position by several devices which I am bound to expose. He said that the press had declared that Mr. Hamilton Smith was a representative of the Rothschilds, and had made an offer on their behalf. He said that three-fourths of the Opposition members in the House had stated the same, and he was very anxious to know the whole truth. From whom, Sir, could he get the whole truth better than from the man who he says the press and three-fourths of the Opposition members of this House declared had made a proposition on behalf of the Rothschilds? But the right hon. gentleman had that information already, over Mr. Hamilton Smith's own signature, for, in a letter dated the 14th of February, 1898, Mr. Hamilton Smith states:

In this connection allow me to state that no offer to build the line was made for the house of N. M. Rothschild & Sons, as has been stated in the House of Commons.

The right hon. gentleman himself was the person to whom this was addressed, and the right hon. gentleman read it in this House. He had Mr. Hamilton Smith's own word that he had never put in a proposal from the Rothschilds. And yet at this late day the right hon. gentleman tries to justify himself before this House by declaring that he was in lack of information, and had to send a private telegram to Lord Strathcona in order to get it. Sir, if the communication to Lord Strathcona was private, why did the right hon. gentleman send his private secretary all over this House to hunt up newspaper correspondents, and to get them to put into the newspapers the answer to that private telegram? If a private telegram is sent by the right hon. gentleman as Premier, and an answer comes to that private telegram, let him keep it as such. But he was in a hurry to give it to the press—why? The evident desire of the right hon. gentleman was to discredit Mr. Hamilton Smith and to make it appear to the public that he had told a lie to the Government of this country, in face of the statement made by Mr. Hamilton Smith, in his letter to the right hon. gentleman, that he did not make any proposition on behalf of the Rothschilds. I leave that to the members of this House and to the country, and to the press that has been making these allegations, and they will be the best judges of how my hon. friend stands in that connection.

Once more, the right hon. gentleman declares that my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, has contracted the unfortunate habit of moving the adjournment of the House. His memory fails him again. That custom, Sir, was commenced when the Liberal-Conservatives were in the government of this country, and during the last few years of that Government, when the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and others who now hold Cabinet positions, took it upon themselves, against the protests of the Government and of the Speaker himself, to move the adjournment of the House at every whipstitch in order to ventilate some grievance of their own. That was when the unfortunate habit commenced. But my hon. friend has a perfect right, in a matter of this gravity, to ventilate it at once, and he can do it in no other way than by taking advantage of this rule of the House. It is a legitimate thing for him to do in this case.

But the right hon. gentleman says that the hon. leader of the Opposition is inconsistent in asking that this telegram be brought down—why? Because my hon. friend had on one occasion read a telegram to Mr. Greenway in connection with negotiations with the Greenway Government, and then refused to read a telegram from the Greenway Government. Are the cases parallel? Not at all, Sir. My hon. friend who leads the Opposition tried at that time to get the consent of the Greenway Government to have the second telegram read in this House, which they refused to give, and as an honourable man my hon. friend could not read it without their consent. It is not so in this case. The private telegram is in the trousers pocket of the right hon. Prime Minister himself, and he can give the required information in half a minute's time if he chooses to do it. The right hon. gentleman has put himself in a false position. He has committed an act of wrong against a private citizen of the Empire. He has led the people of this country to believe that Mr. Hamilton Smith is a prevaricator and an economist of the truth, and he has done it when he had, over Mr. Hamilton Smith's own signature, the information that the thing he was asking about had no foundation in fact at all.

Mr. MACLEAN. The serious feature of this incident is this, that if the right hon. gentleman sent the telegram we believe he did send, then he considered the Manu & Mackenzie agreement a provisional agreement, and if an offer was forthcoming from men of good standing to build the railway for one-fourth of what the Government proposed to give these men, then he was in honour bound to accept it; and he is also bound in honour to tell the House what question he put to Lord Strathcona.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman is missing the point before the House altogether. The Government did not want any evidence to prove that Mr. Hamilton Smith was a prevaricator.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I state that deliberately. The Government had that evidence in their possession, and that evidence has been laid before the House.

Mr. FOSTER. No evidence at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That evidence is now on record. The gentleman whom the right hon. leader of the Opposition has taken under his wing, and whom his lieutenant lauds in the House to-day, is a gentleman who stated that he had commissioned Sir William Van Horne to make a distinct proposition to this Government for the construction of the Teslin-Stikine Railway. He made that statement over his signature, and he made it, I have no doubt in my own mind, to aid politically the hon. gentlemen opposite. The gentleman to whom he referred, Sir William Van Horne, was asked by my right hon. friend the First Minister whether there was a vestige of truth in Mr. Hamilton Smith's statement.

Mr. FOSTER. No, he was not asked that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He was asked whether the statement made by Mr. Hamilton Smith was true, and he replied that there was no truth in it—that Mr. Hamilton Smith had made no such proposition to him; and Mr. Hamilton Smith stands before this country as having made an important public statement, which is contradicted in the first instance by Sir William Van Horne—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Directly contradicted by Sir William Van Horne, and his contradiction is supported by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES—who has alleged that neither directly or indirectly did Sir William Van Horne ever communicate such a proposition from Mr. Hamilton Smith to him.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Or anybody else.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Or anybody else. There can be no mistake about it. Mr. Hamilton Smith was asked who the third party was to whom he had made this offer for the purpose of being communicated to the Minister of the Interior. He replied that it was Sir William Van Horne. He stated that in my presence; he stated it in the presence of three or four members of the Government. Sir William Van Horne was communicated with on the instant, and Sir William Van Horne gave the statement the most emphatic denial.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hon. gentlemen have the temerity to say no in the face of Sir William Van Horne's letter which has been laid on the Table of this House, and which is to be found in the pages of "Hansard."

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman read—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman knows that he cannot interrupt without the permission of the speaker.

Mr. FOSTER. No, but I thought the hon. gentleman would be courteous enough—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman, from his long experience as a member of the House, knows that he cannot interrupt a speaker unless the speaker gives permission.

Mr. FOSTER. I just wish to ask—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to ask permission of the Chair—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Unless the hon. gentleman rises to a question of order, he has no right to interrupt without the permission of the hon. gentleman who is addressing the Chair.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to ask just this—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. I am rising to a point of procedure. I am willing to take your advice, Mr. Speaker, and your advice is, that I have no right to interrupt the hon. gentleman unless with his consent. But how am I to get his consent, if I am not to be allowed to ask him for it?

Mr. SPEAKER. I understood the hon. gentleman to refuse his consent.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman was trying to stop me in the middle of a sentence. It is an old trick of his. He and I have sat in this House a good many years together, and I have watched him very closely. I have always noticed that, whenever a statement is being made which he thinks goes strongly against the position he takes, he jumps up to break the force of it by interrupting. I am perfectly willing that he should make all the interruptions he pleases, but he must do so at the proper time.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order, order.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to read this letter:

Ottawa, 19th February, 1898.

Dear Sir Wilfrid,—In reply to your inquiry of this date, I beg leave to say that I have never communicated to the Hon. Mr. Sifton or anybody else any proposition from Mr. Hamilton Smith concerning the building of a railway towards the Yukon district, nor had I authority from him to make any proposition.

Faithfully yours,

W. C. VAN HORNE.

Now, if the hon. gentleman wants to ask me a question, I shall be happy to answer him.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask my hon. friend to read just exactly what question was put to Sir William Van Horne, to which that letter was an answer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The question put to Sir William Van Horne is contained in the letter addressed by the right hon. the Premier to that gentleman on the 19th of February, 1898:

Privy Council, Canada,

Ottawa, 19th February, 1898.

Dear Sir William Van Horne:

On the 15th instant, I received from Mr. Hamilton Smith a letter as to the statements of which I would desire to communicate with you.

Mr. Smith, in his letter, makes the following assertions:—

"My associates and myself have for many years been connected with the Treadwell mine and other gold mines on the coast of Alaska, so that we have been especially familiar with that northern country. Last year, at our instance, Mr. Henry Bratnober was sent on an exploring expedition from Lynn Canal to Dawson, with instructions to see what route was best adapted for the construction of a railway from the coast to the unobstructed waters of the Yukon. He returned by the so-called Dalton trail from Rink Rapids by Hootchie and Dalton's Post, to Pyramid Harbour, noting elevations, distances and the character of the country. He was, we are informed, the second white man who had passed over the entire length of this line. His report to us was so favourable as to the many advantages of this route, that as soon as your Minister of the Interior returned from the west, I approached him through a mutual friend, offering to build, in the year 1898, a substantial railway from Pyramid Harbour to Rink Rapids, with no cash subsidy, but with a reasonable land grant covering mineral rights. At the time, I referred, by authority, to several of the largest financial firms in London, showing that our ability to build such a line was beyond question.

"The answer I received was, that the Government might prefer the Stikine-Teslin route. To this I replied that in my judgment, from my familiarity with the country was correct, the Stikine line had practically no value as a commercial route, and that no sane capitalist would invest a penny in it; but, of course, if the Government would give the right assistance, we would build the line, while disclaiming any responsibility for its value when constructed.

"Doubtless, these informal negotiations were communicated to the Cabinet."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. So far as I have read is a quotation from Mr. Hamilton Smith's letter. My right hon. friend the Premier goes on to say :

The Hon. Mr. Sifton, to whom I gave immediate communication of this letter, stated that the above assertion was altogether untrue.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES—(reading)—

I thereupon invited Mr. Hamilton Smith to meet me this morning in my office, and he accordingly met me there in the presence of a few of my colleagues, and then, in answer to our inquiries, stated that you were the mutual friend who had communicated between him and Mr. Sifton.

Under such circumstances, I would feel obliged, if you would let me know at your earliest convenience whether, as is claimed by Mr. Hamilton Smith, you can corroborate his statement.

Believe me, dear Sir William,

Yours very sincerely,

(Sgd.) WILFRID LAURIER.

Nothing could be plainer than the question put to Sir William Van Horne, and nothing could be plainer or more unequivocal than Sir William Van Horne's answer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If these hon. gentlemen accept his answer, I am justified in the statement with which I prefaced my remarks, that, so far as the Government is concerned, we have found Mr. Hamilton Smith to have been a prevaricator.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, no.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And I have no hesitation in saying further, that the only conclusion any one can draw from the facts is, that this man made this offer to the Government after he had first communicated its contents to the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I repeat my statement, and I make it with authority, because I asked the question myself of Mr. Hamilton Smith, and I say that Mr. Smith, having first communicated his offer to the hon. leader of the Opposition, I am justified in coming to the conclusion that Mr. Smith's offer was a mere kite which the hon. gentleman was playing for the purpose of misleading the public.

Mr. IVES. Whether Mr. Smith is a prevaricator or not, it is quite evident that these hon. gentlemen are trying to make him out one. They do not like the proposition he has made, because it is understood by the people of this country as infinitely more advantageous than the offer they accepted secretly and suddenly for fear a better one would be made. It is quite evident, whatever may be the character of Mr. Smith, that the members of the Government are in a conspiracy—I will not say anything further—to make him out a prevaricator. But let us see how far the correspondence shows him to be a prevaricator. Mr. Smith says that he approached a mutual friend. I do not know whether it is contested or not, but I do not think it can be successfully denied, that Sir William Van Horne is at present a friend of the right hon. leader of the Government. I do not think the leader of the Government would want to deny that charge. Sir William Van Horne has not denied that he is a friend of Mr. Smith; so that Mr. Smith's statement that Sir William Van Horne is a mutual friend both of himself and the leader of the Government is certainly not a prevarication. Now, what does Mr. Smith say that he communicated to Sir William Van Horne. He says :

I approached the Minister of the Interior through a mutual friend, offering to build, in the year 1898, a substantial railway from Pyramid Harbour to Rink Rapids, &c., &c.

What does Sir William Van Horne, in his letter, deny? Does he deny that this offer was made? Does he deny any part of this conversation at all?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. IVES. Not at all, but he writes a very diplomatic letter indeed, in which he is exceedingly careful as to what he denies, and exceedingly careful not to assert anything. He happened, fortunately, to be here in Ottawa at the time. He was here, as everybody knows, lobbying for the Government to promote this Yukon Bill and push it through. He happened to be here, very handy, and received the letter, and he answers :

Dear Sir Wilfrid :

In reply to your inquiry of this date, I beg leave to say that I have never communicated to the Hon. Mr. Sifton or anybody else any proposition from Mr. Hamilton Smith concerning the building of a railway towards the Yukon district, nor had I authority from him to make any proposition.

That means simply that Sir William Van Horne received the simple communication of a simple financier from London, made to him in all trustfulness. He took him in, he swallowed him, but said nothing about it. The people of this country are not all fools, and they have the evidence of the true inwardness of this business. They understand that Mr. Smith was not a prevaricator, but made a very great mistake indeed in his choice of a mutual friend to communicate this proposition of his to the Minister of the Interior. The people of the country generally do not say that the hon. Minister of the Interior told an untruth, when he denied that this proposition was communicated to him, but they have made up their mind that the Canadian Pacific Railway and Sir William Van Horne preferred the Stikine-Teslin route, and preferred Mann & Mackenzie for some reason—many think, because they are interested in the contract. Consequently, the mutual friend was mum, said nothing, but he hurried on the execution of the contract, and pushed the Government to a point from which they could not retrace their steps, and then he comes out, like the diplomat he is, and denies nothing that Mr. Smith said at all. We can only conclude that Mr. Smith trusted him and was deceived, that Mr. Hamilton Smith expected him to make a communication to the Government, and he did not do so.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Read the last clause of Sir William Van Horne's letter.

Mr. IVES. I do not know about that, but I know that the Minister of the Interior, in his declaration, as stated to the House by the right hon. leader of the Government, denies in toto that any communication was made to him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He has taken that back.

Mr. IVES. Well, I am not here every day, so I suppose I must apologize for not understanding all the sharp turns in this affair. I do know that the people of this country understand, that, for some reason, Sir William Van Horne preferred to have Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie have the contract for this road rather than that it should go to Mr. Hamilton Smith's friends, and, therefore, he kept quiet until it was too late for Mr. Hamilton Smith's proposition to be acted upon by the Government, and then he comes out and says: I did not communicate that proposition to the Government.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). How do you get over the last statement?

Mr. IVES. The last statement is "I was not authorized to do so."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. IVES. Oh, well, that is very plain.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. IVES. Sir William Van Horne simply says: I have no written authority; if I had gone to the Government and laid this proposition before them without a written authority and they had called upon me to implement it, I should have got my great railway corporation into a bad fix. What he means is this: Though I had this conversation that has been referred to, though I knew the financial standing of these London men to be adequate and sufficient, though I knew that Mr. Hamilton Smith and his fellow capitalists could build this road and would build it if the contract were given them, I preferred that the others should have the work, and as Mr. Hamilton Smith did not authorize me in writing, I say now that I was not authorized to lay the proposition before the Government. That is what it means and nothing else. As to the effort that is made to draw a red herring across the trail and make it appear that Mr. Hamilton Smith has told a lie in saying—which he never did say—that he was making an offer on behalf of Lord Rothschild, as my hon. friend has pointed out, in his letter which the Premier gave to the House in most dramatic fashion, Mr. Hamilton Smith distinctly says: "Let me correct one misunderstanding which has appeared in the House and in the press; I am not acting in any way for Lord Rothschild's firm." Yet, with that in the "Hansard" and in the public press and in the minds of the people, what is the step taken to discredit this man and make him out a prevaricator. The Premier sends a telegram which he does not dare to lay on the Table of the House, to Lord Strathcona, no doubt asking him if Lord Rothschild was a party to Mr. Hamilton Smith's offer. Lord Rothschild, being communicated with, says "No," and this is handed to the press and published through the country in order to make this man out a prevaricator. Instead of being a prevaricator it seems to me that he was simple enough to be taken in and gulled by Sir William Van Horne.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I wish to draw attention to one or two points that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ives), who has just sat down, has made. In the first place, I must congratulate the hon. gentleman upon the dramatic and ingenious way in which he seems to be able to read into Sir William Van Horne's letter a great deal that does not appear on the surface. The hon. gentleman, first of all, declined to read the final clause of that letter, which clause is a most emphatic denial of the statement made by Mr. Smith in his letter, which was quoted by the Premier, in regard to the message he sent to the Minister of the Interior. Mr. Smith there distinctly stated that he had, through a mutual friend, sent an offer to the Government. And when he was confronted by the members of the Government and asked who that mutual friend was, he stated to the Premier in the presence of several members of the Government that that mutual friend was Sir William Van Horne. Now, Sir William Van Horne denies emphatically that he had read any such communication from Mr. Smith.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, emphatically.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Hon. gentlemen may say "no," but they cannot twist plain English words into meaning anything but what they manifestly mean; and, if words mean anything, then Sir William Van Horne plainly and distinctly states that he had not from Mr. Smith the authority referred to.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Sir William Van Horne states distinctly that he never communicated to the Hon. Mr. Sifton or anybody else any proposition from Mr. Hamilton Smith concerning the building of a railway towards the Yukon district, nor had he authority from him to make any proposition. If he had no authority to make it, on what ground or in what way can Mr. Hamilton Smith support his statement that he had made a proposition to the Government? If he did not authorize Sir William Van Horne to approach the Government, how can he imagine for a moment that the public will believe he made the proposition to the Government? It is only by reason of his statement that he, through a mutual friend, had come before the Government—in other words, had authorized that friend to make a proposition—that he has any basis for his letter and for the statement which the leader of the Opposition has been discussing here. If that is not the meaning of his words, he has no basis for his argument, and if that is the meaning of his words then, Sir William Van Horne's denial that he had any such authority is sufficient refutation of the statement.

But, the hon. leader of the Opposition, a few moments ago, without rising in his place, made a statement to which I must take exception. That statement was incorrect in fact and without justification in any way. He threw across the floor the remark that my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior had withdrawn his statement, that statement being that he, the Minister of the Interior, had not directly or indirectly received any communication from Mr. Hamilton Smith.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In his own statement in reply to a question on the Order paper to-day he has withdrawn it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The Minister of the Interior in no sense or way withdrew it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He completely withdrew it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. In no sense or way did he withdraw it. He could not withdraw it, because, as a matter of fact, no such proposition was made to him on behalf of Mr. Hamilton Smith by anybody—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He admits that it was—

and the Minister of the Interior having made that statement, with full cognizance of what he was saying, a few nights ago in the debate, had no reason to think for a moment of withdrawing it, because it was a true statement and he could not, with truth, withdraw it. Nor did he use any words which the leader of the Opposition could in any way construe into a withdrawal of his statement. I want the hon. gentleman and the House and the country to understand that the Minister of the Interior in no way withdraws that statement, but maintains it, and that it is a true statement in fact.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This discussion raises some important, some very serious considerations. In the first place, I desire to draw the attention of the House to the unqualified promise made by the hon. Premier only yesterday in this House. The leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) spoke as follows:—

Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the right hon. leader of the House if he would be good enough to lay on the Table a copy of the telegram which was sent to Lord Strathcona in reference to Mr. Hamilton Smith. The answer of Lord Strathcona having been given to the public, I think it very desirable that we should have the message that was transmitted to him.

And the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) replied:

I have no objection, and shall lay it on the Table to-morrow.

And to-day the right hon. the leader of the Government pretends to fly into a frenzy and makes a great ado about being the guardian of his own honour, when he says that the promise of yesterday is not binding upon him to-day. We have had other samples of his promises and we know how much he has done in the way of performance. But this beats the record, Mr. Speaker. There never has been a promise of his so quickly violated as the promise made by the right hon. gentleman yesterday and broken within twenty-four hours.

But there are other questions involved in this discussion, that has become somewhat sharp. It is a serious thing for the Minister of Marine, or for any other member of a Government, to use the extraordinary language that he used about a gentleman, Mr. Smith, or Mr. Brown, or any other man outside of this House, without having the most positive ground for his statement. He has charged Mr. Smith with being a prevaricator of the truth, he has charged him with having made a statement that had not a vestige of truth in it; and we have to-day evidence from the Minister of the Interior himself that goes to confirm, almost to a letter, the statement which he branded as being untrue. And I shall show it, Mr. Speaker. Whether I fall in that or not, I rise in the interest of fair-play to put this question to the Government: Seeing the large interests that are at stake, the undoubted general interest taken in the offer of Mr. Hamilton Smith, the interest the right hon. gentleman himself took in that offer, the importance that he has attached to the offer in connection with this cable correspondence across the Atlantic to an officer of this Government, of which we are, it seems, to be permitted only to see a part; recognizing that it is a bona fide offer, recognizing its importance, the interest in it is sufficiently great to clear up once and for all, as it could be cleared up, this supposed confusion as to what occurred between Mr. Smith and Sir William Van Horne, and at the same time, incidentally to ascertain the financial standing and integrity and character of Mr. Hamilton Smith. Of course, that would involve the question of accuracy as between these gentlemen on the Treasury benches and Mr. Smith himself in this matter. It can be very easily done. The right hon. gentleman, if he feels himself to be on sure ground, can have a committee of this House appointed, and that committee can sift to the bottom, in one sitting, the truth or falsity in connection with these statements; and we will see whether the prevaricator is outside or inside this House. Now, Sir, I never heard the English language so twisted, sentences so distorted, in an attempt to put another construction upon a record before this House, as has been attempted on this occasion. I never heard of any man being treated so unfairly as Mr. Smith has been treated by Ministers of the Crown. As I have followed the statements of the Minister of the Interior and of the right hon. leader of the Government himself, I say there is the best evidence, on the face of it, that throughout the whole business Mr. Hamilton Smith has acted without the suspicion of attempting to misrepresent anything or any person. I say that Sir William Van Horne, in this letter, has taken the greatest pains not to contradict one single statement made by Mr. Hamilton Smith, he has taken the greatest precaution, not merely to approach it in a diplomatic way, as one might think on first blush, but to state the exact truth. But the evidence is undoubted that Mr. Smith said to Sir William Van Horne what he has said he did, that Sir William Van Horne did approach the Minister of the Interior, if we are to believe the Minister of the Interior—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I beg to say to the hon. gentleman that I do not ask him to believe the Minister of the Interior. It is a matter of perfect indifference to me whether he believes me or not.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not know what the purpose of the interruption is. I do not think the Minister of the Interior was following me. I say that if the Minister of the Interior is to be believed—because, judging from some remarks of his colleagues, there are members of this House that do not accept his statement to-day, as I have accepted it in good faith. I say that if the Minister of the Interior is to be believed in this matter, Sir William Van Horne did approach him, and did tell him of these informal negotiations, which Mr. Hamilton Smith says were informal. I can hardly believe it possible that any hon. gentleman will contradict the statement the Minister of the Interior has made to-day, when referring to his language used only a short time ago in the House:

That gentleman stated to me upon one occasion, in the course of a casual conversation, that there was a gentleman named Hamilton Smith who was prepared to call upon me for the purpose of discussing the question of a railway to the Yukon.

He tells us that that gentleman was no other than Sir William Van Horne. Here we have the confirmation of the statement which Mr. Hamilton Smith makes in his letter, which is to this effect: That after having had that conversation, Sir William Van Horne reported to him that he had seen the Minister—and no one has contradicted that—because, after having told Sir William Van Horne of what he was prepared to do in what he calls these informal negotiations, he says:

The answer I received—

And after what we have heard, it was doubtless from Sir William Van Horne, after he had seen the Minister of the Interior.

The answer I received was that the Government might prefer the Stikine-Teslin route.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Not from Sir William Van Horne.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How does the hon. gentleman know? I say that, taking the answer of the Minister of the Interior to-day, and taking the letter of Sir William Van Horne, it is impossible to come to any other reasonable conclusion than that Sir William Van Horne did convey the conversation which undoubtedly took place between Mr. Smith and Sir William Van Horne, to the Minister of the Interior, whether that casual conversation or some other casual conversation. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, we have this fact, that Sir William Van Horne did have a conversation with Mr. Smith. Mr. Smith states the purport of it; Sir William Van Horne, when told the purport of it, does not deny that that conversation took place. He is careful not to deny what Mr. Smith says passed between them, but only that he had authority from Mr. Smith to make any proposition. Fairness to Mr. Smith, why did not the Minister of Marine, if he desired to treat that gentleman with ordinary fair-play, refer to this sentence that Mr. Smith inserted in his communication to the right hon. the Prime Minister :

Doubtless, these informal negotiations were communicated to the Cabinet.

He could not positively be sure that what he had told Sir William Van Horne had gone direct, in so many words and in the terms named, to the Cabinet; and therefore he did not make the statement which these hon. gentlemen are so loud in contradicting. He made a very different statement. He set out with great care the facts and points of the statement made to Sir William Van Horne, and then concludes: "Doubtless these were communicated to the Government." The answer of Sir William Van Horne is, not that a single word has been misrepresented by Mr. Hamilton Smith, but all he says is: "I had no authority from him to make any proposition." What he did do, and no one will deny that he did, was to go to the Minister of the Interior, as the Minister of the Interior tells us, and tell that gentleman that Mr. Hamilton Smith was prepared to call upon him for the purpose of discussing the question of a railway to the Yukon. I venture to say that it is not to be believed by any one, until positively so stated, that on that occasion Sir William Van Horne did not tell the Minister of the Interior all he knew of Mr. Hamilton Smith as regards his financial standing, and what an offer from a man like that would mean, and what importance should be attached to it. I take it that no member on the Treasury benches will seek to make this House believe that the conversation, casual or otherwise, ended without the Minister of the Interior learning from Sir William Van Horne that Mr. Smith was a man in every way able to carry out any undertaking that he should put his name to. Therefore, under the circumstances, knowing that this gentleman's financial standing is undoubted, I do not understand myself why the Government should make such a fierce, such an unfair, such an unfounded attack upon him. I again urge upon the Government the request, that if there is any question, as they themselves have insisted, as to the facts, seeing the importance they attach to that offer, the trouble they have already taken about it, the interest in the country over the matter, they should form a committee, let them have a committee of their own choosing, to ascertain just what the facts actually were and are, where there has been misrepresentation, or where there has been any attempt to deceive or mislead. I will not conclude these observations without calling further attention to the language in a communication the Prime Minister read to this House and which was addressed to him by Mr. Smith. The right hon. Prime Minister, repeating the letter addressed to him, said—quoting from Mr. Hamilton Smith's first letter :

His report to us was so favourable as to the many advantages of this route that as soon as your Minister of the Interior returned from the west, I approached him through a mutual friend, offering to build in the year 1898 a substantial railway from Pyramid Harbour to Rink Rapids, with no cash subsidy, but with a reasonable land grant covering mineral rights. At the time, I referred, by authority, to several of the largest financial firms in London, showing that our ability to build such a line was beyond question.

The answer I received was—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). From them ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. From Sir William Van Horne.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. From those men ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am reading from Mr. Hamilton Smith's letter, quoted by the right hon. Prime Minister; and the Minister of Public Works will see that while there is an ambiguity about it, his solution cannot possibly be correct.

The answer I received was, that the Government might prefer the Stikine-Teslin route.

I have argued to-day, and I can only reason about it, that this was after the conversation between the Minister of the Interior and Sir William Van Horne.

To this I replied that in my judgment, from my familiarity with the country, was correct. The Stikine line had practically no value as a commercial route, and that no sane capitalist would invest a penny in it; but, of course, if the Government would give the right assistance, we would build the line, while disclaiming any responsibility for its value when constructed.

Let me emphasize my point, for I desire to make it, as to my mind it relieves Mr. Hamilton Smith entirely from occupying any questionable position before this House or before the country. Sir William Van Horne's letter does not deny any statement there made. For instance, he does not deny that Mr. Hamilton Smith told him he would build by either route, that he preferred one, but if the Government wanted it, he would build the other. All Sir William Van Horne says is that Mr. Hamilton Smith did not then and there authorize me to make a proposition by you to carry out the work. There, Mr. Hamilton Smith no doubt did not understand the view which Sir William was taking. But to my mind there has been nothing said in debate, there is nothing in this correspondence to show that the statement is not absolutely correct, and it is, that he told Sir William of his readiness and willingness to perform the work, and went no further; he did not make a formal offer or commission Sir William to make it. He then goes on to say :

Doubtless, these informal negotiations were communicated to the Cabinet.

The right hon. Prime Minister says in a letter :

The Hon. Mr. Sifton, to whom I gave immediate communication of this letter, stated that the above assertion was altogether untrue.

I hope the leader of the Government misrepresented what the Minister of the Interior stated to him, because it would place the Minister of the Interior in the position of being the most reckless of men. It would be absolutely impossible for the Minister to state whether that conversation occurred or did not occur. It is not pretended he was present. The conversation was one purporting to have taken place between Sir William Van Horne and Mr. Hamilton Smith. The First Minister goes on to say :

I thereupon invited Mr. Hamilton Smith to meet me this morning in my office, and he accordingly met me there in the presence of a few of my colleagues, and then, in answer to our inquiries, stated that you were the mutual friend who had communicated between him and Mr. Sifton.

The hon. Minister of the Interior says every word of that statement is true. He has said so to-day. He says Sir William was the man who communicated between them. Again :

Under such circumstances, I would feel obliged, if you would let me know at your earliest convenience whether, as is claimed by Mr. Hamilton Smith, you can corroborate his statement.

Now we will see what Sir William Van Horne says in answer to that letter, setting out the statement in detail :

Dear Sir Wilfrid,—In reply to your inquiry of this date, I beg leave to say that I have never communicated to the Hon. Mr. Sifton or anybody else any proposition from Mr. Hamilton Smith concerning the building of a railway towards the Yukon district, nor had I authority from him to make any proposition.

But the Minister of the Interior, confirming that statement, and which in detail is not denied so far as it was a conversation, said that Sir William Van Horne told him that Mr. Hamilton Smith was prepared to call upon him for the purpose of discussing the question of a railway to the Yukon. It is not for me to enter into the relations of Mr. Hamilton Smith or Sir William Van Horne, nor does it much concern the public as to whether good faith was kept by one or the other; but I say that so far as the record is disclosed, Mr. Hamilton Smith having stated what he says he did to Sir William Van Horne, and that not being denied by Sir William, any reasonable man has a right to suppose that during the casual conversation Sir William told the Minister of the Interior what he had told him in regard to his readiness and ability to carry out this work.

THE MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR
(Mr. Sifton). Inasmuch as to what took place in a conversation with myself as has become the subject of discussion in the House, I would have preferred not to have taken part in the debate, but when my hon. friend who has just taken his seat rose to speak, I made up my mind from something which dropped from his lips that it was desirable I should reply to him. At the same time I must confess that before the hon. gentleman sat down the necessity for the reply had apparently disappeared. I desire to call the attention of the House for a moment to the peculiar position in which our friends of the Opposition are placing themselves, and the extraordinary methods of argument to which they are resorting in order to make something out of nothing, because it is apparent that that is the attempt in which they are engaged. In the first place, we have an attempt made to saddle this Government with the responsibility of having received an offer for the construction of a line of railway involving the expenditure of some millions of dollars, which it is not alleged was ever reduced to writing or properly communicated to the Government. When it is considered that the gentleman who is supposed to have made this offer has apparently had a large experience, and has been described by the leader of the Opposition as representing very large and important business houses, hon. members must consider that a ridiculous phase of the proposition has been placed before them, namely, that this gentleman came here, was prepared to make an offer and did make an offer for the construction of a railway but never put it in writing before the Government. On its very face the proposition is silly and is quite contrary to all ordinary business transactions. It is almost enough to make a business man smile when the proposition is made.

Now, I gave an answer to a question, this afternoon, which apparently has afforded hon. gentlemen opposite a certain amount of comfort in their desire to construct something out of nothing. Let me remind my hon. friends of the old Latin maxim, which I will put in English: "From nothing nothing comes." The hon. gentlemen opposite may labour a long time, but they will not succeed in convincing the people of this country that the agent of an important English business house came to the Government of Canada for the purpose of making a proposition, and hung around here for two months, and never wrote that proposition upon a sheet of paper or submitted it to anybody. The other evening, the hon. the leader of the Opposition asked me a question, and I answered it, and I answered it, I presume, in the terms which are stated in the question upon the Order paper to-day: which is substantially correct. I said that gentleman, who, I say now, was Sir William Van Horne, being in my office one morning, said to me, that there was a gentleman named Hamilton Smith who was prepared to call upon me for the purpose of discussing the question of a railway to the Yukon; Sir William Van Horne said: I was asked to mention his name to you; I have mentioned his name to you." Well, Mr. Speaker, that gentleman, Mr. Hamilton Smith, never called. Why, Sir, if the hon. gentleman would, about that time, go to the flat in the Langevin Block where my office is, they would have seen two waiting-rooms filled with gentlemen waiting to see me about the Yukon. I personally never undertook to keep track of them all. I was perfectly willing to interview every one who came in, if I had time to do so, and, if Mr. Hamilton Smith had called on me, I would have discussed the matter with him to the best of my ability, and I would have done as would any Minister who had a grain of sense; I would have communicated to the leader of the Government and to my colleagues the substance of what he had said to me.

Sir William Van Horne went out, after having mentioned Mr. Hamilton Smith's name, and Mr. Hamilton Smith never called, and he never made any proposition, and, therefore, when Mr. Hamilton Smith makes a statement to the effect that he had approached the Minister of the Interior through a mutual friend, offering to build in the year 1898 a substantial railway from Pyramid Harbour to Rink Rapids without any cash subsidy, but with a reasonable land grant covering mineral rights, he made a statement which is altogether untrue—altogether untrue, I say. That, I presume, almost anybody can understand. If a man comes and says, over his signature, to the Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada, that he approached the Minister of the Interior and made an offer, and if that man did not make an offer, and if no offer was made, is his statement true or untrue? Let any member of the House answer that question. It seems to me to be pretty clear that the man's statement is untrue. Now, Mr. Smith said that he made an offer, and he subsequently said that he made it through Sir William Van Horne. Sir William Van Horne says:

I have never communicated with the Hon. Mr. Sifton, or anybody else, any proposition.

Well, he does not say, "offer"; he says, "proposition." Does the one not include the other? Can our friends opposite get any political comfort out of the fact that the word "proposition" and the word "offer" are not exactly the same? Did not "proposition"? Why, certainly not. Sir William Van Horne says, if he had made me an "offer," that he had not made me a "proposition"? Why, certainly not. Sir William Van Horne puts it in the broadest and most general and most comprehensive way, when he says that he never made to me, or to anybody else, any proposition from Mr. Hamilton Smith concerning the building of a railway towards the Yukon district; nor had he any authority to do so.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) allow me to ask him a question?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Certainly.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) say whether Sir William Van Horne discussed with him the substance of Hamilton Smith's proposed proposal, or the proposal that was to be made some time thereafter?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I say, most emphatically, that Sir William Van Horne never discussed with me anything of the kind. I tried to convey the idea to the House pretty clearly, but it seems to be difficult to some of my hon. friends opposite. There never was any proposition made, and so there could not be anything discussed, because it was not made. The only knowledge I had of the name of Mr. Hamilton Smith was when Sir William Van Horne said to me: There is a gentleman named Hamilton Smith who is either going to call upon you, or prepared to call, about a railway to the Yukon; I was asked to mention his name, and I have done so. Mr. Hamilton Smith did not call. The proposition was not made; it could not be discussed, and it was not discussed. It is perfectly clear, I think, therefore, that when Mr. Hamilton Smith made this statement, he made a statement which was untrue. He made a statement which he had the opportunity of retracting, and he refused to retract, and he now stands convicted by two witnesses at least—the only persons who could corroborate or deny the statement—namely, myself and Sir William Van Horne, and both have unequivocally contradicted the statement which has been made by Mr. Hamilton Smith.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that it is necessary for me to say anything more about it. I cannot conceive what our hon. friends opposite are talking about. They are simply playing upon words; they are simply trying to gather some shadow of an argument out of something that does not afford an opportunity to do so. The plain statement is: Mr. Hamilton Smith said he made a proposition. He did not make a proposition, and it has been proven that he did not do so.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). From the remarks of the Minister of the Interior, it will be apparent to the House, that, if there is any quibble upon words in regard to this matter, it is a quibble by hon. gentlemen opposite, and not by Mr. Hamilton Smith. As I understand it, Sir William Van Horne has not denied anything that Mr. Hamilton Smith has said. Mr. Smith has said that he approached the Minister of the Interior, offering certain things, and he mentions at once that he understood that these informal negotiations were communicated to the Cabinet. Has Sir William Van Horne said anything which is in the slightest degree contradictory of that? The Minister of the Interior has frankly told us that what transpired at the conversation between Sir William Van Horne and himself was this: That Sir William Van Horne told him, either that a gentleman would call or was prepared to call for the purpose of making an offer to construct the railway. Now, according to the Minister of the Interior himself, this was a matter affecting to the greatest possible extent the interests of the Yukon country and of the Dominion, and the Minister was told, according to his own statement, that a gentleman representing English capitalists of the very highest standing was prepared to call upon him for the purpose of making an offer with regard to this important project. And what does the Minister of the Interior do? One would suppose that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton), if he had the interests of the country and of his department at heart, would himself take steps to communicate with Mr. Hamilton Smith. One would suppose that, if an offer of that kind had been suggested to him, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) might, in the intervals of his conversations with these gentlemen who were calling at his office, have taken five minutes to dictate a letter to his secretary, asking Mr. Hamilton Smith, if he had any offer with regard to that matter, to submit it to him. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) is in a hurry to as speedily as possible close this deal with Mann & Mackenzie, and so he closed it only eight days before Parliament opens.

It does seem very remarkable to me that the communication to Lord Strathcona sent by the right hon. the Prime Minister, was yesterday of such a character that it could properly be submitted to the House, and to-day has changed its character so that it cannot be submitted. It also seems a remarkable thing to me—I may be mistaken about it—that, if the communication sent to Lord Strathcona was of the private and confidential character which has been suggested by the right hon. gentleman, that he should have seen fit to submit the answer to it to the press of this country, knowing very well, or understanding very well—if his statement in the House is to be relied upon to-day—that the communication, an answer to which it was, could not be submitted to the House. I do not think hon. gentlemen on either side of the House can come to the conclusion that that is dealing fairly with Mr. Hamilton Smith; and, as Mr. Hamilton Smith cannot make his defence in this House, I think the right hon. leader of the Government should give him the fair-play that is always due to a man who is not here to speak for himself.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Now, there are three things that are apparent: In the first place, that Mr. Hamilton Smith had some conversation with Sir William Van Horne about this matter since these negotiations commenced—that cannot be controverted; in the second place, that Sir William Van Horne had some conversation with the hon. the Minister of the Interior about it; and, in the third place, that the suggestion to the Minister of the Interior was not acted upon in any way by him, although it had an important bearing on a subject that has been discussed in this House at great length. Now, I do not think the country cares very much whether or not there was any misunderstanding between Mr. Hamilton Smith and Sir William Van Horne or between Sir William Van Horne and the Minister of the Interior. But what the country does care about is this: whether or not there was a man with competent financial backing who was prepared to build this railway for one-fourth of the land which the Government propose to give to Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie; and if hon. gentlemen opposite think that the country is to be deluded by any question of a misunderstanding between these gentlemen, when the real question in the case is whether or not there was a bona fide offer, they are very much mistaken. It will not do to meet the country with any quibble about misunderstandings or about confidential communications which cannot be brought before this House. What the country wants to know is whether Mr. Hamilton Smith has behind him men who are prepared to build this railway for 1,000,000 acres of land. Outside of that the country does not care one sixpence whether there was a misunderstanding between these gentlemen or not. The country also wants to know whether the Minister of the Interior was properly performing his duty the other day when, knowing that Mr. Hamilton Smith, with capitalists behind him was prepared to make this offer, he would not take five minutes of his valuable time to consider it.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to call the attention of the House to a statement in regard to Mr. Hamilton Smith contained in the "Monetary Times," a paper which I believe is in accord with the politics of hon. gentlemen opposite, from which it will be seen how the people, from a monetary standpoint and apart from the political aspects of the case, view this Mr. Hamilton Smith. Of course, we expect to hear the hon. leader of the Opposition talk in this House about this most respectable gentleman, this man of great financial standing; but I want to show what the people of this country think of the offer that was made by this man of such great ability and such wonderful financial power. According to the statement made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Borden, Halifax) Mr.

Hamilton Smith complained that the Government did not seek after him. Well, I do not think it is the business of the Government to run after men like Mr. Hamilton Smith. This Government can just as easily be approached by Mr. Hamilton Smith as the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). But Mr. Hamilton Smith sat in the gallery of this House in the afternoons, and every communication that has been given to the country was given by him to hon. gentlemen opposite, and not to the Government. He has never made a proposition in writing to the Government. The only proposition he made was given out by another member who represents one of the Yorks. Now, let me say that Mr. Hamilton Smith went out into the Yukon country in company with young Mr. Onderdonk, and they examined the country together; and when young Mr. Onderdonk returned, the first thing that happened to him on his arrival in Hamilton was to be interviewed on the proposed railway in the Yukon country. Of course, he condemned the Government, because, if you remember, his father was "my friend Onderdonk," of the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition; and this young man is associated with Mr. Hamilton Smith. In the "Monetary Times," Mr. Hamilton Smith is termed, "Mr. Hamilton Smith, who represents a New York company"—not an English company, not the Rothschilds. It says:

Mr. Hamilton Smith, who represents a New York company, and talks a good deal about the Rothschilds, in a letter to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, offers on behalf of his associates, to build a railway from the Lynn Canal, on the Dalton route, 288 miles, for a subsidy of 1,000,000 acres of land. He makes it a condition that no other railway from the Lynn Canal be authorized within the year, and that he be authorized to charge "proper traffic rates." He also offers to build a railway by the Stikine-Teslin route for a subsidy of 2,000,000 acres. He claims, on the basis of Mr. Jennings's report, that the provisional contract let to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann will absorb 4,500,000. If Mr. Smith be in earnest he should have made his proposal in a formal way before the provisional contract for the Stikine-Teslin road created the actual complications.

Now, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) would like the Government to go around and peddle their offer throughout the country to Mr. Hamilton Smith or other contractors, simply because Mr. Hamilton Smith comes down here and makes a fake offer—I cannot give it any other name. Speaking on my responsibility as a member, from my place in the House, I say that no contractor of any standing would make a serious offer which he intended to fulfil without putting it in writing; and no company, to say nothing of a Government, would accept a proposition, particularly a verbal proposition, from a man who was hob-nobbing with the members of the Opposition and simply trying to put the Government in a fix. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) bemoans the fact that Mr. Hamilton Smith is not able to reply. Mr. Hamilton Smith simply made the offer, and ran off to New York, and he is now on the Atlantic.

An hon. MEMBER. No, he is here.

Mr. GIBSON. Very well, whether he is on the Atlantic or in this House, he has plenty of friends on the Opposition side of this House, and we have an opportunity this afternoon of judging how much they think of Mr. Hamilton Smith and his offer. The fact of the matter is this, Mr. Speaker, their bubble has "busted"; the whole thing has been exploded. When I left for the west on Friday, I was told that we were going to have something of a wonderful character brought down to the House by the gentlemen who were advocating the case of Mr. Hamilton Smith and his Yankee partner Onderdonk—and perhaps some of our friends on the other side would like to be taken in with them.

An hon. MEMBER. They are in now.

Mr. GIBSON. They are in now. They simply wanted to embarrass the Government. That is all that this whole matter amounted to from the beginning to the end. I was told before leaving for the west last week that we were going to have some great revelations brought before the House on Monday, and it is rather singular to find that these so-called revelations should come from the two members representing the Yorks in Ontario and the Yorks in New Brunswick, and I shall leave the House and the country to judge how much these gentlemen are in accord with their leader, judging by some of the remarks we have heard from them in this House. But I say that no man occupying the position as a member of this House could declare that this Mr. Hamilton Smith has made a bona fide offer to the Government and repeat that before his constituents. There is nothing in black and white to which these men could be held. What then would be the result of negotiating with them? The Government, after they had solemnly agreed to a contract, subject to the ratification of Parliament, would have simply opened up negotiations which would have caused no end of delay, and the result of which would have been that instead of this man coming up and confirming his offer by entering into a solemn contract, the whole summer would be absorbed by the Government in looking after Mr. Smith and his phantom associates and security in New York State, and the railway would never be built in time for the coming season's business.

Mr. POWELL. There is one thing on which the House is thoroughly satisfied, and that is that the hon. gentleman who has just sat down has "busted the bubble," to use his own expression. He says that gentllemen on this side are evidently anxious to be on the ground floor with the gentlemen who made the offer to the Government which the Government failed to entertain. I would ask the House if it is a perfect bonanza to be on the ground floor with the gentlemen who offered to construct this road for one million acres of land, what kind of a bonanza would it not be to be on the ground floor with the gentlemen who have got the contract for 4,000,000 acres.

Mr. GIBSON. I would not like the hon. gentleman to put words in my mouth which I did not say, and I hope he will forgive me for correcting him. I never made any reference to the value, but what I said was that there was no contract, but simply a "fake" offer from Mr. Smith.

Mr. POWELL. Then I fail to understand still further what the hon. gentleman was aiming at. An offer, as I understand, has already been made, and if there is any fakeism about it, what object can hon. gentlemen on this side have in seeking to be partners with Smith? That may be very clear to the hon. gentleman, but it is rather puzzling to myself.

Hon. gentlemen on this side are rather astonished that a gentleman who plumes himself on his title of knight (Sir Louis Davies) should be so far forgetful of the principles of honour as to defame a man unnecessarily and who is not present to defend himself. Such conduct may be looked upon as akin to that of the right hon. leader of the Government who fails to recognize any moral obligation to keep his word. The principle of elongated veracity, which seems so characteristic of that hon. gentleman, so far as keeping his promises is concerned, is only equalled by the tortuous principles of honour which are so characteristic of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies).

Just a word in reply to my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), and it was for this purpose alone I rose. As soon as this offer was made, I made some inquiries, in case these gentlemen who made the offer might have some speculative purpose in view, as to their financial substantiality. I found, in answer to my inquiries, that the gentlemen who made this offer to the Government—and I went to great trouble and took the greatest pains to find out their financial standing—are rated as follows:—I found that Mr. Hamilton Smith is a gentleman who is entrusted in England with a contract amounting in value to £4,000,000 sterling—that is about $20,000,000, or about six times what it is calculated by the Government will be sufficient to build this Yukon Railway. He has associated with him in this offer a gentleman by the name of Harry Mosenthal. That gentleman, I find on application to the banking community, is the head of the large firm of Mosenthal Bros., and is reputed to be worth, in his own name, no less a sum than $5,000,000 or £1,000,000 sterling.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And not in New York.

Mr. POWELL. No, in London. I also find that he has associated with him in this offer a gentleman—and he is not a New York man either—by the name of J. H. Lukach, who signs on behalf of an exploration company which has a paid up capital of £1,100,000 sterling, and whose assets are estimated at no less a sum than £2,000,000 sterling. In addition to these, I find, among the applicants for this contract, Mr. Herbert Gibbs who, I am informed, is a member of the firm of Anthony Gibbs & Sons. Their exact rating I was not able to obtain, but I found that they are one of the most reliable and richest houses in London. Then I come to Mr. Lionel Phillips, another of the applicants, who is a member of the firm of Wernhor, Beid & Company, who are rated as the very richest financial firm in the whole city of London. The next gentleman I find on the list of Mr. Smith's associates is Lord Farquhar. It may be that the hon. gentleman from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) looks upon him as an American, but he was the late head of the firm of Sir Samuel Scott & Company, and was a partner in that firm with the Duke of Fife. He is, I understand, one of the rich men of England. When such men as these make an offer to the Government, all the Government have to do to prevent "fakeism" is to accept their offer; this done, there is a contract, and these men are pledged to carry it out. On the question as to whether Sir William Van Horne or Mr. Smith speaks the truth, or as to whether the ingenuity of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) is equal to the herculean task of proving that this gentleman, Mr. Smith, must necessarily and of malice aforethought be directly guilty of mendacity, I shall express no opinion, but this I shall say, that this country is going to hold these gentlemen responsible for throwing away no less than 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 acres of the richest gold fields to Mackenzie & Mann unnecessarily, when they reject an offer from men of such proved financial standing as those I have mentioned to build this railway for 1,000,000 acres. I think that the Government should take warning by the elections of yesterday. If by any possibility there could be submitted another contract after the Drummond deal and the Yukon deal, that strong right arm, as the right hon. leader of the Government was pleased to call the Hardy Government, would become withered, if not absolutely dead.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I desire just to say a word or two in reply to the hon. gentleman. I must say that, so far as his remarks about the country being in such a state are concerned, there is no proof of his statement. I had a little experience during the past week of the feeling in the country, and I must say that I did not hear the Yukon matter mentioned once. The hon. gentleman who sits beside my hon. friend and who could have instructed him, told me that if the present Opposition had not been so foolish as to take the stand they did, the Ontario Government would have been defeated. It seemed to me that the more my hon. friend tried to prove, the less he proved. If all this money, which he mentioned, is at the back of these people, Mr. Smith and his associates, then why had they not sufficient business ability to make an offer?

Mr. McDOUGALL. They could not get into the auction room; the door was not open.

Mr. FRASER. I submit that if they did not know enough to be aware that there is a Minister and a Government, and a mail, and many other means of communication, I would only ask them to go to the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) and he would tell them. Just think of it—all this money at his back, and yet Mr. Smith did not make an offer. The evidence is irresistible that he did not. We have the testimony of two witnesses against him, and that being the case I submit that when Mr. Smith says he is associated with these other people he is not to be believed. Once you show that a man makes a misstatement—and he has clearly done so—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. FRASER. Oh, well, hon. gentlemen opposite may say "No," but the Minister of the Interior says that Sir William Van Horne told him that Mr. Smith was going to call upon him. Now I call the attention of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) to that. How rich we lawyers would get on that basis. One of us is told: A rich client is going to call upon you tomorrow; but the client never has sense enough to call. The statement of Sir William Van Horne simply was that Mr. Hamilton Smith would call. The legal acumen of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) enabled him to see the difficulty at once. This discussion started upon a question whether Mr. Smith had made an offer or not, and the hon. member for Halifax saw that there was no chance for his arguing upon that. So he says that the Government should have run after this man.

Mr. BERGERON. Why not?

Mr. FRASER. That appears to be the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Bergeron's) idea of how this affair should have been conducted. Was Mr. Smith interested in getting a contract? Was it a good thing for him to get a million acres of land? If so, surely he would have been sufficiently interested to go to the Government. After his conversation with Sir William Van Horne he must have known the place to go to. Why, then, did not he call? Will the hon. member for Halifax say seriously that the Government ought to have sought him after Sir William Van Horne said that he was going to call upon them.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The conversation as given by the Minister of the Interior, amounted to this: That Sir William Van Horne informed the Minister that Mr. Hamilton Smith was prepared to call upon him. What I suggested was, if he knew this gentleman was prepared to call upon him with an offer of that kind, it was his duty to communicate with him.

Mr. FRASER. That makes the case all the stronger. If Mr. Smith were prepared to call, then there was no reason why he should not call immediately. If he were ready there was no reason why he should not have been there next morning. The surprising thing is that Sir William Van Horne did not say: I am ready to bring this man now if you will receive him. When I hear of the admirable financial backing of this man, of the rich men he had behind him, the question naturally arises with me whether these men were not in earnest or whether they had not enough confidence in Mr. Smith to authorize him to make an offer. To bring this case home, suppose that the leader of the Opposition was told that a deputation was ready to wait upon him to ask him to take a certain position upon some public question, would the hon. leader of the Opposition seek out those parties? If they were in earnest, they would call upon him. This discussion started upon the issue whether Mr. Hamilton Smith had made an offer before the present contract was entered into by the Government. That is clearly disproved, and, therefore, the whole question is outside the cognizance of this House.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Our hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) has laid great stress upon the fact that the gentleman upon whom we have had so much discussion, Mr. Hamilton Smith, failed to call upon the Government or to make a proposition to them. My hon. friend wants to know why Mr. Smith did not call, that is an interesting question. But it suggests a great many fellow-questions. For instance, why did not a great many other persons make offers? We are told that there are at least twenty contractors in Canada alone who are capable of carrying out this work, perhaps more than that; and that in Canada, Great Britain and the United States, there are probably a hundred parties quite competent to handle it. Why did all of these men, who, presumably, would take a good thing if they got it, neglect or fail to call upon the Government. Perhaps it would be better in the interest of the country if the hon. member for Guysborough would put the question in another way and ask: Why did not the Government call for tenders? How is it that even Mr. Maitland Kersey, who was in Ottawa anxious for an opportunity to make an offer and representing sufficient capital to carry out this work, went away exceedingly disappointed, having entirely failed to get an opportunity to communicate with the Government.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). That is not what his letter says.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). That is the report published.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Has my hon. friend (Mr. Bell) read his letter?

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The fact is that no person got an opportunity to have communication with the Government. The Government in fact have informed the House that it was their deliberate purpose that no person should have such an opportunity. In the speech in which the Minister of Railways moved the first reading of this Bill and opened the discussion on this question, he stated that owing to urgency it was the deliberate purpose of the Government not to call for tenders, not to allow parties to make offers, but to confine themselves entirely to negotiations with Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie. And, in the course of the debate it has been brought out that no definite proposition was ever made by Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie. The statement was made in this House by a gentleman representing the Government, that various informal discussions took place, and finally after much discussion the Government succeeded—if we are to believe the hon. Minister of Railways—in beating Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie down to these terms on which this contract has been concluded with them. Therefore, it is not at all surprising that the Government, having deliberately refrained from calling for tenders, should confine their negotiations entirely to this firm of Mackenzie & Mann, which they had chosen for some reason which they have not communicated to the House and the country. So they were prepared to refuse Mr. Hamilton Smith had he made an offer. This is a portion, but not a very material portion, of the matter immediately under discussion. This discussion arises through the refusal of the Premier to lay before Parliament and publish to the people of Canada a telegram which, yesterday, he promised to lay before us and make public. He must have known yesterday whether or not it was in the interest of the people of Canada that they should receive the information which he to-day denies them. How is Parliament, how are the people to reach a reasonable conclusion as to the propriety of the reply given by Lord Strathcona, if they do not know the question that was asked him by the Government? It is perfectly competent for the Premier to take refuge behind the assertion that in this matter he is free to act as he pleases. But it seems a rather singular way of conducting public business to say that the communication he sends to the High Commissioner is of a private character, while the reply is not of a private character.

Now, we might perhaps spend more time in such ingenious vagaries as our hon. friend the member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) indulged in a little while ago, in wondering what could be the nature of this telegram, what could be the contents of this telegram, which apparently it is so important to the Government not to submit to the people, that the Premier has chosen deliberately to place himself in a peculiar position, and moreover to place the Government in a peculiar and embarrassing position, by refusing to lay it on the Table of the House. That is, to my mind, by far the most important matter in this connection. It is the point from which we start. Now, a great deal of special pleading has been indulged in, and a great deal of perversion and verbal equivocation have been indulged in, in the endeavour to cast discredit upon Mr. Hamilton Smith on the part of the Government. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has gone so far as to make a statement about that gentleman, using his privilege of Parliament, which I do not think he will venture to make outside of Parliament, or as a private citizen.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He would not dare to do it.

Mr. BELL. The fact brought out here by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), the recitation of the character and the financial strength of Mr. Smith and his associates, show that Mr. Smith is not a man of that kind, nor are his associates men of that kind, to whom one could safely address in private life such insulting remarks as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has chosen to address to him behind his protection as a member of Parliament. Now, a good deal of stress has been laid upon the fact that Sir William Van Horne has denied absolutely the statements made by Mr. Hamilton Smith. Well, I must say that according to my knowledge of the sense of the words employed, that is not an argument that can be successfully made. In the first place, there has been a good deal of discussion as to the relative meaning of the words "offer" and "proposition." The Minister of the Interior laid down the very extraordinary doctrine that the word "proposition" was more comprehensive than the general word "offer," that it included offer, whereas offer would not include proposition. Now, according to my knowledge of the meaning of words, and the customary use made of them, I think "offer" is the most general term that could be employed; and that proposition is a word which implies such details, such particularities and such necessary fixity of purpose, that it is the term usually employed in describing business propositions, strictly business communications. You find the word used continually to define and to specify a certain class of offers which from their nature, from their precision, and from the fact that they are limited, are of a specific business character, such as a man must abide by, and from which he cannot depart. Now, there has been a great deal of equivocation. The Minister of Agriculture, for instance, takes the ground that the Minister of the Interior had not, in the admission he made to-day that he was approached by Sir William Van Horne, contradicted the statement that he made in the course of his speech in this House on the Yukon Bill. If I am not mistaken, that was with reference to the positive statement made by the Minister of the Interior, that no proposition had been made to the Government by the Rothschilds, and therefore it is clear that it is not a contradiction. But when the Minister of the Interior admits that Sir William Van Horne approached him on behalf of Mr. Hamilton Smith and told him that Mr. Hamilton Smith was prepared to go to him and make an offer, that does not contradict what was stated by the Minister of the Interior when he said that the Rothschilds had not made an offer. Nothing could be more evident, they referred to entirely different things, and so far beyond them that, instead of casting doubt upon Mr. Smith, they sustain his veracity, because, among other things that Mr. Smith has stated is the fact, which he absolutely states, that the offer made by him was not an offer on behalf of the Rothschilds. I believe it would be very much more to the interests of the country if the Government, instead of being able to say that they had stood on their dignity and had not run after Mr. Hamilton Smith to ask him to make an offer, had been in a position to say: We did go to Mr. Smith to see what he would do. It would be much more to their credit if they were able to say that they had gone to every other person whom they had reason to believe was of such financial ability as to be able to take hold successfully of such a work, and had asked him to make an offer. We have now this offer made last week by Mr. Hamilton Smith, by which, if accepted, they would have saved 3,000,000 acres of the mineral lands in the North-west, and in which, notwithstanding the remarks of the hon. member for Guysborough, the people of this country are very much interested indeed. Of course it is not likely that we will reach any very satisfactory conclusion here as to what should be done. We say on this side of the House that the duty of the Government was to have taken every offer they could get, to have made access to them as easy as possible. They say that was not their purpose, they say their purpose was to make it impossible for any other person to come to them, and they give a reason for it. The whole tenor of the speech of the Minister of Railways and Canals in introducing this Bill, was that in taking that course the Government had taken the right course. Well, if they had relied upon that defence, if they had said: Mr. Smith, technically speaking, may have been said to have made an offer to us, but precisely he did not make an offer, he did not come to us and we did not go to him, if they had relied upon the statement originally made by him that it was not their purpose to go into the market and look for contractors to do this work cheaply, if they had relied upon the statement that they could secure the completion of this work more in the interest of the country by not taking tenders, if they had continued to urge that plea, to press the plea of urgency, you could understand the ground upon which they stood. But what is the position now? Now they have shifted from that position. I would point out this fact, that they have entered upon a futile undertaking in endeavouring to discredit the offer of Mr. Hamilton Smith, by attempting to prove either that he lacks veracity, or that he lacks financial ability. That is a work that the Government will inevitably fail in accomplishing. The more they endeavour to carry that work to a successful completion the more will they arouse suspicion in the country. People will ask why it is that this gentleman, whom facts stated here show to be a man of great financial strength, with associates of great financial strength, failed to come into communication with the Government. There is no doubt he made a reasonable attempt to do so, he employed a mutual friend for that purpose; but after informing the Government that he was ready to make that offer, he apparently never received an opportunity to make it, and the end of it was that he was compelled to come in at the last moment with his offer. He has made an offer which unquestionably must be contrasted with the offer the Government have decided to accept; and I believe that any attempt to induce the people of Canada to think that this is a fake offer, an offer not to be considered because an endeavour is made to show that Mr. Hamilton Smith has failed in the matter of veracity, has been guilty of prevarication, is bound to fail most conspicuously. There is more reason, a great deal, in my mind, to believe that in this matter there might be room for suspicion that the gentleman who went between the parties in this matter might have had some interest in not doing more than, perhaps, complying in a measurable way with the wishes of Mr. Hamilton Smith. It cannot be denied that Sir William Van Horne did carry out the wishes of Mr. Hamilton Smith in conveying, in a sense, to the Minister of the Interior the offer that Mr. Smith had made. But it is not at all in evidence that he did more than that; and it may be that Sir William Van Horne held the same opinion at the time he made that offer, or entered into that conversation, that he apparently held when he wrote the letter which has been printed and read in this House to-day, saying that he had not authority to make a proposition. Well, there can be no question at all about that, I think. Sir William Van Horne ought to be the best judge of what authority he had, and how far he was warranted in going on the strength of a conversation held with Mr. Smith. But the fact that he is in a position to state that he had not authority to make a proposition does not at all contradict Mr. Smith's statement that he conveyed an intimation to the Government that he was prepared and willing to make them an offer. There is no contradiction there at all. I think that, finally, a great deal turns in this discussion upon the specific use of the words, and I think a good deal of attention might be well directed to the selection by Sir William Van Horne of the peculiar words he used. He had "no authority," he says. Now, it is quite competent for a gentleman in conversation with another to make a proposition and to say to him: I will be pleased if you will communicate that to another person; and that gentleman would be perfectly competent to turn about and say at a later stage in the negotiations: I had no authority to make any proposition. He might not even be required to go the length of saying that he had no written authority; he might say: I had no verbal authority. I was not explicitly authorized to make any proposition to the Government. The result of the whole discussion, I think, is this, that after threshing this matter out as we have done, the fact remains that it is proven, first of all, that Mr. Hamilton Smith was correct in saying that he had communicated with the Government through a mutual friend; secondly, that that mutual friend, Sir William Van Horne, did make that communication to the Minister of the Interior. But what is required to substantiate everything said by Mr. Smith himself or by his friends? Not another word. Every material statement made by Mr. Hamilton Smith is proved either over the signature of Sir William Van Horne or by the admissions of the hon. Minister of the Interior in this House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to say a few words on this question before the debate closes. It is quite clear to me that the Opposition are trying to create an impression in the public mind of this Dominion, that an offer has been made by Mr. Hamilton Smith to construct this railway. I would recommend hon. gentlemen, if they want to get at the bottom of this affair, to place a notice on the Order paper asking the Government to lay on the Table all offers received for the construction of a railway in the Yukon. Mr. Hamilton Smith's offer would then come down with the rest, if any offer was made. It is apparent that the leader of the Opposition has been over-anxious and over-zealous in trying to raise difficulties in the way of the Government carrying through this measure. From his extended parliamentary experience, no doubt, he thought it would be a capital move if some man could be induced to make a tender very much below the terms of the contract proposed to be entered into with Mackenzie & Mann; and Mr. Hamilton Smith evidently was willing to allow himself to be used. He was willing to be made a tool of for the moment in order to carry out what, no doubt, the leader of the Opposition considered would be a decided party advantage, if he could only get it accomplished. Mr. Hamilton Smith went a certain distance; but, unfortunately for the Opposition, he did not go far enough. When it came to placing his proposition in black and white, Mr. Smith did not do it. He did not go so far as to have an interview with the Minister of the Interior. He sent word by a high dignitary that he wanted an interview with the Minister, that he intended to have an interview, but he gave no intimation as to whether he proposed to put in an offer or not. At all events, that idea was not communicated to the Minister of the Interior. Mr. Smith went a certain length. If the leader of the Opposition had been in his place, he would, no doubt, have gone "the whole hog;" but Mr. Smith backed down and did not go the length of placing himself in the unenviable position of implicating financial friends in England, when in reality, he had no power or right to do anything of the kind. The leader of the Opposition used him very well to the length he would go. Hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to show that an offer was made by Mr. Smith to build the road, and that 2,000,000 acres of land would have been saved, if that offer had been accepted. The most stupid elector will see through the fallacy, and the humbug that the Opposition are trying to practice with respect to this whole scheme. They have spent the whole afternoon with the hope of laying down grounds on which they could arraign the Government for recklessness in closing a bargain without giving an opportunity to Mr. Hamilton Smith to make an offer, and in endeavouring to show that he was anxious and earnest to make an offer to build the road at a less price. But Mr. Smith had not enough stamina to go forward and make a distinct offer to build the road. The result is, that hon. gentlemen opposite now find themselves in the position of realizing that the bubble is burst, or, as an old member of this House said on a memorable occasion, there is nothing to it. Hon. gentlemen opposite have laboured to convey this impression to the public, but, when they go to the country and attempt to show that any blame attaches to the Government and that this is a proposition that should not be carried out, they will utterly fail.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, is a business man, and the leader of the House claims that this Government is a business Government. Let us apply business principles to this transaction of letting this contract and the dealings of the Government with Mr. Smith. We will suppose that there are three gentlemen who are trustees of a large estate. They employ an agent to dispose of that estate. The people of this country have entrusted this business Government with the lands of the North-west, and the Yukon, and all the public lands, the Government acting as trustees. They employ the Minister of the Interior to look after the Crown lands and to act practically as their agent. Private trustees, in a business transaction, appoint an agent to dispose of their lands. If a gentleman comes along and makes an offer for a certain tract, the agent considers the offer and may be disposed to accept it. Another party, however, says: I know a gentleman who is prepared to make a better offer. Whose duty would it be to go to that other party? If the agent should accept the first offer, what would be the opinion of the trustees? It would be that the transaction looked as if the agent got a slice, and the trustees would decide that the agent should not dispose of any more of their land. What will the people say, when they find that the trustees to whom they have committed the entire lands of the country have acted in a similar way? The Minister receives an offer to build a railway for a bonus of certain lands. He is informed that other gentlemen are prepared to make a better offer. Would it not be the Minister's duty, as it would be the duty of an agent for private individuals or trustees, to place himself in communication with these parties and say: We understand you are prepared to make an offer. Have the Government acted on business principles? They have simply acted in such a way that the people have a right to say that the transaction looks suspicious, to say the least of it; and private individuals or trustees of an estate would dismiss an agent who transacted business as the Minister of the Interior has transacted business connected with dealings with the lands of the country.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY— MR. HAMILTON SMITH'S PROPOSAL.

Mr. POPE. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, we were engaged in discussing a very important question upon the motion to adjourn. The hon. gentlemen on the other side, or rather some of them outside of the Cabinet who chose to participate in the defence of the unfortunate position occupied by the right hon. the leader of the Government, have been trying to defend a bad case. True, not many independent members on the other side of the House rose to offer a defence of the Ministry in their peculiar position, but we find the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) equal to the occasion. I am quite sure that since the last general election even that hon. gentleman himself will recognize that he is hardly an independent member. Immediately after the elections, and when his party got into power, he was ambitious for a ministerial portfolio, but not succeeding I understand that he was then to have gone to handle the delicate scales of justice upon the bench of his native province. Later, however, the story is, that he will soon occupy a gubernatorial mansion in the west. Be that as it may I trust that the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) has not crowded out of that very comfortable lodging the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), for most of the hon. members of this House would rejoice to visit the latter hon. gentleman at Regina. I am sorry to learn that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) intimated in the House the other evening that he did not intend to be Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories, but if that be so I would remind the hon. gentleman that it creates a breach of contract between himself and myself, because he had already arranged for first quality cigars, &c., upon my visit to that section of the country. I trust that he will be faithful to the agreement entered into with me outside of this House and afford me the opportunity of calling on him at Government House.

Now, Sir, it has been stated here, and great stress has been laid upon it by hon. gentlemen opposite, that in connection with Mr. Hamilton Smith's case, we have no written proposition, no written document tendered to the Government in the early stages of Mr. Smith's inquiry as to whether his proposition would be received or not. I do not myself place much importance upon that. If Mr. Hamilton Smith had become acquainted with the fact that there were negotiations going on between the Government and contractors for the construction of this road, he must have learned it through some avenue of information of which the general public was ignorant. It must have been told to him that those negotiations were of a quiet and private character, and that the contract or bargain would be made without the public being aware of it. Under those circumstances Mr. Hamilton Smith must have seen that the bargain should be handled in a very delicate manner, and there is nothing strange to me in the fact, that knowing Sir William Van Horne he should have asked that gentleman to inquire of the Government whether they would be prepared to receive or entertain a proposition from him. Not having received any reply from the Government to the effect that they would be prepared to receive his proposition—and under the circumstances in which this deal was brought about and in which this contract is being forced upon the country and upon this House—it would have been most astonishing if Mr. Smith would have offered a proposition, for he had no friendly communication direct with the Government of the day such as some gentlemen who are closely allied with this contract evidently did have. But, Sir, the Minister of Railways told us when he introduced the Bill that he had laboured earnestly and hard, and that the whole Government had exerted their power in order to bring down the demands of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and to compromise as far as possible with these contractors. We are bound to believe from this statement that the Government did make desperate efforts behind the curtains to bring the contractors down to the terms of the present contract, and if that be true, one would think that the Government could have gone a little further in trying to get a good bargain for the country. No man will say—I do not care whether it is the First Minister or the last Minister, or no Minister at all—no man will say that Hamilton Smith does not represent great capital, and that no man travelling through this country to-day or to-morrow has more capital at all times under his command for proper investment than has Mr. Smith. Under these circumstances, and knowing that Mr. Hamilton Smith was prepared to make them an offer, or was prepared to see them, then when the Government were putting forth these strenuous efforts which they claim were in the interests of the country, why, forsooth, did they not at least endeavour to have an interview with Hamilton Smith, even though they were bound—under some peculiar circumstances that have yet to be explained and that the future history of this country has to reveal—even though they were bound to Mackenzie & Mann, and tied down to bar out all others. Even if it were only to bring these contractors to the position which the hon. gentleman himself admitted he would like to have brought them to, to agree to a better contract in the interests of the people of this country, I do not see why hon. gentlemen did not call upon Mr. Hamilton Smith to submit his proposition.

Now, this debate arose from a very singular position, which had been repeatedly referred to, and which, I think, will stand being referred to again and again. The right hon. First Minister stated in this House, only yesterday, that to-day he would lay on the Table of the House a certain telegram which he himself had sent to Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal; and every citizen of this country who esteems the honour, and integrity, and word of the First Minister of Canada, would expect to see that promise fulfilled and the message forthcoming. The right hon. gentleman gives us the answer which was published; but the message which was promised yesterday, is not forthcoming to-day—why? Mr. Speaker, somebody has been consulted; the wiser head has been interviewed. Another gallant knight, who sits on the front benches, who is the boss of the circus, has been asked, and he says, "Don't you do it; the wording would be a give-way. Sir Wilfrid, don't you venture;" and, of course, actor as the Prime Minister is—and we are bound to say, a more or less successful actor—he thought the dignity of his position and his honour were at stake, and he would stand behind that and refuse to give the message to the people of this country. Sir, the honour and the dignity of the Prime Minister of Canada is precisely what the people of this country make it. What was once said by the right hon. gentleman, "I am a Democrat up to the hilt," holds as good to-day as it did on the day he uttered it; and, if the right hon. gentleman supposes that, as Prime Minister of this country, he possesses greater integrity than the people he represents, I say he is standing on an uncertain footing, of which, sooner or later, the people of this country will remind him. A people are always true to those who do not forget their position; but they are always jealous of public servants, no matter how great or important they may be, who, even from a desire to shield their Government or their party, even for a moment forget to be frank, honest and straightforward, and neglect to fulfil to-morrow the promise they make to-day. When a Government come to that position, they will be called down by the people, and will be called to a reckoning at the earliest opportunity.

Having been refused that message, Mr. Speaker, we are compelled to indulge in speculation as to what it contained that was so fatal to hon. gentlemen opposite that they dare not give it to the public press and to the people of this country; and I presume I have as much right to speculate upon it as any other member of this House. I would say that there must have been something in that message which would indicate that, if this man Hamilton Smith was a responsible man, worthy of the confidence of the Government, from a financial standpoint, his proposition would be entertained by hon. gentlemen opposite even at this late stage. If that be true, and if that message was shown to the boss of the circus, the gallant knight from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), he must have immediately said: "It will not do for you to read that message. If you give that to the House, if you lend that information to the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, it will prove that this is an open bargain, which is capable of being dealt with, and we shall be showered with offers from contractors from various parts of the world to give us all and more than all we will gain by this contract, and for far less money—aye, for half or one-fourth of the money value we are giving under this contract." Well, Sir, the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House had a moment of meditation last night—a moment of deep and thoughtful meditation. A few people were speaking in one part of Canada, and hon. gentlemen did not like the sound of their voices. Those people had been reading and listening, and they tried to speak; but, weighed down as no electorate was ever weighed down before, by the patronage and the tyranny, as you may call it, of two governments, they had to speak under that tremendous load; but still, hon. gentlemen know that they have spoken. They have spoken emphatically, and some of them are still whispering; and until they get done whispering, hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House do not feel certain of their position. Under these circumstances, I say, we have to speculate. Would it have been possible that Lord Strathcona could have received some such message as this: "Hamilton Smith's offer fatal to us in Ontario elections; Hamilton Smith represents himself as Rothschilds' agent; cable he is not at once, otherwise my right arm will be amputated." Could a message of that character have found itself trickling along under the deep waters of the Atlantic, and meeting the timely hands of our old friend and colleague in this House, Lord

Strathcona? Every man who knows the genial and versatile character of that hon. gentleman's political career, knows how kindly disposed he would be to all parties. He would be the precise man to trust with a delicate message of this kind. I know of no hon. gentleman anywhere who would be more willing or anxious to serve those who keep him where he is than Lord Strathcona. Not that he requires the position, but he is a business man. "Business is business" with him, even in his old age; and, Sir, as he sits over there in those sumptuous parlors, enjoying the leisure and the dignity of his position as representative of a country which is no longer a colony but a nation, he knows that his name will be mentioned in cablegrams, which will be laid or be refused to be laid, as the case may be, on the Table of this House, that he will still be kept alive in history, and that if he were to go out of that position, his future life—be it long, as I hope it will be, or short, as I hope it will not be—will be closed, so far as the career of diplomacy and politics is concerned. Thus still with him "business is business." Under all these circumstances, enjoying his position over there—and everybody who has had the pleasure of being received by the High Commissioner knows full well the enjoyment he has in his position—he was the gentleman to entrust with that message. Possibly, a message may have crossed the wires, not so carefully worded, because it is not all members of the Government sitting opposite who are so careful of the words they use—they do not all handle the English language so delicately as does the right hon. First Minister; some of them have two arms and strike out with both from the shoulder, and possibly Lord Strathcona may have received a cable message as follows:—

Cable me at once that Hamilton Smith is universally acknowledged throughout the whole world as a colossal, unparalleled and unmitigated howling prevaricator.

The cable wire being made of strong and particularly good metal, that message, strong as it is—though not fully representing the force, I acknowledge, of the hon. Minister, because he, no doubt, could have dictated a stronger message than my weak imagination possibly can—might have found its way over and been received; and when you think of the old age of the High Commissioner, you can imagine the nervous condition into which it threw him and imagine his wringing his hands and running around and bringing in the servants, and saying: "Something must be done at once,"—and so the cable answer came. Or, Sir, he might have received another and still a third cable, because there is another hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who is—I do not wish to say materially but specially interested in this matter—and that is the Minister of the Interior. He is the second father, for, I suppose, under the circumstances, we must say that the Minister of Railways is really the legitimate father of this Bill. But it has a foster father in the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), and it is he who has to deal with this, and he does not make any bones about it, but says, we may suppose, in his message :

Hamilton Smith's offer on behalf of the Rothschilds to build the Yukon Railway for 1,000,000 acres of land is having a disquieting influence on the public mind. Cable me at once that he does not represent the Rothschilds.

Now, we have to draw on our imagination ; and undoubtedly some hon. gentleman on the other side, if not on this, who has a greater power of imagination than I, will give us other messages eclipsing perhaps those I have mentioned, because I am beginning to think, under present circumstances, that we have an imaginary Government, and under those circumstances, we may expect to find on the other side of the House greater imagination than on this.

However, as hon. gentlemen may think that I have no foundation for these imaginary telegrams and that all this is made up out of the whole cloth, let me call the House's attention to certain facts and records of history on which I have based my suppositions. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), who plays an important part in this Government, has not always been Minister of Railways. He has not always occupied a seat in this House, but he has been, as is well known, Prime Minister of the province of New Brunswick. They hold elections in New Brunswick, and there are just the same sentiments to be dealt with there as we have to deal with in this province. There have been in the past occasions in New Brunswick when the Government had to call upon the faithful—when imagination had to be used, when cables or telegrams have had to be sent and answers received ; and among others, we find this telegram which was sent when the hon. Minister of Railways was First Minister of New Brunswick. The telegram was sent to the Hon. David McLellan, Provincial Secretary, St. John :

I am pleased to learn from my agent that the Government have signed a contract with me for subsidy to dry dock. The other improvements which I am prepared to make will depend upon the people of St. John supporting the Government candidates, so as to aid me in securing further subsidy. I have already expended $20,000 in acquiring land in your city for proposed works, and have all arrangements completed to go ahead immediately on the additional subsidy being granted. I wish you and your ticket success.

J. D. LEARY.

This is dated New York, January 17th. And in the investigation that followed, Mr. Pugsley, who was then Solicitor-General of the province of New Brunswick, of which the Minister of Railways was First Minister, acknowledged under oath that he himself prepared that telegram, sent it down to Mr. Leary, and asked him to repeat it for the benefit of the electors. So when the hon. gentlemen opposite found themselves in such straits and difficulties, it was nothing more than natural that the gentleman who had unravelled one knot—not the Gordian knot, because that was cut by another member of the Government—but a smaller knot down at St. John, should come to the rescue of the right hon. leader of the Government, and say to him : follow the example of myself as a successful Prime Minister in New Brunswick ; follow the example of my Solicitor-General, and send a message to Lord Strathcona. Do not trust him with the reply, but dictate the reply yourself—business is business—tell him what reply you want. So in drawing this little quiet picture, I have not been drawing something that is unnatural, but something we have foundation for.

My hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), during his speech this afternoon, said that we were trying to get the Government into a fix. Sir, that is impossible. They have got themselves into a fix. There is no question about that. It was impossible for this Opposition to place those hon. gentlemen in so miserable a position as the one they occupy. They know that they dare not give the information to this House upon this very point, which they themselves possess, and which they promised us only yesterday. Am I to go back to my section of the country and tell my people that the First Minister of this country, who behind the shield of his dignity should stand supreme in every point of honour, promises a thing one day and refuses it the next ? Mr. Speaker, it may be all very well for the right hon. gentleman, with a powerful party behind him, to think that he can stand up in this House and say to the people : I will give you what I please ; I will not fulfil my word ; I will not carry out my promises. I refuse to keep my word with your representatives. But I tell the right hon. gentleman that every Government has its day of reckoning, and that that day will come to this Government as sure as the sun rises and sets.

There is no hon. gentleman, no matter what position he occupies, who can soar so high that he cannot be brought down ; and the higher he soars, the worse is his fall when he comes to earth, as he is certain to do. The right hon. gentleman has received indications of his loss of strength. He knows it. He knows that to-day one arm is paralyzed and withered—and it is the right arm. I do not know whether the right hon. leader of the Government is left-handed or right-handed, but if he is right-handed, my advice to him is to begin to practice with the left.

Now, Sir, this country has a direct interest in the hon. gentleman answering that question. If the people have no interest in this matter, why does the right hon. gentleman give the message that was received and refuse to give that to which it is a reply. The Prime Minister promised us this information; and I say again no matter what honours he may have won recently, no matter how lofty the position he occupied while on the other side of the water as the representative of Canada, no matter what medals may have been given him there, when he comes back here he is a Canadian, nothing more and nothing less; he is one of us, and, being one of us, he cannot shield himself behind the declaration he has made: My honour is my own. I have nothing to say as to his private honour or as to his private affairs. But when he rises in Parliament and promises to furnish us with a certain document, and then, when we ask for it it is not forthcoming, the hon. gentleman does not occupy a pleasant position in this House and before the people. He might as well know that first as last. In my opinion, this is a serious matter. If it had been the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) who acted in this way, none of us would have thought anything about it. We would not have asked many questions, for none of us would care much. We would care a great deal if the case were that of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). This side of the House have a special interest in that gentleman. He is our representative in that Cabinet. He has been specially selected by the First Minister as a proper sample of what we are who sit on this side. So, if he were to refuse us, we should feel it most keenly. It would be crushing, heart-rending, to be refused by the hon. Minister of Public Works. But it is serious when it comes to the chief factor—except the boss of the whole circus—among these artists, these scientists, who can polish everything off by refusing to give us information. It must be remembered that it was the personality of the right hon. gentleman, it was his word, it was his promises, made upon a hundred platforms—but broken, every one of them, in this House—that brought the hon. gentleman into power and gave him the place he occupies. And so we attach more weight and more importance to his utterances than we should otherwise do. Of course, Sir, we would expect an evasive answer from the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He has practiced that for years and has become an artist in that sort of thing. But we should expect that hon. gentleman not to get into such a position. He would never have landed with both feet in the pot as the Premier did. His knowledge of the wily gentlemen on this side of the House would have advised him the moment the question was asked as thoroughly and faithfully and well as he advised the Prime Minister to-day not to present the telegram. But the First Minister, not having the sagacity of his faithful colleague, and I presume, that hon. gentleman being out of the House so that the Premier could not consult him, the Premier answered: Certainly, with all pleasure and delight I will lay the telegram on the Table, and then the people will know whether this contract is bona fide or not. It is important, it is absolutely essential, that we should know whether this contract is bona fide or not, and to that end, all the information should be laid upon the Table. I do not know this man Smith personally; I am not tied to his apron-strings; I am prepared to express a straightforward, independent opinion on this question; and if he is not a bona fide man, if he has not the capital to build the road as cheaply and well as the gentlemen to whom the contract is left, we will drop him and proceed to remodel the present contract. For hon. gentlemen opposite must know without our telling them that this contract must be remodelled before it can pass both branches of this Parliament. That has to be done, and we might as well proceed with these changes at once. We have a right to know, and it is important to us that we should know, whether this is a bona fide proposition or not. Therefore, I say that the right hon. Premier is not doing justice to the people or credit to himself in promising information yesterday and refusing it to-day.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CLANCY. Hon. gentlemen opposite are evidently very much disturbed in mind. I cannot allow this occasion to pass without calling attention to one or two points with respect to the very difficult question which now engages the attention of the House. In the few moments that I shall claim your attention, I shall not discuss the merits, either real or supposed, of the two contracts. I merely wish to call the attention of the House to the position taken by the right hon. Prime Minister and to a statement that was subsequently made by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). The country will naturally inquire: What was the object of the Prime Minister in sending the message which has been a number of times referred to? I am sure the House is puzzled up to this time to know why he should send such a message, unless he should attach some importance to an offer formally made by Mr. Hamilton Smith. Otherwise, I should like the hon. gentleman to tell us why he should have sent such a message of inquiry. Why should he inquire whether Mr. Smith was representing the Rothschilds or somebody else? The House ought to be in possession of the information, particularly since the hon. gentleman has deemed it best to withhold it.

Now, as the right hon. gentleman has used that for public purposes, the House and the country demand to know what that cablegram contains. I say, it is manifestly unfair to the House to withhold it. Let me show how the hon. gentlemen have attempted to build up their argument. In the first place, the Prime Minister says this is a private telegram. The very pertinent answer will be made: Why did you send that telegram? Next, the hon. gentleman says it is private, but it was sent on public business of a most serious character to the country; therefore, I say, the country has a right to it. Now, if there was no proposition, then there was no necessity for the right hon. gentleman sending a cablegram. It is stoutly denied by the Minister of the Interior that any proposition, in any shape or form, was ever made by Mr. Hamilton Smith on behalf of any person. The hon. gentleman has made that statement as broadly as it can be made. Now, I leave it with the First Minister and the Minister of the Interior to settle that difference between them. In face of no proposition ever having been made, the First Minister is driven to sending that cablegram to Lord Strathcona to inquire whether Mr. Hamilton Smith was acting on behalf of the Rothschilds. It does seem to me that the House has a right to know something more about this matter. Now, it is perfectly clear that Sir William Van Horne did wait upon the Minister of the Interior and discussed the matter, so far as has been disclosed by the Minister of the Interior, with that gentleman, on behalf of Mr. Hamilton Smith. Now, if that occurred, Mr. Smith was not wrong, when he said that he, at least through a mutual friend, approached the Government. Whether Sir William Van Horne discussed in detail the character of that proposition, is information that the House has been denied this afternoon. But I would like to ask the Minister of the Interior this question, if he will be kind enough to answer me: Whether upon that occasion the Teslin route or any other route was discussed between him and Sir William Van Horne?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. To the best of my recollection, when Sir William Van Horne said Mr. Hamilton Smith was likely to, or would, call upon me to discuss the question of a railway to the Yukon, he said by the Chilkat route—to the best of my recollection.

Mr. CLANCY. I am very glad that we have an answer, because I see, in the letter quoted by the First Minister for the purposes of this debate, that Mr. Hamilton Smith is said to have stated:

The answer I received was that the Government might prefer the Stikine-Teslin route.

Now, let us trace this up. Sir William Van Horne did wait upon the Minister of the Interior; the hon. gentleman admits the question was discussed as between the two routes. Then he comes back and says the answer was, that they must go by the Teslin route, or not at all, and therefore Mr. Smith made no offer. Now, there can be nothing plainer than that Mr. Hamilton Smith was shut out, to use a vulgar phrase—in other words, there was no use in him waiting upon the Government to discuss the proposition, because they had settled upon the Teslin route. Now, I do not think it was fair, on the part of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, this afternoon, to try to discredit the veracity of Mr. Hamilton Smith. It does seem to me that the Government ought to be able to rest their case upon better grounds. Let any one scrutinize the correspondence, as it now appears. There is absolutely no variance at all, in so far as stated in Sir William Van Horne's letter quoted by the First Minister—there is absolutely no variance at all between that statement and Mr. Smith's letter. The only question is, whether Sir William Van Horne at the time he discussed the matter with the Minister of the Interior, was told: Well, we cannot consider any other route but the one. The offer was to be based upon only that route, and, therefore, Mr. Hamilton Smith's further propositions, through a mutual friend or otherwise, could no longer be discussed. If he did not wait upon the Government afterwards, it was simply because, as he says, he had his answer, namely, that the Teslin route had been chosen, and it was not at all likely the Government would consider the other. Now, I did not rise for the purpose of discussing this matter at length. I only repeat that this House should be in possession of that cablegram. It has been used for public purposes, and it does seem to me that the First Minister should at least disclose the reasons that induced him to send that message, in face of the statement made upon that side of the House, that no proposition was made.

Mr. QUINN. It was not my intention to say anything on this question this evening. I expected to hear some explanation from the members of the Government, or their supporters, after recess, but, unfortunately, they have not seen fit to make any. We are left with simply three propositions before us. The first is presented by the Prime Minister, who discovers, between last night and this morning, that the message which he promised to bring down, is a private message and cannot be brought before this House. Of course, we mention, in parenthesis, that Lord Strathcona's answer to this private message might also be considered a private communication; but it does not seem to be necessary to preserve the inviolability of his answer. The next is the explanation given by the Minister of the Interior, who says that, if Mr. Hamilton Smith were a business man, he would not rest satisfied with any verbal explanation or conversation that Sir William Van Horne had with him—the Minister—but he would make a business proposition in writing. Of course, we have not before this House any documents to show that there was a proposition in writing from Mann & Mackenzie. It is quite true, we have the result of several verbal interviews between those gentlemen and the Minister of the Interior, but there is no document before this House, so far as I can see, which can be called a proposition on the part of Mann & Mackenzie, other than the contract which is produced before us; so that, if any business proposition was made, we have the right to assume that it was made by the Government, and not by Mann & Mackenzie. And we have the right to assume that, if the Government wished to act fairly, honestly and in a straightforward way in this matter, they would have made these business propositions to more than one individual, or to more than one firm. Now, we have another explanation from the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson)—who I see standing beside the Speaker's chair, and I am very glad that he is present. He says that we are very much worried over this, because we are probably sorry that we do not have any interest in the proposed contract that Mr. Hamilton Smith was to get for 1,000,000 acres of land. Now, I think this is the key to the whole situation, so far as the power behind the throne is concerned. The whole situation is this: Hon. gentlemen opposite, by the mouthpiece of the hon. member for Lincoln, say here, that the Opposition are sorry because they could not get an interest in that 1,000,000 acres of land. We cannot afford to say, is the hon. gentleman's implication, what has brought about this contract, carrying with it 4,000,000 acres of land, but we will have the 4,000,000. The pot with 1,000,000 acres was big enough for the Opposition but was not big enough for the Government supporters. Now, I am afraid that the country will take that view of it. In fact, I agree with my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope), who says that a large portion of the country has already taken that view of it, and have sounded their disapproval of it in no uncertain way yesterday. I do not quite agree with my hon. friend from Compton, when he says that it was the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce who dictated this course to the Prime Minister.

I think the gentleman who dictated his course probably sits directly behind the right hon. Prime Minister, and occupies that seat at the moment, because we have a precedent for his conduct as regards that letter. We remember that a certain public or rather private letter was going to be exposed in the press, if a certain hon. gentleman would consent. That letter had been stolen, and it was intended that it should be published in the newspapers. The Minister said, when he found at one moment that it was impossible to trace the letter because it had been stolen, the office burglarized and the safe opened and this letter taken away, and it had gone into a hundred different hands, that he had not the slightest objection to the letter being published. But when it came to be known that the letter was still in existence, and not in the hands probably of the Minister, he then said: Oh, no; if I should allow this letter to be published I would be simply encouraging the theft of private documents. This is, no doubt, the Minister who dictated to the Prime Minister the way in which he could get out of publishing this private document. However, I do not think we should hammer on this question very long. I sympathize indeed very much with the position of the right hon. Prime Minister; I feel sorry that the Premier of Canada should be found in this position, and for the credit of the right hon. gentleman and for the credit of this country we should drop the matter as soon as possible. I see hon. gentlemen opposite are heartily ashamed of the Ministers, and I can assure them that every hon. member on this side of the House is equally heartily ashamed of the position which they occupy.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

UNSETTLED CLAIM OF MANITOBA.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the Government to a motion made by me last session, in accordance with which the following return was ordered:—

Copies of all memorials, statements and other documents from the Government of the province of Manitoba in relation to an unsettled claim resulting from that province being charged with the cost of the erection of public buildings; with copies of all correspondence in connection therewith.

I desire to know why the return has not been brought down, and whether it is the intention of the Government to place this information before the House?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I will communicate with the Department of the Interior or the Department of the Secretary of State and inquiry will immediately be made in respect to the matter.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Blair for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) an Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. Speaker, when I was relieved yesterday afternoon at six o'clock from continuing my remarks on this subject, I assumed that the adjournment was taken not to accommodate myself, but to allow hon. members an opportunity of inspecting the bulletins exhibited on the streets last evening. It was an interesting night to gentlemen on both sides of the House, and the adjournment afforded members an opportunity of seeing in what respect the bulletins indicated the results of the engagement in which the people of Ontario participated yesterday.

Before proceeding with my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call your attention and the attention of the House to the fact that some of the newspapers at least which made reference to the few remarks I addressed to the House yesterday, misrepresented me. They misrepresented me in this respect. My calculations of the quantity of freight and number of passengers that could possibly be carried under ordinary circumstances by means of steam communication on Teslin Lake down to Dawson City, were made on the basis of 100 passengers per day and 100 tons of freight, or 250 tons of freight or 250 passengers for each steamer. That was my calculation of the capability of any means of communication that would be possible for this company or any other company to place on Teslin Lake and Hootalinqua River down to Dawson. I took that as the limit of traffic that could possibly be carried over that route, and be continued during a season of five months' open navigation. My calculations were also based on the carriage of that number of passengers and that quantity of freight over the wagon road from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake. I figured that as the quantity which could be carried during those five months, because it was as much as, in my judgment, could be moved by any means of transportation that the company could place from Teslin Lake to Dawson City. Instead of the newspapers representing my remarks in this way—and I beg to refer hon. members to the report of my remarks in "Hansard," the unrevised edition of which is in my hands and where my remarks will be found just as they were stated, and just as I have now stated them—some of the newspapers represented me as making this calculation of the carriage of freight and passengers from Teslin Lake to Dawson City from 1st September, the date for the completion of the railway, up to the close of navigation, which would be, according to calculations that have been presented to the House, and which I accept, as between one month and six weeks. I thought it proper to make this explanation to the House in regard to the manner in which I was misrepresented by the press in respect to this matter.

I have referred to the reasons which led to the adjournment of the House last night at six o'clock. They were very important to hon. members on both sides of the House, important particularly to hon. gentlemen on the Government benches; and whatever feelings hon. members on this side of the House may entertain with respect to the result, I am informed that the effect on the hon. members of the Government and their supporters has been such as to cause alarm to some people in this city. I have been informed, that so chagrined were these hon. gentlemen on seeing the bulletins of the results of the elections last night; their faces grew so long this morning that you could not find a barber in the city who would shave a Liberal without charging double price. I am not surprised at that. for only a few nights ago I heard the right hon. the First Minister making an appeal to the electorate of the city of Ottawa and of the province of Ontario, to stand by the Hardy Government which was the right arm of the Government on the hill. The hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said: If you want to stand by my Government you will stand by Mr. Hardy, and you will not allow the right hand of the Federal Government to be cut off on election day. Well, Mr. Speaker, the right hand of the hon. gentleman's Government may not have been cut off yesterday, but it was at least broken and mangled and it is hanging in a sling to-day. But that is not all. The night before election day, at the late hour of 12 o'clock, we witnessed an unusual scene in this city, which was doubtless enacted with a view of saving the right arm of the Federal Government. We witnessed at the hour of midnight, men employed with horses and sleighs under the protection of the left hand of the Government, carting snow off the walks around the Parliament Buildings. That was an effort on the part of this Government to save its right arm. But, Sir, these kind of efforts availed not, and the people of Ontario did as they thought proper in the interest of their country, and so the right arm of the Government is now paralyzed.

In my remarks yesterday I referred to the exorbitant concessions that the Government are giving under this Bill to Mackenzie & Mann for the construction of 150 miles of railroad, and I shall now draw the attention of the House to the importance and value of these mineral lands which are included in that grant. We are given to understand by the Ministers that the location of the lots selected by Mackenzie & Mann is to be such as to conserve to the Government the adjoining locations with a view of selling them to miners and prospectors generally. Now, according to the Government mining regulations at present in force, I understand there is a charge of $15 each for these locations, to persons who choose to engage in mining enterprises there. The Government also charge $15 a year for the holding of each of these locations, and in order to hold it for a year, the ordinary owner of a claim is obliged to work it whether he gets any gold or not. There are 3,700,000 acres given to Mann & Mackenzie for the construction of these 150 miles of road, and if the Government alternate sections adjoining the land of Mann & Mackenzie were sold out to free miners and prospectors, the Government would receive from each miner a sum of $30, and $30 on each of the 3,700,000 acres would amount to 111,000,000. In other words the equivalent of what the Government proposes to give and which the contract actually does give to Mann & Mackenzie, would bring in revenue to the public treasury the sum of $111,000,000, if the same quantity of mineral lands were given to individual miners and the same rates charged for them as are charged today. But that is not all. Besides the Government realizing that vast amount on the sale of these locations and on their holding for 12 months, free miners outside of these favourite contractors are obliged to pay 10 per cent on every dollar's worth of gold they extract from these claims. There is a reservation on $2,500 to begin with, but after that amount is taken out, the miner has got to pay a royalty of 10 per cent on every dollar's worth of gold secured. Let me show what that means. Suppose we take $100 as an average, a very small one indeed, to be extracted from each location of the 3,700,000, then 10 per cent on that would realize to the Government $37,000,000. That is what we would expect to accrue to the revenues of the country under the regulations which miners and prospectors are now subject to, and adding that to the $111,000,000 which I have already calculated, we therefore find that we are giving to Mackenzie & Mann the equivalent of $148,000,000 for constructing this narrow gauge line. I speak subject to correction, but if there is any hon. member opposite who can point out that I am making a mistake in calculating $15 as the price of the location in the first instance, another $15 as the price for holding the location, and 10 per cent royalty on the gold extracted, then, Sir, I shall be glad to hear that hon. gentleman make the correction. Now, what are Mackenzie & Mann getting? In the face of the fact that the Government is bound to go to enormous expense to protect Mackenzie & Mann's property and their enterprise, yet all that the Government can expect to realize from Mackenzie & Mann, is only 1 per cent on the product of their lands, which on the same basis of calculation would amount to only $3,700,000, while the ordinary miners and prospectors, and everybody else who chooses to engage in the enterprise there, must pay $148,000,000 on the equivalent of what Mackenzie & Mann get. In my opinion the franchises given to Mackenzie & Mann, outside of the mineral lands to the extent of 3,700,000 acres, should alone be sufficient inducement for them to undertake the work. Any enterprising company, with a full knowledge of the facts now before the country with regard to the mineral wealth of the Yukon region and with regard to the prospects of a large number of people going in there, should be willing to undertake the construction of that road for the usual grant given in aid of the construction of railways in other parts of Canada, namely, from $3,000 to $6,000 a mile. In my humble judgment, the monopoly which Mackenzie & Mann are getting, by the prevention of other people getting Government aid for the building of any other line of railway into that country for the next ten years, is in itself a great franchise. In my judgment, the consideration that is given by the Government to these gentlemen ought to secure for us a continuous all-rail line from Edmonton, Prince Albert, Calgary, or any other important point on the Canadian Pacific Railway, into the Yukon district; and if the Yukon district is going to prove the great country it is now represented to be, and that the evidences given to the House by the Government indicate it to be, that is the route by which a railway must be built in order to satisfy the people of Canada; and how are we going to build it if we are to give away 3,700,000 acres of the best gold land in the country to Mackenzie & Mann for the building of 150 miles of road?

To show the dangers of the route selected, let me quote from Mr. Jennings's report:

In reporting the result of my observations for a railway route between Stikine River and Teslin Lake, B.C., I would, however, first refer to the means of communication between the sea and a suggested point of debarkation on the river, by mentioning that the Stikine has been navigated by steamers to Glenora and Telegraph Creek, a distance of from 140 to 150 miles from the sea, since the early seventies, when the Dease Lake and Cassiar mining excitement was at its height, but while so navigated during the open season, usually between 1st May and 20th October, the journey has almost invariably been considered slow, tedious and not without danger, partly owing to the inferior class of steamers used and partly to the fluctuating state of the water. At times the river is too low for speed with a reasonable cargo, or, the stream may be very high and the riffles difficult to make headway against, with the additional danger of drift trees or snags getting foul of the steering gear or wheel. The latter danger is most to be feared where the channel is contracted, such as in Little and Klotchman's cañons, where, if any mishap occurred to the vessel's machinery, she would at once be carried against the rugged rock walls by the swift swirling, disturbed waters, and sunk by having her planking either torn out or stove in. The distance of 96 miles between Wrangel and Little Cañon can be made by a powerful steamer in one day, whereas by reason of the swift and difficult water above it takes two days more to reach Telegraph Creek, a further distance of only 54 miles, or 150 miles from the sea, therefore, with these facts before one, it seems reasonable that on a route where safe and speedy transit is contemplated, it is advisable to commence the railway section well down the valley at a point to be determined on below the Little Cañon and on the left bank of the river, 96 miles from the river.

This is evidence that ought to be accepted by this House with regard to the dangers attending the navigation of the Stikine River; and this must have an important effect on the number of people who will be willing to subject themselves to the dangers that must meet them in going up that channel. Other parts of the same report refer to the Hootalinqua River and the Lewes River, and the difficulties attending the navigation of those streams, on account of shoals, bars, snags, land-slides, and so forth. We have five or six hundred miles at least of that navigation beyond the point to which this railway is to be built. In view of these facts, and the further fact that we are not getting a satisfactory route after all, notwithstanding the enormous franchises and concessions in land and in other respects that are being given to the company, I feel that to support any such measure as this, this House would be making a terrible mistake in the best interests of the country. It is not possible, I take it, for the Government to make anything approaching a definite statement as to what the value of the concessions they are giving to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann is. It may be $3,700,000, it may be $10,000,000, it may be $40,000,000 or $50,000,000, or it may be $500,000,000; and the Government are not in a position to dispute any figure I have named from any data or any proof they are in a position to show to this House.

I made reference yesterday, in my remarks, to the position taken by the right hon. First Minister in respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway contract when it was before this House in the session of 1880-81. On that occasion I find that the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) gave expression to his views, and among his remarks I find the following:—

The Minister of Railways tells us it is the best contract Parliament could possibly make. How does he know that? How does the House know it? Did he give the country an opportunity of judging whether it is or not? Did he give the contractors an opportunity of tendering for the work, or of coming to the Government and saying: We will undertake its performance; let us know your propositions, your concessions? Not at all. Secretly, behind the back of Parliament, and without the knowledge of the people's representatives, the hon. gentleman signs this contract and affixes his official seal, without the authority or sanction of Parliament. He contents himself by telling us it is the best contract ever submitted to Parliament, and the best the Government could do. How do we know that? The Government has refused the people's representatives in Parliament, and the people themselves, an opportunity of pronouncing upon the character of the other proposals and schemes. * * * The Government refused to submit it to the people. They refused to submit the scheme to public competition. They did not tell the people, as they ought to have told the public: "We want to build this railway; these are our grants; here are our concessions; give us a tender for this contract. No, the hon. gentleman enters into a secret contract with this company, and then boldly asks Parliament to ratify his action, &c., &c., &c.

Now, this was the language addressed to the House by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) on that occasion, and, having those remarks in my mind, I felt curious to hear from him some statement with respect to this deal, some explanation why he was prepared to justify the present Government in signing a secret contract with Mackenzie & Mann for a piece of work the construction of which Parliament never authorized, in aid of which Parliament never made any grant, and for the building of which the Government never called for any tenders. Those are explanations that I would like to have from the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), particularly in view of his criticisms on the Pacific Railway contract, passed by the Government of the late Sir John Macdonald, for a work fully authorized by Parliament. Why, Sir, by an Act of Parliament passed seven years previously and put on our statutes by the same party who now occupy the Treasury benches, full power was given to the Government to proceed with the building of that railway. When the second reading of the Bill embodying that contract was moved by the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), an hon. gentleman who does not now occupy a seat in the House, Mr. Robertson, of Shelburne, N.S., thus addressed the House:

For days past Parliament has been engaged in the discussion of this contract. The announcement was made in the House this afternoon that the Government have received a proposal from other gentlemen for the construction of the Pacific Railway. We have no information as to the terms of that proposal. We simply depend on the rumours. We have no information as to the terms of that proposal. * * * I think it would be unfair to ask Parliament to proceed with the discussion of this question until we know the terms of the offer. Whether they are more favourable to the country than those of the contract. Holding that view, which I believe to be entertained by this House, I beg to move:

That, in view of the fact that another offer for the construction and working of the Pacific Railway has been received by the Government, this debate be adjourned in order that the Government may lay the said offer on the Table of the House.

These remarks and that motion of Mr. Robertson were followed by an address from Mr. Blake, who, in the course of his speech, used this language:

Now, the Government having before them another proposal for the construction of this railway, a copy of which is placed in my hands, and is signed by, I do not hesitate to say, the strongest combination of Canadian capitalists ever witnessed in combination at all, in terms which I am not now about to describe, but which are infinitely better than the terms of this contract, removing many of the objections which have been taken to it, it is not right that the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches should propose to their supporters that they should concur in this resolution, &c., &c.

That was the argument used by Mr. Blake, after it was known that a second offer had been made to the Government, and after that offer had been laid on the Table. The ground was then taken by hon. gentlemen who to-day occupy the Treasury benches, that the contract which was signed with the Canadian Pacific Railway, should be put aside, and that the contract which, in their judgment, was a better one, should be accepted. They argued strenuously that it was perfectly honourable for Parliament to reject the contract then before the House and accept the tender that was submitted by the other parties. Mr. Blake followed up his argument by moving an amendment to the motion for the second reading. Which amendment was as follows:—

That the late Government invited tenders for the construction and working of the Canadian Pacific Railway under the Act of 1874.

That no tenders were received in answer to those invitations.

There we have Mr. Blake's admission that the Government of Sir John Macdonald did ask for tenders but got none, and in that respect the contract now before the House stands in a very different position compared with that which was submitted to the House in 1891.

That the policy of the present Government, approved by this House in the session of 1879, was to obtain Imperial aid towards the work.

That the policy of the present Government, approved by this House in the session of 1880, was to construct the railway as a Government work.

That it appears that during the recess the Government determined to make a contract for the construction and working of the railway on wholly new conditions.

That the Government did not invite tenders on the basis of the said new conditions at all.

That such new conditions were not made known by the Government at any time prior to the making of the contract or until the night of the 10th December last, when the contract was laid on the Table.

That the said new conditions, not authorized or contemplated by the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, are of the most vital importance, and amongst the same are the following:—

By the contract the contractors are given large powers of selection of the land.

By the contract the power to select two-thirds of the land by the Government is taken away.

Under the contract property and capital stock of the company is perpetually exempted from taxation by Dominion, new provinces, or municipalities therein.

By the contract the power of the Government to reduce an established tariff is limited to the case in which the company is making a net revenue not exceeding 10 per cent on the capital invested in the construction of the railway.

By the contract no power given to the Government to prescribe from time to time the accommodation and the trains to be provided by the company.

By the contract no power given to the Government to acquire the road.

That Parliament is free to reject such a Bill.

That it is now proposed that Parliament shall legalize the contract.

That the House is under no obligation to do so, and it is its duty to refuse to do so, unless satisfied that the public interest requires such a step.

That the conditions of the contract are extremely onerous and disadvantageous to the country.

That it now appears that terms much more favourable to the country can be obtained.

That on the 14th day of January instant, only five weeks afterwards, the said new conditions were made public, an offer which is now on the Table was made to the Government by Canadian capitalists of high standing and ample means, credit and business ability, to complete those parts of the railway to be built by the contract, and to equip and maintain and work the whole railway from Nipissing to the Pacific Ocean, and to perform all the obligations undertaken by the contractors, on terms far less onerous to the country, in the following respects, &c., &c.

Now, these were the points on which the Opposition of that day undertook to criticise the measure that was then before Parliament, and advised the Government and the House as to what should be done as between these two contracts. In this resolution Mr. Blake declares that the contractors received large powers. Well, what powers did they receive? I will explain that more fully later on by quoting from hon. gentlemen who occupied the Treasury benches then, and who were responsible for the contract. But I would say now that the powers given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were powers that the Government had been vested with by Parliament to give for the construction of the road. The contract had this force, in addition, that the Government not only had the power to let the contract according to the tenders that they called for by their advertisement, but they were subsequently empowered by Parliament to proceed with the building of the railway as a Government work. That was tried, but it was not found practicable; it was not found to be as advantageous to the interests of the country, and therefore the Government adopted the plan of inducing contractors to accept a contract under somewhat changed conditions which it was decided to offer. Mr. Blake, in his resolution, complains of the exemption from taxation which is given to the company. Why, the bargain now made with Mackenzie & Mann provides for the exemption of their property from Dominion taxes, provincial taxes and municipal taxes, except in the case of incorporated towns or cities that may be built up in that country. Suppose that a poor miner or prospector goes into that country and takes up a claim, at which he works hard in order to extract the wealth which it contains. He must incur considerable expense in getting into the country, and he must pay for his claim. He is subject to taxation—Dominion, provincial, municipal and incorporated town or city taxes. But these contractors are exempt from nearly all these taxes. Mr. Blake took exception to the contract of that day also because it did not provide safeguards with regard to the tariff of charges of the company. The tariff of charges for that railway may, in some sections of the country, be complained of, but people who are familiar with the working of that railway, the business that is being done upon it and the expenses incurred in its operation, cannot find very much fault with the tariff that has been in existence practically ever since the building of the road. But what powers are given to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann under this contract? They are given almost absolute power in the establishment of a tariff. I admit that it is subject to the approval of the Government in the first instance. But, in view of the great difficulties, as we are informed, that exist, and must exist, in the way of those who undertake to build and run this line, Mackenzie, no doubt, will make a very high tariff. And what then, Sir, and that we have a right to expect from the favouritism already shown the contractors? After that tariff is established, the Government has not the power to interfere with it for four years. The Government are not allowed to put that road under the ordinary Railway Act, with regard to rates, even then. They are allowed to reduce the tariff 25 per cent, but that must stand for three years further, and, until the tenth year, the Government is not given power to interfere with the tariff of rates on the basis of the provisions of the general Railway Act. That is an immense advantage to the contractors, in view of the calculations that have already been entered into with regard to the number of people that are expected to go over this road and the freight that will have to be carried. Why, Sir, you have only to refer to the figures quoted in my calculations as to what business could be done over a common wagon road. As I was able to show, a tariff of $20 a ton on freight carried 150 miles by a team, and $10 for every passenger on the road, would amount, allowing at the rate of one hundred passengers and one hundred tons of freight per day for five months, to nearly half a million dollars' revenue for that length of time.

Now, with the facilities that the Government promise us, Mann & Mackenzie are going to put on this route, both on the Stikine River and Teslin Lake, what may we expect this traffic is going to amount to? What revenue is likely to flow from it? But here, Sir, the Government's hands are tied. No matter how much money Mackenzie & Mann make out of their undertaking, no matter if they realize out of the lands the Government are giving them, the enormous amount of money that is being calculated by hon. gentlemen in this House and by people outside, though they may make these enormous profits out of these lands, and these enormous profits from the operation of the road, the Government's hands are tied by this contract from interfering with the rates to any extent; for ten years they must leave them almost undisturbed so far as the General Railway Act is concerned. Now, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Blake, in his resolutions, referred to the fault of the Government in not prescribing the extent of accommodation to be provided on the Canadian Pacific Railway with regard to the train service, and so on. Well, what is there in this contract to compel Mackenzie & Mann to put even one train a day on that road? I cannot see anything to compel them even to operate that road. When they have completed their road and have reported that fact to the Government, and the Government have sent their engineers to examine it, and have found it in accordance with the terms of the contract, then the contractors can get their land grant, they can get the whole of their land grant if they choose, and the Government have no power under the present contract to claim a forfeiture of any part of that land concession, or any other concession, on account of the company failing to operate the road, or failing to put ten trains or any number of trains, or even one train a day, upon that road. There is no guarantee whatever in this contract that there will be a certain number of trains put on that road, or any particular class of trains. We do not know what kind of train service may be put upon this railway, or this tramway. Now, Mr. Blake also complained that there was no power given to the Government to acquire the road. Well, I am inclined to think that that would not be a good idea. It seems to me it would not be a property that the Government could handle easily. But I find that in the contract before the House there is no power given to the Government to acquire at any time that 150 miles of road, if they chose to do so, in order to connect it with another road or extend it. There is no power, there is nothing in this contract to prevent Mackenzie & Mann from handing over that railway when it is completed to anybody they like, whether he be an American or any other foreigner. Now, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the offer of Mr. Hamilton Smith which occupied so much of the time of the House this afternoon, I am not going to weary the House by any further reference to it than to say, that from what we learn already of the position which Mr. Smith must necessarily occupy financially from his connections with such people as have been named, and whose credentials were given to the House this afternoon, I do not think there can be any doubt whatever in the minds of the people of Canada of the ability of Mr. Hamilton Smith to carry out any work that he might undertake to perform in Canada under any reasonable contract with the Government. Let us remember also that the hon. gentlemen now occupying the Treasury benches took the position, when they were in Opposition in 1881, that there was nothing in the contract entered into between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government that would prevent the Government from accepting the subsequent tender that was made after the signing of the contract. They took that position then, and why don't they take it to-day? The grounds for taking that position to-day, as I have intimated already, are very much stronger in relation to the present contract. The present contract was entered into without any previous knowledge on the part of the people of Canada. The people were not made aware that it was the intention of the Government to enter into a contract, they were not made aware that the Government intended to make any contract of that kind. The Government kept their intentions to themselves, they took very good care not to invite anybody in this country or out of this country to tender for the performance of that work until they had signed this secret contract, behind closed doors, with Mackenzie & Mann. Now, Sir, under these circumstances, and since the Government had no authority from the people, or from Parliament, to justify them in making a contract of this kind, especially within eight days of the assembling of Parliament, I say it is the duty of hon. gentlemen opposite to retreat from their position, and to give the consideration that is due to the offer of Mr. Hamilton Smith. If they fail to do so, they will work a great detriment to this country, they will violate a principle that is dear to the people of this country and which they consider very important in their own interests. In pointing out the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite in 1881, I beg the House to bear with me while I read some extracts from the speeches delivered by members of the Government of that day in defence of the conditions under which they entered into the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Before proceeding to read those extracts in defence of the action taken by members of the then Government, I should like to quote from the speech delivered at that time by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and I regret the hon. gentleman is not at present in his seat. The hon. gentleman made use of the following language in the course of his speech:—

Well, all the plausibility, if there was any in it, that the excuse may have had, has gone. Now, we find that capitalists of equal standing, of equal wealth and experience, come forward and say: We will do this work for you, and on terms which, I do not hesitate to say, if you put the just value on the exemptions, and if you put a very moderate value indeed on the enormous privileges of the monopoly that is granted them, is $40,000,000 at least better than the offer contained in the contract heretofore laid on the Table. Sir, there are four courses open, as I think, and fairly and favourably open to these hon. gentlemen. They might with good reason have withdrawn the original contract altogether, and if they had seen fit, gone on as they proposed to us nine months ago, and constructed this road as a Government work; or they might have accepted this new offer, also a perfectly legitimate, a perfectly reasonable thing to do; or they might have said: Under these circumstances we feel it our duty in the interest of the people, whose guardians we are—

I wonder who are the guardians of the people to-day.

—to see if we cannot get better terms than either; or they might have left the whole matter to the people, the true and proper arbiters,—

Who are the true and proper arbiters to-day?

—and let them say whether they would retain these gentlemen and their contract, $40,000,000 worse than the offer now made, or be ruled by that "aristocratic demagogue," my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake). These hon. gentlemen talked of sacrificing something for their honour. Millions must, if need be, be given up to their honour. It reminds one of the words of the poet (not the hon. member for Niagara):

Their honour rooted in dishonour stood,

And faith unfaithful taught them falsely true.

What is the true position of this House? Are these gentlemen the despots of Canada? As I understand the case, the members of this House are the agents of the people of Canada, and these hon. gentlemen are the agents of the agents of the people of Canada. I can well understand gentlemen in the awkward position in which these hon. gentlemen now find themselves, saying, and feeling too, that it was their duty to submit to considerable sacrifices for the purpose of carrying out a contract to which they had agreed; and, Sir, if it was their land they proposed to sacrifice,— Whose land are hon. gentlemen sacrificing to-day?

—if it was their money they proposed to give away, if the price of those exemptions were to come out of their pockets, if those monopolies were to hurt them and them alone, then I could understand their telling us that their honour forbade the sacrifice. But are they going to lose one cent by forcing the original contract? Are they going to suffer in any way? The parties who are going to suffer are the people of Canada. It is the birthright of the people of Canada which you propose to give away; it is the money of the people of Canada you propose to sacrifice; it is out of the pockets of the people of Canada that all these exemptions and charges are to be defrayed; it is the people of Canada and their children and grandchildren who are to suffer if you create these extortionate and exorbitant monopolies. The duty of an agent in such a case differs from the duty of the principal. His duty is not to sacrifice his principles, money and rights, but if the agent has fatally compromised himself, the least the agent can do, if he be an honourable man, is to refer the matter to the principal and abide by the principal's decision.

Who are the principals in this matter to-day? They are the very same as were the principals in the case of that contract —the people of Canada. Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce willing to agree to the argument he laid down in respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on that occasion, he having before him a tender to perform the work for one-quarter of the amount which the Government propose to give Mackenzie & Mann?

If these hon. gentlemen desire to maintain the name of honourable men, that is what they should be prepared to do, and not talk to us honour in carrying out a contract which they rashly pledged themselves to.

A contract to which they rashly pledged themselves. What could be more rash than the action of the Government in pledging themselves and entering on an engagement such as the one represented by the measure before the House, an undertaking involving an almost unlimited amount of money, and an almost unlimited portion of the best of the public domain. I have stated 3,700,000 acres as the consideration to be given by the terms of this contract; but there is nothing in it to prevent Mackenzie & Mann claiming 5,000,000 acres instead of 3,750,000. They have only to start on the ground and make excuses suitable to themselves for carrying the road 200 miles, and we have evidence before the House that probably it will be necessary to construct the road 208 miles instead of 150 miles. That being the case, if Parliament sanctions this measure, Mackenzie & Mann will practically be given more than 5,000,000 acres; and so we are giving almost unlimited concessions to Mackenzie & Mann in this respect also.

Proceeding, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

I say, if ever there was a government on the face of the earth who were bound so to conduct their negotiations as to give no legitimate cause for suspicion, it was the majority of the members of the present Cabinet. Now, Sir, what have these hon. gentlemen done? Knowing that they stood suspected, knowing that their past record would not bear investigation, even if they did not care for their own honour and reputation, they should consider the effect of their conduct on their followers behind them; and yet they must needs carry on their negotiations in secret.

Where did Mackenzie & Mann and the present Government carry on their negotiations? In secret, with closed doors.

They must needs refuse information which this House and the country had a right to have.

What position did the First Minister occupy this afternoon? Important information was asked yesterday, that information was promised to be laid on the Table, and to-day that hon. gentleman has refused to give that important information.

They must needs keep these terms so studiously concealed that until I read that contract, I had not the faintest idea that, reckless as they are, they would commit so ridiculous and foolish an act as to set their hands to such a bargain as that, knowing all that, what did they do when the contract came down? We find them in the most desperate hurry to get rid of the discussion, in most desperate haste, that within ten days a matter which they themselves admit to be the most important with which the Parliament of Canada has ever had to deal should be carried through without the slightest chance or possibility of appealing to the country or obtaining from other parties any offer which might replace the one now before us. And when this new offer comes here, made by men of the very highest standing—an offer which they have shown by the very best possible tests is a bona fide offer—how are these men met? With vituperation and abuse of the very grossest kind.

What treatment did the offer of Mr. Hamilton Smith meet with this very afternoon in this House, Mr. Speaker? What did that offer meet with from the Treasury benches this afternoon? Why, Sir, it met with the most unjust treatment that could be directed towards the proposition of any man, private or public, in any country. Then the hon. Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) went on to say:

Not only by the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite, but men in this House also. What do these gentlemen propose to do? They propose to save the people of Canada many millions of dollars in money and land, and to remove these monopolies which hon. gentlemen wish to create. Is that a crime? Is it to be held a crime in this country if several Canadian capitalists come forward to say: You have made a bad bargain, we will undertake to construct this road at a less cost than proposed in the contract brought down; we will free you from a number of these embarrassing clauses and restrictions which you have unfortunately placed in your original bargain. The hon. gentleman dared to hint that this bargain was a fraudulent one—that it contained the elements of deceit, the elements of hypocrisy, the elements of a political dodge. All I can say is this: that when we come to consider these two offers, when we consider how the original negotiations were conducted, when we regard the extraordinary secrecy with which this whole matter, from first to last, has been negotiated, we must say that if everything was honest and above board, with respect to the original contract, the whole circumstances attendant upon its introduction have been most fortunate.

With every feature of a knave complete,
If it be honest 'tis a devilish cheat.

What is the conduct of hon. gentlemen towards their supporters in this matter? I do not believe a party was ever so dragooned as those hon. gentlemen have been upon this occasion.

I would like to know what means has been resorted to by hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches to dragoon their followers into supporting this measure. It would be curious for anybody to become possessed of the facts with regard to the means which have been used for the purpose of getting hon. gentlemen behind the Ministers to give their support to this measure which we are now considering.

All discussion has been shut off, all remonstrance forbidden. They have recourse, with their majority 70 strong, to the last and ugly argument which a Ministry driven into a corner has recourse to. They have told their supporters that if they dared to listen to better terms or to sanction them when offered, they will have to choose between seeing them out of office or probably dissolution.

If we are to believe the rumours that are floating around the corridors of this House and throughout the constituencies, there is something of this very kind going on now. On behalf of the Government, Liberal members are being approached and told: If you do not support the Government and if the Government is defeated it means that they will appeal to the country, and you will have to stand an election, but if you do support the Government the general elections are three years off yet and the people will forget your vote before that time. These are the arguments that are presented to some hon. gentlemen who are expected to feel a delicacy in supporting this monstrous measure. Sir Richard Cartwright continued:

I do not remember a single hon. gentleman opposite, even among the Ministers themselves, who has ventured to say that this contract is just the contract he would like to see.

I am quite satisfied that there are very few hon. gentlemen outside of those on the Treasury benches who would say that this is the kind of contract they would like to be asked to support in this House.

Do these hon. gentlemen mean to tell us that a monopoly is a good thing, that exemptions are good things, that it is a good thing in itself to deprive the Governor in Council of the right of reducing tolls?

And in this particular instance in respect to this contract, this Government deprived themselves of the privileges of touching these tolls for four years, and then only to the extent of 25 per cent, and they are not allowed by the contract to place the operation of this road under the General Railway Act for ten years. What I have quoted is an extract from the speech delivered in this House on the 18th January, 1881, by the hon. the present Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. (Sir Louis Davies). That is a long time ago.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is a long time ago, but it is a time we should not forget, because during the intervening 17 years we have had an opportunity of seeing to what extent the predictions of the then Liberal leaders have been verified. What has this country suffered because of the very exorbitant—according to the Liberal way of putting it—concessions given to the Canadian Pacific Railway then? I do not see that this country suffered anything, but I do see that since the prompt opening of that road, Canada has progressed and attained a position that it would not have attained had that road not been constructed. When we had the rebellion in the Northwest, what would we have been without the Canadian Pacific Railway? How could our people get to the Stikine River now without the Canadian Pacific Railway? Without the Canadian Pacific Railway how could the people east of Manitoba and the Territories, and east of the Rocky Mountains, and all the way to Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island; how could they get to the Yukon to-day? They would be compelled to travel through American territory out to California, and then find their way back to Canada. Without the Canadian Pacific Railway how could the people of the province of Ontario send their flour and their farm products to the Pacific Coast, and from the coast to the Yukon district? Why, Sir, the carrying out and the completion of that railroad by the Conservative Government places Canada to-day in the proudest position that any country can occupy. In order to meet some of the arguments presented by the Liberals on that occasion, the present hon. leader of the Opposition addressed the House, and I propose to quote from him and from some others who replied to criticisms then made from the Liberal benches. I believe that in quoting these extracts it will serve all the purposes that are necessary, to enable the people to compare the circumstances connected with that transaction with the circumstances in connection with the transaction which we are now discussing. The hon. leader of the Opposition, in reply to Sir Albert Smith, said, and other members of the Liberal party:

What did the hon. gentleman do? When he found himself in the Cabinet, arrived at the goal of his ambition, he came down as a member of the Government, and put on the Statute-book an Act which stands there with all the authority of law to-day. He wants to know where we got the authority to make this contract. Let him look at the Act to which he was a party. Let him look at the Act of 1874, and he will find that his hon. leader, true to the opinion he had held for years, and which he did not hesitate to express that $30,000,000 in money and 50,000,000 acres of land was utterly inadequate to secure the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and he asked his friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to come to his aid in getting an Act put on the Statute-book authorizing any Government while the statute remained law to secure the construction of the Canadian Pacific by a subsidy of $10,000 a mile in money and 20,000 acres of land a mile. If you count the number of miles of the road, including the branches, you have over 56,000,000 acres of land. The hon. gentleman voted for that when he was sitting on the Treasury benches, and yet, in the year 1881, relegated back by the people of this country to the Opposition benches, the hon. gentleman discovers that this was a frightful undertaking, and that there was no authority for it. Why, what does that Act provide? It provides that any Government while it remains law may contract with any person or co-partnership or company incorporated or hereinafter to be incorporated for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway—that Act authorizes the Government of the day, whoever they may be, while that Act stands as it is to-day, to spend $10,000 cash per mile, 20,000 acres of land per mile and such further sum in addition as the lowest tenderer might ask in accordance with the other provisions of the Act. The hon. gentleman may find it convenient to forget all this; his hon. leader may find it convenient to forget all this; but with that law standing on the Statute-book of the country he will not make the people of this country believe this Government had not authority to make the contract. But what did hon. gentlemen do at a time when the revenue of the country was altogether inadequate to meet the expenditure, at a time when the Finance Minister of that Government was coming down session after session and asking for $3,000,000 additional taxation of which he himself stated $2,000,000 was for the purpose of constructing the Canadian Pacific. Those hon. gentlemen came down to the House the same session and put this Act on the Statute-book. When they came back a little more than a year afterwards they said: We have not enough with the $3,000,000 we asked for last session, we must have half a million a year more! Did hon. gentlemen draw back and say we must stop the contract for the Canadian Pacific Railway? No; they went on and the Finance Minister met the House session after session with deficits until the amount of the deficiency between revenue and expenditure was over $7,000,000 during four years, and with that condition of things—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; had not the hon. gentleman been dismissed by an intelligent public from the position he held he would have found himself on the 1st of July, 1879, with a deficiency of over $3,000,000. And in that position of things, with a deficiency rolling up year by year between revenue and expenditure, what did they do? Instead of saying, stop, do not let any more contracts, they went on session after session, taking power to let new contracts down to the last hour. The hon. leader of the Government declared it was their intention to build the Canadian Pacific from the shores of Lake Superior to the shores of the Pacific. What more did the Government, of which the hon. member for Westmoreland was a member, under the authority of this Act, and in the face of these enormous and annual deficits? They advertised to the world asking on what terms parties could be found who would come forward and construct the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have heard something about the cost of advertising in my department since. I do not think they can find any occasion in which we spent over $10,000 in those matters in my department. I think we will all come to the conclusion that no better result having followed that expenditure, it would have been just as well to have diverted the money to some other purpose. At all events, the fact remains that, down to the end of 1878, hon. gentlemen advertised publicly to know on what terms parties would come forward and construct the whole of this road from the shores of Lake Superior to the shores of the Pacific. Now, I challenge any gentleman to say, which the hon. leader of the Opposition has not ventured to say, that we have exceeded the powers Parliament has authorized for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. On the contrary, the hon. gentleman says things have all changed and declares that the 25,000,000 acres of land is worth $3.18.

This is the statement made by the hon. leader of the Opposition on that occasion, and

Mr. McDOUGALL.

I think it is a very complete answer to the position taken by those who criticised the Government with regard to the merits of that contract. I do not wish to weary the House, but I will quote a short extract from the speech of the late Hon. Sir Leonard Tilley on that occasion. Sir Leonard Tilley said:

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us see where we stand at this period in the proceedings. Here an opportunity was open to those hon. gentlemen when the Government was formed, of which the present leader of the Opposition was a member. They went to the country and declared distinctly that this policy would be carried out. They brought down a Bill and placed it upon the Statute-book giving 54,000,000 acres of land and $27,000,000 for the completion of that road. They provided for $1,400,000 to be paid in addition to that, and they practically provided for $13,000,000 to be paid in addition, which, if you add the whole together is $41,500,000 and 54,000,000 acres of land. They undertook to build a telegraph line in addition to that at a cost of another million dollars, making the whole expenditure under the Bill of 1874, and under the contracts they entered into subsequently $96,000,000—making it infinitely more expensive than the proposition of 1873 and more expensive by $20,000,000 than the proposition now on the Table of the House.

That was the statement of Sir Leonard Tilley, in reply to the criticisms made by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) and other gentlemen who attacked the policy of the Government in respect to that question. Now, we had, as I said before, the predictions of those hon. gentlemen on that occasion, and we have had an opportunity of knowing to what extent those predictions were verified. It is enough for us to point to the fact that the people of this country, on the first opportunity, returned that Government to power, and on the next opportunity returned them to power, and continued them in power for eighteen years subsequent to the passing of that measure by Parliament. A better vindication of the position taken by the Government of that day could not have been expected.

Now, I do not wish to delay the House very much longer, but I was amused to hear the argument made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) a few days ago. That hon. gentleman came to the rescue of his colleagues in the Government who were more actively engaged in connection with this contract; and I do not know that I would be infringing on any right if I were to quote from a paper well known to hon. gentlemen, an independent paper published in the city of Montreal, the Montreal "Star," its view of the statement made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture on that occasion. But before proceeding to read from that paper, I must confess that I was rather amused, coming as I do from a constituency on the Atlantic Coast and thereby having some knowledge of the difficulties that attend navigation, to hear the proposition made by the hon. Minister with respect to means of navigation from Victoria, or Vancouver, or Port Simpson to Fort Wrangel. The hon. gentleman proposed that it was quite expedient to build barges and sail them from Vancouver to Fort Wrangel, whence they could go up to the railway terminus on the Stikine River at Glenora or Telegraph Creek. The hon. gentleman contended that they could be of such dimensions and construction as would enable them to be towed from Victoria or Vancouver all the way up to Fort Wrangel, and thence to Telegraph Creek in order to do away with the necessity for transshipment. Now, we have heard in this House already reference made to the danger of navigating those waters between Vancouver to Fort Wrangel. We also have heard about the difficulties of navigating the Stikine River up to Telegraph Creek. We are told that the water in the Stikine is very low at the very time when this traffic must necessarily be done. During the autumn months, I learn from the information before the House, the water is at times as low as 26 inches in one or more places. Now, anybody that knows anything about crafts that have to be towed or propelled, or have to go under sail on such waters as the Dixon Strait, knows that it would be impossible to have a barge so constructed and of such a size as to be of any use whatever, so far as carrying freight is concerned, in such shallow water as in the Stikine River. It is questionable whether it is possible to have a barge or steamer constructed that can go to Telegraph Creek, where it is proposed this railway must start. I could not help thinking, when the hon. gentleman made the suggestion that barges could be towed from Vancouver to Telegraph Creek, of the peculiar position occupied by him, and could only come to the conclusion, that he was at a loss to find use for his cream pans. As we all know, we had an experience of tuberculosis on the Experimental Farm some months ago, in consequence of which my hon. friend's cream pans are becoming rutsy, and I suppose his proposition was to put them on the route between Victoria and Telegraph Creek for carrying supplies to the Yukon. The "Star" thus comments on the hon. Minister's proposition:

VERY LIKE A WHALE.

Mr. Fisher's proposition to extend the all-Canadian route to Canada by means of a line of whale-back barges between Wrangel and Victoria or Vancouver is calculated to strike dismay into the hearts of the Washington tail-twisters. For originality and audacity there has been nothing to equal it since that remarkable voyage of the Wise Men of Gotham. The only thing that approached it was Dobell's fast line of bottle-necked steamers, with all the modern inconveniences, that was going to paralyse the trade of the United States at the rate of twenty knots an hour. It was a beautiful dream, but where is the bottle-necked fleet? Stranded on the reefs of a brutal and unsympathetic money market; striving ever in vain to beat around Cape Despair; or wandering ever in search of that fabled haven known to the ancients as Tarte's new harbour. We may never see our Carcassonne, we may never see Tarte's harbour, or Dobell's bottle-necked Argosies, but we shall never see any empty bottle without thinking of Dobell.

Oh! Andrew Blair, Andrew Blair! If we could only look into your heart of hearts and find out what the Minister of Canals thinks about that whale-backed extension of a pan-American abortion known as the all-Canadian route!

Far be it from us to say that a whale-back barge might not with favourable weather and the luck that favours fools, be towed in safety from Victoria to Fort Wrangel; but having escaped the perils of the sea, how is it going to avoid the breakers of the United States customs? Senator Frye's amendment requires all ships from Canadian ports to the Stikine to report to the United States collector of customs and submit to the regulations dictated from time to time from Washington. That the whale-back would not require to tranship its cargo is true, but the Government which assumes to control the transshipment of cargoes in the Stikine will probably "from time to time" discover new methods of hindering cargoes that are not transhipped. Of what use for Fisher's whale-backs to escape the giant waves of the Pacific and the sharp rocks of the Alaska coast, only to be harpooned in the Stikine River by a Yankee collector of customs!

But our Government is an Administration of infinite resources, and there are quite a lot of Ministers to hear from. Who knows what plan the Minister of Marine and Fisheries may have to propose for the perfecting of the whale-back system? How would it do to have a line of balloons from some point in the Pacific Ocean, just outside the American three-mile limit, where the whale-backs could make close connection with the bottle-necked air ships flying to Glenora direct?

For picturesque variety the all-Canadian route promises to take the cake. The scheme is developing remarkably as it progresses through the House. Each Minister as he speaks seems to have something to add or something to subtract. By the time they were all spoken the route will no doubt include transportation by railway, by whale-back, by river steamer, by tramway, by sledges, by toboggan slide, by water chute, by Shanks's mare, and possibly by balloon, not forgetting a United States passport. Although, it promises to be the most characteristic product of our whale-backed, bottle-necked Administration.

I think that is a very proper view of the position occupied by hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches with regard to this claim.

In concluding my remarks, I wish to refer to an instance in respect to the position of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in relation to this measure. I could not help thinking, when I learned of the enormous concessions and franchises given to Mackenzie & Mann by this contract, that the Finance Minister must have had a hand in moulding this scheme. He was Prime Minister of a government in Nova Scotia at whose instance legislation was passed only a few years ago, handing over to a large foreign monopoly the management, control and ownership of vast coal-bearing properties in that province. I need not go into particulars of that great scheme. It is enough for me to refer to the fact that, only a few weeks ago, the Minister of Finance had to leave his place here in Ottawa and join the present Prime Minister of Nova Scotia on a mission out of Canada altogether, a mission to Boston, in the United States, to interview this monopoly and induce them to recede from a position that they had taken under the authority of legislation passed at the instance of the government when the Finance Minister was Premier. That which led up to this mission was the fact that some of the best coal mines in the constituency I have the honour to represent, were closed by this monopoly that had been brought into existence by the so-called Fielding-Murray government. Under the powers given to the Dominion Coal Company by that measure, that company closed down two of the most important collieries under their control, one colliery known as the Victoria Mine, and the other known as the Gower Mine, throwing out of employment thereby people upon whom there depended for the necessaries of life about three thousand souls. In addition to that, a large number of the people who were labouring in these mines had invested their earnings, over and above what was necessary to maintain them from day to day, in homes which they expected to enjoy for the balance of their lives. The closing down of the mines threw them out of employment, and thus they could not occupy the houses that they had worked so hard to make their own, nor could they dispose of them in any way. It was not until all this came about, that the Finance Minister realized the nature of the injury he had inflicted upon the people by this improvident legislation. He went to Boston, and when he got to Boston reports reached these people of offers being made unfair to the people.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not wish to interfere with the hon. gentleman's argument, but I have been trying for some time to see how this argument affected the debate on the second reading of the Yukon Bill. If the hon. gentleman brings it as an illustration in support of his contention, I shall be glad to have him show how it applies.

Mr. McDOUGALL. My purpose is to give to this House and to the country an illustration of the future effects of this monstrous measure that we have now before us. We have had experience in Nova Scotia of this reckless method of placing at the disposal of monopolies the interest and property of people. This is a perfect illustration of the result of the contract now before the House, if carried into effect. These great collieries were brought into existence by the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of capital, some of it invested by our own people and some by English capitalists. The result is that to-day these proerties are valueless to the people of this country, and property which was always recognized as the heritage of the people, the coal in these lands, that existed previous to the coming into existence of this monopoly, is now locked up. Under these laws, these properties could only be held by people under lease extending over twenty years, and under these leases the properties had to be worked under penalty of forfeiture. Their working was in the interest of the country. But, under the legislation passed at the instance of the Finance Minister—whom I am now glad to see in his seat—a monopoly was created and power was put in the hands of these people to hold these properties without conditions of forfeiture for a term of ninety-nine years—not twenty years, as under the old laws. The humble, hard-working prospector or miner of the Yukon will occupy in the future the same relation to Mackenzie & Mann, in the development of the gold areas, as do the miners in my county to this great monopoly. Under this contract, Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann have power to hold these properties, to work them or not work them. Do the Government give the same privilege to the honest free miner or prospector, to the poor man who goes there to make money or earn a bare living? Such a man must forfeit his locations unless he pays a certain consideration each year, and also does a certain amount of work, whether he takes mineral out of the property or not. Is not this precisely the same position as that occupied by the poor miners down in Cape Breton, who are to-day rendered homeless, scattered through the country, here and there, among friends, and some without friends or means, their property rendered valueless, and all through this legislation passed by the legislature of Nova Scotia? Under the old law of the province, these mines could not close down. Those who held them had to work them or surrender them to the Crown, when they could be handed over to somebody who would work them. We are in no such position with regard to the monopoly existing to-day.

Therefore it is that I found myself compelled in the present instance, in order to give hon. gentlemen in this House my experience and the experience of my people in these large monopolies, and in order to give my constituents an opportunity of understanding more thoroughly the effect of this measure upon their interests, to bring forward this case as an illustration, and a fitting illustration, of the contract that is now before the House; and I take it that when you consider these circumstances you cannot object to my doing so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not object to the hon. gentleman bringing up the illustration, but what I objected to was his wandering into a great deal of extraneous matter. Of course, the illustration is very apt.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Sir, I look upon this deal as an improvident deal. I look upon it as a sporting deal, because the Government has not invited proper competition for building the road, and has no authority for making such a bargain. I look upon it as a gambling deal, because the Government are unable to tell us to-day whether they are giving a consideration worth five millions, or fifty millions, or 500 millions, for the performance of this work. They are unable to fix any figure, although we have before the House the information of competent engineers as to what that work should cost. The hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Dobell), when speaking yesterday made some allusion to the alleged fact that the Government were unable to ascertain what this road would cost. Why, Mr. Speaker, the Government had the same means of ascertaining approximately the cost of building this road that they have of ascertaining the cost of building any other road in any other part of the country. No Government can be positive as to the actual cost of building a work of that kind in any part of the country otherwise than by the estimate given them by competent engineers, which they have in this case. I look upon it as a reckless deal, because it is absolutely without guarantee for the operation of the road in the public interest. I look upon it as a monstrous deal, because the Government are giving such immense franchises, franchises of which they cannot tell themselves the value. I look upon it as an outrageous deal, because it takes from the people of Canada from four to five million acres of the best gold-bearing lands in the Yukon district, on which the eyes of the people, not only of all Canada are fixed to-day and have been for months past, but the eyes of the whole world, I may say, are fixed upon the gold-bearing lands of our Pacific Coast regions, I look upon it as an unwarranted deal, because this Bill has for its object the placing at the disposal of the people who want to enter into that country the means by which they may do so in providing them a railway only 150 miles in length. As I explained yesterday, a man coming from my part of Canada would take about twenty-two days to reach the Klondike district, and all this great undertaking on the part of the Government, for which they are bartering away the most valuable gold-bearing locations in that country, will afford to that man is, according to the estimate of the Minister of the Interior, a ride of five hours. Now, I am willing to take my own estimate of about fifteen hours, and even then all the conveniences that are to be provided by this monstrous proposition will be only fifteen hours out of twenty-two days. In view of these circumstances, I feel that I would be failing in my duties to my constituents, and to the people of this country, if I did not raise my voice against this contract. As I said yesterday, if it were my own business, I would proceed with the building of a wagon road for present purposes, because, even if this road is built by the 1st of September next, we will only get four or five weeks of benefit from it during the next sixteen or seventeen months. In view of these circumstances, I would look at it from a business standpoint, and adopt the plan for the present of building a good wagon road thereby giving the country five months connection, and by the time the season would be near its close, then there would be ample time for the Government to proceed with some better means of communication if they thought necessary to do so. From the time of the close of navigation, which takes place in October, until some time in the following May, or perhaps the 1st of June, no communication can be had beyond this 150 miles of railway, for people who are going into or coming out of that country. If they attempt to get from Dawson City by any means to the end of this road at Teslin Lake, or if they reach the Stikine River at Telegraph Creek, they may come at a time when there is too much ice to permit any kind of craft coming down that river. The route is subject to all these disadvantages and inconveniences, and consequently from the close of navigation next fall until the opening of navigation in 1899, we cannot expect any benefit from this railway. Even if the Government were willing to abandon this contract and to proceed in some other way, I would not be ready to support even the proposition of Mr. Hamilton Smith of giving such a large concession as he asks for performing the same work; that is, I would not be willing to go so far as to say, even with the information now before us as to the benefits that are to accrue from the completion of this work, that I would sanction a contract with Hamilton Smith for the performance of the work for one-quarter the amount that is to be given under this contract to Mackenzie & Mann. I believe that the best way of giving proper communication between the most important sections of Canada and this great Yukon district is an all-rail route from some point in the Northwest Territories, a route that can be used every day in the year.

I am willing to go as far as any hon. member on this side of the House in aiding the construction of an all-rail line to that country, and I would go so far as to say that I would be willing to support such a measure undertaken by the Government, and would be willing to vote the money required for the building of the road. Why? Because it would give us every-day communication with that country; it would afford the people of every part of the world the means of getting there, and because, and this is a reason of still greater importance, our people engaged in the industry of farming and producing food products, of which very large quantities will be required in that mining country, would be able to send produce there. A large quantity is required there now. Where did it come from and under what circumstances do they get it, will they get it by the Stikine River? It will be subject to four or five different modes of transit, thereby increasing the freight rates and enhancing the cost of food supplies, and even after this railway is built as proposed under this contract food will be very little cheaper in that region than it is to-day. I consider it is the duty of hon. members of this House to look at this question from a business standpoint, to look at it from the standpoint from which they would view it if considering it in their individual and business interests. Looking at it from that standpoint, hon. members having the interests of all the different classes to consider, the interest of the farmers, the interest of our manufacturers, the interest of our producers generally, and remembering there is nothing to be obtained in that country that is needed for consumption except what is brought in, hon. members should seek to secure that market for our own people who produce the articles that are there required. With that object in view it is the duty of hon. members to devise the best means by which our people and our producers can get into that country, and at the same time reduce the cost of food products there, the high prices of which take away largely from the profits of the people who go there to seek their fortunes. Under these circumstances I cannot do anything else than vote against the measure before the House or any measure of the kind introduced by the Government, and in doing so I feel I shall be discharging my duty not only to my constituents but also to the people of Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has been trying to come to a conclusion for the last hour and a half, and I have now much pleasure in congratulating him on having arrived there, and no doubt you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members on both sides of the House are equally pleased. I like to see a man industrious. I like him to spend his industry when there are products to be expected, but not to use his industry in turning the grindstone long after the grindstone is worn out.

I rise to speak briefly on the Yukon question, and particularly on the Yukon Railway question. You understand, Mr. Speaker, that it was late in the summer that the boom took place; it was not till late in July we heard much about the Yukon. True, we knew that gold had been discovered in that region since 1880, but it was not till about July, 1897, that the boom commenced, and consequently the Government had not very much time to make arrangements until well on in the season. I am sure that the country will congratulate the Government upon the energy, push and despatch with which they entered on the duties lying before them.

The first step they took was to pass a mining law applicable to that country. It was necessary to make suitable regulations, and the Government made a wise provision whereby the country would realize a certain amount of profits that were to be obtained from that section. This they did by securing to the country every alternate claim, and in that way, wherever a rich find is made, the Government will expect to be recouped in a large degree. The next step they took was to provide protection for property, limb, life and freedom in that country, and they sent Major Walsh and a posse of police for the purpose of maintaining law and order in that section. The next step taken was when the Minister of the Interior crossed the continent and went to see for himself the actual condition of the country, where the rush was going on, and he proceeded to the neighbourhood of Dyea and Skagway and different points. He went there for the purpose of understanding and knowing the necessities of the case. He not only went to those points, but I understand he ascended the Stikine River to examine for himself, so far as time permitted, the navigability of that stream; and so soon as it was determined to prepare for the general rush, the fall was nearly over. The Government after arriving at the conclusion that a railway was necessary, acted with the greatest despatch and energy that could reasonably be expected from any body of men.

There are several questions on which I think both sides of the House are tolerably well agreed. We are largely agreed in respect to the necessity of building a railway. I suppose three-fourths of hon. gentlemen opposite believe it is necessary to build this railway in order to secure the trade of that region to the Canadian people, and to provide some way by which people can pass with greater facility than they are passing now into that far country. The present leader of the Opposition stated, when he had a free hand, when he was out in the western country, when he was not controlled by parish politics, when he stood on a higher platform than he occupies to-day, when he viewed matters from a Canadian standpoint, from the standpoint of the interests of the Canadian people—the hon. gentleman at that time expressed himself in these words in regard to the necessity for building the railroad: "It is of vital importance." "It is absolutely essential to the best interests of the country." Then, when he was not controlled by parties here on account of the contest which was going on in Ontario, the hon. gentleman so expressed himself. I understand that he (Sir Charles Tupper) waited upon the Minister of the Interior and pressed upon him the necessity of taking immediate action to secure the trade of the Yukon for Canadian merchants before that trade should be diverted into other channels. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) told the Minister of the Interior also, that, if he took immediate action, not only the Conservative party, but the country, would support him. Now, when the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) came back east, and before meeting these parish politicians, as I have called them, he expressed himself in the city of Montreal, from the exalted position he occupied, from the position of a statesman, from the position of a Canadian, and from his position as a leader—he expressed himself in favour of this road and in favour of the Government taking immediate action to construct it. It was not until after the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) came into this House, that a cosmopolitan—or will I say, a man of the “World”—drew him across the coals for acting in such a way. And do you know, Mr. Speaker, the reason that cosmopolitan gave for condemning the then leader of the Opposition? It was solely on the ground of parish politics, as I shall prove from quoting a paragraph or two from his speech made on that occasion. After telling his leader that he had done wrong, and that he should have consulted the party—his leader before that thought the party was able to rise with him, but, of course, the leader was astray in that opinion—this so-called man of the “World” made this reference—and you will see from it that he did not act in the interests of the Dominion as a whole, nor in the interests of those struggling over the mountain passes to reach that distant country, but that he had in his mind’s eye the interests of the Conservative party in the province of Ontario.

Mr. MACLEAN. Hear, hear. Forty-seven to forty-six.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman acknowledges himself that he was a parish politician, and that, instead of having the interests of the Dominion at heart, he came here to carry out the agreement that was made in the city of Toronto, a few months ago, when this Conservative Union was formed, and when Sir Charles Tupper and Mr. Whitney agreed one to scratch the back of the other, and when the Conservatives were perfectly willing to sacrifice the interests of the whole country in order that the Conservative party here should work in the interests of the Conservative party there. This is what the man of the “World” said, and you will see what object he had in view:

If there is one thing which struck the Conservatives of Ontario more than another, it was the indecent way in which at the close of the last session of the Ontario legislature two subsidies were rushed through which we have now found out were for the benefit of the same people who controlled the Yukon Railway. The Conservatives of Ontario are discouraged.

I may just interpolate here, that they are more discouraged to-day than they were then.

They saw some connection between the subsidies voted at Toronto and the Yukon deal at Ottawa, and looking forward to the elections about to come off in our province they (the Conservatives) expected the Opposition at Ottawa to expose the iniquity of all these deals. Instead of that, however, they found the Conservative leader of the Opposition rushing forward in the most anxious way to approve of the policy of his opponents.

Now, Sir, if this man of the “World” had the interests of the Dominion at heart, he would have sought to show that the policy of his opponents was wrong, and that the leader of the Opposition was wrong in supporting a wrong policy. He did not attempt to show that for one moment, but he endeavoured to show that the leader of the Opposition should not have taken the course he did because the Ontario elections were about to come off, and, by his supporting the policy of the Liberal Government, it might give discouragement to his friends in Toronto. This is the cosmopolitan or the man of the “World” who cannot rise above the world. He does not go high enough to be a statesman; he is working in the interests of a certain section of the country, and he brought his worthy leader—worthy on this occasion—to task for looking at the country’s interests instead of at the interests of the Conservative party in the province of Ontario. Just here I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberals in the province of Ontario are returned to-day with a majority over all about equal to the majority they had four years ago.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The Ontario Liberals came into power four years ago with a majority of only four over all, and they come into power to-day with a majority of more than four over all.

Mr. MACLEAN. Oh, no.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). And in less than two months they will have a majority of ten over all.

Mr. MACLEAN. “We will whack Whitney.”

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another point in the discussion of this Bill upon which we are all agreed, and that is, that this route, as far as possible, should be a Canadian route. That is not quite possible, perhaps, according to the present route selected; but here is what the leader of the Opposition said, when he had a free hand, when he was not bound down by the persons who gathered around him and gave him bad, instead of good, counsel.

There was one route and one route alone and that was the route on the Stikine River and thence from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake.

Now, a number of persons have deviated from that opinion in saying that probably another route was better, and I think the last speaker (Mr. McDougall) has gone so far as to say that the navigability of the Stikine River was of a very doubtful character. I do not know personally, and I must take the opinion of parties who have gone over that route, and those who have written the history of the navigation of the Stikine, tell us that it has been navigable for a great number of years. We know that when the gold find was made in the Dease country, which is some miles out of Telegraph Creek, vessels of large tonnage went up and down that river several times during the year. We are told by Mr. Jennings that it is navigable for large steamers for a large portion of the year, and that, with the expenditure of very little money on one or two places, it is quite practicable for navigation for river steamers built for that purpose and built stronger than those which previously operated on that route.

We are told by some that we will be controlled, to a very large extent, by the United States, because part of that river passes through the disputed territory, or territory now in possession of the United States. If we are to be controlled at all in that respect, Mr. Speaker, it is owing to the blunders of the leader of the Conservative party, who should have given proper information to the commissioners at Washington in 1871, and so prevented the Stikine River from being placed in the position it was then placed in. Whether that will alter the powers we before had on the Stikine, it is a matter for the lawyers to decide, but, in the reading of the two treaties, I have come to the conclusion that the Americans have more control over us since the Treaty of Washington than they had before. Now, let me read the section of the Anglo-Russian Treaty which refers to this subject. It is as follows:—

It is understood that the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, from whatever quarter they may arrive, whether from the ocean or the interior of the continent, shall for ever enjoy the right of navigating freely and without any hindrance whatever, all the rivers and streams which in their course towards the Pacific Ocean may cross the line of demarcation upon the line of the coast described in article 3 of the present convention.

By this provision we had propriety rights; we had all the rights that a proprietor of any of these rivers had. There was to be no hindrance whatever; we were to be under no regulations whatever: we had as much power as if the rivers were completely in our hands. But that was changed in 1871, so as to take the propriety rights from us and to give us back only commercial rights, which, in my opinion, are quite different. The Washington Treaty, article 26, provides:

The navigation of the rivers Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine, ascending and descending from, to and into the sea, shall for ever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty and to the citizens of the United States, subject to any regulations of either country within its own territory, and not inconsistent with such privileges of free navigation.

Sir John Macdonald was our representative on that occasion. He was the man who should have given information to that commission in regard to the treaty already existing and the propriety rights it gave us. If the Stikine River had been left out of the Washington Treaty altogether, we would have more power of navigating it to-day than we have. If to-day there are any difficulties, the responsibility does not rest on the Liberal Government, but on the Conservative party, who failed to do their duty on that occasion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, another phase of the question upon which we are very nearly agreed is that the construction of this railway will benefit Canadian trade. Every person here to-night will acknowledge that if we are to derive any benefit whatever from the proceeds of the Yukon country, we must seek to get into that country, and carry into it the products of the Canadian manufacturer and the Canadian farmer; otherwise these advantages will go to the United States and other countries. Therefore, one of the objects to be aimed at is to build that railway as quickly as possible, and thus to establish an all-Canadian route, which will secure for the Canadian people the trade of that country. The hon. leader of the Opposition, in his free moments, expressed a very sound and logical opinion in regard to this matter. He said:

I felt it my duty as a public man to take the position I did, because there are some questions that are higher than party.

According to the opinion of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) there is nothing higher than party. The hon. leader of the Opposition continues thus:

When it is a question as to whether Seattle or other United States points or Victoria or Vancouver are to be the base of supply, party should be subservient to public interest.

Now, that is sound doctrine; that is the position which every statesman should take; that is the position which every man who is sent here as a representative of the whole country should take. But I am sorry to say that when the hon. leader of the Opposition was soaring so high in the principles of statesmanship, he was dragged down to the level of those who could not follow him; and when they had the caucus and drilled him in, the poor old man had to come to book, and be led by the man of the "World."

Now, we are told that the contract for this railway should have been let by tender. Well, it was well known throughout the country—it was well known to myself, and I am not in the contracting business—that the Government intended, during the coming season, to construct a railway into that country; and surely any contractor who had that information would have interviewed the Government in regard to it. Every contractor in this country knew just as well as those who got the contract that such a road was to be constructed. Mr. Hamilton Smith, who was said to have represented the Rothschilds of England, who was said to-day to be backed by eminent men whose united capital exceeded £20,000,000 sterling, knew that a contract was to be given. He was in the city of Montreal; and I understand also in the city of Ottawa; and do you suppose that if he was in earnest and desired to get this contract, he would not have put himself in communication with the Government, either by letter or personally? Supposing any person was in the position of Mr. Hamilton Smith and wanted to get the contract, would he not have interviewed the Government, submitted his terms to a certain extent, and announced, either by letter or personally, that he was prepared to undertake the work and had the financial backing to enable him to carry it out. The thing is so preposterous that no person can reasonably suppose that he was in earnest or that his proposition was a bona fide one at all.

It is said that the rates of transportation should be stated in the contract. Has there ever been a subsidy given to a railway where the transportation rates were stated? I challenge any member on the opposite side of the House to point out any single one. We were told to-day that a provision as to rates was put in the Canadian Pacific Railway contract, and the Conservative party should be ashamed of it to-day, because it enables that company to make charges to-day which they would not be otherwise enabled to make. That provision is that until they earn 10 per cent on their invested capital, the Governor in Council cannot interfere with their rates. I am sure the man of the "World" will acknowledge that that was a great mistake committed by his party at that time. Now, it is said that the rates should be inserted in this agreement; but have not the Government these rates in their own hands? After making a reasonable calculation and knowing the bulk of travel through that country and the difficulties and the expense of working that road, will they not know pretty closely the tolls that should be charged in order to give a reasonable return upon the capital invested. I think we can trust to the Governor in Council not to allow that company to charge unreasonable rates. It is said that they will make extraordinary profits. I think it was the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) who made a calculation, a few days ago, so wide and extensive that really it would take almost all the figures in the arithmetic to work it out. It is said that figures never lie, but we are told that those who do the figuring very frequently do lie. You can make figures tell anything, and unless you have a sound basis to work upon, your calculations are merely guess work. My hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall), instead of saying that 200,000 people would go into that country, said that this railway could only carry 20,000 or 30,000 people during the season. But if the calculation of the hon. member for West York be right, that of my hon. friend from Cape Breton must be wholly wrong, and these gentlemen may take whichever horn of the dilemma it is most pleasant for them to sit upon. Then there is the objection brought against this contract that we are giving the contractors too much land. Every speaker on the opposite side said that we are giving away half the country. But did any one of them say what amount of land they would give for constructing this road? Would they give one-half or three-quarters the quantity? It is impossible to set a value on this land. It may be of great value and it may not be of any value at all. If you take the gold-bearing lands in any country—California, Australia, British Columbia or anywhere else—you will find that those rich gold-bearing spots are only in pockets here and there, and that after a time the pockets become exhausted and the balance of the country is not worth developing at all. A large proportion, therefore, of this 3,750,000 acres is likely to be just in the same position as the land in the other mining districts in British Columbia.

Again we are told that the Government have not adopted the proper way of selecting those lands. But did a single one of these hon. gentlemen show what system they would adopt or suggest a better system? The system we have adopted is of two kinds. A base line can be drawn along the course of a river and location made along that line, three miles on either side, and three sections of three miles square on either side of that. And the Government are to have every alternate section. Is it not then just as likely that the Government will have rich lands as that the company will. Nobody would want the company to have lands without any gold at all, and therefore the selection along the general route of rivers is just as fair to the one as to the other, and that is the way we wished to divide those lands. The second is by taking a point at any place and running a line due north or south or east or west. It was said the other night that such a base line would take in the whole tract of the river or creek along which most of the gold is found. Now, do you suppose that Providence has come to the aid of Mackenzie & Mann and made the creeks run directly north or south or east or west? I have always understood that the creeks and rivers in mountainous countries are as tortuous as a snake when crawling on the ground. Therefore, one of these points is just as likely to come within the land selected by the Government as by the parties to the contract. Therefore, I see no force whatever in this argument, nor do hon. gentlemen opposite point out a better way of selection, if selection is to be made at all. We know that the company must have large profits in order to reap a reasonable return upon their investment. I think it is stated by Mr. Jennings that the railway will cost nearly $4,000,000. But although I do not wish to place my opinion in opposition to his, I am inclined to think that when we estimate the cost of labour, the cost of getting materials to the ground, and the kind of weather which prevails in that section, the cost will be found to far exceed that estimated by Mr. Jennings in his report. Time, of course, will tell, but in addition to the cost of the railway we must bear in mind that there is the cost of placing steamboats on the Teslin Lake and Hootalinqua and Lewes River all the way down to Dawson City, so that in addition to the $4,000,000 for the construction of the railway, we may add $2,000,000 for steamboats, so that $6,000,000 is likely to be the amount of the investment. Another fact which we must bear in mind is this, that these $6,000,000 will be lying idle about six months in the year, and that the earning power only lasts during five months, so that the income during these five months must be considered as equivalent to the interest on an investment for a year.

Then again, we must come to the conclusion that this boom is not going to last for ever. The history of the country will no doubt not be an exception to that of other gold countries. We have heard a great deal during the last few months with regard to the immense quantities of gold found in the Klondike, Eldorado and Bonanza Creeks. We have heard such stories before and have read such stories, but we know very well that in 1858, when the gold boom broke out in British Columbia, and when gold was found on the Fraser, Thompson and Columbia Rivers, people flocked there from almost every country. Not less than 30,000 found their way there in one summer from California, and Vancouver was built up in a few days. A large number came from the coast, sufficient to constitute the main land into a colony almost in a day. Those people went up the rivers to seek gold, but during three years only $3,000,000 in gold was found. The result was that during the last twenty or thirty years very little gold has been found, certainly not in paying quantities, in that neighbourhood. That may be the story which will be told of the Yukon in a very few years. Again, take the excitement we had over the Cariboo country in 1861, when hundreds of thousands came from all parts of the world and flocked into the Cariboo district. We had creeks there which were just as valuable in gold as the creeks in the Yukon to-day. In the Lightning Creek and Williams Creek, there was as much gold as has been found in the Yukon up to the present, and there were other rich creeks as well. But what has become of the Cariboo gold district? Why, it has petered out. There are only a few miners there now, and had we built a railway into that country, it would not be to-day worth the old rails on it. Take again the Dease country which goes very near the present Yukon, which is at the head of the Stikine River, further up the country. In 1872, we had another boom in that section, and the people used the Stikine River to bring up supplies. They did get a great deal of gold from there—about $6,000,000. The Cassiar country, further up, was about in the same position. $4,000,000 worth of gold came from the Cassiar, and the excitement passed away. The boom has subsided, people are not rushing in. And how do we know but that the Yukon country will be in the same position? I am almost as sure as I can be of anything that in less than ten years, yes, in less than five years, this whole boom will have the bottom knocked out of it, and, instead of having thousands and tens of thousands going into the Yukon district, there will only be a few hundreds there seeking gold as there are now in the Cariboo. Taking all the gold that has come out of all the mines of British Columbia for the last thirty-eight years, we find that it is $57,500,000, or only about $1,500,000 of gold for every year. That has been the result of the work of the thousands of people who went to that country. Bear in mind that that will be the history of the country we are speaking of. In boom times we generally speak in boom style. We are apt to multiply actual amounts by tens and twenties. We have found the same thing with respect to Winnipeg real estate a few years ago. Properties were sold for $20,000 or $30,000 that could have been purchased since for one-tenth of that sum. In Montreal or Toronto there were somewhat similar experiences. In that same way this Yukon country is boomed beyond any value that it possesses in itself. After 18 years since the discovery of gold in the Yukon we have taken out of that country only $4,100,000 worth of gold. This year, I suppose, has produced more than any other, and it may bring out probably as much as British Columbia, but I very much doubt that it will exceed it.

There is another point we must bear in mind, that if we do give Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie a large area of land the gold does not come into their possession until they develop their claims; and we find that on the average it costs $1.25 to develop $1 worth of gold. They may have large finds in some places, but they will have no finds in others, and the average find will be of a very reasonable character, so it is unreasonable to expect that they will realize such large sums as some hon. gentlemen opposite say they will. My own impression is that you will hear the last of the Yukon country within the next fifteen years, and therefore the railway communications that will now be provided at the expense of these parties will be of no further value, the railway iron will be taken up, and people will cease to go there by rail; but probably a few of them will find their way, as in the case of the Cariboo to-day, on foot over the mountains and through the valleys. We are anxious to get that railway in immediately, before the boom is over, so as to catch the large number of passengers that are going in and have the opportunity of carrying their outfits and provisions. Therefore, I contend, the Government could not afford to wait even until the House should meet, because it would have put off this contract and would have made it impossible to construct the road this season. Thus one whole season would be lost, the transportation of passengers and supplies would be carried on through United States channels, and probably by next season, the American route would have been established and it would be impossible to turn the tide of trade towards channels and Canadian business centres. Though we give the contractors this quantity of land, we throw no burden upon the people. We believe, as has been said, that the Yukon should pay for the Yukon, the taxpayers of this country should not be burdened to pay the costs of that railway. Though there are hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of us who will never pick up an ounce of gold in distant parts of the country, we can yet do something to so direct trade as to make a profit even for many who do not go there. There will be a profit for our manufacturers if we can take active steps to accomplish the ends we have in view. Our manufacturers to-day are preparing for that, as a matter of fact. They are ready to supply the outfits required in that country and all the supplies called for by that market. Our railway companies will be benefited, for a considerable portion of the freight that goes into that country will be carried over our Canadian roads. But not a moment is to be lost if that trade is to be secured for Canada. If we delay but a few weeks it means that we lose that trade for a whole year.

This road will result in a great saving. I have made a brief memorandum giving an estimate of what I think it will be agreed is much below what the actual results will be. I have drawn up the figures to show the extraordinary saving that it will be to our people to have these facilities provided. Suppose that 20,000 people are carried by this line. Each person will save at least $100 as compared with what it would have cost him had he been compelled to go by the route over the mountains. It is said that from 150,000 to 250,000 people will go into that country this year. Taking it at only 20,000, this will be a saving of $2,000,000 to those who go there to seek their fortunes. Then there will be a saving of $250,000 on the transportation of their supplies. I believe that that is a low estimate. Then those people will reach the Yukon country in thirty days less time than it now takes them to reach it. Time is money, and if you count this time at only $1.50 a day, that will amount to $900,000. This saving of time as compared with what would be necessary to go in by Dyea or Skagway will represent money actually left in the hands of the people.

Then, take the cost of living for these thirty days, while going over the passes, that will at least be $3 a day. Now, $3 a day for thirty days for 20,000 people will amount to $1,800,000 that will be saved by establishing this route immediately. The whole thing will come to $4,900,000. Now, there is not a single person in the House who can take these figures without concluding that they are very low, that the estimate placed upon the number is very low; therefore, I think, that they can be safely taken as an extraordinary saving to the people who go out there. When we cavil over a few acres of land, a few acres that they say will all turn out to be Eldorados or Klondikes, and when we dispute here, while knowing that this may be saved for the people who go out there, I think we are losing time at the expense of the country. Now, I want just to say a few words of regret. I regret that we cannot save more of that country's wealth to ourselves. That wealth belongs to the Canadian people just as much as the timber limits over which my hon. friend opposite made such an ado a few days ago, only it is of a different character. The timber grows upon the land, the gold is found under the soil. Is there any way by which we could save that to ourselves, instead of giving it to every tramp that may come from China, from Italy, from the United States, from Germany, and from every other foreign land—coming in with empty bags upon their shoulders, picking up our wealth and putting it into their bags, and walking out without saying, Thank you? Can we devise any plan by which some, at least, of that money will go into the exchequer of the Dominion of Canada? If we can, we should adopt it. True, the Government has taken one line of action, and a very wise one, I think, although I fear it will not be successful. They propose to charge a royalty upon the finds of the miners. If a miner finds $500 a week, he has to pay 10 per cent upon it; and, I think, 20 per cent on anything over that sum. But I can see that there must be very great difficulty in collecting that royalty, and, even if we collect it, it would not be uniform. Hundreds go in there, not with a pick and shovel, but for the purpose of obtaining the gold that has been found by the miners; they go in there for the purpose of selling whisky, of keeping dance-houses and gambling-houses; and the poor miner, who works hard all day in a temperature, perhaps 40 degrees below zero, his money goes largely into the hands of people who pay no royalty at all. Now, is there any other plan? A plan suggests itself. We might make every person take the oath of allegiance, when he goes in there; we might say that no person can hold a miner's claim unless he is a Canadian. You know well, Mr. Speaker, that a large number of those who cross the mountains and endure all the hardships to dig gold, will not hesitate to swallow an oath, and the whole Bible, if necessary, to become a citizen of Canada, when they are there. They may take the oath of allegiance and promise that they will shoot the President, and, after they have filled their bag and after they have gone across the mountains and reached the United States, they will take the oath that they will shoot the Queen. Now, how are we to manage that? Well, I have a suggestion. I do not know whether there is anything in it. I hold that we should charge a poll-tax on every man, or woman who enters that country. We might meet them at the boundary and say to them: We have provided you protection; we have sent in Major Walsh with a posse of police for the purpose of giving you all the protection that is necessary in that country; we have built a railway which has cost us millions of dollars, and we have furnished you with these facilities. Now, if you think it worth while, if you think your fortune is in that country, it is not too much for you to pay for all we have given you, say $25. Let us collect that tax from every person who goes in there in search of a fortune, whether it be a hotel-keeper, or a gambler, or even a dancing girl, or any other person who goes there to seek a fortune. This $25 a head would bring us in a large sum of money every year. Suppose it was collected on 20,000 people, it would bring us in just half a million dollars. Why should we not adopt that plan? In British Columbia they have a poll-tax on medical men and on lawyers going in there. A medical man cannot go into the province of British Columbia to practise his profession without paying $100, and many professional men go there and pay the $100 so that they may make a living. What is the difference in principle between that and paying a tax for going into a country to pick up loose gold that is found almost on the surface of the ground? It is a suggestion that I think should be considered. In any case, I deeply regret that of all the gold that is found in that country Canada should get so small a portion, and that the larger portion should go into the United States, into Italy, into all the other countries from which these parties come. I understood the other day from the papers, that a large number of people are coming from even China, sent out by their bosses, who use them as slaves, sent into our gold districts to make wealth for their masters. Therefore, I think it would be wise if some such plan were adopted by which we may secure a portion of that wealth for the people of this country. As it is now getting so late, I propose to draw my remarks to a conclusion. I will not make five attempts to close, as my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) did, but I will immediately take my seat.

Mr. MOORE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 3rd March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 50) to incorporate the Ottawa Montreal and James Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Fraser.)

Bill (No. 51) respecting the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company.—(Mr. Clarke.)

THE QUEEN vs. COULOMBE AND OTHERS.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked,

1. Are the Government aware that the defendants in the case of The Queen vs. Coulombe and others for smuggling whisky, have appealed from the conviction pronounced against them by Mr. Justice Chauveau?

2. Are the Government aware that the hearing of the appeal before the Court of Queen's Bench has been postponed until the October term?

3. Why was such postponement asked for and granted?

4. Were counsel for the Crown authorized to consent to such postponement?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows: 1. Yes. 2. Yes. 3. Postponement granted because of the absence of counsel on both sides from Ottawa in attendance on their parliamentary duties. 4. Yes.

POSTMASTER AT LOWER L'ARDOISE.

The following questions being called, (Mr. Gillies):—

1. Who is the postmaster at Lower L'Ardoise, County of Richmond, at the present time?
2. When was the present incumbent appointed?
3. Who was his predecessor in office?
4. Why and when was he removed?
5. At whose request?
6. Were any complaints in writing against the late postmaster filed with the Government or the Post Office Department?
7. What was the nature of these complaints, and by whom were they furnished?
8. Was an investigation afforded the late postmaster before removing him from office? If so, by whom was the inquiry held?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I would ask that that question be allowed to stand.

Mr. GILLIES. Will the hon. Postmaster General tell me when it will be convenient for him to answer this question. It has been on the Order paper for about ten days, and I would really like to have an answer.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will endeavour to give the hon. gentleman the answer to-morrow.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY

Mr. CHAUVIN (by Mr. Casgrain) asked,

1. Have there been acts of mutiny and revolt committed by the convicts of St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary lately, and what measures have been taken by the Government to establish order there?
2. What is the name of the officer or employee in charge of the administration of the said penitentiary at the present time?
 - (a.) When does the Government intend to appoint a warden?
 - (b.) Does it intend to appoint a warden, or a warden and deputy?
 - (c.) What are the names of those persons who have asked for this place?
3. When will the Government publish the report of the three commissioners appointed to inquire into the administration of the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary, and on what date was the said report delivered to the Government?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). 1. In September last, there were two or three nights in which some disturbance occurred, but order was restored without serious difficulty. Since that time, on three or four occasions, a very few of the more incorrigible convicts have tried to renew the disturbance, but without success. Nearly all the sensational reports which have appeared in the press regarding alleged disturbances at the prison were without any foundation whatever. The measures taken to preserve order were the strengthening of the staff, temporarily, by Dominion Police, and the transfer of experienced police officers from other prisons. 2. George L. Foster. (a) At an early date. (b) Whatever offices are vacant will be filled. (c) We do not believe it is in the interests of justice to answer this question at present. 3. The publication of the report is now under consideration. It was received on February 5th, 1898.

KENNETH MCKAY, LOCKMAN.

Mr. GILLIES asked,

1. When was Kenneth McKay appointed lockman upon the St. Peter's Canal?
2. When were his services terminated?
3. Was Mr. McKay dismissed?
4. If so, why and at whose request?
5. Were any complaints lodged against him? If so, what were the complaints and by whom laid?
6. Was an investigation held, and if so, when and before whom?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Kenneth McKay was first employed upon the St. Peter's Canal in April, 1892. 2. He was dropped at the close of the season of navigation in 1896, and on the opening of navigation in 1897 he was not re-employed. 3 and 4. He was not dismissed, but such of the men who were not needed during the winter season were dropped, and among them was Mr. McKay, who was not re-employed in the spring. 5. There were no complaints lodged against him. 6. No investigation was held.

RAILWAY RATES TO STIKINE RIVER.

Mr. MACLEAN asked,

1. Has the Government any reliable information showing the feasibility of any route or routes for railway purposes from any port on the coast of British Columbia to Glenora, Telegraph Creek or other point on the Stikine River, within Canadian territory?
2. If so, which, in the opinion of the Government, is the best route to be chosen for such a railway, and what (approximately) would be the average cost per mile?
3. If the Government has no reliable information regarding a railway route from the British Columbia seaboard to Glenora or Telegraph Creek, is it proposed to take steps to acquire it, and what (if any) surveyors have been commissioned to undertake the work?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Government has no reliable information as regards a route from a port of British Columbia to Glenora, &c., within Canadian territory. It is not possible, therefore, to state positively that a feasible route for a railway can be found, or if there be one, what would be its cost per mile; but it has been determined to ask Parliament for an appropriation for the bar-ometrical exploration of a railway route within Canadian territory between the Stikine River terminus of the Teslin-Stikine Railway and a suitable ocean port in British Columbia.

BANKS IN THE YUKON DISTRICT.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

Has the Government made any arrangement with the Bank of Commerce for establishing a branch of that bank in the Yukon district? If so, what is the arrangement made? Has any other bank made proposals to the Government looking towards establishing branches in the Yukon district?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). There has been some correspondence between the Government and the Canadian Bank of Commerce with reference to opening an agency of that bank in the Yukon district. The correspondence at this moment is unfinished, and I would prefer, if the hon. gentleman will permit me, to let it stand in that position for a day or two. With regard to the second part of the question, no proposal has been submitted to the Government by any other bank, although I am aware, from general conversation, that other banks are talking of the probability of their going in; but we have no proposal from any other bank.

Mr. FOSTER. That part of the question stands, then, for a day or two.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, if the hon. gentleman prefers.

THE ONTARIO COURT OF APPEAL.

Mr. MACLEAN asked,

Whether it is the case, that by reason of the fact that a fifth judge has not yet been appointed to the Ontario Court of Appeal, the appeal to that court in a habeas corpus matter by a prisoner confined (as it is alleged unjustly) in the Kingston Penitentiary cannot be heard? Is it the case that there are ten important appeals standing for hearing by the Court of Appeal, some of which were set down for hearing in May, 1896, that cannot be heard because of the fact that the fifth judge has not been appointed? Does the Government intend to appoint a fifth judge, and, if so, when?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). As regards the first part of the question, I have to say, that the Government has no information on the particular points raised therein. As regards the appointment of a judge, no provision was made during last session for the payment of the salary of a judge; but provision will be put into the Estimates this year for that purpose.

SHIPPING MASTER OF BEAR RIVER.

Mr. MILLS asked,

1. Has Mr. Thomas H. Miller been dismissed from the office of shipping master of the port of Bear River, Nova Scotia?

Mr. BLAIR.

2. If so, why was he dismissed?
3. Has Albert Harris been appointed in his place?
4. If so, how old is Albert Harris?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Yes, by Order in Council, 13th January, 1898. 2. As it was satisfactorily established, by an official investigation under oath, that Mr. Miller was an active and strong partisan both before and at the time of the late general election of 1896. 3. Yes, by Order in Council, 13th January, 1898. 4. Sixty-eight. Mr. Harris is a retired merchant, and is represented to be "a good, reliable and respectable man," and that he would make a good official. The duties at Bear River are comparatively light, and the shipping fees received by the former shipping master for the year 1896 amounted only to $84.60.

POSTMASTER AT STE. ANNE DE BEAUPRE.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked,

1. Was Albert Godbout, postmaster of St. Anne de Beaupré, dismissed?
2. If so, was an investigation held into his conduct before he was dismissed?
3. Did the officer investigating the charges made against him report that such charges were proved?
4. What is the reason of said Godbout's dismissal?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Mr. Albert Godbout, postmaster at Ste. Anne de Beaupré, has been dismissed. 2. An investigation was held before dismissal. 3. The officer who investigated the charges against the postmaster, confined himself to forwarding the evidence taken on oath. 4. The postmaster was dismissed for having taken an unduly active part in elections, as shown by the evidence.

BRITISH VESSELS SEIZED BY RUSSIA.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

What is the present position of the claims on behalf of British vessels seized by Russian authorities in Behring Sea?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. The validity of the claims in respect of the schooners "Ariel" and "Willie McGowan," seized in the North Pacific Ocean in 1892, has been recognized by the Russian Government, and a sum of $40,078.75 has been paid over by that government to satisfy them. The respective amounts payable to these vessels will be available so soon as necessary preliminaries are arranged, and the name of a responsible person entitled to receive the same, on behalf of each vessel, has been ascertained and satisfactorily established. 2. The validity of claims in respect of the seizure of the schooners "Maria," "Carmolite," "Rosie Olsen" and "Vancouver Belle" and the warning of the schooners "C. H. Tupper" and "W. P. Hall" has not yet been admitted by the Russian Government; but diplomatic correspondence has been renewed between Her Majesty's Government and that of Russia, in connection with such claims, since Russia's settlement of the "Ariel" and "Willie McGowan" cases, and it is hoped the arbitrator may shortly be appointed.

GRANTS TO CHEVALIER DROLET.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

What is the extent of the mining concessions granted to Chevalier Drolet?

How much has been paid, and how much is still payable thereon?

What are the conditions of tenure and operation?

Has he the right to lease or sell these concessions?

Has the Government any knowledge as to whether he has, in fact, disposed of the whole or a part of them for a large sum of money?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Thirty miles of the submerged bed or bars of the North Saskatchewan River. 2. No payment has yet been made, as the first yearly rental is not payable until the 1st July next. 3. The conditions of tenure and operation are contained in an Order in Council issued in the matter, which will be laid on the Table of the House if moved for in the usual way. 4. Yes. 5. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman lay the Order in Council on the Table?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. If you move for it, I will do so.

Mr. FOSTER. Without moving for it?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes.

LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

Who is now the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories?

Has Mr. Mackintosh tendered any resignation of that position to the Government, and, if so, what was the date thereof?

Has the position been offered to any person, and, if so, to whom, and with what results?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Mackintosh is at this moment Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories. He tendered his resignation, to take effect on the 1st of January last, but it has not yet been accepted. Pending the acceptance of his resignation, I am not in a position to give any more information on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. The question I asked was what was the date of his resignation, not the date at which it would take place.

The PRIME MINISTER. I cannot give the hon. gentleman precise information as to that; I understood he wished to know when it would take effect. My impression is that the resignation was handed in in December or November.

GOLD DREDGING LEASES.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

What is the total length of the river gold dredging leases granted to date in the North-west and the Yukon; on what rivers or streams, and to whom?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The information asked for is properly the subject of a return, and will be brought down in that form, when an order is obtained in the usual way.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

Have any leases for dredging for gold on the rivers or streams in the Yukon or North-west Territories been granted to John Connor, of St. John, N.B., and, if so, to what extent, where, and for what consideration?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No lease has been granted to John Connor.

RED POINT WHARF, P.E.I.

Mr. MARTIN asked,

1. On what date did the Government assume control of Red Point Wharf, Lot 48, in Prince Edward Island?

2. Is the Government aware that its bad condition for some time back, has seriously interfered with shipping?

3. Has the Government engineer reported to the Government as to the condition of this work or the sum required for repairs?

4. Has the Government decided that repairs shall be made on this wharf in order to have it ready for spring shipping?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. The Order in Council accepting the transfer from the government of Prince Edward Island of Red Point wharf is dated 20th October, 1897. 2 and 3. It has been reported to the Government that a sum of $1,000 will be required to effect the needed repairs to that wharf. 4. The information will be given when the Estimates are laid before the House.

TIGNISH BREAKWATER—TENDERS.

Mr. MARTIN asked,

1. How many tenders were received by the Government for the construction of the work on the breakwater at Tignish, in Prince Edward Island, in the year 1897? What are the names of the parties tendering, and the amount of each respectively?

2. Was the contract awarded the lowest tenderer, to whom, and the amount obtained?

3. Has the department appointed an inspector of the work? If so, what is his name?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Ten. The tenders are as follows:—

John Burns, Ottawa.....	$ 6,770
Félix Sauvageau, Montreal.....	7,320
J. H. Myrick & Co., Tignish, P. E. I.....	8,725
Hugh McDonald and C. W. Mof- fatt, Sydney, C.B.....	9,750
A. J. McFadyen, Tignish, P.E.I..	10,450
John P. Brennan and Richard Keeffe, Alberton, P.E.I.....	11,775
John Heney and Henry Smith, Ottawa, Ont.....	12,061
J. B. McManus, Memramcook, N.B.....	12,500
J. E. Simmons and D. C. Bur- pee, Gibson, N.B.....	12,940
R. Fennell, Ch. H. Chandler and Michael Eagen, Charlottetown, P.E.I.....	17,445

2. Yes, to Mr. John Burns, of Ottawa, for $6,770. Mr. Burns has asked the department to accept the assignment which he has made of his contract to Messrs. James H. Myrick & Co., and by Order in Council, dated 14th February last, the assignment in question has been accepted. 3. No Inspector appointed as yet.

AGENT OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE AT CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.

Mr. MARTIN asked,

1. Who was the agent for the Department of Justice at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, during the year ending 31st December, 1897?

2. Was he paid a salary or did he collect his fees?

3. What amount did he receive for his services during the said year as salary or fees, or both?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). 1. A. P. Walker. 2. Paid by fees and received no salary. 3. The fees during the previous year amounted to $247.78.

WEST POINT PIER, P.E.I.—TENDERS.

Mr. MARTIN asked,

1. Has the contract for the construction of West Point Pier, in Prince Edward Island, been let, and to whom?

2. How many tenders were received for the work, and what are the names of the parties tendering, and the amount of each tender?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Yes, to Messrs. McDonald & Moffatt. 2. The following tenders were received:—

Hugh McDonald and C. W. W. Moffatt, Sydney, C.B.....	$ 9,500
Félix Sauvageau, Montreal.....	9,717
John Burns, Ottawa.....	9,770
Angus McKinnon, Coleman, P.E.I.....	11,450
J. E. Simmons and D. C. Burpee, Gibson, N.B.....	11,750
Heney & Smith, Ottawa.....	11,901
J. P. Brennan and B. H. Ram- say, Alberton, P.E.I.....	13,891
J. B. McManus, Memramcook..	14,372

Mr. MARTIN.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES.

Mr. McINNES asked,

1. What steps have been taken to determine the boundary line between Canada and that portion of Alaska contiguous to British Columbia?

2. Has the Government protested against the United States occupying and assuming control of Dyea, Skagway and other portions of Alaska alleged to be Canadian territory?

3. What action is now being taken, or is contemplated, by the Government to bring about a settlement of the Alaska boundary question?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Under the first article of the convention entered into at Washington in 1892, Messrs. T. C. Mendenhall and W. F. King were appointed commissioners on behalf of the United States and Her Majesty respectively to make a coincident or joint survey of the territory adjacent to the boundary line in question, "with a view to ascertainment of the facts and data necessary to the permanent delimitation of said boundary line in accordance with the spirit and intent of the existing treaties in regard to it between Great Britain and Russia, and between the United States and Russia." Surveys were accordingly made between latitude 54 degrees and 40 minutes and the 141st degree of longitude, in the years 1893, 1894 and 1895, and on the 31st December, 1895, a joint report was signed by Mr. W. W. Duffield, who had replaced Mr. T. C. Mendenhall as United States commissioner, and Mr. King. This report, with accompanying maps, was laid before Parliament in 1896. No determination of the position of any part of the line was made by these commissioners, their duties being confined by the convention to the ascertainment of facts and data. 2 and 3. The matters referred to in the 2nd and 3rd questions are now receiving the attention of the Government, but it is not deemed to be in the public interest to make any statement in regard to them at the present time.

JUDGE PRENDERGAST.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

Has the Government considered the necessity for a commission of inquiry in the case of Judge Prendergast, of the County Court, in the province of Manitoba? Is it proposed to issue a commission of inquiry into this case?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Government have considered this subject and come to the conclusion that there is nothing to inquire into.

MERCHANDISE IN AMERICAN VESSELS

Mr. KAULBACH. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, and with your permission, I desire to call the attention of the right hon. the leader of the Government to a matter, appearing in the Toronto "World" of yesterday, of vital importance to the province to which I belong, and to Canada as a whole. We having four members from the maritime provinces representing our interests in the Cabinet of this Dominion causes me to doubt the correctness of the statement. But, if true, it would be a death-blow to the greatest industry in Canada, as it is her great source of wealth. I refer to our deep-sea fisheries, and I would ask as the most provident thing to recall such a deal at once. The announcement is as follows:—

Washington, D.C., March 1.—The Secretary of the Treasury has received through the British ambassador, information that the Canadian Government would hereafter allow American vessels to carry merchandise from one port in Canada to another.

I would ask the right hon. the leader if this statement has any foundation.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am happy to relieve the feelings of the hon. gentleman by telling him that the statement made in the Toronto "World" is absolutely incorrect and untrue.

Mr. MACLEAN. The hon gentleman who read the paragraph should have stated that it came as one of the ordinary press despatches from Washington.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am sorry to learn that the hon. gentleman takes his inspiration from Washington.

TREASURY BOARD RECOMMENDATIONS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the Government to the fact that a motion was carried in this House last session, as follows:—

Resolved,—That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying His Excellency to cause to be laid before this House a copy of schedule B, showing recommendations of the Treasury Board, as submitted by report of Council to His Excellency the Governor General on the 6th and 7th July, 1896, and intended to be approved by him, laid upon the Table of the House last session, with a statement of the action taken by the Government on each of these appointments as made by the said Order in Council approved by His Excellency, or where no action has been taken, the reason for such a course.

This is a motion carried during the last session of the House, and I understand that it has not been complied with. I wish to ask my right hon. friend whether it will be necessary for me to put another motion upon the paper, or whether this motion of last session will be complied with and the papers brought down?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am somewhat surprised to hear that the motion has not been complied with. If the hon. gentleman will send me the volume referring to it, I will have it attended to.

MR. OGILVIE'S KLONDIKE REPORT—FRENCH TRANSLATION.

Mr. MONK. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the Government to a matter which has already been referred to by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte). It is in regard to the French version of Mr. Ogilvie's report. I am receiving letters quite frequently from my French constituents in reference to Klondike, and I would like to ask the Government what progress had been made in the translation of that report, and how soon we may expect to have the French version. It is a pity there has been so much delay in the French translation.

The PRIME MINISTER. There has been no delay whatever. The matter has been attended to and is being pushed forward with all speed possible. We realize fully the great importance of having this valuable report circulated amongst the French population.

Mr. FOSTER. Might I ask whether Mr. Rose or the Government is to bear the cost of that translation?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The firm of Hunter, Rose & Co. bear the cost of the translation.

Mr. FOSTER. They certainly should.

MR. HAMILTON SMITH'S OFFER.

Mr. IVES. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to say that many, in fact all of the most sensible men in the world, never come to an absolute decision without sleeping the night over it. The right hon. gentleman has had a night's sleep since his refusal yesterday to lay on the Table the cablegram to Lord Strathcona, and I would like to know to-day if he still absolutely refuses to lay that message before Parliament?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Orders of the Day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was waiting for my right hon. friend to reply to the inquiry from this side of the House, but as he does not seem disposed to answer, I want to draw the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the fact, that an omission—whether by accident or design I am not able to say—has evidently taken place in the contract that is now before the House. The Minister of the Interior gave to the public the Klondike Official Guide by Mr. Ogilvie, and it is dated the 27th January, two days after the contract was made with Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie. I find it stated officially in this work, officially given to the public by the Minister of the Interior that :

River steamers will ply all summer from the mouth of the Stikine to Telegraph Creek. A wagon road with abundance of transportation facilities will be available from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake, and steamers will be plying on this lake and on the Hootalinqua, Lewes and the Yukon rivers.

As there is no mention made in the contract of the wagon road which the Minister of the Interior has informed the public would be immediately available upon the disappearance of the snow, and as it is a very important matter, I thought it was possible that that clause which the contract must have contained when this official document was prepared, had by some inadvertence been unfortunately omitted. I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of the Interior to that omission.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I do not think there has been any inadvertent omission in the contract, and I think the statement contained in the Official Guide will be found to be correct.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the Minister of the Interior omitted one important particular in his answer, and that was whether this road was to be constructed at the expense of the Government or at the expense of the contractors.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The Official Guide simply stated what accommodation will be furnished to the people there. There was no statement in the Official Guide that the Government would construct it or that the contractors would construct it.

WEST PRINCE, P.E.I.—NOTICE OF VACANCY.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to the fact that a vacancy has occurred in the riding of West Prince in the province of Prince Edward Island in this House, by the death of our late colleague, Stanislaus F. Perry, and I trust that a writ may forthwith issue in order that the said riding may be represented in Parliament at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. SPEAKER. This is the first formal intimation the Chair has had of the vacancy caused by the death of the late hon. member for that riding. Notice will be taken of this information now, and it will be entered on the Minutes, and the Speaker's Warrant will at once issue for a new election.

Sr CHARLES TUPPER.

YUKON ADMINISTRATOR WALSH.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to the fact, that some fifteen days ago the right hon. the leader of the House was asked as to whether he would lay on the Table the instructions and commission to Administrator Walsh. The right hon. gentleman promised to lay these papers on the Table, and I draw his attention to the matter again as it is important we should have them.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Blair for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) an Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, representing as I do an important, an intelligent and a wealthy rural constituency which is deeply interested in the discussion now going on in this House upon a most important question, I do not feel that I would do justice to the position which I hold ; I do not feel that I would be doing my duty to my constituents, to myself, and to this country if I did not give expression to my sentiments on this question. I do not expect that I will bring to light any new argument upon this important subject ; I say important subject, because I believe that in the political history of this Dominion none more important has ever been brought before the Parliament of Canada. I have not the assurance to think that I can throw any great light upon or add any new interest to this question, which has been discussed so fully, so freely, and so ably by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. My expectation is not to make an oratorical display, but merely to have a business talk upon a business question with business men and in a business way. The announcement that rich finds of gold had been made in the Yukon district ran like an electric shock throughout this country, throughout this whole continent, and I may say throughout the whole world ; and the eyes of people of various countries, and not only their eyes, but their feet, have been directed to that field of operations, in which they expect—and I hope their expectation will be realized—to reap a bountiful harvest. It is therefore a matter of necessity, which I think will be conceded by gentlemen on both sides of the House, that some means of transportation should be provided of a more rapid and cheap nature than now exists, to enable the miners and their supplies to be landed in that country. We do not disagree in regard to the importance of having a railroad. It is the manner of building that road that causes the contention in this House and throughout the country.

I had the pleasure last evening of listening to a very able speech by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Macdonald), who made statements and gave us figures in regard to the benefits to be derived from the construction of the Yukon Railway, with the most of which I can agree. I can agree with him that it is an important matter to have a railway constructed into that country. I may agree with him that 20,000 people or more will find their way thither. I may agree with him also that a railway would save millions of money to the poor miners who are struggling to find their way into the gold regions of that desolate country. But, Sir, I do not think that the conclusions to which the hon. gentleman came are logical or correct. While it may be true that 20,000 people may find their way in, and that millions of money may be saved to them, I do not think it follows that we should ratify a contract made by this Government in secret a few days before the meeting of this Parliament, by which a large portion of the domain of the Dominion of Canada is given away and a great deal more than would have been necessary if competition had been invited, and other men had had an opportunity to make offers. The hon. gentleman further stated that it would cost $1.25 to get $1 worth of gold out of that country. He further stated that in the course of ten years he believed that country would be worthless, and would be deserted by the miners. But, Sir, none of these statements or prophecies of the hon. gentleman can be considered as a justification of the Government for making a very unfair, unjust, and unbusiness-like contract with these contractors. The hon. gentleman told us that the rush was so great that there was no time to be lost—there was no time to advertise for tenders or to invite competition. But, Sir, I think I am speaking to intelligent men, who are reading men; and if you go back for nine months in the history of this country, you will find scarcely a newspaper published in Canada during that time which omitted to mention the Klondike region, the great excitement that was occasioned throughout the world by the gold discoveries there, and the great ingresses of people who were expected to go into that country in the coming spring. The people of Canada, the United States and all over the world have been discussing this matter for the last nine months; and it strikes me that since the last meeting of Parliament the Government have had ample time to consider this matter, and have had ample evidence that there would be a great rush of people into that country. Yet we have the strange spectacle of a Government, a few days before the meeting of Parliament, making a secret contract with contractors to give them 25,000 acres a mile, or about 4,000,000 acres, of rich gold-bearing lands for the construction of a temporary railroad. There may be some doubts in regard to the feasibility of the route which has been selected. It is not for me to discuss the legal aspect of the question, as affected by the Washington and Russian treaties. But I notice that some hon. gentlemen have gone out of their way to disparage the name of one of the greatest of Canada's late statesmen, the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, and tried to prove that he had injured the interests of this country in helping to carry through the Treaty of Washington. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that in all the transactions we have had with the United States, in all the treaties that have been made between England and the United States in which Canada has been interested, Canada's interests and England's interests have been sacrificed and the United States have come out the gainer, until Sir John Macdonald met them and secured from them the Washington Treaty, which gave to us $5,000,000, and which was a just and honorable treaty, and so recognized by the people of this country. Though these hon. gentlemen do not feel or judge as we do in political questions, yet I think it is wrong on their part to follow the great statesmen of this country to their graves and disparage their memories. Why, Sir, they cannot hurt the name of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. His work stands to-day as a glorious monument to his patriotism and his loyalty to Canada and Canadian institutions, and his name will be handed down to posterity with esteem and honour and will be remembered long after those who disparage it are unremembered and fill unhonoured graves. I regretted also to hear the hon. gentleman speak so disparagingly of that country. It was but a prophecy he made, but I trust that it is one which will not prove true. I trust that the prophecy he made, based upon his experience of other countries and other portions of this country, will not prove correct. I, for one, have great hopes for the future of the country in which I live, and I do not like to think that an important part of it, which we have every reason to believe is richly stored with gold, shall in a few years be abandoned as worthless.

I remember, not many years ago, hearing hon. gentlemen opposite condemn the then Government of this country for having purchased the great North-west for $1,500,000. That country they characterized as a "sea of mountains" which it would not pay to own and govern, and condemned the building of a railway from ocean to ocean to open up to colonization and settlement the vast areas which we purchased for so small a sum, they denounced as a most unprofitable transaction. Yet I have been told that one mine in British Columbia has produced $4,000,000 in gold, almost three times as much as the great North-west cost us, and I shall not undertake to speak of the great returns of farm produce from Manitoba or of minerals from the mines of British Columbia. These have been immense, and the returns we may expect also from the great Yukon district will add greatly to the material prosperity, wealth and population of this country. If, Sir, as the member for West Huron asserts, it takes $1.25 to get $1 of gold, why all this wrangling in this House about so worthless a country? If in ten years time that country will be desolate, surely it cannot be worth our while to undertake to get into it and send our forces in there to maintain law and order, which cannot be done except at great cost. I trust, however, that prophecy of the hon. gentleman will prove false and that this distant region will prove a very important part of this Dominion in the future.

There are other uncertainties with regard to this Teslin Lake route which I shall not discuss, as legal minds are better capable of placing them before the House, but there seems, from the discussion which we have listened to, doubts as to the right of Canada to navigate the Stikine River without coming under the customs regulations and coasting laws of the United States. There is also a doubt with regard to the feasibility of navigating those rivers to and from the Teslin Lake. I am told that in certain seasons the water in them falls so low as to render navigation impossible. I am told also that the Five Finger Rapids are dangerous to navigate, so that taking all things into consideration, there are considerable doubts and uncertainties with regard to this route. But there is no doubt regarding what Canada has to give. We are to give 25,000 acres of land for the construction of a temporary road, of the standard of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway. When you examine the report, you find that this Kaslo and Slocan Railway has grades upon it of 171 feet to the mile and curvatures between 29 and 30 degrees. This, therefore, is to be a narrow gauge road, with rails of only 45 pounds to the yard, and you may guess what kind of temporary affair will be the railway which these people are going to furnish under this contract. We may have some conception of this when we understand that the late Government required all the contractors of the Canadian Pacific Railway on that section between Montreal and the Atlantic seaboard to build the road with a maximum grade of 52 feet to the mile and with maximum curves of six degrees. But if we are paying 25,000 acres of land to the mile, with all the franchises and privileges and the monopolies which are attached to the contract, for a road which the right hon. leader of the Government said was but for a temporary purpose, let me ask the question how much would this economical Government be prepared to pay for a safe, first-class railway into that portion of the country?

Mr. MOORE.

The next consideration I wish to place before this House is the privileges which are given these contractors compared with the mining regulations to which the miners in that country are subjected. I have said that we are giving about 4,000,000 acres of land, or about 6,000 square miles, and when I tell you that 6,000 square miles is as large as six states like Rhode Island in the American Union and as large as Delaware and Connecticut together, the extent of that territory which we are giving for this narrow gauge temporary railway will be better appreciated. Then with regard to the privileges which are given these contractors compared with those given to the miners, we find that while a miner has to take out a certificate for which he has to pay $10 a year and forfeits all right to any claim he may strike unless he has this certificate, the contractors pay nothing. The poor miner has also to register his claim and pay $15 a year to the Government for registration fee, while these rich contractors pay nothing. Then the poor miner is made to pay a royalty of $10 on every $100 he produces in gold, while the rich contractors only pay $1. A company of several miners will pay a fee of $50 where the nominal capital is less than $100,000, and $100 where the nominal capital is $100,000 or more, but these rich, highly-favoured contractors pay nothing. Nor can a mining company hire a miner who has not taken out a certificate and paid his $10 fee, under the penalty of having their mining claims forfeited, whereas these contractors are free to hire whom they choose without any conditions. And while a miner who leaves his claim 72 hours is considered as having abandoned it and it may be cancelled, these contractors are subject to no such disability. These important privileges which are given to the contractors and are withheld from the miners may have serious consequences. When men go in there and find that the contractors are placed in this favourable position, there will be great danger of contention and strife arising. Those men are hardy and brave, they take their lives in their hands, they go out there to make their fortune and they are not going to be deprived of their rights, and if they are interfered with there will be trouble, and I would not be much surprised if blood should be shed and the Government compelled to increase its forces very largely in order to maintain law and order in that distant country. With regard to the monopoly which they are giving in addition to the land, I will point out that, according to section 4 it is provided as follows:—

4. For five years from the first of September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by Parliament to be constructed from Lynn Canal or thereabouts or from any point at or near the international boundary between Canada or Alaska into the Yukon district, and for five years from said date no aid in land or money shall be granted to any person or company other than the contractors and the contractors' company to assist in building any such railway.

Section 5 confers upon them further privileges as follows:—

5. The contractors and the contractors' company shall be entitled to receive in preference to any other person or company during ten years from the said first of September, 1898, such aid or assistance in land or money as the Government may be authorized and may see fit to grant in aid of a line of railway from the Stikine River to an ocean port in British Columbia, provided that the contractors or contractors' company are willing to undertake the construction of the same at once and completion thereof within a reasonable time upon receiving notice thereof from the Government.

Another very important concession granted to this company is that they are to pay only 1 per cent royalty, while the poor miner must pay 10 per cent. What is there in the law or in the mining regulations to prevent these contractors from saying to the miner who goes into that country: Prospect upon our lands instead of the Government lands, and if you find a claim you may work it for 5 per cent royalty, while if you find a claim upon Government land you must pay 10 per cent? In this way, paying only 1 per cent to the Government, these contractors would receive 4 per cent net from the miners, I cannot see any reason why they could not compete with the Government in this way greatly to the loss of the country. And when we consider that these contractors are to select from the country the best portion of the mining land, it must be apparent that the belief will spread abroad throughout the world that the best lands will be in the hands of these contractors and that the contractors can offer better inducements than can the Government. Consequently we are placed in the position not only of turning over these great franchises and benefits and this great area of land but of enabling these contractors to compete with the Government, to the great loss and detriment of the country.

We have heard in this House some very strong remarks regarding the leader of the Opposition. An hon. gentleman said not very long ago that the majority of the people of Canada required that this contract should be ratified by this Government and he sounded a note of warning that should it not be done, the people, when they had an opportunity to pass upon the question would be found strongly in favour of ratifying the contract which has been signed and laid before us by the Government. Well, Sir, I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but when I hear these accusations that are being hurled across the floor with regard to the hon. gentleman whom we have selected as our leader, I feel this—that should the Government succeed in putting this measure through Parliament, then, when the time comes for the great tribunal of this country, the people, to pass upon this question, the leader of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition will be able to lead his followers to one of the grandest, to him, one of the most agreeable victories he has ever achieved in his long and useful career.

Mr. CRAIG. I had no idea, Mr. Speaker, of addressing the House on this question at the present moment. But, as I think it necessary that this matter should be fully ventilated, I shall make a few remarks. We all admit, I think, the great importance of this question. It has been charged that the Opposition are obstructing this measure, that they do not realize the importance of the railroad which is the subject of this contract. Sir, we on this side realize as much as do hon. members of the Government side of the House the importance of measures to secure the Yukon trade for this country. It has been said that the objects of this railway and of an all-Canadian route are, first, that supplies may be got into that country for the people who will be there, so that suffering next winter may be prevented, and also to secure the trade for Canada. I make the declaration here that we are just as anxious to secure the trade for Canada as are hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. In fact, taking the previous record of the two parties, there should be no occasion for me to make any such declaration; for we have found in the past that gentlemen on the other side have advocated the extension of trade with the United States, in fact have advocated doing away with the limitations to that trade, whereas we have always advocated the securing of the trade of this country for the people of this country.

For my part, I have been prepared from the first to give fair consideration to the contract submitted to us. But, Sir, from the way it has been brought to the attention of this House, from the way in which this bargain was made before Parliament met at all, from the fact that the contract has already been signed and the work is actually going on, I fear that we cannot expect gentlemen on the other side of the House to give this matter fair consideration. They are really bound to back up the Government in this case. I believe that if the matter were left to them, clear of considerations of party, a great many of them would take the same view of this question that we do. I have no doubt in my own mind that there are hon. gentlemen on the other side who, while they will vote to put this contract through in order that the Government may be sustained, yet, if they were free to vote according to their own judgment, we should find them opposed to this contract entirely. In order to back up what I say about members on the other side not being free to give this subject fair and independent consideration, I shall read a short selection from a paper which has been in the past, and, I believe, is to-day, friendly to gentlemen on the other side of the House, a paper which has a high standing in the mercantile community of the province of Ontario—I refer to the "Monetary Times," published in Toronto. I notice in last week's paper the following :—

The urgency of the Klondike case will be admitted by all reasonable people. It was necessary to provide some speedy and expeditious mode of getting to that gold region.

There is ground for complaint that decisive steps were not taken sooner to meet this necessity, but the business having been delayed till within a week of the meeting of Parliament, the reason for acting without the authorization of that body could no longer be pleaded. Parliament would, in six days, meet to express its own will, and it was scarcely worth while to anticipate its action at this late stage by an act of executive volition, when nothing was to be gained, in point of time, by the unauthorized contract. If such action could ever be justified, it would have been when the meeting of Parliament was unavoidably far off, and a great gain in time and construction would be made by immediate action. Parliament, under the circumstances, can scarcely consider the contract on its merits ; practically its only function is to assent to a bargain already made. Meanwhile the contractors have no guarantee that the contract will be condoned by Parliament, and the delay must paralyze their efforts both in floating the scheme and in construction.

I think that bears out what I said. I may say that is from an independent source, a paper that looks at the matter from a non-party point of view, it is a paper which, as I said, has in almost every case been favourable to hon. gentlemen opposite ; so I offer my sympathy to many gentlemen on the other side of the House who, I have no doubt, will vote to sustain this contract, but yet in their own minds think, as the majority of the people of this country think, that this is not a good bargain for the country, and ought to be condemned. Now, Sir, I propose, in the short time which I shall address the House, to state some of the objections that I have to this bargain. These objections have been stated by members before, but I think it is important that they should be stated over and over again. We want the people of the country to understand what this bargain was, we want them to know that it is not a good bargain for the country. Of course, hon. gentlemen opposite and their organs throughout the country state their side of the case many times over, and sometimes their organs throughout the country misrepresent what has been said by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House in order to make a point. But I intend to state three or four objections which I consider strong ones, to this bargain and to the way it has been made. In the first place, I object to the way in which this matter was arranged, in that no tenders were asked for. Now, it has been admitted, it was admitted by the Minister of Railways in introducing this Bill.

that generally it is a good thing, and it is only right that tenders should be asked for in matters of this kind. He made that statement ; but he said it was impossible to ask for tenders for this contract, for this great work, because the matter was so urgent. His argument was urgency, and that is about the only argument that he offered. He said the urgency was so great that there was no time to advertise for tenders and receive and consider them. Now, we say that this urgency was caused by the Government's own delay. We maintain that if there was urgency, if there was great urgency, it was caused by the Government's own lack of prompt action. The Minister of Railways, in introducing this Bill, used this language :

Hon. members of this House will recollect quite clearly, that before the close of last session evidence was pouring in upon us of the immense discoveries of gold that were taking place in the Yukon district, and returning parties were bringing the most fabulous accounts of its mineral deposits.

Now, that is the statement of the Minister of Railways, made in introducing this Bill. He says that before the close of last session evidence was pouring in upon us of the immense discoveries of gold in that district, and that returning parties were bringing fabulous accounts of the discoveries of mineral deposits. Now, I hold that if that was the case, if these accounts were coming to the Government before the close of last session, then there was no excuse for them in delaying the matter at all. They should have considered the matter then, they should not have put it off all summer, and then at the last minute find that they were in such a hurry to have this road built that there was no time to advertise for tenders. They have no excuse for delaying this matter at all. While this plea of urgency may satisfy their own followers in the House, and their supporters in the country, I am sure it will not satisfy the people of independent minds who look at this matter without any party prejudice at all. Now, Sir, did the Government act at once when they heard of these reports ? Not at all. They did nothing, they let the matter pass from month to month. I do not know what they were doing, but they were travelling all over the country, and had not time to look into this matter until it got so late that they could not do it properly. So, Sir, while the plea of urgency is given by the Minister of Railways, I do not think that is the real reason, or the only reason, for not asking for tenders. I intend to quote a few more words from the speech of the Minister of Railways, which will bear me out in making that assertion. He said this :

This is not a class of undertaking in which you would propose to advertise for tenders. We have never done so. It was not done by our predecessors, and I presume it never will be done by any responsible Government.

Then he says again :

It would not be an effective way under any circumstances.

And further on :

How could we ask for tenders when no cash was to be given ?

Sir, the only conclusion I can arrive at from all these remarks of the Minister of Railways is that they had no idea at all of asking for tenders. Even if they had had plenty of time, if there had been no urgency in the matter, they would not have asked for tenders. I think there was another reason, and what was that reason ? I believe that reason was this : that they had arrived at the conclusion to give this contract to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. I think the Government did not want anybody else to come in and tender, they did not want tenders at all, and naturally would not advertise for them. While that plea of urgency may avail with some people who do not understand all the circumstances I am satisfied it will not be accepted by the country at large, because, even if they had but a short time, a short time would have sufficed to ask for tenders. It would not take long to invite particular contractors to tender for this work, and to ascertain what they would do it for, and we might have got it done, and no doubt would have got it done, for a much less price than we are asked to pay for it to-day. It is said that Mackenzie & Mann are reliable and responsible men. Well, there is no need of saying that, because nobody disputes that fact. But we maintain that there are other contractors in this country who are capable and responsible men, and we maintain they should have had a chance as well. Now, Sir, had they a chance at all ? Had any other contractors any chance to tender for this work at all ? We have heard one gentleman mentioned in connection with this work, Mr. Hamilton Smith. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have tried to ridicule this gentleman, have tried to insinuate that his offer is a bogus offer, have tried to prove that he has been guilty of—well, I was going to say lying; I suppose that was what was meant, although that is rather a plain word to be used in this House. Well, Sir, how was Mr. Hamilton Smith treated ? We are told that a mutual friend of his informed the Minister of the Interior that he was prepared to call upon the Minister and talk over the building of this railway. Well, now, the Minister of the Interior says he never called on him. We say that the Minister of the Interior should have asked him to call, when he was told that he was ready to call to see him and to talk over this matter. But it is said in reply that the Minister of the Interior had no right to run round after him. Well, I would like to know what Ministers are for. Are they to sit in their offices and wait till people come to them and bow before them ? I hold that they ought to act in these matters as any other business man would act. If I wanted to get some work done, and I heard that some gentleman was willing to do it for a certain price, and was willing to see me about it, I would write him a note and would ask him to call, especially if I was told by a gentleman of such high standing in this community as Sir William Van Horne. We asked the Minister of the Interior if he had made any inquiries about the standing of Mr. Smith, and he says that he made no inquiries about him at all. If he had made inquiries, what would he have found ? Not that Mr. Hamilton Smith was a man of no standing, not that he was a man to be treated with ridicule, not that he was a man who would make offers that did not amount to anything. He would have found that he was a man having a substantial backing, that the man himself was of the highest standing, and those who were associated with him were men able to carry out anything they undertook to carry out. I say the people of this country will hold the Government responsible for not paying a little more attention to Mr. Hamilton Smith when he was willing to call and talk over this matter with the Minister of the Interior. I think it is about time the Ministers learned that the country will not excuse them for neglecting to call on a man respecting a matter of such importance. If a Minister is able to save two million or three million acres of land by going to see Mr. Hamilton Smith, or taking the trouble of asking him to call at the department, the people will not accept the excuse that Mr. Hamilton Smith did not call on him, especially when he is aware that Sir William Van Horne had stated that Mr. Smith was willing to call and talk over the matter of building this railway. The country will not acquit the hon. gentleman of blame in this matter. I notice that the Minister of Railways, in introducing this Bill, talked about other men who would have been glad to build this road. The hon. gentleman said :

I know there were others. I know there were others who felt that they represented large amounts of capital and had untold means behind them, and were willing to enter upon the construction of this road.

As I read those remarks I thought perhaps the hon. gentleman referred to Mr. Hamilton Smith, because he said he was prepared to talk railway with the Minister of the Interior. But the Minister of Railways proceeded to say :

None of those large capitalists materialized, and I did not get my eye on any credentials which went to show that they were prepared and capable of carrying out the undertaking.

I do not wonder that the Minister did not get his eye on others; I do not think he wanted to get his eye on others, for he would not take the trouble to ask to see them. They did not wish to see Mr. Hamilton Smith, who offered to come and talk over the subject, a gentleman with large capital behind him, and it is apparent the Minister of the Interior did not want to get his eye on that gentleman. But, as the Minister of Railways said, they did not see their credentials. The Government did not want to obtain them. They had fixed their eye on two other men to whom they wished and intended to give this contract, and to whom they did give it. The Minister of Railways also said:

They (Mackenzie & Mann) were the only two men we knew who were willing and capable of carrying the work out.

No doubt they were the only men they knew of, because the Ministers would not know any other men. Sir William Van Horne told them about Mr. Hamilton Smith, and the Minister of Railways himself stated in the House that there were others who were willing to undertake the work: he did not say there was only one man but there were others; yet the hon. gentleman said that Mackenzie & Mann were the only men he knew of who were willing and capable of doing the work. I am satisfied from reading the speeches and from statements made by Ministers that the Government were determined to give the contract to these men, and they did not want to know any other contractors. That is one of the objections I take to the contract, and I have endeavoured to make it plain that the Government should have advertised for tenders, but they failed to do so; they declaring that this was on account of urgency, but in my opinion it was because they were determined to give the work to Mackenzie & Mann.

Another objection to the contract is the character of the road to be constructed. It has been described as a tramway, as a narrow gauge road, and at all events it is a road that will not be able to carry a large amount of traffic. I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite read the Montreal "Witness," which is one of their staunch supporters, but the "Witness" in discussing the matter, after it had found out something about the contract, expressed its surprise at the character of the road to be built for the price to be paid, and stated that in view of the high cost a substantial and first-class road should be built, not a tramway or a road supposed to be of a temporary character. The Minister of Railways showed the House in the course of his speech that it was calculated that about 50,000 passengers and 50,000 tons of freight would require to be rapidly carried into that country. I am afraid that a road running only during five months will find it very difficult to carry those people and supplies into that country. I maintain that when the country is building a road to the Yukon it should be a first-class road and not a temporary one such as that proposed under the contract, which will be a tramway, will be constructed with light rails, and will be totally unequal to carrying large numbers of people in and out, together with supplies.

The greatest objection to the contract is, however, the price which the Dominion is going to pay for it. It has been heralded all over the country by supporters of hon. gentlemen and by hon. gentlemen themselves that we are not going to pay any cash, and that there never was a road built without money. That is a very poor argument to use. We may sometimes give what is even more valuable than cash, and we are doing so in this case. Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, say: We are only giving some acres of barren land, in a country where there are no people, and we might as well give away the land. Those men further say that they would not accept the land as a free gift, that the country is practically getting the road built for nothing, and that is indeed what they seek to make the people believe.

What is the price we are paying for this road—what is it the country is called upon to pay under the contract now before the House? We are going to hand over mineral lands, not lands worth nothing, but lands of great value in the money markets of the world to-day. How many acres will the contractors receive? Twenty-five thousand acres a mile, equal to about 4,000,000 acres, or the equivalent of 5,800 square miles. It is pretty difficult to grasp that idea. They are receiving a whole province carved out of the Yukon country. More than that. The Government is not selecting the lands and assigning them to the company, but they are allowing the company to select the land where they please. Again, they have a long time in which to make selection, three years for the first half and six years for the balance. The contractors may have to-day prospectors going all over the country finding out the gold deposits and marking them out. One of the Ministers when speaking on this subject, said the contractors could not commence to make a selection of lands until the 15th June, by which time thousands of miners would be scattered all over the country. I am told that very few men will be able to get over into the country before the middle of May, and no doubt the contractors, who are men of large means, will have hundreds of prospectors picking out the best places, and so soon as the time arrives for taking up the land they will be able to go to the very spots previously selected and take the pick of the land. If we consider the extent of this gold country it is evident that the contractors will practically secure the greater part of the gold-bearing lands of the Yukon district, and the balance left for other people will not possess great value. But I am not surprised that the contractors receive 25,000 acres of land per mile, or 4,000,000 acres in all, the selection being made by themselves, because they have made their own price. Is that denied? The Minister of Railways made that statement to the House himself. The hon. gentleman said: It may be asked why did we agree to give 25,000 acres per mile. The answer is a very simple one, and it is because the contractors would not take less. So we find the Ministers themselves at first appeared to think that they should get the contractors to accept less. They seemed to think it was too much, although hon. gentlemen opposite now say the lands are not worth anything. The truth is that they could not get the contractors to accept less than 25,000 acres per mile, and they had to give it to them. The Ministers were entirely in the hands of the contractors. It is a serious confession for the Government to be obliged to make before the country. Here are two contractors ready to build this road, this tramway, narrow gauge road and temporary road, and when they talk the matter over with the Government they want a certain price, and say they will accept 25,000 acres per mile. The Government say: We think that too much. Mackenzie & Maun reply: We will not take less. The Government are bound to give these men the contract; and so they say: We will give it. That is a strange way to make a bargain for the people of this country, and it is about time the Government stepped out and allowed other men to form a Government who would be able to make a bargain more in the public interest. What would we think of a business man who wants to buy something, but who picks out one man with whom to do business. This man wants a certain price, and the other starts out to beat him down, but the man says: I must have that price, and so the other gives him the price, although he might have obtained it for less money from another person. We believe that the Government might have got that road built by other contractors at a great deal less cost, and we hold the Government responsible that they did not do it. It is said by persons competent to judge, that the road could be built for one-fourth of what the Government undertakes to pay, but take it that it could be built for one-half of that amount, and even then I hold that the Government have shown themselves to be incompetent in making this bargain. They are proven to be incompetent by their own confession. It was a humiliating confession for the Minister of Railways to make in this House when he said: We wanted the contractors to take less, and we tried to cut them down; and when he is asked, why he did not do it, he has to confess that the contractors would not come down in their price, and so the Government had to deal with them on their own terms. There is another strange thing in the remarks of the Minister of Railways about this transaction. He tells us, that the Government wanted the contractors to take less land, and then he winds up by saying: Well, we do not know whether these lands are worth anything or not. He tells us that, after all, perhaps the contractors are getting nothing, because the Government did not know whether the lands are worth anything or not. Sir, it is a humiliating spectacle to hear a Minister of the Crown make such a statement to Parliament, in face of what Mr. Ogilvie says at page 92 of his report. I will read Mr. Ogilvie's statement in this regard for the benefit of the House, for perhaps some members on the other side have not read it, and perhaps, when they hear it, they may vote against this contract because I am sure they cannot endorse the statement of the Minister of Railways, that the Government did not know whether these lands were worth anything or not. Mr. Ogilvie says:

At many of the points mentioned it will pay well for working even under present conditions, and at many others it will pay well when we have such facilities as we expect to have during the next year for entering and developing that region. Attention may be directed to the fact that the whole of that vast district owes its now world-wide reputation to the richness of 140 claims in the Klondike division. One hundred of these are on Bonanza Creek, and about 40 on Eldorado. To use a mining term, many of these claims are "world-beaters," and if the indications now known are worth anything at all, they are worth from sixty to seventy millions of dollars in those two creeks.

Taking this division as a whole, including the three creeks named, affluent to Indian Creek, a district some 35 miles in length and 25 or more miles in width, if the indications can be relied on, there are one hundred million dollars in sight in that area.

And yet we are told by the Minister of Railways that these lands may not be worth anything at all. Mr. Ogilvie's report continued:

No one can guarantee this amount, but the prospects so far developed point to that sum pretty conclusively. This district is exceptionally rich. Nothing has ever been found like it heretofore in that country, in fact, in very few countries has anything been found like it, and while we cannot confidently assert that other finds as valuable as it will be made, it is altogether improbable that gold is scattered over such a vast extent and only rich at a point which is less than the 140th part of the total area. If we add to this part of the northern area of British Columbia, we increase it nearly two-fold, and the comparative area of the Klondike district is much lessened.

Well, Sir, that ought to be conclusive as to whether these lands are worth anything or not. It is a pity that the Minister of Railways and the Government did not read that before they made this bargain, and anyway, it is rather strange that they should make a bargain about a thing they did not know anything about, and did not know whether it was valuable or not.

The Minister of Railways also told us that he did not know whether Mann & Mackenzie had a good bargain or not, but he hoped they had, and I will quote his words, because they are very remarkable, and, I have no doubt, represent the views of the Government on this question.

Whether we have given them in one of those acres a Bonanza or second Eldorado we do not know; we may have done so, but we may not.

It may be, and it looks as if the Minister of Railways did not know anything about what he was doing, but I think Mann & Mackenzie knew something about it. I am strongly of opinion that they knew something about it and that they were not in so much doubt as the Minister of Railways in regard to the value of these lands. Mann & Mackenzie are not the men who would undertake this on spec, and I am quite sure that they had some idea that they had got a Bonanza or second Eldorado. The Minister of Railways again says:

That is all a chance, but it is one of those chances in which, happily for the Government and the country, the risk is all carried and borne by other parties to the contract. We do not assume any risk; they do.

Well, what an absurd statement for a man to make when he is parting with lands which may turn out, as he said himself, to be a Bonanza or second Eldorado. He tells us that the Government may have given Mann & Mackenzie a Bonanza or second Eldorado, and yet he says, in the same breath, that the Government are taking no chances at all, and that Mann & Mackenzie are taking all the chances. How absurd that is. If these lands turn out to be Bonanzas and Eldorados, as the Minister of Railways thinks they may, what will the country think of this bargain then? There is very little doubt that Mann & Mackenzie will select the very best lands in that country, and there is very little doubt that these lands will turn out well. Then, if what Mr. Ogilvie talks about come true, and the lands yield $100,000,000 to the contractors, does any sane person think that the country will hold that the Government was justified in making any such bargain as this? Does the Minister of Railways think that the people of Canada will believe with him, that Mann & Mackenzie took all the chances?

Now, Sir, I will quote from the "Monetary Times" again, and I would impress upon hon. gentlemen on the other side, that this is a commercial and not a political paper. This is what the "Monetary Times" says about the statement of the Minister of Railways, that perhaps these lands are worth nothing at all:

No impartial person can view the continued depreciation of the Klondike gold lands, for which the railway company has bargained, without amazement, the more especially as it is chiefly indulged in by official personages, whose object it is to defend the bargain. Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann are represented as little better than ninnyes for having entered into what is described as the wildest of wild speculations.

We all agree with that, and I think the country agrees with that, too.

Undoubtedly, there's a large speculative element in the deal; but what are we to think of making a bargain of this kind, toward which, when it has been made, one of the parties thereto acts as if it desired to defeat the scheme? Admitting, as we have done from the first, the large speculative element in the deal, we think the odds in the gamble, as it is called, are against the Government, decidedly, not to say largely.

Well, Sir, instead of the contractors taking all the chances, it is quite plain that the contractors are taking no chances at all. The Government must know that, if this contract is ratified by Parliament, the contractors can sell out these lands for far more money than the railway is ever going to cost them, and they can pocket millions of dollars besides. That statement cannot be disputed. What I have said has been borne out completely by this article in the "Monetary Times." The contractors are taking no chances, but the country is taking great chances, and throughout Canada to-day the Government are being condemned for parting with such a valuable domain of the people. If there is any gamble at all in it, the Government must be condemned for being on the wrong side of the gamble.

Now, Sir, the Minister of Railways said: "I believe this Bill will stand close examination." Well, we are trying to give it close examination; that is what we want to do. I do not know that gentlemen on the other side of the House are examining this Bill very closely. We have not heard very many of them giving their views to the public upon it. The arguments used to defend this Bill are not arguments which I think will avail with the public; they have not been very strong or very forcible. The Minister of Railways also said: "All we desire is that the Bill shall be fairly examined, and that it shall be well understood." Does he mean that the Government supporters can judge of this bargain without reference to party? I am afraid not. The Opposition are trying to let the country know what this bargain is. A few days ago I was talking to a gentleman in Port Hope, a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, about this Yukon Railway Bill. I said to him, "This is a pretty bad bargain." He had the idea that the lands to be given to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann were all in British Columbia. When I told him that that was not the case, but that they were all in the Yukon region, he expressed great surprise; and, although he was careful not to say too much in condemnation of the Government, he agreed with me that they were giving too much for what they got.

Now, we want the country to understand this question, and if we can do it we are determined that they shall understand it. In the first place, we want them to know whether they are getting an all-Canadian route. That is a question on which there is a good deal of doubt at the present time. That is the only plea urged for the building of this road; but I am not satisfied in my own mind that we shall have an all-Canadian route when this road is built. In fact, the probabilities look the other way. One probability is that at Wrangel we shall be in the hands of the United States, as we are in other ports in Alaska. The Government should have settled this question before introducing the Bill, so that there would be no doubt about it. I suppose urgency was their excuse for that. But we may go ahead and build this road, and give away all this land, and not have an all-Canadian route after all. What defence will the Government then have before the country?

Then, we want to know the kind of road we are to get for the great price we are paying for it. We are not going to get a first-class road; I think that is evident. We are getting a narrow gauge road built with comparatively light rails. It may do the work for a little while. In fact, we are getting a temporary road. I am satisfied the people of this country do not understand this; they think we are getting a first-class road. They must think so when they see the great price we are paying for it. Therefore we want them to know we want the country to know what price we are paying for this road. People have asked me whether the House of Commons would pass this Bill. I have said that I had very little doubt the House of Commons would pass it. The members on the other side of the House would feel bound to support the Bill, because if the Bill did not pass the House of Commons, the Government would be defeated. But whether or not the Bill will pass the two Houses, I cannot tell. I hope, for the good of the country, that it will not, because I consider the contract a bad contract in every way. We want the country to know the price we are paying for this road. The price is, first, selected gold lands in the Yukon district to the amount of 5,800 square miles. Next, there is the small royalty of one per cent which these contractors have to pay, while all other men in the country have to pay ten per cent. Then, they are to have a monopoly for years; no one else is to be allowed to build a railway into that country. When speaking on this question before, I said that that monopoly was itself almost a sufficient price to pay for the building of that road. Nobody else can compete against them. All the passengers and goods going into the country must go by their road. Nobody else can build another railway or get assistance to build a railway. More than that, if these contractors were building a road into a country where there was no traffic, where there were no people or very few going in—if they were going to build a road into a country where, as a gentleman of their party once said of another road, they could not earn enough to pay for the grease on the axles—we might give them a large price. But they are building this road where there is a large business waiting for it. A large quantity of freight is there, and the people are ready to buy their tickets and step on the train. Therefore I consider that the price these men are getting for this railway is an exorbitant price, entirely out of proportion to what the country is getting—far more than we would have had to pay if tenders had been asked for, or if the Ministers had taken the trouble to ask Mr. Hamilton Smith or some other men to call upon them. But they did not know any other men; they did not want to know them. They shut themselves up to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and these gentlemen made their own price; and if this Bill passes the two Houses of Parliament, the result will be that the country will have to pay a far greater price than it ought to pay. While I want to see a road built, I do not want to see one built under a contract in which the country takes all the chances and the contractors get a second Bonanza and Eldorado. I believe that the more the people know of this contract the more they will condemn it, and that is the only excuse I have to offer for adding to the debate on this question.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up the time of the House to any great extent in discussing this matter; but I will take the liberty to discuss it from the point of view of the constituents whom I represent rather than as a matter of general policy. I do this principally for the reason that the constituency which I represent, owing to its geographical position and the nature of its productions, has a particular interest in the development of the Yukon district, just as it has a particular interest in the development of the Kootenay country. The agricultural region which lies immediately to the east of the Rocky Mountains, necessarily, in the nature of things, has the most intimate interest in the development of the mineral region lying immediately to the west of those mountains, whether that region be north or south. The success of the agriculturist depends not only on the favourable conditions of the locality in which he lives, but equally upon the nature of the market that he secures for his products. Our situation in the far west is unfavourable to some extent for the marketing of our products in the east; but it is proportionately favourable for the marketing of our products in the west. Lacking, then, to a great extent the markets in the east, we look to the development of the country west of the mountains as that which will most certainly tend to the development of our country east of the mountains. Therefore, I repeat, we have the most intimate interest in the mining development of any country west of the mountains. And inasmuch as the Yukon excitement is the greatest excitement, we have the greatest interest in the development of that region, owing to our being its nearest agricultural neighbour in the Dominion.

While I might claim the right to take up the time of the House discussing this matter from a local point of view, and while I do take my stand, to a certain extent, on that somewhat narrow ground, I wish to point out that, although the point of view in which I regard the question is of great local interest to us, nevertheless, it is one which is likewise of considerable interest to the whole Dominion. It is on the general prosperity and progress of the agricultural regions of central Canada that the prosperity and progress of the whole of Canada must depend. Eastern Canada cannot hope for any considerable further expansion, except through the further development and expansion of western Canada, so that anything which tends to the development of the west, anything which can promote the development of our western agricultural regions, must tend directly and intimately to the progress, and development, and prosperity of eastern Canada. So that, if I take this opportunity of discussing this Yukon Railway scheme from the standpoint of the agriculturists of the west, I do not think I am open to the charge of wasting the time of the House or the time of those members who represent the eastern portion of the Dominion, because they, too, have a direct and intimate interest in the prosperity of that part of the country of which I have the honour to be one of the representatives.

I propose to discuss this Yukon bargain from the point of view in which it has been laid before the public. The claims made on its behalf are, first, that it is intended to secure to Canada the trade of the Yukon, which otherwise would fall into the hands of the Americans. Second, that it will secure the development of the Yukon, and third, that it will prevent the otherwise certain starvation which, without it, is bound to occur. These are the three points that are claimed in favour of the contract, and I propose to discuss them from the point of view of the locality I represent.

As to the construction of this road preserving to Canada the trade of the Yukon, I can only say that, so far as we can see in our part of the country, and so far as our interests are concerned, it does not appear to us as calculated to attain that object. The trade of the Yukon country is very largely one in food products, and it is that part of the trade in which we in the North-west are particularly interested. If the construction of this railway will give us that trade, then certainly we are bound to support it; but if, on the other hand, it fails in that object, then there is no inducement, to us at any rate, to give it our support. As a matter of fact, the possibility of supplying agricultural or any other products to any market depends, in the first place, upon the cost of production, and in the next place, on the cost of reaching that market. If we, the agriculturists of the west, can reach the Yukon market over the railway about to be constructed, so as to be in a position to compete successfully with our rivals from other countries, then that railway, no matter where located, will be of great advantage to us. But if the circumstances are such that we shall not be able to compete over that railway with our rivals to the south of the line, then, so far as we are concerned, and to that extent, it is of no use at all to us.

The geographical position is this. The nearest point of production of surplus food products in the Dominion to the Yukon is that part of the country in which I live—the country immediately surrounding Edmonton—and the next nearest point is the country immediately surrounding Regina and extending eastward to Winnipeg. If the food products, therefore, which are consumed in the Yukon cannot be drawn from those localities, they cannot be drawn from any other part of Canada, but must be obtained from some other and foreign country. The distance by rail from Edmonton to the coast at Vancouver is a matter of 800 miles, and from Regina to the coast by rail it is 1,000 miles; and if you go further east towards Winnipeg, the distance is 1,200 to 1,400 miles. In that distance the Rocky and Selkirk ranges have to be crossed, and the haul is proportionately expensive. Any point on the Pacific Coast is a common point for the Yukon trade over the proposed railway. Our competitors for the furnishing of the food products to that country are the States of Washington, Oregon and California. These States are the producers of surplus food—the very articles required by a mining community, and the same articles that we produce. They are, and have always been, our competitors in the markets of British Columbia. The agricultural regions of Washington, Oregon and California are situated at distances by rail from the coast running from scarcely any distance at all up to 300 miles. That is to say, our competitors have the advantage of a haul of from nothing to 300 miles, against a haul by rail of 800 or 1,000 miles. Under the circumstances, it is not necessary to argue for an instant, that if the agricultural products of our country have to reach the Yukon region over the Teslin Lake Railway, they will not be used in the Yukon at all in competition with those of Oregon, Washington and California. I am not speaking for the rest of the country, I am not arguing on principles or politics, but merely placing an undoubted fact before this House, so that the position taken will be thoroughly understood, and why it is being taken. If we, the agriculturists of the west, cannot compete with our rivals across the line for the trade of the Yukon in food products, which is by far the greater part of that trade, then it is for us to look for some other means whereby we can hope to obtain that trade.

The position of eastern Canada, as I understand it, is this. If we can sell to the Yukon the food the people there require, at advantageous prices, then the manufacturers and merchants of eastern Canada will be in a position to do greater business with us; for every dollar that we get means, we will say, fifty cents to the manufacturer or merchant of eastern Canada. But the supplies which the agriculturists of Washington, Oregon or California sell to the Yukon mean nothing to the merchant or manufacturers of eastern Canada. If I have proved that we, the agriculturists of the west are not able to enter that country with our products in competition with our competitors, I have proved not only to ourselves but to eastern Canadians as well that their interests are not being served fairly and fully by the construction of the Teslin Lake Railway.

I said that a second claim made on behalf of this bargain was that it was a proposition whereby the Yukon country would be developed. I am prepared to admit that to a certain extent. But I wish to draw the attention of the House to the difference in the interest which this country has as between the development of the Yukon and securing of the trade of the Yukon resulting from that development. The development of the Yukon means nothing to this country if that development does not mean increase of trade for this country. Little as I would wish to oppose the development of any part of the country by any reasonable means, it is a very grave question whether we are justified in taking measures to develop a certain section of our country when we are not going to get the benefit resulting from that development; when we are only helping our opponents, our rivals—if you like to say our commercial enemies—to reap the harvest from its development. I am not what is called a National Policy man, in so far as the National Policy means a high tariff. But I should like to be understood as being a thoroughly National Policy man when I hold the ground that whatever is done within the limits of the Dominion of Canada should be done for Canada; and if we cannot do it for Canada, we can afford not to do it at all.

However, that is not the point I wish to speak of particularly. I wish to discuss for a few moments, with your leave, Mr. Speaker, a certain feature of this proposition—the granting of a certain area of mineral lands to this company. I take the liberty of discussing this side of the question because it seems to me it is one on which the members who have already spoken are not, perhaps, informed from the same point of view as I happen to be, owing to circumstances. According to the knowledge which I have acquired from practical miners, the proposition to hand over a certain area of gold-bearing land of the Yukon under the system proposed—that is to say, giving the right of selection of eighty different parcels throughout that country—is not a proposition tending, in itself, to the development of the Yukon, or, I would add the development of the trade of the Yukon. The reason is this. We must depend for the development of the Yukon and the value of the trade resulting from that development upon the number of men who are employed by others or who employ themselves in searching for or digging gold in that country, and any action which restricts in any way the energy or the ambition, or, if you like to call it so—since the word has been used here—the gambling propensity of the prospector, is so much hindrance to the country, so much hindrance to the trade of that country, which trade we wish to do. I am not finding fault with the area of the grant which is made, because the difference between three million acres and ten million acres in that country means nothing—absolutely nothing. It is not the area, but the right of selection. Or I will turn it the other way and say that a grant of one hundred thousand acres in that country with the right of prior selection is a better thing for the party to whom it is granted than ten millions of acres to be taken arbitrarily without selection. The case of mining lands is different from that of agricultural lands. The gold of the Cariboo—some thirty or forty millions of dollars—was taken out of an area less, I believe, than one of the blocks that are to be granted to Mackenzie & Mann. Now, if one block of three miles by six miles, or of six miles by twenty-four miles, is likely to contain, or may possibly contain thirty millions of dollars which can be mined at a profit, it is clear that no company or organization requires a very large number of such areas in order to satisfy even the most rapacious in the matter of this world's wealth. The question is not as to the number of acres you give, but as to giving the right of selection; and when you give a railway company the absolute right of prior selection of eighty blocks of land, speaking generally and roughly of six miles by twenty-four miles, you practically, in my humble estimation, hand over to them the total gold-bearing area of that country, unless the Yukon far transcends any gold-bearing country that exists on earth or ever existed. Take the province of British Columbia, which is much larger than what we call the Yukon district. It has been mined and prospected for thirty or forty years, and there is not a man here but knows, if he knows anything of British Columbia, that to give to any concern the right of selection of eighty blocks of land of the size proposed to be given to Mackenzie & Mann, would enable that corporation to cover every mine in British Columbia that ever did pay, that is now paying or that, in all human probability, ever will pay. When you give that privilege to any organization of men you certainly put the prospector and miner at a corresponding disadvantage; and, as I maintain that it is upon the energy of the prospector that the development and the trade of the country depends. In so far as you hamper the prospector you injure the country.

I have heard it said repeatedly in the House that these men, having received an immense grant of land, will employ men to prospect, and having prospected it and found rich mines, they will work them to their own advantage, and that, therefore, instead of this land grant meaning less development, it means more development. That is a point I would like to discuss for a moment. In the first place Mackenzie & Mann do not need to send one prospector into that country. There are a hundred thousand men in the Yukon or on the way to the Yukon, or preparing to start to the Yukon, and every one of those men, under the terms of this agreement is a prospector of Mackenzie & Mann. If any man of that hundred thousand strikes a good claim anywhere in that Yukon country within the next nine years, Mackenzie & Mann, under this agreement, will get the advantage of that discovery. There is no question about that. They do not take the claim he has located, but after he has located a claim, they can "blanket" the surrounding country. Therefore, I say they do not need to employ a single individual, for every man who goes into that country is a prospector for them, and their expenditure on account of prospecting, as an addition to the trade of the country, may, therefore, be wiped off the slate.

Now, then, we will suppose that they have taken up their grant of land, or their half of six by twenty-four miles; and supposing for the sake of argument it is situated on the Klondike,—there is room in that area probably for 15,000 or 20,000 miners if it were all good ground to work on ordinarily sized claims, including their helpers and so on. If Mackenzie & Mann, being business men, take up one of these grants and they find good pay upon it, they will work that good pay, but they will not work what is not good pay. That is the difference between Mackenzie & Mann having the land and it being thrown open to the ordinary prospectors. Let the ordinary prospector strike a claim, and forthwith hundreds of others will flock in and take their chances of developing the surrounding country. But under this agreement, if a miner strikes a claim and Mackenzie & Mann hold the surrounding block of country, they put on their prospectors, and if they strike something particularly rich, they employ ten or twenty men in working that particular rich area; but they do not employ the hundreds of men, the thousands of men, who would flock into that area and work it on the chance of making something, if it had been left open for them to do so. This country is out the difference between the trade that will be done by the ten or twenty men working for Mackenzie & Mann, and the trade that would be done by the thousands of free prospectors. But it may be said that it is not right to give people the privilege of going in and working in a case like this. If they are not going to make money, it is far better they should be kept out. Suppose the whole of the area is gold-bearing and that every foot of it will yield to the miner at the rate of $5 or $10 a day. The ordinary miner will work that for the wages he makes out of it and do well. But if one particular section of that country is good for a million or two and the rest is only good for $10 a day, Mackenzie & Mann will work the deposit that is good for a million or two, but the $10 a day area will lie dormant and we will be out the difference in the amount of trade just the same. I lay particular stress upon this question, because I do not think the members of the House are posted upon the effect which the restrictions upon the energy of the prospector will necessarily have upon the actual development of the Yukon country. To throw the choice of the whole of all the land of that country into the hands of one company will be, I say, a greater hindrance to its development than the building of the railway can possibly be a help to it.

Another thing I wish to point out is that the grant of land to Mackenzie & Mann extends not only throughout the Yukon territory, but it extends outside and over to the Mackenzie River. On behalf of the country east of the mountains, I claim that is essentially unfair. It is only the country west of the mountains that can possibly be advantaged by the development that will result from the building of this railway. The country east of the mountains lying between the Mackenzie River and the Rocky Mountains, must necessarily in the nature of things, depend for its development upon whatever communication there may be entirely on the east side, whether by water or by railway; and I say it is essentially unfair that for the building of a railroad west of the mountains that can only benefit the country west of the mountains, these people should be given the right of selection east of the mountains as well.

The third point alleged in favour of this contract is, I believe, the necessity on philanthropic grounds of establishing communication at an early date. It is held that if such communication is not provided at an early date whereby people can go into and come out of that Yukon country, there will be starvation there next winter, and there will be a terrible condition of affairs, for which this country would be responsible. Let us look at that for one moment. Remember, Sir, that if there is danger, or if there were likely to be danger of starvation in any part of the Dominion of Canada, it is the duty of this Government to take such measures as may be necessary to prevent that starvation, whether the people concerned are citizens of our own country or not. But it seems to me that the idea that there will necessarily be starvation in the Yukon country next year is rather far-fetched. There was a rush to the Yukon last year, a rush that was entirely unexpected, a rush for which we were largely unprepared, and we have every assurance that there will be no starvation there this year—for the reason that those who were in danger of starvation simply got up and walked out, a very natural proceeding on their part, and one that I think any one would expect them to take. Now, if these people got up and walked out last winter, I suppose that if the people there next winter should find circumstances unfavourable for remaining there, they will get up and walk also. Even if there was no prospect of the construction of a railway, or no prospect of improved communication into that country during the coming summer, there is no reasonable probability that people would go into that country without taking with them sufficient provisions to carry them through the winter. The experience of this winter would induce them to do that. So I say there is no danger in the nature of things, if matters were left alone, of starvation occurring there next winter, especially when we know that it has not occurred this winter. But there is this further consideration. When it has been advertised far and wide throughout the world that the Canadian Government is taking means to prevent starvation by building a railway, people will thereby be encouraged to go in without making sufficient provision for themselves, and perhaps if the railway should fail to connect, if there should come an early fall, then there might be starvation as the result of the promises that were made; or else the people will do as they have already done, they will get up and walk out. So I say that whatever reasons may be urged in favour of this railway—and I do not wish to traverse them or discuss them—I do not want to traverse or discuss the objections that are raised against it—I say that on these three points I see no reason for supporting this contract, namely—on the ground that it is going to secure the trade for Canada; on the ground that it is going to develop the country; and on the ground that it is necessary as a humanitarian proposition.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I will say this in addition to what I said a few minutes ago in regard to the national development of this country. If there is gold in the Yukon district, it is our gold; if it is there to-day, it will be there to-morrow, it will be there ten years from now if it is not taken out. It is money in the bank for this Canadian nation. I will take the liberty of saying that I do not believe the Canadian nation should go into mining speculation. I do not believe that as a nation we should try to make money out of the Yukon in that way; but I say that the Canadian nation, as a nation, has a right to-day, and it is a duty as well as a right and privilege, to take all reasonable means to secure whatever benefit may naturally accrue from the development of the Yukon to Canada through the ordinary course of trade. I have no hesitation in taking the ground that if circumstances are such that to-day Canada can reap a benefit from the development of the Yukon, it is our duty to see that she does so, as representing the business interests of the country. In the first place to take measures for securing that trade, rather than for the purpose of merely securing the development of that country. I think that in this case the cart is being put before the horse; that our first step should be to secure the trade of the Yukon and then provide for the further development of the Yukon. But if I understand the matter aright, we are providing for the development of the Yukon, and our rivals, our opponents, our enemies to a great extent, are to reap the benefit of that development, pending action to be taken by us in the future, more or less distant, to secure a share of that trade. It does not appear to me to be a business-like proposition that we should develop our country for the benefit of our rivals. I believe in development, but I believe in development for our own benefit. On the ground that it is our first duty to take such measures as will conserve to Canada and to Canadians the trade of the Yukon rather than to secure the development of that country for the benefit of the trade of our rivals—on that ground, if on no other, I have no hesitation in registering my vote against the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. ROCHE. Mr. Speaker, while not at all desirous of engaging the attention of this House for any great length of time, first, because from the very full discussion that has already taken place on this question, I cannot possibly hope to add anything new or original to the debate, and secondly, were I even in a position to do so, I recognize it would not at all result in effecting any change in the Government's decision in respect to the same; still, I feel that I would not be discharging my full duty to my constituents or to the people of my adopted province, were I to content myself by giving a silent vote on a question of such vital importance, not only to the people of western Canada, but to the people of Canada as a whole.

When, during the last session of Parliament, a contract for the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass line was being railroaded through this House during the dying days of the session, a contract which involved the expenditure, or rather the giving away of millions of acres of our best coal lands in the province of British Columbia, a contract which a great section of our people considered to be a very extravagant one and one which, under the circumstances, the Government would have been perfectly justified in constructing as a Government line; still, in view of that plea of urgency which seems to be a very favourite one to use on behalf of the Government in getting through any contract, in view of the apparent and seeming necessity to that part of the country for this line, in order to retain the trade of that mining country in Canadian channels, the people were not disposed to be hypercritical, and submitted themselves to the inevitable, although not without many protests on their part. Encouraged by their success in the past, the Government are again about to try the patience of a long-suffering people by foisting on Parliament and this country a contract which, for recklessness and utter disregard of the resources of this country, surpasses anything of a similar character hitherto launched by any body of public men ever having charge of the public affairs of Canada. Some of the Government members, in discussing this question, have done so in a spirit that would seem to imply, in their devotion to that galaxy of intellect that now adorns the Treasury benches, that they have a monopoly of all the wisdom of Parliament, and that, in fact, we, on this side of the House, do not know what we are talking about. Allowing, for the sake of argument, that this is the case, they have now arrived at that stage where, to use a scriptural phrase, "Too much wisdom hath made them mad," and some of the most severe condemnations and some of the strongest utterances heard in condemnation of this deal I have heard come from the political supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite who reside in the province where I have the honour to live, gentlemen who declared that they could not understand how any body of public men, and especially the members of the present Government, in view of their past professions, could come to Parliament and ask the representatives assembled to acquiesce in any such deal. So frequently have Government professions been departed from since hon. gentlemen opposite have assumed the reins of office, that they now require a very slim excuse indeed to attempt to justify their actions, and the people have already given up any hope that they will implement their promises by legislation, except in so far as it may suit political exigencies. Urgency, inadvisability, force of public opinion, and numerous other excuses have been advanced to explain the discrepancy between past professions and present performances, and it ill becomes any Minister or any hon. member opposite constituting that combination of political weathercocks—if I may be allowed to use the term—to accuse any hon. gentleman on this side of the House with having changed his mind on any public question, when they themselves have shown themselves so expert as political acrobats as not only to have astounded their political foes, but their political friends as well. Who does not remember the principle enunciated by the Liberals when they were in the wilderness, and were most profuse in their promises, if they were permitted to enter the promised land, on this very question, that all public contracts would be let by public tender. How eloquent in denunciations were they, if they thought the late Government were about to engage in any public work without throwing it open to public competition. How have they put this principle into practice? Have they carried it out? Decidedly, no. Why? They fall back on their old excuse, the plea of urgency. I think, if the Government had not sufficient time at their disposal to have advertised for tenders in the ordinary way for the construction of this line by asking public competition, the least they should have done, under the circumstances, was to have notified all the gentlemen who had been in the habit of carrying out railway construction in Canada, either by a circular or otherwise, and thus place all the contractors of Canada on an equal footing with Mackenzie & Mann. By doing so very little time would have been lost, the public would have reaped the benefit, the Government would have made the best possible bargain under the circumstances, for I consider that one of the best arguments that even the Ministers themselves considered that the terms of this contract were extravagant in character, was the statement of the Minister of Railways and Canals, who declared that the Government tried their best to beat down the contractors' terms, but without success. If the Ministers did not hold that opinion that the contract was extravagant in its nature, why should they have tried to induce the contractors to take it for a less subsidy, for something less than it was worth? The logic of hon. gentlemen opposite is rather contradictory in its character.

Mr. Speaker, this contract puts me in mind of another famous contract made in Manitoba, a few years ago, the one entered into for the construction of a road, the parties being the Northern Pacific Railway Company and the Greenway Government. So favourable was that contract—I mean, favourable to the railway company—that one of the Northern Pacific Railway magnates made use at that time of a notable phrase which will go down to posterity in the history of that province, because of its truthfulness—"that the government was their meat." So it is in this case. Mackenzie & Mann, knowing a good thing when they saw it, being able and competent men in their own line, and shrewd, practical men, as is evidenced by the terms of this contract—they knowing the position the Government were in as regards the plea of urgency, also knowing that they alone of all the contractors in Canada were selected to tender for the construction of this road, took advantage of this state of affairs to name their own price, which we, on this side of the House, claim to be most exorbitant; and the Government tamely submitted, or in other words the Government became their meat.

But is the claim of urgency a valid reason for engaging in this contract in this peculiar manner? We say, no. The report of Mr. Ogilvie, as has been pointed out, was in the hands of the Government last July—indeed it has transpired during the debate that it has been in the hands of the Government since last March. Here I take issue with the hon. Minister of the Interior, who asked the question, would any sane man on the strength of that report ever dream that any great number of people would flock into that country. Well, I think the mental equilibrium of the gentlemen on this side of the House is equally as good as his own, and I unhesitatingly say, yes, the report of Mr. Ogilvie in reference to those large gold finds and to the probable mineral resources of that country was of itself sufficient to ensure a large influx of people, in the words of the report itself. The hon. gentleman knows that there is nothing so infectious as the gold fever; what is there in this universe that will more quickly draw people from the four corners of the globe than reputed finds of gold? The hon. Minister (Mr. Sifton) depends largely on his emigration literature depicting in glowing terms the agricultural resources of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, to draw population to those fertile plains. How much greater effect will a report of an engineer of the high standing of Mr. Ogilvie, in which he lays bare to the public the knowledge of the vast mineral wealth of the Yukon region, in bringing in, not as the Minister of the Interior said, two or three hundred miners, which was his rather peculiar and pessimistic interpretation of the word "influx," but thousands of souls—miners, speculators, capitalists, business and professional men and almost every class of people under the sun. So that I think the Government cannot hold themselves guiltless in not having taken steps earlier in order to ensure the opening up of a highway into that remote region. Instead of which they dilly-dallied and now make the excuse that the reports as to the navigability of some of those rivers were not received until very recently, but the trouble is they did not make a commencement soon enough or this information would have been at hand in plenty of time to have asked for tenders. Why, the very paragraph quoted by the Minister himself on page 92 of the report, which says that in a district some 35 miles in length and 25 miles in width, it is estimated that there are $100,000,000 in sight, is sufficient to indicate the wealth of that country and to induce thousands of people throughout the world to flock into that district.

It evidently seems to be the object of the members of the Government and their followers to talk all around this question, to touch upon the fringe of it, and not to get at the question itself. That long speech delivered by the Minister of the Interior the other day—a speech which I am willing, as a western man, to give him all credit for—was the best presentation of the case from the Government side that could possibly be made. No wonder, because this Yukon child is the Minister of the Interior's own first-born, and like most other fond fathers, he is very proud of it. He can see qualities in it that no person else can, and he has therefore dressed it out and made it as presentable and respectable as he possibly could. When I said this Yukon child was the first-born of the Minister of the Interior, I meant, since his promotion to the Dominion Cabinet. It is true that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) has had some previous experience in the letting of railway contracts. It is true that the hon. gentleman has before now, on the part of the Greenway Government, entered into a railway contract with these very same contractors. It may be only a coincidence but it is a peculiar coincidence. Possibly their relations in the past have been so very harmonious and mutually advantageous that of necessity the Minister (Mr. Sifton) could not pass them over and so he gave them a preference over any other contractor in Canada for the construction of this road.

After Recess.

Mr. ROCHE. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was pointing out that this was the first venture of the hon. Minister of the Interior in any transaction of such large dimensions since his accession to the present Government, because his time has been principally occupied in wielding the tomahawk and decapitating a number of Conservative officials on that very convenient plea that they were offensive partisans; and therefore he probably had not much time at his disposal to engage in any huge deals such as this. But I was also saying that he is by no means as green at the business as his youthful appearance would seem to indicate, but that he has had a little experience in the past, and, strange to say, with the very same contractors, in putting through a contract for the construction of what is commonly called the Lake Dauphin Railway, in the province of Manitoba, more properly speaking, the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company. This was a line which the members of this House will remember was subsidized to the extent of 6,400 acres a mile, and also by a cash bonus to the extent of $40,000 per annum for twenty years, or, in all, $800,000. This alone was sufficient to have enabled the contractors to have raised what money they required for the construction of that road, to equip it, and run it at a very fair profit. But not content with this, the hon. Minister of the Interior, when Attorney General of Manitoba, undertook to give some other valuable aid from the provincial treasury to these contractors. He therefore put through a deal which practically made a present of $8,000 per mile for 100 miles to these contractors, by guaranteeing the principal and the interest on the bonds to the total amount of $800,000. On the strength of the Dominion subsidy, there would have been ample, in the opinion of the best railway experts, to have built, equipped and run this road at a very fair profit. Therefore, it was entirely unnecessary for the provincial government to have come to the relief of these contractors and practically to have made a present to them of $8,000 per mile, without even taking a mortgage on their land grant as security—the only security being a lien on the road, subject to the Dominion subsidy, which comes first. So, I say, it seems very strange indeed that the relations of the hon. Minister of the Interior with these contractors, Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie, should have been of that character as to have caused a renewal of those relations in negotiating this Yukon deal. While not at all charging corruption against either the Greenway Government or this Government in connection with these contractors—because I would be very foolish to do so without being able to prove it, and, not being behind the scenes, I am not able to prove it—still, to use the expression of my hon. friend from Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), it has a very piscatorial effluvia about it. I merely state the facts and leave the members to draw their own conclusions. It has been further stated that, in addition to these business relations between the hon. Minister of the Interior and Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie, there is also a family relationship. I do not know whether that is the case or not. I am merely stating it as a reputed fact, which possibly the hon. Minister of the Interior may be in a position to deny or may take occasion to deny.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Mr. Speaker, might I ask the hon. gentleman, as a personal favour, to repeat the remark he made about the family connection?

Mr. ROCHE.

Mr. BENNETT. See "Hansard."

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I am asking it as a favour.

Mr. ROCHE. I presume, the hon. gentleman is asking the question in order that he may have an opportunity to deny the statement. The statement may be wrong, and if so, I am sure the members of this House will prefer not to take the denial at second-hand. I think the hon. Minister of the Interior is quite able to take care of himself, and he will, no doubt, be able to refute this statement, if untrue. I am not giving it as a fact; I am merely giving it as current report. I was about to say that I have it, on the opinion of a railway expert whose name, if I were to take the liberty to divulge it, would be accepted by every hon. member on either side of this House as a high authority on the subject, that this railway could be built for $6,586 a mile, which is less than the amount of the grant made by the provincial government of Manitoba; and with the terminal facilities and the rolling stock, the total cost would have amounted to some $750,000, or less than the amount voted by this Dominion Parliament. These figures are really higher than the work could be done for at that time, but they are put at the outside limit. Therefore, hon. gentlemen can draw their own conclusions as to the contract entered into with these same gentlemen.

Now, I was speaking of the speech delivered by the hon. Minister of the Interior of nearly five hours' duration. That speech was largely directed to his own political followers, because if we could judge by the number of times we saw the hon. gentleman's back, he seemed to be more anxious to keep his own followers in line than to convince members on this side of the House; for there were rumours of dissensions and of certain members kicking over the traces. His speech consisted also of large quotations from the reports of Mr. Ogilvie and Mr. Jennings, which has been placed upon our desks a week previously, and which members of this House were no doubt cognizant of; and also clippings from American newspapers, which were, no doubt, manufactured in Ottawa by some of the emissaries of the Government, and sent out to do duty in their behalf. He also read a description of the country and its water stretches, gave his own version of the Russian and Washington treaties, and spoke of how the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald had sacrificed the rights of Canada in the navigation of those north-western waters. But I venture to say, that I am well within the mark when I state that, in that long speech of five hours' duration, not forty minutes were devoted to a discussion of the contract itself. Possibly, the hon. Minister considered that discretion was the better part of valour, and therefore avoided that as much as possible. As a sop to the members from the North-west, who came to this House vowing vengeance on the Government because of this contract, in which country public opinion, irrespective of party, is opposed to this deal, and to obtain their support, he hints that at some future time, in the sweet by and by, the Edmonton route—a route which the people of that country are all desirous of seeing opened—may be built through the Peace River country to connect with this Teslin Lake Railway, so that some of our towns and cities, like Edmonton, Prince Albert, Calgary, Regina, Brandon and Winnipeg, may obtain a slice of that Yukon trade, which is now going to the American republic. But I very much fear that, with our heritage being given away, as this contract gives away millions of the best gold-bearing lands in the world, if we can believe Mr. Ogilvie's report, we shall stand a very poor chance of obtaining the construction of this other road which we are anxious to see built, and which would be in all respects an all-Canadian route, free without doubt from any of those obnoxious and harassing customs regulations, bonding privileges and the many other objections common to those coast routes. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem anxious to get away from the main question as far as they can, and to talk all around it. No defence has been offered by the Government whatever for granting a land monopoly of 3,750,000 acres of mineral land to those contractors, further than a retort—a most puerile one from men claiming to be statesmen—to the effect that Conservatives should be the last people to talk about a land monopoly, because their party had given a land monopoly to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the construction of that railway. This was a policy condemned by our Liberal friends for the last fifteen years, and surely they do not now argue that two blacks make a white. Everything good in their policy has been stolen from the Conservative party, and surely they do not want also to steal the vicious features. We expected something different from our Liberal friends, especially in view of their past professions. It is true, the Conservative Government did grant a monopoly of virgin soil for the construction of a transcontinental highway, 3,000 miles in length, to bind the provinces of this Dominion together, and to keep faith with the people of British Columbia. But in this deal our Liberal friends have gone them one better, and are giving away millions of acres of some of the richest gold-bearing lands in the world, if we are to believe the report of Mr. Ogilvie. We have given all this land for the construction of not 3,000 miles of railway, but for 150 miles of road which the right hon. First Minister himself declares is going to be but a temporary one—a road, in other words, properly described as a three-foot tramway.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) declared that the Yukon country must pay for the Yukon Railway, that the down-trodden taxpayers of eastern Canada were sufficiently taxed, and objected to our national debt being increased for the construction of this line. But the hon. gentleman was not always so solicitous and sensitive concerning the increase of our national debt. He was not so solicitous for the welfare of the poor down-trodden taxpayers of eastern Canada when, as a member of the Government, he supported the proposition of the Government to burden them to the extent of $7,000,000 for the construction of the Drummond County Railway. So that it is rather late in the day for the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) to become so very sensitive with reference to the poor taxpayers of eastern Canada, after being so very anxious and willing to see the country taxed for the construction of a railway largely intended to assist his own political friends and more particularly that very dear friend of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), who, that hon. gentleman declared, had stuck to him in the dark days of the past, and who now, like Dickens's "Mrs. Macawber," he would never desert, especially when he had the opportunity of returning one good deed by another.

If the Stikine Railway were to be constructed on business principles and the gold lands retained for the benefit of the people, if the Government had taken time by the forelock and, after getting all necessary information, had thrown the contract open to public competition, not only would the Yukon country be able to pay for the railway, but the development of the wonderful mineral resources of the country would add to the credit of Canada to such an extent that we would be able also to pay for the Drummond County Railway.

Neither have the Government attempted to defend that portion of the contract with reference to the royalty imposed on individual miners as contrasted with that imposed on the wealthy contractors. Ten per cent is charged on the production of the individual miner, while but 1 per cent is charged to the wealthy contractors. We can on this side retort on the Liberals the old cry which they again and again have used against the Conservative party. By this contract the poor man is made poorer and the rich richer. The old battle-cry of the Liberals is entirely set at naught in their own house by their own political leaders.

No defence either has been offered to the monopoly created by tying up this country and binding it to give a preference to those contractors in the event of the construction of this road further south, or of the monopoly they now enjoy for the next five years during which no other line will be permitted to be constructed from the coast.

And above all, the Government have given no defence for practically allowing the contractors to charge whatever tolls they please. If there is one thing about which the Government should have been more particular than another, it is this question of tolls, because they have had the object lesson before them of the pernicious effect of the high rates under which the people of the North-west have been labouring for years. It is well known that the people in the North-west would have prospered much more were it not for the fact that they have to pay excessive charges on incoming and outgoing freight, and therefore, having such an example before them, the Government should have had particular regard for the interests of the people in this respect. It is true that the tolls are subject to the approval of the Governor General in Council, but that practically means nothing with the present Government in power; it practically means that the contractors may charge what they like. It is true that the tolls must be reduced 25 per cent at the end of four years and 25 per cent at the end of three years more, but at the end of the seven years, after this 50 per cent reduction takes place, no reasonable man can doubt that the freight rates even then will be higher than the average freight rates on the western roads; and during this interval, the contractors will have been able to make sufficient on transportation alone to pay for the road twice over.

The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), strong man as he is physically, was, I thought, specially weak, even for him, in the argument that he addressed to the House the other day. He used some illustrations, one in particular, that went directly against his own contention. Why, he said, in discussing the offer of Mr. Smith, why did not these gentlemen come forward with their offer before the contract was signed? My answer is simply because they had not the opportunity. The hon. gentleman said it is all very well for these men to come on after the contract is signed and completed and offer a better bargain. But, he said, I have attended sales before now, and have seen articles knocked down to the highest bidder, and afterwards other gentlemen coming forward saying they were willing to pay better prices. What does the hon. gentleman's argument amount to? It amounts to no more than this, that the purchaser had such a snap that there were plenty others willing to give higher prices for the articles knocked down to him. But they had nothing to complain of for the opportunity was given them to bid. In this case, however, the contract was not put up for public competition, so that there is no parallel whatever between the two. What we object to is that the public did not have an opportunity of tendering, and that it was only those favoured contractors, Mann & Mackenzie, who were given a chance to bid at all.

Mr. ROCHE.

For these and numerous other arguments, which I might adduce as opposed to this contract, but which have already been advanced by hon. gentlemen on this side and which it is unnecessary for me to repeat, I have made up my mind that it is my duty to oppose this contract by my voice and vote, and I feel confident that in so doing I shall be giving expression to the sentiments not only of the majority of my constituents, but of the people of the province where I have the honour to reside.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I have listened, Mr. Speaker, to the remarks of my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Roche) with somewhat mixed feelings. That hon. gentleman is my near neighbour in Manitoba, and he is a gentleman for whom I have a great deal of personal regard, and in that respect, I may say, I do not stand alone in the province of Manitoba. It was, therefore, with mixed feelings that I heard my hon. friend somewhat demean himself, in my estimation and that of the majority of the members of this honourable House, by some of the remarks which he thought fit to make in connection with the subject before us. Of course, his attacks on hon. Ministers are not perhaps so much a matter of surprise as they might be. In fact, criticism and attacks on hon. Ministers, coming from any quarter on the other side of the House, are perhaps not a matter for surprise when we bear in mind the somewhat painful scene which was enacted here not long ago, when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) attacked the leader of the Opposition, and also made an accusation against the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), which, I may say, I would have been very glad if that gentleman had seen fit or had been able to refute. When you find such a state of unfriendliness and want of respect for their leaders among members of the Opposition, it cannot be a matter of surprise that they should criticise and attack the leaders on this side; and perhaps we ought to be glad that they do so, because it shows that they make no invidious distinctions between their own leaders and ours. I do not know that I have very much to say in regard to the Yukon contract.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I have no doubt that that would exactly suit hon. gentlemen opposite. What I have to say, I am going to say, with their permission, and I hope that when I get through, they will be none the worse for what I have said. The subject of this railway has been threshed out pretty fully. We have had it discussed from every imaginable point, and have had some of the most remarkable criticisms upon it that it has ever been my lot to hear upon anything. It is not necessary for me to go into details. I find that all the other speakers make that remark, and I like to be in the fashion. The speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite have been remarkable for a peculiarity characteristic of them all, that, while they have poured out their criticisms upon the present contract, none of them have suggested anything better. Now, the Government was face to face with a very complex problem. There was a country which was just being opened up, and about which no one knew anything until a very short time ago. That is putting it very broadly, but, as a matter of fact, that was the case. I am inclined to agree with the speaker whom I heard address an audience down town, a few days ago. He said that a beneficent Providence had kept the gold in the Yukon covered under 20 feet of earth until such time as there was an honest Government on Parliament Hill. I believe that speaker took an inspired view of the whole case, and I think we could have no better proof of this beneficent Providence than the contract laid before this House.

Now, before going on to deal with the contract, I desire to take up one or two questions which were dragged into this debate by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche). That hon. gentleman alluded to the career in the province of Manitoba of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). Now, Sir, I have watched that career with considerable interest, and I know that the hon. member for Marquette and others of his political stripe have also watched that career with great interest. I understood the hon. member for Marquette accused the Minister of the Interior of having been connected with the bringing of the Northern Pacific Railway system into the province of Manitoba. The hon. gentleman's memory must be rather short in that case, because the hon. Minister of the Interior was not at that time a member of the Government of Manitoba and did not have anything to do with the bringing in of the Northern Pacific Railway. I am sorry that the hon. Minister of the Interior was not one of those directly instrumental in bringing in the Northern Pacific Railway, because the coming in of that system has been a great boon to the people of that province. Previous to that time, we were, as all know, completely under the monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I would like to ask, if the abolition of that monopoly and the bringing in of the Northern Pacific Railway was not a benefit to the people of Manitoba, why did the friends of the hon. member for Marquette, then in power in the Dominion, pay such a large sum to the Canadian Pacific? What are the facts in regard to this case? The Northern Pacific was brought into the province by receiving a grant—cash; there was no land grant—of $1,750 per mile for the greater part of the road, and $1,500 on the Portage branch, a total of $532,000—say, half a million dollars. There was never any railway constructed in any section of Canada for such a small cash subsidy. The land grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway branch lines which parallel the branch lines of the Northern Pacific, in many cases, realized $14,000 per mile. The coming in of the Northern Pacific had the effect of reducing rates throughout the province 3 cents per hundred within the first month, soon followed by other reductions, thus saving millions and millions of dollars to the people of the province. The increase in the value of farming lands on the little Portage branch of 54 miles is alone sufficient to pay every dollar that the Northern Pacific cost the people of Manitoba.

Then, we come to the Dauphin Railway. The hon. member for Marquette waxes eloquent about that road. He dare not go into his own constituency and criticise that Dauphin Railway as he did here to-night. I am glad, for one reason, that he did it. I have a strong personal liking for the hon. gentleman, but I do not love him politically. I shall take good care that his constituents in the northern part of his riding shall have the full benefit of that speech. No step has ever been taken by the Government of Manitoba which has received more hearty and more universal commendation than the bargain they made with Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie to build that railway. What are the facts? I do not like to accuse the hon. gentleman of misrepresentation or perversion of the facts, but I must say that, though he is a very good doctor, he would have made, perhaps, a better lawyer. He has a wonderful way of bringing out the strong points for his own side of the case and leaving out of sight the points on the side of his opponent. A mail subsidy was granted by the late Government to any railway that might be built from the Manitoba and North-western Railway or from Portage la Prairie, for the first hundred miles, $40,000 per annum, and for the second hundred miles leading up to the Saskatchewan, an additional $40,000 per annum. Those who followed the campaign of hon. gentlemen opposite in the last election, know that the present leader of the Opposition came to Winnipeg and promised that this railway should be completed through to the Saskatchewan before the end of 1898. A land grant was made of 6,400 acres a mile, besides the mail subsidy. The legislature of Manitoba in 1893 passed an Act by which they agreed to guarantee the interest on the bonds of the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company up to $9,000 per mile, at 5 per cent for thirty years, and also gave the company power to issue bonds unguaranteed to the extent of $7,000 per mile, thus allowing them to assume a bonded debt of $16,000 per mile.

For that privilege they took a mortgage on the land grant. Now, what happened? The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, who were, I have heard it stated, somewhat friendly to the late Administration, immediately upon this Act being passed by the Manitoba legislature, surveyed a line, a paper line, an air line, from Selkirk across the Narrows of Lake Manitoba, and partly through the Dauphin country, and they appropriated the land grant of the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company, and proceeded to sell it, and did sell a great many parcels of that land. They had no authority for taking that land except the authority of the late Government. As a matter of fact, to-day the Canadian Pacific Railway Company owns, or pretends to own, and sells and disposes of the lands which really are the land grants of the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company. Now, a great many people, I do not know whether our hon. friend from Marquette was among the number, criticised that bargain, and said it was an infamous bargain. They said, like Col. Sellers, that there were "millions in it." But it lay on the Statute-book for over three years, and nobody ever came to make the millions, nobody would touch the road, nobody would build it, and the great Dauphin district, the last great reserve of good arable land which the people of that province possessed, was being deserted. People went up there and homesteaded, they lived there for three, four or five or six years, and then they got disheartened and discouraged; hope deferred made the heart sick. They kept asking for a railway, but they got nothing but promises. They got promises from the Hudson Bay Railway Company, they got the promise of the Winnipeg and Great Northern Railway Company. And talking about railway legislation in the province of Manitoba, does my hon. friend the member for Marquette remember the streak of rust which now runs from the city of Winnipeg?—a disgrace to the late Government and a disgrace to the Hudson Bay Railway Company. Why, that railway cost the province of Manitoba $256,000 in bonds, which have been bearing interest ever since. That was under the regime of the late Mr. Norquay, and there has never been a train run over it. The ties have been taken up and burned by the farmers, the rails are being used as head beams in the cow stables throughout the country, and trees are growing on that track twenty feet high. That railroad cost the province of Manitoba $250,000, and still this hon. gentleman talks about the Dauphin Railway and the Northern Pacific. Now, Sir, in regard to this Dauphin Railway, what happened? Their whole land grant was 6,400 acres per mile, but a large portion of that land grant had been hypothecated by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and as a consequence the Dauphin Railway Company, or the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company, would have been driven to go away west to other regions in search of land.

Mr. MILLS. What about the Yukon road?

Mr. RUTHERFORD.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Mr. Speaker, I did not introduce the Dauphin Railway into this debate. If hon. gentlemen do not like the arguments which I am making, I am very sorry, but I am not responsible for the introduction of that railway into this debate. Now, in regard to this matter, the land grant, as I say, lay there, the mail subsidy lay there, and nobody would touch the road. The hon. gentleman said those were quite enough to induce anybody to build that road. He knows better, he knows that nobody would build that road, and nobody did build the road, that it lay there and lay there, and nobody would touch it. The people of Dauphin came to us, men who were in his own constituency, came to the Manitoba Government and asked that they should have a railway. And what did the Manitoba Government do? What is this wonderful bargain that he talks about? The Manitoba Government said, we will give you a guarantee of the principal and interest on $8,000 per mile for 100 or 125 miles of that railway, as the case may be. They got 100 miles of that railway, which cost, as he says, a guarantee of $800,000, with interest at 4 per cent. Then they built twenty-five miles more, for which they also received that guarantee. Now, what are the facts? It was a guarantee of interest and principal, and as security they took a first mortgage on the railway itself. The track itself, I may say, is one of the very best tracks in Canada, they took a mortgage on the track, on the terminals, on the station-houses, telegraph lines, cars, rolling stock of all kinds and descriptions; they took that as a guarantee on their security for $8,000 per mile. Now, any hon. gentleman who knows anything about railway construction will admit at once that that was quite a sufficient guarantee for the province of Manitoba in regard to that railway. But this railway, which is a new railway, and which we never expected to pay interest for at least three or four years, has been in operation only a little over a year, and, Sir, it has paid interest on its bonds, and it has not cost the government or the people of Manitoba one cent, and it never will. I say a railway like that is a credit to any government, and if it was engineered through by the Minister of the Interior, I say all credit to him. It ill becomes the hon. member for Marquette, in whose riding these poor settlers lingered and lay for so many years without a railway, to get up on the floor of this House and criticise the action of the Manitoba Government. Now, I understand that the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) attacked the contract this afternoon. Well, I want this House to deal leniently with the hon. member for Alberta in that matter. This House should take into consideration the fact that that hon. gentleman lives at Edmonton, and he would like very well, as most of us would,

to have a railway from Edmonton to the Yukon. But the hon. member has allowed his predilections, to some extent, to blind his judgment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. It is only my opinion, you know. The hon. gentleman has not realized that time is the whole essence of this contract, that it is absolutely necessary for the Government of Canada to get means of communication into that country just as soon as possible. This matter has been fully explained to this House by far abler men than myself, it is a matter in which I am sure I have the hearty and unqualified support of the hon. leader of the Opposition, although some of the small fry of the party may not agree with him. The leader of the Opposition has also stated that the route which has been selected by the Government is infinitely the best that could be selected under the circumstances. Now, I do not wish to be hard on any man because he belongs to the Opposition. I believe in giving credit where it is due, and when I find a display of intellect, a display of statesmanship and a knowledge of the subject far above the petty party spirit which characterizes the remarks of most hon. gentlemen on the other side, I wish to give credit for it. That being the case, I am sure these hon. gentlemen will admit that the opinion of the leader of the Opposition is entitled to some consideration at least, and when we have his support of this route, it is not necessary for me to dilate upon it. But that route is certainly not going to give the people of Canada the whole trade of the Yukon country, no route could do that. You cannot change the location of the west coast of Alaska. You cannot prevent the American people taking supplies into that country, they are going to take them in anyhow. But by this route we are going to receive a very much larger share of the trade of the Yukon country than we could possibly receive by any other route, not excepting the route via Edmonton—and I will tell you why, in my opinion. I have been through booms, and I do not believe that this Yukon craze is going to last any time. I believe myself that over 200,000 people are going to try and force their way into that country this summer; but we will make the most moderate, the most conservative estimate of the number of men that will go in there, and we will say that 50,000 men will go into that country this year. Forty-nine thousand of those men, at the very least calculation, are going to come out of that country next fall, broken, dispirited and discouraged, and they will spread all over the country, and the result will be that only the most determined and the most hardy and adventurous of men will return to that country. That being the case, we want to get all the trade possible this summer, and we must have it. As a matter of fact, hon. gentlemen do not know what they are talking about when they speak about going into the country by way of Edmonton. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) talked about exemption from taxation. What does he think that country consists of? Has he the idea that anybody is going to live there permanently? Such will not be the case by any means. It is a barren country, and although in the Klondike and the creeks running into it wonderful discoveries of gold have been made during the past season, it is not to be imagined that the whole region is going to be covered with Klondikes. Prospectors have been there sixteen years, and they are not "tenderfeet," but they know their business and they have been going through that country carefully prospecting, and they have found only one Klondike, one Eldorado. As a matter of fact, although a man may obtain gold equal to $8, $10 or $12 a day in the beds of rivers and streams, he would be better off working in Ottawa or Hull for $1.25 a day and he would save more money. It will cost him a great deal more than average prices to live and get out gold in that northern country.

The leader of the Opposition has stated that it takes $1 to get out $1 of gold. That calculation is based on ordinary conditions; but in that country—and I know a little about the country, for I live much nearer to it than hon. gentlemen opposite, and I have been far north on the barren lands—it is going to cost $3 for every dollar's worth of gold taken out. If the people can get in there and we can get their trade, which we will eventually do, the country will become developed in course of time; but the only people who will remain to develop that country will be men like Mackenzie & Mann and other capitalists who have money to spend. If we can get the trade of the country, we are going to secure for the Dominion two or three dollars for every dollar's worth of gold taken out; and under these circumstances I say that the contract made is a very good bargain for the people of Canada. I hope I have made my views plain on this last point.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I am sorry for the sake of hon. gentlemen opposite, and perhaps I had better enter into more lengthy explanations. I will give my opinion honestly and fairly, and it may be taken for what it is worth. Of course it does not compare with the opinion of the hon. member for Kent, particularly as regards the timber limits of that country. It does not compare with the opinion of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) as regards the value of the land grant, which I think he placed at $18,000,000,000. I wish to repeat that the people who go to that country and remain there will have money, and every dollar's worth of gold they take out will be the means of putting at least $3 into the pockets of the people of this country. The man who gets $1 worth of gold may not spend $3 in obtaining it, but the disappointed man will spend a great deal; and this development will largely benefit the country as regards trade. When the country settles down into a regular rut—if it ever does—and at all events if it should ever settle down into an ordinary mining country, where capital will be invested for its development, the people of Canada may look for a large share of its trade. So soon as that occurs, it will be time enough to enter into business arrangements for the construction of a railway from Edmonton into the Yukon. As a settler of many years' standing on the plains of Manitoba, I am very much in favour of an interior route, when it can be built; but when we have to face the fact that it is necessary to construct a railway in order to obtain immediate communication with that country, to take in people and supplies, and prevent the region falling into a state of anarchy endangering human life, I am, while anxious and willing to have a railway by an interior route, still more anxious to secure communication at the present time. It is claimed by some hon. gentlemen that our western produce will not obtain entrance into that market. For several years past Manitoba and the North-west have supplied the Vancouver and Victoria markets with butter, cheese, pork and food products of every kind. A large number of cattle have been shipped from the plains to the coast. Just before I left, the Lake of the Woods Milling Co. at Portage la Prairie, was making a large shipment of flour, putting it in double sacks, to the Klondike. The rate on flour from Portage la Prairie to Vancouver is heavy; but representations made by the Winnipeg Board of Trade on their visit east to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have resulted in such a reduction in the freight rate on flour to the coast that no doubt the Lake of the Woods Milling Co. and Ogilvie & Co. and various other millers throughout our wheat-growing section will be able to compete with the millers of Oregon, California and Washington. Wheat, of course, is up in price just now in any case, but pork, butter, cheese, eggs and articles of that kind have risen in price very rapidly and are still rising on account of the demand from Vancouver and Victoria to supply the Klondike country. We will secure not the whole of that trade, but a fair share of it; and hon. members are aware that the passes at Dyea and Skagway are already blocked, and that the only available route which can be used with any hope of success is via the Stikine River and Teslin Lake. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Roche) discussed the value of the land grant and talked very wildly and very lengthily about its value. What does that hon. gentleman know about the value of that land? When he began his speech and he commenced to enter into details, I thought that at last we were going to obtain some definite information as to its value; but he twisted and turned and squirmed and could not give the House any definite idea as to what was the value of that grant. Now, no hon. gentleman in this House nor anywhere else can give the faintest approach to an appraisal of the value of that land. It is a barren mountainous country; there are certain beds of creeks and streams which are gold-bearing, and these, according to Mr. Ogilvie who knows more than anybody else about the country, average 300 feet in width. Mann & Mackenzie cannot take up a single piece of land which is not at least six miles wide and in these six miles wide there are over 31,000 feet. Therefore, even if there is a little streak of pay dirt which may be richer or poorer like the rest of us, as the case may be, running through the middle of that 31,000 feet 300 feet in width, you can see the enormous amount of territory which these men will have to take and which in 99 cases out of 100 will be absolutely valueless.

Again we are told, that this contract is going to make the poor man poorer and the rich man richer. I do not want to bring up old stories, but we are all aware of a political party in this country that succeeded exceedingly well in doing that for seventeen years, and at the end of that period the poor man was poorer and the rich man infinitely richer. We do not believe for a moment that the implementing of this contract is going to have any such effect at all. Hundreds of poor men have gone into that country last fall taking with them every cent they could save; hundreds of men crazed with the excitement over gold mortgaged their farms and houses and with the money landed at Dyea and Skagway trying to force their way over the White and Chilkoot passes, but they failed miserably. I know many of these men who came back with nothing but their lives, having lost every cent they had without ever reaching the gold-bearing country at all. That state of affairs is going to be infinitely worse this year. At the present time at Skagway there is hardly standing room on the beach, and as we see from the newspapers anarchy and disorder of every kind reign. What would be the effect on the minds of the people of the whole world, if Canadians allowed such a state of affairs as that to exist on Canadian soil? It has been our boast hitherto that we have maintained law and order in the Dominion of Canada, and how could we possibly continue to maintain law and order, unless in the first place we build a railway to give these men fair and reasonable transportation, and in the second place to enable the Canadian authorities to send a sufficient military or police force to uphold the law in that country. Whatever may be said by hon. gentlemen on the other side, the present proposition is infinitely cheaper and more satisfactory than anything they could think of to attain that end.

My hon. friend (Mr. Roche) dilated on the poor taxpayers of eastern Canada. When he comes down east he develops a wonderful interest and friendly regard for the taxpayers of eastern Canada, but when he is up west he does not tell us very much about them. He does not talk about the taxpayers of eastern Canada to his constituents, but he keeps that for his speeches down here. It sounded a little strange to me that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Roche) should criticise the Dauphin Railway and the Northern Pacific Railway, which are admitted to have been of the greatest possible benefit to the people of Manitoba, and which have been approved by the people of Manitoba to such an extent that the Greenway Government which promulgated and perfected that railway policy, has been time and time again successfully returned to power, and at the present time, the Opposition in the legislature is so small that it almost takes a microscope to see it at all. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Roche) also criticised to-night the Crow's Nest Railway contract which passed this House last session. Well, that railway is going to be the means of saving to the people of his province of Manitoba, at the very least calculation, $750,000 every year. The downtrodden taxpayers of eastern Canada did not object very seriously to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and it comes with a very ill grace from the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) that he should criticise that railway which is undoubtedly of immense benefit to his province. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the House is tired of the subject of the Yukon Railway. Every available argument has been discussed in connection with that road, and I trust that hon. gentlemen will not be too hard on me, if I do not prolong the debate to any very inordinate length.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Yes, I will go on until I finish. I must say that I regret very deeply that hon. gentlemen opposite, with the exception of their leader, have shown such a lamentable lack of patriotism in this matter. I regret very much that they have delayed the letting of this contract to such an extent. Perhaps they had a reason for it, but it appears to us on this side of the House as if the greater portion of their speeches were simply made for the purpose of factious opposition. These gentlemen of the Opposition feel as we feel, that the contract is a good contract.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, they do not.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Well, I never make an assertion which I cannot prove. These gentlemen opposite feel that the contract is a good contract; they know that it is a good contract, and they tacitly admit that it is the best contract which could possibly be promulgated in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Other hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Yes, they admit it because they have not produced a better, nor have they made any suggestion which would lead to the introduction of a better contract than the one now before the House.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. I have listened to all that has been said in defence of this contract by the Minister of the Interior and by other hon. gentlemen in this House. I have also listened with a great deal of pleasure to the address of the hon. member from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), a gentleman whose opinion on railroad corporations and monopolies is always admired and respected in Ontario. The more this agreement or contract is discussed, the more dissatisfied am I with its terms. We are told that it has been modified in two or three important particulars, but I do not think that such a bargain as this could be modified with so delicate an instrument as a pen; I would like to see it modified out of existence with an axe, and I hope there are hands either in this House or elsewhere that will do that work.

I appreciate all that has been said by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) about the duty of saying nothing which would embitter the pleasant relations heretofore existing between the United States and Canada; I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that Parliament stood at all in need of a lecture on this point from the hon. Minister. I agree with him, that the duty of saying nothing to embitter these pleasant relations is binding on both parties in this House. I wish I could only persuade him that the Government should be just as truly bound by the duty of doing nothing to embitter these relations. I believe the Government is doing a great deal to embitter these relations where it gives away a large slice of the Yukon territory to provide a tramway to be used during the pleasure of the United States. The Government is giving away resources far more than sufficient to build an all-Canadian route from Teslin Lake down to Port Simpson; and all the country gets is a tramway which may be useless whenever the commercial interests of the State of Washington or the State of Oregon are able to call our treaty rights in question. If the Government were really what it pretends to be, the friend of peace and good-will, it would seek to avoid all international complications by making Canadians independent of any treaty rights which may be regarded as favours by our American friends. The Government cannot ensure harmony by ignoring the possibility that difficulties may be raised at Fort Wrangel. The Government could have avoided all cause for misunderstanding by dropping Fort Wrangel and the Washington Treaty out of the question, and by establishing a route which would have secured the entire trade of the Yukon to Canadian citizens without reference to any possible difficulty at Fort Wrangel or elsewhere. It has been suggested that there are grave international reasons why this bargain should be promptly ratified. It would not be right to ask the Government to trumpet those reasons from the housetops. I for one am quite content that the Government should keep a tight grip on its state secrets. I only wish I could persuade it to keep an equally tight grip on the country's resources.

My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser)—I read his speech in "Hansard" the other day—likened this bid to the bid of a man who would like to put in his bid after the article he wanted had been knocked down to some one else. He seemed to look upon the hon. Minister of the Interior as a sort of auctioneer in the matter. I confess I cannot see any evidence of a sale. I believe that if the goods had been put up, there would have been not only this bid, but many others even better. It seems to me, from all the evidence before the House so far, that the hon. Minister of the Interior acted as if he had a good deal rather make a bargain with Mackenzie & Mann than give the people a chance to make better bids. In regard to this Hamilton Smith matter, which has caused so much talk, it strikes me that the circumstances surrounding that case will require a good deal of explanation from the friends of Sir William Van Horne. I believe that the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway realized the danger of allowing Mr. Hamilton Smith to get in between Mackenzie & Mann and the Minister of the Interior. I believe that Mackenzie & Mann represented the Canadian Pacific Railway interests, and I am therefore inclined to think that Sir William Van Horne undertook to amuse Mr. Hamilton Smith until Mackenzie & Mann had completed the deal with the Minister of the Interior. In other words, the friends of Sir William Van Horne had better hurry up and get their explanation in quick, or the country will be at liberty to conclude that the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway simply confided this man Hamilton Smith out of a chance to get in an offer that would have effectually spoiled the Mackenzie & Mann deal. I have never seen Mr. Hamilton Smith or Sir William Van Horne in my life, and I have no personal knowledge that would enable me to put a value on their words: but the circumstances surrounding the case strongly suggest to me that Mr. Hamilton Smith is telling the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

I would like to refer again with becoming reserve to the difficulties created by the policy of the United States towards Canada. I believe that if the Government had anticipated any trouble that may come from the south like patriots, they would have had the whole country behind them, even to the extent of building an all-Canadian route from Lake Teslin to Port Simpson. The country will not begrudge the few millions in dollars needed to build a railway in defence of Canadian trade; but the country will begrudge the millions in gold claims which are given in tribute to Mackenzie & Mann. I am ready to believe, Mr. Speaker, that there are grave international reasons why this tramroad should be built; but I do not believe there are any international reasons why this bargain should be made or ratified. There is surely a difference between building a railroad or a tramroad for the benefit of the country and making a bargain for the benefit of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. The Government appeals at once to our patriotism and our parsimony. They talk like patriots; they tell us that this tramroad is a good thing for the country, and that it has to be built, no matter at what expense; and then they come to us like pawn-brokers and tell us that they have to save the money of the country, and that they are giving us the accommodation required, and it is not costing the country a cent. I confess that I am not persuaded by the Government's double-barrelled argument. I say that if this tramroad had to be built to meet a grave national emergency, the Government should have risen to the occasion like patriots. They could have done as the American Government did in the case of the Union Pacific Railroad—advance the money required to build the road and take a mortgage on it. If they had done that, I believe the country would be paid back every cent, just as the United States have been paid back the $45,000,000 they advanced to the Union Pacific Railroad. But hon. gentlemen say that the country must not take any chances. Since when, pray, Mr. Speaker, did this country cease to take chances when there is a railroad to be built? When there are any chances to be taken, the country has to take them, for there is no one else to take them. The country had to take the chances a year ago, or rather the Canadian Pacific Railway Company took $3,000,000 out of the country's strong box for the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and the friends of the Government got 300,000 acres of British Columbia coal lands. There was no desire then that the country should not take any chances. There would be no desire now that the country should not take any chances if the risks were at all great. I would sooner see the country take the chances than Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann take everything in sight. Some hon. gentleman has suggested that this Yukon business is a huge gamble, and that the country should keep out of it. I do not know whether this hon. gentleman thinks that it would be immoral for the country to rush into such a gamble, I cannot quite see the morality of his idea that the Yukon is a gamble and that the country should keep out of it. The country might better risk its own money than enfranchise Mackenzie & Mann to risk other people's money. I remember that the hon. Minister of Railways, on the afternoon on which he introduced this railway Bill, said that these gentlemen were going to put their hands into their own pockets. These gentlemen will not do anything of the kind so long as the good old British public has got a pocket in its clothes. These contractors are not going into this gamble with their own money. They will use the country's resources to get the money they need. If the enterprise is successful, they win, and if it fails the British public lose and the country's credit is injured. If this scheme should prove unprofitable, Mann & Mackenzie will certainly lose the prospective profits, but the real loss will fall on the innocent investor who has advanced his money. Then the promoters of future enterprises, who will cross the sea in these magnificent ships, a model of which is in the lobby of the House, when they want money from England, will find, as they walk around Lombard and Threadneedle streets, that they will not be able to secure any, because the British investor has been already bitten in this gamble which this Government is going to keep out of. I do not think that there will be any loss. If there were any risk of loss in this transaction, Mackenzie & Mann would not be found within gunshot of this contract.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON—William Mackenzie, of Toronto, and Daniel Mann, of Montreal, are not exactly children in arms, although one hon. gentleman on the other side of the House seems to think that their parents or guardians should have taken hold of them and prevented them from signing away all their worldly possessions in this contract.

There has been an effort on the other side of the House to put the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) before the country as a sort of young David who goes after these Philistines and bowls them over. But these Goliaths of the contracting world are not new at the business of making bargains. I understand from my hon. friend the member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) this afternoon, that this Yukon Railway contract is not the first which Mackenzie & Mann have made with the hon. Minister of the Interior who represented the Dominion in these negotiations. It is perfectly wonderful—I have been making some inquiries—the mine of information that one may find on inquiring into this railway deal. I think, if I mistake not, that the hon. Minister of the Interior, in his former capacity as the Attorney General of Manitoba, was entrusted with the interests of that province in a bargain which immediately preceded the construction of the Lake Dauphin Railway referred to by my hon. friend. I think, too, that Mackenzie & Mann looked after their own interests in that transaction. When the Minister of the Interior was doing the personally conducted Klondike tour business, the other night, before adjournment, it is a pity he did not produce a map showing a diagram of what the Lake Dauphin Railway cost Mann & Mackenzie and what Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann received from the sale of the bonds guaranteed by the Manitoba Government. Then he might have given us a map of the land grant, neatly blocked out, showing how much land Mackenzie & Mann got. I am told that, as the result of that bargain, they got a good paying railway which did not cost them a cent. They had a few hundred thousand dollars, after cleaning up, the difference between the proceeds of the bonds and the cost of the railway, and the returns of the land grant are not all in yet. If I am mistaken, I can only blame the hon. Minister of the Interior. He should have produced a map and diagram showing the enormous losses in land & Mann lost in land and money because they could not hold up their end in a bargain with the Manitoba Government, when the present Minister of the Interior was Attorney General of that province.

I wish I was as sure of this Government's ability to take care of the country as I am of the ability of Mackenzie & Mann to take care of themselves. The House need not offer these contractors any sympathy. They can worry along first rate, considering that under this contract they have got pretty much everything in the Yukon. As to the value of the lands which these gentlemen are to receive. I have been very much struck with the marked difference between the Liberals at Ottawa and the Liberals at Toronto in their estimation of the value of mineral lands. I wish the Liberals at Ottawa would place as high a value on the best lands in the Yukon as the Liberals at Toronto place on the worst mining land in that province. Here are the prices :

(1) The price per acre of all Crown lands to be sold as mining lands or locations in the districts of Algoma, Thunder Bay, Rainy River and that part of the district of Nipissing which lies north of the French River, Lake Nipissing and the River Mattawa shall be :

- | | |
|--|--------|
| (a) If in a surveyed township and within six miles of any railway..... | $3 00 |
| (b) If elsewhere in surveyed territory.. | 2 50 |
| (c) If within six miles of any railway, but in unsurveyed territory..... | 2 50 |
| (d) If situate elsewhere in unsurveyed territory | 2 00 |

(2) The price per acre of all other Crown lands sold as mining lands or locations, and lying south of the aforesaid lake and rivers shall be :

- (e) If in a surveyed township and within six miles of any railway..... $2 00
 (f) If situate elsewhere..... 1 50
 57 V., c. 16, s. 4, part.

(3) The price per acre for a patent of mining rights shall be half of the above rates. (Order in Council dated 21st May, 1897.)

These Yukon lands are surely not less valuable than the lands in the unproved districts of Ontario. I believe that north-western Ontario, is a great mining region, but proud as I am of my province, I cannot blind myself to the fact that the Yukon has produced more gold than Ontario, and that it is to the Yukon, and not to north-western Ontario that people are flocking from all parts of the world. If the lands included in this grant had belonged to the Ontario Government, the price would have been for the 3,750,000 acres $3 an acre. In Ontario there is no reduction on account of the quantity taken. Even the noted Engeldue syndicate had to pay the regular rate on every acre surveyed in their concession. But my hon. friends opposite do not even place the value of $1 per acre on the 3,750,000 acres in a mining region supposed to be the best in the world. No, Mr. Speaker, instead of doing that, they give the land to encourage two gentlemen to build a narrow gauge road, which will pay immense dividends, if they succeed, and will be a total loss to the British investors if they fail; and on this very road I am informed this evening that the rails to be laid were first laid down on the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway thirty-two years ago.

Another point to my mind, which has not been sufficiently cleared up, is that the country loses the chance of getting $15 a year on every claim worked in these 3,750,000 acres. As I read the regulations, the country get $15 per year on every claim registered, and $15 every year so long as that claim is worked. The chances are there will be a great many claims staked out on this territory, which is dedicated to the profit of Mackenzie & Mann, and the country loses the possible annual revenue on such claims.

I grant you, as an hon. gentleman said a moment ago, that the one per cent is a charge on the gold yielded by the Mackenzie & Mann properties, but the other miners in the district have to pay a royalty of 10 per cent. The annual tax of $15 a year would probably pay the expense of maintaining law and order in the district; and as I read the agreement, the country must protect the Mackenzie & Mann properties either at the expense of the eastern taxpayers or the other miners in the Yukon district.

I believe that the presence in the district of a private corporation, endowed with vast territorial powers, will be a cause of endless wrangling and trouble. The cost of settling disputes between the individual miners and the agents of these contractors will be large. More money and men will be needed to protect the alleged rights of Mann & Mackenzie than the rights and property of all the other interests in the Yukon. I believe, as a matter of dollars and cents, it will be a bad business, this enfranchising of individuals with territorial rights which should be exclusively administered by the Government. This thrusting in of an incorporated middle man between the state which should control all the territory and the miners who are seeking to stake out claims, will inevitably lead to trouble.

I am satisfied that it will be cheaper to pay the interest on the cost of this investment than to maintain the extra police and courts that will be required owing to the excessive privileges which this bargain confers upon two individuals. I do not say that the Conservatives, when they were in power, did not put through some transactions that were, possibly, a little off colour; but I hardly think, I do not believe, I am dead certain, they never would have been equal to the iniquity of such a transaction as this. But if the Conservatives had brought down such a bargain to Parliament, they would not have made any offensive display of righteousness. They would have thanked heaven if they could have got it through before the police interfered. When this Government does anything it wants the entire country to admire it, even when it is scattering the country's money right and left. When the Tories did wrong, they tried to plan so as to get away before the police got word of it. The Liberals want to do wrong to an accompaniment of brass bands and bouquets. I can tell hon. gentlemen opposite that this Yukon Railway bargain cost their friends many a vote in the province of Ontario last Tuesday. I believe that if the Conservative Opposition had been in a position to show its enmity to the influences which profit by this bargain, the Conservative Opposition would have swept the province from end to end. If the Ontario Government has escaped defeat, its leaders must know that the dissatisfaction which this bargain has aroused in Ontario has brought them to the very verge of death after twenty-five years of supremacy. That is all I've got to say.

Mr. GANONG. I had not the pleasure of being present when the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) introduced this Bill. But when I arrived, the following day, I could not but be struck with the dejected air of the hon. Minister of Railways, and of hon. members on the other side, except, possibly, the Ministers who were in what would be called, probably, the ring. It was a manifestation of that psychological power which, when a man gets extremely angry, drives the blood to his face, and which, when he is extremely frightened, will upset his equilibrium, the forces flying wild, striking at the pit of his stomach, as it did in the case of many members opposite, paralysing their extremities and even raising the hair on their heads. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) once stated in this House that he was not endeavouring to fire over the heads of members of the Government, he was endeavouring to strike them in the heart. For a time it was not possible to get any words from the hon. gentlemen on the other side, only by aiming at their diaphragm. They worked very much on the principle of the famous Edison doll. When the diaphragm is pressed, it cries "Ma, ma!" With hon. gentlemen opposite it was, "Mann, Mann!" The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) used the phrase—and I presume he used it advisedly—"the wild and woolly west." I should not have applied that phrase myself; but since I have the authority of the Minister of the Interior, I can only suppose that he knew what he was talking about. It is quite evident that he used this as applied to some of his own supporters, because he has succeeded well in pulling the wool over their eyes; and if evidence of wildness is required, I think we can furnish that as well. As to the pulling the wool over their eyes, he referred to certain grants that were to be had, provided this deal went through, and, for some hon. gentlemen who do not live so far in the west, there was another inducement held out—steamboats, steamboats galore to be built, though this was made possible only by the retention of the National Policy. We had from the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) the statement that he was in this line, and that he favoured this contract. Why should he not? He has every interest in favouring it. Hon. gentlemen on this side may say that it is a grand and glorious thing to have built up a country; but the hon. member for Centre Toronto, according to his own words, has been the saviour of the country. If so, he has been its saviour from his friends only. The hon. gentleman's resonant tones had hardly died away in the words, "Elect me. I did it," in the Toronto campaign, when he received what might have been called a Chilcootian blast from the west. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), who is, I believe, the owner of the Winnipeg "Tribune," took occasion to state that "Mr. Bertram's platform, it is satisfactory to learn from an unquestionable source, is not the platform of the Liberal party." I would like to ask the hon. member for Lisgar what that "unquestionable source" is. Two Ministers, representing, we presume, the intelligence of the Liberal party, took occasion to go on the stump in Centre Toronto, and they undoubtedly backed this policy. If the Bertram policy is not the policy of the Liberal party to-day, what policy have they? It is the policy they proposed and carried through this House. So,

I say, it is an evidence of the wildness referred to by the hon. Minister of the Interior, to make a statement in this House, or out of it, in the newspapers or otherwise, that this Bertram policy is not the policy of the Liberal party.

The purpose of this Bill is to confirm a contract made between this Government and Mackenzie & Mann for the building of a railroad, or more correctly speaking and taking the words of the right hon. First Minister, a temporary tramway, from some point on the navigable part of the Stikine River to some navigable point on Lake Teslin, the standard of which shall be equal to that of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway.

Now, Sir, the very fact of the Government placing this matter on the bill of fare for this session, if they are sensible business men, which I think this country has very good reason to question—if, I say, they are sensible business men, the Bill pre-supposes that they had a full knowledge of the requirements and of the resources of that country, and not only so, but that they had a full belief themselves in the possibilities of this great northern country, this country which is to be reached through the construction of—what? The construction of a road, but also the construction of a road, be it remembered, that is adapted to the requirements. It is essential to remember that the road should be adapted to the requirements, and also that the road should be on a proper route. It should be remembered that up to this time this golden harvest consisted chiefly, if not wholly, in placer mines, consisted of that class of mining in which the working classes of this country were particularly interested, a class of mining that does not require large capital, but that simply requires the strength and sturdiness of the men, with a few inexpensive implements with which to dig the wealth out of the soil. I say that the Government believed in this, and as a proof of it, what have they done? They have advertised in the Klondike Official Guide, made it an official advertisement, and have done this in a manner that is not at all creditable to the Government. They have taken an official guide that costs less than 10 cents, and put it on the market, and in order to put money into the pockets of some of their political friends, they have authorized the sale of this book at 50 cents, the difference between this and the cost going into the pockets of their friends, when this book should have been spread broadcast over this country without the charge of a cent to anybody. They have not only done this, but they have sent the author of this book, who is admitted to be the best authority on the Yukon district we have, out to lecture under the auspices of His Excellency the Governor General and under the auspices of the First Minister of the Crown. In doing this they have given the best possible proof that they believe in the great wealth of this country. If they do not, they are no better than banditti, luring men to hardships and death that they know are before them. Now, Sir, throughout this matter I cannot help but commiserate the Minister of Railways. I know something of the Minister of Railways; I know some of the difficulties he had to get into this House. When he got in here the first thing he had to do was to father a job that had been put up before he ever came here. He did it with an ill grace, he did not do it with the old accustomed fervor that we had seen in the local legislature. But he had scarcely got through with that before he attempted to fly a kite of his own in the Canada Eastern railroad. Well, that kite is still in the air, it still lacks the wind, and it is liable not to land where the hon. gentleman wishes. He scarcely got through with that, before this hair-lifting scheme was thrown in. He happened to be in a position where he had to accept it or get out. He was told so very plainly, if reports be true. He brought it in here with an apology, too great an apology for a man of his ability. But I would warn hon. gentlemen to look out. Evil days seem to have fallen upon the Minister of Railways. He seems to be sowing wheat for other reapers, with the possibility of gleaming a little for himself. Keep your eye out that he does not glean most of that golden harvest for himself. The Minister of Railways told us that he knew a good deal about this matter in some places, and in others he absolutely denied knowing much if anything. It is quite evident, however, that at least a year ago—for I believe a question brought out the fact, that on the 15th of March, 1897, every one of Mr. Ogilvie's reports were in the hands of the present Government—they evidently had this matter well in hand, had they chosen to have taken it up. No doubt the reports were accurate enough to have been acted upon. Now we find the hon. Minister of Railways said this, in his speech the other day:

Hon. members of this House will recollect quite clearly, that before the close of last session, evidence was pouring in upon us of the immense discoveries of gold that were taking place in the Yukon district, and returning parties were bringing the most fabulous accounts of its mineral deposits.

Now, it was on the strength of just such information as this, supplemented by such outside information as was available, that the Minister of the Interior went off on that junketing trip out to the western coast. Does any one imagine that the Minister of the Interior went for his health? If they do, they do not know the Minister of the Interior. He did not go out for the purpose of examining placer mines, he had some other object in view. He did not go to determine if a certain railway were warranted, or if the railway was warranted by a certain route. He had determined on that before he went, without any question. But he did not take the country into his confidence. He went out there simply as a part of the grand play that was to come off in this House at the ensuing session. The Minister of the Interior went out there, and he did go up some of these passes. He no doubt put on some of these remarkable looking suits, and tramped over the passes just to see how it would feel to be a Klondike miner. The Minister of Railways has stated, also, that in their opinion the Chilkat Pass was the proper pass through which to build, as a business enterprise. Well, it is not at all surprising that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann wanted to build by that pass. They had good reason to wish to build by that pass, for according to the statement of the Government engineer—and by the way whatever may be said in connection with this, it must be remembered that he at least has a reputation to maintain—the engineer states that the route will be 245 miles long from Lynn Inlet to a point on the Yukon five miles below Five Finger Rapids. He states that that route will cost $5,635,000 to build. According to the present contract now before the House that route would give Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann 6,125,000 acres of land. It is quite evident why they wished to build through Chilkat Pass. They were not looking so much for a good railway as for good land. The words of the Minister of Railways on this subject were these:—

The Chilkat route would cost a great deal of money; probably, among all these four the Chilkat route is, although the longest, the most favourable from a business point of view, and one which, were it not for the national considerations, might be very favourably regarded.

If the contention of the Government supporters is correct, that this is a hard contract, why do not the contractors give it up? Hon. gentlemen seem to be very sympathetic in behalf of these poor contractors. On the contrary, additional concessions have already been made. They have conceded points not only in respect to the directors, but in other respects, and around these corridors we have seen the principal mover in this great deal ready to make concessions. These facts prove that the contractors are after a land grab. What does this little tramway, wending its way up to Teslin Lake, represent? It represents the tail of a rat that will eat the life out of that country. Hon. members need not ask the contractors why they preferred to build by Chilkat Pass. They are sufficiently well up in natural science to know that the longer the tail the rat has the greater will be the capacity for devouring this the most palatable meal ever set before a gourmand; hence they would sooner build through Chilkat Pass and get the larger land grant for the railway and the auriferous deposits of that country.

The Minister of the Interior did not go into that country for his health; he went there professedly to determine on the route. He is no novice at spectacular performance. He concluded to build—but without doubt he had arrived at that opinion before he went west. Not only so, but he knew enough to bring all the forces possible to back this scheme. What did he do? The first thing was to ring in the loyalty cry. He felt, however, he could not carry the Chilcat Pass route simply because one of the termini would be in a foreign country, in a country that commercially is antagonistic to Canada; but he felt that if he could raise the cry of an all-Canadian route he would be able to carry it, because the people would pick up the cry from one end of the country to the other. This, of course, was a surprise to the people, because it was not according to the traditions of the party he represented. I do not want to be understood as opposing an all-Canadian route; on the contrary, I will oppose in every way possible a railroad by any other route. But I do want a route, if we have one, that will possess some practical value to the people of Canada, who are most interested in having the best possible route adopted.

As the hon. gentleman had determined on building a railway, why did he not take the people at large into his confidence? It was not necessary to determine the possibility of this route chosen. He had the report of 1896-97 in his hands. Not only so, but he had the report of Dr. Dawson in 1887, in which he said:

Communication may easily be established by railway from the mouth of the Stikine to the centre of the Cassiar district and beyond.

Mark the word easily. Nor did the hon. gentleman make this trip to determine the necessity of that route, because the Minister of the Interior, no doubt, put it into the mouth of the Minister of Railways to say:

It became clear to us that we should immediately address our attention to dealing with these problems.

Further on he said:

With such a probability staring us in the face, could we afford to allow any time to be wasted; could we allow months or even weeks to go by which must be used if we were to meet the demand that transportation facilities should be provided at once.

Then, why the necessity of this secret contract? This is a question which is being asked all over the country, from Victoria to Cape Breton and from our southern boundary to the Arctic Sea. It was asked, and asked very loudly on the 1st of March. This visit to the west made by the Minister of the Interior was but part of the farce to draw the attention of the public while plans were being prepared, and these plans took time to prepare. They have been pretty thoroughly sifted, but they will stand more sifting yet. They were made, not by a novice, but by one who was a master hand. The Government have either wilfully allowed provisions to be incorporated into the contract, or they have been incorporated so skilfully that the Government could not detect their nature, that they convey untold wealth belonging to the working people of this country into the hands of a monopoly. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that no hon. member on this side would wish to have it thought that the Minister of the Interior made a confidant of one party. It is true we have had some evidences during the life of this Parliament to raise suspicion that the Ministers have made confidants of the public contrary to usage. We have evidence of it in the case of the Minister of Finance, when he wished to influence the Nova Scotia elections. We had some little evidence also when the Minister of Railways wished to give Kingston the contracts for locomotive engines. But surely the Minister of the Interior would not attempt to give information to one party and keep it from another. Surely no man would have any intimation that the Stikine route would be selected, because it carried with it the biggest pull on the public domain; that it would stand best with the people because the cry of an all-Canadian route would blanket everything else. But if the Minister did not do this, it was to say the least a remarkable demonstration of that wonderful condition of the mind known as telepathy. If it were admitted that the Minister is not connected by blood with Mr. Mann it would only be greater evidence that this science of telepathy is not dependent on consanguinity. Hon. members cannot believe that in this country Mr. Mann and his partner are the only men among 5,000,000 Canadians who would be able to carry out this work, but there are beside about one hundred millions of Anglo-Saxons, some of whom I presume have some little ability in the line of carrying on such extensive public works, still, Sir, these were the only men apparently who could be trusted with so much of this auriferous surface, sub-soil and bed-rock. And as an evidence that telepathy or something of that character had something to do with that contract, Mr. Mackenzie has himself become a little confidential, for he is reported as having stated in Winnipeg as follows:—

We spent a great deal of money before—

Before what—

—before we took up the scheme. We spent a good deal of money before we took up the scheme.—

This scheme was not sprung on Mackenzie & Mann inside of fifteen minutes——and every fair-minded man will support me when I say that it would have been folly to let every person know what we were doing.

How does it chance that Mackenzie & Mann knew so much of this road, knew so well just where to go and make their survey, knew how many miles of road they could get, and how big a pull they could make on the public domain. It is quite evident that some one had given them information, and we have the confirmation of that from the spokesman himself of the contracting parties. They went and looked over the promised land in order to find out just how much land this Government should promise them. Now, Sir, if more were needed we have further evidence from the statement of the Minister of Railways. He says :

And people ignorant of the difficulty surrounding the situation, and without knowing the character of the undertaking, would not have offered to have entered into the contract.

How did the Minister of Railways chance to know that these good people, these friends of the Government, had been all over this country. He tells us as plainly as can be, that they must have known, for he refers to every one else as being ignorant. What will be the impression that will go throughout this country? The impression will be that there are only two people in this matter and they are Mann & Mackenzie; they were in it from the first and have been in it ever since. When the thinking people of this country have had time to read and digest the remarkable diplomacy in the speech of the Minister of Railways in which he tried to impress upon us the stupendous difficulties under which these contractors will have to labour; the thinking people will be very much surprised indeed. Let me read a little of his (Mr. Blair's) statements further. He says :

I presume we may be asked—

He was very weak kneed when he started out; he knew very well that the sober thought of the people of this country would call the Government to account for this conduct of theirs. He says :

I presume we may be asked, why did we give so many acres as 25,000? Why did you not give the contractors less? Well, I may frankly acknowledge that the reason was because they would not take less. We could not force them to take less. We bartered and negotiated it with them. Members of the Government, sub-committees of the Government—sub-committees constituting pretty nearly the whole numerical strength of the Government—urged on Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann every conceivable argument in order to get them to reduce their terms, and we did get them down very much below, I can assure you, the demands they made; but we could not get them below 25,000 acres per mile; therefore did not.

Well, that is a very nice kind of argument for a Minister of the Crown to make. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, it would be interesting to this House to have a map displayed here showing how much Mackenzie & Mann asked in the first place, so that it might be learned what brazen effrontery these contractors did have. I am not much of a lawyer, but I believe there is such a thing as contributory evidence, and if there was ever a case under heaven of contributory negligence there is a case to-day before this Parliament against this Government, for holding the report of the engineer for one year and not allowing the country to know what they proposed to do about this contract. They come before this House and they cry that they had not time, but the question of contributory negligence meets them in the face every time. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly wonderful; these Ministers had fairly to pray with these contractors—and some of the Ministers have had experience in praying within the last year. The Minister of Finance with his deputy the Prime Minister of Nova Scotia got a chance of praying down at Boston; praying over a contract that they themselves brought into existence, and the Minister (Mr. Fielding) has scarcely got the dust off his knees yet. What was he praying for? He was praying to keep two towns alive in his own native province, one of 2,000, another of 3,000 population, that were about to be depopulated through the very franchise that he himself granted when First Minister of Nova Scotia. Why, the Minister of Finance might have furnished the rails for this Yukon railroad, and got them from Mr. Whitney, of Boston, probably at a cheaper rate than these 36 or 40-year old rails they propose to put on it. If this contract is an evidence of the ability of thirteen Ministers of the Crown, two ministers of the Gospel, and all the laymen sitting on that side of the House, to reduce the claims of Mann & Mackenzie to build this railroad, then they had better throw up the job and let the Conservatives treat with the contractors.

Why, Sir, when the country gets a chance to grasp the true inwardness of this matter they will be struck with amazement. It is a perfect wonder to most people that Mackenzie & Mann did not ask for a cinch on what daylight they have in that Yukon country; certainly they must have asked for the whole aurora to make a halo for themselves. Why, Sir, if this scheme materializes the man in the moon won't be in it with this Mann, for the man in the moon shines with a borrowed light, while this Mann of the Yukon will shine resplendent in the glories of his own possessions; although none the less robbed from the honest working men of this country, and that by a Government elected to protect them. Now, Sir, again referring to the speech of the Minister of Railways when he introduced this Bill. He said :

The Government knew, or at all events we thought we knew, what was wanted in this direction.

A good many people now think they did not know.

First came the question as to how we can get what we want,—

Please note the reading of this :

—and upon what terms can we get what we want.

Now, Sir, up to yesterday that read very smoothly and nicely, but after the First Minister refused to give a telegram to this House on which hinged, not this contract, but the possibilities of another and more favourable contract it will leave the whole country, from the east to the west, to question as to whether the Government have not themselves had some hand in this deal. It would perhaps be more appropriate to read it in this form :

Then came the question as to how can "we" get what "we" want, and upon what terms can "we" get what "we" want.

The Minister, continuing, says :

How could we invite tenders on these conditions ?

Well, he had better have done it and taken the chances, or else have prayed longer and more earnestly, and reduced the amount of the subsidy. He says further :

We did not propose to give any money to the enterprise, we proposed that the territory should pay for the railway which was necessary for its future. How could we tell the value of the land ; how could we tell in advance the value of a land subsidy ?

They had better to have asked Mackenzie & Mann, who are well up in such things. Besides that, they might also ask some of the members who sit on the back benches. For instance, they might have consulted the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes), who, last session, so strongly impeached certain supporters of the Administration for grabbing coal lands in British Columbia. I wonder if that hon. gentleman's statesmanship is too narrow to oppose a worse deal than that. Shall we hear the voice that downed the oracle of Liberalism, the Toronto "Globe," in defence of his native province, score as strongly against an outrage that affects the whole of this country ? I hope we may ; the time will be opportune for it. Now, I wish to call attention to a few figures that have been given by the engineer of the Government in connection with these contracts. He states that 245 miles of railway over the Dalton trail could be built at a cost of $5,635,000. He states that 208 miles on the Stikine Valley route (not including the sleigh or wagon roadways in either case), could be built at a cost of $3,957,000. That is a difference between the cost of these two roads of $1,678,000. But if they would carry the same acreage per mile, there would be a difference in the land grant of 925,000 acres. Well, if this 925,000 acres is worth $1,678, it is worth just 1.814 cents an acre. At the same rate, the 5,200,000 acres for the 208 miles on the Stikine Valley would be worth $9,432,800. These are rather startling figures to be presented to the country, and they are made upon a very conservative basis. What do they show ? They show, based upon the report of the Government engineers and upon the offers of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann for building this road, that this country is being asked to present to these contractors, or their assigns, 208 miles of railway, with terminal facilities and many franchises hitched on, and above these, a land grant of the value of nearly $5,500,000—and what for, Mr. Speaker ? This is all, Sir—for the very questionable possibility of being able, according to Mr. Jennings, to work 12,000 people and their supplies through to the gold fields next fall. Mr. Jennings knew, when he was making that statement, the number of trips that could be made on the Stikine River, and, as his reputation depended upon it, he did not make an over-estimate, but made a fairly conservative estimate, knowing the conditions and the navigability of the river. In regard to the value of these lands, we have also corroborative evidence from the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) ; and, if there is any one who knows their value, his paper indicates that he does. He said also, on the floor of this House, in defending this contract, that it would be almost impossible for Mackenzie & Mann to get men to work on this road—why ? Because they could go into this rich country and shovel gold. No one will dispute the hon. member's statement, for he is in a position to know about it better than most of the gentlemen on either side of the House. I do not oppose the road to that country. I advocate it. I advocate its being built by the Government. It cannot surely be possible that the Government are short of funds, with all the potentiality of Governor General's warrants unsigned behind them. Surely there must be funds somewhere to build this small road. No, Sir ; but this was not part of the play. Everything before this had been pantomime to the public, but a farce to the members of the Government. What did the Ministers do to meet the exigencies which they knew were upon them—and brought on, too, by their own negligence ? Why, Sir, they did not require to do anything. The farce was over, and the people, instead of paying for the pantomime at the beginning, as is usual, are asked to pay for it at the end, and at what a price ! Why, Sir, it was not even as in the old Scotch song, "Whistle, and I will come to you, my laddie," but the laddie was right on the ground, ready to whistle himself, and whistle he did ; and, according to the hon. Minister of Railways, he whistled both long and loud, and the least price at which this country can get just such a whistle is 5,200,000 acres of land, worth $9,432,800. Mr. Speaker, what do you think of such a tune ? What will this country think of such a tune ? Why, Sir, up to a few days since, everything had been running as placidly as a summer sea. We had Jubilee festivities and jollifications of every sort, with possibly a few jamborees thrown in, when lo! this telepathic scheme, which had been maturing for about twelve months, dazzled the whole country with its brilliancy. And, Sir, it evidently is pretty brilliant. It outshines even the Rothschilds, who are presumed to have a fair share of this world's goods. But, Sir, up turns Mr. Mann, the man who, figuratively speaking, has been in the Government woodpile for a year; and what does he say? He says: Don't you worry; this railroad shall not cost you one coined dollar of the realm. Besides that, as stated by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche), he had enjoyed the advantage of some little contracts before. He had a little surplus, and he told the hon. gentlemen who are engineering this deal, that he was willing to let them have $250,000 to keep the grease running on the Government wheels until this contract was put through. Not for money will he build this road. Oh, no—the Government do not want him to build it for money, but just simply for love of Canada. For love of how much of it, do you think? We shall never know, probably, on this side how much Mackenzie & Mann wanted in the original draft, but we know to-day, from the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), that they loved the 3,750,000 acres of Canada sufficiently well to build a railway in return for it.

The hon. Minister of the Interior says that the contractors' total grant is 3,750,000 acres, but according to the engineer, the amount is 5,200,000 acres of auriferous land, located according to this certain plan which they have. But the engineers say: do not lose sight of one thing—it is an all-Canadian route. The Ministers hark back to these followers: Do not lose sight of the fact that it is an all-Canadian route; that is the only thing which is going to save us in the eyes of the country. Well, Sir, the contractors did not only wish for this little piece of Canada—this 3,750,000 acres that they loved so well—but they asked for a few extras. I am not going to enumerate all they get, but there was one condition in particular that they insisted upon, and that was: you must prevent Uncle Sam or any other bad boy from coming in at the work to compete with us. Notwithstanding the statement of the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) that this is a glorious and great contract, that it is a Bill that could not be improved upon. Why, Sir, it has, since its first reading in this House, changed shape very materially and more particularly in its land grabbing propensity. Possibly the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) may have had something to do with it. He may have assisted, remembering the difficulties he got into himself in his own native province. I do not presume in taking this matter up to assume the position of an exponent of international law or of one qualified to determine the scope of international treaties or rights, but I do state, and the statement is borne out by the facts patent to every hon. gentleman who reads that with an anti-British feeling as rampant as it is in the United States to-day, so rampant indeed that last year a treaty of arbitration sent over by Great Britain was rejected by the United States. I say with this feeling as it is, and more particularly with the feeling from the western or silver states as it is to-day against Great Britain on account of her refusal to accept a silver standard, and also the direct interest of the western states, in this matter of supplying the trade of the Yukon country, so far as we are concerned in Canada, we need look only for the closest interpretation of the words of the treaty, or in the words of a Liberal—I cannot say statesman—but politician, we need only look for cold justice. Why, what would you think of a United States customs collector collecting duty on fresh fish when he knew there was no duty on them in the tariff and was well aware that the entry would be returned to be amended? Would you not think that such a proceeding was an outrage? I have no doubt of the opinion of hon. members, but, Sir, such a proceeding was carried on in the city of Eastport, and it was carried on at the instigation of the Liberal party in the county of Charlotte. During the election of 1887, in order to frighten the fishermen along the coast into the belief that they must vote for the Liberal party or a duty would be imposed on fish, a leading Liberal of Charlotte put up a job with the customs collector, and the customs collector imposed a duty on fresh fish only for a day or two, just long enough to serve their purpose. Only for that, a Conservative would have been elected for that county in 1887, and would have sat in this House from 1887 to the present day.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to ask the hon. Minister of Customs a question. Presuming it may be an advantage to the shippers in Seattle to make it interesting enough for the collector of Fort Wrangel to refuse to allow goods to be transhipped there in bond, in what position would he be? It would take weeks to negotiate with Washington, and by the time you had the matter settled, the question of navigating the Stikine for this year would have gone by. I do not wish to intimate that this will be done, but if it should be done it will simply be a little retributive justice on the Liberal party for their action in the county of Charlotte. It seems to have been taken for granted by a great many members of this House that everybody is in favour of this Stikine valley route. I want it understood that I, for one, am not in favour of that route. I want it to be understood that there will have to be a good deal more information produced before I will vote for any subsidy, either of lands or moneys, to build this temporary flimsy tramway over the mountains. I will concede that possibly a good wagon road could be built, but that could be built at an expense of $210,000, it being only 150 miles long according to Mr. Jennings's reports.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. GANONG. If you do not like your medicine come to the purer atmosphere over here where people keep to their principles. I wish to refer to some statements of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) regarding the possibilities of transport over this tramway. He says that "it has been estimated—and the estimate does not seem to be an extravagant one—that from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000 will be spent on transportation and supplies of these people. It does not require any lengthy argument on my part to show that the volume of trade is a thing to which this country should devote a large amount of attention, when there is a possibility of securing it for Canadian workmen and manufacturers." Take the estimate of Mr. Jennings, that it takes $400 worth of goods to supply any miner going to that country. According to the Minister's estimate, 125,000 persons will go into this country over this Yukon valley route.

Now, the hon. Minister of the Interior says of his knowledge that the Skagway and Dyea passes are closed up, that there are more people there at present or arriving than can possibly get through those routes. So he must expect that they are all going over the Stikine valley route, at least he is giving the public that impression, with the hope that it may help to carry this scheme through. It is a most ridiculous statement to put before intelligent men, that, looking over this route, it will be possible to carry over it 125,000 able-bodied men and the stuff they will need to take with them, which will be equivalent to virtually 125,000 tons. But take the figures of the hon. Minister of the Interior at a later period in his speech, when he had sobered down. He said that this road would have the effect of bringing to Canada within six months trade to the extent of perhaps twenty or twenty-five millions of dollars. That means, on the basis of the calculation of the Government engineer, that 50,000 men and 50,000 tons of supplies would be carried in over this route. That is all done to influence the public in favour of this scheme. The route cannot do this work this year. Do you presume, Sir, that the hon. Minister of the Interior fancies that it can? He had not the most remote idea, nor has any other hon. gentleman on that side of the House any idea, that it can be done. Why, his wagon road, in the unfinished state it will be in the spring, cannot be made use of until late; and then you have the June rains on it, so that it would be almost impossible to carry in goods by the wagon road. The tramway will not be finished until the 1st September, and after that there will be six weeks to carry that immense traffic into this country.

To get any correct idea of the possibilities of this route, one must take fully into account the conditions of the Stikine River. I am going to ask your indulgence while I read a synopsis of the report on this river, because on the navigability of this river depends the whole value of this route.

The width from Telegraph Creek to Klootchman's Cañon, a distance of 44 miles, average 500 feet. In this stretch occurs the Grand Rapids, a particularly swift section of the river. At Klootchman's Cañon the river runs between rugged rock walls, and contracts to 300 to 500 feet in width for one-third of a mile, and at Little Cañon, ten miles further down, contracts to 100 or 150 for three-fifths of a mile. Below Little Cañon the river widens, but makes many bends and swings, and the bottom lands are frequently divided by channels cut during freshet season through the silt and loose formation.

According to Dawson :

The extensive flats near the mouth of the river render it necessary to enter it about high tide.

He reports also :

Mr. Hunter ascertained that the channel across these flats has from one to two feet only of water at ebb tide.

Such, Sir, is the description given. Such is the description given by the Government engineers of the water-way by which it is proposed to carry 50,000 men and 50,000 tons of freight between the 1st of May and 1st October this year. It is nothing more than a canoe stream. One of the engineers remarks in his report that the Indians of this river are remarkable adepts in poling a canoe. The rapids are so swift that they cannot paddle against them, and must resort to poling.

There are some other matters to be considered in this connection. Dawson reports that the highest water occurs in June and July. That is undoubtedly after the spring rains have started the snow in the mountains. He also states two other facts that must be taken into account in connection with the river. The precipitation at Fort Wrangel is sixty inches. As soon as you get inside the mountain ranges the precipitation is so little that it is absolutely necessary to irrigate the land in order to cause it to produce anything. These things have a material bearing on the navigability of this river. Besides, he states that the country has been largely bared by fires, and no doubt as it begins to be settled, the timber will be cut off. Any one who knows anything about timber land knows that it is absolutely essential, in order to reserve a supply of water, that you should have timber lands at the beginning of these rivers. Let us also look at other and no less discouraging conditions. First, note that the streams which join to form the river are streams starting in the mountains, mere mountain torrents. They, as well as the main river, run in contracted valleys in which rivers from the very nature of the country are subject to sudden rises. The only conclusion is that when a sudden shower comes (which, according to Professor Dawson, is very rare) inside of these mountain ranges, from the configuration of the country, the water runs rapidly off into the stream, accounting for the sudden rise and fall of these streams. At one time you may have one or two feet of water at a given point, and within an hour, fifteen feet of water at the same location. He says:

At times the river is too low for speed with a reasonable cargo, or, the stream may be very high and the riffles difficult to make headway against, with the additional danger of drift trees or snags getting foul of the steering gear or wheel. The latter danger is most to be feared where the channel is contracted, such as in Little and Klootchman's cañons. If any mishap occurred to the vessel's machinery, she would at once be carried against the rugged rock walls by the swift swirling, disturbed waters and sunk by having her planking either torn out or stove in.

That is Mr. Jennings's report, and truly it opens up a beautiful prospect for the transport of human beings and of valuable property. Again, he states that the level is sometimes fully fifteen feet below the lowest water mark at high water period, and also that it is with considerable risk that the passage through these contracted reaches are made, and delays are common, as driftwood is liable to become foul of the rudders or wheel. At Little and Klootchman's Cañons there is a current of about eight miles. I fancy from the light way in which a good many members on the other side talk with regard to this question of currents that they have not a very clear idea what an eight-mile-an-hour current means. If they wish a clear illustration of it let them go down to Sparks street and stand before an electric car going at eight miles an hour. When they have picked themselves up, shaken the dust off their feet and regained their composure they will have some idea of the impact of a vessel in an eight-mile current. Why, Sir, I am not giving the best points in this river. That is not what we must consider. What you need to do as sensible business men, is to look at the difficult points of this navigation. Even the Minister of Railways damns it with faint praise, for he says, in reply to the ex-Minister of Finance, I believe, in regard to shipping goods by steamer up this river.

Certainly not, unless it is a very shallow craft. And further on Ocean transit will terminate at or in the immediate neighbourhood of Fort Wrangel, near the mouth of the Stikine River.

That hon. gentleman recognizes that it will be utterly impossible for vessels of any size to navigate this river. Now as this is an important point. I shall refer to some of the past experiences on this river. The Minister of the Interior himself, in trying to show the expense of transportation, gave a strong argument against that river. He read, I believe, from the Victoria "Colonist," and I will only quote what refers to this point:

Everything used in constructing the railway except the right of way and the ballast, must be taken up the Stikine River. This is what will make the undertaking exceptionally difficult.

Mark the words "exceptionally difficult." The Victoria "Colonist" people who are virtually on the ground, state plainly, and their statement is repeated by the Minister of the Interior, that this will make it exceptionally difficult.

Mr. Dawson states that it is navigable for stern-wheel steamers of light draught and good power, to Glenora, 126 miles from Rothesay Point, at its mouth, and under favourable circumstances to Telegraph Creek, 12 miles further.

He also states:

It is generally necessary to carry a line ashore at a few places.

It is true, Mr. Ogilvie has stated that the Hudson Bay Co.'s steamer made but two trips from Port Simpson to the Stikine River and up as far as Telegraph Creek, in 1896, and two in 1897. But it is rather unfortunate that the Minister of the Interior did not succeed in getting the logs of these two steamers. We might then have known how long they were waiting at the mouth of the river in order to get over the bar: we might have known at what season of the year it was, whether it was after the spring freshets when they were able to navigate this river with craft drawing four feet of water, or whether it was at a later season. The fact that this is not produced to us, is an evidence that the Government have not taken proper precautions in looking up the navigability of this river. Mr. Ogilvie states further:

Sudden rises in the river also bring down lots of drift wood, which compel tying up until it abates.

Now, Sir, I would like in this connection to make a little reference to Port Simpson. Mr. Ogilvie states:

If we have to make our way entirely in British vessels, we can take a river steamer at Port Simpson, and watching for a favourable opportunity to cross Dixon entrance (some 60 miles across), 170 miles brings us to the mouth of the Stikine River.

But that is just where the difficulty begins, from the mouth of the river to Telegraph Creek. Then the Minister of the Interior states positively that the Stikine is a navigable river. I should not like to take the judgment of the hon. gentleman. He says later:

I do not think anybody ever supposed that it was navigable for ocean steamers.

Mr. Jennings, his own engineer, turns round and says :

The Stikine River is usually navigable for powerful steamboats of suitable design, to Glenora.

It may be possible that the Minister of the Interior cannot distinguish the difference between a river that is absolutely navigable, and one that is usually navigable. This river cannot possibly be open more than five or six months in the year, and if this word "usually" can be applied here, the probabilities are that not for one-half of that time will it be possible for any vessel of respectable size to navigate that river. Next, we have the authority of the Minister of Agriculture. I do not know what the great rivers are that run through his country. I do not know what the great waters are. Possibly he may have an unusually large lake area in his county. But he seems to speak with great authority, for he says :

We have a few miles south of Fort Wrangel, Port Simpson, where, if necessary, we can tranship into lighters, and tow those lighters from Port Simpson up the Stikine River ; and I believe there is another possible proposition, which is, that such lighters should be constructed somewhat after the form of whale-back vessels, which are used on the great lakes, so that a string of these lighters could be towed from Victoria, or Vancouver, all the way up the inside channels without any transshipment or stoppage, or anything more than entering the first American port they will come to, Fort Wrangel. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, and says it is impossible. But that is a proposition which I have discussed with some practical men.

Why did not the hon. gentleman advise us who these practical men were ? Certainly to men who know anything about shipping, it would have been interesting to know the names of the practical men who had made such an absurd proposition.

They say it is perfectly feasible, and I would not be at all surprised—

Well, any shipping man who knows anything about his business, would be surprised.

—to find that before this railway is far proceeded with, the materials for its construction will be carried up to Glenora in the way I have pointed out.

Well, Sir, if they do carry this up to Glenora it will be by putting wheels on their keels. The projection of such a scheme is a symptom of a disease not uncommon on the other side of the House, known as having wheels in the head. To back up this, we have also the statement of the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram). It is not surprising to hear the hon. gentleman talk like this, for he says he is building steamers himself, and this is necessary talk for him until his steamers shall have been delivered :

The Minister of Agriculture stated that he had been looking into the matter and discussing it with other people, and he was inclined to think that barges could be towed from Victoria and Vancouver via Wrangel and the Stikine River to Telegraph Creek. From what I know, because I have given great attention to the subject, and I happen to be building boats for the Stikine, I am very much inclined to think it can be done, while I am not absolutely certain. Then, of course, it would be a more available route than ever for the purpose of enabling people to send goods without breaking bulk from Victoria or Vancouver, to the head of Telegraph Creek.

Well, the party who are now in power in this country some years ago, had a friend about the time they were endeavouring to carry out their commercial union plan. It is true they dropped him when he got into a little difficulty. But you will remember that that hon. gentleman is still alive, he is over in London, and they might work him in now. His pet scheme is, I believe, to put a trolley wire over the Erie Canal. Now if you can get the hon. member for Centre Toronto to build these boats with wheels on them, and get Mr. Erastus Wiman to string along his trolley wire, you may succeed in running a steamer up to Telegraph Creek. It will not be long, however, before we shall hear from the senior member for Halifax and also from the members of the city and county of St. John, that they propose that a whaleback shall start from some of our eastern ports to make the north-east passage and go around and up to Telegraph Creek. It would be about as reasonable as the talk we have heard in this House on the subject, and which is not much to the credit of the hon. members who are trying so hard to bolster up this scheme. What have we here after all ? We have 150 miles of circuitous river navigation, dependent on mountain torrents, with either too much or too little water, liable to sudden rises, and an eight-mile current, which will require warping. Yet we are asked to accept this as navigable waters for the transfer of $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 worth of freight during the season of four months. This is called a great National waterway. When hon. gentlemen take into account all the data, they will have ascertained the extreme risk taken as regards navigation at these points. It will be very difficult to obtain insurance, and I question very much whether it will be possible to obtain any insurance at all. We have here a report from the Pacific Coast, under date of February 23rd, as follows :

Most of the marine insurance companies have advanced the rates for Alaskan trade. The freight rate on steamers of the approved class has been made 1 per cent, below deck, and 3 per cent above, in place of 1 per cent below and 2 per cent above. Freight on barges or dismantled ships advanced from 4 per cent to 5 per cent below deck and 7 per cent above. The new rate on hulls and equipment of barges is from 5 to 6 per cent, an advance about equal to that made on freight.

The advance on approved steamers is understood to be about 15 per cent, and to range on other steamers and other classes of barges from 30 to 50 per cent. The advance has been made because the business is undesirable. Risks in southern Alaskan waters being rendered exceptionally hazardous by the dangers demonstrated in the wrecking of the steamers "Wilapa," "Corona," "Mexico," "Clara," "Nevada." The loss to insurance companies on the hulls and equipment alone of these vessels it is said was: "Wilapa," $20,000; "Mexico," $80,000; "Corona," $120,000 "Clara Nevada," $20,000.

This is the route over which the Minister of Agriculture expects to be able to run whale-back vessels. The fact of the matter is, that these difficulties are not brought to light, but this contract is being foisted on the country under the guise of ultra loyalty, calling it an all-Canadian route, although it is simply to assist a monstrous combination in getting an immense land grant.

I would be the last to oppose any practical route. I believe the only practical route is through the centre of this country via Edmonton. I hold that the capabilities dispose of the plea that the road is being built on the ground of urgency, and the Edmonton route is the only one that should be thought of in connection with granting a large subsidy by the Government. That is a route which would open up at least some country for settlement. In what position will the farmers of the North-west be placed in connection with the present route? When they come to add the expense of transportation to the coast to the cost of their goods, and then send them north, they will find it will be possible for the farmers of the State of Washington, and of the states further to the south to pay the duty, and still send their goods into the Yukon country in competition with those of Canadian farmers. Our farmers, by the Edmonton route, would be able to send beef and breadstuffs to that country, and if hon. members will take the list of necessary supplies set out by Mr. Jennings, they will find that the quantity furnished by the farmers, out of a total value of $400, would possibly be $200, outside of what might come indirectly. It is in the interest of our western farmers that the route via Edmonton should be adopted and the railway built by no other route. The protection of the western farmer was reduced under the present tariff. Even protection on flour, which might possibly have gone from our western country, was reduced, perhaps in the interest of the State of Washington, which can furnish food supplies for this great Canadian country. Let hon. members note how deftly the Minister of the Interior threw out his catchy side-show to obtain the votes of some of our good western farmers. What did the hon. gentleman say? He told the House plainly that he was making a bid for these western votes, and he made the statement in plain English language.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. GANONG. Let hon. members listen, and they will understand. He said:

Mr. GANONG.

It is contemplated to extend it down from Telegraph Creek down to Alice Inlet, at the extension of Observatory Inlet, which will be seen marked on the map. The distance is about 200 miles; and although we have no engineer's report on that territory, we have made pretty careful inquiries from Hudson Bay officers and others who have special knowledge regarding it, and we are assured that no doubt it is a practicable route for a road between those two points.

Now we come to the point:

I have adverted to this point in connection with the enterprise in order that members of the House, from the west particularly, may see that in considering this matter we have not lost sight of their interests.

This is making a bid for the western support:

Members from Manitoba and the North-west know very well and thoroughly understand that in any project of this kind I at least will be most sedulous in looking after the interests of Manitoba and the North-west, the fertile districts of which I hope to see settled by a very much larger population than is there at the present time and affording a very much larger and profitable market for the merchants and manufacturers of the east.

He bases an argument as follows:—

This, therefore, is the scheme we have laid before the House for its approval.

This is the scheme by which the hon. gentleman sought to hoodwink the western vote.

If the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) is as solid on railway building as on tariff building, he must favour the Edmonton route, which I have been advocating. It is nice to see one hon. member look pleasant, and that hon. gentleman should certainly look pleasant, with the possibility in view of securing large dividends from steamboat building. That hon. gentleman said:

But when the Government built a railway through permanent agricultural lands, while they were making a permanent debt they were also securing a permanent asset, and such an expenditure was justifiable.

So far as regards the position of the east, I may say that the people of the eastern provinces have paid pretty well towards western government investments. I do not think it can be thrown up against them that the eastern members have particularly objected to doing so. We have made large investments in the west to open up the country by railways and canals, while in the east we have not received adequate assistance. The eastern people are willing at any time to pay their fair share towards the development of this country, but they do not want any kiting scheme brought into Parliament for making large grants to speculators. They do not want the wealth of the country that belongs to the workingmen to be swallowed up by pet contractors.

I do not propose touching very much on the provisions of the contract—it is too vicious to touch. There are some points upon which I do not believe the members who are shouting so loudly on the other side of the House know very much. We endeavoured to get some information from the Minister of the Interior and some from the Minister of Railways, but these gentlemen begged the question as far as possible. We must presume that the estimates of the engineer are made from Glenora, for that is the only point on the Stikine River he mentions. He says that a wagon road will be only 150 miles on account of the grade, he makes an electric road on account of the lesser grade, 165 miles, and he estimates a tramway or railway with a less grade, 208 miles. You will note that there are no positive points claimed for the termini of this road, but they are presumed to be the same in each case. The cost of these 298 miles of railway is given at $3,957,000, including docks, sidings, telegraphs lines and contingencies. You will note that section 1 of this contract reads :

Distance of about 150 miles more or less.

And the last paragraph of this section reads :

Provided also that the location of the said railway between the points mentioned shall be such as the contractors may decide upon without filing plans thereof prior to completion, provided that the grant of land thereby contracted for shall not be made upon a larger mileage than the Minister of Railways considers reasonably necessary for traversing the distance between the terminal points.

It would be well for the Minister of the Interior and some more of these gentlemen opposite who are endorsing this patent job, to note particularly the reading of that. That clause is very likely to carry with it the Canada Eastern Railway, for does it not provide that it shall not be made upon a larger mileage than the Minister of Railways deems proper. The Minister of Railways holds the Government right in the grip of his hands and he holds the contractors in the same position. It is not at all likely that there will be any less mileage than is estimated by the Government engineer, and as they have a perfect right to build the road to Clearwater, it will represent 22 miles more making according to his estimate, 230 miles. Not only that, but there will be a bigger surprise when this matter comes before the House and the country later, for without a doubt, when the railroad gets around these little curves that are so handy to follow you will find that instead of it being 150 miles, as is stated broadcast over the country to delude the people, this road will be 240 miles long and will carry with it a grant of 6,000,000 acres of this rich alluvial land of the Yukon district. This based on the estimate of $1.81 cents per acre gives a value of $10,884,000. The Minister of the Interior positively stated that the total grant is 3,750,000 acres, and I now ask the Minister is it a fact that that is the only amount this railway is to receive? Why are all these misleading statements put before the House and before the country; why do they not face the music like men and tell the people truly what it is proposed to give the contractors. I again ask the Government: are 3,750,000 acres of land all these contractors are to obtain? It seems but a small difference to some hon. gentlemen yonder, this little trifle of 2,225,000 acres of the richest alluvial soil under Heaven to be thrown away.

Let us take up clause 2 of the contract and perhaps we will get a little more information. It says :

They shall also have a line of railway from the waters of Lynn Canal to Port Selkirk, or thereabouts, by way of the Chilkat Pass.

That means that this contract gives them a virtual charter to build another road via the Chilkat Pass, the very pass that according to the Minister of Railways they wished to build through in the first place. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that while the Government would not allow the contractors to build through the Chilkat Pass, they did, however, allow them to tie up the route there so that no one else could do so. Just wait, Sir, until this new cloak of loyalty lately adopted by the Liberal party in this country has been worn out; wait until it has served its purpose to contribute 6,000,000 acres of this land to this monopoly, and you will see the tail of that larger rat crawling down through that pass. If you wanted anything else to show that an adept framed this scheme, you will see it in the provision that the Government grant a charter to this country to build a road through the Chilkat Pass, and you will see it in the manner in which they sandwich in another lot of stuff here that should be in an entirely different section. Section 3 is thrown in here on an entirely different matter with the hope of throwing the people off the scent, but directly they come back to the old ground they started on, and section 4 says :

For five years from the first of September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by Parliament to be constructed from Lynn Canal or thereabouts, nor from any point at or near the international boundary between Canada and Alaska into the Yukon district, and for five years from the said date—

This is the part that is interesting :

—and for five years from said date no aid in land or money shall be granted to any person or company other than the contractors and the contractors' company to assist in building any such railway.

What was the object of putting that in the contract at all? If it was put in carelessly it is rather odd that it should have been so. Nay, Sir, it was put in with the utmost care. The contractors wanted to use that very clause when they were going on the markets of the world, to point out that this very clause was one that provides for much of the good things in store for the future.

Now, Sir, if this patriotic seed, stolen from Conservative granaries, has found sufficient soil to take root in Liberal principles, let them make this contract read a little differently. If they have improved in their morals, they would make this section read thus: "And for ninety-nine years no aid in land or money shall be granted to this or any other company to assist in building any such railway." And if they will not incorporate that, Sir, in the clause, it was put in solely for the purpose of making another land-grab in the future. From the wording of section 5, which I will not pay any particular attention to, it will be found a much more troublesome section under which to call for tenders than was the original condition as to the tenders for the Stikine Valley road. Passing on over the question of tolls and exemption from taxation, and the contractors' obligations, or rather lack of obligations, to provide transport northerly, which were so admirably shown up by the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney); also the deposit, which, I believe, it has been stated is already in the hands of the Government, we strike what may be termed the bonanza clause of the whole thing, section 11. I shall not take the time of the House to read it; but, Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret that the time should ever have come when such a clause should have been placed before the backbone, the workmen, of this country. I have already proved conclusively, Sir, that to the contractors, as an investment to speculate on, this grant is worth $10,884,000. To back up this idea of immense value, what did the contractors do? They offered $25,000 a year to one man to go in and look over the country and locate claims. Could any better evidence be found of the estimate these contractors place upon the value of this immense territory that has been given to them for building this little tramway? Section 12 relates to locating the lands. A glance over it will show the consummate skill with which it was prepared. But, Sir, be it said to the credit of the hon. gentleman who leads Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, that he squeezed the rat so hard on this vital point that he had to agree to drop half of the three-square-mile lots from his capacious maw; and who knows but that another such pounding and squeezing would cause the Minister of the Interior to change the reading of the Bill so as to make it tally with the extract which he read from the New York "Commercial Advertiser." Why, Sir, I never, in my experience, have seen an hon. gentleman who could assume the courage to stand in the House before intelligent men, and read such a clause as he did from that paper. This is the clause I refer to:

But Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues stood firm, and all that the contractors receive from the Government is a land grant along the route. The bargain is pronounced to be the best one which Canada ever drove in a railway negotiation.

So it would be, if there was a vestige of truth in this, but it is a lie; and, Sir, this is from a paper which is not considered by the Government worthy of a place on the files of the Library or Reading Room here. The next article the hon. Minister of the Interior will be quoting from as to the doings of his Government, is quite likely to be from the "Police Gazette;" and from what we hear, there have been some actions in caucus which would warrant their actions being reported in the "Police Gazette." The Minister of Customs might object to that paper being brought into the country, but a few copies might be allowed in just for the edification of some of these hon. gentlemen on the other side. On the contrary, these contractors will not take one acre of land grant along the line of the railway except such as may be required for terminal facilities, which they will get in addition. Why, Sir, they have a sort of go-as-you-please license along the rivers, streams and gulches of that northern country. Besides, they are allowed to box the whole compass to find a starting point. They are allowed to go north, south, east or west, just as they choose, for a location. Besides that, read the last clause, subsection 2 of section 12, and what does it say in regard to the distribution of this land grant:

Provided that if, in the selection of lands along any base line, the courses thereof prevent rectangular blocks being laid out, such blocks shall be adjusted to the required angles.

What required angles? This will give these contractors a chance to steal more gold lands. It would not require a John Gilpin to ride his horse over paying ground with such a license as that. It only requires one of these expert engineers who framed this contract. The last clause in this section is one that was strangled by the hon. leader of the Opposition. Number 16 looks on the face of it as a fair clause, but, with the telephone and the telegraph and all other conveniences in the hands of this monopoly, I fear that the chance of the poor miner ten miles away from a recording office will be very poor. He will find that this swivel base line will surround him before he gets a chance to record his claim; and, even if he does, they will scoop up everything around him. Number 17 suggests an examination of present regulations, as this Bill, if passed, will override all regulations. If it were not a serious thing, it would be laughable to put it before the country. On opening the regulations, we find the very first words printed in the interpretation are the "free miner." What a farce, Mr. Speaker! What a misnomer; what a play upon words! In the vocabulary of the Liberal party you have the two expressions, free miner and free trader.

They are on a par, you take your choice, and you pay for both. Who is this free miner? He is a man who dare not place his foot on an acre of Government land without first planting down $10. He is a man who if, by mischance, should lose his license to go and search for claims, will have to pay $2 for a renewal of it. He is a man who, after he has found gold, is asked for what? If he prospects for three, four or five years, he has to pay in $10 every year; and if he should find gold, what is he asked for? Is he a free miner? Yes, Mr. Speaker, he is a liberal free miner. He pays $15 more for the right to mine. They say there is something free in that country—the fishing is free. The Almighty, in His wisdom, has put thousands of fish into those waters, and the Government have not thought fit to charge any impost on fish so far. Section 8 of the rules and regulations provides:

Every free miner shall, during the continuance of his certificate, but not longer, have the right to enter, locate, prospect and mine for gold and other minerals upon any lands in the Yukon district, whether vested in the Crown or otherwise, except upon Government reservations for town sites, land which is occupied by any building, and any land falling within the curtilage of any dwelling house, and any land lawfully occupied for placer mining purposes, and also Indian reservations.

Why, Sir, this section 17 of this contract is this curtailment of the miners' rights provided for in these regulations? It prevents six million acres of the very best lands, now Government land, from the possibility of being located by miners. Six million acres of land belonging to the labourers of the country are thus totally debarred from location. Then if this liberal free miner has not quite enough ground and wants a little bench claim, as they call it, he can, within sixty days, if he applies, obtain a little enlargement of his claim. But is this free? Oh, yes; if he will pay $100. That brings up the charge on the free miners to $125 for mining under these liberal rules and regulations. Then, section 39 is worth reading:

A claim shall be deemed to be abandoned and open to occupation and entry by any person when the same shall have remained unworked on working days, excepting during the close season, by the grantee thereof or by some person on his behalf, for the space of seventy-two hours, unless sickness or other reasonable cause be shown to the satisfaction of the mining recorder, or unless the grantee is absent on leave given by the mining recorder, and the mining recorder, upon obtaining evidence satisfactory to himself that this provision is not being complied with, may annul the entry given for a claim.

This man, who has paid $10 from year to year, in order to be able to locate a claim and who has found sufficient value, in his opinion, to locate a claim, who has paid $125 for the sake of being called a free miner, can, if he absents himself seventy-two hours, be fired right out of his possession. That is a monstrous regulation, and right beside him there is a monopoly to which will be given six million acres of the choicest claims they can select alienated for ever from the rightful owners—the hardy sons of toil in Canada—to be worked?—no, not to be worked, but tied up for speculation, and only subject to a royalty of 1 per cent. This free miner, after years of work, has to pay his $125 annually and his royalty of 10 per cent, and dare not cease work under penalty of forfeiture. If he ceases for seventy-two hours, he can be fired out; and just to show the great love they have for him, the Government charges him 10 per cent royalty. That aptly illustrates the regard which the Liberal Government have for the workingman, compared with their love for the monopolists. Their love is represented in the ratio of 1 to 10.

Never in the history of this country has so great a stride been made towards that most lamentable stage that we find now to a considerable extent prevailing on the south of the line—the stage of socialism. There in that great northern country, watched over only by the eternal stars, have been lying for ages untold millions. Hardy prospectors have at last succeeded in unlocking enough of it to satisfy the world there is more, and this good news has been heralded from one end of Canada to the other and all over the world. The news that rich placer mines, requiring only the labour of her stalwart sons with simple and inexpensive tools to extract riches before undreamed of, has stirred the ambition of men who in other lines of work could scarcely hope to attain more than a livelihood. Sons of hardy fishermen, men inured to the hardships of lumbering, solid sturdy sons of farming communities, all comparatively young men—these, Sir, the best stock of the country are all moving toward this land of promise to claim their share in their birthright, only to be met in the teeth by this monster monopoly with its tentacles directly or indirectly on every available acre of placer mining property that can be found in the country. It is such monopolies as this that directly robs the labouring classes, that gives rise to the discontent that breeds socialism. Yes, even anarchism. It is to this class of people who are more directly affected that this Government will have to give an accounting. The first notice of demand for such accounting was given March 1st, 1898, in Ontario.

These contractors are not new men at the business. When this contract was made, giving such an immense amount of land to these men, why were they not subjected to some restriction? Why did not the Government apply to these men some of the restrictions that the city of Toronto applied to Mr. Mackenzie with regard to the street railway. As soon as the receipts from that railway amount to one million dollars, its owners have to pay 8 per cent of the gross receipts to the city, and when they amount to $1,500,000 they have to pay the city 10 per cent on the excess over $1,000,000, and on all excess over $1,500,000 of gross receipts, 15 per cent. If hon. gentlemen sitting opposite had the interests of this country at heart, if they had endeavoured to preserve the best interests of the workmen and the citizens at large, they would have inserted some such restrictions in this contract.

I shall advert for a few minutes again to the contract. Section 18 gives some remarkable privileges to the contractors and I would like to ask a question of the hon. Minister of the Interior, but as he is not in his seat perhaps the right hon. First Minister will answer me. We are going to get information if we can—that is if the Government has it. Will the contractors be allowed to equip this road for the first year with the 28-pound rails that have been referred to?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You were told that they would.

Mr. GANONG. We will accept that, even from a layman. If it is thus equipped will the company be allowed, after ten miles has been laid and accepted by the Government engineer, to select 92,160 acres of land. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not want to answer that question. If they do locate 92,160 acres of land, will they be allowed to mine upon any or all of this before the completion of this road and its acceptance by the Government? Will the prospectors for this company going upon this ground be required to pay the official fee of $10 the same as does the free miner? Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be struck dumb. If this road should be fully equipped by September 1st with 28-pound rails, will the land be transferred in fee simple to this company? I tell you, Mr. Speaker, it is very hard to get any information out of them. The process is slow, either because of their culpable ignorance or their no less culpable indisposition to state facts, or both, the country, I have no doubt, will be able fairly to decide this question. Every new fact that has been brought out emphasizes the necessity there was for having an open contract for having this work open to tender, so that every man interested might have a chance at least to put a value of his own upon the construction of this road. Why, this urgency scare is just about exploded. The United States Government have found that it was a fad run by the Government here to scare people into accepting this outrageous contract.

They have found out what it means, and they do not propose to send any supplies there, having found that it is unnecessary. Why, Sir, I have no doubt that, with a reasonable notice such as might have been possible for the Government to give with the report of 1897 in their hands, there might have been a tender from the miners in that district. It may be that some of the hon. gentlemen opposite will smile. Some of them smile one way and some another. I have no doubt they will laugh at the idea that the men who, after years of toil, have succeeded in unearthing this gold should have some little right to tender, should have some little right to say which is the best route to go into that country, what is the best way for them to get their supplies in there. Laugh? Yes, Sir, laugh at giving the workmen a chance, but hobnobbing in secret with these contractors who are scooping in the best of the country; laugh as their party has always laughed at and gayed and hoodwinked the workmen of this country; laugh as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) then Minister of Finance, laughed at the workmen when, in 1878, they came to him and asked him for something to do, and he told them in substance if not in so many words that the only consolation he had to give them was that they must work more and eat less, while the Conservative party, ever true to its traditions, has been the friend of the working classes, protecting their labour, protecting their rights, and ever will. Mr. Speaker, I would oppose this Bill for three reasons: first, because the making of this secret contract, involving so large interest in the public domain, is contrary to representative parliamentary principle. Second, because it will, at the sacrifice of very large and very valuable land grants, subsidize a route, that cannot provide facilities at all commensurate with the cost to the country; or to put it differently, because the advantage to our country from what is conceded to be a temporary tramway, dependent on the uncertain navigation of the Stikine River, will not warrant the country being forced into so outrageous a secret contract. Third, because the question of urgency being very largely eliminated by its lack of capacity for carrying supplies for this year, there is no warrant in giving assistance of such magnitude to other than a permanent route, and one that will open up a large tract of country for permanent settlement, such as the Edmonton route. That the country will stand no trifling on this question was evidenced by the paralysis of the right arm of the right hon. the First Minister on March 1st. Years ago, through a settlement that was made of disputed territory on this continent, we lost Michigan. Later on, in 1842, by the wanton stupidity of some people who did not understand this country, through the Ashburton Treaty, the province of New Brunswick lost the best agricultural portion of the state of Maine, making it necessary for the Canadian Pacific Railway through it to go through a foreign country which would not have been necessary but for that. But, here, Sir, here to-day, in this House, elected to protect the rights and interests of our citizens at large, is projected a Bill by this Government which, in its vicious principles and provisions will be far more disastrous to Canada, if carried, than was the loss at that time of the territory in Maine. Mr. Speaker, I should be untrue to the great guild of workmen to which I claim to belong if I did not in every possible way oppose such a monstrous Bill as the Government is now attempting to force upon the country.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words with regard to this contract; I think it is my duty to say my say like the others. I have seen enough and read enough to know that all countries need railroads, that all countries that have railroads are progressive countries, that all countries that are without railroads are unprogressive countries, always in financial misery and have always been exposed to be conquered and swallowed up by others. For this reason I am greatly in favour of this Government building a railroad in British Columbia, not merely of 150 miles, but of as many miles as the Government may desire, and not only in British Columbia but anywhere else. I desire to explain my standing in this House. I was selected by the people of the county of Dorchester to come to this House not as a politician but as a representative. My understanding with them was that I was not to come here and be in opposition for the sake of being in opposition, and for the sake of objecting to any measures that the Government might bring before the House.

I was elected on the condition that I would do the best I could for the country, whether for the Government or against the Government. It was on that condition that I was sent here by the people of the county of Dorchester, and I could do nothing else than be true to that mandate. I do not propose to be a politician, but I propose to be independent. I did not come here to please or displease others, but I came here to suit myself, in acting for the interest of the country. I am here to support measures because they are in the interests of the country in general, and not because they are brought forward in the interests of certain politicians. I am here to work, not for politicians nor for myself, but for the country in general. We are all paid to do that. Well, Sir, I may say to you that I am in favour of a railway through the province of British Columbia into the country known as the Yukon district, but while I am strongly in favour of that railway, I am strongly opposed to the method the Government have chosen to secure its construction. I think that this district and the Pacific Coast deserve a road, and should have a road; but my hon. friends opposite should not bankrupt this country for the sake of building that road. I think the Government have been too hasty in making the contract to build this road. Why have they been so hasty? If I tell what I think the reason is, I presume the Speaker may stop me, but I will go on until he does so. I believe in speaking plainly and without ambiguity. We know that at one time our Divine Lord said to his Apostles: I will leave this earth, and I will send you the Comforter. Well, I believe that when Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann signed that railway contract, they promised my hon. friends opposite to send them the comforter—not exactly the divine apostle, but a comforter in the shape of checks. That, I think, is the reason why the Government have been so hasty in desiring to build that road. With them it is a matter of "business." Now, I am as old as any of them, and I have done probably a great deal more business than any of them. I have dealt with all kinds of people, and I have seen what people on the other side of the line call "the elephant." Hon. gentlemen seem to be amused. I do not know whether they understand in plain English what the elephant means. Well, on the other side of the line where I have resided for thirty-five years, when people speak of having an elephant, they mean a piece of rascality. Now as soon as the hon. gentlemen opposite heard about the Klondike region, they jumped at the opportunity and immediately went to work to get a railroad built, but they kept it in the dark until the 25th day of January, and then they let out the elephant for public gaze. Well, Mr. Speaker, I must say that that seems to be the habit of the Prime Minister, that seems to be his way of doing business, but it is what I call a queer way of doing business. I know what business is as well as he does, for I have done, without any doubt, more than he has, but not that kind of business. You may remember that in 1896, Parliament was called together on the 19th of August, and on the 18th of August, one day before Parliament met, the Government of the right hon. gentleman secured Governor General's warrants to the extent of $2,300,000; and the very next day Parliament met. Well, if he was going to run the machine without the members of this House, what was the use of calling us here? The Government have made this contract with Mackenzie & Mann in precisely the same way. After they sign the contract and bind the country to this "business is business," then they call the House together. Why, Sir, the right hon. gentleman acts in the same way as an old woman down in my county. After her daughter was married she went and invited the people to the wedding. Now, I want to know why the Government are afraid to take Parliament into their secrets. What is the peculiar business that they have on hand; what is the secret of this contract? I have done business in my lifetime to the amount of millions of dollars, but I was never caught in a thing of that kind yet. The Prime Minister probably knows very well that his doings are far from being according to the laws of the country ; if he does not know it, I do. The Minister of Railways introduced the Bill under pressure from his colleagues, as was very evident from his speech and then he seemed to wash his hands of the whole matter. It reminds me of the conduct of Pontius Pilate who was pushed on to do what he did not approve. The hon. gentleman came here, played his part for a moment, then slipped quietly out and repudiated the business or the "business is business." He does not seem to have had as much grace as Judas Iscariot, because after he had betrayed Our Saviour he went and hung himself.

Where the hon. gentleman has gone, I do not know, but it is not my fault he is not present, and I therefore must proceed. The hon. gentleman stated, when in his place, that we must build this railway for Japanese, Chinese, Hungarians, Russians and Italians, who are coming in here with their knives, and it was necessary to have the scoups and their picks, their shovels and their road built. What do we owe the Chinese, Japanese, or other peoples ? Are we compelled to build a road for them, to bankrupt our country to construct a railway to carry them into the country and enable them to fill their pockets and then steal away ? The Government should consider the matter seriously and not jump at opportunity to build a railway for other people. The Government has sufficient to do to provide work for our own citizens, we have enough to do without assisting others. No one works for us ; we take care of ourselves. Let the Japs, Chinamen and the Yankees take care of themselves ; we owe them nothing. Gold in considerable quantities was discovered in the Yukon only last year, but immediately the Government turned around and made a secret bargain with Mackenzie & Mann, a bargain the particulars of which they never dared to let the country know. They had been working at it for months, but have kept it secret, and it is a secret bargain to-day. The Government have tried to make the House believe they have acted in good faith ; but, although they may try to make me believe it, I am unable to believe a word of it. They have given the contractors a land grant of 25,000 acres a mile, and they now represent that it is only worth $25,000. There is not a man in this House, the country or the world who knows just the value of this grant. Do hon. gentlemen opposite know what they are giving away ? They are giving away great mines of wealth which are the property of the country ; they are giving away what does not belong to them. Members of this House are paid $1,000 per session, and Ministers receive $7,000 and expenses ; for what ? To conserve the interests of the country, not to squander or give away that which does not belong to them. They are not working for themselves ; they are nothing but the agents of the people. They are on the same footing as men who take their scythes and go into the fields and cut grass ; if such men faithfully and honourably do their work, they are to be praised for performing their duty. The Ministers are in the same position, and if they step beyond the limits placed on them by the constitution and squander the property placed in their hands, they are not doing their duty. If the property belonged to them individually, they would be saving with it and not give it away. Let them follow the advice, "Do to others as you would wish to be done by." You would not give your own property away.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman's interesting speech, but it is not quite regular to address the members ; the hon. gentleman should address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. MORIN. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your advice, and I will try and do a little better. This is the first time I have addressed this House, and I am not acquainted with its rules. Hon. gentlemen opposite and one hon. member on this side of the House have great sympathy for Mackenzie & Mann. Let Mackenzie & Mann take care of themselves ; and, if it is our duty to take care of our own country, let us do it. We are not sworn to take care of Mackenzie & Mann, who can take care of themselves, and who can also take care of their own. We have a right to take care of what belongs to the country. That is my policy ; I do not know whether you call it Conservative or Liberal, but I call it an honest policy. It has been said that the Americans are coming by thousands into this gold district. Let them come and let them go, but what business have we to make such great sacrifices to build a road for them when they do not build a road for themselves. Do not the Americans own that country from Behring Straits and from the Pacific Coast to the Arctic Ocean ; do they not claim to own part of our own coast in British Columbia. Have they not as much land as we have and have they not as much gold as we have, and why should we build a railroad for them ? In fact American example is against our building this road even for ourselves. In 1847 they found gold in California which belonged to Mexico at the time, and in 1848 they fought Mexico and conquered and became owners of California, but they never built a railroad until 1867. For twenty years they went around by the Isthmus of Panama ; they had a railroad in California but they had none across the mountains. In 1867 the Americans built the Union Pacific Railway, and I paid taxes to help to build it. They bought Alaska from Russia in 1867, they have no railroad anywhere in that country yet, and is it anything like common sense that we should build one for them. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) showed us a little black map the other day about an inch wide; I call it a nigger map, and he told us what a little, small bit of our country we were giving to Mackenzie & Mann. It was just a little black spot on that map. Now we will make a calculation on that, and see what it really is. This Government is offering to Mackenzie & Mann 3,750,000 acres of choice land. That will make 5,846 square miles and a fraction over, and if you extract the square root it will give you almost 77 miles square; a great deal larger than the State of Rhode Island, a great deal larger than the State of Connecticut, almost the size of the State of New Hampshire, and almost three times larger than the province of Prince Edward Island. Deny one word of that, any of you. This is not politics; it is common sense. Remember that the province of British Columbia has an area of 407,000 square miles with a population of 80,000 people, and remember that you give three provinces like Prince Edward Island to Mackenzie & Mann to start with. What kind of a railway are you getting in return? It is a tram road. I have seen tram roads in Pennsylvania which we used for mules to draw logs on, but that mule tramway had 28-pound steel rails. If the Government knew as much as I do about narrow gauge roads and tramways, they would give this business up at once. I have seen the Pennsylvania Central Railway Company trying to use all kinds of rails, 42-pound rails, 50-pound rails, 76-pound rails, and 95-pound rails, and do you think that you are going to have any kind of a railway from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake with 28-pound rails on a narrow gauge? Why, you dare not put an engine on that road weighing more than ten tons. I am not a politician but I know from practice that business is business as well as any of you. I borrowed $20 and left home at the age of 15 years, and I travelled the States and Territories over and over. I have walked from Wisconsin to the Red River of the north, before Minnesota was a State, and I drove logs on the Mississippi from Lake Itasca to New Orleans. I have done business with men worth millions of dollars, and if any of you gentlemen can teach me politics you cannot teach me a word about business. I say here in this House, as well as any place else, that politicians are no use when they come in contact with business men. We do not need men to make fancy speeches to please the galleries. No, Sir; we need work right on the ground; that is what counts. Why, a poor man will starve with politics; a beggar will die with politics. Now, don't you forget what I am going to tell you. Who built the city of Buffalo, New York? Who built the city of Detroit, Michigan? The province of Ontario built them. Whoever was at the head of the Government, it was bad management. I do not care whether he was a Liberal or a Conservative; it makes no difference to me at all. At that time there was no system in the way business was conducted, and every line of railroad ran to Buffalo or Detroit, and these cities just swallowed the juice and the sap out of the province of Ontario. What happened once may happen again, with that snowshoe road that you are talking about building—I do not care whether a Liberal Government or a Conservative Government is building it. I may call it a snowshoe road and nothing else. It is of no use to any one only to those who want to swindle the Government. They put before this House that they will build a road, but who will operate that road? They cannot do it. Remember, I am going to give you truth, right and left; I have got the medicine right here. Very well, they are going to build a road. After that road is built, what will they do with it? They will just say, "To hell with the road!"

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not consider that the language which the hon. gentleman made use of last is quite parliamentary.

Mr. MORIN. I will withdraw it at once and apologize. What will they do with that road? Why, they will give a man five cents to take that road off their hands. The gold is what they are after—nothing else. Some men here say they are very tender-hearted about Mackenzie & Mann. Now, take the sensible, business view of this. Supposing that road was built. We have rights up and down the Stikine River by water; but we have no right on the land, and how are we going to build a railroad from Telegraph Creek to Fort Wrangel? Our friends the Yankees are just waiting until we do our work, and they will do their work afterwards. We can make use of the river, but we cannot make use of the land. The moment we try to make use of the land, they will stop us. Well, suppose the whole thing is a success. Where will the supplies for the Yukon Valley come from? Some will come from the province of Manitoba—from Edmonton, Regina and Calgary. Very well; how will you get them? You will have to ship produce to Vancouver by car twice—four or five or six hundred miles; unload it from the cars and place it on the steamers; then ship to Fort Wrangel; unload and reload on lighters; then take it up the Stikine River, with twenty-six inches of water. I never measured the water, but that is what the Minister of the Interior said. After you get to Telegraph Creek, you have to unload from your light boats and load on the cars. Then you ship to Teslin Lake, and then unload and load again. What will the transportation and frequent tran-shipments of that produce cost, from Manitoba until it gets to Dawson City, or to any other place on the Yukon River? What will our friends on the other side of the boundary line do? We all know; if you do not, I do from experience. I have been in every state and territory in the United States. I know a great deal more about that country than I do about my own country; and there is no better state in the Union than the state of Oregon, as far as agriculture is concerned. So far as minerals are concerned, the state of Pennsylvania is ahead of the Union. Illinois comes next in agriculture, but only for corn; but Oregon comes in for apples, pumpkins, oats, barley, corn, wheat, and all kinds of fruit and all kinds of meat. They are shipping from Oregon to Chicago, and what will be the result when that road is built? The people of Oregon will load their vessels at Portland, Oregon, and will ship to Fort Wrangel, 600 or 700 miles, while our people will have to ship from Manitoba 1,400 or 1,500 miles by rail. The Americans will ship by water, which we all know is cheaper than by rail, and will undermine us, and undersell us, and control our trade and commerce. Why should they not? My hon. friends on the other side passed a law last year to allow corn to come into Canada free of duty. Can they deny that? Well, we all know that Oregon is a productive agricultural state, and we all know that corn is preferable to oats as food for cattle and horses both. Any man who can do so should use corn in preference to oats. If hon. gentlemen do not know this, I do, for I have fed from forty to sixty horses for twenty-two years, and have had to pay for learning. When my friends on the other side of the boundary line can ship corn to this side without paying duty, they would be very foolish to ship oats and pay duty. We all know that a bushel of corn, as a rule, is worth two of oats. If you want to fatten hogs or feed cattle or horses, corn is what you need. The Americans will ship corn to our country, and they will stock the province of British Columbia and the Yukon Valley with corn, grain and meat.

If you want to build a railway and have a Canadian route which will give you no trouble, you should build your railway from Edmonton. There you will be at home for ever and for ever. You will have a road through our Canadian country, and you will go across the Saskatchewan River and the Athabasca River, and the Lelard River, and then strike the Yukon River, and go down as far as you please. You then will have a central road, and, from my own personal knowledge—not from what I heard from Tom, Dick or Harry—when you strike the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, you are bound to strike stone coal. I say that, because I have owned thousands of acres at different places, and I know by the strata of the land whether there is stone coal or not. When I strike a stratum of what they call a free-course vein, I know that stone coal is there. When you build your road from Edmonton, you open up the Yukon Valley and the Mackenzie River Valley; but, if you build your railway where Mackenzie & Mann want it, where will you be, and how will you be? I should like to know. Now, remember this: Our people are all thinking about gold. I myself am no gold man; I am a timber man, and I say this to you—members, Ministers, and all—when you strike a tract of timber land, it is not worth a dime so long as there is no railway, but the moment you build a railway, that timber land is worth $2 and $3 per thousand feet, board measure. On the Yukon River, or any place else, supposing they cut 1,000 feet, board measure, per acre; that is almost nothing. But when you strike that, you strike enough to pay for the whole road without the gold. When you strike a tract of land of 40,000 or 50,000 acres, that gives 10,000 feet, board measure, per acre, that is very little; 15,000 feet per acre is called pretty good; 20,000 feet, board measure, per acre is called fair; 25,000 feet, board measure, per acre is called good; 30,000 feet, board measure, per acre is called very good, and 50,000 feet is called extra good. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, I am not saying this because I heard Tom, Dick or Harry say so; but I know from experience, and I have paid for my experience. I have bought the stuff from year to year. I have contracted for 600,000,000 feet that I have paid for myself, and know something about it. I have no doubt, although I never saw the land, that Mackenzie & Mann can realize a dollar per acre from every acre we give them by the sale of the timber growing on it, and then they will have a railway and the land besides; and, if my hon. friends on the other side are willing to give them a clear title to the railroad and the immense tracts of gold and timber lands this contract provides, why let them go ahead and do so. I cannot prevent them, but I can fight them. I ask your pardon, Mr. Speaker, for mistakes I have made, and will not detain you further.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. MORIN. Just wait, and I will go back again to the Drummond County Railway. This is the first time I have risen in this House, so that you cannot say, Mr. Speaker, that I have been troublesome. This is the first time, but I hope it will not be the last. I may say to you plainly, that I will rise again, and that, if my friend Pontius Pilate is not out of the place, I will scratch his back for him. Pontius Pilate is the Minister of Railways. I will go for him, and it will be plain talk, open and above board, so that you can hear it clear, for my information is written down in black and white.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I wish to crave your pardon for any departure from the rules of this House on my part, as this is the first time I rise to address the House, and if I happened to say anything that might have displeased you, I hope you will accept the apology I make for the same.

Mr. BELL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on, go on.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope my right hon. friend the leader of the House is not going to object to the adjournment of the debate. I must ask him the question.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfred Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) will agree with me that we have not been at all exacting, but that we have given every facility to the Opposition to carry on this debate; and if we wish to come to a conclusion I think that we should go on a little longer. We have not made much progress this evening.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to one or two points. He understands as well as any one in this House the immense importance of the question that is being discussed. I do not think he expected or any one else in this House expected that the debate would not last a considerable length of time. There are a large number of members on this side representing important constituencies and it is not fair—

An hon. MEMBER. Speak now.

Mr. FOSTER. We have rights in this House, every member of us; we have one right which, I think, every person will acknowledge—that is we must have due and reasonable time to debate important questions. And it is not right on sanitary or moral or on any other grounds that we should be driven, in the small hours of the morning, to discuss an important question like this. I submit that to the common sense of all. I say further that it will not lead to an earlier closure of this debate if severe measures of this kind are taken. I myself propose to speak, and I propose to speak at some length. I am not physically able to speak at length to-night.

An hon. MEMBER. Let some one else speak.

Mr. FOSTER. There is an hon. gentleman who sits on the opposite side whose constituency I do not know. He has never signaled his constituency by rising to speak, but he has signaled himself by interruptions and remarks which I do not characterize. I was not addressing myself to the hon. gentleman, but to a more important personage, the leader of the Government, and I am trying to make plain to him, with all frankness and all earnestness, that it will not conduce to the discussion of this subject to make unreasonable demands upon us. I have one more remark to make. A little more than a week ago the leader of the Government did not think it so urgent a matter, did not think it so much a part of the contract to hasten forward the debate but that he could propose to adjourn this House for a whole week. I think it is not right for him to endeavour to make up for that eight or ten days of adjournment by pushing gentlemen on this side of the House beyond their physical strength and endeavour to make them debate this question at this unseemly hour. I state for myself and for a great many more hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, that we propose to speak in the interest of the country and of our constituents. The hon. gentleman has force on his side, and he can make an exhibition of that force upon the House if he wishes. We shall submit if it is necessary, but we will not submit with good grace, and we will discuss the question, even if we have to do it against great difficulties and under adverse circumstances. I hope we shall not be driven to that extreme, and I hope my right hon. friend, now that he has had a moment to think it over, will allow those much-talked-of sunny ways of his to lead him and permit us to discuss this question in proper hours.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would be the last man in this House to endeavour to abuse the power we have on this side; and I do not believe that I can be fairly challenged on that ground. I do not believe the Government now in office can be charged with having on any occasion abused the power of the majority that supports it. I do not answer the threat the hon. gentleman has made. I leave that aside, and I think that when he considers it he will think that it would have been as well for him to leave it aside also. But up to this moment the hon. gentleman has not shown such a desire to hasten the discussion or to reach a conclusion as to entitle him to say that we should not take a little more time to make up for what might have been more profitably used this evening. I do not know that the debate has been enlightened or anybody instructed this evening.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a matter of opinion.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is my opinion; I do not seek to express the opinion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster). But, for the reasons I have given, I think we might go on for an hour more, or half an hour more, at all events, before we adjourn.

Mr. FOSTER. The right hon. gentleman has imputed to us a desire to waste the time of the House. I repudiate that most earnestly and most emphatically. No man has spoken on this side of the House who did not speak because he felt it his duty to speak, or who did not speak in the way he was impelled to speak by a sense of duty. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Morin) who has just taken his seat, in his quaint and witty way said many things that caused amusement. There was not a single sentence he pointed that was not an expression of the strong common sense characteristic of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) should not make two speeches.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to make only a short plea—I know the Speaker is insistent—I will not take much time.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman not to make two speeches.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Ganong) certainly took no more time than was necessary.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the motion is put. I hope the right hon. Premier, seeing that it is one o'clock in the morning, will yield to the very modest request made on this side and allow members to go home and get some rest. I have heard it intimated in the lobbies that we were to stay here all night. I could not believe it. After the appeal made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) who is leading the Opposition, I hope that the right hon. gentleman will not force the hon. member (Mr. Bell) who has moved the adjournment, to go on. Thirty minutes, the time mentioned by the Premier, will not allow the hon. gentleman to make the speech he proposes to deliver.

This gentleman was here from one of the provinces paying his expenses for a week. Not only members representing maritime province constituencies, but all others outside of Ontario have been compelled by the Prime Minister to stay in Ottawa doing nothing and paying their expenses, when they might have been making their speeches. I gave to the chief Whip of the Government the names of several gentlemen who would have occupied all the sittings of this House in delivering their speeches during the entire week the Ontario elections were going on; but the Prime Minister wanted to allow his supporters to deluge the country, to help his right arm to carry the province, and so he adjourned the House for a week. It is unreasonable at this hour of the morning to ask us to continue this debate; the motion that is now before the Chair will occupy the half hour that he wanted to take out of the speech of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell). This is one of the most important questions that will come before the House this session, and the constituents of hon. members will expect them to signify their protest, not only by their votes but by their voices. These gentlemen from a distance particularly have a strong claim on the right hon. gentleman to permit them now, at this hour of the morning, to retire.

The PRIME MINISTER. I rise to a personal explanation, as I have no right to speak again. The hon. gentleman says that I agreed to this adjournment which took place during which members from the maritime provinces were kept here doing nothing. The hon. gentleman is aware that if I agreed to the adjournment, it was after consultation with the leader of the Opposition, and with his consent. I may say that I had understood from the leader of the Opposition that the debate would close to-night. The leader of the Opposition did not understand it exactly as I did. That was my understanding, at all events, and I told him I expected the debate would be closed this evening.

Mr. TAYLOR. I rise to make a personal explanation on my own behalf, and on behalf of the leader of the Opposition who is not in his place. The chief Government Whip came to me some time yesterday and stated that he understood the debate was to close to-day. He remained here while I went over and consulted with the leader of the Opposition, whom I asked if he had made an arrangement that the debate should close to-day. He said, by no means. Then I came back and told the chief Whip of the Government the message from the leader of the Opposition. Afterwards I went over to consult with my leader and to find out how this understanding could have arisen. He told me that the Premier had asked him when he thought the debate would close, and he said in reply that he thought the members had pretty well spoken on this side. The Prime Minister said: Do you think we can get through on Thursday? The leader of the Opposition said: It is possible that we might. That was all the bargain there was.

The PRIME MINISTER. That was not my understanding.

Mr. TAYLOR. There was no bargain arrived at, as I was informed. In reference to the statement of the Premier that the leader of the Opposition had agreed with him to adjourn for a week, I understood from the leader of the Opposition that the Prime Minister came to him and suggested that the House should adjourn for a week, and the leader of the Opposition yielded to his invitation, thinking that it was the desire of the Prime Minister.

Mr. FOSTER. One word of personal explanation, because, before the leader of the Opposition went out, I had a conversation with him. He certainly did not understand that we were to close to-night, in fact he told me it was impossible to close to-night. It is perfectly impossible to close this week.

If the hon. gentleman gets this vote by the middle of next week he will get the vote, I think, as soon as he can possibly expect it in view of the discussion on this subject which we propose to make on this side of the House. Now, I make another appeal to my hon. friend not to drive matters to an extremity, but to allow us to close the sitting now.

Mr. McINERNEY. I would make one suggestion to the right hon. leader of the Government. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), who has moved the adjournment, has been lately a very sick man. He was confined to his room for over a week, and he expected at least, so I understand, that the Government would consent to the adjournment of the debate to-night. This is a circumstance that I wish to bring to the attention of the right hon. gentleman, hoping that he will accede to that proposition.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is a new feature altogether. If my hon. friend from Pictou is in ill-health, I certainly would not compel him to speak at this hour of the night. Under these circumstances, I will yield to the motion to adjourn the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 1 o'clock a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 4th March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

VACANCY.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that my attention having been called by the Honourable Member for King's, P.E.I., in his place, to the fact of the demise of Stanislas Francis Perry, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Prince West, P.E.I., I have, in accordance with section eight of chapter thirteen of the Revised Statutes of Canada, issued my Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, to make out a new Writ of election for the said electoral district.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 52) respecting the Nakusp and Slocan Railway Company.—(Mr. MacPherson.)

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION.

Mr. BAIN moved :

That the first report of the Select Committee of Agriculture and Colonization be concurred in. He said : I may explain to the House that this is simply the ordinary motion asking for power to employ a shorthand writer.

Motion agreed to.

COMMISSION TO MAJOR WALSH.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) laid upon the Table of the House the commission to Major Walsh.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask if the instructions issued to Major Walsh are included ?

The PRIME MINISTER. No, I have only the commission, not the instructions.

Mr. FOSTER. When may we expect the instructions ?

The PRIME MINISTER. As the Minister of the Interior is not in his seat to-day, I cannot say when, probably at an early day.

PERSONAL—LIQUOR PERMITS IN THE YUKON.

Mr. DAVIS. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the House to an article that has appeared in the Saskatchewan "Times," a Conservative newspaper published in Prince Albert, in the district of Saskatchewan, which article is copied from the Winnipeg "North-Westerner." The article reads as follows :—

The falsehood put in circulation by some unscrupulous partisan that Sir Charles Tupper had secured a permit to take 50,000 gallons of whisky into the Yukon has been promptly and emphatically contradicted. Sir Charles is not in the whisky-peddling business, nor would he be likely to get favours from the Government in that connection if he were. The Government is reserving favours of that description for its supporters. The only whisky-peddling monopoly is that, so far, in which Mr. T. O. Davis, the Grit M.P. for Saskatchewan, is interested.

Now, I may say that so far as I am concerned I have never applied to any member of the Government for a permit to take liquor into the Yukon or into any other place ; nor am I connected with any institution which has applied for such permit. I am not directly or indirectly interested in the Yukon, either one way or the other ; and I wish to deny this slanderous accusation.

THE RAILWAY RATE WAR.

Mr. SPROULE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a matter which, to my mind, is of considerable importance, and to put myself in order, I intend to move the formal adjournment of the House. It is known to most people, especially in the province of Ontario to-day, that a somewhat unseemly wrangle is going on between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway. The intercourse which has hertofore existed between them, and the traffic arrangements for carrying on the business of the country between Toronto and North Bay, and vice versa, have been practically stopped. The travelling public who use the Canadian Pacific Railway for going to the North-west or coming from the North-west to centre, western or south-western Ontario, are very much inconvenienced in consequence of it. There appears to be no possibility, so far as we can judge from what has taken place already, that the two companies will reach an understanding by which the ordinary traffic arrangements which existed heretofore are to be renewed; and therefore the public are to remain under this inconvenience. According to my remembrance of what took place in this House, the original charter granted to that portion of the road between Gravenhurst and North Bay and the amendments to the charter afterwards had but one special object in view, and that was that the portion of the road between Gravenhurst and Callander—because Callander was then supposed to be the objective point—was practically to be an independent road, which all roads from western Canada could use for traffic purposes to reach the Canadian Pacific Railway, and where the trade of the west, of London, Hamilton and Toronto and the country of south-western Ontario, would be carried so as to reach Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia. And to show that this was the case, I may mention that at the time there was strong objection taken to the proposed grant by the Government to the building of the road. I remember distinctly, because I went with one or two deputations to the Government to object to a large grant being given the company unless that portion of the line should be kept as an independent line available for all roads that would reach it at either end. The first grant made was one of $6,000 per mile, and certain provisions were inserted in the charter to secure the use of this portion of the road by all railways for all time. It was afterwards found that the road could not be built as rapidly as was expected at the time, and a few years afterwards an additional grant was given of $6,000 per mile, and provisions were inserted in the Act to safeguard what were considered the rights of western Ontario.

The first charter was 44 Vic., chap. 45, an Act to incorporate the Northern, North-western and Sault Ste. Marie Railway. The incorporators included a large number of men, among these being Barnhart, Morris, McCarthy, Cumberland, Stuart, Wood, Turner, Gurney and others. In that Act provisions were inserted that the company should build the road, and to insure its being used for the purpose it was intended clauses were inserted in the Act as follows: After providing that the company may receive aid from the municipalities, or from the Government or from certain sources, the Act says:

The company may receive from the Government of Canada or from the Government of any of the provinces, or from private individuals, or municipal or other corporations, who may have power to make or grant the same, money or securities for money in aid of the construction, equipment and maintenance of the said railway and bridge, and the same may be received by way of bonus or gift, or by the way of loan. And in like manner and for the same purpose the company may receive, take and hold grants of lands from either or any of the said governments or from private individuals, municipal or other corporations, who may have power to grant the same, and upon accepting such aid from either or any of the governments aforesaid, may agree to give such running powers to, or to make such traffic arrangements with any other railway company or companies as the said government may require to be made or given as a condition of such grant; but nothing herein contained shall render it lawful for the company to make any arrangement whereby one company may obtain advantages over any other company.

In section 32 it is provided:

The company shall make running arrangements with, and give running powers to any railway company or companies in the Dominion of Canada (whether incorporated by the Dominion or any of the provincial legislatures) which are now or may hereinafter be situate on the line or lines hereby authorized, or which touch or cross the same, or any line or lines which connect with any of such lines, upon terms to be agreed upon; and such running powers shall include all proper and necessary facilities and sidings for obtaining fuel and water, and generally for the passing and working of the trains of the company or companies exercising the same; and the facilities so to be given shall be equal to all companies exercising such powers, so that no unfair advantage shall be given to any one company over another in the use of the said lines; and all the powers mentioned in this Act shall be so given upon the payment of a reasonable compensation therefor; and any railway company or companies, as aforesaid, which may claim and use the running powers and facilities over the line or lines of the company, as hereby authorized, shall grant similar running arrangements and powers over any line or lines of railway which such company may own or control, and which may now or may hereafter be situate on, or many touch or cross the same, or any line or lines which connect with any of such lines, and all such powers shall be so given and exercised upon the payment of a reasonable compensation therefor.

The next provision applicable is clause 34, as follows:—

In order to afford reasonable facilities to all the companies whose lines of railway may, at any point or points, be connected, mediately or immediately, with the railway of the company hereby incorporated for the receiving, forwarding, delivering, interchange and working of traffic upon and by way of the several railways belonging to or worked by such companies respectively, the company hereby incorporated shall, for the purposes of all traffic whatsoever, whether passengers and their baggage, including the usual accommodation for express matter, or freight of any description, including live stock and minerals, and whether such traffic shall originate or terminate upon the railway systems of such companies or either of them, or come from or be destined to some other railway or railways, or other carriers connecting mediately or immediately with them, at all times receive, ticket, bill, invoice and forward the traffic upon and over its railway from such connecting point to or towards its destination, and deliver any and all such traffic as consigned either in final delivery upon or from its own railway, or to some other carrier for further transmission to its destination according to the ticket, bill or invoice; and in like manner shall receive, ticket, bill, invoice and forward the traffic destined to or by way of such connecting railway and duly deliver the same at such connecting point to such connecting railway. And the company hereby incorporated shall afford to all other companies having connecting railways, as aforesaid, all needful accommodation, facility and convenience at the stations and by their trains and otherwise by through rating, billing and ticketing for the promotion of their business and the interchange of such traffic.

2. And the company hereby incorporated shall not give or allow directly or indirectly any preference or advantage to, or to the traffic by, any other railway or portion of a railway or other carrier's line forming part of a continuous route, whether owned or operated by or in interest directly or indirectly with the company hereby incorporated or otherwise, over any such connecting railway or the traffic thereby; and it shall be unlawful for the company hereby incorporated to make, and it shall not make any greater or higher charge for the carriage of traffic or any service connected with the traffic passing through or from any such connecting railway than the lowest charge it shall make for a like and similar service over any part of its own railway, or which shall be made over any part of a railway worked by or in interest with it, nor make or allow any discrimination, preference or advantage as between any such connecting railways.

Clause 35 provides:

In case the said companies shall fail to agree upon the extent or manner of working or carrying into effect any of the provisions contained in sections 32 and 34, such matters in difference shall be settled by three arbitrators, appointed from time to time, one to be appointed by each of the said railway companies, parties to such difference, and the third by one of the judges of one of the superior courts of Ontario, and in the event of either of the said companies refusing or neglecting to appoint such arbitrator for the space of ten days after being requested or notified so to do by the other company, then the said judge shall appoint such arbitrator for the company so neglecting or refusing; and the decision and award of the said arbitrators, or a majority of them, shall be final and binding on the said companies, and may be enforced in any court of law or equity having jurisdiction in the premises.

Then the schedule which follows lays down the conditions:

And whereas, in the course of the debate upon the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, certain questions arose which the contractors present at Ottawa deemed it expedient to meet, by agreeing that this company would enter into certain undertakings with the Government of Canada so soon as it should be organized, and it is expedient to provide for entering into such arrangements:

Therefore, it is unanimously resolved that this company is prepared to enter into an agreement with the Dominion Government to the effect following, that is to say: If any company other than the Canada Central Railway Company build a line from any point on the Canadian Pacific Railway at or about the Wharnapit River to any point on Lake Huron or Lake Superior, or on the River Ste. Marie, such company shall have running powers over the Canadian Pacific Railway from the point of junction to Callander Station, on condition that such company shall grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway similar and reciprocal running powers over its railway west of such point of junction. In the event of the company purchasing, acquiring, amalgamating with, leasing or holding and operating the Canada Central Railway the said Callander Station shall continue to be a neutral or receiving and distributing point common to the Canada Central Railway and any railway in the province of Ontario running southward from said Callander Station; and, in that case, all traffic to or from any point in the west or north-west coming from or destined for any such Ontario railway shall be carried to or from Callander Station at the same mileage rate as similar traffic to or from such point coming from or destined for the said Canada Central Railway, and such mileage rate shall not be greater than the average rate per mile charged for similar traffic from the point of shipment on the Canadian Pacific Railway to the point of destination on the Canada Central Railway or from the point of shipment on the said Canada Central Railway to the point of destination on the said Canadian Pacific Railway, as the case may be. And for the purposes of this section the word "traffic" includes not only passengers and their baggage, goods, animals and things conveyed by railway, but also cars, trucks and vehicles of any description adapted for running over any railway, if offered for carriage as freight. But this agreement shall not be construed as consenting to any running powers by any railway over the Canadian Pacific Railway. This agreement to be subject to the conditions as to special rates for purchasers of land, or for emigrants, or intending emigrants, which are contained in the 24th section of the charter of this company. If at any time the Canada Central Railway should be purchased, acquired, leased in perpetuity by, or amalgamated with this company, such amalgamation, acquisition, purchase or lease shall be made subject to the existing legal obligations of that company created by this charter, or any amendment thereof in respect of running powers or traffic arrangements, as well as in respect of the matters and things referred to in the letters patent incorporating this company.

That was the original Act. Afterwards when that incorporated company got power to build the railway and received a subsidy from the Dominion Government, clauses 32 and 34 were incorporated in it for the purpose of continuing those rights and powers. Now, then, clause 3 in the next Act which we have, namely, the Act to amend the Act incorporating the Northern and Pacific Junction Railway, which name it went by then; clause 3 provides:

Whereas, by the contract between Her Majesty the Queen and the company set forth in schedule "B" hereto, it is agreed that in the event therein stated the Parliament may cancel the lease therein mentioned and take over the portion of the said railway between Gravenhurst and Callander free from encumbrance—

That portion of the railway between Gravenhurst and North Bay, because it finally reached North Bay instead of Callander:

—upon the assumption of the bond or debenture debt of the company to the amount of eight thousand dollars per mile of that section of the railway, and upon payment of any further sum of money beyond the bond or debenture debt of eight thousand dollars per mile and the subsidy paid to the said company, as the said railway may then be worth—the value to be ascertained in manner therein provided.

It will be understood here that they were to pay the bonded debt of $8,000 per mile, and whatever additional cost it was to the company to build that railway outside the subsidy which the Government gave them. They finally gave them a subsidy of $12,000 per mile, and that with the bonded debt of $8,000 per mile was supposed to cover the cost then; but if there were any additional cost beyond that, the Government was to take it over and pay them back the difference between the $20,000 a mile and what the road actually cost. They were to take over that road at a value to be ascertained in the manner provided, namely, by arbitration. For that purpose this contract was entered into. Now, the lease that was entered into in connection with that is set forth in schedule "B." This was the agreement entered into between the Government and the railway company which then controlled the road:

Whereas, by an Act passed in the forty-fifth year of Her Majesty's reign, chapter fourteen, it was made lawful for the Governor in Council to grant a subsidy not exceeding six thousand dollars per mile, nor exceeding in the whole six hundred and sixty thousand dollars, towards the construction of a railway from Gravenhurst to Callander, both in the province of Ontario, such subsidy to be granted to such company as should be approved by the Governor in Council as having established to his satisfaction its ability to complete the said railway within a reasonable time, to be fixed by Order in Council, and according to descriptions and specifications to be approved by the Governor in Council, on the report of the Minister of Railways and Canals, and specified in an agreement to be made by the company with the Government, to be payable out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, as in the said Act particularly mentioned:

And whereas, by another Act passed in the forty-sixth year of Her Majesty's reign, chapter twenty-five, it was made lawful for the Governor in Council to grant a further additional subsidy not exceeding six thousand dollars per mile, nor exceeding in the whole six hundred and sixty thousand dollars, towards the construction of the same railway, to be granted to such company as should be approved as aforesaid and also to be payable out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, as in the said last mentioned particularly mentioned.

And whereas, pursuant to the above cited Acts of Parliament, the Governor in Council hath granted to the Northern and Pacific Junction and sixty thousand dollars, towards the construction of the railway aforesaid, the full subsidies authorized by the said Acts, amounting in the whole to twelve thousand dollars per mile of the railway, but not exceeding in the whole one million three hundred and twenty thousand dollars.

Now, therefore, the Northern and Pacific Junction Railway Company do covenant and agree with Her Majesty the Queen, in consideration of the subsidies granted as hereinbefore and hereinafter mentioned.

I may say that was done for this reason. The question was raised in Parliament, how will you keep this an independent road? It is only 130 miles long, and it was intended to be a connecting link between southern and south-western Ontario and the Canadian Pacific Railway, whereby the commerce of that section of country could be carried on without interruption or unfair traffic arrangements. It was said that this road was too short to be carried on by a separate company, and the question was, what company would control it? It would have to be either the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or the company which controlled the railway at the other end. The two roads running from the south to Gravenhurst were the Hamilton and North-western and the Northern. These two railways were running under one agreement, and it was decided to put this link into the hands of the company controlling them. They were to maintain this road and run it, and give facilities to the roads that reached it at either end to carry on their traffic without any interruption or interference, for the purpose of securing in perpetuity the right of the railways of western Ontario to carry on their traffic with Manitoba and the North-west, and vice versa. This agreement went on to provide for the carrying out of the conditions set forth in the three clauses which I have read. It said:

4. The said lease shall contain a provision requiring the observance by the lessees of the said railway of the several provisions contained in the 32nd, 34th and 35th sections of the special Act incorporating the Northern and Pacific Junction Railway Company, under the name of the Northern, North-western and Sault Ste. Marie Railway Company.

5. That through rates and fares shall be agreed upon and made between the lessees and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company from time to time, for traffic to and from all points on the Canadian Pacific Railway west of the point of junction with the said projected railway, and all points of the railways of the lessees, and such rates and fares shall be divided (cartage and including in the rate to be first allowed to the company performing it) on the basis of mileage, except where such division would act unfairly by the reason of the one line of railway having a largely preponderating mileage, in which case the division of rates and fares shall be settled on a fair and equitable basis by mutual agreement, and in the default of agreement, by arbitration. If the parties can agree upon a single arbitrator there shall be but one arbitrator, otherwise each party shall appoint one arbitrator, and the two so appointed shall appoint a third, and the award of the majority shall be binding; failing agreement as the third arbitrator, he shall be appointed by one of the judges of the High Court of Justice of the province of Ontario. Provided, that this clause shall have no effect unless the Canadian Pacific Railway Company shall, within six months from this date enter into a contract with the lessees, agreeing on its part to the terms of this clause;

Which they afterwards did do——and the said agreement shall provide that the through freight business shall be conducted in through freight cars without transshipment in the manner and on the terms usual among connecting railways; and for the purpose of facilitating and developing the business of both parties, it shall also provide for the making, from time to time, by mutual arrangement, of close and suitable train connections at the point of junction for through passenger business—

Which they have not done, and which they do not do—

—having regard to the connections of both companies' railways with their connecting lines, and also for the running of through sleeping cars, in such business, and that such connecting trains shall be run by the lessees upon their own railways, and on the said leased railway, and by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on their railway, with due and reasonable expedition, and that each company shall give to the freight traffic interchange between them the despatch usually given to through freight by connecting lines of railways.

6. For the purpose of insuring the free interchange of traffic coming to or going from the railway so to be constructed between the lessees' railways and the railways connecting therewith, so far as such interchange shall be under the control of the lessees, the said lease shall also contain a provision that in the event of the Parliament of Canada being at any time hereafter of opinion that the traffic of the railway system of the lessees coming from or going to the projected railway and interchanged with lines connecting with the lessees' system of railways is not so interchanged without preference or prejudice as between such connections, then being of such opinion the Parliament of Canada may, if it see fit, cancel the said lease and take over the said railway free from encumbrance upon assumption of the bond and debenture debts of the lessor company to the amount of eight thousand dollars per mile of the railway and upon the payment of such further sum of money beyond the said bond debts of eight thousand dollars per mile and the said subsidy, as the said railway may then be worth,—

That is, they were to count out the $8,000 of bonded debt and the $12,000 of subsidy per mile, and what the railway was worth above that, they were to pay—

—the value thereof to be ascertained, in case the Government and the company cannot agree, by arbitration; the arbitrators to be appointed, one by the Government and the other by the company, and the third by the two so appointed; failing agreement as to such third arbitrator, then by one of the chief justices of the High Court of Ontario, under the provisions of the Ontario Judicature Act in that behalf, and the award of the majority shall be binding.

7. In consideration of the premises and upon the terms and the conditions hereinbefore mentioned, Her Majesty agrees to grant and does hereby grant to the Northern and Pacific Railway Company a subsidy of $12,000 per mile of the said railway so to be constructed, but not exceeding in the whole one million three hundred and twenty thousand dollars, payable out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

This is signed by Adam Brown on behalf of the Hamilton and North-western Railway Company; Charles Tupper, Minister of Railways, on behalf of the Government of Canada, and A. P. Bradley, secretary. That was the agreement then entered into for the purpose I have mentioned—to keep this line always an independent link, whereby the railways of central and western and south-western Canada could carry on their trade with Manitoba and the North-west over the Canadian Pacific Railway. But as it is at the present time, these two railway companies have disagreed, and the Canadian Pacific Railway is carrying its traffic over its own lines, carrying passengers, freight and baggage from Toronto to Carleton Place, a distance of 228 miles, and then back to North Bay, a distance of 216 miles. Passengers and freight are taken over 444 miles, whereas, if they went by that connecting link, as it was intended they should, they would only have to travel 232 miles. The public are subjected to these inconveniences by virtue of the quarrel between these two companies, and they will not come to terms. Neither of them have appointed an arbitrator, nor made any reasonable attempt, so far as I can learn, to adjust their differences. It, therefore, seems to me a matter of sufficient importance to justify the Government in quiring into it, with a view of seeing whether they should not take action under the powers contained in this Act which I have read, and take over that portion of railway between Gravenhurst and Callander or North Bay, so that new arrangements might be made, then if another link from Toronto to Gravenhurst was built, a distance of only 111 miles, the trade of the great cities of Toronto, Hamilton and London could be carried without interruption and without the inconveniences to which it is now subject by the disagreements of these companies. I contend that no railway company has a right to hamper the traffic of the public by reason of its little quarrels, so as to compel the public to travel an extra distance of 212 miles for no purpose in the world. We gave that railway $12,000 a mile, because $6,000 a mile was not sufficient, and because it was intended that that road should be kept in perpetuity, available for all other roads which might reach it at either end.

Now that has been virtually destroyed and there must be something done. I notice that in a letter from the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the other day, to the Board of Trade in Toronto, he intimated that the only remedy was the construction of another line from Toronto to North Bay or Sudbury. There is no need for that if the Government does its duty, because the Government has the right to take over that line from Gravenhurst to North Bay, and then at furthest a connecting link could be built from Toronto to Gravenhurst, and the link would be complete, and the trade of the great city of Toronto, in which we are so much interested, would not be crippled by the preference given to Montreal and the other eastern cities in business with Manitoba and the North-west, as it is now.

I draw the attention of the Government to this matter in the hope that they will look into it, and either compel these companies to have recourse to arbitration for an adjustment of the difference, so that the Ontario trade may enjoy the advantage of the shorter distance which it was intended we should have when the Dominion Government gave the large sum of $12,000 per mile to build that road, or else consider whether, under the circumstances, it is not advisable to take over the road and run it as an independent railway, and make such arrangements as the Government may see fit, in the interests of the travelling public and the trade of Ontario.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I endeavoured to follow the statement which the hon. member has just made as closely and carefully as I possibly could, and I was able to catch the conclusion he led up to and the suggestions he made regarding governmental action. But I must confess that the subject being new to me, I was not able to pursue the various clauses in the statute which he read, and which, in his opinion, would justify action on the part of the Government in the direction he has indicated. I am, therefore, not free at the moment to intimate what my view may be, after having had the opportunity of looking into the matter, or what action the Government might feel called upon to take, upon a thorough understanding of all the circumstances. But I would suggest to the hon. member—and I make the suggestion with every desire to facilitate any proper action—that if he would kindly call upon me, I would be very glad to go over with him in detail the various matters he has referred to, and discuss the question with him in all its bearings.

WAGON ROAD TO THE YUKON.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders are called, Mr. Speaker, I desire to put a question to the Government. I regret that the Treasury benches are practically empty, but I am glad to see now my right hon. friend the Prime Minister taking his seat, because it is extremely inconvenient to have the members of the Government absent when the House is sitting. I have two matters of pressing importance to which I desire to draw the attention of the Government. One is in the Department of the Interior and the other is in the Department of Customs, and neither the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) nor the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) is in his place. I do not think that this is calculated to promote public interest.

My right hon. friend will remember that I drew the attention of the Government yesterday to a matter of very great and pressing importance. That was the question of the construction of the wagon road which was announced by the Department of the Interior and published over Mr. Ogilvie's signature on the 27th January last. That announcement was:

River steamers will ply all summer from the mouth of the Stikine to Telegraph Creek. A wagon road, with abundance of transportation facilities, will be available from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake, and steamers will be plying on this lake and the Hootalinqua, Lewes and Yukon rivers.

That is a matter of very great importance. I thought perhaps that this clause had escaped the observation of the Government in the drafting of the Bill now before the House, and I, therefore, drew the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) to it. What was the answer I got? I got this answer from the Minister of the Interior:

I do not think there has been any inadvertence or omission in the contract, and the statement contained in the Official Guide will be found to be correct.

Is that any answer for the Minister of the Crown to give Parliament, when his attention is drawn to a fact in which thousands of people are deeply interested? Look at the disgrace that attended the Skagway and Dyea route last year—four thousand horses lying dead in those passes and no end of suffering and loss of property, simply because there was no proper means of travel, and both passengers and animals had to wade into the mire. The public has been officially informed by the Department of the Interior that there is to be a wagon road constructed from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake, and that question was treated, not with the attention and the courtesy which the Government are bound to give every member of this House when he approaches them in a respectful manner with regard to public business, but in the most cavalier manner as will be seen by reference to yesterday's proceedings. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), after the Minister of the Interior had replied to my question, said :

I think the Minister of Interior omitted one important particular in his answer, and that was whether this road was to be constructed at the expense of the Government or at the expense of the contractors.

It certainly is very important to know how this work, which is bound to cost a very large sum of money, is to be constructed, and whether any measures have been taken for its proper construction as soon as the snow disappears and a sleigh road is perfectly useless.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I must call my hon. friend to order. I have no objection to any questions that may be put, but at this stage he cannot enter into a debate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was not entering into a debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. gentleman was making a speech. I hope he will be good enough to confine himself to putting a question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was impossible for me to put the gravity of this matter before my right hon. friend at less length. I do not want to detain the proceedings for a moment, but simply, on a matter of the greatest importance, I wish the Government to condescend to give Parliament the information, whether they have made any provision for the construction of this road, whether it is to be practically taken up, or whether it is to be again in the deplorable condition in which it was before the winter set in, until the 1st of September, when the proposed railway is expected to be available. Are the people who rely upon the statement of the Government that there is to be a wagon road there, to be in the position of those who undertook to go through these passes last year? This is a matter of grave importance in which thousands are deeply interested, and it is entitled to the respect and consideration of the Government.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am delighted to hear that the hon. gentleman wants to expedite the business of this House. I have not seen any evidence of it up to this moment. With regard to the question he has put, I am sorry to say that my hon. colleague, the Minister of the Interior, is inevitably absent from his seat to-day, but I shall call his attention to this matter, and if the hon. gentleman will kindly repeat his question to-morrow, I am sure he will have his answer.

UNITED STATES CUSTOMS REGULATIONS AT FORT WRANGEL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, and not with the view of doing anything to impede public business, I want to draw the attention of the Minister of Customs, whom, I am glad to see in his place, to a very important statement contained in the "Daily Witness," of Montreal, under the heading of "News From Vancouver." This statement is dated Toronto, March 2nd, and is as follows :—

G. F. Beard, of this city, who is organizing a party of Klondikers, wrote to the Customs Department recently with reference to the customs situation at Fort Wrangel. He has received a reply from Mr. John McDougald, Commissioner of Customs, who says he understands that the United States customs do not yet permit Canadian goods for the Stikine to be transhipped at Wrangel without paying duty.

If this statement is correct, that on the second day of March these duties were being collected on Canadian goods, it is a matter that demands the immediate attention of the Minister of Customs.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I will attend to the matter. The letter is signed by Mr. McDougald, as I understand the hon. gentleman.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It says so.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I will make inquiry into the matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will send this paper over to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson).

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENTS TO OFFICE.

Mr. GILLIES. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the right hon. the Prime Minister to a telegram I find in the columns of a very influential, and widely circulated, and fairly accurate newspaper. I refer to the Montreal "Star," and the statement to which I wish to draw attention is worded as follows :—

Quebec, March 3.—Rumours are current in Liberal circles, and apparently well founded, to the following effect: Immediately after the session, Mr. Choquette, M.P., is to be named judge at Arthabaska; Judge Lemieux will be transferred to Sherbrooke, and Mr. Carroll, M.P., will be appointed to the judgeship vacated by the death of Judge de Billy.

In this connection, as a statement has gained considerable currency in connection with the hon. member for Guysborough, who, it is said, has been knocking at the door of the Cabinet for some time past—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies) must not take advantage of my leniency to transgress the rules of the House. Of course, newspaper articles, if they relate to any public matter, are often of great advantage to the House; but I am doubtful if quotations about the positions of individual members can be quoted by a member of the House unless he vouches for their accuracy. As to that part of the hon. gentleman's statement, then, I do not think that it is quite in order. As to his going on to refer to some other hon. member, I am afraid he is out of order, unless he has some simple, plain question to ask about the business of the House.

Mr. GILLIES. I have a question to ask the right hon. Prime Minister. I wish to ask what truth there is in the statement I have read to the effect that two hon. members are to be appointed to judgeships.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If I had any information on this subject, I should not feel called upon to give it to my hon. friend (Mr. Gillies). I must tell the hon. gentleman, that, so far as these newspaper reports are concerned, for my part, I attach very little importance to them. Generally, the newspapers are better informed on the business of the Government—if they are to be credited—than I am myself. They publish many a thing as being done by the Government, or contemplated, that are not done and are not contemplated. I am not aware, for instance, that Judge de Billy is dead—

Mr. GILLIES. I did not ask that.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman asked me if it were true that Mr. Carroll was to be appointed in place of Judge de Billy. Well, he ought to wait until Judge de Billy is in his grave before he asks us to discuss his successor.

THE STIKINE-TESLIN WINTER ROAD.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I have a question to ask which is of importance. A party of Klondikers, popularly so called, passed through here yesterday, amongst them being a large number from the city and county I represent. Having read over the terms of the contract, and taking the speeches of the members of the Government, they are bound for the Stikine River, under the impression that when they get there—by the 8th or 9th of March—they will have a completed road over the pass, with shelters provided. They have pinned their faith to that statement.

Mr. GILLIES.

It will be a tremendous disappointment to them—but for these statements they would have gone by Edmonton—if, when they reach there, they find that the road is not completed. I have promised to telegraph them the information, and I would ask my right hon. friend if he will give me the information, as to whether that road will be completed within the contract time, and whether the shelters and provision houses will be made, as provided in the contract.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have every reason to believe, in fact I am aware, that every effort is being made by the contractors to have this winter road ready by the 8th March. It is quite possible, owing to the tactics of the Opposition and the difficulties placed in their way, that they may not be able to complete the work within the prescribed time. That is all I have to say.

WHISKY FOR THE KLONDIKE.

Mr. GUILLET. I wish to call the attention of the Government to an associated press despatch from Liverpool to the effect that a large party of Klondikers have embarked for the gold fields on a vessel named the "Manaunse," the vessel having a cargo of 150 tons of whisky. I shall not read the article, but I would like to know if the Government will allow this whisky to be admitted.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). That is another newspaper report, which may have little foundation in fact. If it is true that these gentlemen are bringing with them so much whisky, it seems to me they have taken extra precautions. We will wait until the whisky is here, and then we shall know what to do.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Blair for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) an Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, the debate which has continued now for some time, and which, apparently, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister thinks is being prolonged unnecessarily, has developed some features which are of a gratifying character to the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I was exceedingly pleased, yesterday, and on some other occasions in the debate, to hear hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House speaking of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) in kind terms such as they have not always used. It is quite true that some of the gentlemen who have indulged in these complimentary remarks, have rather expressed themselves to the disadvantage of the followers of the hon. gentleman and have complimented him in a measure by contrasting him with his followers, greatly to their disadvantage. But, with all that, we are delighted to discover that the Government supporters are now recognizing that in the leader of the Opposition we have a statesman, a great statesman.

Mr. GIBSON. The best man of the lot.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I hear an hon. gentleman say, "the best man of the lot." I am pleased to hear him say so, because, on some occasions, I think, I have heard him make some remarks of a different tenor, of a rather uncomplimentary character. And, as I cannot think that the leader of the Opposition has improved so much in the short time in question, I am glad to be able to compliment that hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) on coming to a better sense of the character and eminence of the leader of this side.

The question of providing railway accommodation for the Yukon is very largely discussed in this House in connection with one or two impressions that are held. The justification which the Government assumed, or seeks to assume, for itself for the contract and for the route which it has selected largely turns upon one or two questions, or, perhaps, I might more properly say, on one or two impressions which we might call popular impressions.

The propriety of the action of the Government, the wisdom of the selection of the route they have made, largely depend, in their estimation, upon the extent of the influx of people into the Yukon which they might reasonably anticipate; and furthermore, the time when they might expect that influx to take place, and the time when they first learned it was likely to take place. The birth of this Yukon question, the beginning of interest in the Yukon, can be pretty exactly fixed. I think it was on the 15th or the 16th of July, 1897, that the people of Canada first began to hear the word Yukon popularly used; they certainly did then for the first time hear the name Klondike. About the 15th or 16th of July, at Victoria, I happened by accident to meet those returning miners who had formed the first party coming back from that Yukon district and bringing with them stories of the wonderful richness of the gold deposits of that country. Now the Government claimed that they could not know at an early date the facts of these rich finds; they have contended that they were not thoroughly informed of the probability of a large influx of people into the Yukon; but certainly on the 15th or 16th of July last, the world was beginning to hear of the Yukon, and on the 18th or 19th an officer of the Government, Inspector Strickland, was on his way to Ottawa, and probably reached Ottawa about the 22nd of July, bringing with him in his pocket very interesting specimens of the nuggets to be found in the Yukon district, and bringing precise details of the richness and extent of the finds of gold that had there been made. Now, immediately that those discoveries were made known, they were of such a startling character that the news was telegraphed to every part of the world, and certainly by the 18th or the 19th of July, in every part of the world to which the telegraph carries information, people were discussing the Yukon or talking about the Klondike, and were beginning to form parties to go to that country. As early as the 17th of July it was stated, and I think stated correctly, that the whole population of Seattle was in a state of excitement over the matter of going to the Yukon; and on the 17th of July, which I think was a Sabbath, a steamer actually sailed from Seattle loaded to the water's edge with gold miners going to the Yukon to seek their fortune. Now the question that is now so interesting to this country—because it is the question that is to settle whether the Government in this matter are taking the right course or not—the question that first had to be decided was, Where is the Yukon gold field? The next question, was, How can we get there? These are the two questions that have been considered by the Government when they decided on their route into that country. The Yukon gold field lies, as probably almost every person now knows, near the international boundary, about the 64th parallel north latitude, and the deposits of gold extend, so far as we can tell, in a southerly direction down to somewhere in the vicinity of Lake Teslin, or about the 56th parallel north latitude. This auriferous region stretches along parallel with the coast of the Pacific Ocean, and at a distance from that coast varying from 100 to 200 miles. The particular feature of the locality that has made it a puzzling question to the country, is how to reach that region; and a difficulty for the Government, perhaps, in deciding on the best route by which to build their railway, lies in the fact that the frontier, the shore of the Pacific Ocean, through nearly the whole of that distance, is not British territory, but is United States territory. But when people began to say to themselves, How can we get to the Yukon? we began to hear the names of St. Michaels, Juneau, Dyea, Skagway, names now familiar the world over, but not before then heard of outside of their neighbourhood. It was at once discovered by those who thought of going to the Yukon country that there were two classes of routes, or rather there was one route which stood by itself entirely, the route via St. Michaels at the mouth of the Yukon River, using steam ocean navigation to the mouth of that river, and then ascending that river for some 2,000 miles until you come to Canadian territory, that is a voyage of some 4,000 miles or thereabouts.

The other alternate routes are those via Dyea and Skagway, or by Juneau, by the Taku Inlet, and by the Stikine River. Now, these are all precisely similar in their character. In every one of them the first part of the journey is made from Victoria or Vancouver, or from such American port as may be selected. Then a voyage by pack trail, or on foot, has to be made over that mountain range which lies along the coast, and after crossing that, all the early adventurers proceeded by using a system of water communication which runs generally in a north or north-easterly direction from Teslin Lake until it crosses the international boundary in the Yukon district. Now the Government have introduced a Bill to provide a railway, and they have introduced it in a very peculiar manner. They have made what we on this side of the House regard as an improvident bargain, they have made it in violation of some principles which, it has been usually held, ought to apply to all bargains made by the Government, that is to say, they have failed to secure the advantages they would enjoy by calling for tenders, or by bringing as many contractors and parties ready to engage in such a work, as they possibly could into competition, in order to secure a low price. They have decided in this case not to do that; and they have urged quite a variety of reasons, not very numerous, but which we must consider in detail, in considering this bargain. The first reason they give is that of urgency. The Government's justification for making this contract with Mackenzie & Mann, was that there was great urgency, they were pressed, and so pressed for time that they were not at liberty to take those steps that an ordinary business man would take, and were driven by stress and pressure to make a hurried bargain. I have read with care the two speeches made from the Government side of the House which throw light upon this question. I refer to the speeches made by the hon. the Minister of Railways, and by the hon. the Minister of the Interior. The Minister of Railways apparently expected a good deal of opposition to the Yukon Bill; by the manner in which he introduced it he was apparently under the impression that he was not speaking to a friendly audience. His whole speech apparently was a reply to anticipated criticisms. The reasons given by him to induce the House to accept the Yukon Bill were, in the first place, this same argument of urgency; in the second place, that by building the railway by the route which the Government had selected, they had secured an all-Canadian route. Subsequently the Minister of the Interior followed and discussed this measure at very great length. To a large extent his speech was taken up, not with careful criticism of the measure, or in advancing reasons why it should be supported, but you will find that he also relied in the arguments he presented to the House, on the fact that urgency obliged the Government to depart from the ordinary custom of taking tenders for this work; and furthermore, that this was an all-Canadian route. Practically the arguments advanced by hon. members on the other side of the House, including members of the Government, in favour of the Bill, are two: first, great urgency, that the matter must be disposed of very hurriedly; and, second, that the route selected is an all-Canadian route.

First, to deal with the question of urgency. The Minister of the Interior did not give the House the impression that he thought there was very great urgency, in so far as it was necessary to provide for the accommodation of a very large number of passengers, because he said from his place, speaking of what he termed the probable influx of people into that country, all he intended by the expression "influx" was a few hundred people. If that was the view which the Minister took as late as the time when Mr. Ogilvie's report was made public, it was an extraordinary view for the hon. gentleman to hold, because as early as 20th or 22nd July, certainly as early as the last days of July, he must have known that all the world over interest was taken in this region, and every one moving about in Canada was aware that in almost every town and village parties were being formed to go to the Yukon. From the very moment when it became known that these marvellous discoveries of gold had been made in the Yukon, or in the neighbourhood of the Yukon, and when the people began to recognize that they were the greatest gold discoveries ever made, they said: Let us go there; and necessarily the people of Canada and the United States everywhere discussed the question of the best route to the Yukon. The very question which the Government of Canada had to decide when they came to select the route was one which the people of Canada and the United States, and the business men, to whom it was a live issue, had decided for themselves, namely, what was the best route to the Yukon.

Now, what is the best route? Let us appeal to the decision of public opinion. Unquestionably it has been decided to be the route not by the Stikine, but by Dyea. In 1887, when the Government sent Mr. Dawson to visit that country and report on it, he went by Dyea. When Lieut. Schwatka visited the Yukon he went by Dyea. When Mr. Ogilvie was sent by the Government, he went by Dyea; and Mr. Ogilvie, in his report, states that at this day practically all miners entering the Yukon go there via Dyea or by Lynn Inlet. So that the question was decided by the parties who were most interested, the men who wanted to get there quickly, those who were resolved to go there to seek their fortune, the men who wanted to get there cheaply, safely and rapidly—all those men who resolved to go to the Yukon, and all miners who are going there at the present moment, have decided by their action that the best route is by Lynn Inlet and Dyea Pass. That being the case, why did the Government decide to take another route; and in doing so it may be asked have they decided so correctly or wrongly? It must be admitted by Government supporters that if it can be shown that the route selected is not a good one and is not in fact a suitable route, a tremendously strong argument is advanced why this Bill should be defeated. The only reasons apparently given why we should adopt this route via the Stikine are the two to which I have referred: first, that the Minister of Railways states that urgency compels the adoption of this route, as it is the only route which can be built over this year; and in the second place, that he and the Minister of the Interior declared that this is the only all-Canadian route. These are fortunately very explicit statements. Are they correct? It surely should not be difficult for hon. members composing this House to come to a satisfactory determination on these two questions, whether or not the route via Stikine is the only route that can be built over in 1898, and whether it is the only all-Canadian route. But these propositions, I contend, are totally unfounded; neither can be proved and both can be disproved.

The route via the Stikine is, according to the report of Mr. Jennings, the Government engineer, only twenty-seven miles shorter than the route via Lynn Inlet. He states that the route via Pyramid Harbour to Fort Selkirk is 235 miles, and the other is 208, one being twenty-seven miles longer than the other. Is the Minister of Railways prepared to come before the people of Canada and seek to induce them to believe that a route which is only twenty-seven miles longer than the route he has selected, could not be built over during the season of 1898, when he maintains that a railway by the Stikine route could be built? Moreover, the evidence of Mr. Hamilton Smith and the report of Mr. Jennings show that the route via Lynn Inlet, although longer, is an easier route over which to construct a road. Mr. Smith, in his letter, states, and it has not been contradicted, that on the Dalton route there is no grade exceeding 2 per cent, which, considering it goes over a mountain pass, is a very easy grade. Mr. Jennings, on the other hand, in his report, shows that on the route by the Stikine there are grades up to 4 per cent. Under the terms of the contract there are to be grades up to 171 feet to the mile, which is equal to 3½ per cent. Another fact indicating, that the proposition that the only route over which a railway could be built in 1898 was via the Stikine is unsound, is that Mr. Hamilton Smith in his letter to the Government offers to build a road via Lynn Inlet in 1898; and the Government could have justified themselves as to the financial ability and standing of himself and the interest he represents, and no doubt he would have been willing to have made a deposit of a quarter of a million dollars, or any other sum, to guarantee the construction by that route in 1898. These reasons seem to me conclusive that this question cannot be decided in favour of the Government on the argument of urgency advanced by the Minister of Railways and the Minister of the Interior. I think a fair consideration of the facts and arguments advanced on both sides will show there is no cogency whatever in that argument, and that if it applies at all, it applies in favour of the route via Pyramid Harbour and Chilkat Pass. Let us consider the question of the all-Canadian feature of this proposal. The one route would terminate at Pyramid Harbour at the sea, and below the Rink Rapids on the River Yukon, inland. There is no question as to what would constitute an all-Canadian route—that question does not admit of argument. We all admit that an all-Canadian route is one that would have both termini, and the whole length of the line in Canadian territory; and when the Government come to this House and propose to adopt a route as an all-Canadian route, they are bound to show that these conditions, that both termini and the whole extent of the line lie in Canadian territory, are fulfilled.

Let us contrast these lines: that by Chilkat Pass, suggested by Mr. Hamilton Smith, and that by the Stikine, advocated by the Government. We know that the terminus at the northern end of both these roads is unquestionably in British territory, but how about the terminus at the southern end? We all know that the terminus of the Stikine Railway is practically at Wrangel, and Wrangel is unquestionably in American territory. But as to the terminus of the Chilkat Pass route which is at Pyramid Harbour, that is an open question, and one which I hope to see decided in favour of the British contentions. I believe that when the boundary line there is delimited it will be found that Pyramid Harbour is in British territory; that is only a reasonable construction of the treaty. In that case the Chilkat Pass route would be an all-Canadian route and the Stikine route—the navigation of the Stikine River being necessarily a part of it—cannot be an all-Canadian route, for the reason that we must tranship our goods at Wrangel and come under the control of the United States Government regulations. But there are other reasons which ought to be considered by the people of Canada and by this Parliament in deciding which of these two routes should be taken, if we admit at all that the Government are bound to build a road from the Pacific Coast into the Yukon country.

Another reason advanced by the Government and their supporters in favour of the contention that it was necessary to provide railway communication to that country is that it would prevent a varied series of shocking disasters, of riot, of bloodshed, of starvation. I was glad to listen to my friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) deal very effectively with that contention. So far as the question of riot and bloodshed is concerned, we may look to the past history of the development of mining interests in the Canadian North-west and British Columbia with a great deal of satisfaction as a people. In no part of Canada has law and order been more effectively preserved than in the mining districts of British Columbia. In Rossland, a town grown up in a few days and containing a large number of the wilder spirits of the border coming not alone from Canada, but from many parts of the United States, there has been no disorder. There has been everywhere under the British flag evidence that one official or two, backed by the strength of the Canadian Government were sufficient to maintain order even among a very lawless population.

A great deal has been said from the Government benches of the urgent necessity of building this road, and the people of Canada are called upon to construct it at great expense, because it is said that if it is not built there is danger of the people starving in that country. That is a very extraordinary proposition to make, and I thought it was most satisfactorily answered by two speakers on the Government side of the House, the hon. members from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) and Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford). The hon. member from Alberta suggested that very naturally if people after going into the Yukon found they were not going to have enough to eat they would walk out as they walked in; and the other hon. gentleman (Mr. Rutherford), who seemed to be very well satisfied with his own opinion, told us that if 50,000 people went into the Yukon this summer, 49,000 would come out this fall. That certainly disposes in a most satisfactory manner of any danger of the glutting of that country with people, and any danger of starvation or misery. I think, Mr. Speaker, we might safely enough leave it to the common sense of those who are going into the Yukon to provide for themselves. We have in the city of Montreal some 300,000 people who are fed every day without the intervention of any Government machinery. They are supplied with everything they require, because there are business people only too anxious to supply them, and we may safely leave it to the traders of British Columbia, or even to the traders of the extreme north, to see that every man who has money to pay for food will be supplied with it. There are, and have been for years, two very extensive corporations doing business in the Yukon, namely, the Alaskan and the North American Transportation and Trading Companies, and these concerns are perfectly competent to supply goods to all who have the means to pay. Very early in the history of this gold discovery the question of food supply came up, and some said that there was danger of starvation. Last year I had the opportunity of speaking to the commissioner of the Hudson Bay Company at Winnipeg, and I asked him if there was any danger of starvation or hunger in the Yukon. That gentleman laughed at the idea, and said that his company had very great facilities for doing business and were perfectly able to supply the wants of everybody there.

Having now disposed of these questions of urgency, of the danger of hunger, and of the all-Canadian route, let us consider whether or not the Government have selected what is probably the best route to the Yukon. The route from Victoria via the Stikine to Dawson is 1,770 miles long, so far as we can trust to the figures that are published, and of that 770 miles, or about 45 per cent. is made up of sea voyage. The route via Pyramid Harbour is 1,370 miles, and of that 900 miles, or about 70 per cent. is sea voyage. Now, I would like to know if any person were proposing to go or to send freight into the Yukon, whether he would prefer to take a route 1,770 miles long, of which only 770 was by sea voyage, 1,000 miles was by tramway and river voyage (and an exceedingly narrow and ill-equipped tramway at that), or whether he would prefer to take a route 900 miles of which was by sea and only 470 of which was by rail and river navigation. Which would he select? If he would go as the travelling public does everywhere, he would unquestionably select the route via the Chilkat Pass. In the latter case he would have the comfort and ease and security and cheapness of travelling on a well-equipped steamer by sea.

If the plan offered to the Government by Mr. Hamilton Smith were carried out, he would have, not a tramway, but a first-class road, extending 288 miles to a point where it would connect with river navigation for boats drawing at least five feet of water. At Pyramid Harbour, the ocean terminus of the Chilkat Pass, there is deep water, with landing facilities that would enable large steamers to draw up beside the wharf from which the train would start, so that there would be no more difficulty in passing from one to the other than there is at any of the ocean ports of Canada, and less difficulty than there is at New York. And at the other terminus of the railway, at the river landing, where there is five feet of water, the same course could be followed. The river boat could be drawn up beside the wharf at which the train would land the passengers and freight, and they would be carried with the greatest possible facility and cheapness on their way. Let us consider whether there was not sound sense in the proposition laid down by Mr. Hamilton Smith, that no capitalist who expected to get any return from his investment would consider for a moment the route by the Stikine River, as compared with the route via Pyramid Harbour and the Chilkat Pass. If these routes were competing, as they necessarily would, for the traffic and trade of all those people from the United States and Canada and other parts of the world, going to the Yukon country, what chance would there be for this route via the Stikine? They would be compelled necessarily to carry passengers and freight at the same rates; and how could this road possibly live or be a paying business venture, if it were compelled to carry passengers and freight at the same rates over a route 400 miles longer and involving five transshipments as against four transshipments by the other route? That question of transshipment adds very largely to the expense. It is necessarily a very interesting question to the people of eastern Canada. A man anywhere from eastern Canada who wishes to reach the Yukon country, must first of all load himself or his freight on a transcontinental railway, then tranship at Vancouver or Victoria to an ocean steamer, again tranship at Wrangel, if he goes that way, to a river boat, then again to the light railway running to Teslin Lake, and then again to another river boat; and after that he has the chance of having to make one or more portages in making his way down the Hootalinqua River. He has at least five transshipments to make as compared with four by the other route, and there is no possibility of his having by the latter to make any portage to avoid difficulties of river navigation.

This being the case, why should the people of Canada be asked to build this railway via the Stikine at all? It is not called for by any urgency. We know now, from the contract laid on the Table of the House, that that road cannot be ready to do any business before September of this year. Urgency means the pressure of business that has to be dealt with at the moment. There is no urgency to deal with the business of 1899. The plea of urgency would apply, if we had to attend to the business of 1898, which, we are informed, cannot be dealt with by this road. Why, then, should choice be made of the worst route? Has the Minister of Railways or the Minister of the Interior given any reason why the people of Canada should be asked to pay what is admitted on all hands to be a liberal price for the worst route? And, finally, have hon. gentlemen given any satisfactory reason why they should try, using the power given by the monopoly clause, to compel the people of the United States and the people of Canada who are going to the Yukon country, to go via the most expensive, the most dangerous, and in every way the worst route? Have they made any case at all on these points? I maintain they have not.

There is another reason which perhaps requires some consideration, and that is probably the least tenable of all, when it comes to be looked into. That reason is, that the Government are acting in this matter because they wish to keep the trade of the Yukon for Canada. How are they going to keep the trade of the Yukon for Canada? By compelling that trade, as far as it is in their power, to go by the Stikine, the slowest, the most perilous, and the most expensive route. It is always known that the flow of trade is very nicely paralleled by the flow of water. You can no more make business run in an unprofitable channel than you can make water run up hill. Business naturally and inevitably follows the most convenient channel. The more easy of access you make your business, the more people will come to you to do business. The more convenient you make it for people to come to you, the more people will come to you. Then, how are the Government of Canada going to keep the trade of the Yukon for Canada by compelling it to follow a route 400 miles longer, at least twice as costly, and, as the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) points out, one that is open only five months in the year, as against a shorter and more convenient route which is open twelve months in the year? That is a conundrum, and I would like some member of the Government to try to answer it. If, instead of the worst route, we had the shortest, most convenient and in every way the best, and if it were the property, not of a company, but of the Government of Canada, how would even that keep the trade of the Yukon for Canada? The Government have not explained that, and I think the people of Canada would be very glad if they would attempt to explain it. There is no doubt that we are enjoying a great many courtesies at the hands of the United States, and they are enjoying a great many courtesies at our hands. The bonding privilege is extended by each country to the other to facilitate business, and in many other ways we are enjoying friendly relations with the United States. We are acting kindly towards them, and I think they are acting kindly towards us. We see sometimes alarming and sensational reports in their papers, and we sometimes see similar reports here; but to my mind there is nothing to warrant the feelings which inspire those reports, and no danger that these friendly relations will be interrupted. Now, if we had the best possible route to the Yukon, how could we keep the people of the United States from using it?

Who are the people that are competing with Canadians to-day for the trade of the Yukon? Are they not the people of the northern and north-western states? They are in such a position that they can come to us and say: We want to pass our goods in bond over the Stikine route. Let us assume that that is the best route, and that we must allow them to pass their goods over it, they will enjoy every facility and advantage which the Government of Canada has created at the expense of our people, because we cannot refuse them equal participation in those rights. How then can it be seriously contended that the main purpose of building this railway by the Stikine route is to preserve the trade of the Yukon for the people of Canada and give the people of Canada an advantage over their competitors in the United States? That is an utterly irrational and indefensible proposition.

The fact of the matter is that with the duties adjusted as they now are, the people of the north-western states will be able to take the trade of the Yukon in a great many lines, from the people of Canada. Take food stuffs, and particularly feed for animals, bulky food products, in which there will be a very large trade, how will we stand compared with our American rivals? The supplies we furnish must come from this side of the Rockies. We shall have to haul those supplies over the Rockies, probably six hundred to eight hundred miles, to the coast, then tranship to Fort Wrangel, and there tranship again up the difficult Stikine River, and again tranship over the road to Lake Teslin, and perhaps have to portage before reaching Dawson City—how can we expect to bring those bulky produces all that distance, with all these disadvantages, and compete with people who can ship directly from the Pacific Coast?

Will the duties imposed last session enable us to keep that trade? I do not think so. The duty on flour is 60 cents per barrel of 200 pounds. Mr. Jennings estimated the cost of handling flour or anything else across the proposed Yukon route to Lake Teslin at 9 cents a pound or $18 a barrel, and the duty is 60 cents. On beans the duty is 15 cents a bushel, or a quarter of a cent a pound. These are articles that will be largely used by the Yukon miners, and the duty will not count at all compared with heavy freight rates. Corn pays no duty at all, and instead of the people of Edmonton having an opportunity of sending their coarse grains into this country, they will find they are hopelessly beaten. There is no chance whatever for them to compete. Hay pays a duty of $2 a ton, or one-tenth of a cent per pound. What protection will the duty of one-tenth of a cent per pound afford on an article which has to be conveyed over a route where you pay many cents a pound for freight? None whatever. It would be cheaper for the people of that Yukon country to go to the United States and buy there and pay the duties than to take the goods which can be supplied from Canada and which must be hauled across the Rockies to the coast of British Columbia—because that province does not supply enough for its own population—and then be transhipped and sent on to the Yukon. Therefore it is absolutely foolish to talk of this proposed route capturing the trade for the people of Canada. I would be delighted if it would have that result, but there is no reason to believe that it will, but every reason, on the contrary, to conclude that this argument, like other arguments on the other side, is absolutely baseless and untruthful and of no effect whatever.

A great deal has been said in the course of this discussion—because I do not suppose that many discussions have ever wandered much more widely—concerning the various treaties, and a great deal of blame has been heaped, in connection with these treaties, upon a very eminent Canadian statesman, now deceased unfortunately. These treaties have been ransacked, a good deal of legal ability has been directed towards them, hours have been occupied in discussing them, and with what result? I think that to the mind of the ordinary citizen of Canada the conclusion is inevitable that these treaties do not count for anything in connection with this question. No matter from what source we derive our rights, they are indisputable. We have the right of navigation of the Yukon and the Stikine rivers. It has been suggested that difficulties might be raised in connection with the question of transshipment at the Stikine River under the treaty. I do not see how that is possible. We have exactly the same state of affairs existing at the Yukon. We hold our right to navigate the waters of the Yukon on precisely the same treaty conditions as our right to navigate the Stikine. On the Yukon, the Government of the United States has designated St. Michael a port for transshipment, transshipments are made there regularly and continually, and there is no suggestion that that right is to be interfered with. And just as we enjoy the right of transshipment at St. Michael's, so we will have it, with equal freedom from embarrassment or disturbance, at Fort Wrangel. At this moment we have at Dyea and Skagway the same privilege as at Boston and Portland of shipping goods in bond. The fact of the matter is, that under our treaty rights, we enjoy the same free passage, at these western ports as at Atlantic ports, for our goods over the United States territory as the United States enjoy over Canadian territory; and all the time that has been devoted to discussing the disabilities that might be thrown in our way in this matter of transshipment has been wasted. So far as I can discover, our rights are not questioned at all but are perfectly defined. We have never been interfered with yet in the enjoyment of them, and it is not at all likely that we shall be.

Now, as bearing to some extent on this question of an all-Canadian route, on which so much stress has been laid by members of the Government who have chosen to speak in defence of the Bill, let us consider a little more at length this matter of the privileges we are enjoying in the transportation of property across United States territory. If there is any point in our having an all-Canadian route, if it is profitable for the people of Canada to give a large land grant or money grant or to make any other sacrifice in order to have an all-Canadian railway route, it must be surely competent for someone on the Government side to show where that advantage is going to arise. In respect of what point, is an advantage to us to have an all-Canadian route?

Mr. PRIOR. To the coast.

Mr. BELL. I shall prefer to have an answer from the other side of the House. The hon. gentleman may speak on this question and perhaps I may be able to gather from him where the advantage lies, but I must confess it is now perfectly obscure. At present I do not see that it is any advantage whatever for the people of Canada to go to any extravagant expenditure for the construction of a railway in order to have an all-Canadian route. We have an all-Canadian route by the Intercolonial to Halifax, but that hauls very little freight. It is put where it is for military reasons, and it is of no advantage to the eastern coast, whatever advantage to the coast on which my hon. friend resides, an all-Canadian route on the Pacific might be. There is no doubt that the Intercolonial Railway would be a more profitable road commercially, if it were not an all-Canadian road. It would then be in a position to compete with the Canadian Pacific, to do business with the Atlantic coast cities, and to handle freights from the west. Because it is an all-Canadian road, it is an unprofitable road. It is a most necessary route, one for which Canada has paid a fair price, and without which Canada could not exist; but, as a commercial route, it is a failure. So it seems to me it is an utterly exploded humbug, this idea that the country ought to pay an extravagant price for a road because it is an all-Canadian route.

Mr. DAVIN. Particularly, when you do not get an all-Canadian route.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). And, as my hon. friend from West Assiniboia says, this is not an all-Canadian route. Now, let us consider what advantage the building of this road will confer upon us. We have the right now to enter Lynn Inlet, because it is tidewater, but we cannot go up the Stikine, because it is a river. We can go to the ports at the head of the inlet, because we reach them by sea navigation. But there we touch the American territory. What have we to do, then? All that is necessary for a person who wishes to transport goods, is to pay to the collector the amount of the United States duty and take his receipt. Then, on making his way across to Canadian territory until he reaches the Canadian customs office at the summit of land, his money is refunded to him by the Canadian Government. No difficulty is thrown in his way; he has every facility given him for doing his business; he can do it that way more cheaply and better, because it is a better route to take. So that, so far as that all-Canadian feature of the route is concerned, to my mind, there is no reason why we should put ourselves out of the way, merely considering this as a matter affecting the pockets of the people of Canada.

Now, another question which, perhaps, some may think I should not touch upon, but which, perhaps, it is fair enough for me to advert to, is one that affects an enormous proportion of the people who sit in this House. It was dealt with by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). I was delighted to hear him come out so plainly. Of what value is this route going to be to any persons east of British Columbia? It may be that, as the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) contends, it will be of some advantage to British Columbia, but of what advantage is it to the rest of the country? For instance, what good is it to the constituents of my hon. friend from Alberta? That hon. gentleman lives within six or seven hundred miles of the coast. But as you go east from British Columbia, toward the portion of the country in which most of us live, the advantage to be gained grows less until, so far as the eastern provinces are concerned, it becomes infinitesimal, microscopic and utterly invisible. Then, this is the position,—the Government of Canada is building a railroad over the most expensive route and over a route where it can never, according to my opinion, benefit the trade of the coast even of British Columbia, because they have to come into competition with the people of the United States, who are their natural competitors, and where it is of no earthly good to any other part of Canada. Why, then, should the Government be prepared to pay for the building of that road what is admitted to be an enormous price? Why should we be asked to vote away 3,750,000 acres of land in what is said to be the most valuable mineral country in the world, for the construction of a road which is of no good to anybody, and which is in the wrong place? What reason does the Government give for asking their supporters to vote for such a proposition? There is a route which could be used, if it were absolutely necessary to make a way to get into the Yukon. I do not think that that necessity is proven, for, if the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) is right, the people are going to get there faster than is good for them; he says that of 50,000 who go in this summer, 49,000 will be glad to get back next fall.

We are told, that in that country their lives will be in danger, and there is a possibility, which I do not admit, but it is said to exist, that bloodshed, riot and wrong-doing will take place. I do not admit these things, but if they are to be guarded against, why not build the road in the place where, some day, a road must be built, and where it will develop Canada, promote settlement and run through good land to the Yukon? Reaching it in that way, it will make it among the possibilities for the people of the older part of Canada to secure the trade of that country. What route is there that does that? There is a route, and that is the Edmonton route. It can be built now, and so anticipate expenditure that must be made by Canada at an early day. In travelling through the north-west of British Columbia, you realize in a very short time that the artery that makes settlement possible is the railway connection. At this moment they have the Canadian Pacific Railway, a great line, crossing that country, and it has had the effect of settling up the country for a distance of eight or ten miles on either side. In order to settle the northern part of that country, you must build branch or parallel roads. In that fine country in which Edmonton lies, in which, farther east, Prince Albert lies, which extends to the foot of the Rocky Mountains, there is an abundance of good grazing land and farming land. That country will have to be opened up with railways sometime, if it is to be filled with workers, with taxpayers, who will help to bear the burdens of Canada. Why not undertake it now? If it is necessary to give $3,750,000—which, at $2 per acre, amounts to $7,500,000—to build a road to connect the coast of British Columbia with the lands of the Yukon by a route where it can only serve a tithe of the people of Canada, why not build it from Edmonton or Prince Albert over a route where it could be used by all the people, where everything that passes over from the east would pass over at an advantage? But, even if it were not feasible, at this moment, to build a road there, why not build a wagon road of such a character that it could be used afterwards for building the railway? This could be done at comparatively small expense, and it would serve the double purpose of reaching the Yukon and bringing about the settlement of the district beyond Edmonton. If I am not mistaken, to reach the navigable waters of the Pelly River, that route would not exceed 900 miles in length. I am not so familiar with that country that I can be sure of the figures, but I think I am nearly right. According to the estimate of the Government engineer, this would cost $1,400 a mile, or a total of $1,260,000.

A road of that character, I believe, would be of great value. It could be built so that a large number of people could pass over it, even in some part of this season. It would open up the Yukon country, and more than that, it would open up and develop the fine farming country about Edmonton; and unquestionably it would bring to that country, which is treeless, or comparatively so, in which lumber is expensive, and it would bring into the markets of the world, the large lots of timber land which lie north-west of Edmonton as you approach the mountains. If you were to go to the people of Canada and ask them for authority to build this route by Edmonton, which would cost one million dollars, it would be a feasible and rational proposition, and I maintain that a proposition to build at a cost of some $7,500,000 a small, poorly built, inefficient tramway, in a wrong place, is not a reasonable proposition. Now I do not think it is advisable to spend much time in considering the different features of the contract. Those are matters of detail, and I have endeavoured so far in my argument to deal with the essence of the question, with the large considerations that ought properly to be considered when we are discussing the second reading of the Bill. I do not think it is well to spend much time now in doing work which will have to be done, if it is done at all, and which can only be done, in committee of the whole House, that is, discussing the details of the measure. The flaws and defects which the Opposition can point out in the various sections of the contract, can probably be more satisfactorily and usefully dealt with in committee. However, I would simply make one observation here. Admitting that it was the purpose of the Government to restrict very considerably the power of the contractors to select large portions of the valuable mineral lands in the North-west, the provision compelling them to select 72 square miles in each block, is not sufficiently stringent to be of much value. It gives to the contractors power to select some 81 blocks. In 81 localities, they can select valuable mineral properties. Now, are there 81 valuable mineral centres in the North-west, or in the Yukon? Would not this power of selecting 81 blocks give to the contractors every recognized valuable mineralized centre that lies in the North-west and the Yukon district to-day? Would it not in addition give them probably every recognized mineralized centre of value in British Columbia as well? One such block, three miles by six, would take in all the valuable mineral lodes known in Rossland. If I am not mistaken, every portion of the mineralized belt at Rossland which has been proven yet to be of value could be included in one single block, three miles by six. The whole of those creeks that lie on the Yukon, the Klondike, the Eldorado and others that are of recognized value, could be taken up in one or two. The fact that the Government has restricted the contractors to only 81 points of selection in the North-west, does not, to my mind, restrict them sufficiently to compel them to give to the rest of the people who are going into that country looking for wealth, an equal chance. There is another reason which I think ought to weigh very strongly with the electors of the country in deciding whether this is a good measure or not, and it is a matter that was dealt with fully last night by my hon. friend for Charlotte (Mr. Ganong) in which he contrasted the stringency of the regulations of the Government in dealing with individual miners, and the great laxity and excessive liberality of the Government in dealing with the contractors. The fact that an individual miner must pay $25 a year in order to have a property out of which he can dig any gold at all, and then be compelled to pay 10 per cent royalty on what gold he does take out in excess of $2,500, seems to me a most unjust, unfair and unreasonable discrimination against the individual miner. The further fact that the contractors may let these mineral lands lie undeveloped as long as they like, is not right. On the other hand, the individual miner, if he does not work it, is compelled to forfeit his property in 72 hours, a property upon which he may have spent a good deal of time, which he probably looked for a long time before he found it. There is to my mind another exceedingly grotesque feature in this contract. If there was one thing about which our friends on the Government side of the House dealt with more unction, with more impressiveness, with greater pertinacity than anything else, it was the charge continually made against the Conservative party that they were the friends of combines and monopolies. They coined a word at the last election to express the contempt with which they looked upon the Conservative party who had, as they said, allied themselves with these people; the word "combinester" was created by the Liberal party, but it was to be used in that contest only, as they did not require it afterwards. The only men in Canada who could be relied upon at all times to treat fairly the workingmen, were the Liberal politicians and Liberal Governments. The only men who could be relied upon on all occasions to create a combine, to create a monopoly, to favour monopolists, to help millionaires, to make the rich man richer, and the poor man poorer, were the Conservatives. On the other hand, when the Liberals came into power the sun of prosperity would rise upon the workingman, and his healing beams which were to bless the workingman, would at the same time bring destruction and annihilation to all those creatures of an unhealthy atmosphere, to all the combinesters and their fine-spun schemes. Well, we find this Government that is made up of those gentlemen who went about the country declaiming so eloquently about the combinester, who professed themselves so warmly to be the friends of the workingmen and the enemies of monopolists, are here engaged in this very Bill in creating what is probably the greatest monopoly that Canada has ever seen. They are taking probably one-half, almost certainly one-half, of the richest lands in what is admitted to be the richest gold field in the world, and are giving them to two individuals, giving them under such conditions as are glaring when contrasted with the conditions upon which the ordinary citizen, the ordinary workingman, is permitted to take up a claim. That is a feature of this contract which, while the Government may have made up their minds to swallow it, can scarcely satisfy many hon. gentlemen opposite who probably are opposed to combines sincerely, are opposed to monopolies, are opposed to special privileges to any person. How can these gentlemen, these doubtless honest members of the Liberal party, who sincerely believe that monopolies and combines are wrong, and should not be created, and that every man in this country should have a free and equal chance—how can these hon. gentlemen vote for a Bill containing such clauses? They may do it, if they do, it will show to the people of Canada that there is no more sincerity in the rank and file of the Liberal party in dealing with these matters than there is in their leaders, and that is absolutely none whatever. Now, perhaps one of the most interesting considerations in connection with this whole matter, one that has been dealt with by many speakers, and one to which I will refer to but for a few minutes, is the value of the concession that has been made to the company. We have it pointed out pretty clearly that the Government is not getting very much in return. If we were to consider nothing else but the railroad that they are getting in return, regarding it as a railroad, and knowing, as we now do, that it is a narrow gauge road, a tramway, with very light rails, and necessarily with very light equipment, with sharp curves, with very heavy gradients, a road 150 miles long, a road about as long as the Government road in the little province of Prince Edward Island, when we realize that for that road the Government of Canada are giving away four times the area of Prince Edward Island, what would be thought of this Government if they went down to eastern Canada and proposed to build a railroad in Prince Edward Island and give to the people who built the road not only Prince Edward Island, but three times as much territory more which they could select from the best lands they could find in Nova Scotia as well?

That is an illustration applicable to this case. What is the value of these 3,750,000 acres? It has been fairly argued that they are worth at least $7,500,000; and it must be recollected that 3,750,000 acres is the minimum quantity. If we select the other figures which have been given by Engineer Jennings, and take the road as of the length of 165 miles, we have 4,425,000 acres; if we take the line as 208 miles, the quantity exceeds 5,000,000 acres; and consequently, if we estimate these lands to be worth—and this is a very moderate estimate—$2 per acre, they would reach the figures I have given. How easy it would be for a company to go on the money market and sell the privilege of occupying an acre of these lands for $2. So we are about to pay from $7,500,000 to $10,000,000 for a poor piece of railway construction. But these lands, it may be argued, and argued fairly, are not of any very definite value to the Government of Canada at the present time. They lie there, however, possessing very great indirect value. They are bringing people into Canada. The simple fact that they are lying there open has had probably the effect of inducing more immigration than have all the efforts of the immigration department for many years past. Will the fact that this land, to the extent of at least 3,750,000 acres, has been transferred to a company stimulate immigration? No. If it were arranged that those contractors should sell the lands on the same terms as the Government extended to free miners and accepted in return $2 per acre, if indeed the Government entered into a supplementary contract, whereby individual miners could obtain these lands from the contractors at $2 per acre, or even $3 or $4 per acre, on conditions imposed by the Government, then possibly those lands might possess the power to attract, as they possess to-day. Would it not be wise to endeavour to enter into such a bargain with the contractors, that so soon as these lands were leased by the company to individual miners, the company should receive from the Government $2 per acre, or even a higher sum? Would that not be a good bargain for Canada to make? The land has now passed entirely out of the hands of the Government, or it will do so if we do not succeed in defeating this Bill which is now before the Parliament, and which stands without any justification whatever.

One great objection to the Bill—but I do not deem it necessary to deal with it at length, because it has already been fully argued—is, that the Government lies under grave suspicion in connection with this transaction. They have sprung upon the people of Canada the announcement that they have entered into this contract. How many people knew that the Government were negotiating with these contractors before the negotiations were completed?

An hon. MEMBER. Four.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). About four. Capitalists interested in the matter, anxious to tender for the construction of such a railway as is proposed, were not able to reach the ear of the Government, and could not make an offer; and, under these circumstances, the Government of Canada lie under grave suspicion, because they have chosen to conduct their operations in secrecy, when secrecy did them no good. What purpose, in the interest of Canada, was served by the Government maintaining secrecy in respect to this transaction? If we can believe the hon. Minister of Railways, he did his very best to make a good bargain for Canada; he exercised every effort and used every influence to secure a good bargain for the Dominion. If he were really anxious, however, to secure such a result, why did he deprive himself entirely of the greatest advantage belonging to a person entering into a bargain, and that is, inviting competition? Why did he, if he desired to make a bargain, shut out all competition? Have the Government, or any hon. gentleman opposite, given justification of the conduct of the Government in keeping the bargain secret? The fact of the matter is, that the Government have shown a great deal of folly in conducting the negotiations secretly, but they have shown a great deal of wisdom in holding their tongues since the contract came before the House. Some of their supporters have talked round the question, but no one speaking with authority has made a satisfactory defence of the manner in which the Government conducted the negotiations, and the Opposition, in arraigning the Government before the people of Canada as having been unwise, if not worse, in this transaction, are acting perfectly within their rights. If any transaction ever came before Parliament deserving of condemnation at the hands of this House and condemnation at the hands of the people of this country, I think it is that embodied in the Bill submitted, for the second reading of which we are now asked to vote.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) It was not my intention to intervene in the discussion at this stage, as there are no available papers in French on the matter under discussion, and I could not find any such detailed information on the subject-matter of this debate. I found it impossible to procure such information, for several reasons. In the first place, the other day I asked the right hon. Prime Minister whether he intended having the official guide prepared and published by Mr. Ogilvie on Canada's great gold field, the Yukon district, translated into the French language, so as to enable the French-speaking members of this House to study with more profit its contents. The right hon. gentleman promised to see to it that this translation should be placed at our disposal at the earliest possible moment: now, although I elicited that promise from the Prime Minister over ten days ago, we have not yet had that translation, or at least it has not yet reached us. But, Sir, it is not so much in my own personal name that I bring this matter before the House as for the sake of our own fellow-countrymen who are leaving their homes and are already wending their way into the Yukon region. A great many French Canadians are likely to seek their fortunes there this year, and they have not the necessary information to guide them.

I enter my protest against such a state of things, as it is likely to deprive those intending gold-seekers, on the eve of their departure for the Yukon, of the necessary and detailed information on that district, about which the great majority of them know absolutely nothing. I also tried to procure some information from the debates of the House, but here again I found that the French "Hansard" did not go any further than the 14th of February. I draw the attention of the House to that fact, as showing how the French language is overlooked. I hope that with a French Canadian Prime Minister at the head of the Administration, these details will be better attended to in the future. Mr. Ogilvie's report is of greater importance to the French-speaking people than is generally believed; therefore, it should be translated at the earliest possible moment, and it should have been done before now.

I shall not dwell at any great length on the subject now before us, as it has been fully threshed out by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. A great deal of light has been thrown on the subject by the hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House, and I hesitate not to say that the comments we have heard are quite sufficient to fully elucidate the matter, so as to show the hon. gentlemen opposite how the best interests of the country may be safeguarded. This is an important issue, as it interests not only those who intend seeking the Yukon gold fields, but also, in the highest degree, the country at large. The Government have taken some steps to have railway communication into that gold-bearing region, and to secure the building of a railway, by giving the contract to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. In my opinion, that contract contains many objectionable features. The worst feature of all is that private interests are surrendered, by that contract, as well as the rights of the country at large and, besides, the powers of Parliament are nullified. There can be no manner of doubt about private interests being surrendered by that contract. Private interests, in many cases, are going to be jeopardized, owing to this contract having been given to Mackenzie & Mann, without public tenders being called to carry out such work. There is no doubt that several solid and responsible companies would have tendered for this work, and in so doing, not only would they have benefited by it, but larger benefits would have accrued to the country at large. We can see plainly to-day that those companies have not been fairly dealt with in this connection, by the Government, from the standpoint of the general interests of the country, and did not receive at the hands of the Administration the protection they were entitled to. Private interests were also undoubtedly entitled to the protection of the Government, under the circumstances. In a case like this, the influence of those companies should have been allowed to prevail, as public interests would have benefited by it. In my opinion, those companies will no doubt call the Government to a bitter account for not having been called to tender for this work. I utterly fail to see on what grounds the Government can justify their action in not calling for public tenders. The action of the Government could be justified but on the most serious grounds, because this system of public tenders is the best safeguard possible to the public funds and to private interests as well. By inviting tenders, the action of the Government would have been unobjectionable, and the public treasury would also have benefited by the competition of the several tenderers. I believe that the Government must have been actuated by very weighty reasons in not inviting public tenders for a work of such importance. And yet, strange to say, they have not deemed it fit to act in the open light of day and to make known to this House the motives that prompted them to take such a line of action. Sir, what was the consequence of the action of the Government in this case? The result was that they were called upon to give away 3,750,000 acres of gold-bearing lands, the value of which cannot be exactly estimated. Such a result speaks by itself and this is the reason why they did not put up that great contract to tender.

When was that contract let? It was entered into within ten days of the opening of Parliament. Now, Sir, I make bold to say that the powers of Parliament have been ignored by the Government, when, within a few days of the opening of Parliament, they undertook to give away such a large portion of our public domain, and of our national inheritance. What, I ask, prompted them to take such a step? The only plausible explanation of the step taken in this instance by the Government was that they were sure of having their action endorsed by the hon. gentlemen opposite, who would merely register their votes in favour of that grant, irrespective of the consequences that might follow therefrom.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) The is right.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) With such a system, involving, as it does, a new and deplorable departure from the principle which underlies free parliamentary institutions, I believe that the freedom of hon. members is hampered, and their hands are tied by such a procedure. When the hon. members opposite are brought face to face with a measure of that description, giving away, without tenders, a portion of the public domain, the value of which cannot be estimated, they will not hesitate, when they know that an adverse vote of theirs would sweep the Government from power, to support such a measure, and I doubt not but that they will register their votes in favour of it. But, I ask, what about the duty of the hon. gentlemen to their province and to the country at large? I have no hesitation in saying that they will be false to their duty and endorse a measure which should, undoubtedly, be defeated. Under such circumstances, Sir, the role which the hon. members are called upon to play in Parliament is or may be nullified if not detrimental to our interests.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) That applies to the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Let the hon. gentleman who has just interrupted me allow me to remind him that, if he wants to get promotion, he will have to register his vote in favour of the measure of the Government, were it even ten times worse than it really is. The hon. gentleman and his friends are bound to support this measure, for their hands are tied, this contract having been entered into within ten days of the opening of Parliament. Fortunately, on this side of the House, we enjoy the privilege of criticising this contract, and although we are the minority in this House, still we have it in our power to take the necessary means to have it amended, should we fail in having it voted down by the House.

I hold, Sir, that it is surrendering the interests of the country at large to grant 3,750,000 acres of land to those gentlemen, the value of which is unknown or at least can be but imperfectly estimated from Mr. Ogilvie's report. But if we are to believe implicitly what that gentleman says in his report, I think we are making a pretty liberal grant to Mackenzie & Mann, and no wonder these gentlemen are afraid to lose their contract, should it be blocked somewhere.

I stated, a little while ago, that the Government were also surrendering, by this contract, the interests of the country at large. It has been shown here the other day, by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) that such an action, involving, as it does, the locking up of an immense tract of land, had never been done by any Government on the face of the globe. Such a fact, I believe, is well worth considering. Further, I may say that never was anybody known to have handed over to somebody else a property the value of which he could not estimate. Now, from what we know of the value of those lands, as stated in the report of Mr. Ogilvie, we may safely say that we are putting in the hands of two men the highly auriferous deposits of the richest gold country in the world. In my opinion, it would have been by far preferable for the Government to have taken action and undertaken themselves the building of this road, rather than entering into such a contract with private contractors, under such provisions as those now submitted to our consideration. Such an action on the part of the Government could only be justified on the strongest grounds. The Government have at their disposal all the necessary machinery; with competent public officers, with civil engineers and all the means in their possession, they could easily have undertaken to build a road into that country, connecting the Stikine River with Teslin Lake. The cost of a Government railway would probably be greater than if left to private enterprise, but, in addition to our securing a national road, we would have retained the gold lands of the country for the people of this country. But not only are these men given the gold lands of the country, but they will also have a preference which places at their disposal the means of acquiring untold wealth. They are given exclusively the right to build branch lines, to construct, acquire and operate during ten years lines of telegraph and telephone, thus creating a monopoly in their favour. If we are to believe what Mr. Ogilvie states in his report, these gentlemen, owing to that huge monopoly, will before long acquire greater wealth and revenues than the Government itself will have. Let me now deal with another objectionable feature of this contract. It is surely a crying injustice against which I enter my most solemn protest, that the Government should impose on the company a royalty of only one per cent on the gold extracted from their lands, while the free-miner, the poor man who goes into the Yukon, to make a living for himself, and who, at the risk of his life, has prospected that country as far back as 1885, should be compelled to pay on his gold a royalty of 10 per cent. I say again it is a crying injustice and a course of action altogether unwarrantable. Sir, what fair-play is that? In my opinion, it is the contractors who should be compelled to pay a royalty of 10 per cent, while the Canadian free-miner who goes into the country to make a living for himself and for his family, at the risk of his life, should pay but 1 per cent on his gold, or even no royalty at all. I had to-day the opportunity of meeting a man who has just returned from the Klondike, and he told me that the royalty of 10 per cent imposed on the miners was an intolerable hardship. The Government, I hope, will take into consideration the position and the interests of the free-miners and will make a great reduction on this heavy charge. There is another very important feature of this Bill to be considered, that relating to the selection of the best route to the Yukon district. The route which they have chosen is not altogether a desirable one, as a certain portion of the territory which the Stikine River runs through is claimed by the United States. Moreover, owing to the railway facilities in the State of Washington, travellers going to the Yukon already largely buy their supplies and outfits in the United States. The gold-seekers wishing to reach the Klondike will travel as usual via the Grand Trunk Railway, and will stop at Seattle, for the purpose of buying their supplies and outfits previous to taking the Canadian route. This will take place, with the proposed route, as it will offer them the advantage of reaching United States territory, before taking our Canadian route, and they will thus have only one customs duty to pay, which, in this case, will be paid to the Canadian authorities. The reason why this route was chosen, in preference to all others, was the securing of the enormous trade of that country to Canada. Now, this end will be defeated, because, instead of taking that route, the intending Klondikers will buy their outfits and supplies at Seattle. Thus, that great trade, instead of accruing to the benefit of Canada, will, in a large measure, benefit the United States of America to which the hon. gentlemen opposite have always shown such deference. In fact, there has been, ever since the outset, a most determined effort on the part of the United States to divert that trade from Canada, and to grasp and turn it to their own advantage.

There is, Mr. Speaker, an all-Canadian route, through Edmonton. We would secure by that route the whole volume of the trade of that district. This route offers several advantages, as it would greatly assist the opening up of the valleys of the Peace River, of the Nelson, Liard and Pelly Rivers, before striking the Yukon district. In my opinion, Sir, this route should not be lost sight of by the Government, and I was happy to read in the papers a few days ago that a delegation had interviewed the Prime Minister asking him to provide for railway communication in that direction. This route, I trust, will soon be opened, and I believe that it will greatly benefit the country at large. At an earlier stage of this debate, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) made a remark which I cannot let pass unchallenged. He said that the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House would be ashamed of the opposition they are offering to this measure, as they are ashamed to-day of the position they took upon the Remedial Bill.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Hear, hear.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) We are by no means ashamed of the position we took formerly in regard to the Remedial Bill, because our course was grounded on the constitution, and we were simply upholding the constitution. When the Conservative Government brought up the Remedial Bill, they acted in conformity with the decision of the Privy Council, the highest tribunal in the Empire. We have always redeemed our pledges, on this side of the House. It is the hon. gentlemen opposite who ought to be anxious to bury all recollection of their opposition to that Bill; they are the very men who ought to be ashamed of having opposed a measure which was quite adequate, as it secured to a French Catholic minority their rights to separate schools. Mr. Speaker, before resuming my seat, I wish to tender the House my thanks for having so patiently heard me throughout. And, while I am on my feet, I wish to give expression to the hope that many hon. gentlemen will oppose this Yukon deal, as I am myself in duty bound to do; and were I to follow a different course, I would be negligent of the interests and incur the displeasure of the electors of the county of Champlain who, at the last election, have rendered such a conscientious verdict on the school question by voting down the Laurier-Greenway settlement, which, as we all know, has been condemned by the highest religious authority on earth; and, as the hon. gentlemen can see, this was a very sensible verdict, and one that has been confirmed by later events.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, coming as I do from the North-west and representing a great constituency there, I do not think it would be a fit thing for me to allow this debate to close without expressing what I believe to be the opinions not only of my constituents, but the opinions of the people of the entire Territories. There are other reasons why I am constrained to speak, for did not my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) express a fervent wish that I would not allow the debate to close without taking part in it, and regarding the wish of such a high dignitary as a command I am here to obey.

Mr. McDOUGALL. He is not here.

Mr. DAVIN. I regret the Minister is not here. I regret it because it will be impossible that I should not refer to his speech. Mr. Speaker, every thing connected with this Klondike business is extraordinary. You have secret negotiations by the Government to spend millions, and you have secret telegrams promised by the Prime Minister and then not produced. The whole thing, therefore, has a suspicious look, and we have to give our constituents and to give the country such ideas as occur to us should be expressed in regard to this matchless deal, this Yukon grant to two happy men, whom I do not blame at all because it is their business. I do not blame Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie if Pactolus is made to flow into their lap by the Government, but the rest of the country may be expected to have a different opinion upon that matter. Sir, the speech of the Minister of the Interior is one that I should like to praise if I could. It is practically the first speech he has made in the House, and he is a North-west man and he showed fight, and if I could I would praise his speech. I can give it this praise: that it excited hon. gentlemen opposite and gave heart and voice to benches that had been silent up to that time. In his absence I will apologize to the Minister of Railways for having done him wrong. It was a very extraordinary spectacle we had from that hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair), because he is one of the parties to this contract, which reads:

Whereas, it is necessary in the public interest of Canada that railway and steamboat communication with the Yukon district should be established without delay; and whereas, subject to the approval of Parliament, Her Majesty, therein represented by the Minister of Railways and Canals,—

Well, it was a very extraordinary thing that, though Her Majesty had been represented by the Minister of Railways and Canals, that hon. gentleman knew so little about the Bill which he had introduced, or knowing much about it, said so little in explanation of it. In fact the contract was signed by another in his name. We had two speeches from the Minister of Railways and they fell flat. There was discomfiture and dismay in the ranks of the Government, and there well might be. Then came the Minister of the Interior, who is the real author of the Bill, and what kind of a speech did he make to us? Did he give such an explanation of this Bill as a Minister moving the second reading of a great Bill ought to give? Did he show that it was justifiable on economic grounds, that it would tend to the development and enrichment of the country, that the bargain was an economical one? Not at all. He said very little about the Bill, but he took five hours of two sittings to abuse the Opposition. You, Sir, like him, are a lawyer, and you know that proverb, "If you have no case, abuse the other side." He had no case. I have no doubt that with a good case in court, he would prove a good advocate; but with a bad case in this high court of Parliament, he proved a bad advocate; and I will show that his speech utterly failed to justify this Yukon deal to the Parliament or the people of Canada.

Now, Sir, what is the first question that ought to be decided? The first question, it seems to me, that ought to be decided is this: is it justifiable on economic grounds for a Government to build a railway for the development of a mining country? Many great thinkers doubt whether it is justifiable for a Government to build railways at all. I think there can be no doubt that the argument for building railways to develop a farming country is a good one; but the argument for building a mining railway rests on a wholly different footing; and we should have had from the Government benches the question debated from a politico-economic standpoint, and we should have heard some justification for the course taken. But if you are going to build a railway into a mining country, there is no use of doing it on most extravagant terms. The Minister of the Interior based his chief argument on the ground of haste; and if he fails to justify his statement that it was necessary to be hasty in the building of this railway, he fails utterly. Sir, you know, and I hope the members of the Government know, that because of hasty action in regard to lands which were little known in parts of this continent that formely belonged to Canada, this country lost millions and millions of acres which are now some of the fairest states in the country below the line. British power would now predominate on this continent in a manner almost inconceivable if what was given away by a foolish man named Onslow, whom Franklin laughed at as a good-natured man who always sought to do good, and what was subsequently given away by Lord Ashburton, had been retained for Canada. Therefore, I say we have historical example against the argument that has been put forward here by men who have said in perfect ignorance of the land, that it is of no value. Here are hon. gentlemen who tell us, in the same breath almost, that they know nothing about the country, and then that the land is perfectly valueless; the Minister of the Interior taking the extraordinary course of trying to demonstrate that he had made a very shrewd deal with Mann & Mackenzie, and one of his supporters telling us that the country is a wholly worthless one, and that of every fifty people who would go in probably forty-nine would return the next year. We have had to-day from one of the members from the maritime provinces a weighty argument showing that there was no need for haste. If so, the case the Minister of the Interior tried to make out falls utterly to the ground.

Now, taking up the contract, the first thing I object to in it is this, that Parliament is flouted. Here we are told that this contract is made subject to the approval of Parliament, and what is the attitude of the Ministers in regard to the majority whom they probably think subservient? What is their attitude in regard to this House, and what is their attitude in regard to another House? Why, Sir, that if Parliament dares to have anything to say to this project, if Parliament, thinking the contract is subject to its approval, dares to set it aside, Parliament will behave so badly that one of the Houses of Parliament is threatened by one of the Ministers. My hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) shakes his head. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will not use that hackneyed joke of O'Connell's, and say that if he shakes his head there is nothing in it, but I will say that he is greatly mistaken, for we all remember how, at the close of his speech, the Minister of the Interior said that the people of Canada would hold the other House to a bitter account unless they passed this Bill.

Mr. DOBELL. He did not say so.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend again shakes his head. I will prove shortly that he did say that; and taken in connection with much of the hon. gentleman's speech, it was characteristic. With regard to that speech, I do not want to say anything harsher than this, that most of it was irrelevant, and a good deal of it was indecorous, in the way it referred to eminent men living, and to eminent men whose memory lives in this House. There are some words which I might use if the hon. gentleman himself were present; but there is a certain restraint placed upon me by the fact that he is not. If I wished to be harsh and extreme in my expressions, the hon. Minister gave me an example when he referred to the treaty made by Sir John Macdonald and other plenipotentiaries—the Treaty of Washington. What did he do? He flouted the memory of the greatest man that Canada has produced—a man who was a great constitutional lawyer as well as a great statesman, and he declared that Sir John Macdonald had never read the Treaty of St. Petersburg. Such a statement would be a piece of presumption coming from almost any one, but particularly coming from a young man and a still younger Minister, and from a man who is a lawyer by profession. His statement amounted to this, that Sir John Macdonald could not have read the Russian Treaty, or le would not have consented to the conditions of the Treaty of Washington. My legal friends who have spoken from this side pointed out what is perfectly true, that, we have by the Treaty of Washington pretty well all the advantages which we had under the Russian Treaty. My hon. friend showed, not only ignorance as a lawyer, but a marked disrespect for a great man, very unbecoming in a gentleman of his years and capacity.

The speech of the hon. gentleman, however, produced considerable effect on the other side, but, Mr. Speaker, the effect produced was due altogether to contrast. It came as a revelation to our hon. friends opposite on the back benches, who were dumb, discouraged and dismayed, that any Minister should have the courage to defend this extraordinary measure. But when we read and study the Bill, we are not astonished that the hon. Minister, who is the author of it and who made the contract, and who was like a hen defending her chickens against the opposition hawk, which was pouncing upon them, should have been roused to spread his wings and fight for his progeny as best he might. Sir, the criticisms of the Opposition not only impressed hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, but powerfully impressed the country. The criticisms of this Bill have powerfully impressed all Canada, as we know who have just come back from that province, where, with ten-fold odds against it, the Conservative party has gained a towering moral victory and probably a political victory as well. One of the things that contributed most to that victory was the strong impression made upon the public mind by our criticisms of this unfortunate Bill. And I am speaking what I feel, Sir, when I say that I would have been glad if my right hon. friend the First Minister—who had nothing, I am sure, originally to do with this contract—had, when its true character was exposed to him, withdrawn it.

My hon. friend questioned my accuracy when I referred to what the hon. Minister of the Interior said, and I shall quote from "Hansard" the exact words:

It will remove the danger of the country being, not in the hands of our officers, but in the hands of an alien population who will contemn the authority of this Government. These things I look upon as important. Let my hon. friends opposite understand that if this railway project is obstructed—

Mark you this, here is the extraordinary spectacle of a man moving the second reading of a Bill, assuming a bellicosity seldom seen on such an occasion, and then concluding with such a threat as this:

—if this railway project is obstructed, if it is stopped here or elsewhere, and if that territory passes from the control of Canada by reason of there being no railway communication, the people of Canada will hold them to bitter account. Is that not a threat? My hon. friend shakes his head. Then he does not attach the same meaning to words that I do, because I consider it a very pointed threat indeed.

What was it that gave heart to hon. gentlemen on that side in the speech of the hon. Minister of the Interior. It was simply this. Instead of saying that this Bill was good, he put his arms akimbo, "a la fille de Madame Angot," and said: You are just as bad.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I heard my hon. friend who smiles cheer that at the time, and we heard all the members of the Government cheer, but will that justify the conduct of the hon. Minister to the people of Canada? In the North-west, and I believe all over the country, the Government will be held to a strict account with regard to the professions they made in Opposition. That speech of the hon. gentleman was what used to be called in old legal pleading "a confession and an avoidance." In reply to the charges made against him, he said: You are as bad, and produced a map—a deceptive map, as I have shown; a map that did not give a true account of affairs. The whole thing was a piece of parliamentary melodrama—was not very dignified in a Minister of the Crown.

The hon. gentleman lectured us on parliamentary demeanour, and he favoured me with a lecture on my style of expression. He spoke of the tail wagging the dog. Well, the hon. gentleman was quite competent to speak of a proceeding of that kind, because there are two notable instances of the tail wagging the dog, neither of which is creditable to the Liberal party. There was the tail that wagged the dog up in Manitoba and made the dog turn aside from the pledges on the strength of which the Government had won an election. And there was the tail that wagged the dog in this Dominion, and made a great Minister turn aside from views that must have been cherished by him and to which he had pledged himself publicly and solemnly. The hon. gentleman was therefore in a good position to lecture us about the tail wagging the dog, for he knew all about it.

The first thing which the hon. gentleman dealt with, when he did come to discuss the subject proper, was the cost of building this railway; and he did exactly what the Minister of Railways did—he began at once to depreciate Mr. Jennings. I propose to dissect this speech and show that it is steeped in want of candour, and that in it the hon. gentleman contradicts himself. He depreciated Mr. Jennings's ability in this manner. Mr. Jennings calculates that this line could be built for $3,485,000, or $24,034 per mile, but the hon. Minister says that is quite a mistake. Why? Because anybody who knows as much as he and some others, including the leader of the Opposition, would not believe that that calculation was correct.

Although my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) was for a long time Minister of Railways, I do not think that he would hurriedly say that a calculation made by Mr. Jennings on such a subject as that was incorrect. And I will tell you why. I happened to be connected with a great railway inquiry into all the facts relating to the Canadian Pacific Railway. We had to examine the work done by Mr. Jennings and to examine Mr. Jennings himself. We found that he was not only considered one of the first of railway engineers, but a man of impregnable morality as well. We found that he had resisted the strongest temptations held out to him by contractors to represent one kind of work as another kind of work. A more capable engineer than Mr. Jennings does not exist. Yet the Minister of the Interior says that nobody would accept his calculation of what the railway would cost. Then, he depreciated the land that was to be given for this railway. He told us that Ogilvie told him that only about 300 feet width in a stream bore gold. But it was shown by the leader of the Opposition that, under the wording of the contract, the contractors could lay their base line in such a way that they could cover all the gold. And what is the result? We have heard one Minister declare that, in consequence of the criticisms of the leader of the Opposition, they have changed their Bill in what must be regarded as a pretty vital point. In connection with this, I will say something that I would prefer saying with the Minister of the Interior present. He said that I spoke of the Conservatives having the instinct of government, and he added, "whatever that may mean." Well, if he does not know what that means, then, at any time, without fee or reward, I will give him a private audience and explain it to him. If he does not know what it means, he is what I certainly do not take him for, a man of imperfect education. The change that was made because of the criticism of the leader of the Opposition, shows that there was an instinct of government on this side which was not that side. Through the whole speech of the Minister of the Interior we find a bowing to this superior instinct of government, for the only attempt he makes to justify what the Government has done is to say: You did the same thing. But he cannot get off with that. I am going to give you chapter and verse from men who are his leaders in the Government, showing that the principles on which he has acted in regard to this contract are contrary to Liberal principles as surely as they are unsound from a Conservative standpoint to-day.

He vaunts that there is no money paid. There was no necessity to pay money when you were giving away land in such quantities. Besides the land, these contractors are given a monopoly. I will read subsection 4 on page 7 of this Bill, and I intend merely to read it, and I will leave it to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this country, whether, if it were parliamentary for me to say that the Minister was guilty of effrontery in characterizing that clause as he has done, it would not be an appropriate thing to say. He said that there was no monopoly, and insisted on it again and again. This is what the clause says :

For five years from the first of September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by Parliament to be constructed from Lynn Canal or thereabouts, or from any point at or near the international boundary between Canada and Alaska into the Yukon district, and for five years from said date no aid in land or money shall be granted to any person or company other than the contractors and the contractors' company to assist in building any such railway.

Now, there is no language that I can use to characterize the boldness of a man who will say that does not give a monopoly.

Then, what does he say about rates? He became very melodramatic. In his accession to our ranks we gain a good actor. He threw his hands about and then put his arms akimbo and said: Rates? You say we do not fix rates. I throw out a challenge to you. I defy you to show a single instance in which you, when in power, fixed rates for a railway that was being incorporated. Is that the way to judge it? Is it not of a piece with the exhibition of mountebanks for a member of the Liberal Government to speak in this way? I read here the doctrine laid down by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. I quote from "Hansard," December 17th, 1880, page 143:

They evade altogether the most important question of rates, to which my hon. friend most properly calls attention.

His hon. friend was Hon. Edward Blake. What had he done? He had laid down a principle, that you should fix the rate of tolls in such a Bill. He laid it down as a plank of the Liberal platform. The Liberals have been educated in that throughout the entire country, and it is a fair supposition that in the last election many voted for them in consequence of such sentiments. Yet, the moment we ask them to fix rates—which, I think, was the best thing to do even in our time, but surely we have made some progress—he turns around and says: Show us a case where you fixed rates. No, I cannot show such a case, but I show where you professed that rates should be fixed. Again, on page 146 of the same volume, is the following (Sir Richard Cartwright):—

Fifthly, Sir, I take issue entirely with their omitting to fix such rates as would prevent the future population of the North-west from being put under the power of these grinding and terrible monopoly tolls, which have proved such a tremendous detriment to the progress of the country on the other side of the border.

And I call your especial attention to this:

Now, Sir, these hon. gentlemen tell us that this need not, in the slightest degree, disturb us, because, say they, the Government can fix the rates. Well, as my hon. friend pointed out, the Government can fix the rates. The Government must fix the rates in the early periods of the railroad, and at a very high point. I think every reasonable man will admit that. But, Sir, by the provisions of this contract, you take away from the Government, for ever, the power.

And so on. With such principles as that laid down by one of the leaders of the present Government, have not the people of Canada the right to ask of them to carry out their principles, and if they do not do so, have we not the right to regard them as political humbugs? Here is what you professed, and when you get into power, you will not carry out your professions.

Now, I revert to the land grant and the hon. Minister of the Interior's calculations. He calculated that there would be only 37,500 acres of the 3,750,000 that would prove to be gold-bearing. Well, a claim is about an acre, and one claim has often produced thirty million dollars. If you have 37,000 mining claims productive, supposing each one yields $10,000 or $30,000, you see how it runs up. But I have an authority here that I am very glad to be able to use. Last night we had a speech from my hon. friend the member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), in which he condemned the Minister and the Government in language as strong as we ever used from this side. I call attention to what he said, not because he spoke against the Government, but because it is the language of a practical miner. He has lived among placer mines, he is a practical miner, and here is what my hon. friend for Alberta said:

I have heard it said repeatedly in the House that these men, having received an immense grant of land, will employ men to prospect, and having prospected it and got rich mines, they will work them to their own advantage, and that, therefore, instead of this land grant meaning less development, it means more development. That is a point I would like to discuss for a moment. In the first place, Mackenzie & Mann do not need to send one prospector into that country. There are a hundred thousand men in the Yukon or on the way to the Yukon, or preparing to start to the Yukon, and every one of those men, under the terms of this agreement, is a prospector for Mackenzie & Mann.

We have been sneered at for making the same statement by men who know nothing about placer mining. The hon. member for Toronto West (Mr. Osler) made the same statement, and hon. gentlemen on the Government benches were ready to sneer at it. But here is a practical man, a placer miner himself, a man who has lived most of his life amongst placer miners, and this is what the hon. member for Alberta further says:

If any man of that hundred thousand strikes a good claim anywhere in that Yukon country within the next nine years, Mackenzie & Mann, under this agreement, will get the advantage of that discovery. There is no question about that. They do not take the claim he has located, but after he has located a claim, they can "blanket" the surrounding country. Therefore, I say they do not need to employ a single individual, for every man who goes into that country is a prospector for them, and their expenditure on account of prospecting, as an addition to the trade of the country, may, therefore, be wiped off the slate.

Now, I want to give you another quotation, because I am sure it will be listened to with pleasure and with deference from the Government benches, because there is no man on the Government benches who knows as much about placer mining as the hon. member for Alberta. This is what a strong Liberal is forced to say, out of his knowledge of placer mining, about your precious contract :

It is not the area, but the right of selection. Or I will turn it the other way, and say that a grant of one hundred thousand acres in that country with the right of prior selection is a better thing for the party to whom it is granted than ten millions of acres to be taken arbitrarily without selection. The case of mining lands is different from that of agricultural lands. The gold of the Cariboo—some thirty or forty millions of dollars—was taken out of an area less, I believe, than one of the blocks that are to be granted to Mackenzie & Mann.

"Less than one of the blocks." Now make your calculation, and you will see that it rises up to millions. But what are millions? These gentlemen, like Onslow, like Ashburton, say: These lands we know nothing whatever about, they are worthless, we are not giving Mackenzie & Mann anything. They try in that way to throw dust in the eyes of their supporters, but let me say they are not throwing dust in the eyes of the country.

Now, if one block of three miles by six miles, or of six miles by twenty-four miles, is likely to contain, or may possibly contain, thirty millions of dollars which can be mined at a profit, it is clear that no company or organization requires a very large number of such areas in order to satisfy even the most rapacious in the matter of this world's wealth.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to say that the Minister of the Interior himself confesses incompetence. He declared to begin with: We all know exactly what we knew last session about the Yukon country, there is no dispute about it. If I recollect aright, the printed report was not brought down before the House prorogued; but he says it came down afterwards. But he says there was nothing in that report to give people an idea that so many persons would go into the Klondike. Now, Sir, what is the fact? He twitted the Minister of Railways with not having read the reports of his department. Now I have to twit him with one of two things, either with not having read the report, or with conveniently forgetting it. I have here the report of Mr. Ogilvie of November 6, 1896:

From all this we may, I think, infer that we have here a district which will give 1,000 claims of 500 feet in length each. Now, 1,000 such claims will require at least 3,000 men to work them properly, and as wages for working in the mines are from $8 to $10 per day without board, we have every reason to assume that this part of our territory will in a year or two contain 10,000 souls at least. For the news has gone out to the coast, and an unprecedented influx is expected next spring.

That was in his hands in November, 1896, and yet he tells us there was nothing in Mr. Ogilvie's reports that would justify him in expecting that large numbers were to flow in. Then he half remembers that there must be something like that, and he says that even if Mr. Ogilvie, who was there and who knew what the country was, did say that an unprecedented number would go in, would a Minister be justified in acting on that? Why not, Sir? Would not a competent Minister be justified in acting on it? If Mr. Ogilvie could say that, then with our knowledge of California, with our knowledge of Australia, is it not palpable to any sensible man that tens of thousands would be going into this Golconda? He says it is necessary to build that railway in a hurry because so many people are going in. He had to hurry up so much that he would not look out for better offers: the hurry was so great that he had to do this thing secretly. Now, if he was capable, if he was fit for his office he would have acted earlier. He had the evidence before him as far back as November, 1896, that that place would be inundated with people, that an unprecedented number would crowd there, yet he did not act. What reason does he give for not acting? He says:

Nobody dreamed of such a thing—

That such a lot of people would go in. And yet you have abundant evidence that they dreamed of it in the United States as far back as the beginning of 1897.

This is his language:

It is easy to be wise after the event.

It is surely not to hear such language that we pay a Minister of the Crown an annual salary of $7,000. A man who so describes himself here can be got for $700 a year.

And if the hon. gentleman can prove events backwards, and hold people responsible for not knowing what is going to happen in the future, then he can hold his political opponents responsible for a great deal, and it would be a very convenient matter of political argument. But I assert, Mr. Speaker, that there has not been one moment of delay in connection with any of the work devolving upon the Government of this country by the development of the Yukon district. I assert that the hon. gentleman can take the record of his party, he can look back over the history of the development of the great west, and he can find time after time when prompt action was required and no action was taken by that Government.

And so on. This argument is made simply to show that when the Conservative party were in office, they were as bad as hon. gentlemen opposite. Is that any justification? The hon. gentleman reveals himself in the language he thus uses and proves that he is not a competent man.

I want to deal with a very delicate matter. The hon. Minister devoted a lot of time to my friend Major Walsh. So good an appointment did I think that of Major Walsh that when he was appointed I wrote and congratulated him. I said that probably this was the only act the Minister would do which would please me, but I knew well he had selected a good man. The hon. gentleman has devoted much time to Major Walsh. But what did he do? He said—and it was not at all necessary to do it, and it is evidence of the want of candour which characterizes this whole scheme—that not only was Major Walsh eminently fitted for the position, which I entirely endorse, but he said and the hon. gentleman must have known the facts, because I am aware that he is very intimate with Major Walsh, that the Major made a great sacrifice by accepting $5,000 a year to go to the Yukon. I say here, without fear of being contradicted, that not only is that incorrect, but it is almost impossible that the hon. Minister did not know it to be incorrect. This is all I will say about the matter—it is part of the want of frankness which characterized his whole speech.

I put a question on the paper in the early part of the session in respect to the Edmonton route and the Prince Albert route, and I received an answer which was not very satisfactory. But I was very much disconcerted by the wave of the hand, the contemptuous wave with which the Minister treated the Edmonton route. This is what he said about it:

We can get across by way of Edmonton. I started a party of police that way before I went west myself, and they just got across the summit of the mountains the other day.

The true route is that by way of Prince Albert and Edmonton, because in that way the Government can build a railway which they can justify before the country, and at the same time they can develop the magnificent country along the Peace River. What time would it take to build a railway through from Edmonton? When I refer to the Prince Albert route, I may say that there is a point where the line from Prince Albert would join that from Edmonton, and thence the line would go forward by Peace River to the Yukon; thus when I mention the Prince Albert route I mean the Edmonton route as well. The true all-Canadian route, which would have retained the trade of the country to our own people and within our own borders, as my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) mentioned last night, is that route. I suppose it could not have been built so rapidly as this rag-tag tramway. But where would the difficulty have arisen? We are told there might be starvation in the Yukon. The hon. member for Alberta, who knows something of the western country—and I know something of the country also—says that is perfect nonsense. If there was the least danger of starvation the people would walk out of the country, just as some of them walked out during the present year. There is no foundation for that statement, or in fact for seven-eighths of the statements put forward for the purpose of justifying hon. members opposite in voting for this extraordinary and reckless contract. We could keep all the trade in Canada, and the money that would be spent by the miners would go into Canadian pockets, and the North-west would thereby be developed, Manitoba would likewise be developed, and Winnipeg, the great centre of Manitoba, and the gateway to the North-west, would be still further developed. Winnipeg instead of having a population of 30,000 would have 60,000 in a short time. I see the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) in his seat, and the hon. member when he came here from the west was very zealous in regard to this question, and I hope the blandishments of Ottawa have not changed him. I hope he has not been hypnotized by the blandishments of the capital, and that he still keeps the Winnipeg virtue which he brought with him a distance of 1,500 miles. If it has suffered deterioration it has occurred here, and I have seen in the past what the blandishments of Ottawa could do. I am proud, however, of the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), who has shown that he is made of sterner stuff, and that the blandishments of this city have not changed his opinion. I have here a sketch of the route to which I have referred, and I would be very glad to place it in the hands of hon. members; but I do not think it is necessary to refer to it further than to say this, that men who have gone over both routes declare that for a part water route you cannot have a better route than that by Prince Albert. There is also a water route from Edmonton to the point where it meets with the Prince Albert route. Along both routes not merely is there a ranching country but there is a gold producing country as well, and the construction of a railway would develop a farming and a gold-producing country. The line would pay well from the larger traffic over it, and by developing our North-west Territories we should secure for our merchants money which will otherwise be distributed among merchants over the line.

The route adopted by the Government, called an all-Canadian route, we have shown is not an all-Canadian route, and we have shown that this claim, like almost every other claim put forward by hon. gentlemen opposite, has no foundation. No doubt this railway will put some money into our mer-chants's pockets, but can it be supposed for a moment that the miners of Colorado and Oregon and those who arrive from Seattle and other American ports will buy their outfits in Canadian cities? No. They will buy them at the point of departure. There are companies in Chicago, Seattle, and in nearly every large city in the United States for supplying miners' outfit and sending men equipped to the Klondike, and the men are buying their outfits there. The bulk of produce will be brought in from Oregon and other States. I do not know how to characterize—a poppycock argument, a poor, petty contention, something contemptible for a Minister to use, that unless this line was built during the present year, the Yukon would probably pass out of the hands of the Government. Why should that occur? If they are going to the country without a railway, cannot they come out without railway facilities? This road is to be finished on 1st September. But it can only be run, according to the reports of Mr. Ogilvie and others, for one month after that time, because the river closes the 1st of October. In order to build this line, which can only be run for one month, we are to rush into millions of extravagance and into a reckless bargain that nothing could justify. Mark what I say. It will stamp this Liberal Administration with indelible disgrace, and it will stamp the Liberals in this House who vote for it with a disgrace that will bring punishment on them when they go back to their constituents. Sir, if the Liberals in this House have become dead to Liberalism and become the mummies of Liberalism, the Liberals of this country, outside of the walls of Parliament, are yet alive and understand what Liberal principles are.

The argument of the Minister of the Interior is: We are to build this line, and we are to spend 3,750,000 gold areas for the building of the line. Why are we to do this? It is, he tells us, so as to be able to bring provisions to men who go into that country. He says we may lose control over the Yukon, for there will be an alien population there, and so, according to his own hypothesis, in order to accommodate an alien population, who will carry away with them the vast wealth of the Klondike, we are to spend this money and to do this wrong act. Mr. Speaker, the whole contract is steeped in folly; the whole contract shows the greatest incapacity. It not only shows incapacity, but it shows governmental insincerity and indecision combined, and, if the contract be carried out, instead of our having in the Canadian treasury millions and millions from that Yukon country that would almost pay off our public debt if properly managed, there will be a further serious addition to the liabilities of our people. With the ridiculous and petty statesmanship into the hands of which Canada has fallen, we have lost a great opportunity for adding to our national wealth. There is nothing to be apprehended from our going on quietly in this matter. Let me for a moment, in connection with that insincerity which I have spoken of, point out where my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) was unjust to the engineer, Mr. Jennings. He spoke thus in misrepresentation of Mr. Jennings:

I need not say to the House that Mr. Jennings did not make what could be called a survey of a railway route, for he had no time to do anything of the kind.

Look at Mr. Jennings's report, and the first thing he tells you is this; he is addressing the very Minister who makes that statement, and he says:

Sir, in accordance with your desire for an interim report covering the examination of the country made by me for a highway or railway route between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake, I have the honour to report, &c., &c.

Mr. Jennings tells us that he made a railway survey, so that here you have the statement of the Minister discrediting his own engineer, actually falsified by what this engineer says in the first words of his report. That is a most serious thing, and I do not know, if such an exhibition of insincerity and incompetence has been seen before. I accuse the Minister (Mr. Sifton), first, of incompetence, because I will not accuse him of worse. If it is not incompetence, it is worse, and I accuse the Government of incompetence in condoning his offence, and if not incompetence, it is worse. The more you examine into this railway deal, the more objectionable it is. Look at the contract; look at all that surrounds it; look at the way all negotiations were avoided that might have saved us from this reckless bargain, and look at the way the Government conducts this debate. They are afraid to defend it; they make a spurt now and again, and then lose all heart. When crushing arguments are made from this side of the House, one Government supporter starts out and makes a fight, and then they get afraid. It is something like what used to occur, in the old days, before the walls of Troy. Timid warriors there shrank before the swift-footed Achilles, as timid warriors on the Government benches now shrink before the aged hero of debate on this side. It is now in this House as it was before Troy, one of the besieged starts out and then takes to his heels, once he sees the broad buckler and sword of his over-whelming opponent.

The present political situation reminds me of this. Some centuries ago, pirates swept every sea, and the great terror of them was, first, Spain, and afterwards, England. There was this peculiarity about the pirate ship, that the captain was not absolutely master. He had not, for instance, the authority over his crew that the captain of a man-of-war would have, because sometimes he would get a late captain more audacious than himself that would serve under him as a mate. Generally speaking, the captain understood how to sail the pirate ship, but sometimes he had men on board who thought themselves better seamen than he, or thought themselves vested with more force of character. There was no bond of law and authority, only that of plunder. Looking across the House, it seems to me that there is there something like what used to be witnessed on board the pirate ship. You have the first mate from Quebec, and the second mate from Manitoba, and now they have hoisted the black flag. I think that originally the captain had better intentions because I can never believe that the captain of that ship yonder would have originally allowed his men to bear down upon this magnificent galleon; no galleon that ever went out of Cadiz could compare with it in wealth.

What I would like to see, Sir, and what I hope to see is enough of public spirit in this country to send out a frigate or ship of war, like the rescuer of other days, floating an English flag, which will bear down upon the pirate ship, take her and her prize, and lead both safely to English justice, so that the pirates may be sent where they ought to be, which certainly would not be a place from which they could rule a country.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, at this late stage of the debate, I do not rise to participate at any great length in the discussion of the important measure placed before Parliament, and which has been so thoroughly threshed out on the floor of this House; but, as one of the representatives of one of the great eastern provinces, I feel it my duty, under the circumstances, when the best interests of the country are at stake, to give expression to my views, with no faltering voice. And at the very outset, Sir, I may say that if there is a fact upon which there exists a perfect consensus of opinion in this House, it is the absolute necessity of providing the earliest possible means of railway communication with the extensive gold fields of the Yukon region; and on that policy, Sir, I do not think there is a single dissentient voice in this House. I am free to say here that it would be a suicidal policy to neglect adopting every measure necessary not only to facilitate the access of the Canadian territory to those who are going to the Yukon, but also to put down in a prompt and efficacious manner the troubles and disorders which are of so frequent occurrence in mining districts. Should we not be lacking in public spirit ourselves were we to surrender with wantonness, by a policy of inaction, and allow to be diverted from us the immense trade to which the discovery of these gold fields will undoubtedly give a fresh impetus? Within a few days of the opening of Parliament it was stated in the public prints by pessimists that Parliament had been dethroned and had abdicated its powers, or rather that the Government had trampled under foot the franchises and privileges of Parliament, and why? Because the Mann-Mackenzie contract had been signed without our being consulted on the matter. Sir, if I read aright what is stated on the matter by writers on parliamentary government, I hold that the Government is simply a committee of this House, to which we delegate our powers. Now, the Government have thought it fit to agree to the proposals made to them by Mann & Mackenzie, on grounds to which I shall refer later on. Who can blame them for that? To believe that men of such high standing as the members of the Cabinet would deliberately sanction a corrupt bargain, is the height of absurdity. That the Government, consisting of honest men, should have considered it their duty, and a matter of urgency to agree to the proposals made to them, is no such extraordinary departure. Under such circumstances, when thousands of gold-seekers are preparing to wend their way into the Yukon region, what useful purpose, I ask, would an executive council serve, did they hesitate to assume the responsibility of a similar action, and prepare a measure like the Bill under discussion? But, Sir, at all events, the contract entered into by the Government, must be sanctioned by this House. The charges levelled against the Government, before the opening of the session, are now out of place. The people of this country now know that their representatives are free either to endorse or to reject this measure, according as they deem it favourable or contrary to the best interests of the country.

Previous to entering into the discussion of the contract on its merits, allow me, Sir, to offer a view of the matter which is quite personal. It is an opinion which may be disputed, but, I am sure it will command the respect even of those hon. gentlemen who do not subscribe to it. Upon an occasion like this, I cannot forget that the very men who opened up those immense territories of the North-west to civilization, were fellow-countrymen of mine from the province of Quebec. It was from the province of Quebec that went forth the missionaries, the trappers of the Hudson Bay Company, the chief factors of the North-west Company, and the voyageurs of old who were the first to venture across the prairies and to pitch their tents on the coast of the Pacific Ocean. Later on, among the hardy adventurers and explorers who wended their way into the Yukon region, are to be found again compatriots of mine, and if you look over the map of that country, you will find many French names of places such as Juneau, Labarge, Mercier, Ladue, which bear testimony to this fact. The measure now before the House, although it assumes a purely commercial form, aiming at connecting those northern territories with the rest of the country, is also, in my opinion, an official consecration of the pluck and heroism displayed by those pioneers of the great west. As the building of that railway was a matter of absolute necessity and urgency, it was necessary for the Government to make the best possible bargain with the contractors. Now, Sir, if we review the different provisions of this Bill, we will easily satisfy ourselves that it will greatly benefit the country.

In the first place, Sir, we are not called upon to vote a single cent of the people's money for the building of that railway. Now, on that ground alone, and let me add that it is an unprecedented fact in our political record that a railway was built without involving us in debt—on that ground alone, I say, irrespective of all other considerations, I feel warranted in supporting this measure. I stand here to say, Sir, that it would be most unfair to impose any more taxes on the rate-payers of the Dominion, and specially on the taxpayers of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, for the building of this Yukon railway, for I think, Sir, you will agree with me in saying that we have dealt most liberally by the North-west, within these twenty-five years past. Not only have we made large outlays for the purpose of developing those provinces, but we even went to the length of depriving ourselves, for their benefit, of many public improvements of an urgent character. I speak with knowledge, for the county of Gaspé, which I have the honour of representing in this House, with a population of twenty-five thousand inhabitants, is still without any railway communication; and I may further say, that the south shore of the St. Lawrence, with its great agricultural possibilities, and where are to be found some of the oldest and most prosperous settlements of Canada, is also deprived of railway facilities. As I said, it would be most unfair to add to our public debt, even for the purpose of building a railway into the Klondike, after we have made so great outlays for the development of the North-west, to the prejudice of the other provinces. Therefore, I congratulate the Government for their having solved this problem without committing the credit of the country to the expenditure of a single dollar. In my opinion, the Klondike ought to pay for the Klondike.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentlemen opposite and the Conservative press have been loud in their denunciations of the Government for having granted to Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie those gold-bearing lands. I take it for granted that the people of the older provinces of the Dominion would have condemned any action of the Government, involving the increase of the public debt and charges for the building of this railway; and I take it also for granted, in view of our past record in connection with all the great public works carried on under the various Administrations that have succeeded each other—

Mr. LEMIEUX.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). (Translation.) Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) I take it for granted, I say, that had the Government recklessly undertaken to build this railway, their action would have involved an expenditure of at least seven or eight million dollars of the people's money. Under the circumstances, Sir, I hold that it was the bounden duty of the Government to indemnify the contractors by means of a land subsidy. The hon. gentlemen opposite have vied with each other in giving exaggerated estimates of the value of the gold-bearing lands granted to Mackenzie & Mann, but I must confess that some Conservative papers have capped the climax in their fanciful valuation of those auriferous lands. I happened to hear, the other day, my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) indulging in similar fantastical estimates with regard to this land subsidy. The facility with which the hon. gentleman launches out into the most extravagant statements is no longer a matter of surprise to me. The hon. gentleman is a brilliant scholar, and, owing to his alertness of mind, he readily assimilates the literary food with which he regales himself. He has, no doubt, read Alphonse Daudet's famous novel, "Tartarin de Tarascon," a masterpiece of French literature, which brought a fortune to its author, and has been translated into several languages. The hero of this novel is a typical good-natured child of the south of France, with his fancy and brain overheated by a burning sun. My hon. friend, in my opinion, is very nearly related to Daudet's hero. He is the north-western Tartarin, and if his extravagant estimate of the land subsidy granted to Mackenzie & Mann cannot be accounted for by the influence of the sun over his overheated fancy, I will venture to ascribe it to the golden rays of the Klondike. Here is an extract from "La Presse":

THE YUKON AND ITS MINERAL WEALTH—
MR. OGILVIE'S REPORT.

"If the indications now known are worth anything at all, they are worth from sixty to seventy millions of dollars in those two creeks (Eldorado and Bonanza). Taking this division as a whole, including the three creeks named, affluent to Indian Creek, a district some thirty-five miles in length and twenty-five or more miles in width, if the indications can be relied on, there are one hundred million dollars in sight in this area."

What is given to Mackenzie & Mann is the pick of nearly four million acres of lands, or seven times more than the area which, judging from the indications, is likely to yield one hundred million dollars.

Therefore, according to the estimate of "La Presse," the gift made by the Government to Mackenzie & Mann amounts to seven hundred million dollars. I must honestly confess to my astonishment at these fantastical figures. But what "La Presse" refrains from saying, the better to arouse popular prejudices against the Government, is that Mr. Ogilvie's approximate valuation applies but to one particular district, and that the gold-bearing claims of that area are already located by the thousands of miners who have invaded it. Mann & Mackenzie will therefore find themselves on a footing of equality with free miners, and will have to run as much risk as the others do. For my part, I hope that the brilliant vistas which are keeping the eyes of the whole world riveted on the Klondike, will materialize; but, on the other hand, there is not a man in his senses who will not agree that in the discoveries of all those wonderful Eldorados, one must make a pretty large allowance for the figments of fancy. At all events, it ill becomes the Conservative party to find fault with the Government of the day for parting with their lands in favour of Mackenzie & Mann, especially in view of their past action in committing the credit of the country to an enormous expenditure for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway across the continent. And how many million acres of land did not the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) ask the House to vote in 1881 in favour of that ogre, the Canadian Pacific Railway? I make bold to tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that by their action in so liberally subsidizing that company, they have created, not only a huge monopoly, but a vast landed aristocracy, which brings us back to the palmy days of feudalism, and to which the North-west farmers are bound to pay homage and fealty. The lands granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway are daily increasing in value, and constitute for the future an abundant source of income to their owners, while the Yukon lands, on the contrary, can only be said to offer indications of gold. But when the gold has been extracted from these lands, or rather from those glaciers, the resources of that country will have been exhausted.

Mackenzie & Mann, we are told, are going to make a good speculation, being on the point of selling their grant on the English market. Should they do so, what of it? Should the contract prove less beneficial to the country for all that? Whether this rumour is well grounded or not I do not know, but one thing I know, from my past experience of the English people, and my daily intercourse with them, from the knowledge I have of their history and literature—for I am a regular reader of the English newspapers, I am free to say that there is not on the face of the earth a more conservative, a more practical and prudent class of people, from a business standpoint, and as they know how to give and take, I doubt whether Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann will find in England any capitalists ready to buy their lands, when they have read the onerous conditions contained in the contract; for it is expressly stipulated that it is only upon the completion of any ten miles of their railway, and after it is in running order, that they will have the right to select their lands; then only will they be allowed to select a certain number of claims. Besides, the contractors will become entitled to their lands but on the first of September, provided their road is completed and inspected and approved by the Government. Sir, I believe I am but voicing the feelings of my hon. colleagues from the province of Quebec, when I say that I approve, conjointly with them, this contract, as it stands, because it secures to the country an all-Canadian route. We are thus creating a national route, making of Canada the base of supplies for the intending miners, and enabling our manufacturers, our workmen and our merchants to secure the immense traffic to which a fresh impetus will be given for several years to come by the enormous tide of population flowing into that region. For it may be stated, without any exaggeration, that at least 100,000 miners will be wending their way into the Klondike within a year, and it is easy to see how this exodus towards the gold fields of the Klondike will swell the volume of our trade.

It has been stated across the floor of this House that the Government of the United States were going to create difficulties of every description in order to prevent us from navigating that portion of the Stikine River which flows through their territory. I do not think those fears are well founded. Were those predictions to materialize, who ought to be held responsible for that state of things? Ought not the blame for such action on the part of the United States authorities to be laid on the hon. gentlemen opposite who, within the last fifteen years, have been so loud-mouthed in their professions of loyalty before the people of this country? Should we not, on good grounds, call to a bitter account the hon. gentlemen for the line of action adopted by their leaders? Should we not be warranted in stigmatizing the blamable indifference shown by Sir John Macdonald and the other British plenipotentiaries in neglecting to revive in the Washington Treaty certain clauses of the Anglo-Russian Treaty of 1825? Let us hope, however, that the fears entertained by the hon. gentlemen will prove groundless, and let me offer to the House the reasons on which I ground my opinion. According to all the authorities on international law, the right of navigating rivers and water-courses as a means of communication and commerce is grounded upon natural law itself; and further, nothing that so far has transpired in our intercourse with the neighbouring republic goes to show that they are willing to strain our mutual relations of good fellowship. But, Sir, if we took stock in the rumours that have been afloat in the air, from the very outset of this debate, it was rather from within Parliament instead of from the outside, that we were to look for the enemy, in connection with this Yukon railway. The Senate, we are told, is going to block the Bill which will undoubtedly be put through this House, by taking upon themselves the responsibility of preventing Canada from getting the earliest possible means of railway communication with the Klondike. Should the Senate decline to ratify this measure, our manufacturers and our business men will see the immense traffic of the Yukon district diverted from us, to the enrichment of the people of the United States. And were the majority in the Senate, by an abuse of their power, to go against the will of the people, I say, without hesitation, that they would defeat the policy of the fathers of confederation, thus setting up an absolute and tyrannical power, and their usefulness would soon have ceased. I think, Sir, this debate should now come to a close, as the agitation created around this issue ought to be given its quietus, now that the provincial elections in Ontario are over. For it is a well-known fact that if this agitation has been kept up so long by the hon. gentlemen opposite, it was only for the purpose of inflaming public opinion against the Hardy Cabinet. But now that the struggle is over, I fail to understand why they keep it up. The attitude adopted by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) bears a striking resemblance to the position assumed by another leader of the Opposition in the British House of Commons, who lived at the time when Palmerston was Prime Minister of England. When asked by his followers what charge they should level at the Ministry, he invariably answered, "Gentlemen, the time has come when we must advertise for a grievance." Now, the hon. leader of the Opposition has also advertised for a grievance. It cannot be said that he had advertised for it at the beginning of the session, as he did formally and strongly approve of the action taken by the Government. But his followers have since reminded him, in the words of the old leader of the Opposition in the British House of Commons, that the time had come for him to advertise for a grievance. The hon. gentleman has since advertised for a grievance, but the grievance he has formulated is an offspring of his fancy, prompted by disappointment, and it is not likely to find an echo in the country.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, coming as I do from a rural district in the province of Ontario, I can say that the feeling of the people on questions of this kind is so strong in the older parts of that province against the granting of bonuses, that the local candidate in the Liberal interest recently found it necessary to put in his address the statement that he would oppose any bonus proposed for a railway, no matter what effect it would have upon the Government of the day. I do not take quite so strong ground as that against bonuses, because I quite understand that there may be times and places where railways ought to be built for the purpose of developing the country, and to which it would be right and proper to give a bonus; but, Sir, I do not think it is right and proper to give a whole country almost, or a very large section of country, for the building of 150 miles of railway. I happened to be in the House when the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) introduced this Bill, and I was very greatly surprised at the position he took on that occasion. He admitted that he had information even before Parliament rose last session that large finds of gold had been made in the Yukon district; and it has come out since that there was information in the Department of the Interior as long ago as the 16th of March, 1897, that there had been a great discovery of gold in that district. Now, Sir, it seems to me very strange that the Government, being in possession of these facts, took no notice of them. After the close of the session the Prime Minister went to England. That was right, because he went there as our representative at the Jubilee of Her Majesty the Queen. But I believe three other Ministers went to England during the recess. We had the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who had to go there to make a loan. Then we had the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), who had to go there to try to convince the people of England that the preferential clauses of the tariff applied only to the people of England; but he came back having fully convinced the people of England that the preferential clauses of our tariff applied to all the world except the United States and a very few other nations. Then, the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) had occasion to go to England, it is said, to get rid of office-hunters. He was so harassed and embarrassed by those people that he found it necessary to leave the country.

The most astonishing thing about this Bill, to my mind, is that when the Government found that they wanted to build a railroad in that country, they took no precautions to get the necessary information. In my judgment, as soon as this great discovery became known to them, it was their duty to send their engineers to that country to get an estimate of what a railway would cost, to ascertain where it should be built, and as far as possible to get an estimate of the value of the land in the country. I think it would have been well for them also to have made their information public, so that other gentlemen who are in the habit of contracting for the building of railways would also have sent out their engineers so as to be in a position to make offers to the Government. But, Sir, it appears that only one firm got the hint. How they got it I do not know. But Mr. Mackenzie, in an interview which he gave to the press in the city of Winnipeg, said that they had information about that country, that it had cost them a great deal of money to get it, and that he did not think any man would blame him or his partner for not giving it to the world. I think he was right; but I think the Government were very wrong in not obtaining that information and in not putting this work up to tender, so that there would be competition, and there would be a fair chance of getting several offers. If they had done that, they would have had some reason on which to justify themselves before the people; because if there was anything on which hon. gentlemen prided themselves and as to which they found fault with their opponents when they were in Opposition, it was that everything should be done by open tender. I think that is a good principle. I think every public work should, as far as possible, be let by tender. But the Minister of Railways ridiculed this idea. "Is it not idle," he said, "under such circumstances, to talk about inviting public tenders to carry on such a work?" That is astonishing to me. I do not think anybody would be astonished at the Government asking contractors to tender to build a railway or any other public work. Then he gives the reason. He says: "Why, we did not know what to offer. If we offered 5,000 acres per mile, that would be perhaps too little, and if we offered 50,000 acres per mile, that would be too much; and we really did not know what to do." Now, it really does seem to me to be a matter of common sense, that any man might have written an advertisement stating that the Government were prepared to receive offers for the building of a railway, and that they would give a bonus in land for that purpose. If they had done this I am satisfied they would have got plenty of tenders. If the hon. Minister of Railways was not able to ask for tenders of that kind because he did not know what quantity of land to offer, what position was he in to make a bargain with the contractors when they came to him? He pretended that he had no knowledge of the value of the land, and consequently he was at the mercy of the gentlemen with whom he dealt privately; and that is one of the worst features of the case. He simply says: "Yes, it is absolutely a gamble, nothing more and nothing less." That is, to my mind, a very strange statement for any Minister of the Crown to make. I do not think the people of this country want their business done in that way. I think we want straight business. We do not want Ministers of the Crown to gamble in our property. We are willing to pay a fair price for what we want done; but we want to be in a position to know what is a fair price before we give the job; and it seems to me that the Government, with the facilities they have at their disposal, might easily know. The Minister of Railways also said that there had come no estimate under his eye as to what a railway would cost in that country;

yet he comes down to this House with a Bill that proposes to give away 25,000 acres per mile to build a railway. He says: "I do not know whether that is too much or too little; it is purely a gamble, and that is the way we are doing the business of this country." Well, Sir, I do not approve of that at all, and I do not believe my constituents would approve of it. Then, Sir, when we come to the contract, if there is one thing the Liberal party fought in this House, it was the monopoly that was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway in the North-west; but what do they do here? They give Mackenzie & Mann a monopoly of this railway for five years, during which time no other person will be allowed to build a railway into that country. Besides that, they fix the rates for ten years. There shall be no alteration in the rates for the first four years; then there shall be a drop of 25 per cent; then they will run for three years more, and then there will be another drop of 25 per cent. At the end of seven years they will be carrying freight for half the price they got at the beginning. That seems to me a very extraordinary thing. It seems to indicate that they must be getting at the start about double what they ought to get, or else they will not be able at the end of seven years to carry freight over that road at half the price. Then, it is pointed out on all sides that at the beginning they will have more work than they can do. There is another difficulty. What is to hinder Mackenzie & Mann saying "We made a contract to carry freight beyond our capacity." They may say, we may just as well make $100 a ton on the freight as carry it for $25 or $50. What is to hinder them? There is to be no competition, the Government will not allow anybody else to build a railway there, and the whole public will be at the mercy of this monopoly. Now, I am entirely opposed to a monopoly. Of course, I know my Liberal friends opposite will say that is very curious for a National Policy man, but it is the fact none the less. I find that there are as many National Policy men on the other side of the House as on this, because they have apparently changed their tactics entirely, but those hon. gentlemen who were in the House at the time knew full well what an agitation there was in the North-west against the monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and we know how time and again the late Sir John Macdonald was put in a very embarrassing position because he was not able to do away with that monopoly. And how did we get rid of it? By the Government of the Dominion guaranteeing the interest on the bonds of the Canadian Pacific Railway for $15,000,000, and I think it was fortunate we got out so easy, because, so far as I know, we have not been called upon to pay a dollar. But that was due entirely to the good management and tact of the leader of the Government, Sir John Macdonald, who watched his opportunity and took advantage of the signs of the times.

Then these contractors will have the right to select whatever lands they see fit in that country. Now, I think that the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) made the other day a very forcible speech and put the matter about right when he said that Mackenzie & Mann will, under this contract, have all the gold mines worth having in that country. He said more than that, and I think he said so truthfully, that they would not only have all the gold mines worth having, but would not have to spend a dollar in sending out prospectors, because if there is to be 100,000 men going into that country this year, as hon. gentlemen opposite say there will, these people will all be prospectors. or the great bulk of them at any rate will be looking for mines, and just as soon as one of them makes a discovery, Mackenzie & Mann will have an agent on the spot to gobble it up. Is that in the interests of the poor miners who are working for their living and who go out there in the hope of making a strike?

Nor is that all. The first thing that a poor miner has to do is to pay $10 for a license. That is the first thing he has to do in order to be able to prospect. If anything should happen that license, if he should happen to lose it, he has to pay $2 for a duplicate, which makes $12 for the first license. In addition he has to pay an annual rental of $15 before he can work his claim. That makes $25, and then he has to pay a royalty of 10 per cent on all the gold he takes out. How does he stand in comparison with Mackenzie & Mann? These gentlemen get this large amount of land and do not have to pay any rental or any miner's fee, or any license fee, nor have they to pay any 10 per cent on what they find. They simply have to pay a royalty of one per cent. I recollect the time when these hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches and the gentlemen behind them pretended to be great friends of the workingman. How many times did they shed tears over the hard lot of the workingman and lead us to believe that if only they reached the Treasury benches, the public would see what they would do for the working classes. They would have no more monopolies, they would not help the rich to grind the poor, they would not give the rich any special rights or advantages. But, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to see that in this, as in most other of their promises, they have entirely failed to practice what they preach.

The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), whom I do not see in his place, seems to have had more to do with framing the policy of this Government than anybody else. It is said that he framed the tariff, and if that be the case, he did pretty well because he kept the Government pretty close to National Policy lines. That hon. gentleman says it is against the policy of the Government to give land grants in agricultural sections for building railways. I fail to see any difference myself in the principle, and I should say that mineral lands are much more valuable than agricultural lands, especially if they are nearly so rich as those are reported to be. But these gentlemen do not always stick to giving lands—sometimes they give money. We all recollect how last session the Crow's Nest Pass Railway scheme was put through the House in the dying days of the session. We also know how these gentlemen, when in Opposition, used to deplore the unfairness of bringing down in the dying days of the session great railway bonuses, but it seems that in this they have followed the example of their predecessors, and in the dying hours of last session they brought down a bonus of $3,630,000 for the Crow's Nest Pass and forced it through the House.

There is one great virtue which they claim for this particular route, namely, that it is a purely Canadian route. If it were, I would feel much better towards it than I do, but if it be an all-Canadian route why all this worry about the unloading at Fort Wrangel and putting the goods into river boats. I think that that is the best evidence this is not an all-Canadian route, and if we are to believe what we read in the papers, the Government are going to have a good deal of trouble in getting their goods from Fort Wrangel up to the Stikine River. I would much prefer, as far as I am concerned—I do not know if the party on this side would agree with me—seeing the railway built through the North-west from Edmonton, and I will tell you the reason. A good many people will go to that country, if we are to believe hon. gentlemen opposite, who will not make a success of mining, who will lose what money they took with them, and not be able to remain in that country, because it is not a farming country. But if they went in through our own North-west, those people might locate on our lands or settle in our towns and villages and work, for other people, and in that way we would be able to keep them in our own country and the expenditure would not be in vain. I am strongly of opinion that this route is not in the best interests of this country, especially if it is to be, as represented by the Government, simply a temporary railway with a three-foot gauge. Somebody said that the rails are to be old rails that were in use thirty years ago and were laid away to rust. I hope that this is not true, and that if we are to have a railway it will be a better one than that.

The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) wonders how the Government made so good a bargain. He said he was astonished at the contractors signing the contract without having been given the right to select the lands before they did anything towards building the railway, because people will go in and gobble up the best land and these contractors will only have to take what is left. I should have been sorry had that happened, because I think it is enough to pay a man after he has earned the money, instead of paying him in advance. Besides, it is so different from anything the Liberal party has ever advocated. The Minister of the Interior displayed a map showing how much land had been granted to railways, and declared that this policy had kept settlers away, and had been a great disadvantage to the North-west. That was one of the stock arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite, when in Opposition. Now they are pursuing the very course which they then condemned. We are told that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann cannot get this land until the railway has been completed and accepted by the Government. But, as soon as they build ten miles of the railway, over 92,000 acres is set apart for them, and as each additional ten miles are finished they get another 92,000 acres. They do not get a deed of it, but what is the difference? Nobody else has the right to go upon it, to lay out claims upon it, or take possession of it in any way. Then, hon. gentlemen opposite, to make this contract seem more reasonable, belittle that country. But Mr. Dawson tells us that last year two and a half million dollars in gold was taken out of these mines. Then, I wish to refer to a few items from Mr. Ogilvie's report, just to show that this contract is not the matter of pure speculation it is represented to be by hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. Ogilvie says that we have 1,400 miles of streams in our part of the system, upon all of which gold can be found. Fourteen hundred miles of gold-bearing lands on the creeks, and yet they say this is a matter of simple speculation. Again, Mr. Ogilvie tells us of meeting a man who had been a miner for twenty-five years in California and British Columbia, and who said he had never seen a country so rich in gold. Not only that, but the statement has been quoted in this House, that there was $100,000,000 of gold in sight in a certain district of 35 miles square or thereabouts. Still, these hon. gentlemen are willing to give 25,000 acres a mile for building this railway, which will be a very ordinary work and, we are told, will be only a temporary railway. They say that this work will cost a total of 3,750,000 acres. But they cannot speak with certainty of that, because they do not know the length of the railway. It is reported that it will be 208 miles, instead of 150 miles. For my part, I am decidedly opposed to doing business in this way. The duty of the Government, before they let a contract like this before us, was to make themselves fully acquainted with the facts of the case. They should have known what the railway would cost. They should have taken time by the forelock, and made these investigations, instead of going off holidaying, as they did last summer. They should have had engineers report the state of the country and give estimates of the cost. Had this been done, they would not have been at the mercy of one or two men and reduced to saying that they could not find any others. It was a state secret that they were looking for offers, I believe, until this contract was signed. It was, as far as I am concerned. The first intimation I had of it was when I saw the "Globe," with a whole side filled with the report that a great contract had been signed to build a railway into that country without costing the people a cent, the contractors taking land that was comparatively worthless, land that nobody else wanted. But the Government think so much of this land that they will not allow anybody to go there unless he pays $10 for a license: they will not let him work unless he pays $15 rent, and that he has to pay every year, and besides all that, he must pay 10 per cent of what he makes. And this is the land that they say is no good. Even if my party were in power and made such a bargain as this, with this immense grant of land and these monopoly clauses, with all this—I will not say, trickery; I do not mean to be offensive—but all this want of care for the public interest, I would not support it. I say it is a shame, and I hope there will be enough members on the other side who will feel that country must be placed above party, to prevent this measure going through. Just as in the case of the National Policy, hon. gentlemen opposite thought of the country and were willing that the people should blame them for not keeping their promises, than to give the country the free trade they had promised, I hope it will be the same in this case, and that the feeling among those behind the Government will compel them to greatly change this measure.

Mr. SEMPLE. I should hardly have said a word on this occasion, were it not that a statement had been industriously circulated that the Liberal party lost votes in the last election in Ontario because of the measure that is now before this House, and therefore the local Government is not responsible. I think that, as the returns come in, it will be found that the Reform party has as many supporters in the present House as they had in the last one. I was in Wellington for three or four days during the campaign. In the south riding of Wellington, at the Dominion election, a Conservative was returned by over 100 majority; now a Liberal has a majority of nearly four hundred. In the other Wellingtons there were larger majorities than before. During the campaign, I never heard the question of this Bill mentioned. I will say to the hon. member for Lennox (Mr. Wilson), that if it was discussed in Lennox, it was not to the advantage of the Conservative party.

Mr. WILSON. May I put the hon. gentleman right? What I said was, that the candidate in the Liberal interest had to say in his address that he was opposed to bonuses, before he could stand any chance of being elected, and he did it.

Mr. SEMPLE. I had not reference to the speech of the hon. member from Lennox, but to those of other hon. gentlemen.

Mr. WILSON. You mentioned my name.

Mr. SEMPLE. Some are apt to look at matters in a visionary way; they seem to have two kinds of spectacles, one to magnify and the other to make smaller what they see. It is through these spectacles that hon. gentlemen opposite seem to regard the different phases of this question. For instance, the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney) computed the value of the timber on lands granted to the company at $400,000,000. I find that the agricultural lands in the whole province of Ontario are valued, in round numbers, at $572,000,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the Klondike, and millions, and hundreds of millions as if they were talking of so many units. When a man is going to exaggerate, he might as well do it on a generous scale.

Now, with regard to the construction of the Glenora and Teslin Lake Railway, many reasons lead me to believe it will cost a large amount of money. For instance, I see that an English company, of which the leader of the Opposition is the chief manager in this country, advertised to take passengers from Vancouver or Victoria, with 400 pounds of luggage, for $500, and I see at the present time contractors are engaging labourers for the Crow's Nest Pass Railway at $1.75 per day, taking them to that section of the country and bringing them back. I have heard from very good authority, from men who have been out in the Klondike, that the wages of labourers working in the mines run as high as $10 a day, and I have even heard it stated that sometimes $15 a day are paid. So, if this company are going to reap a rich harvest, they will still have to pay for the construction of the railway an enormous amount of money in wages. Suppose, for instance, that the cost of constructing that road is $3,750,000, that is just equivalent to selling all that land at $1 per acre. If it costs to build the road $7,500,000, it will be $2 an acre; if it costs, as it is reasonable to believe, $10,000,000, it will be nearly $3 an acre for the land. I think that from $1 to $3 per acre would be a very good price for that land of gold and eternal frost. We learn from the official reports that there are 125,000 square miles, or eighty million acres of land, of which the contractors are to receive for building the railway about one-twentieth, or 5 per cent. They will have one part, and the Dominion of Canada will have 19 parts, and they will have the railway to develop 95 per cent of the lands which the contractors cannot claim. Now, Sir, it is a known fact that the United States purchased the adjoining territory of Alaska, that is rich in gold, rich in timber, rich in harbours, for $7,200,000, or about 2 1-10 cents per acre. Mr. Ogilvie, in his report, informs us that the number of miners who go out to the Klondike know best where to find gold, and the many thousands that locate claims cannot be disturbed or the contractors claim any land until ten miles of the road is built. Whenever the company do make a location, the Government have the alternate section. Therefore if it is good for the contractors, it will also be good for the country. The more trade there is, the more duty will be paid into the treasury. Indeed the country is already beginning to derive a benefit from that region, because I see that on the Pacific Coast business is brisk, large returns are coming in, and everything points in the direction that if the road is built, it will certainly help the trade of this country. Any person who has read about placer mining knows that in no place has it lasted for any great length of time. I remember hearing about the California gold fields, the Australia gold fields, the Cariboo gold fields, the West Africa gold fields, the Rainy River gold fields. Who did not hear about a year ago of the enormous riches there were in Rossland? How many thousands of dollars have been invested there which are lost, for which there will never be any return? Gold is something that seems to attract individuals, people have gone crazy looking after the yellow metal. It is indeed doubtful whether many will make their fortunes in the Yukon district; that is something that remains to be seen. The contractors, Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, have to take great risk. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) was honest enough, when speaking last evening, to say that the investors might be at a loss, but he supposed the company would be secure. I may say that during the recess I had considerable conversation with intelligent and thoughtful people, and they were very much gratified that there was to be no increase of the public debt. We know that during the last session a large amount was voted for the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, a large amount was also voted for the Rainy River district. With the rich timber and the rich mines in those places, there was something to justify those votes, because we knew that the mineral industry in British Columbia was increasing, that miners had set their faces towards British Columbia, and it was necessary that a road should be built in that region in order to have the minerals smelted at a cheaper rate, and encourage the increase of population which is desired by all parties. Although the Government gave a large amount, provision was made that the coal in that section of the country should be relieved from the grasp of those likely to form monopolies; there was an agreement that only a certain amount should be charged for coal. I think it is really refreshing to hear some hon. gentlemen talk about the great monopoly to be enjoyed by Mackenzie & Mann in their contract with the Government. We are told these contractors are relieved from the competition of any road from American territory to tap the traffic that they will enjoy on their road. Why, Sir, these hon. gentlemen who are speaking against monopolies have been castigating their own predecessors. Who does not remember the gigantic monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway, a monopoly that was granted for twenty years, and no change can be made in the tolls on that road? It is true, a change can be made if their earnings amount to 10 per cent, but the company will manage things in such a way that they can never be touched by the Government. It is refreshing to hear those hon. gentlemen speak of a monopoly, who have been for many long years endorsing such a monopoly as the Canadian Pacific Railway, endorsing the cotton monopoly, the sugar monopoly, and a great many others too numerous to mention, besides granting over 39,000,000 acres of land for to encourage railway construction. It is also worth noting, that when the leader of the Opposition was interviewed by a representative of the press, he clearly expressed himself as in favour of the action of the Government in the present bargain; but when he comes among the politicians they say that won't do, that he must oppose the contract, and he has yielded. It often happens that the leader of a great party leads that party, but in this case it is the party that leads the leader. But with all his ability, he now finds himself in a very awkward position. Whatever he may think on his own account, he is told that he must carry out the wishes of his friends as expressed in the caucus.

In the future, when the leader of the Opposition makes a statement on any question, it may be asked whether there is not danger that a certain amount of discount must be taken from the expression of opinion given. I believe if hon. gentlemen opposite had not had a bad case they would not have talked so long; they have dealt with so many subjects that their wanderings have been similar to the wanderings of the streams in the Yukon or of the Trent Valley Canal. Of course, if they had had a good case, they would have delivered shorter speeches, but during this debate they have dealt with many topics foreign from the subject of debate. It has been said that hon. members on this side of the House cannot defend the present contract. I hope I shall never be in a position when I cannot defend such a contract as this, and I certainly can defend the action of the Government in securing the building of a railway and giving one-twentieth of the territory benefited by it for the purpose of paying the cost of its construction and at the same time developing the country. The whole discussion has been conducted by hon. gentlemen opposite in the dark, and no doubt if they had possessed more information their speeches would not have been so long, but they will have no effect in the country which they seem to confidently expect; they think they will be heard for their much speaking. I am glad that the Government have taken this step to develop the Yukon country out of its own resources, and not add one cent to the already heavy taxes borne by the ratepayers of the Dominion.

Mr. CAMPBELL. At this time of the evening, I do not intend to occupy more than a few minutes of the time of the House. The subject under discussion has been so fully ventilated that nothing new can be said about it; but as it is a very important one, I do not feel like allowing the opportunity to pass without giving expression to the views I hold in regard to it. For let me say, that I have been struck with the extraordinary statements made by previous speakers and to the extravagant language used in describing the proposed Yukon Railway. It has been described as a monstrous bargain, unparalleled in the history of this or any other country, that the transaction is unequalled in the history of any country, that the subsidy given is greater than that ever before allotted. One hon. member went on to say that the duty of the Government was not to build the road as proposed, but the Government should itself build it; that they should have given liberally and handsomely and enormously from the resources of the country to construct the railway. Then the debate is peculiar in another way, as to the subjects that have been dragged into it. We have had the Drummond Counties Railway, the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, the Dawson Railway, and we have even had the Manitoba school question brought up in this discussion, as well as the Ontario elections. All these things are foreign to the subject under consideration, and certainly have very little to do with it. But the Government deserves credit for the manner in which they have conducted the affairs of this country, I say, and I do so without fear of contradiction, that never was there a Government in this or any other country that has made such a grand record since it assumed office. It has been a bold and progressive Government, a Government capable of managing the affairs of this Dominion. The very moment the Ministers came into office they had to face a question that had engaged the attention of the House for a whole week, and that wrecked the former Government. They took hold of it in a businesslike and statesmanlike way and settled the question to the satisfaction of all men in this country, and there is not a man on the Opposition side of the House who dare rise in his place and move a motion of censure for the manner in which they have settled it. They brought up a question that should have been settled ten years ago, and that was the extension of the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal. There never was a measure brought before Parliament that should have received the commendation of every practical man more heartily than the proposed extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal. If the late Government had the proper instincts of a government they would never have allowed that great railway, which cost the people of the Dominion $50,000,000, and which has ran behind from $300,000 to $500,000 annually for a number of years, to stop where it did, with the great metropolis of Montreal within a short distance; and this Government, recognizing the requirements of the country, recognizing the duty devolving on them, saw that the only method of wiping out the deficit on the Intercolonial was to do that which any railway company would have done ten years ago, secure an extension to Montreal; and accordingly they made a bargain which I hold should receive the commendation of the whole people of Canada. Hon. gentlemen may compare the transaction with what other railways do, and they will find in every case that the bargain made by the Government to secure the extension of the Intercolonial was a wise and prudent one, and was for the general interest of Canada. Take the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That company wanted to extend their line from Toronto to Buffalo. They gave the Grand Trunk Railway $40,000 a year to run over thirty-nine miles to Hamilton. Take the Wabash system. It sought an extension from Detroit to Suspension Bridge. Its line ended at Detroit, and the company wanted the privilege of running to Buffalo by way of Suspension Bridge. Of course, they could have built an independent line; but for power to run over 229 miles they have paid the Grand Trunk Company $229,000 each year. More than that: they give the Grand Trunk Railway 75 per cent of all the local freight on their road. That is what other railway companies have done. By the agreement submitted to the House last session the Government acquired equal rights to run into Montreal and use the terminal facilities of the Grand Trunk Railway, and acquired the Drummond County road, all for the sum of $210,000. There never was a bargain brought forward in this country or in any other, that should more heartily receive the commendation than the proposed Intercolonial extension to Montreal. Before the road had ran into Montreal for a period of five years the profits from the extension would pay off the $210,000, and probably leave a balance of $300,000 or $400,000. This subject has been brought up during the present discussion, and the measure was opposed last session for a great many days. Hon. members will remember the hue and cry that was raised by the Opposition because this bargain was made. The phrase was hurled across the House and it seemed to roll under the tongue of the ex-Finance Minister that we had by one fell stroke increased the public debt by $7,000,000. We had agreed to pay $210,000 a year for running over 176 miles of railway. This extension, however, would not only pay for itself, but yield a profit, I believe, of $300,000 or $400,000—yet hon. gentlemen opposite told the House and the country that this Government had increased the public debt by $7,000,000.

Then when this Government saw the great possibilities of the Kootenay country, they seized the situation, built the Crow's Nest Pass Railway with energy and diverted to Canadian channels the trade of that great district which otherwise would have gone to the Americans south of the line. Like statesmen and business men the Government provided for the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and vast benefits will accrue to Canada from that undertaking.

Another new phase of development took place this year in the Yukon region, and the Government was again prompt to formulate a progressive policy. If the Government had not taken prompt measures to secure railway communication to the Yukon, disastrous consequences would have occurred next year, and the Government would have been charged, and I believe rightly charged, with dereliction of their duty. I need hardly discuss that phase of the question because the leader of the Opposition has admitted the necessity for prompt measures being taken to secure transportation facilities there; and the hon. gentleman has also agreed that the route selected by the Government is the best route available at the present time, so that these two questions may be dismissed from our considerations. There consequently remains only the question: Is the bargain a good one? Admitting that the road was necessary, and admitting that the route selected was the best available, then what should the Government have done? Should the Government have built that road themselves, or should they have made a contract such as they did make? Sir, if this Government had taken five millions, or six millions, or ten millions of dollars out of the public chest to build the Yukon Railway, I can imagine how the leader of the Opposition and his friends would have held up their hands in horror at such a course. They would have told us that we were going to swamp the Dominion by enormous increases of the public debt, and they would have told us also that the Yukon country itself should have paid for the boom of a railway. And, Sir, the Opposition would have been right in taking that ground. I hold that the Government, in providing that the Yukon country shall itself pay for this railway, have acted wisely in the interests of our people. After the prorogation of last session of Parliament rumours reached here of the rich discoveries in the Klondike, and as these reports became confirmed we saw from all countries in this wide Dominion, young men and able-bodied men, the brightest and best in the land wending their way to these arctic gold fields. It was absolutely necessary that measures should be taken to get supplies in there, and the Government acting promptly and wisely, at once made provision for the development of that country. Mr. Jennings, one of the most competent engineers, was sent to try and find a route into that country and the Minister of the Interior lost no time in going over that difficult Pass so as to possess himself personally of all the facts. All this took time, and then the urgency arose. The Government were compelled to act promptly, and they did act promptly and they have made a bargain which I believe the people of Canada will commend, and which will undoubtedly meet with the approval of all honest men in this Dominion. The Government has provided that the older sections of Canada which have already contributed millions towards the bonusing of railways shall not be called upon for one dollar in connection with this work, while at some time these older parts of Canada will derive enormous benefits from the building of the road. These gentlemen of the Opposition tell us: but you have given away 3,750,000 acres of the very richest land that the sun ever shone upon, and you have provided that these contractors can select it where they please. Why, one would never think that the gentlemen over there, for years and years backed up a Government that had given away no less than 68,000,000 acres of the very best land in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and locked it up for all time to come in the possession of a railway company. Yet, Sir, they talk about this Government granting 3,750,000 acres in a rocky region, as a huge crime and as something unprecedented in the history of any country. What insincerity are not those gentlemen opposite guilty of? What are the facts? The Government have taken every precaution to preserve the interests of the people of Canada in this matter. We all know that Mackenzie & Mann are taking great risks; I hope they will make money out of this transaction, I hope they will make millions out of it, because the more they make the more all the people of Canada will make. We have in that region from 75,000,000 to 100,000,000 acres of land, and I venture to say that millions of acres of that land is not worth 10 cents a square mile. There may be some of the land rich in minerals, but the Government have provided that each alternate section shall be held for the benefit of all the people of Canada, and if the company finds a rich mine on their block, which I hope they will, then the Government will own the adjoining block, and the people of Canada will share in its wealth.

Now as to the question of a monopoly being given. Why, there is no monopoly worth speaking of at all, and whatever monopoly is given to this company is a monopoly that ought to have been given, and which if the Government did not give they would have been derelict to their duty in withholding. We do not want an American road from Dyea and Skagway in there next year; an American road which would monopolize the commerce of that region for the American people. We want to retain that trade for Canadians, and the course taken by the Government will retain it for Canadians. Sir, the monopoly only exists so that no railway from the American border will be bonused by this Government. There are already two charters granted last year to enter that country from the coast, and from Edmonton or from any point on the Canadian Pacific Railway you can get as many charters as you like. I hold that this monopoly is one which is in the interests of the people of Canada, and which the Government were wise in giving.

Again, Sir, this is an all-Canadian route so far as we know. We have the same rights to navigate the Stikine River as the Americans have to navigate the St. Lawrence, and then when we get to the head of the Stikine we have an all-Canadian route through a fine Canadian waterway down to Dawson City. If there is any trouble, which I may say I do not anticipate, we can easily extend our line to Port Simpson, and then we will have a through Canadian road right from the ocean to the heart of the Klondike. I trust, Sir, that if that country proves as wealthy as it is reported to be, there will be many railroads in there. I hope to see a railway from Edmonton, but as the great object was to get a railway communication at once, the Edmonton route was impossible this year. A railway must be constructed by the 1st of September so that supplies can be got in there next summer before navigation closes, and while I am in favour of the Edmonton route, yet we must remember that it is a thousand or fourteen hundred miles and it was impossible to build a line there this year. I have no doubt, Sir, that the people of this Canada of ours will approve of the businesslike and statesmanlike course that has been pursued by this Government.

The great thing which we who are sitting behind the Government can point to with pride and admiration is that, unlike the days of the old Government, when such things stunk with corruption, robbery and boodling, not one dollar of money has been stolen in any of these transactions. That is to the honour and credit of the Government, and I say that the Liberals of this House will approve of and stand by the Government in the wise and statesmanlike course they have pursued in the last 18 months, and I am sure they will go on as they have begun, and will make a record such as has never been made by any previous Government in this country. I tell the Opposition, that the Government of this country, composed as it is of business men, honest men, straightforward men, and men of ability, has a long future before it, and I hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will long live to fill the position they are now filling so well.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no possible hope of closing the debate to-night, and under the circumstances I think it would be hardly worth while for us to proceed any longer at this late hour of the night. If it were possible to reach a conclusion to-night, it would be different, but there is no hope of that. Under the circumstances I hope the right hon. First Minister will allow the debate to be adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There is certainly no hope of getting through to-night; I do not know whether there is any hope of getting through at all. I had hoped that we would close this debate yesterday. I had some conversation with my hon. friend on this subject, and my understanding was that the debate would be closed yesterday. I believe, however, that such was not the understanding of my hon. friend. But no intimation has been given to me that this debate, which has gone on for three weeks, will be concluded, and, therefore, it is certainly not fair that we should adjourn to-night at eleven o'clock.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I found a large number of gentlemen anxious to continue the debate, which is one of grave importance, and I am sure that my hon. friend who is leading the House will see that no person can apply a great deal of pressure on gentlemen who wish to express themselves on the subject. I do not think any time has been lost so far, and on Monday or Tuesday at the latest I expect we shall be able to bring the debate to a conclusion; and I think that object will be attained quite as readily by adjourning now.

The PRIME MINISTER. If the hon. gentleman will tell me that we shall take a vote on Tuesday, I will agree at once to the adjournment of the debate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will assure my hon. friend that I will do everything in my power to bring that about. He knows that there is a limit to either his power or mine in a question of that kind; but I think we shall be able to take the vote on Tuesday, and I will give my hon. friend all the assistance I can in that direction.

The PRIME MINISTER. In years past, when I sat on the other side of the House, there has never been any difficulty in coming to such an understanding after a debate has reached a certain stage. If my hon. friend will say that we shall take the division on Tuesday, I will agree very readily to the motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will do everything in my power—

The PRIME MINISTER. That is hardly satisfactory.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And I have no hesitation in saying that I believe it would be quite practicable to take a vote on Tuesday.

The PRIME MINISTER. If the hon. gentleman will say so, and he has control of his party, I will agree very readily to an adjournment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will use all the power I have.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think that under such circumstances the hon. gentleman should have no hesitation in coming to an understanding, such as has been done on several occasions in my experience, and in his experience, that a certain day should be fixed for the taking of the vote, and if my hon. friend will agree that we shall take a vote on Tuesday, I will agree to an adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to have to address the House this evening; but, as hon. gentlemen opposite are desirous of expediting this debate, I am obliged to proceed with the few remarks which I intend to address to the House on this question. It seems a little strange that the anxiety of hon. gentlemen opposite to expedite the debate, which is evident by their refusal to allow an adjournment to-night, had not been manifest to some extent when they ventured to adjourn this House for a week during the time the Ontario elections were in progress.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to interrupt my hon. friend for one moment. I am anxious that there should be no misunderstanding. If my hon. friend is obliged, under the circumstances and after what I have said, to continue the debate to-night, I wish the hon. leader of the House to understand that I give no engagement to promote, as I was ready to do to the utmost of my power, the taking of the vote on Tuesday. I do not think the progress of the debate will be promoted by an unreasonable demand.

The PRIME MINISTER. Let me say this to my hon. friend. This is the first time in my experience that we have not been able to come to an understanding. This debate has lasted three weeks, and here we are taunted by an hon. gentleman on the other side with having adjourned the debate for the Ontario elections, when he knows as well as I know that this was done with the consent of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am very glad the hon. gentleman has made that remark. Is the House to understand that the hon. gentleman, being the leader of this Government, and being responsible for the business of this House, is to consent to everything which hon. gentlemen on this side consent to? Does he propose to deal with this measure in the way that hon. gentlemen on this side think it should be dealt with? If so, this debate need not continue much longer, because we can bring it to an end in five minutes. The hon. gentleman is responsible for the adjournments of this House; he has the majority in this House; and when he undertook to adjourn the House for the Ontario elections, he took upon himself the responsibility of saying that the matter which was so urgent that a contract had to be signed eight days before the meeting of Parliament, had ceased to be urgent and thus that this House might adjourn in idleness for a week. I and other gentlemen from the maritime provinces and other distant parts of the country had to remain here for a week, while hon. gentlemen were stumping in the province of Ontario. That is the position of affairs so far as that is concerned. However, as hon. gentlemen opposite desire to proceed with this debate to-night, we will endeavour to proceed with it, and perhaps public business may not be so much expedited after all. I do not say that in any sense of using a threat, because this matter has been dealt with so thoroughly by hon. gentlemen on both sides that I for one shall endeavour to put in the most concise form possible everything I have to say with regard to it.

I cannot very well follow in detail the remarks which fell from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who immediately preceded me. My hon. friend from Gaspé spoke in his own beautiful tongue, and with his own beautiful voice, but unfortunately for me I was not able to always follow what doubtless were the very eloquent and able remarks which he made. I always listen to the hon. gentleman with pleasure, even if I cannot follow him very well, on account of his eloquent manner of speaking, his magnificent voice and the ease and grace with which he addresses the House.

I do not propose to attempt to deal at any length with the question which was spoken to by the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Sempie), as to the effect of this measure on the Ontario elections, because that is a matter I do not know very much about; and so far as the remaining remarks of the hon. gentleman are concerned, I think they were fully covered by those of the hon. Minister of the Interior and other gentlemen, to whose speeches I do intend to devote a little attention.

So far as my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell) is concerned, I was a little surprised to find, after his telling us that the Manitoba school question and the Drummond Railway and various other matters were not at all relevant to this debate, and after his complaining that these matters had been introduced by hon. gentlemen on this side, that he took up a considerable portion of his speech in dealing with them himself, and gave us some very comprehensive statements as to the general excellence of this Government. He informed us that it was more excellent than any Government which had performed similar work in this or any other country at any time. I do not claim the all-embracing and all-comprehensive knowledge of all the Governments of the world which the hon. gentleman seems to possess, and therefore I shall not venture to contradict his proposition on that point, so far as other countries are concerned; but so far as our own country is concerned, I would not be quite disposed to acquiesce in everything he said. However, that is more or less aside from the main question, and I shall not pause further to deal with it.

Speaking from this side, I have, in the first place, to say that I recognize the importance of developing, so far as we are able and so far as it is at all consistent with the public interests, the resources of Canada, not only in the Yukon, but in every other district of Canada; and I for one am prepared to give a fair and cordial support to any fair and reasonable measures looking to that development. And so far as this scheme is concerned, I do not at all seek to criticise the Government for taking measures to develop the interests and resources of this country in the Yukon district. If they have been active in that respect, they are entitled to our praise and support. But any proposal from the Government looking to the development of the Yukon district must be examined upon its merits. What do we find in the proposal which this Government make with regard to this project? In the first place, the project of the Government, as I understand it to have been outlined at the commencement of this session is:

To construct a road for immediate communication with the Yukon district, in order to provide food and supplies next winter for the thousands of men who will be in that region. That is the object and the only object the Government have in view. It was not to establish a perpetual permanent route; for a communication which might be more in accord with the interests of the country, that has to come later.

In other words, what the Government have brought down is a temporary measure for communication with the Yukon district. What, then, is the purport of that measure? In the first place, it is that there shall be established an all-Canadian route. That all-Canadian route is to be what is called the Stikine River and Teslin Lake route. The contractors are to build this road. They are to own it after it is built. It is to be presumed that they are to operate it, but there is no clause in the agreement or the Bill, as I understand it, which obliges them to operate it. If I am wrong in that respect, I shall be very glad to be corrected, because I have examined the Bill and the contract, and I have examined the Railway Act; and unless I am mistaken, I cannot find in any of these three documents any provision which obliges this company to operate the road after it is constructed.

What is it that we propose to give to these gentlemen for constructing this road? We propose to give them the right of selecting, in any part of that district they may see fit, over 6,000 square miles of territory, comprising the richest mineral-bearing lands in the world, if we are to believe the official report which the Government are scattering all over the world for the purpose of inducing people to go there. This has been elaborated by hon. gentlemen on this side over and over again, and I do not need to repeat it. If the official guide which the Government are sending out as the official guide with regard to this country, is to be believed, if the statements of Mr. Ogilvie, who made a personal visit to this country and who remained there for over two years, are to be believed, then in that region there are mineral lands of such enormous value that one small district, a district which might be occupied a thousand times over by one-tenth of this grant, will probably yield not less than from $60,000,000 to $100,000,000.

The able and convincing argument which was addressed to this House yesterday by the hon. gentleman from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) must, it seems to me, convince any hon. gentleman in this House that the right of selection will give to these contractors the power to secure to themselves every rich portion of gold-bearing area in that district. But suppose that that is not the case, suppose they are able to secure only one—and certainly, with 6,000 square miles, which is one-third the area of Nova Scotia, if there is a district there nearly equal to that described by Mr. Ogilvie, they will be sure to have one—what will be the result? The first result will be, as has been pointed out by hon. gentlemen on both sides, that ordinary miners will be excluded from that land. In the second place, either the development of the district will be checked, or, if the company proceed to develop and work, as no doubt they will, then, the Government gives away to the contractors 9 per cent of all the gold extracted. If it were a district like the one referred to by Mr. Ogilvie, the Government's own expert sent there to learn the facts, and if it realized sixty, or seventy, or a hundred millions, the Government will lose 9 per cent of the total amount, and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann will have at least that advantage, so far as they are in competition with other miners of the country. I think that a contract of that kind should be supported by very extraordinary reasons before this House should be called upon to adopt it. What is the justification for this measure as presented by the Government? The first plea is urgency. That has been dealt with by hon. gentlemen on this side, and it has been shown, over and over again, that this matter was brought to the attention of the Government before the close of last session. It has been shown that months elapsed before they took any active measure. And it has also been shown, out of the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite, that, if this urgency did exist, it would have been easy for the Government to call Parliament together a week or two, or three weeks or a month earlier, so that the contract could have been submitted to Parliament in the ordinary way. They have not done that. They have violated one of the very first principles of governmental dealing with contracts in this country by failing to advertise for tenders and by making this contract without any communication with the country at large, and by secretly dealing with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. The next justification we have is, that this whole transaction is, as two Ministers of the Crown have said, a huge gamble. That was the expression used by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) in justification of this measure, and also by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). Now, I am not aware that the Government have any mandate from this country to gamble with the public resources or the public domain of Canada. Hon. gentlemen may say that his is not a gamble on the part of the Government, but that it is a gamble on the part of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. It seems to me that, if it is a gamble on one side, it must be a gamble on the other. These gentlemen, it is said, do not know the value of the lands they are getting. Still, it does not seem to be very much of a gamble on their part, because they have, at least, the assurance of the official expert of the Government that these are the richest mineral lands in the world. If it is a gamble on the part of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann on the ground that they may get much or may get little, it is equally a gamble on the part of the Government, because, for the same reason, the Government cannot know whether they are giving much or little. The people do not expect the Government to deal with public questions in this way, but to know what they are doing. When the Government frankly say that they do not know what they are getting, that they do not know the value of the work to be done by these contractors, or the value of what they are giving, how then can they justify themselves for bringing such a proposition down to the House?

The principal defence that was made in regard to this Bill was the very exhaustive and very lengthy address that was made by the Minister of the Interior in support of the motion for the second reading of this Bill. The hon. gentleman, it seems to me, went very far afield with many matters that were not directly connected with this Bill. And, though I give the hon. gentleman credit for the ability he displayed in his speech, it seems to me that he was at least as much disposed to make political capital out of the remarks he addressed to the House as to afford information to the House on the subject he was discussing. There are one or two remarks made by the hon. gentleman which, though not very relevant to the question under discussion, I think deserve some attention from this side of the House, coming as they do from an hon. Minister who was making such an important speech in support of the second reading of this Bill. The hon. gentleman attempted to deal very severely with the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and told us that that hon. gentleman had used very extraordinary language with regard to our relations with the United States. He stated that the language of the hon. leader of the Opposition was like a stump speech addressed to a backwoods audience, or some words of that kind. There were portions of the hon. gentleman's own remarks which did not seem to me to be of a very high order, or to be in any way what we might properly expect from a member of the Cabinet addressing the House on so important a question as this. But I desire to call the attention of the House to what the leader of the Opposition did say with regard to that:

Sir, the time has come, I do not hesitate to say, when, if Canadian rights are to be maintained in Canada, we have got, as a Parliament and Government, to show that great republic that while we are ready to do everything men can do to maintain the most friendly and harmonious commercial and every other kind of relations with that great country, we are not prepared to sacrifice the indefeasible rights of Canadians at their bidding.

Now, Sir, I for one subscribe to every word of that, and I think that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, at least most of them, will be willing to subscribe to every word of that, and I am sure there are few Canadians in this country who will not be willing to subscribe to every word of that. I would deprecate as much as any hon. gentleman in this House, any attempt to assume an aggressive attitude towards the United States, or towards any other country, but that is entirely different to the position laid down by the leader of the Opposition, that we have a certain independence and certain rights of our own, and that so far as we are concerned, we shall always be ready and willing to defend those rights. Now I would call the attention of the Minister of the Interior, if he were in his place, to the fact that on the very day on which he delivered his speech, the great organ of the Liberal party in this country used language with regard to this very matter which went far beyond what the leader of the Opposition said. I refer to the Toronto "Globe" of the 15th of February last, in which this language was used:

The despatches from Ottawa show that certain influences at Washington are determined to capture the first year's Yukon trade, no matter how treaties may be broken or the national faith compromised by the process.

Did the leader of the Opposition use any language which went nearly as far as that? I read a little further on:

Any regulation which practically prohibits the enjoyment of this right, solemnly given by treaties, will be a breach of faith, and will do infinitely more injury to the people on behalf of whom it is done than to us.

And further on:

The objections arise almost wholly from the Pacific Coast cities of the United States, which propose to abolish everything that stands in the way of their securing the whole of the Yukon outfitting trade, and they are determined that Congress and the officials at Washington shall do everything to neutralize the advantages of the Canadian position. They propose to employ the circumstance that a strip of American territory intervenes between the ocean and the Canadian Yukon, to embarrass the free access to our own lands, but they are woefully shortsighted if they think Canada can be held up in this questionable way. Canada cannot be closed out of her own territory. We believe we speak the mind of every section of the country when we express the determination not to be tricked or intimidated out of our natural rights in that region. If the United States Congress thinks proper to break a treaty in order to back up the game of Tacoma and Seattle, our Government will have to proceed forthwith to meet the situation.

Now, I think the Minister of the Interior, so far as any criticism of the leader of the Opposition is concerned on that point, is very well answered out of the mouth of his own organ which stated even more emphatically than the leader of the Opposition, matters as to which most, if not all, Canadians are thoroughly in accord. Now, Sir, the Minister of the Interior was disposed to be critical if not captious in other respects, and he undertook to read to this House from the Montreal "Daily Witness," and to show that the leader of the Opposition had stopped short at a certain place in the article which he was reading from that paper, for the purpose of misrepresenting that article to this House. Sir, the hon. gentleman himself did exactly that of which he wrongfully accused the hon. leader of the Opposition. He was asked to read on, and he failed to read on, and I venture to read on to the House as a criticism upon some of the terms of this bargain, what the hon. gentleman declined to read on that occasion :

There would seem, at all events, to be every probability that if there is really any great wealth in the country the syndicate will have no difficulty in reaping the first-fruits of it. It looks as though they would be likely to acquire for themselves or to make a profit on almost all the gold lands discovered up to the amount of their available grant. With the power of laying down a base line as may best suit their own advantage, and with the power of securing an uninterrupted territory of twenty-four miles long by three miles in breadth, it looks as though the syndicate could secure the best of the land without sharing on equal terms with the Government.

It is true that since the hon. gentleman made his speech on that occasion we have been told by the Minister of Agriculture that that provision is to be modified, although we are not yet informed as to the exact terms of the modification, and I, for one shall await with some interest a statement of what the exact terms will be. But when the hon. gentleman undertook to leave this portion of this newspaper article out, that fact had not been stated to this House, and we do not know whether at that time the Government had made up their minds to take that course. Then the article proceeds :

Their interests and privileges are so large as compared with those of individual prospectors and miners that the latter will find it always to their own interest to form a sort of partnership with the syndicate, or at least to "stand in" with it against the interests of the Government, and even with those of other miners, friends or partners. Prospectors who discover a rich stream or a rich lode will stake out their own particular claim so as to secure it and also to guard themselves against the power of the syndicate. And that done, it will be to their interest to notify the syndicate of their discovery and enter into negotiations with it for their mutual interests. The syndicate, with the power of securing a whole stream bed, if it is not more than twenty-four miles long and three miles broad, or a plexus of streams at intervals from one another, by skilful laying down of their base lines, can well afford to make it worth the while of any individual prospector, or even any company, to join it in securing the locality. The syndicate, which will own its property in fee simple, can convey to any miner or prospector or company that "stands in" with it much larger areas of the rich locality than could be secured by such prospectors or company under claim from the Government.

It would be to the advantage of the prospector to deal with this company rather than to deal with the Government for this very obvious reason. If the prospector takes his land from the Government he gets only a lease, he has to pay $15 a year, he has to pay a free miner's certificate, and he has to pay 10 per cent royalty. If he takes it from the contractor, or the company, he may, with great advantage to them and also with great advantage to himself, get his land in fee simple, if you will, or he gets his land for a longer term and at a lower rental if you like, and he pays royalty at a less percentage ; therefore it will be to the interest of the prospector to stand in with the syndicate and not to stand in with the Government.

By getting their land through the syndicate, too, the miners, prospectors or private companies would only have to pay a royalty of one per cent—

That is what I have just mentioned.

—instead of ten per cent. In most cases, however, probably the successful prospectors would prefer to sell outright to the syndicate or to some capitalist company working in with it, and thus leave themselves free to prospect for further discoveries of rich districts. Thus, the Yukon must soon be full of prospectors who will be little other than agents of the syndicate. By this process the land grants will become rapidly available, to the discouragement and hindrance of independent development, and to the injury of the revenue interests of the Government.

Now, I do not know how you could put in a few words a much more cogent criticism of the terms upon which these contractors are to get these lands than the statement of them contained in that article which the Minister of the Interior did not see fit to read to this House, after he had criticised the leader of the Opposition for omitting some portion, and I have not heard in this House any answer to the arguments briefly and pithily put in that article. It is true there is one thing now eliminated that I mentioned a moment ago, and that is the right to secure 24 miles by adding blocks at either end. But if we are to place any reliance on the argument, and it seems to be a fair and reasonable argument, of the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), that is not going to make very much difference with regard to the ability of the contractors to secure all available gold mining areas in this district.

The Minister of the Interior also dealt at some considerable length with a question which is not very relevant to the subject before this House, and he dealt with it solely and obviously for the purpose of making political capital. The question was, whether or not the rights of Great Britain and of Canada under the Treaty of St. Petersburg had been diminished by the Treaty of Washington ; and I regretted that an hon. gentleman standing in his place in this House as a Minister of the Crown did not see fit to take the position which was very properly taken by my hon. colleague for Halifax (Mr. Russell) with respect to it. I think it is a pity that any Minister of the Crown in this House should see fit to state that the rights acquired by Great Britain under the Treaty of St. Petersburg had been reduced by the Treaty of Washington. It would have been better to have made the most of the rights of Canada under one treaty or the other ; but I must admit that I was unable to follow the arguments of the Minister of the Interior with respect to this subject. I desire briefly to refer to the language which he used. The hon. gentleman said, in the first place, that we had what he called a proprietary right under the Treaty of St. Petersburg in the Yukon, Stikine, Porcupine and other rivers running into the Pacific Ocean, an absolute proprietary right ; and he stated that this proprietary right had been lost in some way so far as the Stikine River was concerned by the Treaty of Washington. I did not understand, and I hope some hon. gentleman will explain to me, what proprietary right was possessed in the Stikine River by Canada under the Treaty of St. Petersburg which we do not possess under the Treaty of Washington ; or how we possessed a proprietary right under the one treaty and did not possess the same proprietary right under the other. I am not forgetting what has been suggested by my hon. colleague from Halifax (Mr. Russell), that perhaps our rights were not restricted to commerce under the Treaty of St. Petersburg, as undoubtedly they are restricted under the Treaty of Washington ; but you cannot say that in the one case there was a proprietary right and in the other there was not a proprietary right ; and I would have expected the hon. gentleman, a member of my own profession, in dealing with this great question as a constitutional lawyer, to have been somewhat more exact in his language in respect to it. But after proceeding at great length to show that our rights were lost, that we were very much injured by the substitution—if it was a substitution—of the Treaty of Washington for the Treaty of St. Petersburg, we find the hon. gentleman saying that we occupy an absolutely impregnable position under the Treaty of Washington—I am quoting his own language. So we have lost a large portion of our rights, according to the hon. gentleman, by the substitution of the Treaty of Washington for the Treaty of St. Petersburg, and yet we occupy an absolutely impregnable position on this point under the Treaty of Washington. I do not see how that can be ; and to use an elegant simile, which was introduced by the hon. Minister, perhaps we had Phillip drunk at one page in "Hansard," and a dozen pages further on we had Phillip sober. That was a simile which the hon. Minister thought fit to apply to the leader of the Opposition. I think the hon. gentleman might well have considered his own language before he undertook to apply such a simile to my hon. friend. So far as the Treaty of Washington and the Treaty of St. Petersburg are concerned, I do not think we have lost anything at all. It is perfectly obvious, as was stated very frankly to me by my colleague from Halifax in answer to a question I put to him, that so far as the use of the Stikine for purposes of commerce is concerned, we stand exactly under the Treaty of Washington as we did under the Treaty of St. Petersburg ; and no hon. gentleman has advanced any argument to convince me to the contrary. There may be some later argument that will convince me, because I am perfectly open to conviction. I desire, however, to point out to the hon. gentleman this : that so far as the regulations are concerned, it is perfectly clear, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) that our rights under Article 6 of the Treaty of St. Petersburg were subject to regulations—that the right of free navigation of those rivers by British subjects would necessarily be subject to some regulations, even although there is no expressed statement to that effect in the treaty. It has been suggested, and I will not say it is not an arguable point, that we had other than commercial rights under Article 6 of the Treaty of St. Petersburg, but I venture to suggest that it is at least doubtful, and I desire to point out the distinction between Article 6 as compared with Article 7. Article 6 of the Treaty of St. Petersburg provides :

That the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, from whatever quarter they may arrive, whether from the ocean or from the interior of the continent, shall for ever enjoy the right of navigating freely and without any hindrance whatever, all the rivers and streams which, in their course towards the Pacific Ocean may cross the line of demarcation upon the line of coast described in article 3 of the present convention.

Article 7 of the Treaty of St. Petersburg provides :

That for the space of ten years from the signature of the present convention the vessels of the two powers, or those belonging to their respective subjects, shall mutually be at liberty to frequent, without any hindrance whatever, all the inland seas, the gulfs, havens and creeks on the coast mentioned in article 3 for the purposes of fishing and of trading with the natives.

In the one case you have a provision applying solely to subjects ; in the other case you have a provision applying not only to ships of the subjects but to the ships of the two powers. It is open to doubt whether in the case of Martin, referred to by my hon. colleague from Halifax (Mr. Russell), we would not have had exactly the same difficulty under the Treaty of St. Petersburg as we had under the Treaty of Washington, because it is needless to remind members of the legal profession that there is a marked distinction between the ships of the power concerned and the ships of the subjects concerned. The ships of the power have extra territoriality ; the ships of the subjects are in all cases subject to local laws and to municipal regulations. In order to show that I am not alone in holding this view, I venture to bring to the attention of the House what was said by Mr. Laflamme, when Minister of Justice in 1877, in quoting from the despatch of the law officers of the Crown. He said :

Even if the rights of free navigation under the Convention of 1825 still existed, it would be a matter of doubt whether the conveying of a prisoner through American waters would be within the terms of the Convention.

He is quoting in that statement the language of the law officers of the Crown, and therefore it is at least a matter of doubt whether the construction which I have ventured to suggest with regard to the 6th and 7th articles of the Treaty of St. Petersburg, is not the correct construction. So much for the rights of Canada under these respective treaties. One further remark, and it is this: When the Treaty of Washington was made, we must bear in mind that the United States had taken the position that Russia had ceded to the United States, free from every restriction, and free from every encumbrance, the entire territory of Alaska and of the rivers in it, that therefore the question of the old treaty was entirely a question between Great Britain and Russia, that the United States were not bound by it, and that the United States were entitled to hold Alaska free from any restriction placed upon it by the Treaty of St. Petersburg. It is stated by the law officers of the Crown, in the same despatch to which I have referred:

That in regard to the rights of Great Britain to the navigation of the Stikine, Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that by clause 6 of the Treaty of the 30th March, 1867, between Russia and the United States, which declared the cession of the territory and dominion to be free and unencumbered by any reservation, &c., Russia did virtually revoke the permission she had granted to Great Britain by the Convention of 1825, in regard to the free and unrestricted navigation of the rivers flowing through that territory to the sea; and although Russia could not voluntarily and without the consent of Great Britain withdraw the right conferred by that Convention, that right, whatever may have been the nature of it, has been lost by the negotiations which led to the Treaty of Washington and by that treaty itself.

Quite so, but what I desire to point out to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House is, that at this very time, before the Treaty of Washington was made, the United States were taking the position that they had that country ceded to them free and unrestricted, that they were not bound by the Treaty of St. Petersburg, and, as my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Russell) has very well pointed out, when you come to deal with international law, you are practically bound by the view which the opposite party takes, and as the United States, the opposite party, were taking this view at that time, what other conceivable thing could we have done than to deal with these rivers on the Pacific Coast exactly in the same way in which we dealt with the St. Lawrence?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Mr. RUSSELL. My hon. friend surely does not understand me to have said that we were bound by the view taken by the opposite party.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I will read to my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) what he did say. I have it here :

On the question of international law, a private opinion is quite unimportant. The question is, what is the opinion and the conviction of those with whom you are dealing. International law is not law, it is only international morality. There is no sanction for it, as has been stated over and over again, by authorities on the subject.

Mr. RUSSELL. I trust my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) does not believe that the passages he has read support his statement, that I said we were bound by the view taken by the opposite party.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If we pursue the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) to its legitimate conclusion, what is our position? Our position is this, that the United States claimed they had this territory unrestricted by the Treaty of St. Petersburg or any other treaty, and they were actually at the time so insisting, and instructing their officers to act accordingly, that we had no right to navigate these rivers. That is plain from the debates which took place in 1872. If you pursue the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) to its legitimate conclusion, then you are forced to accept the opinion and conviction of the opposite party with whom you are dealing.

Mr. RUSSELL. Not at all.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Well, if my hon. friend's language does not mean that, I do not know what it means. If it does not mean that, I do not think it means anything at all. Now, with regard to our rights under the Treaty of Washington; and I am as anxious, I hope, as any man in Canada to maintain them to the utmost possible extent. We have the right of free navigation of a portion of the Stikine River, which runs through the territory of the United States, for the purpose of commerce, subject to regulation, and they have the same right with respect to the portion of the river which runs through our territory. Then, so far as this being an all-Canadian route is concerned, it never can be called an all-Canadian route, in the proper sense of the word, until you have once determined what these regulations are to be. These regulations cannot be determined solely by us. The United States certainly have a voice in them, and I suppose the United States would claim they have the sole voice. If that is so, and if the United States do see fit to make regulations which, in our opinion, interfere with the navigation of that river, I do not know exactly what remedy we would have, except by recourse to arbitration or by entering into negotiations with them for a settlement.

Until that is done, it does not seem to me that, in any proper sense of the word, we have an all-Canadian route via the Stikine River.

Coming a little more particularly to the direct question before the House, I desire to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to some of the provisions of this contract and of this Bill. The hon. the leader of the Opposition has already called the attention of the Government to one provision in the contract, which the Government have declared they will modify, with the consent of the contractors, and no gentleman on either side of the House can deny that this is so important and so great a modification that it is well worth ten times the debate which we have expended upon this Bill so far. I again call the attention of the Government to the fact that there is no provision in this Bill, or in this contract, or in the Railway Act, so far as I am aware—and I say this subject to correction—by reason of which the contractors will be obliged to operate the road. I cannot find any such provision, but if I am in error in regard to that, I will be glad to be corrected now. That is one provision which may be amended when we get the Bill in committee, and, if it is not amended, it will be a great defect. It will be a defect in the Bill for this reason: If the road is a road which the contractors can operate profitably, at such a profit as will reimburse them for their outlay, then there is no reason whatever for giving them the enormous land grants we are giving. If, on the other hand, this is a road which cannot be operated by the contractors profitably, and which we must insist upon their operating for the purpose of developing the country, then, surely, we ought to have some provision in the Bill by which the country would be safeguarded against the contractors failing to operate that road. I do not think any hon. gentleman opposite would deny that for a moment.

The second criticism I have to make on this contract is that although this matter is stated to be a matter of the utmost urgency, a matter which required this contract to be entered into eight days before this Parliament assembled, we do not find anywhere in this contract, so far as I am aware, the very ordinary provision that time shall be of the essence of the contract—a provision so ordinary that it is contained in the printed forms of contract used in the Department of Railways and Canals; a provision which was inserted last year in the contract with regard to the Fast line. It may be suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite that there is some implication in the terms of this contract, that time shall be of the essence of the contract. That may be discussed in the Committee. I do not agree with that view, and at the proper time I shall be prepared to state my reasons. But the provision I have suggested would seem to be the first thing a lawyer would have inserted in this contract, when the very essence of the scheme is that the road shall be constructed in the present season, and shall be ready for operation by the 1st of September next. With regard to the deposit which was made under the contract for the Fast Line last year, I find in clause 13 this provision:

The contractors shall supply the steamers in accordance with the terms of this agreement, and within the time or times hereby contracted therefor, for which purpose it is agreed that time is to be of the essence of this contract.

I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite, and I ask them in all seriousness, why, if a provision of that kind was necessary in regard to the Fast Line scheme, it was not inserted in this, which, according to hon. gentlemen opposite was of a very much more urgent character? I know the ability and the capacity of the legal gentlemen who are members of the present Government, and I cannot bring myself to believe that they overlooked the importance of such a provision as that; and at the same time I find it hard to understand why it has been omitted unless the intention was not to insist upon the completion of the road on the 1st of September, 1898. Then, we are told that we have security for the completion of this road on the 1st of September, 1898, by the deposit of $250,000. I would have expected to find in this contract the same provision that was inserted in the Fast Line contract with regard to the deposit; but I do not find it. According to section 14 of the Fast Line contract:

It is agreed and understood that in the event of the contractors making default in having two of the steamers ready by the time hereinbefore named in that behalf, then the said deposit of ten thousand pounds is to be forfeited to Her Majesty as agreed upon, and as liquidated damages for such default.

Why do you not find in this contract a provision that the sum of $250,000 is to be forfeited to Her Majesty, in case this road is not completed according to the terms of the contract on the 1st of September, 1898? If this contract is drawn in the interests of the contractors, I can understand the omission; but if it is drawn in the interests of the country, I am bound to say I cannot understand it. Hon. gentlemen will argue that the language of this contract may point to a conclusion different from that which I have suggested. I will examine the 10th clause, which deals with this matter:

The contractors shall, within ten days after the execution hereof, deposit with the Government, in cash or approved cash security, the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars as security that the railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake, hereby contracted for, will be completed and equipped in accordance with the terms hereof, and on such railway being completed and equipped and accepted as hereinbefore specified, the said sum or security shall be returned to the contractors, or to whom they may appoint.

Now, what will take place if this road is completed on the 1st day of September, 1899, instead of on the 1st of September, 1898? The Government either will or will not accept the road. If they do not accept that road, will any gentleman on the other side of the House pretend that the company are bound to operate it? I think not. If they do accept it, will any gentleman on the other side of the House venture to say that this sum of $250,000 is forfeited and will not be returned to the contractors? It would be perfectly plain if there were such a provision in this contract as there is in the Fast Line contract, that if the road is not completed on the 1st of September, 1898, the deposit shall be forfeited. But no such provision is to be found in this contract from first to last. Therefore, I venture to submit that hon. gentleman opposite have no security for the completion or operation of the road. But, oh, says the hon. Minister of the Interior, we will recover damages. The hon. gentleman was asked by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), "On what principle will you recover damages from these contractors?" The hon. gentleman gave no real answer to that question. He gave the answer that any layman could give just as well—that they would be recovered in the ordinary way. Now, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, what damages could the Government of this country recover for one year's delay in the completion of that road? What would be the measure of the damages? Does any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House venture to say that the Government could recover the damages which would be sustained by any individual in this country who failed to get into the Yukon? Why, any infant in the law knows that the Government could not recover damages in any such right. Could the Government recover damages by reason of loss to the revenue?

I think no hon. gentleman on the other side of the House would deny that these damages would be too uncertain and too remote. Therefore, when the Minister of the Interior endeavours to convince this House that the Government can recover any substantial damages from these contractors through their failure to build the road in time, I think he takes a position which he will find it very difficult to maintain. There is another very strange omission in this contract. It is a very ordinary provision in regard to railways, that if the contractor does not proceed with the work with such expedition as will convince the Government that he will complete it within the time specified, the Government shall have the right to take it out of his hands and complete it themselves. No such provision is to be found in this contract. The contractors can go on and put the Government at defiance, working or not as they see fit. Hon. gentlemen will no doubt say that they will not get the land grant unless they do complete it; but if the Government are not in a position to forfeit this deposit or to recover damages against them, the Government have one alternative or the other, so far as I understand. Either when the road is completed, say in one year from the 1st of September, 1898, they must accept that road and allow it to be operated, in which case the company will certainly be entitled to their land grant as I understand the contract—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I may be wrong in that view, as I see my learned friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) smile, and perhaps he will set me right.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). No, I was smiling at the endorsation which came from the hon. leader of the Opposition. He had no doubt about it. You have, but he has not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understand, I repeat, that if this company completes this road on the 1st September, 1899, the Government will either accept it or not. If they do not, they are in exactly the same position as now, because the company are not obliged to operate it. If they do accept it, the company are entitled to the land. That is my view of the contract, and if it be wrong, I should like to be corrected. There is another view of this contract, and one in which I shall differ—of course in a kindly way—from my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), because I notice he has smiled at the suggestions which have been made with regard to it by hon. members on this side. I refer to clause 9:

The contractors or contractors' company shall provide, or arrange with others to provide, steamboat transport of freight and passengers between the terminus of said railway on Teslin Lake, or other terminus northerly thereof, and Dawson City to and fro.

The objection I have to that provision is this. In the first place, there is no time mentioned within which the contractors shall provide this steamboat transport. The obvious answer to that by hon. gentlemen opposite would be that they may be obliged to provide it in a reasonable time. Well, that may or may not be, but I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite how long are the company obliged to provide it. Suppose they provide it during six months and then stop, what are the Government going to do? Are they going to bring an action for damages against the company or what will they do? I do not know what remedy the Government has and should like to be informed of it by hon. gentlemen opposite. There is another curious thing in connection with the question of damages, and I desire the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) to this. The contractors, once the Government accept this road, are absolutely free from any personal responsibility. Now suppose the Government do accept the road and the company fail to operate it and fail to provide this steamboat accommodation, or having provided it, fail to continue it, whom are the Government to sue? I suppose it will be the company, because the company in that case will have assumed the liabilities of the contractors. But this company may have covered every available bit of property they have in that country by a mortgage for every dollar it is worth, and the liability of the company to the Government for these supposed damages may not be worth a snap of the finger. In what position will the Government then be? And I suppose that the Government, in dealing with an urgent matter like this, are bound to provide against every possible danger to the public interest. I do not think they have done so.

Now, I have detained the House at greater length than I really intended and I shall endeavour to make my remaining remarks as brief as possible. The Government, in making this contract with Mackenzie & Mann have violated the principle of dealing with contracts by tender. The question is, are there such circumstances existing as will justify the Government in having departed from that salutary rule? We have the statement of the hon. Minister of the Interior that between his return from the west and the 20th of December, 1897, he was informed by Sir William Van Horne that Mr. Hamilton Smith was prepared to make an offer for the construction of this railway. I think I am stating the fact fairly when I state that. We also know that Mr. Hamilton Smith had communicated with Sir William Van Horne, and that Sir William Van Horne, in so far as he said anything, spoke by Mr. Hamilton Smith's authority. We also know—at least I think we know—that Mr. Hamilton Smith has at his back men who are capable of doing the work which Mackenzie & Mann propose to do. Well, we are told by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) that the negotiations between the Government and Mackenzie & Mann extended over a great many days. There was a great deal of bartering. They wanted more land at first and the Government beat them down, and all these negotiations took a long time, so that the contract was not finally signed until the 25th of January, 1898. Even if the Government had the right to depart from the ordinary principle of dealing with these matters by public tender and contract, even if they were justified—as I think they were not—in excluding other Canadian contractors from this work, why, for the purpose of making better terms with Mackenzie & Mann, did they fail, during all these weeks to call in Mr. Hamilton Smith and procure from him the offer which he has made since. I have not heard any satisfactory explanation of their failure to do that, and I do not think any can be given. During these weeks, when the Government were trying to make the best bargain they could with Mackenzie & Mann, the Minister of the Interior had it within his knowledge that Mr. Hamilton Smith, supported by capitalists of sufficient capacity—some of the greatest capitalists in the world—was anxious to enter into negotiations for constructing this road. Why was not this gentleman called in? Why were not circular letters sent around to contractors throughout Canada who would have been willing to make an offer to build the road? Why was it the Government saw fit, during all this period, to deal with one firm only? What is the reason? I am not able to understand any reason advanced so far, and I think there are some other gentlemen in this House who do not appreciate any reason given, and I think the country will want a better reason than any given by hon. gentlemen opposite up to this time.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Can he give an instance in this country in which a contract of this kind was let by tender?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the hon. gentleman tell me when there was a contract of this kind in the history of the country?

Mr. McCLURE. Then I put the question this way: Can the hon. gentleman tell me of a case in the history of this country of a railway contract let by tender by the Government?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Well, I must say, I have not under my hand a list of the contracts, but if he will seek the sources of information readily available to his hand in the Library, he will find dozens of such cases. And, so far as that is concerned, I may answer the hon. gentleman in the way in which he answered a question, when he said that if his questioner wanted information, he had better look it up.

Mr. McCLURE. I did look for it, but could not find it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). However, I think I have sufficiently answered the hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, in conclusion, I venture to submit to this House that all the considerations that have been put forward by hon. gentlemen opposite as to the offer of Mr. Hamilton Smith, are beside the question. The hon. Minister of Customs spoke in such a way as to lead one to suppose that he believed that any offer made now was not an honourable offer. I do not so understand it. I understand that this contract has been made subject to the approval of Parliament.

I take it that that means something. I understand that if it is made subject to the approval of Parliament, then it depends on whether Parliament approves it, whether it shall be put through; and if, during the discussion of the contract, another offer is brought to the attention of this House to do the same work upon the same terms for one-quarter of the land grant which this Government proposes to give to this company, I, for one, see no reason why Parliament should not vote to accept that offer rather than the offer which the Government had made behind the back of Parliament, behind the back of the country, and behind the backs of the practical men in this line of business. And I do not propose, so long as the information before this House with regard to the offer of Mr. Hamilton Smith is in the condition in which it is at present, to support any proposition which gives to Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie four times the quantity of gold-bearing land in the Yukon district that this road can be built for by Mr. Hamilton Smith and his associates; and I think that any hon. gentleman who votes to give almost four million acres of gold-bearing land in this district to Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie, without being thoroughly convinced that there is not a bona fide offer to build the road for one million acres, and without further information from the Government on that point than has been afforded to this House, will find it hard to justify his action to his constituents. So far as I am concerned, I protest against the Government dealing with a matter of this kind in a gambling spirit. I have not used the word "gambling"; they have used it themselves. They are self-styled gamblers; and gambling in the public domain of Canada is not a thing that the people of this country will endure. It may be said that there has been gambling in this country with regard to political principles. We have had unrestricted reciprocity, free trade, commercial union, and various matters of that kind; but I do not think that hon. gentlemen opposite should proceed beyond that and deal in a gambling spirit with the public resources of the country. They should know what they are getting and what they are giving. At all events, I feel sure that the country will not endorse a Government which sees fit, in the face of an offer such as has been laid on the Table of this House, to confirm this contract with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. I therefore beg leave to move, seconded by Mr. Powell:

That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be left out and the following words be added instead thereof:—"the Bill No. 6, an Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company, be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved, that this House, while recognizing the necessity of providing adequate facilities for transportation into the Canadian Yukon gold fields, regards as indefensible the terms and conditions of the proposed contract, but will cordially support the grant of substantial assistance in aid of the immediate construction of a railway on the best available route under such conditions and safeguards as will prevent the creation of any railway or mining monopoly."

Mr. MORRISON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.36 o'clock a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 7th March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY INQUIRY.

Mr. LISTER (by Mr. Morrison) presented the first report of the Committee appointed to investigate re the Drummond County Railway.

Mr. MORRISON moved:

That leave be granted to the special committee re Drummond County Railway to employ shorthand writers to take such evidence as the committee may deem necessary, in accordance with the recommendation of said committee contained in their first report.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON moved:

That the special committee re Drummond County Railway be empowered to print all evidence taken before said committee, and all proceedings, from day to day, and that the rule of the House in regard thereto be suspended as recommended in the first report of said committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill (No. 53) to incorporate the Prudential Life Insurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Bain.)

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES— THE ATLANTIC FISHERIES.

Mr. RUSSELL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg to ask a question. A Bill has been introduced in the United States Senate, according to a despatch published in the Ottawa "Citizen" of Saturday, extending the homestead laws and providing for right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska. I notice, from the despatch, that there was comparatively little discussion until section 13 was reached, providing for certain bonding concessions to Canada in lieu of privileges to be extended by the Government of this country to the United States. The report proceeds to say :

Mr. Turner (Washington) moved to strike out that part of the section which related to the entering of Canadian ports by American fishermen. He did not, he said, make the motion because he was hostile to New England fisheries, but because he deemed it unfair to burden this measure with a demand upon the Dominion that it yield a contention it has made for one hundred years.

Mr. Hale (Maine) inquired if Mr. Turner did not think it would be of advantage to the United States to obtain the fishing concessions from Canada.

Mr. Turner replied that it would be of advantage if we could obtain it, but he did not think it could be obtained.

Mr. Hansbrough (N.D.) said that the Committee on Public Lands was in possession of information that Canada would accept the conditions imposed by the section. He was firmly of the opinion that the Dominion Government would yield on the fisheries question in view of the concession made to it by the Bill.

What I wish to ask, Mr. Speaker, is, whether there have been any negotiations of such a nature as would warrant the statement that is reported to have been made by Mr. Hansbrough ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My attention and the attention of my colleagues was called to the debate in the American Senate to which my hon. friend has just alluded. The statement made by Mr. Hansbrough was, that the Committee on Public Lands was in possession of information to the effect that the Canadian Government would agree to the withdrawal of the privileges which belonged to Canada by the convention of 1818, to which the hon. gentleman has specially directed our attention. Of course, it is difficult to judge of the remarks which may be made in any legislature, upon a summary report of that character ; but assuming that the report of the language attributed to Mr. Hansbrough is correct, all I have to say is, that there is a very serious misapprehension on the part of Mr. Hansbrough. There have been no negotiations of any kind, official or unofficial, between the Government and the authorities at Washington, except such negotiations as took place when I and my colleague, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, proceeded to Washington in November last. These negotiations have already been communicated to the public, but in order to make the thing still more certain, I beg to lay on the Table of the House the whole correspondence which took place. It consists, first, of a letter addressed to myself by Sir Julian Pauncefote, on the 26th November last, including a statement of certain propositions made by Mr. Foster, with the consent of the President of the United States ; and my reply to Mr. Foster's statement and his rejoinders.

I beg to move for leave to lay said correspondence on the Table of this House.

I should say that in the correspondence which I have just laid on the Table, there is nothing whatever of any kind (as a perusal of the correspondence will show) to warrant the statement made by Mr. Hansbrough.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Might I ask my right hon. friend if these papers contain all the negotiations which have taken place between the Canadian Government and the Government of the United States of America ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Absolutely everything.

Motion agreed to.

THE YUKON RAILWAY—THE ACTION OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I draw the attention of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to the statement which has just been made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). I wish to ask my right hon. friend if he is aware of the action which the Senate of the United States have taken in the most formal and unmistakable manner, and whether in view of it he proposes to proceed with the Bill now before the House. My right hon. friend will remember that when this action of the United States was first proposed, I drew his attention to it, and his reply to me was : that it was impossible to suppose that the legislature of any country like the United States of America could possibly adopt a measure of that kind. The right hon. gentleman therefore declined at the time to consider seriously a proposition of such an extravagant character. We are now brought face to face with the fact that the Senate of the United States, so far from treating that as a violation of treaties and a thing that it was impossible that any Government could entertain, have by a majority of 34 to 16 declared their determination to render impracticable this proposed Yukon Railway by the Stikine River.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is proceeding further than merely to ask a question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will conclude with a motion, Mr. Speaker, because this is a matter of the very greatest importance, and one that I am sure has obtained the careful consideration of the Government. The question has now assumed such a phase that the Government must regard it as of the most serious character. My right hon. friend will remember, that the hopes he entertained some time ago that no proposal of such a character, which would strike at the very basis of the treaty arrangements between Great Britain and the United States, could possibly be entertained by the American Senate; have been disappointed. We have reached a point at which the Senate of the United States—a part of the Government of the United States and a most important part of the Government of that great country, as my hon. friend is quite aware—have by a majority of 34 to 16 pledged themselves to, in fact, destroy the object which this Government aims at in providing an all-Canadian route. The Senate has shown that it is determined not only to prevent this being an all-Canadian route, but also to render any expenditure this Parliament may make in connection with it, absolutely nugatory, unless several demands of a most extraordinary character are complied with by the Government and Parliament of this country. They require that this Bill shall be changed in all its essential particulars, they declare that the bonding privilege shall be withheld unless the same privileges are accorded to American fishermen; a request contrary to the Treaty of 1818, a matter that I drew the attention of the House to a short time ago, as one that has practically been set at rest by the negotiations that have taken place, and the legislation continued from 1888 down to the present time by the Canadian Parliament.

In addition to that, the American Senate dictate that this Government shall issue miner's licenses, as they now do, upon equal terms to American citizens and British subjects, and further, that this Government shall issue these licenses when and where the Government of the United States dictate. I have no hesitation in declaring, that no member of this House will do more than I to promote the most cordial and friendly relations between the Republic of the United States and Canada. It is our interest in every way that the most harmonious relations should exist between the two Governments and the two countries. I yield to no person in my desire to see those friendly relations continued. I need not remind my right hon. friend that again and again the Liberal party in this House have denounced the action of the Conservative Government and the representatives of the Conservative Government, for having basely sacrificed the best interests of this country at the shrine of the interests of the United States of America. The Liberal party again and again used their power in this House to defeat treaties made between Great Britain and the United States of America, in regard to matters affecting Canada, on the ground that the representatives of the Conservative party had basely surrendered the best interests of Canada at the dictation of the United States

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

In view of that action of the Liberal party in days past, I am here to say now, that the position of the great Liberal-Conservative party is what it always has been. Our policy is a desire to do everything that possibly can be done, consistent with the honour and interests of Canada, to promote the best possible relations between the United States and ourselves.

But, Sir, there is a limit to human endurance, and I feel that there is a limit which I am quite sure no Government, either in this House or in this country will ever be sustained in going beyond in their efforts to promote these cordial relations.

I feel sure that we can look to this Government, as we can to any Government that enjoys the confidence of the Parliament and people of Canada, for the maintenance, not only of that which is the indefeasible right of Canada, but the preservation of a position which will show to that great Republic—great and powerful as it is—that the Dominion of Canada will never submit to have terms dictated to it which strike at the very root of the independence of the Government and of the Parliament of this country.

The time has arrived when it becomes a most serious question for the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues to consider, whether under these circumstances he proposes to press this Bill upon the further consideration of this House, when it is proved beyond the possibility of a doubt that it is to end in an utterly futile arrangement so far as the object contemplated by the Bill is concerned. I am quite certain that my right hon. friend and his colleagues will receive the hearty support of both sides of this House in taking that manly and independent course which is absolutely due to the character and position of this country, and in devising such measures as will effectually prevent our being subjected to the base humiliation we will be subject to, if we were to submit to such terms as the Senate of the United States propose to dictate to the Government and Parliament of Canada.

I beg, Mr. Speaker, to move the adjournment of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I agree very sincerely with the sentiments which have been uttered this moment by my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) I agree very sincerely with everything that he has said in regard to the maintenance of the dignity of this young nation. We are only a small nation yet. We are willing to be on the most friendly terms with the powerful nation to the south of us, but I agree with the hon. leader of the Opposition that nothing should be given away of our national dignity. Though I agree with the sentiments which he has expressed in this regard, I am sorry that I cannot at all agree with him in the conclusions which he has based upon these sentiments. And I venture to believe and hope that when he has reflected upon this subject, he will come back to the opinion he himself expressed at one time outside of this House, and has since repeated in this House, that the only route we could have taken to have access to the Yukon country was that by the Stikine River, if we wanted to have the advantage given to us by treaty and to avoid the possible hostility of our American neighbours in regard to trade arrangements. When we had to determine upon the policy we would adopt and upon the route we would select, in order to afford to Canadian trade and to the Canadian people access to that part of their own territory which lies in the region of the Yukon River, it was apparent that there was only one of two routes to be chosen. We had either to take the route by the Lynn Canal and Dyea, or the route by the Stikine River. The advantages of the one had to be set against the disadvantages of the other, and vice versa. The advantages of the route by the Lynn Canal were that it was shorter and more direct than the route by the Stikine River. But if we had adopted the route by the Lynn Canal, that is to say, had chosen to build a railway from Dyea by the Chilkat Pass up to the waters of the Yukon, we would have had to place the ocean terminus of the railway upon what is now American territory. I agree with the statement which has been made on the floor of this House on more than one occasion that Dyea, if the treaty is correctly interpreted, is in Canadian territory. It ought to be; but the fact is, as my hon. friends know very well, even those who do not belong to the legal profession, that possession is nine points of the law; and even though by the letter of the treaty, Dyea is in Canadian territory, the fact remains that from time immemorial Dyea was in possession of the Russians, and in 1867 it passed into the hands of the Americans, and it has been held in their hands ever since. Now, I will not recriminate here; this is not the time nor the occasion for doing so; but so far as I am aware no protest has ever been entered against the occupation of Dyea by the American authorities; and when the American authorities are in possession of that strip of territory on the sea which has Dyea as its harbour, succeeding the possession by the Russians from time immemorial, it becomes manifest to everybody that at this moment we cannot dispute their possession, and that before their possession can be disputed, the question must be determined by a settlement of the questions involved in the treaty. Under such circumstances, Dyea was practically in American territory—at all events, in possession of the Americans; and, therefore, if we had undertaken to build a railway from Dyea to the Yukon country, we would have been placed at the mercy of the American authorities with regard to the bonding privilege. We would have been in this position, that though we had built a railway, the ocean terminus of that railway was not in our own country, and we could not send a ton or a pound of goods over that railway unless we had the permission of the American authorities. On the other hand, if we were to build a railway by the Stikine River, there, Sir, we had a highway—because a river is a highway; we had a highway arising in our own territory and flowing through the territory of another country to the sea, and over that highway we had, not only by the common law of nations, but by a special treaty, signed by both British and American plenipotentiaries, the right of navigation. Now, that right of using the Stikine River as a highway, means something or it means nothing. I am sorry to say that I cannot agree with my hon. friend's interpretation, when he says that this right of navigation which we have by the Treaty of Washington means nothing at all. I assert, on the contrary, that by the terms of the Treaty of Washington the Stikine River is a highway which we have the right to use for commercial purposes—for the carrying of goods over it, without having to pay duty at the American frontier. There is the difference, which my hon. friend has overlooked, between the Stikine route and the Dyea route. If we had built the railway by Dyea, when we came to Dyea we would have come to an American port, and according to the law of nations we could not have entered a ton of merchandise or a pound of food without subjecting ourselves to the necessity of paying duty, if the Americans refused to bond the goods. But, Sir, we have by treaty the right to use the Stikine River as a highway. If we have not the right to send goods over that river, I want to ask any sensible man, what was the use of having secured the right of navigation on that river by treaty? It would not be worth the paper on which it was written. But while this is our position, while we have a right to use the river as a highway in carrying merchandise from the sea to our own country, it is not in the power of the American authorities to demand the payment of duty when we reach the Stikine River. I admit, as every one will grant, that the Americans have a right, not to impose duties there but to make municipal regulations for their own protection—to prevent smuggling, and so on. But I maintain that if the Americans in establishing municipal regulations for their own protection, were to go the length of defeating the rights which belong to us by treaty, such regulations would be null and void, and would be so pronounced even by American courts. A treaty to which any nation has assented is part and parcel of its laws, and cannot be defeated by any law passed by the legislative authority of that nation. Therefore, as the Treaty of Washington is part and parcel of the laws of the United States, as it is part and parcel of the laws of Canada, it is not in the power of the American people or of the Canadian people to do anything which will make nugatory the rights secured by that treaty.

I regret exceedingly the legislation which has been introduced in the American Senate, by which we are refused the bonding privilege; and I may say in passing that perhaps that Bill has been agreed to by the American Senate under a misapprehension, because the statement made by Mr. Hansbrough that Canada was prepared to surrender some of the privileges we have on the Atlantic side of the continent seems to have had some effect. But even if the Bill should become law, if it should receive the sanction of the President, though it may refuse us the bonding privilege on the Stikine River at Fort Wrangel, it does not affect our rights in the least; and if regulations should be made which would prevent our benefiting by the rights that are ours by treaty, of course we would have to exact our privileges and appeal to the American authorities that their legislation is null and void as being contrary to treaty. My hon. colleague the Minister of the Interior, a few days ago, in the speech he delivered upon this question, stated—and properly stated—that upon this question our position is impregnable. We claim, as a right beyond dispute, that the power which we have of navigating the Stikine River is a power which gives us the right to use it as a highway—that is with the power of transshipment and mooring as well—that is to say, that right carries with it, as necessary incidents, all the powers necessary to make it available. That is the position upon which and to which we hold, and therefore there is no occasion whatever for even discussing the suggestions made by my hon. friend. I fully recognize and stand upon this position, that we have rights by treaty which cannot be defeated.

I am aware, however, that though we have these rights by treaty, and though we cannot be defeated except by another treaty negotiated in the same manner, we may be harassed in the exercise of those rights. Well, we have thought of that in the measure which is now before Parliament and to which we ask the sanction of Parliament. We have taken the precaution, in the view of the possibility of our being harassed in this direction, to extend the line down to the waters which are Canadian and in British territory, and we intend at the earliest moment to ask an appropriation from Parliament in order to carry out this view so as to have that line extended at the earliest date—that is part of the contract—to those waters.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

But what would hon. gentlemen opposite have us do? A moment ago my hon. friend asked: Are you going to proceed with this Bill? Sir, I ask the question: If we do not, what will arise? If we do not proceed with this Bill, then there is only one thing to do, and that is to build a line to Dyea on the Lynn Canal. But would that remedy the evil? On the contrary, it would make it ten times worse. There is no possibility of remedy at the Lynn Canal, because there we are altogether dependent on the goodwill of the American authorities. We have no treaty rights there, whereas upon the Stikine River we have. And if these prove insufficient, there is only one alternative for the Canadian Parliament, and that is, at the very earliest possible moment, without the loss of a single day, to have the line extended south where it will reach Canadian waters. I quite agree with my hon. friend in everything he has said as to the character of the Bill introduced in the American Senate, and I hope that the position there taken will be reconsidered. I hope that the American senators and legislators will reconsider their position before proceeding further with this Bill. Though it cannot affect us, though it cannot defeat our rights, still I hope that before they determine that they shall not give us the bonding privilege, unless we do certain things, unless we are compelled to eat humble pie, unless we are compelled, for instance, to revise our own domestic legislation, they will reconsider their action.

There is no other intention on the part of this Government and the Canadian people than to have the most friendly relations with our American neighbours. But I do not admit at all that they have the right to dictate to us what shall be our domestic policy or whether we shall exercise or not the rights which belong to us by treaty. I do not admit at all that the Atlantic fisheries can come into consideration as regards what is to be the policy of the two nations on the Pacific Coast. I understand that our American friends complain that we do not bond their fish upon the Intercolonial when it is landed at Halifax for Boston. But the statement is not accurate. We do not refuse to bond their fish, because there is nothing to bond there. The position is simply this, that the American fishermen, under the Treaty of 1818, have not the power to land their fish at Halifax. Now, if that be, in their eyes, a grievance the fault is not ours, but it is simply the result of the stipulations of the treaty signed by themselves. If at the present time they are not allowed to land their fish at Halifax and are not allowed certain privileges, I must give my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) the credit of having done his best to negotiate a new treaty; and in that treaty which he in conjunction with Mr. Chamberlain sought to negotiate in 1888, those restrictions against the American fishermen were withdrawn. If therefore that withdrawal was not made part and parcel of a treaty between two nations, it is not the fault of my hon. friend, because he was ready to make away with those restrictions, but it was the fault of the American Senate who chose to reject that treaty and reaffirmed therefore the treaty of 1818, thus maintaining the restrictions imposed upon their own fishermen. Under such circumstances, the Americans have no fault to lay at our door. If those restrictions are to be complained of, there was a very simple way of making away with them. That was to confirm the treaty which was negotiated by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and Mr. Chamberlain; and I will say further, to the credit of those gentlemen, that in order to facilitate matters and have more friendly relations between the two countries, they agreed to a modus vivendi which has been continued ever since, and under which, on the payment of a small license fee, American fishermen can enjoy the rights denied them by the Treaty of 1818. At present all American fishermen who choose to take advantage of the present license system can land their fish and enjoy all the privileges denied them under the treaty.

This is the position we hold. Therefore I repeat what I said a moment ago, that the Bill to which my hon. friend alluded, which has passed the American Senate, does not and cannot affect our treaty rights. No regulation made by the American authorities, not even an Act which has the sanction of the President I submit to you, Sir, can avail against our treaty rights, confirmed by the plenipotentiaries and bearing the signatures of all the proper authorities. Under such circumstances, I have no hesitation in saying that, apart from all diplomatic remedy, any regulations or other Acts affecting our rights would be, by an American tribunal, decided to be ultra vires and null and void.

Now, my hon. friend asked a moment ago: Are you going to proceed with this Bill? I ask him: Have you anything to offer other than this Bill?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

The PRIME MINISTER. Even if the action of the United States Senate were to have the effect alleged—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, what will it be?

Mr. SPROULE. Build from Edmonton.

The PRIME MINISTER. The distance from Edmonton is about 1,500 miles, over a country that has never been surveyed, and the route which must cross three or four ranges of mountains. I had the opportunity to state on another occasion, and I here repeat, that the line which we propose to build, and will build, to the waters of the Stikine River is not a line which ultimately, in our minds or in the minds of those who know the situation will be regarded as a competitor with the line by way of Edmonton. I agree that there is strong reason, and urgent reason, perhaps, why a line from the interior should be built. But I do not regard this line from the interior as antagonistic to the line which we propose to build immediately. What we must have is immediate access to that country, a line to be in operation by the 1st of September. This is the object we have in view, and the fact that we have arranged to have access to the waters of the Yukon River by the 1st of September next and not later, is our justification for what we propose. Has the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) any substitute to offer us?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

The PRIME MINISTER. A line by Dyea, I suppose.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; if the hon. gentleman will give me an opportunity, I will make a suggestion now.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have no objection.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will say this to the hon. gentleman, and I think that what I say will commit itself to the judgment of every reasonable man—

The PRIME MINISTER. I hope my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) will not make a speech now, I have the floor.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My suggestion is this: The only basis for the monstrous payment which it is proposed to this House to pay under this contract is that it is designed to secure the construction of a line immediately, a line to be in operation on the 1st of September, by which line we would get communication with that country. That is gone.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentlemen permit me, as this is a very important point. If my hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will allow me, I will state very frankly what I believe to be the position.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would rather the hon. gentleman would give me his alternative.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am going to give the hon. gentleman the alternative. I remind him of the fact that the Minister of the Interior himself stated in the course of his speech that it would probably take six years to negotiate the Stikine question with the Government of the United States. Now, inasmuch as the Senate of the United States has taken a position that makes it absolutely impossible to attain the object which it is proposed by means of this Bill to attain, I ask my right hon. friend to consider the whole question de novo. Before any large expenditure of public money has been made, I ask him to take up the question of an ocean port in British Columbia; and I will undertake, Sir, if the right hon. gentleman will do that—as the urgency has passed by, from the absolute impossibility of accomplishing what the Bill proposed to accomplish—that for far less than he is going to give for the construction of this 150 miles of road, he can have constructed, by contractors of the highest standing and character, the entire line, from either Alice Arm or Kithmast Arm, or whatever may be the best available port, to Teslin Lake.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am delighted that the hon. gentleman has made this statement. I put the question very pointedly whether he had any substitute to offer. He has no substitute, but simply proposes to do the very thing which we have said we intend to do. We have made this contract for the construction of a road to the Stikine River in the hope that the Americans would abide by their treaty obligation. But, even in case they might refuse, we contemplated in this very contract that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann shall have the option—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The PRIME MINISTER—to carry the line down to a Canadian port.

Mr. FOSTER. In ten years.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, but we can call upon them at any time within ten years; and if they do not undertake it next summer, others will. So the position of my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) simply confirms and is the best justification of our course in this matter. He has just declared that the best policy would be to build a line to a British Columbia port. That is the very thing we have done under this contract. We anticipated that, possibly, we should have some trouble with the Americans—though our rights are secured by treaty and cannot be denied—that something might be done such as has been done. Let me recall the attention of hon. members to what I said a moment ago. Does my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) pretend that the refusal of the bonding privilege on the Stikine River is to affect the rights secured to us by the Treaty of Washington? If he maintains that contention, what, then, is the cause of having attained by treaty the right to navigate the Stikine River? Is that right worth something, or is it worth nothing? If it is worth anything, it is worth this—that we have the right to use the Stikine River as a highway, and, in doing so, certainly no impediment can be placed in our way.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Whether impediments should or should not be placed in our way is not the question, but whether they will be placed in our way.

The PRIME MINISTER. The question is simply this: Does this right exist, or does it not? I know very well that even where a right exists, it is sometimes difficult to exercise it; but the fact that a right is difficult to exercise does not at all affect the fact that the right exists. If it be found that this right of ours could be exercised only with too great difficulty, then, here is the provision made in the contract:

The Government shall submit to Parliament at its next ensuing session a measure for the necessary Act confirming this agreement and authorizing the Government and the contractors to perform and carry out the same, also incorporating the contractors and such others as may become shareholders into a company under the name of the Canadian Yukon Railway Company or other name approved by the contractors (hereinafter referred to as the contractors' company), with power to acquire and perform and carry out this agreement, and with all necessary provisions in that behalf, and with all necessary powers to build and operate a railway above mentioned and an extension thereof northward to Dawson City or thereabouts and an extension southward to a point in British Columbia to be designated by the Government and capable of being made an ocean port.

And, in view of the possible difficulties that may be placed in the way of the exercise of our rights, it is the intention of the Government, at the earliest moment, to ask from Parliament for an appropriation so that we may have the surveys made at once, so as to free us from all possible interference in this matter.

Mr. FOSTER. There are two considerations on account of which I am glad that this matter has been brought up, and these two considerations especially affect the position of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who has just taken his seat. The bringing up of this matter has given my right hon. friend an opportunity to set himself right before this Parliament and before the country in an important particular in respect of which, for the last six or seven years, he has been diligently setting himself wrong. It has enabled him to dispel, at this late date, if such a thing be possible, some of the illusions which his conduct and speeches for eight or ten years have tended to fix as settled ideas in the minds of senators and representatives at Washington. If you read over the newspaper reports of the discussion which took place upon one of the clauses of the Bill which has just been passed by the Senate, you will find that not one but several senators made a remark—in answer to the objection of some senators that they did not think it would be germane to interject the provision with reference to the north Atlantic fisheries into a measure which seemingly had nothing to do with them—that they had good reason to believe that in influential quarters in Canada there was a disposition to grant these concessions, and that, consequently, they might just as well be attached to this Bill, and might even better be attached to this Bill than not.

Now, I presume that no one doubts that. Where in the world did these senators get that impression which has settled and become almost a fixed idea in their minds? They got it, Sir, from the speeches and from the conduct of my right hon. friend who to-day sits opposite to me in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. No! Have the hon. gentlemen on the other side lost their memories as well as lost their convictions and their devotion to their former political principles? We know, and every member who will allow his mind to go back four or five years, knows, that at the city of St. Thomas, not many years ago, when the Liberal-Conservative Government was attempting to enforce the rights of Canadian fishermen, according to the Treaty of 1818, that hon. gentleman, as the leader of his party, attacked the Liberal-Conservative Government for trying to resuscitate a barbarism and to bring back the provisions of an old treaty of 1818 into this nineteenth century of light, and freedom, and commercial and other intercourse between civilized nations. My hon. friend remembers it perfectly. That went from one end of this country to the other, and that was not all the mischief of it; it went from one end of the United States to the other, and made senators like Mr. Hansbrough firmly convinced that once he and his party came into power, there would no longer be an insistence upon treaty rights in this country as regards the United States of America. My hon. friend has given other good reasons why Senator Hansbrough and others like him have come to that conclusion. For, Sir, when he and his colleagues were in Washington, before they went and after they came back, did we not have this statement from his own lips in an interview, that what he proposed to do was, to take up all these vexed questions and settle them in a lump? The Behring Sea question was not, I suppose, a question of the first national importance, which stood upon its own firm right, upon which we not only have the right of the treaty, but the right of international law, but had the right which was vindicated for us by the mother country in years of diplomacy, and a right which was afterwards affirmed to us by the tribunal in Paris. Our rights under the Treaty of 1818 are as clear and as undoubted as the sunlight, yet my hon. friend proposed to throw in all this before he would settle the Behring Sea question, to throw in with this all the little vexed questions that were brought up between the two countries, this one amongst the others. When the American people heard him state that, they rightly came to the conclusion that he placed no very great store by these great rights, and that he was quite willing, for the sake of peace and amity, to wipe off the whole score, taking little and big together. There is another reason why they have come to that conclusion. Possibly they read the Chicago "Record," and they read the hon. gentleman's fresh interview shortly after he came back from the elections of 1896, which showed on some points an entire ignorance of the relations between these two countries, the rights of Canada with reference to them, and showed in the whole of that interview a disposition to think lightly of, and to stand lightly by, the rights which Canada possessed, if only good-will and amity could be brought about, in his language, between the United States and this country. There are the reasons. My hon. friend need not assume surprise and feign to be astonished when he hears that Senator Hansbrough and others are looking to him, from his former walk and conversation, for no very sturdy defence of the rights of this country. Well, I said I was glad this matter had come up, because the hon. gentleman has been forced to take this position before the House and the country, now that he does not propose to consider even the old obsolete rights of 1818 as of no force and of no validity in this country, that he proposes to stand by them. And so will he have to. Irresponsible as one in opposition may be, when he is in a position to talk as he will, to promise as he will, when he comes to be Premier of this country, the dignity and rights of this Canadian people are in his hands, and neither he nor any other leader can afford to go one single step behind that dignity and those rights. That is one reason why I am glad this has come up, and Senator Hansbrough now can read the statements which have been made by the leaders on both sides of this House, and can value at their true worth these ante-Premierial declarations of my hon. friend. But, Sir, there is another point. We have been debating a great question in this House for ten, twelve or fifteen days, and we have not been able to draw the right hon. gentleman from covert yet. To-day he has taken one stand. I was going to say, his one stand; but he has taken half a dozen stands upon the question of the Yukon deal. I have heard that it is possible for some philosophers to extract sun-rays from a cucumber, but I never met with a more signal illustration of the power to draw from every defeat some sunny rays of victory than is embalmed in my right hon. friend who sits opposite to me. We have heard the utterances of his own Ministers, three of whom have been declaring in this House, ten days ago, and eight days ago, that they had not the least doubt that the United States Government and people, having treated them most courteously, would continue to treat them most courteously to the end; and they laughed to scorn, and flagellated with whips—and scorpions, if they could have been put upon the thongs of those whips, would have been placed there by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior—they laughed to scorn my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition because he ventured to make a proposition here, that the sentiment in the United States Senate was not friendly to the realization of those optimistic opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite. The Minister of the Interior made the statement, the Minister of Agriculture made the statement, the Minister of Railways and Canals made the statement, that they had no doubt at all that the greatest peace and good will, with reference to this matter on the Pacific Coast, would be found to exist, and the greatest courtesy would be shown them by the Government of the United States True, when he had to take a somewhat different line of defence, the Minister of the Interior made the statement that, of course, we had our rights, and, of course, the United States had always treated us with courtesy and always would, but still he asked were we to stop building this road and wait three, or four, or five, or six years, while trying by negotiations to settle definitely that Stikine matter? The hon. gentleman is on the same ground as the right hon. gentleman: both of them stand on the ground that there is a treaty right, but both of them are bound to come down to the bald fact, that, treaty right or not, the question now is: Will the United States admit the treaty right and allow the operation of trade under it? We said to the Minister of the Interior: Leave off this road until you find out whether they will or not. What was his answer to-day? Ask us to wait five or six years to find out! What does that mean, translated into English? That, though he may be sure of the right, he is not sure that the right will be allowed, and that the operation of trade will take place under that right. My right hon. friend is not any more certain of it. My right hon. friend now comes to the conclusion that there is a strong possibility that we will not be allowed the exercise of that right, and, consequently, that he may yet have to call into operation that preference clause of a ten years' duration which is attached to this contract, but which is not a part of the contract in any obligatory sense.

But the hon. gentleman is bound not to let Mann & Mackenzie go. He is going to hold to them, and together they are going to hold to the ripe plums, to the contract which places a blanket over the best gold lands of the Yukon territory. What for? In order to secure 150 miles of tramway, which if built by 1st of September we could not carry a pound of Canadian produce over it without the permission of the United States authorities at Wrangel. The hon. Minister of the Interior has told the House that it might take four or five or six years to complete the negotiations. What is the use of the leader of the Government saying that a treaty is superior to law, and that we have rights under the treaty which are undoubted. There is the challenge from the Senate of the United States, which proposed to attach an impossible condition to that treaty right, by a vote of 34 to 16. Suppose this Bill passes through the lower House and President McKinley signs it. Go and put your rights before the United States, and alongside of it they will place the provisors under that law. What will happen? Are you going to say that you will use the road on the 1st September? No, but you will have to avail yourselves of the future time of years mentioned by the Minister of the Interior before you will find whether you can put a pound of freight through there by transshipment and under treaty rights.

What does the hon. leader of the Government propose to do? He comes down to the House and practically admits that this Teslin Railway of 150 miles, even if built by 1st September, will be practically useless if the United States maintain their contention.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. And yet the hon. gentleman asks the country to proceed with this unparalleled and extravagant piece of business of building 150 miles of useless road and allow it to lie, year after year, unused until they have made certain investigations and arrived at a conclusion and resolved to build to some port on the Pacific Coast. What this Parliament wants is this—the whole scheme of the Government; and it wants it now. It does not want to build 150 miles for a most extravagant sum and for the Government then to bring down another piece of road for construction, and ask permission to build that link and pay for it out of the country's treasury. What we demand as members of Parliament is, that if this scheme is now abortive, let hon. gentlemen opposite bring in their full-fledged scheme and allow hon. members to discuss it, without tying them up hand and foot in party shackles and threatening Parliament by placing before it a contract for its authorization without permission to dot an "i" or cross a "t" in it. That is what we complain of.

I am glad this subject has been brought up. The leader of the Government is now face to face with a crisis in respect to passing the proposed legislation. He has come to the Rubicon and has found that it is not crossable. On the ground of abstract right, it is, on the ground of the Senate's action and possible complications, it is not. Let us know what we have to do and let us face the Government's scheme as a whole, and not be called upon to consider a small portion of what is possibly to be a railroad into the Yukon. Let us know what the whole scheme is from the beginning to the end, and let the Government take Parliament into its confidence in discussing it; for to-day's proceedings have made it certain that we may push Mackenzie & Mann, and they may push the Government and this road may be built by 1st September, but it will be perfectly useless for any service during the present year. If that be so, let hon. gentlemen opposite bring their whole scheme to Parliament, and we will take it up, and if the Government scheme is a good one, we will support it; for I, as well as my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) and every member in the Liberal-Conservative party, whilst we do not defy or threaten in the least, feel just as firm and just as strong in not abnegating one single right of this country even to the great power to the south, as are hon. gentlemen opposite.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Personally I feel I am in unison with most of those hon. gentlemen among whom I sit when I deplore the bitter temper, tone and substance of the speeches which have fallen from the two leaders of the Conservative party.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Paid agents of the American Government.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to a point of order. The point of order is this: no sooner had I taken my seat and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has risen than an hon. gentleman who occupies a seat as a representative on that side of the House accused us on this side of being paid agents of the American Government? Is that language, Mr. Speaker, which should be used in this House?

Mr. SPEAKER. If any hon. member used that language it is irregular and improper.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for Grey used it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I will retract. I do not think they would do so much without pay.

Mr. FOSTER. I contend that is not a withdrawal.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must withdraw the remark.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Under the circumstances, I withdraw it.

Mr. FOSTER. Where do you put it?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I opened my remarks by regretting the substance and tone of the speeches delivered by the hon. gentlemen who were leading the Opposition. I did so because we are not now debating a purely internal political matter. When we are discussing Canadian politics of an internal character alone and affecting the political rights of either party or those of Canadians, I can understand that parties may differ in the extreme and that violent language may be used. But when the Canadian Government is engaged in the great task of upholding and maintaining the rights of the Canadian people against a foreign power, Sir, I have been taught in my reading of British history that on those occasions the voice of faction should be hushed. No sooner have we the least breath in the Senate of the United States which—accepting for the moment the construction hon. gentlemen opposite put on it—which threatens the treaty rights of Canada, than we hear a craven cry raised by the leader of the Opposition, a craven cry raised by hon. gentlemen opposite that we should surrender, that we should not attempt, either diplomatically or otherwise, to maintain the great vested rights which the Canadian people possess. They are at this moment endeavouring to raise the cry that we should withdraw a Bill, which the hon. leader of the Opposition himself put his imprimatur upon not many days ago, which he said he would be proud to recommend Parliament to pass, which he declared vested in two men, Mackenzie & Mann, probably the only two men in Canada capable of carrying it out, the construction of that road, and to which he pledged the party he led and declared they would give a patriotic support. Why did he do so? Because, as he alleged, it is an all-Canadian route, because it is to build up Canadian interests as against those interests which are competing with us on the Pacific slope, and he sank for the moment his political proclivities and desired to unite with the Government in this great patriotic Canadian work of preserving and conserving for Canada the trade of that great country which the Americans are seeking to take from us. The hon. gentleman has, however, forgotten his patriotism. He has forgotten to assist the Government; he has broken his pledge, and at the first note which comes to us from the American Senate of danger and of the possibility that they may throw obstructions in our way, we have him and his lieutenant who sits alongside of him, rising in their places, forgetting their patriotism, and in the hope of gaining a temporary and paltry advantage calling on us to surrender the rights of the Canadian people.

I beg to tell the hon. gentleman that the present Government of this Dominion are not composed of that kind of stuff, and I beg to tell them also—and I say it with every humility—that it would be well for them before they cry out and call upon the Government of Canada and the people of Canada to surrender; it would be well for them to ascertain if there is any danger whatever. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has talked about the Bill introduced in the American Senate, and has assumed that that Bill aims at the destruction of certain treaty rights which we possess. I challenge him to point to a line or a sentence in that Bill which directly or indirectly affects the treaty rights we possess of the free, open navigation of the Stikine. The hon. gentleman knows very well that we possess a bonding privilege by treaty so far as two or three points in the United States are concerned. He knows that we do not possess any treaty right to the bonding privilege at the town of Wrangel, and he knows that it is specially with reference to the bonding privilege at Wrangel that this Bill is aimed and that the whole question refers to.

Mr. DAVIN. Is not that what makes it so dangerous?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. For the benefit of the close consideration which I am sure the whole House is giving this subject, I wish to ask a question. I understood the Prime Minister to-day to say, and I believe myself there was ground for it, that he claimed that under the Treaty of Washington we had the right not only of navigation on the Stikine, but in connection with that right the right of transshipment. Am I right in understanding the Minister of Marine now to say, that we have not the right to tranship?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. On the contrary, my hon. friend must understand me to mean just what the Prime Minister advised as the construction of that treaty, and he must understand me to mean further, that the granting or withholding of the bonding privilege at Wrangel does not necessarily imply the modification or retraction of the free right of transportation.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have jumped before they came to the stile. Supposing the Bill passes to-morrow; supposing section 13 passes through the American Senate and afterwards through the House of Representatives and is signed by the President and becomes the law of the land, would that detract from our treaty right to free and open navigation of the Stikine? Not at all. Would that take from us the right of transshipment which is necessarily incidental to that free right of navigation? Not at all. I say, therefore, that the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), in calling upon us to yield at the very first threat on the part of some American representatives has—I won't say deliberately, because I have to much respect for him to think that—but in his haste to rise a little party capital for the moment, he has forgotten even to read the section of the Bill he has commented upon. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) talks here as if this threatened action on the part of the Senate was brought about by some remarks of my hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) some years ago, which led the American people to believe that the Liberal party were willing to surrender Canadian rights and Canadian privileges. Sir, does he (Mr. Foster) remember the occasion when the Washington Treaty was negotiated? Does he remember the occasion when Sir Charles Tupper came back and moved in this House the Bill to endorse and approve of that treaty? Does he (Mr. Foster) remember that previously to that time he had occupied the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries, charged with the administration of the fishery laws, and does he remember that he received a lecture from Sir Charles Tupper on that occasion, the like of which I never knew or heard of a young member of the Government getting from a senior Minister. Sir Charles Tupper did not tell him (Mr. Foster) that it was the language of Sir Wilfrid Laurier that brought about the strained relations which unfortunately existed between Great Britain and the United States, but Sir Charles Tupper told him (Mr. Foster) that it was due to the unfortunate manner in which he carried out the fishery regulations.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, no.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think I am quoting the exact words when I say—

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask my hon. friend—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) has made a statement which is either correct or not correct. He has appealed to the "Hansard"; will he read the "Hansard"?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I can recollect the words very well.

Mr. FOSTER. Why does not the hon. gentleman read from the speech?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) said that he would be sorry to take responsibility for the manner in which these regulations had been enforced during the past few years.

Mr. FOSTER. Are you quoting from "Hansard"?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am quoting from the hon. gentleman's speech; I think I have it correctly.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) had to take his whipping on that occasion. By the manner in which he (Mr. Foster) enforced the regulations, he had brought about what the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) who moved the treaty, declared to be a state of commercial war, and Sir Charles Tupper added: It is well known that the distance between commercial war and real war is only imaginary. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was directly charged, because of the manner in which he had administered the regulations, with having brought the two countries to the verge of actual war.

I propose now to revert to the rights which we have guaranteed to us by the Treaty of Washington. Can there be any doubt as to what these treaty rights are?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is not the question.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman will find out what the question is in a moment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is a question of how far they can be enforced and at what time?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will show the hon. gentleman there is no danger. I tell the hon. gentleman that he wants to surrender before there is danger, and I tell him too, that it is time enough to surrender our rights when they are threatened and when we cannot maintain them. We on this side of the House say, in the first place, that we can maintain our rights, and we say in the second place that the Opposition are seeking to surrender Canadian rights before even they are threatened. Now, let us see what the section of the treaty says:

The navigation of the rivers Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine, ascending and descending to and from the sea, shall for ever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty and to the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of either country within its own territory not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

Therefore, we have guaranteed us by treaty—the highest form of national compact I know of—the free and open navigation of that river, subject only to such municipal regulations as either country may see fit to adopt for the protection of its revenue. Does the hon. gentleman want to know what construction the United States places upon treaties of that kind? If he does, let him look at the controversy which took place between Mr. Evarts, the Secretary of State for the United States of America, and the British Government a few years ago with reference to the treaty giving the Americans the right of fishing on the shores of Newfoundland. The Americans had the right to enter, in common with British subjects, on the shores in the Bay of Fortune, Newfoundland; and when they went there to fish they found themselves met with municipal regulations, declaring that they should not fish on Sundays, that they should not fish with meshes of a certain kind, and other such provisions. What stand did the United States take upon that? They said: We cannot acknowledge that any municipal regulations can limit, much less destroy the rights which are guaranteed us by treaty; we have the right to fish here by treaty, and you cannot take away that right from us by saying we shall not fish on Sundays. The United States contended: we have the right here to fish and you cannot minimize that right by declaring that we can only fish in a certain way. And, submitting their proposition and enforcing it with very powerful arguments, they induced the English Government to accept the stand they took. Both Governments are therefore upon record as declaring that defined treaty rights cannot be minimized or detracted from by any municipal regulations.

No one denies, Mr. Speaker, that the principal right which is attempted to be conceded by this article is the right of free navigation of the Stikine and other named rivers for commercial purposes. Well, Sir, what do we find? The treaty must be construed in the light of the subject matter with which it deals. Here is a river which is said to have about four feet of water in depth. We find that provision is made for ocean-borne freight to be carried to the mouth of that river, and to go up it. Does not common sense suggest to you that ocean ships drawing thirteen or fourteen feet of water cannot go up a river with only four feet of water? As a necessary incident, therefore, to navigation, the right of transshipment exists. Now, nobody denies that the subsidiary right follows the major or principal right; and that right being guaranteed to us by treaty, it can never be taken away from us nor minimized by municipal regulations. I have tried to explain to the hon. gentleman that in his unpatriotic course he has misread and misunderstood the 13th section of the American Bill. That section makes no reference whatever to transshipment or free navigation. It makes no attack whatever on the treaty rights which we have there, but the hon. gentleman is so anxious to surrender our rights that he cries out to the Government to surrender those rights before they are attacked.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, but to render ourselves independent of American action.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is giving aid and comfort to the enemy at a most critical time in his country's history.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Why did the hon. gentleman's leader say that he agreed with me in almost every word I said?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman misunderstood my leader very much, just as he misunderstands the text of section 13 of the American Bill. The hon. gentleman knows that a commercial contest is going on between the cities on the western coast of the United States, and the cities on the western coast of Canada, the result of which may be of vital importance to the future of Canada. The question is whether Tacoma, Seattle and San Francisco shall be built up by the Yukon trade, or whether the cities of Vancouver and Victoria shall be built up, as well as Montreal and Toronto. That is a contest for the millions upon millions of dollars of trade which will be the result of the opening up of the Yukon country. Both countries are contending for it. We have built an all-Canadian line, because we believe the trade belongs to us, and because we believe that by reason of that all-Canadian line it can be preserved to us, and the hon. gentleman stands to-day in the unpatriotic and undignified position of trying to destroy the policy of the Government—of playing into the hands of the American people, and of endeavouring to induce us to adopt a policy which would certainly result in handing over this trade to the cities of Seattle, Tacoma and San Francisco.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The very reverse.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Sir, I leave the hon. gentleman in the humiliating position he occupies to-day. I use the word humiliating more especially with reference to the pledges he made when Parliament met, that this Bill would not only receive his own hearty and cordial assent, because it was a Bill to develop Canadian interests, but that it would receive the cordial and patriotic support of the party which he led; and, having made this statement on the eve of the meeting of Parliament, he comes now and asks the Government to withdraw the Bill in order that American interests may be promoted which is a humiliating position for the hon. gentleman to occupy.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIN. I hear a cry of "oh," across the House. I wonder if that is the singing of the Klondike nightingale. Mr. Speaker, a few evenings ago I called attention to the string of absurdities that was given to this House by the hon. gentleman who occupies the high position of Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton); and what has occurred in the American Senate has illustrated the character of that speech. Now, Sir, in the light of what we have heard, I want to call attention to one of the florileges of that speech. We have the hon. gentleman asserting that it is impossible to suppose that the United States could do anything so absurd as we have evidence this morning that it has done. The hon. gentleman had the confidence, which was not the confidence of debate but the confidence of defiance, almost aggressive defiance to this side of the House; and, as he did with regard to other matters, he changed his tone, and here is what he said:

The only question of importance is the question of transshipment.

Well, I understood the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Sir Louis Davies) to say that there is no such question in it now at all, although, if I understood him at the beginning of his extraordinary harangue—because I cannot characterize it in any other way—he said that there was a question of transshipment. However, the Minister of the Interior goes on:

That is a question upon which we can give no positive statement, because, although the matter has been brought to the attention of the United States Government, they have not yet expressed an opinion on the subject. It is a question which, if disputed, must be decided either by negotiation or by reference to a competent tribunal.

Which might take six years; but even the Minister of the Interior does not dare to say that the question would be settled in six years.

An hon. MEMBER. Louder.

Mr. DAVIN. I am trying to imitate the stentorian tones of the Minister of the Interior and of the Minister who has just sat down, and I may quote the lines:

Once upon Afric's sultry shore,
An angry lion gave a dreadful roar;
Another lion made another roar,
And the first lion thought the last a bore.

Sir, I am not going to roar so loud as the Minister of the Interior or the hon. Minister who has just taken his seat; but before I sit down I am going to do what no Minister on the Treasury benches has dared to do—deal with this question in a very few words and in a practical manner. The Minister of the Interior went on:

But it must be evident that it is utterly out of the question for the Government of Canada, under the extraordinary circumstances in which we are placed, to think of opening up diplomatic negotiation and waiting until we got a question of that kind settled, before we proceeded to deal with the building of the railway.

Well, Sir, in the name of all that is rational, would it not be the very thing you would do when you are building on the possibility of being able to tranship? "It would be a ridiculous proposition," said the hon. gentleman, and then, further on, he said :

They might possibly say that we were entitled to the privilege of transshipment ; but, under the extraordinary circumstances, it would probably take us some time to get them to say so. Under the circumstances, the negotiations might be prolonged for several years.

If the negotiations were to be prolonged for several years, in the mind of the Minister of the Interior, and that was in no way to destroy the usefulness of his 150 mile-route. How comes it that the Prime Minister tells us to-day that it is part of his policy in this Bill not to depend upon Wrangel, but to build down to a Canadian port ? Then, the hon. Minister of the Interior goes on to say, and really that is a specimen of the florilege of the learned gentleman :

And the miners, the poor men, for whom hon. gentlemen opposite expressed such sympathy, if they were waiting for something to eat until we made a treaty with the United States, might be sad and hungry before that treaty was signed.

But, Sir, after what has taken place in the American Senate, even if we pass this measure, these men admitting the urgency, which I do not, may stay hungry for a long time.

Just one word, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the question as to whether there is any alternative line. My right hon. friend the First Minister, like his colleague, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), doubted the idea of the Edmonton route and cast contempt upon the route via Prince Albert. I will at a later period, go into this question, but at the moment allow me to say that a more practical route for reaching the Klondike than the one through the Peace River country and having its termini at Prince Albert and Edmonton does not exist in Canada. That has too the advantage of being an all-Canadian route. After all the talk and worry that we have had about the all-Canadian route, which, it was said, this Bill would give us, where is that route to-day ? In order to turn aside public attention from the position in which the Government is—beaten to its knees—the hon. Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) took the course he has often taken in court when he has had a bad case. He went howling to the jury, and talked of everything else but the question at issue. He ventured to cast a slur on men who wear on their bosoms the honours given them by Her Majesty for services rendered in building up the Empire ; he ventured to make a charge against men who, unlike himself and those associated with him, who have been for twenty-five years deceiving the people and the Senate of the United States by their misleading eloquence, have a life long record of loyalty—he ventured to say that a veteran hero, like the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) wanted to surrender, when all that he wanted to do was to save the name and the honour and dignity of the Canadian people. I would ask the right hon. the First Minister and his subordinate—

An hon. MEMBER. Steady.

Mr. DAVIN. I thought at first that I heard the Klondike eagle, but it is the Yukon bray. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who spoke with some force in support of this Bill, had the effrontery to tell this House that it was a proposition to build a railway which would not cost the people a cent. That was one of the beautiful features of the Bill. But the first words that fell from the right hon. First Minister to-day, when he rose to reply to the hon. leader of the Opposition, were to the effect that it was part of the policy of the Government to ask without delay for an appropriation to continue the line right down to a Canadian port. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is evidently part and parcel of the policy of the Government to take up again and again a position and then surrender it ; and as my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) says, when they do surrender it, they get up and boast that they have accomplished some great achievement. The practical position to-day forces us to put the question : What is the use of passing a Bill that will give 3,700,000 acres of gold land to Mann & Mackenzie for building 150 miles of railway, when that Bill contemplates, according to the statement of the First Minister, an extension of 300 miles of railway, which no doubt he will have to bonus Mann & Mackenzie for building. Mr. Jennings calculates that $23,000 a mile is what the Stikine road will cost ? Are the Government going to bonus this additional extension at the rate of $23,000 a mile, in spite of the declaration still ringing in our ears that not one cent was to be taken out of the pockets of the Canadian people to build railways to the Klondike ? Evidently they are, because we have the right hon. First Minister declaring that, in spite of this declaration, it has been the policy of the Government all along to build this extension. We shall appeal to you, he exclaims, for an appropriation to extend this line 300 miles, you will then have a Canadian terminus, and we make this appeal because we are a patriotic party. For twenty months these hon. gentlemen have been a patriotic party and have forgotten the cries of twenty years. Out upon such statesmanship, and let me say to the hon. Minister of the Interior he has now a practical exposition of the embodiment of what is and what is not the instinct of government.

Mr. McINERNEY. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is a somewhat critical moment in the history of Canada, and that it is our duty, as it is the duty of every patriotic citizen in this country, to advise the Government at this critical time in the sober, solemn and conscientious language of truth. It is no time, Sir, for faltering. It is time we should tell this Government exactly what its duty is towards this country, and having found what the duty of this Administration is towards the country, to help it in the fulfilment and performance of that duty. That is the position which I for one intend to take, and it is the purpose of expressing my views in that way that I now take my feet. It is plain to anybody that the balloon sent up a few days ago, inflated by the gas of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), has fallen into a sea of trouble, and that the different members of the Administration, after looking around in vain for life buoys and preservers to save themselves, have at last appealed to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) to get up enough wind to blow the wrecked balloon ashore. I was delighted with the position taken to-day by the right hon. leader of the Government when he said, in no mistaken tones, that he believed we have the full and complete right of navigation, carrying with it the incidental right of transshipment at the mouth of the Stikine River at Fort Wrangel. I was glad to see him take that position even though it was not an entirely logical one for him to take. I believe that that was a patriotic stand for the right hon. gentleman to take at this time, but I was ashamed to see him desert it at the very next moment. If we have the right to navigate the Stikine River and transship at Wrangel, why not continue with this Bill and build the road down to that place or as near it as possible? But in the very next breath the hon. gentleman forsook that position because he next proposed to build the road down to Port Simpson. The two positions are inconsistent. If he believed we had the right to navigate the Stikine and transship there, why not stand by that position? Why desert it immediately afterwards and declare that he will build 300 miles further down to Port Simpson.

Then immediately afterwards, discussing the Edmonton route, he asked: How can we possibly build the Edmonton route—1,500 miles of railway from Edmonton to Dawson City? But, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary, in order to have the Edmonton route, to build 1,500 miles of railway. Four hundred miles from Edmonton will carry us to the Liard River and give navigation over the Liard down to Dawson City, and will open up an agricultural country before which there is a great future.

But what I rose particularly to do was to point out the difference between the position taken to-day by the right hon. First Minister, for which I commend him, and that taken a few days ago by his colleague the hon. Minister of Interior (Mr. Sifton) and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). The Minister of the Interior, in his speech on the second reading said, most distinctly, in answer to the question of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) that our rights to the Stikine River had been seriously curtailed by the Treaty of 1871. Is that true or is it not? At page 662 of "Hansard" in his speech, the Minister of the Interior said:

We are indebted to the sublime statesmanship of our friends on the other side for the curtailment, to a very great extent, of the privileges which we did enjoy on the Stikine River.

And, further on, the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked him this question:

I rise merely for information, and would ask the hon. gentleman if I am right in understanding him to argue that our rights under the treaty between Russia and Great Britain were curtailed by this provision of the Washington Treaty?

To which the Minister of the Interior replied:

I should say yes. If the hon. gentleman desires to dispute it, I think I will be able to satisfy him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not wish to argue it, but wish to have the hon. gentleman's statement.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. (Reading.) "The navigation of the rivers Yukon and Porcupine and Stikine, ascending and descending from, to and into the sea." Every word of this clause is important. That is, we have the right to get in and out by the sea, not simply from the mouth of the river—because a point might arise there—but we have the right to go to the sea wherever it shall be.

The hon. gentleman sets up a doubt in that sentence, as to whether we have a right to go into the Stikine River from its mouth. Against that position we have the position taken by the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) took up, almost to the same extent, the position assumed by the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). I ventured to assert at the time, when I followed him, that no other member of this Administration, no other gentleman on that side of the House, from that time forward would venture to assume any such position in this House. I ventured to point out what the patriotic duty of the Government was, and I am glad to see that the right hon. leader of the House has at last come to a full sense of his duty. The right hon. gentleman, however, was very illogical. He said: We preferred the Stikine River route because it was the only one on which we had navigation rights; it was the only all-Canadian route. The right hon. gentleman must have read the Treaty of 1871; he must have read the provisions of the treaty, the finishing clause of section 26 of which reads:

That the navigation rights shall be subject to any law and regulation of either country within its own territory not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

Now, he must have known, when he chose the Stikine River route, that navigation of the river was subject to the laws and regulations of the United States. I am here to take the position boldly, that this treaty is no curtailment of the rights we gained under the Treaty of 1825; for under the Treaty of 1825 we had only commercial rights; we had not the right to take an armed force, or even a police force, up the Stikine River. Our rights were simply the rights of commercial navigation, and these same rights guaranteed by the Treaty of 1825 were maintained under the Treaty of 1871. But, in the next breath, the right hon. gentleman stated that we owned Dyea. If Dyea is our property, if he believes it to be our property, why not build the road to Dyea, for there then would be less difficulty about the Dyea route into the Yukon than there is about the Stikine route. But the hon. gentleman comes down and, though he does not make the formal proposition, we can infer from what he says that he is prepared to saddle the country with the additional expense of building 200 miles further to Port Simpson, and this only as the tail end of a proposition by which he gives Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann no less than four million acres of the rich mining land of that region for the building of 150 miles of road. After they had given a price which would build the line by the Edmonton route, he proposes a further subsidy to build this 200 miles south to Port Simpson. What we have protested against, do protest against, and will continue to protest against, is this tremendous grant of public lands to this company for the building of a bit of road that is of no practical value.

But I rose particularly to make the protest which I now proceed to make. As a member coming from the maritime provinces, I hold dear the interests of the fishermen down by the sea. I wish to warn this Government, to advise this Government, to admonish this Government, that they shall not, in making any arrangement with the United States authorities, barter away, exchange or sacrifice in any manner the rights and privileges that our fishermen enjoy at the present time. What are these rights? Everybody who knows anything of that part of the country knows that the fishermen from Cape Ann and Gloucester come up to the Gulf of St. Lawrence every year. They must bring with them stores for a season's fishing and bait for a season's fishing, or pay the tax of $1.25 per ton. Their vessels are from 100 to 150 tons. They would feel such a tax, and they do not pay it. Our fishermen go out into the same waters and enter into competition with them. They catch the same description of fish, they take the same riches from the storehouse of the sea. And, when it comes to marketing their catch, they find that their great markets are in the United States. But, when they enter into competition with the American fishermen in that market, they find a duty of from 1 cent to 1½ cents per pound against them on the whole catch. What I protest against is the idea that, while Americans put upon our fishermen a handicap of from 1 cent to 1½ cents per pound on our fish, American fishermen shall be allowed the same rights and privileges on our Atlantic waters as our fishermen enjoy. I ask this Government to be true to the interests of the country, and particularly to the rights of the hardy men down by the sea, the fishermen of the maritime provinces—to be true to them and for no consideration to barter away their heritage for any concession that the American Government may seek to extract from us. I endeavoured to say a short time ago, that, looking at the route which the Government has chosen, looking at the tremendous gift we are making for the building of this road, looking at the temper of the American people at that time, we might expect that they would endeavour, from the vantage ground on which they stand, to wrench from the Government concessions and conditions prejudicial to the people of Canada. I hope—and this is the advice I have to give the Government—that, as patriotic men, they will not sacrifice the interests of any part of Canada or any portion of its people.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I wondered why it was that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) who has just taken his seat, was so anxious to give us his views upon this question; but the mystery has been explained by the strong "piscatorial effluvium" which appeared towards the end of his remarks.

Mr. McINERNEY. It was not a horse-stable effluvium.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. The hon. gentleman is a very eloquent and pleasing speaker, and shows evidence of having careful training in his youth, however much he may have departed from the way in which he should go. He displays great commiseration for the poor fishermen, and says he would not under any circumstance barter away their rights. But he forgets, perhaps, that his views have undergone a change since 1888, when the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), who was not then his leader, I believe, in that memorable Treaty of 1888, was prepared to give away the very rights for which the hon. gentleman so stoutly contends to-day. The hon. gentleman, though perhaps somewhat thrasonical in his speech, is a very worthy and respected member of this House, and his remarks on the Yukon Railway and the Yukon contract will be entitled to a great deal more attention after he has mastered the geography of that northern country.

I am very certain that no member who has spoken on this subject hitherto in this House has displayed the same amount of crude and crass ignorance in regard to the north-western part of the Dominion of Canada, as has the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and I am sure those gentlemen who know that country, and who understand to some extent at least the geography of that country, will have that opinion very much strengthened by his remarks in regard to the Edmonton route this afternoon, when he speaks about building to the Liard River. He speaks as did the hon. gentleman who preceded him, he drags in again the tremendous amount of land, and the value of the land which is being given to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann on account of the construction of this railway. That land appears to be a nightmare on that hon. gentleman's brain. Now I would like to make a proposition, I am not making this proposition officially, but I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite if they think it would be possible at the present time to get a syndicate in Canada which would take up 3,750,000 acres of that land at $1 an acre, that land to be selected on the same terms as this proposed to be transferred to Mackenzie & Mann, and the money to be paid before the goods are delivered?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Well, now, let us look at that matter in a business-like way. I do not believe that any such syndicate could be formed in Canada to-day; and I would like for my part to have some guarantee of the bona fides of those hon. gentlemen who say, yes. Now this road is going to be, as we all know, a very expensive road to build, and $1 an acre, which would only be $3,750,000, or $25,000 per mile, is a small estimate for what that road is going to cost. A great deal has been said about the value of the land, that I do not think is of very much importance. I think I have answered fairly well all the remarks of the last speaker, and I will now deal with a much more congenial subject. We all like to hear the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) speak. When the hon. member for West Assiniboia rises to speak the House at once assumes an attitude of expectation. It always reminds me of a story of a little boy whose mamma got a stammering station agent to tell her a dozen times what time the 12 o'clock train would pass the station. The station agent finally wanted an explanation why the lady asked him so often the same question. Oh, she says, it doesn't matter to me, I know perfectly well what you said, but my little boy likes to see your mouth work. Now that is about the explanation of the popularity of the hon. member for West Assiniboia in this House, this House likes to see the hon. member's mouth work. The hon. member talks very loudly and very eloquently; in fact, as he describes it himself, he roars, and he roared at a great rate about this all-Canadian route, and about the difficulties of transshipment, and the difficulties that were going to be thrown in our way by the United States Senate. Now, it is a well understood fact that we do not need to tranship at Wrangel at all. We have heard a great many arguments in this House based on the ground that transshipment at Wrangel is going to be prevented, but that is not necessary at all. The Hudson Bay Company navigate the Stikine River from Port Simpson, during the season of navigation, with flat-bottomed boats. Gentlemen who are familiar with the case know perfectly well that navigation on the inland waters of that coast is perfectly safe, with the exception of crossing the mouth of Dixon's entrance, and that is dangerous to vessels of any kind when the wind is high. So there is no very great difficulty. We have an all-Canadian route without any doubt. Again and again we have asked hon. gentlemen opposite if they have any thing better to propose, but there is nothing better they can propose. But the hon. member for West Assiniboia dilated very largely upon this. The hon. gentleman talks a great deal in this House, and perhaps it would be as well for him to understand a little more about some of the things he talks on before he takes up so much of the time of this House in regard to them. Now I want just to say a word or two in regard to another matter which has been brought up several times in this House.

Mr. DAVIN. Would my hon. friend answer me a question?

Mr. RUTHERFORD. If I can.

Mr. DAVIN. Would you like my knowledge to be as profound and correct as that of your leader the Minister of the Interior?

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Well, now, on that ground I would not feel quite so safe when the hon. gentleman rose to speak. I am very glad indeed that that hon. gentleman is not gifted as highly as my hon. leader, the Minister of the Interior. He sits on the wrong side of the House, but if the hon. gentleman were to mend his ways and come over here, then I think perhaps he would increase his knowledge on a great many subjects. The hon. gentleman is a very fine speaker, it is his principal avocation. As I understand, he has done little or nothing else in all his life, and consequently he is very good at it. But he goes far afield some times for his similes. I heard him during this session compare my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to the devil.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Of course he took a very polite devil. He went to Milton and brought Beelzebub, and he compared the hon. Premier to Beelzebub. And just to show how consistent these hon. gentlemen are on the opposite side, I think it was only the day before that the ex-Minister of Finance compared him to Marguerite. Now you know it is pretty hard for a man to maintain his composure when he is compared by one hon. gentleman to Marguerite and by another to Beelzebub. The hon. member for West Assiniboia appears to have gone deeply into diabolical literature, he seems to have studied the devil to a great extent, to have followed out his whole life, and, I have no doubt, not only his life but his works. His works have received considerable attention at the hands of the member for West Assiniboia. But I would like to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to another poetical devil who has appeared of late years, and that is the devil created by the famous author of Our Lady of the Snows. If the hon. gentleman will consult the works of that author, he will find that in addition to Milton and other poets whom he consulted in his researches after a devil, that distinguished author has also created a devil. In one of his poems on the devil he has, I think, given the most apt description of the speeches of the hon. member for Assiniboia that I have ever heard, and I am sure this House will realize the similarity as soon as they hear the quotation. The devil sent out his imps to search a poor unfortunate who had arrived at his gates, and they came back with this report—and I am sure hon. gentlemen will recognize the likeness after hearing one of the hon. gentleman's speeches—the report was this :

We have threshed a stook of print and book,
And winnowed a chattering wind ;
And many a soul from whom he stole,
But his we cannot find.

Now, Sir, I am sure that that is a very apt description of the hon. gentleman. I have risen from my seat this afternoon, not so much to discuss this important question that has come before us to-day, as to call attention to the readiness of the hon. member for West Assiniboia to take up the time of this House. I trust that we will hear no more of this nonsense in this debate. We have gone on now for three weeks wasting valuable time, not only of this House but of this country, and we are tired of it, and I am sure the people of this country are tired of it. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been asked, time and again, to suggest anything better than this contract which has been laid before the House, and I hope they will do it or let us come to a vote in a short time, because we are all tired of this chattering wind of talk, and I hope we will hear no more of it. I apologize humbly for taking up the time of the House, but at the same time I could not help bringing in that exceedingly apt description of the hon. member for West Assiniboia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has treated us to somewhat of a confidential lecture as to the manner in which we should conduct ourselves in debate in this House. He has referred to the sublime ignorance of my able hon. friend from Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney) and to my able hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), as frittering away the time; and he then continued his speech by contributing to this discussion a profound knowledge of the Yukon Railway deal, and has continued to consume the time of the House by giving us good solid information which we all value, and which we all received with gratitude. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing any point which the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) referred to, because of points there were none; but I rise for the purpose of saying a word or so germane to the subject under discussion this afternoon, and perhaps incidentally to the larger question which has been dragged into the debate by members, especially on the Government side, as a defence of the propositions which have been made to the House. I am sure this House was delighted this afternoon at the calm and judicial manner in which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries discussed this great international question. For my part, I felt when I listened to his calm and judicious speech, that it was a time when all party feelings should disappear, that we should unite around that common, unbiassed and non-partisan standard he raised and support him in almost everything he proposed, so loud was his loyalty and so at variance were his statements with the facts he presented.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries told the House this afternoon that his youthful training led him at all times to appear as a friend of this country, and never to interject at a critical moment a word which might discredit this country or weaken its case abroad. I can only say that the hon. Minister for fifteen or sixteen years cast to the winds his youthful training, and on every possible occasion in this House at most critical times in the history of this country, the hon. gentleman was found not following out his youthful training, but discrediting the Government, weakening the Canadian case and in every possible way, as the evidence in "Hansard" will show to a conclusion, strengthening the case of his American friends on this continent, as he dealt with trade matters, with fishery matters and with international disputes generally. And the very same fervour he displayed this afternoon was used hundreds of times from the desk in front of me when he fought against the late Government, which, whatever its mistakes, did its best to maintain British connection and to fight for British rights and privileges on the continent of America.

And what else did the hon. gentleman do? He attempted in the remarks he addressed to the House to discredit a British statesman, the leader of the Opposition in this House. Well, Sir, this House does not need a certificate of character for the leader of the Opposition from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. For forty years my hon. friend has been in public life in this country and has been in the forefront of the battle, and I challenge the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to place his finger on a single line in all that forty years' record to show that the leader of the Opposition has not fought for the maintenance of British and Canadian rights on this continent. There is little reward for patriotism in Canadian politics if a mere tyro, and I say it advisedly, such as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is able to rise and attack the record of a man who, with his faults—and we all have our faults—was never yet charged, either in British or American circles, with having deserted the fight for British and Canadian rights on this continent. Not only did the Minister of Marine make this attack, but the hon. gentleman was not sure of his facts.

What is the point before the House this afternoon. If I have grasped it, it is this: The question has been raised as to interference by the American people with certain rights and privileges, which under the Treaty of Washington we believe and assert we hold with regard to the navigation of the Stikine and other rivers. The question has arisen as to why an anti-Canadian feeling has been created among the people of the United States, and why they seek to interfere with what are our undoubted rights and privileges in connection with that treaty. It has been asserted on this side of the House, and asserted with faith in the truth of that statement, that the anti-Canadian feeling, or if you like to put it, the anti-Conservative feeling, the feeling of the United States people against the Conservative Administration, was created, inflamed and excited by hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches at the present time. I am open to correction when I say that at this moment the anti-Canadian feeling, the feeling that we were dependent on the pleasure of the United States, which exists there, would not exist at the present time to one-thousandth part of its present dimensions had it not been for the speeches delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and by the right hon. Premier, who though now he holds a place in the Privy Council of Great Britain, was at that time, not the paid advocate, but certainly the advocate of the American contention on the questions of international law. On the other side we have the statement of the Minister of Marine that that feeling has been caused by the arbitrary and very severe conduct of the Department of Marine and Fisheries in connection with the Treaty of 1818. That is, as I understand it, and the hon. Minister can deny what I say if that was not his contention in this House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not say it was caused by that. But I said the hon. member for

Mr. MONTAGUE.

York (Mr. Foster) was very severely reprimanded by the hon. leader of the Opposition when he introduced a Bill to approve the Washington Treaty, and the hon. gentleman stated he would be sorry to take the responsibility of endorsing that regulation, for it had brought the country to the verge of war.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am pleased the hon. gentleman has made his statement, because the subject is now fresh within the memory of the House. The hon. gentleman will perhaps permit me to go over it. The hon. gentleman has said practically this, that when the present leader of the Opposition came back to this country as one of the plenipotentiaries who negotiated the Treaty of 1888 with the Americans as regards the fisheries, he found it necessary to severely reprimand his present colleague the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), who was then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, for having conducted his department so as to cause a very strong feeling or irritation among the people of the United States, and he so stated in his speech in the House. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us ascertain how much truth there is in this statement. The hon. gentleman can send, if he wishes, for the "Hansard" of 1888, volume I., and in order that the hon. gentleman may not trouble himself to find the page, I will state that Sir Charles Tupper's speech appears on page 673.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have got it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am glad he has. The hon. gentleman never read it, or he misstated it with a knowledge of the facts. If the hon. gentleman had it, I say, he either did not read it or has stated what is incorrect, or he stated what was incorrect after he read it. As I stated this afternoon, I challenge the hon. gentleman to point to one single act, during the forty years of his public life, which would show that the leader of the Opposition had deserted the fight for British and Canadian rights upon this continent of America. I challenge him (Sir Louis Davies) as a member of the Government, after having made that deliberate statement in this House—I challenge him to read line after line of that speech, and to find a single utterance which would bear out the statement he made this afternoon. Now, Sir, I shall read to the House the reference of the present leader of the Opposition to the administration of the Department of Fisheries, and I shall read it for the benefit of the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) and allow him to draw his own conclusions. Here it is ("Hansard," p. 676, second column), and the then plenipotentiary, Sir Charles Tupper, declared as follows:—

When my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was compelled to adopt the same policy that had been adopted by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), who organized that department with great ability, and who filled the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries with equally great ability during a considerable time—I say when the Minister of Marine and Fisheries fell back upon the same policy his predecessor had adopted under like circumstances and took such measures as were absolutely necessary and indispensable for the protection of the rights and interests of the fishermen of Canada, the United States complained bitterly.

Is there any condemnation there? Is it not a declaration that the steps taken by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries were absolutely necessary and indispensable for the protection of Canadian rights and interests? A few lines further down, Sir Charles Tupper says:

The result was that, as before, collisions occurred. Those parties brought themselves under the operation of the law, and it was absolutely necessary, as I have said, in the defence of the rights of Canadian fishermen, to make examples of those parties who showed that disregard for law. The result was, an entirely erroneous impression grew up through the United States.

Is there any condemnation there? Not a single word, not a single line. Then, go to page 677 of "Hansard":

Although we were not giving an ungenerous or an extreme interpretation to the treaty at all,—

Mark you these words:

—but were simply doing that, which my hon. friend opposite found it necessary to do, as did his successor, that is, to defend the just rights of the fishermen of Canada—and no Government would be worthy of the name who would shrink for a single moment from that duty—the result was that because we took this action the sentiment of public men in the United States became inflamed, and instead of thinking of anything like increased freedom of commercial intercourse or of anything that was calculated to be of advantage or benefit to the two countries, they had recourse to the passage of what was called a retaliatory Act.

Now, I want to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, where he finds his condemnation in that? Sir Charles Tupper declares here that the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Foster) was carrying out the provisions of a treaty that was absolutely necessary for the protection of the rights of Canadian fishermen, and he further declares: No Government could exist in Canada, or would be worthy of the name of a Government, that did not carry out the same policy which the late Minister of Finance, then the Minister of Fisheries, had carried out on behalf of Canada. You will find that in every line of his that refers to the action of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as regards this dispute in connection with the rights of the Canadian and American fishermen, the administration of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) of the Fisheries Department is backed up and defended by the gentleman who made the Treaty of 1888 with the United States. In the face of these facts, what did the old country say, what did the Government of Great Britain say?

Sir, we are all aware that the Government of Great Britain is anxious for the most amicable feeling to exist between herself and her great daughter upon this side of the Atlantic. She takes the greatest possible pains that that amicable feeling should exist, and if the Government of Canada had acted in an arbitrary and mean and contemptible spirit, we should not have had merely the reprimand of Sir Charles Tupper, who was the plenipotentiary to the United States, but we should have had the reprimand of the Government of Great Britain herself. Instead of the reprimand of the Government of Great Britain, the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) ought to know, as Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that the Government of Canada then received the commendation of the Home Government for the careful, and painstaking, and just manner in which we had dealt with this question as between the United States and Canada, or, if you like, as between the United States and Great Britain. So I say, that the statement made by the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies), this afternoon, and made for the purpose of showing the country, or attempting to show the country, that it was the Conservative party that created this ill-feeling in the United States towards Canada—that statement is absolutely false and unfounded. I have shown, Sir, that in the speech which the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) referred to as his foundation for that statement, there is not one jot or tittle of justification for any such statement.

But to speak of the treaty matter a little further. Where does the right hon. the present Prime Minister stand? As you are well aware, all the parties to that Treaty of 1888 confirmed it with the exception of the Senate of the United States. You remember that the Senate of the United States rejected that treaty, and, Sir, while the action of the Senate was yet alive in regard to it, the right hon. the present Prime Minister of this country stood up in St. Thomas and declared that the United States Senate were correct, that we had been wrong, and that our treatment of the people of the United States had been mean and contemptible. I ask, then, in regard to this treaty matter, who it was that created this feeling against the people of Canada in the minds of statesmen, as well as of ordinary citizens in the United States? Who was it but the Prime Minister of this Dominion? Who was it but the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who, not satisfied with talking this rot, and trash, and rubbish to Canadian audiences, went abroad, to the United States, and there deliberately offered our commercial freedom as a price to the United States. Sir, I have heard a good many queer things in this Parliament, but I never expected to hear hon. gentlemen opposite charge that it was gentlemen upon this side of the House, members of the Conservative party, who had created a feeling of irritation in the minds of the people of the United States in regard to the people of Canada.

Now, Sir, just one word and I have done, and that word is this: I was in this House when the first reading of this Yukon Railway Bill was moved by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), and I want to ask the Government now, whether or not the difficulty which has cropped up at this stage, and which is a very serious difficulty indeed, was not fully pointed out at the time this Bill was introduced. We asked the question of the gentleman who introduced the Bill: Before you come to a conclusion to construct the railway which you refer to in this contract, have you found out whether it is likely that there will be any international difficulties as regards the all-Canadian nature of that route? And, Sir, we had the Minister of Railways compelled to confess to this House, that he had made no inquiries, that the subject had not received consideration.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I beg your pardon. That is not correct, you know.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, it may be a little incorrect as regards the words; I am speaking, of course, entirely from memory; but I will tell him this: That the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) said he was not aware that any inquiries had been made about the matter. What a position the hon. gentleman is in—a leading member of the Government, a Minister of Railways and Canals, speaking for the Government of Canada, dealing with a matter involving the handing over of 3,750,000 acres of territory to contractors, and saying this afternoon that he did not even take the pains to inquire whether a great question involved in it had been touched upon, or whether inquiries had been made in regard to it. That was not the object. The object was to rush through the Bill, it did not make any difference whether international complications would arise or not. We had an inkling, just a little inkling, in the speech of the hon. Prime Minister in an early part of the debate, of what might happen. He said that this road was only a temporary expedient, or something to that effect. A temporary expedient, surely, because we had the admission from him this afternoon that this Parliament is only on the threshold of Yukon deals—only on the stepping-stone of the great staircase that leads up to Yukon deals. We are giving away 3,750,000 acres of mineral lands in the Yukon for 150 miles of railway; and then we have to build, I think he said, 250 miles more before we have an all-Canadian route. In other words, he is giving away surely all that this country can afford to give of the golden Yukon, and he has not got a railway at all. To my mind, no more extraordinary position was ever taken by a Government in this country. It seems that the whole thing was rushed and bungled from the beginning. It seems that there was no inquiry as to the cost of the railway, no inquiry as to these international questions, no real inquiry as to any of the great factors involved in the construction of this railway, but that the deal had to be consummated in a very few days, and this country must suffer by reason of the neglect of hon. gentlemen in these respects. I have risen, however, specially for the purpose of pointing out the weakness in the statement of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and I shall be glad now to conclude in order that that hon. gentleman may be able to give his evidence to the House that Sir Charles Tupper, if I may be excused for naming him, castigated the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries for his unkind treatment of the United States in connection with the fisheries question.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Mr. Speaker, I notice that the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, put the question as he considered it to be before the House this afternoon, but during the whole of his remarks carefully avoided dealing with that question.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Will my hon. friend allow me a moment? The hon. gentleman asks me for the reference I made in Sir Charles Tupper's speech. I made reference to two statements. The one was where he declared that the two countries had been brought to the verge of commercial war, and the other was that there was a very thin and narrow partition between that state of things and an actual war. The language, on page 690, is this:

Now, having referred to the various provisions of the treaties, I am happy to say that I shall have to detain the House but a few minutes longer; but I would like to draw the attention of the House to what has been accomplished by this treaty. I have told you what position Canada stood in with regard to the United States of America, before the initiation of these proceedings. I have told that we stood face to face with an enactment which had been put on the statute-book by a unanimous vote of Congress, ratified by the President, providing for non-intercourse between the United States and Canada. I need not tell you that the Bill meant commercial war, that it meant not only the suspension of friendly feeling and intercourse between two countries, but that it involved much more than that. If that Bill had been brought into operation by the proclamation of the President of the United States, I have no hesitation in saying that we stood in the relation to that great country of commercial war, and the line is very narrow which separates a commercial war between two countries from an actual war.

So far with regard to the actual state of matters which the hon. gentleman was describing when he went to Washington to negotiate a treaty; the countries had been brought to the verge of commercial war, and there was little difference between that and actual war.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not by Canada. You are referring to the Bill signed by the United States President.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am referring to the conditions which the hon. gentleman found existing when he went to negotiate a treaty. On a previous page, 687, where the hon. gentleman was leading up to this declaration, where he was referring to the gentleman who brought about on the part of Canada these conditions—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, no.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What else was he referring to? The hon. gentleman said:

I need not inform the House that in diplomatic intercourse it is customary, it is right, for the representatives of a government to state the strongest and most advanced ground that they possibly can sustain in relation to any question, and I would not like, I confess, to be tried before the House by the ground taken by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice and by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Could anything be stronger than that?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Are the words, "Minister of Marine and Fisheries" there?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend has raised some doubt as to whether I have read correctly from the record. Considering the long number of years that I have been in this House—

Mr. MONTAGUE. I accept your statement.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I hope the hon. gentleman would not insinuate that in reading a passage from "Hansard," I would be low or mean enough to read what is not there.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend think that is a sufficient apology for his misrepresentation?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I not only think it was a pretty good castigation, but I remember when it was given how mean the hon. gentleman looked under it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. When my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries rose to prove the allegation he had made in a previous portion of this debate—

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. Minister of Agriculture pardon me for a moment, while I take away even the ground which the hon. gentleman has built up for himself. It is true, the language quoted by the hon.

Minister of Marine and Fisheries was used by Sir Charles Tupper. When he discussed this matter, he said:

I need not inform the House that in diplomatic intercourse it is customary, it is right, for the representatives of a government to state the strongest and most advanced ground that they possibly can sustain in relation to any question, and I would not like, I confess, to be tried before the House by the ground taken by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice and by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The ground they took was quite right.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is what I call a castigation.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman seems to think that in reading that, he has proved conclusively that the present leader of the Opposition did not castigate his present colleague (Mr. Foster) who sits behind him. But if this ground was rightly taken, if the Ministers of that day had right and justice on their side, why was it that the then plenipotentiary came back from Washington and informed this House that he was not prepared to be tried on that ground. We all know full well that the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) came back from Washington, having found that the Government of that day in Ottawa had brought this country to the verge of commercial war, which was only a short step from actual war, and took the then Government by the throat and forced them to change their policy and take other ground. He knew, from his position in Washington as plenipotentiary, that the Imperial authorities were not prepared to back up this country in the position which the Canadian Government had taken. He knew full well that the Government at Ottawa had taken a position which was untenable in the face of that taken by the Washington authorities, and forced the Canadian Government to turn right-about face.

The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) took a long time to discuss what had been quoted and said by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) and some little time to discuss the details of this contract, but did not really touch the question which has arisen here this afternoon at all. He spoke of the interference by the Bill which has just passed the United States Senate with our treaty rights on the Stikine River. Sir, we contend that that Bill, including its clause 13, does not interfere with and does not militate against our treaty rights on the Stikine River. It does not interfere with those rights, because by the treaty we have the right, apart from the bonding privilege, of navigating for commercial purposes the Stikine River. We contend that the privilege of using that highway for commercial purposes entitles us to use it without bonding the goods which may pass up and down it. We contend that we have the privilege of transshipping goods, if necessary to carry on the ordinary and commercial use of the Stikine River as an international highway, and that we have the right of mooring in the river and doing all that may be necessary to our enjoyment of our treaty rights and privileges.

But hon. gentlemen opposite evidently suppose that if our goods are billed from Klondike to any point in Canada up the Stikine River, they must necessarily be bonded at Wrangel. There is no need for taking that position, and in doing so these hon. gentlemen are putting a weapon into the hands of our adversaries at Washington and trying to enable them to interfere with our acknowledged treaty rights.

One hon. gentleman opposite—I think it was the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster)—said that Mr. Hansbrough had obtained information from Canada which made him believe that the Canadian Government were prepared to agree to the stipulations of clause 13 in the American Senate Bill, and intimated that the information must have come from our party or Government. Sir, is it at all likely, if such information has been conveyed to Hansbrough or anybody else in Washington, it would have come from the party and the Government who are to-day trying to put through this contract, which hon. gentlemen opposite say is contingent upon these provisions not existing. On the contrary, if there is any suspicion as to where that information may have come from in Canada, the suspicion would naturally fasten on hon. gentlemen opposite who are to-day obstructing the passages of this Bill for an all-Canadian route and the free navigation of the Stikine. If there are any people in Canada interested in obstruction to our free navigation of the Stikine, it is hon. gentlemen opposite who have been contending for a long time that this is not an all-Canadian route. Before this debate began, the hon. leader of the Opposition approved of this route and contract on the ground that it was an all-Canadian route, yet to-day he tells the country and our enemies in the United States that he favours the withdrawal of the Bill because the American Senate have declared that bonding privileges at Wrangel may be dependent on our giving the Americans bonding privileges on fish on the Atlantic coast. Not because the free navigation of the Stikine is to be interfered with or the commercial use of that highway, but simply because a question as to bonding privileges has arisen in the Congress at Washington, he urges the Government of Canada to withdraw this Bill which is not at all dependent upon such a privilege, and is not interfered with by the Bill at Washington.

The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) said, a few moments ago, that my right hon. friend, the leader of the Government, had gone down to Washington with the proposition that all these questions of difference between us and the United States should be settled in a lump, and he implied therefrom that the right hon. leader of the Government was prepared to accept this partial proposition contained in this clause 13 of the Senate Bill. But surely the fact that my right hon. friend proposed to the United States a commission to adjust all the difficulties between the two countries in one lump, must make it evident that he would not accept for one moment this partial proposition with regard to the special privilege of bonding at Wrangel and on the Atlantic Coast. The course of the right hon. First Minister shows evidently that it is quite impossible he should have undertaken to accept for a moment clause 13 of this Senate Bill; and the hon. gentleman's fears in this regard should have been set at rest by the specific statement which the leader of the Government made this afternoon. But the hon. gentleman went on to say that we ought to leave off the construction of this road until we found out about the right of navigating the Stikine. He wants us to indefinitely postpone its construction. It means that the hon. gentleman is prepared to postpone indefinitely the completing of any railway into the Yukon territory, at least so far as this year is concerned. It means that the hon. gentleman is willing to run the risk of starvation in the Yukon country this year, that the hon. gentleman is prepared not to provide the facilities necessary for the entry of these thousands of people who, we know, are rushing into that country, and whom we wish to see enter that country to develop it and help to assume part of the public obligations of Canada and develop trade and business throughout the country.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at eight o'clock.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I had pointed out that the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) had not really touched upon the main issue before the House, that is to say, the issue raised by the leader of the Opposition, who moved the adjournment of the House in order to declare that in consequence of the passage of a certain Bill by the American Senate, a Bill which touches upon the question of bonding at Wrangel, we should therefore withdraw the Bill now before the House to ratify the contract between the Government and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and should immediately make arrangements for an entirely different route into the Yukon. This is the real question, and I wish to point out most distinctly, that the Government do not consider that the question of bonding at Wrangel has any relation whatever to the free navigation for commercial purposes of the Stikine River, that this Bill passed by the Senate, even if it were to become law, would not interfere with the description of the Stikine-Teslin route as an all-Canadian route, because we believe and contend that under the Washington Treaty Canadian subjects may ship goods up the Stikine River without bonding at Wrangel, and therefore without being in any way interfered with. Believing this, I am surprised that the hon. leader of the Opposition should have taken the step he has taken. I wish to refer to another remark of the hon. member for Haldimand—I think it was he—who said that before we made such a contract as this, we ought to have taken steps to find out whether the American Government would allow the free navigation of the Stikine River, or would be disposed to put obstacles in our way in the enjoyment of that navigation and of the perfect freedom of this Stikine-Teslin route. I am surprised to find any hon. gentleman on the other side, or any citizen of this country anywhere, suggesting that before we introduce legislation into the Parliament of Canada, we should go on our bended knees to the American Senate, or the American Congress, and ask them whether they are going to carry out their treaty stipulations and their treaty obligations. That is not of a piece with the conduct of Canadian affairs in the past. I must give credit to the hon. gentleman himself and most of his colleagues, by saying that it is not of a piece with their usual practice or with the practice of any Canadian statesman or any public men, that before we undertake legislation in the Parliament of Canada, we should go to the American authorities practically to ask their permission. I do not think that the suggestion was made with any thought or forethought. And I am sure that the hon. gentleman and those alongside of him will try to remove the impression from the people of this country that they would assume such a position for a moment. But, Sir, the hon. leader of the Opposition to-day made a statement as to what he would do, as an alternate proposition. He said to me, that he would at once take steps to build a road on to Alice Arm or the Portland Channel, to continue the road down to a seaport which is open all the year around and undoubtedly in Canadian territory. Sir, that is one of the schemes that is under consideration at the present moment, a part of the scheme the Government has actually laid before the House. The road to be built between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake is but one portion of the scheme which, if it is found necessary in the future, the Government of Canada is prepared to carry out. But the hon. gentleman would have us go on with this at once before an opportunity is given the United States authorities to put obstacles in our way of the full enjoyment of our treaty rights. I am surprised at the

hon. gentleman bringing forward this scheme to-day, because it was only last Friday that the hon. gentleman was applauding and endorsing an amendment to a Bill that was before the House of an entirely different character, an amendment moved by his lieutenant from the city of Halifax (Mr. Borden), which does not outline in any way, or in any sense, what the hon. gentleman has proposed this afternoon.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It does, exactly.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. An amendment that is drawn in such a way is of such a milk-and-water character that it is impossible to say what it means, an amendment which does not commit the hon. gentleman or any of his followers to any route, which does not commit them in any way to any means of securing the building of the road.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It says, "by the best available route."

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Which may be any route. We have had some of the hon. gentleman's supporters, this afternoon, declaring that the best route was the Edmonton route; we have had the hon. gentleman's supporter, the hon. ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), declaring that the best route was the Dyea route; we have had the hon. gentleman himself declaring that the Teslin Lake-Stikine route was the best and only available route. What, then, does it mean? The hon. gentleman says this amendment means the best available route, and the object of the amendment which he was applauding on Friday, and to-day he tells us that the route which must be chosen is the Stikine-Teslin route, extended to Alice Arm—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Or Kitinat Arm.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Or some other Canadian port. I am surprised to find this, though perhaps I should not be surprised when I find the hon. gentleman change his mind so completely upon this question already this session. But I confess I am much surprised that the hon. gentleman should have taken the stand that he has taken this afternoon, in so completely giving away, so far as he can do it, the treaty rights of the Canadian people and the Canadian Government. I will do him the justice to say that in this he does not live up to the reputation for courage which he has always enjoyed. He has generally been able vigorously to uphold the rights of Canada. He has generally been in a position where he has been able to lead. But now I find him following some of his followers—or shall I call them his leaders?—just as, a few days ago, after he had declared himself in favour of this proposal, he followed his followers, and declared himself against the Bill. For the last few days of the debate on this contract, the course of gentlemen on the other side has led up to this situation. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been declaring that this Stikine-Teslin route was not an all-Canadian route. but because the American Government might put an obstacle in our way and interfere with our free navigation of the Stikine River at Fort Wrangel, the hon. gentleman to-day, following his supporters, comes forward and tells us that the Canadian Government must withdraw their Bill because of this law which he says has been passed in the American Congress. I am surprised that an hon. gentleman, with the force of character, with the reputation for courage, and with the reputation for insistence in asserting his opinion, should have fallen so far away from his former position and reputation, and that to-day, the moment he sees a shadow of legislation in Washington which he thinks may hurt our route, he is prepared at any cost, in order to defeat a Government Bill, to come here and ask that the whole contention and position of Canada on this treaty right which we have in regard to the Stikine River, should be given up and acknowledged to be without force and effect. I do not expect it from the hon. leader of the Opposition, I regret to see that he has taken this position, and that in doing so he seems to be committing his party, so far as he is able to do so, to the unpatriotic and pusillanimous position that the Canadian Government should withdraw their legislation simply because a Bill has been introduced into the United States Senate to interfere with our bonding privileges, especially as this bonding privilege is not necessary to the full enjoyment of our treaty rights, and to the full enjoyment of the commercial navigation of the Stikine River.

Mr. POPE. This has certainly been an afternoon of humiliation for hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I fancy such a spectacle has never been witnessed before in this or in any other Parliament, and it has put the hon. gentlemen to the test in a work in which they have had considerable experience, that is, in turning right angles in their political way of getting forward. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat did not rise because he knew anything in particular about this contract, outside of the reservation of the arable lands around the North Pole, and outside of what he might be able to judge of this motion as a milk-and-water proposition. As Minister of Agriculture we would expect him to be able to express an opinion upon the proportion of milk and water that are contained in the amendment of the Opposition, but beyond that we had no right to expect much from the hon. gentleman. But every Minister who has spoken upon the other side must speak again, they must put themselves right. They have taken one position in this House, and to-day they must taken another; and every Minister of the Crown is bound, as opportunity presents itself, to rise in this House and state his new position to the people of this country. They have been discussing the question of loyalty. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries said in his remarks, which were somewhat cool and collected, that he had a right to charge us upon this side of the House with being disloyal. Mr. Speaker, I have not been many many years a member of this House, consequently it cannot be so many years ago since I remember the hon. gentleman who is now Postmaster General proposing a resolution of loyalty in this House, after a certain general election in which the Liberal party had taken part in a manner which you never hear them refer to now, in which they had been condemned as a disloyal people for having fraternized with the people on the other side of the line, for having courted their assistance in every possible way, a time when Mr. Wiman's name was a household word in this country, and they could not make a forward movement in their political programme without consulting him. Well, Sir, at that time I, for one, as a member of this House, took part in that whitewashing arrangement—not that we needed it, no man inside this House or outside of it, thought that the Conservative party needed to pass a loyalty resolution; but in order that those hon. gentlemen might present a decent and respectable appearance before the people of Canada, I consented to apply the whitewash brush, and I rose in my seat and voted for that resolution, in order that those hon. gentlemen might be made presentable before the people of Canada. Now, Sir, after having taken part in that work, I think it is extremely unfair for an hon. gentleman who has just been across the water and received special honours from Her Majesty, to come back and, forgetting our kindness upon that occasion when they were in a minority, to use the language that he has used to-night. Now, Sir, the Minister of Agriculture, in his speech which he delivered a few days ago, made use of the following language:

In the first place, the Government look to making an all-Canadian route. We took that as the principle which we thought necessary to maintain and make the essence of the contract. We have succeeded in doing that, and hon. gentlemen opposite, however they may have talked around it indirectly, have not dared yet to say that their party, or they themselves as a body, are against that particular feature of the contract. The next proposition adopted and laid down as a principle and made the essence of the contract, is that the Klondike shall pay for the railway; that the people of eastern Canada, the workingmen, and the shopkeepers and the other classes, should not have placed on their shoulders an additional burden or debt in consequence of the building of the railway and development of the Klondike.

Does the hon. Minister say to-day that they are able to carry out that contract without imposing an extra burden? Did not the First Minister say that one of his first duties, at the earliest opportunity, would be to ask this House to grant a vote of substantial aid and assistance towards the extension of that route down to the sea?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. POPE. Yes, he said that in his speech this afternoon.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. POPE. Certainly the right hon. leader of the Government made that statement in this House, and so it will appear in the "Hansard." Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman takes that position, and at the same time he says this is an all-Canadian route. Well, I am not a lawyer; but when I look over at the Government benches, when I see the Minister of the Interior, who is a lawyer, the Minister of Railways, who is a lawyer, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is a lawyer, the First Minister, who is a lawyer, and the Minister of Justice, who, I presume, is a lawyer, the Postmaster General, who is a lawyer, and the Solicitor General, who is a lawyer, and the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion), who is a lawyer—when I find the Government composed of all that legal ability, and who yet are not better able to translate treaties than those hon. gentlemen have been since they came into power, from the treaties affecting Great Britain, including the Postal Treaty, down to the treaties with the United States, I thank heaven that I am not a lawyer, and that I have been permitted to apply a little common sense to the interpretation of those treaties. Now, Sir, it has been laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite that a treaty made between the United States and Great Britain is of stronger force and character than the common law of the country. Now, a treaty with the United States, before it becomes law, has to be ratified by the Senate, and signed by the President of the United States. The law that is being enacted at this moment, that has passed the Senate of the United States, if it is also sanctioned by the President, and if there arises a question between Canada and the United States, in which case the courts of the United States will be called upon to pass judgment, their decision will be according to the common law of that country. I say that when those judges appointed for the purpose of carrying out the common law of the country, when they have rendered their decision, it will have precedence over the treaty, let the consequences be what they may.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hear, hear.

Mr. POPE. I quite understand the hon. gentleman saying "hear, hear." But after listening to the legal talent of the hon. gentleman, the exclamation of the hon. Minister who says "hear, hear," has just about as much effect as if he said "yes, yes." If the whole legal talent of hon. gentlemen sitting on the front Government benches were to acquiesce in my position, I would not feel any more certain in the position I have taken than I do because the hon. member says "hear, hear." I believe that interpretation will hold. The judges of the United States are appointed to interpret the law of the land, and in the event of the violation of treaties it is a question of settlement between the two nations, and you may either go to war or take your medicine. That is about the position of the question. When appealed to, the judges of that country will properly interpret the questions submitted to them. If that be true, then, by the admission of hon. gentlemen opposite—because they have admitted enough by the very fact that on a question like this such a gigantic intellect as is possessed by the Minister of Agriculture should have to work twice on one and the same problem—they are standing in a very different position from that occupied a few days ago when this contract was explained by the hon. gentleman in the speech he delivered on that occasion. Hon. gentlemen opposite indeed find themselves in a difficult position. They find themselves facing a difficulty they have brought on themselves, and they are obliged to admit to-day that the only plan by which they can get out of the difficulty is by extending this proposed road from Telegraph Creek or Glenora down to the sea at or near Port Simpson. If that proposition be correct, and the hon. First Minister said that at all times he had contemplated this outlet, that from the first they had prepared means to escape any difficulty by carrying the extension down to the sea—I want to know why in arranging this contract originally, there was no provision made with Mann & Mackenzie for some basis of contract in this regard and for some definite prices for work connected with the extension. If, as the First Minister acknowledged to-day, hon. gentlemen opposite had already taken this extension into consideration before this Bill came before the House for discussion—if within the ten days which have elapsed the First Minister has intimated to the people that at the earliest opportunity he is going to ask Parliament for money for extension southward, what may not be expected after further discussion? The hon. gentleman is frank at last. He has told the House that the whole of the scheme has been provided for and that a further extension will take place in the direction of Dawson City. Taking the whole scheme, I ask why do not hon. gentlemen enter into it in a business-like manner? Why do they not cancel this semi-arrangement with Mackenzie & Mann, pay them the damages, whatever they may be, pay them a reasonable sum and act with them honourably and straightforwardly; and if they are going to build a road from the sea, begin the construction down by the sea, not in a frozen country where it will cost thousands of dollars to get stores on the ground before the line is commenced. I saw a statement by Mr. Mann in the newspapers, which I presume is correct, that it would cost him $8,000 to place supplies and material in the country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Eight thousand dollars a mile.

Mr. POPE. Yes, $8,000 a mile for 150 miles. Common sense would lead the Government to commence construction down by the sea where when a mile was completed they could use the rails and push forward material and supplies along the route. Instead of so acting we find the Government prepared a contract which they themselves admit could not be carried out, but they included in it a provision which afforded a loophole by which they could escape. Hon. gentlemen opposite now say they contemplated all these arrangements, and yet they entered into a contract for building this road to Glenora and Teslin Lake. The Government are giving away—what? No man can state what they are giving away; no hon. member opposite could place a value on what the Government are handing over to the contractors. No hon. member can say that the Government are not giving away a hundred million dollars. Suppose they had been building the Crow's Nest Pass Railway three years ago instead of this year, before Rossland or Boundary Creek or any of the mining camps of to-day were in existence, they would be doing the same as they are doing to-day, giving away most valuable mineral lands. Hon. gentlemen opposite had an opportunity of making comparison with the extraordinary value now possessed by lands in the vicinity of Rossland as compared with their value two or three years ago. This comparison would apply to lands in the Yukon region, they being both in the western part of Canada, and I am astonished under these circumstances, that hon. gentlemen opposite should give away vast tracts of rich mineral deposits, which extend through Oregon, Washington, British Columbia, and enter the Klondike. Throughout the whole distance there are these rich mineral deposits, and wherever tapped in Canadian territory they have proved richer than in any portion of the United States, where the development has proceeded to the same extent. Under these circumstances I venture to say there never was a wilder proposition submitted to Parliament than hon. gentlemen opposite have submitted on this occasion. Do hon. gentlemen opposite tell me they could not have sold these 4,000,000 acres of land to the people of this country by issuing scrip and receiving in return $40,000,000? They know as well as I do that this could have been done. At the present time the Government charge a miner $10 for his annual license to mine on ground which only covers about an acre, and they obtain 10 per cent of the gold produced. Would not the people prefer to take from the Government scrip covering one acre in fee simple to be taken anywhere in the Klondike during the next five years, and pay therefor $10? This payment would take the place of $10 license and 10 per cent royalty. The whole thing is as clear as the nose on a man's face.

There is, however, another point. I should like to see the date of the issue of the writs of Ontario and the date on which this contract was signed, and see how nearly they ran together. Hon. members would find these transactions trotting along in the same class, with perhaps the contract a little ahead, and ending in a dead heat, although they started even at the ringing of the same bell.

It is not my intention to go deeply into the Bill until I have had an opportunity of further considering the measure itself. I was very fortunate, I presume, but I was not entrapped by the hon. gentlemen for I did not take them to be in dead earnest when they brought this Bill down to the House. I then told the First Minister that before the Bill passed this House, and before it passed the Parliament of Canada, it would be materially changed. Sir, it has been materially changed already, and we are not done reforming it yet. There are some changes yet to be brought about, and until the Government lay down their policy, and until they say, Amen, we will go on changing it. I think the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) might be trusted to say, Amen. From what we know of him in our province, I think that if the Government would entrust him to lay before the House the last change which is going to be made in that contract, we would accept his word for it. As acting Minister of Railways, he put his name to that peculiar document, that contract between Her Majesty and Mackenzie & Mann, but that he really knew its contents, or for one moment understood them, it is hard to believe. That that hon. gentleman (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), pleasant as he is at all times, and agreeable in every kind of climate, realized the fearful document to which he was appending his signature as acting Minister of Railways, no man can make me believe. After having heard this discussion to-night, after having seen the changeability of the Government of which he, unfortunately, happens to be a member, I am sure that his eyes are beginning to open to the iniquity of the contract, and I believe that the hon. gentleman will not now say, Amen, to this Bill. We can hardly blame the Minister of Railways for it, because he was not present, nor was he around the Council Board when that document was signed. He was asked to father it in this House, and, in the execution of his baptismal performance, we discovered before he had been very long on his feet, that, though he might possibly have heard of the Yukon, he had never before heard of the contract between Mackenzie & Mann and this Government. If report be true, and we have the very best reason to believe it, later on, when he met his party in caucus, the Minister of Railways discovered that his followers thought he had not done his duty. For a few days afterwards the Minister of Railways was not present in the House, and he did not return as a solid soldier of the party and as an obedient member of the Government until Mr. Mackenzie passed through this city on the Monday following the Liberal caucus. What mesmerism is there in the possession of this man Mackenzie? What spell does he throw over hon. gentlemen opposite? He makes them do what the people do not want them to do, and he compels them to sign a contract some of the provisions of which they are bound to deny before a few hours pass over their heads. The political faith of that hon. gentleman was once in unison with ours, but, when he served in our ranks, we never were susceptible to this mesmeric influence. There is an unsolved mystery about this matter which causes the Government to give away millions and millions of the money of the people for a tramway between two icicles. To solve that mystery is beyond my power. I can guess at it, and if I had not used up my imagination the other evening in cabling to England, I might draw on my imagination to discover the reason why Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, over and above anybody else, were preferred as contractors for the construction of this road. Can it be possible that they have become the bosom friends of gentlemen on the other side of the House? I know these hon. gentlemen, and in one of them, at least, I have not noticed any change. He looks a little worried, he looks like a gentleman who got into bad company, but, outside of that, he is very much the same as he used to be. He talks the same Tory principles, but has succeeded in charming beyond measure the First Minister, his colleagues and their followers. This Cabinet was said to be full of business principles, and to be composed of men who were going to administer the affairs of this country as they never were administered before—I am bound to say, that is perfectly true, for there never has been such an exhibition of wild business administration in this country as we have exemplified in the contract now before the House.

Now, Sir, fancy a Government giving away millions of acres of rich mineralized lands. Could you do it in Australia?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. POPE. You bet, you could not. Could you do it in South Africa?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. POPE. No, you could not. In no British colony in the world could you give away millions of mineralized acres of the people's heritage for the construction of a tramway between two icicles. Sir, it would be absolutely impossible to do such a thing elsewhere than in Canada. But more than that, this business Government is going to give railway communication to a country that is frozen up for eight months, aye, nearly nine months in the year, and where fuel is just as much an essential of life as is bread and meat. Who will own the wood and coal in that territory the moment the contract is signed? Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann will. They own the fuel in the country, they own the gold in the ground, and they own the railroad that is supposed to take the people there. Why, Sir, Boss Kruger, President of the Transvaal, in his wildest mood, could never dream of granting such a monopoly or of giving away to his friends millions of dollars worth of property belonging to the community.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). For sole answer to the speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Pope), as to the extreme impolicy of the Government's action in adopting the Stikine and Teslin route, I refer him to the repeated declarations of his own leader (Sir Charles Tupper). It has been said by some parties not particularly friendly to the present Government, that the true reason of their success at the late general elections was to be found in the utter incapacity of their opponents, and I am bound to say, the exhibition this afternoon and evening goes very far to lend colour to that statement. Sir, I doubt whether, ever since this Parliament was a Parliament, we have had an exhibition of so much cowardice, so much want of statesmanship, so much want of common, ordinary policy as these hon. gentlemen opposite have displayed in the last few hours.

If ever there was a question which above all others called for the exercise of calm and cool judgment on the part, not merely of the Government, but of the Parliament of Canada and of the responsible leaders of Her Majesty's Opposition, it was the question which, by a deliberate prostitution of the rules of this House, has been hurled at our heads this afternoon. The hon. gentlemen over there want us, forsooth, to cringe to the United States at the very first crack of the whip, on the very first occasion that a single branch of the American legislature chooses to pass a particular Bill. Why, Sir, that is not the law of the United States; that has to pass through the House of Representatives, and it has to obtain the support of the Government of the United States as evidenced by the sanction of the President. Under these circumstances, knowing that this is in every possible sense and shape a matter sub judice before that legislature, we have these patriotic and hon. gentlemen rising up here to strengthen to the uttermost the hands and the forces of the enemies of our country. What right, Sir, has the leader of the Opposition, what right have his followers, to dare to come here under present circumstances and tell us that the Government of the United States have deliberately determined to violate their solemn treaty obligations? What right have they to suppose that the Supreme Court of the United States, an honourable tribunal, would uphold such legislation, if by any chance it should be passed? I say, Sir, that they are deliberately inviting the Congress to make this Bill a part of their statute-book. Every argument, every statement they have made—not this afternoon only, but for the last two or three weeks—almost everything which they have advanced, has been of a character calculated to provoke just such action on the part of the United States. Now, Sir, I do not say—because it would not be parliamentary—that this was their design and purpose; but I do say that if this had been their design and purpose, that is the very way they would have taken to attain such an end. Sir, I will tell the hon. gentleman, as I believe he has been told before from these benches, that the plain duty of the Government of Canada under these circumstances is to proceed as they have begun, and to pay no attention whatever to any such Bills as are now before the Senate of the United States. If the Government or the people of the United States should attempt to violate a solemn treaty, should attempt to deprive us of our rights solemnly guaranteed to us, then, Sir, it would become the duty not merely of the Government of Canada, but the duty of the Imperial Government, to take such action as should be found requisite to obtain for the people of Canada the rights that properly belong to them, or due indemnification for any violation of those rights. But, Sir, it shows how little hon. gentlemen opposite have risen to the position which Canada now holds, it shows how little they understand the fact that the position of Canada has improved enormously in the last eighteen months, it shows how little they understand that we are legislating here, not merely for the people of Canada, but with an eye to the advantage and profit of the whole Empire of which we are a part, that they have taken the course they have done to-day. If that fact had been properly before their minds, the very last thing they would have done would have been, under these circumstances and at this time, to raise this most idle, useless and mischievous discussion. Now, Sir, it is perfectly idle to go into the question whether the bonding privilege—which is the only thing, as I understand, affected by the Bill in question—is essential to our maintaining the right of free navigation. The cases that have been cited, in which the United States have granted us bonding privileges through their territory, where we possessed no rights, guaranteed by treaty, are utterly different from the case in hand. I do not think any lawyer in this House would say that if the United States were to refuse the bonding privilege it by any means follows that they could by that Act deny us the right to the free navigation of the Stikine River. Sir, I will tell my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) that our motto, on this occasion at any rate, is "No Surrender." Sir, I am known, and I hope I shall always continue to be known, as one who desires by all and every honourable means in my power to promote friendship and alliance between the English-speaking nations of the earth, and notably between the people of the Empire of Great Britain and the people of the United States. But were I ten times as desirous as I am of that consummation, under no conceivable circumstances would I as a Canadian representative submit for one moment that any foreign power should dictate to us where we should build railways or where we should not build railways. Still less, Sir, would I consent that any foreign power should presume to tell us what quantity of baggage miners should import free to any particular country under our control, or where those miners should obtain their licenses. Sir, I say that the Senate of the United States, or the authors of this Bill, have utterly and entirely mistaken their position. They have gone utterly and entirely outside of any rights which can possibly accrue to them; and the Government of Canada are not going to be dragooned, either by hon. gentlemen opposite or by the United States Senate or the United States Congress into surrendering any of the rights of the people of Canada. I repeat, Sir, that I regret exceedingly that the hon. leader of the Opposition, who knows better, whatever some of his followers may do, who has shown on other occasions that he could rise superior to the mistakes and blunders which had been committed by some of his former associates—I say I regret exceedingly that he should have precipitated this debate. I tell him that this is a matter that should not be made a subject of angry controversy between one side of the House and the other. This is a matter that should be considered calmly and coolly by the Government, and then considered calmly and coolly by the Parliament. The hon. gentleman was perfectly within his right, I grant, in calling the attention of the Government and the House to the measure which has passed the United States Senate. I do not complain of that; but there he should have stayed. He should not have plunged, while this matter was undecided, into a debate which could not, under any conceivable circumstances, do any good to Canada, and which might do a great deal of harm.

Mr. DAVIN. Does the hon. gentleman know who introduced the debate?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I know that it has been introduced and has been maintained and kept up, to the great injury of the public affairs of Canada, by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am sure my hon. friend will be greatly indebted to me if I tell him that his absence from the House to-day has led him to make a very serious blunder. The attention of the Government was called in a very serious manner to this question by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell).

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I am aware also that the hon. member for Halifax, as I conceive his duty was, accepted the answer that was given him, and proceeded no further. Where angels fear to tread, other kind of people rush in. A very impolitic and a very unnecessary debate has been initiated. Now, Sir, I understand that the hon. gentleman has been good enough to give his advice to the Government as to what they should do. I believe he was good enough to advise us to withdraw the Bill. I will take upon myself to tell him that the Bill shall not be withdrawn.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will my hon. friend allow me to say that I gave no unsolicited advice. I was asked by the Prime Minister to say what I would propose—what I would do to meet this emergency.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Then all I can say is that if the hon. gentleman, taking into consideration all the surrounding circumstances, would advise the withdrawal of the Bill, it is Heaven's mercy that he long since ceased to be the adviser of His Excellency. Now, Sir, if the hon. gentleman wishes to draw a lesson from this, I grant that there are two important lessons to be drawn. The hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition is perfectly aware, and if you refer to his own speech, you will see he was perfectly aware, that by the capitulation of the Treaty of Washington, we greatly departed from the rights which Canada had under the former treaty. Does the hon. gentleman who sits behind the leader of the Opposition contradict his venerable sire?

Sir CHARLES HIEBERT TUPPER. I was simply remarking to my hon. friend beside me that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was contradicting his juvenile colleagues who spoke on that question and took a different view of it.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I was calling attention to the fact that the hon. leader of the Opposition on more occasions than one—and it is to his credit, because he understood what he was talking about—over and over again—shall I recall the page in "Hansard" or does my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition deny it?—pointed out that we had lost heavily in the Treaty of Washington by the substitution of the clause under which we claim the present navigation of the Stikine for the clause which was embodied in the Treaty of 1825, and afterwards confirmed by the Treaty of St. Petersburg. And the hon. gentleman will recollect very well his reference to a certain famous Latin proverb on that occasion.

Now, I do not want to unnecessarily prolong this discussion, nor unnecessarily to stir up bad passions among the members of this House. But I would tell the hon. gentleman this, that they would do wisely and well to abstain until people's memories have grown a good deal shorter from any reference to the superabundant loyalty of gentlemen on that side of the House. I recollect their colleagues and their past intimately. I have had occasion to allude to this before, and shall not do so now, but with respect to the present question, that is to what is due the temper that has been manifested in certain sections of the United States, I have to tell these hon. gentlemen that that is largely due to their own action in the eighteen years that elapsed between 1878 and 1896. There again I shall call the hon. leader of the Opposition to witness that when the Mackenzie Administration went out of office our relations with the United States were in a most harmonious condition. It is true we had obtained very great advantage from them in the Halifax award, and that occasion, I have more than once reminded hon. gentlemen, is the only one on which Canada distinctly came out a gainer in a transaction with the United States; but ten years later in what kind of position did we find ourselves? Did we not hear my hon. friend, from the place now occupied by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), tell this House—and it is on record in "Hansard"—that the impolicy of his own colleagues—because it amounted to that, although he was very careful in his way of putting it—had brought us to the verge of commercial war, which, he truly said, was very close indeed to actual war. The hon. gentleman, for once in his life, stated the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth in that speech of his in 1888, which I cherish and preserve as perhaps the only evidence he has given us that he really did possess some statesman-like qualities.

Mr. BERGERON. That has all been heard this afternoon.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is a thing that cannot be put forward too often, because it is so much to the hon. gentleman's credit, and we want to give him all the credit we can, particularly to strengthen his hands against some malcontents in his own party. The hon. gentleman wants to know what we consider is the proper line to be taken. I will tell him. I consider that the proper line to be taken now is not lightly or rashly to assume that a friendly Government will violate their treaty obligations, but to insist, and to cause the British Government to insist with us, on the observance of treaty rights which have been solemnly guaranteed to us. For the rest, we distinctly refuse to be flurried or hurried. We are charged—whether we are fit for the position or not—with the task of governing Canada for the time being; and if we find that this unhappy course is taken and persisted in, and we can obtain redress in no other way, we will know how to protect and preserve the rights of the people entrusted to us. Sir, we will examine and then decide, and I think that even if the Opposition choose to exhaust themselves in idle and fruitless attacks upon this policy, which, I repeat, the hon. leader of the Opposition, in a lucid interval, approved most heartily—if they choose to aid the enemies of our country for the purpose of bringing about a state of things from which injury and loss may result to a portion of our people, it will not alter our determination one hair's breadth, and that determination is that we will secure a route through Canadian territory and take care to control our own trade for the benefit of the people of Canada.

Mr. QUINN. It is altogether probable that if the hon. Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) had not done me the honour of referring to me personally this afternoon, I would have continued to enjoy in silence the very interesting debate that has been carried on since three o'clock; but since he has done so, perhaps it would be well to refresh your memory. Sir, as to the circumstances which brought forth the remark from the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. You will remember, Sir, that he was reading a contradiction of a statement supposed to have been made by the hon. leader of the Opposition, when he was questioned by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). Finding himself in what was characterized as a very deep hole, an hon. gentleman on this side said: You can wriggle pretty well, but you cannot get out of that hole. The hon. Minister, perhaps a little flurried, said: Well, I am trying pretty hard to wriggle out if you will only give me a chance. I was unfortunate enough to laugh at this sally and thereby attracted the hon. gentleman's attention. I must say I have always followed with a good deal of pleasure any debate in which the hon. gentleman has taken part. I always try to follow him through all the sinuosities of his language and argument. Sometimes I fail, but I have always admired the great talent which he displays in reply. In fact, on this occasion, he brought to my mind—and it was that which caused me to laugh—the words of the old poet:

He wriggled so long and he wriggled so fast,
That he wriggled himself to the dickens at last.

The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) has evidently been studying Voltaire, only he has improved somewhat on the original. Voltaire said that a lie that lives six days is as good as the truth. But the hon. Minister thought that one which would last the afternoon would be equally good. Unfortunately for him, no sooner had he resumed his seat, after a most convincing argument to prove that the leader of the Opposition had at one time slated the then Minister of Marine for something he had done, than my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) stood up and quoted from "Hansard" the very words of the hon. leader of the Opposition which proved that he never used the language attributed to him at all. Therefore, I think I am right in saying that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries tried to improve on Voltaire by some five days and three-quarters.

We have also had the extraordinary exhibition this afternoon of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, the able lieutenant of the right hon. gentleman who leads the House, administering to the hon. member who brought about this debate a spanking, metaphorically speaking, for having had the audacity to bring up such a question. This afternoon when we heard the same speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) we thought it real thunder; but now that we have heard it from the Minister of Trade and Commerce we know that it is only stage thunder—a mere farce. I will not say that the whole plan of the play had been drafted by the Ministers in their Cabinet council before they came here, but I will say that it looks like it. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) taking time by the forelock rises, on the Orders of the Day being called, and reads the telegram announcing the passage of this Bill through the Senate of the United States. He is at once answered by the right hon. Prime Minister who, with all that eloquence which distinguishes him as a parliamentary orator, gives a most beautiful answer to the hon. member for Halifax. Of course we see now that this was done merely for the purpose of spiking the guns of the Opposition upon this question. But that sturdy warrior, the leader of the Opposition was not to be put aside by the fine words of the leader of the Government. The plan which has been shown here this afternoon was all prepared before hand, but then the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) happened to be the lieutenant of the leader of the House instead of the Minister of Trade and Commerce who has just gone out. He therefore was obliged to take the place of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and fire off the guns which had been left to the care of that hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright). Now, what is the position of the Government? I have listened with a great deal of attention, with much interest and with sealed lips during this debate to find out if I could, what the Government intended or if it were in earnest for one hour on any question connected with this contract. I have listened to this debate for two weeks. I have heard the Ministers at one time declaring one thing, and a few days later taking back everything they had said. In the words of my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope), it appears as if every member who has spoken in this debate concerning the contract and charter now before us was obliged to stand up to-day and read the recantation of everything he had said in favour of the Bill, on account of the action of the Senate of the United States. We have heard most extraordinary propositions made upon this question. We have heard the Prime Minister of Canada, aided and endorsed by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, declaring as lawyers and as members of this Government that the treaty of the United States with Canada carried with it the free use for the purposes of commerce of the Stikine River, and not that alone but carried with it the right to unload at Wrangel, the right to tranship at Wrangel. And in the next breath we have heard these hon. gentlemen say that even if it does not carry with it the right to unload and tranship, we can get over the difficulty by building down as far as Port Simpson. The leader of the Government reminded me to-day of that play called the "Mighty Dollar." One of the leading characters is a United States Senator, and one of the expressions he uses is: "I will vote for anything as long as it carries with it another appropriation." The Government say: We are prepared to support the Stikine route, to vote 3,750,000 acres of land; and then, after we get that through, if it will not work, let us have another road and another appropriation. So that, by the time the scheme of the hon. gentleman is put through the House, not merely the four millions of acres already proposed will have been voted, but eight or possibly ten millions of acres of mineral lands will have been given to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Four million acres will account for all the mineral lands there.

Mr. QUINN. The Government would have us in the position of the client of a certain lawyer who resembled very much the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. This lawyer was consulted by his client who said that a man had written him a letter and threatened to arrest him on a capias and put him in jail. After the lawyer had heard the case, he said: They cannot send you to jail for that; go home; you are all right.

An hour afterwards the client came back and said to the lawyer: My friend, I am not only threatened by letter, but this man has been down to see me and he says if I do not pay him he will capias me. The lawyer said: They cannot put you in jail for that. So the client went away comforted. And so it went on until the client, in spite of what his lawyer had told him, found himself coolly in jail. He sent for the lawyer. The lawyer came, and the first thing he said was "My dear fellow, they cannot send you to jail for this." "But," said the client, "I am here." So, the Ministers have been protesting that the Americans cannot prevent us from transshipping or unloading at Fort Wrangel; they cannot prevent our goods going in. But the United States Senate have said, and the Opposition here have said to the Government: You are there, and you cannot get out of it. The hon. leader of the Opposition is not displaying a "craven spirit" as has been said, very irregularly by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. We have been warning the Government not only to-day but ever since this debate began that some day they might find themselves in the position in which they now find themselves. This warning has gone on day after day, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself has said, and after they have answered that it is impossible for the United States to act in this way, we have positive proof that the Government of the United States is going to do what the Opposition feared they would. And the Government have only awakened to that fact sufficiently to try to explain it away by saying that the Opposition has made them do this or led them to do it, or aided and abetted them in putting the Government in this position.

It was not my intention to speak at all on this subject. But I do look upon it as a most serious position for the Government to be placed in, still to persist in proposing the building of a line notwithstanding that the declaration of the United States Senate shows that it will be absolutely valueless, for the United States will make it valueless by the impositions which they will make through their Congress.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 52) respecting the Nakusp and Slocan Railway Company.—(Mr. Macpherson.)

POSTMASTER AT LOWER L'ARDOISE.

Mr. GILLIES (by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked,

1. Who is the postmaster at Lower L'Ardoise, county of Richmond, at the present time?
2. When was the present incumbent appointed?

3. Who was his predecessor in office ?
4. Why and when was he removed ?
5. At whose request ?
6. Were any complaints in writing against the late postmaster filed with the Government or the Post Office Department ?
7. What was the nature of these complaints, and by whom were they furnished ?
8. Was an investigation afforded the late postmaster before removing him from office ? If so, by whom was the inquiry held ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The present postmaster, Daniel C. Mathieson, was appointed on the 30th September, 1897. His predecessor in office was Roderick Ferguson. Certain complaints having been made against him, they were communicated to him in order to afford him an opportunity of replying thereto, which he did, pleading guilty to all of said complaints excepting one—an immaterial one—it was not thought necessary to hold an inquiry.

LOCOMOTIVE DEVICE—INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked.

1. Upon what terms, if any, were Messrs. Cleveland and Petersen, or either of them, allowed to fit up an engine or engines in the Intercolonial shops at Moncton ?
2. What amount of work (and of what value), if any, has been done on these engines or either of them by the employees in the Government service ?
3. What amount of materials (and of what value), if any, has been used in this connection ?
4. What amount, if any, has been paid to the Government by Messrs. Cleveland and Petersen ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Messrs. Cleveland & Petersen are the owners of a patent locomotive cylinder, which they were desirous of having fitted upon one of the locomotives of the Intercolonial Railway. The department had reason to believe that there was merit in this invention, as it had been applied to a stationary engine and had been found to work successfully. In accordance with the custom of the railway to occasionally try new inventions which impress the department favourably, the trial of this device was authorized on one of the Intercolonial Railway locomotives, but upon the distinct agreement that the owners of the patent should pay to the railway the entire cost of the work. In accordance with this arrangement and upon those terms, the device is being fitted upon one of the locomotives of the Intercolonial Railway in the shops at Moncton, and is now in progress and nearing completion. Work has been done thereon to the amount of $1,724.99, and material furnished to the amount of $1,056.28. The parties, who are responsible people, have already made a payment of $250 on account, and as soon as the work is completed will be called upon for the payment of the balance of the whole cost of the work and material furnished.

Mr. GILLIES.

THE UNITED STATES STEAMER "YANTIC."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

How or in what character was the United States steamship "Yantic" entered and cleared, if at all, at any port on the St. Lawrence on her passage through that river in 1897 ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The collector of customs at Montreal reports, that this vessel was not reported inwards formally, but a record was made of her coming in, and no clearance was made. She arrived at Montreal from Boston. On November 4th, the vessel was taken to Cantin's dockyard and there cut apart and placed upon pontoons to enable her to be taken through the smaller St. Lawrence Canals. I have no information that the vessel entered or cleared at any other port on the St. Lawrence.

TELEGRAPH LINE—NORTH SHORE OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Dugas) asked.

1. Is the telegraph line on the north shore of the St. Lawrence being constructed by days' labour or by contract ?
2. Who are the superintendent or contractors ?
3. What are the prices paid to day labourers ?
4. Are they paid in money or in goods ?
5. Have the Government sent on a person to examine the work and see that all is properly done ?
6. What sums have been paid on this work since May, 1896, and to whom and for what service ?
7. How many miles of telegraph wire have been laid on this line since 1896, and in what places ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. By contract. 2. The contractor is Mr. L. P. de Courval. 3 and 4. The department is not aware of the manner in which contractor pays his men. It only knows that up to the present no claim or complaint has been lodged with the department. 5. Yes, a careful examination has been made. 6. Statement of expenditure since May, 1896, to date :

Ahearn & Soper, telegraph instruments and battery supplies.....	$	86	73
Firstbrook Bros., side-blocks.....		137	80
Lewis Bros. & Co, wire and insulators		2,208	56
Samson & Fillion, spikes.....		39	43
L. P. DeCourval, contractor.....		9,003	75
Labour inspecting line—
Frs. Cormier.....	$	13	00
Fidele Desjardins.....		13	00
Israel Cormier.....		33	10
Nap. A. Cormeau.....		277	63
			<hr/>
			336 73
			$11,813 00

7. The line on the North Shore, St. Lawrence, completed to Point Esquimaux in 1889, was in the season of 1897 further extended beyond that place for 43 miles to Piastre Bay, and a further 43 miles to a point 6 miles beyond Aguanus, 86 miles in all.

BRIDGE AT BEAR RIVER, N.S.

Mr. RUSSELL (by Mr. Flint) asked,

Was the question of the removal of the remains of the old bridge in Bear River, between Arnapolis and Digby counties, ever considered by the Minister of Public Works in the late Administration? Was any communication made to such Minister by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in that Administration? If so, what was its purport?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Communications were had between the Department of Public Works, under the late Administration. The then Minister of Public Works received a letter from the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, of which the following is a quotation:

I am in receipt of a letter from the Hon. Mr. Dickey, written, I presume, under the impression that the matter was under the charge of this department, in which he states that he is informed, though he has no personal knowledge of it, that the expenditure would be of no great service to the public, and he knows of no special reason why it should be made, and he adds that he states this in order that the question of recommending the expenditure may be very carefully considered.

In the years 1894-95-96 applications were made to the Privy Council for a vote of $1,000, but they were not granted.

W. E. PHIN—TORONTO HARBOUR.

Mr. CLANCY asked,

1. What amount of money was paid one W. E. Phin, or any partner of his, between the dates of 1st January, 1897, and 1st January, 1898? Are there any amounts still owing for the work done or material supplied in connection with the improvement of Toronto harbour?

2. Were such moneys paid according to written contract? If so, would the Government give copy of contract? If no written contract, would the Government give all information and correspondence in connection therewith?

3. When, where and by whom was Mr. W. E. Phin instructed to proceed with the work, and upon what terms did he proceed?

4. Was the said work advertised, and tenders asked for?

5. How many tenders were received?

6. If no other tenders were received, who recommended Mr. Phin to the department?

7. Before being given the work, was he ever known by the department to have done any dredging or to have owned any dredging plant?

8. For what period of time does Mr. Phin's contract extend?

9. Is it the intention of the department to advertise and call for tenders for any work to be done in connection with Toronto harbour improvements for the year 1898?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. The amount of money paid Mr. W. E. Phin for dredging in Toronto Harbour, between 1st January, 1897, and 1st January, 1898, was $5,310.26. There is no balance due. 2. A written agreement was entered into with Mr. Phin on the 19th July, 1897. No objection to produce the agreement in question, when a return is moved for. 3. Mr. W. E. Phin was instructed to proceed to work at Toronto by Mr. E. B. Temple, engineer in charge of the Toronto Harbour, under his agreement of the 19th July, the price agreed upon being that usually paid by the department, viz., $8 per hour of actual work. 4, 5 and 6. No tenders were asked for, as it is not customary for this class of work. Mr. Phin was recommended to the department by reliable parties. 7. It is not the practice of the department to make such inquiry. All it concerns itself with is that the plant offered is good and reliable, and that the price asked is reasonable. The dredging, as it proceeds, is closely superintended by the officer in charge. 8. The agreement closed with the end of the season of 1897. 9. That will depend upon the nature of the improvements to be performed.

HOMESTEAD LANDS.

Mr. BERGERON asked,

Does the homestead law on Government lands apply to the Yukon territory?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). No.

NEWS STAND AT LEVIS STATION.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked,

1. Who is the lessee at the news stand at the Intercolonial Railway station at Lévis at the present time?

2. When did his lease begin, and when will it terminate?

3. Was said lease given out after tenders had been called for?

4. If not, why not?

5. What is the annual price or consideration of said lease?

6. Who was the lessee who preceded the present lessee?

7. What was the nominal price or consideration paid by said former lessee?

8. If said price or consideration, mentioned in the last question, has been reduced, at whose instance was it so reduced?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Mr. Pichette is the lessee of the news stand at the Intercolonial Railway Station at Lévis at the present time. 2. His lease commenced on 31st December, 1896, it will terminate on the 31st December, 1898, unless extended for another year. 3. Said lease was given out after tenders had been called for. 4. 5. The annual price or consideration is $520. 6. C. A. Demers was the lessee who preceded Mr. Pichette. 7. The nominal as well as actual price paid up to December, 1896, was $160 per annum, but since that date and at the present time the annual price is $520. 8. It has not been reduced.

SICK SEAMEN.

Mr. GILLIES asked,

1. What amount has been paid for medical attendance upon sick seamen at the outports of L'Ardoise, St. Peter's and River Bourgeois since January, 1897, and to whom paid?

2. What are the names of the sick seamen that received medical attendance at each or any of these ports, and the amount paid and to whom on account of medical attendance upon each sick seaman during the period mentioned?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I shall be very glad to give the hon. gentleman who asked this question all the information; but the answer covers four or five closely written pages of foolscap, and it should be moved for in the shape of a return and not given in the shape of answer to a question. The papers are under my hand, and are at the disposal of the hon. gentleman, but it is useless to fill up "Hansard" by printing them as an answer to a question.

ST. PETER'S CANAL.

Mr. GILLIES asked,

1. Is it the intention of the Government to have a sufficient amount provided either in the main or supplementary estimates during the present session to have necessary repairs made to the entrance of the St. Peter's Canal upon the Bras d'Or end, and also to the east wall?

2. What amount do the Government intend asking Parliament for during the present session to have these necessary repairs made?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The matter of repairs upon Bras d'Or end of St. Peter's Canal and also upon the east wall has not escaped my attention. Departmentally a decision has been arrived at on the subject of these repairs, but I doubt the expediency, if the hon. member will pardon me, of making any more explicit statement before the Estimates are brought down.

WEST INDIA TRADE.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) asked,

1. Is it the intention of the Government to take any steps for the purpose of extending and increasing trade between Canada and the West Indies (including Bermuda)?

2. What steps does the Government intend to take for that purpose?

3. How long has the Government had this matter under consideration, and is it probable that any conclusion will be speedily arrived at?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The Government have this matter under consideration. They are fully alive to the importance of the West India trade, which has been urged on them very strongly by the hon. member for Halifax who sits on this side of the House.

Mr. BLAIR.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. JAMESON asked,

1. Does the clause in the statute incorporating the Canadian Pacific Railway Company providing that the lands of that company shall be free from taxation for twenty years from the grant thereof from the Crown, mean that the lands of that company shall be exempt from taxation for twenty years from the time of their selection of said lands and the approval of such selection by the Government, or for twenty years from the actual issue of the patent?

2. Is it usual to allow any long interval to elapse between the selection of the lands by the said company as part of their land grant and the issue of the patent to said lands?

3. Has any effort been made by this or any former Government to ascertain the amount of capital actually expended in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

4. Does the clause in the Canadian Pacific Railway charter exempting that railway company from control of its rates until ten per cent per annum profit on the capital actually expended in the construction of the railway is produced, mean that exemption shall exist until ten per cent per annum is produced on the capital actually expended in the construction of the railway, both by the Government and by the railway company, or is the calculation to be based only on the capital actually expended by the railway company on such portions of the railway as were constructed by the railway company?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. The view taken by the Government is that the exemption dates from the issue of the patent. 2. It has been usual to allow long intervals to elapse between the selection of lands and the issue of patent. 3. No such effort has been made so far as the Government is aware. 4. The question is one which involves the interpretation of a statute by legal authority. When any practical necessity arises for determining the question it will be referred to the law officer of the Government, but up to the present time such reference has not been made.

LOBSTER PACKING.

Mr. BETHUNE asked,

Will the Government, because of the peculiar climatic conditions existing to the north-east of the Island of Cape Breton, allow the lobster packers and fishermen of that section of the country, particularly those of Victoria county, to catch lobsters regardless of size limit, from 1st May to 31st of July in each year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I have not been able to see my way clear to answer the question in the affirmative. It seems to me and to the department that it would be destructive of the lobster interest to make the concession asked.

PROPOSED MINT.

Mr. BERGERON asked,

Is it the intention of the Government to establish a mint in this country? If so, when?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The matter referred to in the hon. gentleman's question has not been considered.

EDMONTON BRIDGE.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

To whom was the contract for the construction of the Edmonton bridge let? Were tenders called for? Who were the tenderers, and what were the figures of each tenderer for which the tenderer would construct the work? Have the specifications been modified as the work has gone forward? Was the time when the work would be completed one of the essential features of the contract? Has the time limit been live*i* up to? If not, were there forfeitures in case of default as to time? If so, have these forfeitures been enforced?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). No sufficient answer can be made except by the hon. member moving for a return.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Department of Railways and Canals.—(Mr. Blair.)

INSTRUCTION TO ADMINISTRATOR WALSH.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) laid on the Table Order in Council covering instructions given to Major Walsh, administrator of the Yukon district. He said: There were no written instructions outside of the contents of the Order in Council given to Major Walsh.

PROPOSED WAGON ROAD IN YUKON.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to state to the Minister of the Interior that the First Minister promised in his absence that when the Minister of the Interior would be in his place he would inform the House what measures were proposed to be taken to ensure the construction of the wagon road, as stated in the report which the hon. gentleman has laid on the Table of the House.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). It is not the intention of the Government to ensure the construction of that road. The statement referred to was made because the Government were satisfied that the operations in connection with this contract for the construction of a railway would necessitate the construction of a wagon road, and no doubt if hon. gentlemen will allow the Bill to pass in any reasonable time, that result will be brought about.

QUARTZ MINING IN YUKON.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Might I ask the Minister of the Interior whether he has issued regulations under which quartz mining can be carried on in the Yukon?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The regulations have been under consideration and some amendments are being considered, and on that account they have not been printed and issued with the others. But I expect they will be printed within a few days and sent to members of the House.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Blair for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) an Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Mr. Speaker, since the opening of this debate we have witnessed many curious scenes, and I think I may safely say we have heard many very curious and contradictory statements. At the time of the debate on the Address the leader of the Opposition made use of these words, after explaining that he had called on the Minister of the Interior:

I told that hon. gentleman the conclusion at which I had arrived. I told him that from the best information I could get from well qualified sources, I had come to the conclusion that there was one route, and one route alone, which in the first instance it was absolutely essential should be taken up by the Government and developed, and that was the route on the Stikine River, going from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake and thence down by the waters. I pressed that upon him very strongly, with a view of getting the earliest possible means of communication with Dawson City, because I had a discussion on the matter with Major Walsh, a very able officer in the service of the Government, as to the probability of his getting in, and knowing the difficulties he had to encounter, I believe it would take him a very long time. I told the Minister of the Interior that I believed it would be found practicable to send an ocean steamer to the mouth of the Stikine River when the ice had formed, and with horses and sleds and provisions and equipments of every kind, to go up on the ice to Glenora or some portion of the upper part of the Stikine River, and by a sled trail go down on the ice to Teslin Lake long before navigation would open at all. I pressed on that hon. gentleman in the strongest and most emphatic manner I could his duty as Minister of the Crown to spare no effort to endeavour to accomplish a connection in that way. I told him I had interviewed the Government of British Columbia, and they had assured me they were prepared to co-operate with the Government of the Dominion in opening, in the first instance, in the absence of the railway, a sled trail, to be made into a trail as soon as the snow went off. I went further; I said to the Minister of the Interior: You heard me make a very strong speech last session on the floor of the Commons in opposition to Government aid to railways. I said: I am prepared to take it all back so far as this road is concerned. I said: I am so convinced of the vital importance to Canada of at once establishing a railway connection between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake that I feel that the Parliament of Canada, so far as I am able to judge—if you will take that scheme up vigorously and put it through at once as a Government work—I believe you will have the hearty support of the people of Canada—the Parliament of Canada and the people of Canada as well. I believe now that the importance of that work cannot be over-rated, and I will tell you why.

And he proceeds to tell us why. Scarcely a month has elapsed since the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) pronounced these words in this Parliament.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. A good deal has happened since.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hear, hear.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The terms of the Washington Treaty have not been changed since.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Hamilton Smith has come here since.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yet, in face of those statements we to-day find the hon. leader of the Opposition rising in his place in this House and asking us to abandon that route altogether and to proceed by some other way in order to reach the Yukon. What vision has he had in the interval? What change has come over the spirit of his dreams? Is it the "World" and my friend from York (Mr. Maclean) that has brought about this extraordinary change in his judgment with regard to this Yukon route. But, Sir, that is not all. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, like the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) have stated that it is idle for us to pretend to have an all-Canadian route, and he sees no reason why we should sacrifice the resources of Canada to obtain access to the Yukon country, because, as he tells us, there is a better route by way of Dyea and Skagway and over the White and Chilkoot Passes. These gentlemen opposite are divided, some of them want an all-Canadian route and some an American route. From the very outset of this debate we find them in revolt against the inspiration of the leader of the Opposition, and refusing to obey that generous impulse of his, which at the beginning prompted him as a patriotic citizen to admit that the route selected by the Government was the best under the circumstances. From the very outset these gentlemen opposite have joined to decry the patriotic effort made by this Government to secure the trade of that country for the Canadian people, and they have united in the unpatriotic endeavour to ensure that the American Government should put obstacles in our way. To-day we find that these gentlemen have to some extent accomplished their design, and have succeeded in inducing the American Senate to give them that measure of comfort which they have so eagerly sought. They have succeeded in obtaining from the American Senate an attempt to interfere with our all-Canadian route, and with those privileges which we enjoy under the terms of the Washington Treaty. These gentlemen are to-day jubilant and in high glee, but although they may find comfort in that from the narrow standpoint of party advantage yet from the higher plane of patriotism, they will one day have reason to deplore this action of the United States Senate, which, I charge, has been brought about by their instigation.

Let me turn aside from this unfortunate phase of the question to deal for a while with the conditions which brought about the contract now before the House. I take it that both parties in this House are agreed that the Klondike is a country rich in mineral lands, but at the same time a bleak and inhospitable region which required to call upon the resources of other parts of Canada and other parts of the world for its development. We know that not only was it necessary to import capital into that country, but in addition to that it was necessary to import labour and machinery, and also to supply means whereby food and clothing and the necessaries of life should be provided for the workmen who went there. I believe, Sir, that no party in this country has a monopoly of patriotism, and believing that, I feel that I give expression to the sentiments of gentlemen on both sides when I say that that labour which we wanted to develop the resources of the Yukon, should be Canadian; that the machinery which is required for that development, the clothing, the food and the light necessary for this new population, should be of Canadian production.

Now, Sir, how was that desire to be accomplished? It was only possible to secure that end by giving an all-Canadian route; an all-Canadian route in fact as well as in name; a route that would start from one part of Canadian territory and reach the Yukon without for a moment leaving the shadow and protection of the Canadian flag. That was our ideal, and let me ask have we accomplished it? I am willing to confess that we have not perhaps accomplished in the letter the ideal that I have just set forth, but I claim that we have got as close to it as the circumstances and as the conditions with which we had to cope would permit. Let me remind hon. gentlemen that we had to consider this question, not only from what I might call the commercial point of view, but we had also to deal with it from the standpoint of the political necessities of this country, and from that standpoint it was necessary that we should get access to the Yukon and access at the earliest possible moment by an all-Canadian route. We find to-day a deplorable condition of things existing at Dyea and Skagway, and it is a condition which would exist in ten-fold intensity in the Canadian Klondike had we not taken action in this matter. The Ottawa "Citizen" of the 3rd of March contains the following news item :

The steamer "Oregon" arrived yesterday from Skagway and Dyea, Alaska. She had a number of passengers who are returning home disgusted with Alaska. Before the "Oregon" left Skagway, seventeen deaths from cerebro-spinal meningitis were reported in twenty-four hours.

That is the condition of things now existing at these places on the Pacific Coast which are comparatively accessible ; and if these are the conditions existing at such places at the present time, what must be the conditions existing at Dawson City ? What will be the conditions existing there one year hence if we allow 50,000 people to go in there without providing any means of ingress and egress ?

Dealing with this question of access to the country, I take it that we may eliminate at once and for ever the question of American routes to the Yukon territory—that by way of Dyea, that by way of Skagway, and that by way of Taku Inlet. Nothing can be added, it seems to me, to what has fallen from the lips of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) to show the inconveniences that would result if we adopted any one of these routes. It is not necessary for me to show the inconveniences, from a political standpoint, that must necessarily result if we were to start from any point on the American coast to reach our own country in the interior. Let us for a moment turn our eyes towards Washington, and see what is taking place there to-day. If, in violation of the most sacred treaties, an attempt is made by the Senate at Washington to prevent our gaining access to that country by the Stikine River, what would be the case if they had the semblance of a right on their side through our attempting to get access by way of those American points ? I say it is absolutely impossible to consider these points, from a political standpoint. But more than that, let us consider them from the standpoint of their physical conditions. The physical condition existing at the present time, in regard to the crossing of the White Pass and the Chilcoot Pass, from the most recent information we have at our disposal, are such that it is absolutely out of the question to think of getting access to the Yukon country through these passes within any reasonable time next season. I said a moment ago that the ideal route would of necessity be an all-Canadian route: and the all-Canadian routes to which reference has been made in the course of this debate are the Edmonton route, the Ashcroft route, and the route by way of Alice Arm. These routes wholly on Canadian soil would be the ideal routes. But let us realize what the construction of any one of these routes, outside of the route by Alice Arm, would be. Take, for instance, the Edmonton route. It would necessitate an expenditure for the construction of at least 800 miles of railway to reach that point on the Stikine River or on Telegraph Creek from which the proposed railway will begin. The Ashcroft route would necessitate the construction of 775 miles of railway, speaking approximately, to reach the same point on Telegraph Creek. I have heard it stated, for instance that the construction of the Edmonton route would cost from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000. If such be the case, I put it to the members of this House, I put it to the people of Canada, to that wider constituency beyond these walls, whether or not under existing conditions this Parliament would be justified in going to such an expenditure as that to enable us to get access to the Yukon country. Let us realize what it means. We would be spending that enormous amount of money to get into a country, the resources and the future possibilities of which are up to the present time practically unknown. But, let me draw the attention of hon. members of this House, to this fact, that when we had built that road to Telegraph Creek, it would be then necessary to build the road from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake. In the construction of a railway by any of these routes, the line from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake is an important link, which must of necessity be accomplished. No route to Dawson City could be established without this particular link having first been built. Now, how far would the people of this country be justified in incurring this extraordinary outlay of $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 at the present time ? I am of opinion that no outlay we can possibly make for the purpose of constructing railroads which may serve to develop the resources of this country is too great, provided it brings about that development which we have a reasonable right to expect. But I say it would be a matter of criminal neglect on the part of the Government of Canada at the present time, with the limited knowledge we possess of the Yukon country and its resources, to incur this enormous expenditure in addition to the enormous expenditure which we have already incurred for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway and other railways in different portions of Canada. We cannot do it, and until we know more of the resources and capabilities and future possibilities of the Yukon country, I say we have gone as far as we can legitimately go in burdening the people of Canada with additional expenditure.

I heard the other night my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) discuss the Edmonton route, and I must confess that in a great deal of what he said at that time I very heartily concurred; because I believe the Edmonton district is an important district. It is a district which has a future before it; it is the district through which probably the Canadian Pacific Railway should have been built, and which would have benefited to a much greater extent by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway than the more arid region to the south through which it went. But, as I said a moment ago, a glance at the map will satisfy the most casual observer that even in the construction of the Edmonton route to the Yukon, the point which that route would reach after having left Edmonton would be Telegraph Creek; and when Telegraph Creek was reached, it would be necessary to prolong the route so as to reach Dawson City. Therefore, if the Edmonton route is ever constructed, that necessary link will be there and in operation when the time arrives for its construction. But I was surprised to hear my hon. friend talk of the necessity of building the Edmonton route, for what purpose? Because he said that if the Edmonton route were constructed, the breadstuffs of the Edmonton district would reach the Yukon country directly instead of going around by the Pacific Coast. It seems to me that it really would be rather an extraordinary demand to make upon the resources of Canada to pledge ourselves to build a road of 900 odd miles into Telegraph Creek simply to allow the Edmonton district the use of the Yukon country as a market for its breadstuffs. I do not think that my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver)—who, I know, is too good a free trader to believe in any such parish politics as that—really intended to press that idea very strongly on the House.

If we have it taken for granted that an all-Canadian route by Telegraph Creek and Teslin Lake is necessary, and that, with the meagre information we possess, we would not be justified in going to the heavy expenditure necessary to build a road from Edmonton and Ashcroft to Telegraph Creek at present, and if we have it admitted that it is urgent, for political and other purposes, to reach that country at the earliest possible time, the only question to be considered is, whether or not, under all the circumstances, we have adopted the best and most economic route, that which is the best in the interests of Canada as well as the Yukon country. We have now reached the crucial point. By reason of the construction of the Telegraph Creek and Teslin Lake route and by the utilization of the Stikine River, we can, according to the estimate given us by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) reach Dawson City in something like thirteen days. If we take the Island of Vancouver as a point of departure, a vessel leaving Vancouver goes along the British Columbia Coast, following British territory the whole length of that coast until she reaches what is now supposed to be American territory, at the southern point of Prince of Wales Island. Leaving the Prince of Wales Island, she comes to Fort Wrangel, at the mouth of the Stikine River. Until she reaches that point, there can be no dispute whatever as to our right of free navigation, because up to that point it is ocean and coast navigation. But when we reach Fort Wrangel, we have reached the mouth of the Stikine River, and the question arises: What are our rights in that river from its mouth up to Telegraph Creek? In so far as those rights are concerned, we have to depend entirely upon the terms of the 26th article of the Treaty of Washington. That article reads as follows:—

The navigation of the rivers Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine, ascending and descending from, to and into the sea shall for ever remain open for the purposes of commerce to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty and the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of either country, within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

The question, then, to be considered is, what is the true construction to be put upon the terms of the Treaty of Washington. In order to resolve that question, it is necessary to consider, in the first place, what would be our rights upon the Stikine River in the absence of a treaty? Second, what were the rights which we enjoyed at the time that treaty was made, in 1871? My contention is, that we, being the owners of the sources of the Stikine River, being the proprietors of the Stikine River in the interior, having many thousands of miles of territory watered by it and its tributaries, and the Americans having simply a strip of land at its mouth on the shore of the ocean—my contention is, that the de jure naturæ, by law, independent of any treaty whatever, we have the right of free access to and ingress from the ocean over that river. That is the common law, that is the principle of Roman jurisprudence, and a principle which you will find consecrated by all the authorities on international law—by Grotius, Puffendorf, Vattel. It is the principle for which the United States have always contended, for which they contended in the case of the Mississippi River, and more than that, it is the principle which has been since consecrated by the treaties of Vienna and Berlin, and is generally adopted on the continent of Europe.

Not for the purpose of making any cheap display of knowledge, but simply for the purpose of giving what I consider to be the legal position of this Government on this question, I would ask hon. gentlemen to give me their attention while I refer them to a few authorities on this subject. I refer them, in the first place, to "Wheaton on International Law." Wheaton says:

When a river rises within the bounds of one state and empties into the sea in another, international law allows to the inhabitants of the upper waters only a moral claim or imperfect right to its navigation. We see in this a decision based on strict views of territorial right, which does not take into account the necessities of mankind and their destination to hold intercourse with one another. When a river affords to the inland state—

This is our case.

When a river affords to the inland state the only convenient means of access to the ocean and to the rest of mankind, its right becomes so strong that according to natural justice, possession of territory ought to be regarded as a far inferior ground of right.

Then, let me quote Phillimore. And here let me say that Phillimore is the greatest authority on international law who has written in the English language. I do not claim that he is an authority at all equal to the continental authorities, such as those I mentioned a moment ago. Grotius, Puffendorf and Vattel, although years have elapsed since they wrote their books, stand even to-day without rivals in that particular branch of law. Here is what Phillimore says :

It has been contended that the principle of this law has been engrafted upon international law, and that it is a maxim of that law that the ocean is free to all mankind, and rivers to all riparian inhabitants. So that the nation which possessed both banks of a river where it disembogued itself into the sea, was not at liberty to refuse the nation or nations which possessed the banks of the river higher up, from the use of the water for the passage of vessels to the sea, and from the incidental use of the banks for the purposes mentioned above. (d) The opinion of Grotius (e) seems to be in favour of this position.

I could also quote upon the same point Wheaton, Vattel, Puffendorf and Grotius. But I have here an authority greater by far, than any of these I have just referred to, and which I say is applicable to the case in point, an opinion which reads almost as if it were prepared to meet with the very difficulty with which we are called upon to deal to-day. I said a moment ago that we were called upon to deal with this question as if no treaty had existed. I have referred you to the opinion of the highest legal authorities in the United States ; I will now refer you to the opinion of one of their most eminent statesmen and publicists. I spoke a moment ago of the case of the Mississippi. You will remember that for some time after the United States came into existence, while the sources of the Mississippi were within the limits of American territory, the river discharged into the Gulf of Mexico through territory that belonged to Spain. It became unnecessary, therefore, for the Americans at the source to get down to the Gulf of Mexico to the sea and back from the sea up the river to their own territories. It became an important matter to them to know how they could get through the territory of Spain, because Spain wanted to do just what some members of the Opposition are now hoping the Americans will seek to do—to prevent those at the sources of the river from reaching its mouth. What do we find said at that time by one of the most eminent men the United States ever produced—Thomas Jefferson. I will refer to the instructions that he gave to the United States Commissioners at that time. Speaking of the law of nature and of nations, he says :

If we appeal to this, as we feel it written in the heart of man, what sentiment is written in deeper characters than that the ocean is free to all men, and the rivers to all their inhabitants ? Is there a man, savage or civilized, unblinded by habit, who does not feel and attest this truth ? Accordingly, in all tracts of country united under the same political society, we find this natural right universally acknowledged and protected by laying the navigable rivers open to all their inhabitants. When their rivers enter the limits of another society, if the right of the upper inhabitants to descend the stream is in any way obstructed, it is an act of force by a stronger society against a weaker, condemned by the judgment of mankind.

That is the opinion of Thomas Jefferson. Writing on a case absolutely analogous to this.

But, more than that, the question has arisen here as to the nature and extent of the right so enjoyed by the inhabitants of the Interior of reaching the ocean. The question has arisen what were the rights incidental to this right of navigation. On this point, assuming that we wish to go up the river to reach the Yukon country or from the Yukon country down the river, we carry our merchandise up to the mouth of the Stikine River by ocean navigation and we can tranship there so as to put our goods on board the river boats and take them to Telegraph Creek. That is, the right to tranship is incidental to the right to navigate. Let me point out what is said, not by continental authorities, dealing with an abstract question, but an American authority, an authority they cannot deny, they cannot gainsay, and dealing with the identical issues that exist here. Here is what Jefferson said :

Among incidental rights—

—rights incidental to the right of navigation—

—are those of having pilots, buoys, beacons, landmarks, lighthouses, &c., to guide the navigators. The establishment of these at the joint expense, and under joint regulations, may be the subject of a future convention. In the meantime both should be free to have their own, and refuse those of the other both to use and expense.

Does it not seem as though Jefferson were writing of the very case that we have now in hand ?

Very peculiar circumstances attending the River Mississippi require that the incidental right of accommodation on the shore, which needs only occasional exercise, on other rivers, should be habitual and constant on this. Sea vessels cannot navigate that river, nor the river vessels go to sea.

Exactly our case.

The navigation would be useless, then, without an entrepôt where these vessels might safely deposit their cargoes and take those left by others, and where warehouses and keepers might be constantly established for the safeguard of the cargoes.

That is what Jefferson said when he contended for rights on the Mississippi exactly the same as we contend for on the Stikine. That is what Jefferson said of rights existing even in the absence of a treaty.

I now come to consider what were the rights which we enjoyed in 1871 when the Treaty of Washington was made. At that time we enjoyed the rights given us by the Russian Treaty, as follows:—

VI. It is understood that the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, from whatever quarter they may arrive, whether from the ocean or from the interior of the continent, shall for ever enjoy the right of navigating freely, and without any hindrance whatever, all the rivers and streams which, in their course towards the Pacific Ocean, may cross the line of demarcation upon the line of coast described in article 3 of the present convention.

I say that under that treaty we had an absolute right to navigate the rivers mentioned in that treaty. What were the rivers mentioned in the treaty? A controversy has arisen as to whether the Yukon River would be included in it. The controversy arose for the first time before the Paris Tribunal, when the question was raised by Sir Charles Russell and Sir Richard Webster as to whether or not, in view of the terms of this treaty the Yukon River would be included in it. You must bear in mind that this treaty was originally drafted in the French language, and in French it reads in this way. The subjects of his Britannic Majesty have the right to navigate the rivers:

Qui dans leurs cours vers l'océan Pacifique traversent la ligne de démarcation sur la lisière de la côte.

That is to say, at the time of the Paris award it was contended that under this original treaty the only rivers we had the right to navigate were those which flow down towards the Pacific Ocean and south of Mount St. Elias. I say the question as to the Yukon was raised for the first time at the Paris Tribunal. It is a matter which may interest some people and they make a point out of the argument, that by the terms of the Washington Treaty the scope of our rights was somewhat enlarged, because we got the right to navigate the Yukon. But, so far as I am concerned, I can only say that if it is a good point, we have to thank the gentlemen who raised it before the Paris Tribunal. It was never dreamed of when negotiating the

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Treaty of Washington in 1871. That question arises, however, under this Washington Treaty, and I think it is well perhaps to say that so far as this Washington Treaty is concerned, I for my part contend—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before the hon. gentleman leaves that Russian Treaty—am I right in understanding him that he agrees that the contention at Paris was correct, that is to say, that the Russian Treaty did not cover the Yukon?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I say that for practical purposes we are not concerned at present as to whether that contention was right or wrong.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And the hon. gentleman does not express an opinion.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is a matter of no interest, but as the question has been discussed, I thought it well to refer to it. But it has no point at all. We are dealing with the rights we have got under the treaty. I will say this, however, that at the time the Washington Treaty was negotiated that question was never dreamt of; in fact it would appear to me from the documents I have in my possession that those who negotiated the Treaty of Washington appeared to be in ignorance of the Russian Treaty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They included the Yukon portion.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. According to the negotiators of the Washington Treaty, they thought the Yukon was covered by the Russian Treaty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That would not follow.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am simply telling you what their opinion seemed to have been. We are not concerned with that. Here is what Sir John A. Macdonald said on the 27th of April, 1871, in a letter which he wrote to Dr. Tupper, now Sir Charles Tupper:

Then it happened that Donald A. Smith mentioned to Sir Stafford Northcote and myself that it was of great importance to the North-west to secure the free navigation of the three rivers mentioned in item 8. He says that the use of the Yukon is absolutely indispensable. That already American vessels from San Francisco carry goods via the Yukon into our country at rates much cheaper than they can be conveyed by any other route. The Stikine River, he says, goes through a gold country, and its navigation is also of importance. The Porcupine is a branch of the Yukon. As the Americans contended for the general principle, they were obliged to consent with respect to these three rivers.

That is all that is said about this matter. He does not appear to have had the faintest idea that the Russian Treaty was in existence, that under that Russian Treaty we were in possession, at all events, of the right to navigate all the rivers with the exception of the Yukon. If there is any doubt about the Yukon, that doubt, as I said a moment ago, was never dreamed of, was never suggested, until the time these gentleman met in Paris a few years ago, and that point was raised by Sir Charles Russell and Sir Richard Webster. But more than that. When the question of this treaty was discussed in the House of Commons, after the negotiations were complete and the treaty was entered into, here is what Sir John said on the subject :

I know, Sir, that there has been in some of the newspapers a sneer because upon the latter paragraph of that article which gives the United States the free use of the St. Lawrence. I refer to the navigation of the rivers Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine.

I may tell my hon. friend (Hon. Alexander Mackenzie) that the navigation of the River Yukon is a great trade, and that the Americans are now sending vessels and are fitting out others for the navigation of the Yukon. I will tell my hon. friend that at this moment United States vessels are going up that river and are underselling the Hudson's Bay people in their own country (hear, hear), and it is a matter of the very greatest importance to the western country that the navigation of these rivers should be open to the commerce of British subjects and that access should be had by means of these rivers, so that there is no necessity at all for the ironical cheer of my hon. friend. Sir, I am not unaware that under an old treaty entered into between Russia and England that the former granted to the latter the free navigation of these streams and the free navigation of all the streams in Alaska.

That looks to me as if it covered the Yukon. That was the view of Sir John A. Macdonald who acted for us at that time. Then Dr. Tupper says :

Mr. McINERNEY. Will the hon. gentleman please continue that quotation ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL—

But that was a treaty between Russia and England, and it may be argued and would be argued by England that when the United States took that country from Russia it took with it all its obligations, but, Mr. Speaker, there are two sides to this question. The United States, I venture to say, would hang an argument upon it, and I can only tell my hon. friend that the officers of the United States have exercised authority in the way of prohibition, and have offered the pretext that that was a matter which had been settled between Russia and England ; that the United States now had that country and would deal with it as they choose, and therefore, as this was a treaty to lay all questions and not to raise new ones, it was well that the question should be settled at once as between England and the United States, as before it was between England and Russia.

Where is the point ? I would like to draw my hon. friend's attention to this fact, that at that time the law officers of the Crown had expressed the opinion, that by the treaty of 1867 under which Alaska passed from the dominion of Russia to that of the United States, these rights still continued to exist. Therefore I see no point in the observation.

Mr. McINERNEY. The United States made the opposite contention.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I admit that. There is no point in that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) says there is a great deal in the point that the United States contended the opposite.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Well, there is this point in it, that the United States expressed one opinion, and the law officers of the Crown in England expressed another, and our object ought to have been to maintain the stronger opinion, that is, the one adopted by the law officers in England. Now, I think I have shown that in the absence of any treaty we would have the right of free egress from the sources of the Stikine to the ocean, and also ingress from the ocean to the sources of the Stikine River. I think I have also shown that under the Russian Treaty we would have had that right of free access, egress and ingress. Now, will it be contended by my hon. friends opposite that the intention was to restrict the rights to that we possessed according to international law and according to treaty ? I notice that in his speech the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) made it a matter of reproach to the Minister of the Interior that he had contended that by the Washington Treaty the powers we enjoyed under the Russian Treaty were restricted and limited ; he made it a matter of reproach to the Minister of the Interior that he should have contended for one moment that by the terms of the Washington Treaty our rights were sacrificed. Now it does appear to me that the senior member for Halifax was unwittingly severe, not upon my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, but upon his own leader, when he made use of that remark. I think he was unnecessarily severe upon the leader of the Opposition when he criticised the Minister of the Interior for having said that our rights were restricted and limited by the Treaty of Washington. Here again I have to call the leader of the Opposition as a witness against one of his own supporters. He said, in speaking upon this question :

Unfortunately, by an oversight, that treaty was renewed with the United States of America, who knew that the people of Canada and every British subject in the Empire possessed an indefeasible right to go in and out of the River Stikine without let or hindrance of any kind whatever, provided that we had the free right of free navigation of the Stikine River, subject to such regulations as might be found necessary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who was to blame for that ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, Sir, I will not go into that. There is an old classic adage which my hon. friend will understand without my calling it to his attention, that prevents a single word. But we were taken advantage of by the United States of America in the construction of the present treaty, and they are in a position to give us hindrance; and, therefore, I say this Government, before they gave away this gigantic territory of Canada to two contractors, were bound to ascertain whether we could use the road profitably after it was constructed. That is the position I take, and I think it is incontrovertible.

That is what the hon. gentleman said himself about this treaty. Why should this be made a matter of reproach to the Minister of the Interior? The old adage to which the hon. leader of the Opposition no doubt referred was "De mortuis nil nisi bonum," referring to the hon. gentleman whose colleague the leader of the Opposition was for a whole lifetime. It appears to me there was no necessity for making this attack on the Minister of the Interior for the language he used. And in any event, I consider this: that in so far as we are concerned, we the Parliament of Canada, dealing now with the rights of Canada, we should take this position—assert to the extreme limit the rights which Canada can possibly possess under this treaty. And here is the position I think the Government should take, that the American sovereignty, as regards the waters of the Stikine River is limited in its scope by the engagements of the Treaty of Washington, which cannot be modified or affected by any municipal legislation. I say that the sovereign power over those waters is vested in the United States, but that the sovereign power which is vested in the United States is restricted in its scope by the terms of the Treaty of Washington, and that those terms cannot be modified, cannot be restricted in any way by any legislation of the United States. That is the principle for which I contend. That was the opinion expressed by Mr. Jefferson, to which I made reference a moment ago.

I will now proceed to show that that is the opinion of the most eminent jurists in the United States. It was also the opinion of Caleb Cushing, who wrote an admirable treatise on the Washington Treaty, and whose opinion was quoted a few days ago by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). But I would go one step further, and claim that this principle for which I am contending is the principle that was asserted by the United States in 1883, it is the principle that was asserted against England by the United States in that year, and it was then adopted by England. Further, it is the principle asserted in the terms of the Washington Treaty by the United States and admitted by England in the terms of the same treaty, that is the treaty under which we hold our right of navigation on the Stikine. If therefore that principle was asserted by the United States and admitted by England, the high contracting parties, in the construction of the same treaty as that we now have under consideration, that principle must of necessity be made to apply to the present case.

Let me point to the case in which the principle was applied. It was the case of Fortune Bay, Newfoundland. In that case, under the Washington Treaty, paragraph 18:—

It is agreed by the high contracting parties that in addition to the liberties secured to the United States fishermen by the convention between the United States and Great Britain, signed at London on the 20th day of October, 1818, of taking, curing, and drying fish on certain coasts of the British North American colonies therein defined, the inhabitants of the United States shall have, in common with the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, the liberty, for the term of years mentioned in article 33 of this treaty, to take fish of every kind, except shell fish, on the sea coasts and shores, and in the bays, harbours and creeks of the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and the colony of Prince Edward Island.

Therefore, they had the right to fish on the coast, harbour and creeks. They had the right, incident to that right, to fish, the right to go on shore for the purpose of taking, curing and drying fish. They also had the right to go on shore for the purpose of getting wood, and also for the purpose of getting water. Therefore, by the treaty itself they had the right to fish in the waters of Newfoundland; by the treaty they had the right of access to the shore for certain specific purposes defined in the treaty. The colony of Newfoundland, in the exercise of the rights it undoubtedly possessed, had passed a law under which no fishing should be done on Sunday, under which it was provided that no fishing should be carried on during certain months of the year, and providing further that seines should not be used, all of which provisions were applicable to the inhabitants of Newfoundland, these regulations being adopted because they believed them to be necessary for the preservation of the fisheries in which they had at least as great a right as the people of the United States. What followed? The people of the United States went to the shores of Newfoundland, and in violation of the law passed by Newfoundland prohibiting fishing on Sunday, prohibiting fishing during certain months in the year and prohibiting the use of seines by the people of Newfoundland—in violation of that law which the people of Newfoundland were obliged to respect, Americans landed on the shores of Newfoundland, fished on Sunday, fished during prohibited months, and used seines against the law; and the people of Newfoundland drove them out? What then occurred? The people of the United States made a claim on England, asserting the principle I contended for a moment ago, that is to say, asserting the principle that although the British Empire had the right of sovereignty over these waters, coast and fisheries, that right of sovereignty was limited to this extent, that even although laws might be passed applicable to the people of Newfoundland, they could not be made applicable to the people of the United States, that although the laws were applicable to the people of Newfoundland, citizens of the United States had the right, in violation of the law of Newfoundland, to go there and do practically what they pleased. The United States Government asserted that right. That right was accepted by England, because, they said: you, the people of the United States are a sovereign people within the terms of the Washington Treaty. And as a result England paid, through Newfoundland, £14,000 as damages.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What were the damages sustained?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Driving out the Americans who were fishing on Sunday.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Destroying nets and fish. The action was that of a British mob.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The Americans arrived there in the month of December and waited until January for a school of fish. They were driven off. It is true that the people cut the nets of the Americans. Some of the visitors returned home taking a cargo and proceeding to the state of Maine. But the claim as made was for damages suffered by reason of their not being able to take fish during that season.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That was not due to the action of the local government or any government, but the action of a mob.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It may take some time to submit the particulars to the House, but I will read them in full. The principle contended for was this, and it was the principle admitted and agreed to in the settlement:

Her Majesty's Government will readily admit what is, indeed, self-evident, that British sovereignty as regards those waters, is limited in its scope by the engagements of the Treaty of Washington, which cannot be modified or affected by any municipal legislation.

That is the principle asserted by Lord Salisbury and accepted by Everts, Secretary of State for the United States, and it is the principle upon which the whole settlement proceeded.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is made matter of reproach to this Government, that they assumed that they would have the right to use the Stikine River for the purpose of navigation and to get access to Telegraph Creek, without having made preliminary inquiry at Washington as to what were the rights we enjoyed there. Sir, we have it from the most eminent authorities, authorities that cannot be controverted, we have it on the authority of Wheaton, we have it on the authority of Wharton, we have it on the authority of Woolsey, and we have it on the best authority of them all, the authority of the most eminent statesman that America has produced in the last century, we have it on the authority of Thomas Jefferson, that, even in the absence of treaty, we would have the right to navigate that river so as to get access to the ocean, and from the ocean we have the right to navigate it so as to get access to the interior. We have it on the authority of all these eminent statesmen and publicists, that we not only have the right to navigate the river, but that we have the right to use the shores and to tranship at any point necessary so as to change from ocean-going into river vessels.

Not only had we these authorities as to our rights, but we had, in addition, the principle conceded and admitted in the Fortune Bay cases. I have used the terms in relation to these cases from manuscript because I have taken them from the correspondence, and I ask my hon. friends on the other side to deny them, if they can. We have before us the principle contended for in the United States in the Fortune Bay cases, and admitted by England. That principle applied to the present case is, that the sovereignty of the United States over the river is limited by the treaty, and that no municipal regulations can be made by the United States which would in any way affect our rights to navigation for the purpose of commerce over that river. Now, Sir, being, as we were, in possession of the opinions of these eminent publicists and jurists, being in possession of the principle which was put forth by the United States in the Fortune Bay cases and admitted by England, what were we to be expected to do? Is it to be thought that we should have gone down to Washington and asked the United States authorities, whether or not they were going to observe their treaties, and whether, in violation of the terms of the treaty and in violation of the principles they themselves contended for, they were going to obstruct us in the navigation of the Stikine River? I maintain, Sir, that to do such a thing would be an insult to our own intelligence and an insult to the good faith of the American people. We have no right to assume that the Americans would not observe their treaties, and I maintain, Sir, that, in spite of what has taken place in the United States Senate, we still have the right to assume, and it is our duty to assume, that the United States will adhere loyally to their treaties, that they will keep these treaties inviolate, and that, in the words of the ever-sacred Book, the authorities of that great republic will remember:

Ye, who believe, must observe your covenants.

I hold, Sir, that we cannot for one moment admit that there could be any doubt on the subject. If, after having on the faith of that treaty, as interpreted by the authors, as interpreted by the people of the United States themselves—if after having on the faith of that treaty entered into negotiations for the construction of this road, and assuming that, under the treaty, we were now to withdraw, this Government would be guilty of an act of cowardice that the people of Canada would never forgive us, an act of cowardice that we could never explain. I say, Sir, that we, the Canadian people, are on this continent the advance guard of the British Empire.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I say, Sir, that we hold, not only the territory that is confided to our care, as a sacred trust, but that we also hold, in addition, the treaty rights that were guaranteed to us, and we would be remiss in our duty to the Empire and to ourselves, if we did not consecrate the principle, that where the British flag once floats, there that flag remains, and that, in the matter of treaty rights once guaranteed to England, the power of England is sufficient to maintain these rights inviolate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to refer to the principle of the Bill, the details of which will be discussed hereafter in committee. There are some changes proposed to be introduced into the Bill, as announced by some members of the Government during the course of this debate, changes as to the board of directors, as to a provision for the operation of the road, and as to the mode of selecting the land.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We have not heard of any change in regard to the provision for the operation of the road. Could the hon. gentleman state what that change will be?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Possibly, the change will be in the direction of introducing a clause similar to that in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's Bill. Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have charged that this is an improvident bargain, that tenders should be called for, and, in a word, they say that we have paid too much for our whistle. Now, what are we getting in return for the concessions that we are to make? We are getting a sleigh road from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is a one-horse sleigh.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not know if it is a one-horse or a two-horse sleigh, but I think it may be good enough for us, because it had the approval of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was not known then, but it is announced now to be a one-horse sleigh.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I suppose we are not very proud, and if we get there even with a one-horse sleigh, it will be all right. We are to have a sleigh road from the mouth of the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, with suitable shelters or stopping-places for travellers at intervals of not more than 25 miles along such road; we are to have a line of railway, with proper terminal facilities, from the navigable waters of the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, and we are to have steamboat transportation from Teslin to Dawson City.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am asking the hon. gentleman who is speaking, and, of course, he can refuse, if he wishes. I trust it will not interrupt the hon. gentleman to ask him, whether he has any information that the provision of the contract with reference to the sleigh road will be complied with? The time expires to-morrow.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am under the impression that these questions will be more properly in order when we come to discuss the details in committee. In aid of the construction of this road we are to give 25,000 acres of land per mile, or on the whole, 3,750,000 acres. That is to say, in this practically unknown region, in this region of perpetual frost, we give 3,750,000 acres of land to men who, before they can call a single acre of that land their own, will be called upon to spend something in the vicinity of $5,000,000.

Now, to a large extent this controversy has turned on the question, whether or not this contract is going to be a good thing for Mackenzie & Mann. I have heard very little from the other side, at all events, on the question whether or not this contract is going to be a good thing for the country, I, for my part, express the hope and the desire that Mackenzie & Mann may make something out of it. I hope they may make not only something, but a great deal out of it; because they deserve it, in view of the enterprise and the spirit they have shown in taking hold of this work. Now, what have we really done? What is our real object? The real object, in the first instance, must be to bring about the development of that country—to find out if there really is anything in it; and, as a secondary consideration in connection with that development, to see as the development goes on that the interests of those who are brought into the country for the purposes of developing it are properly safeguarded. To bring about the development of the country what have we done? We have induced these people to build that railway from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake. The building of that road, no one can deny, is of itself an advantage to the country. To build that road, these men will be called upon to expend $5,000,000. They must put that much out of pocket, in the creation of something which is going to be useful to the country. When we have reached that point, we have got to this position—that they have built a road which is useful to us, and have put into the construction of that road $5,000,000, which must be taken out of the Yukon country. To get that sum of money out of the Yukon country, they must develop its resources. That is to say, they must bring about that condition of things which we are interested in bringing about. In the construction of that road, and in the development of that country, they are the partners of the people of Canada. In order to develop the country they must bring labour into it, they must provide machinery, they must feed and clothe the men they bring in. I understand that the country itself produces nothing of food or clothing, or even of light. Therefore, to get their $5,000,000 back, they must help to develop the country; and, as was said by the leader of the Opposition in this debate, they must spend dollar for dollar to get it out; so that they must not only spend the $5,000,000 in constructing the railway, but they must spend a great deal more in developing the country, in feeding the men whom they employ with Canadian products and clothing them with Canadian goods, in order to get back their money. Thus we have not only secured the construction of the road, but we have interested these men in the development of the country to the extent I have indicated. One would imagine, to hear hon. gentlemen opposite talk about these gold lands, that all these men would have to do would be to go into the country and pick up the gold. But they have to dig and delve and work before they can get it. All that is going to develop the country and benefit Canada at large. But more than that, for every valuable claim they find, they will find another for the Dominion of Canada, which is the large landed proprietor out there, much larger than the contractors; for every dollar of value they give to the land they possess, a dollar of value is given to the land beside it which belongs to us. I have heard a great deal of talk about these gentlemen going into the country and putting their blanket over it. They cannot put their blanket over that country without putting holes in it, or giving us blanket for blanket. Therefore, every dollar they put into the country must go for the food and the clothing of the labourers they employ, and, in addition, for every dollar of value they give to their lands, a dollar of value is added to the adjoining lands owned by the people of Canada.

We have also to bear in mind that there have been mining booms in other countries. This is not the first time that gold has been discovered. We know that distance lends enchantment to the view, and the mystery that surrounds the Yukon district has given value to the land. But what has been the history of the mining booms in California and Australia? We know that these mining districts have been exhausted. In the very richest districts in California, the mining boom never lasted longer than three years, and there never has been a year in which the best parts of that country have produced more than $75,000,000. Then, in California, where the conditions were such that men could live almost the whole year round without shelter, and where they had comparatively easy access for their supplies, we know the miseries and hardships they had to endure, and how soon the mining boom came to an end. We have, however, some information of a positive character about the Yukon country. But a few days ago there was a meeting of mining engineers at Montreal, at which two mining engineers from the Yukon country were present, and gave their experience of the country and their opinion of its resources. Let me read what these gentlemen said—this is from the Montreal "Gazette":

Some interesting things about the Klondike were heard at last night's meeting. Mr. C. J. Christie and Mr. Fred. Hyde, two practical miners, who have spent considerable time in the Yukon gold regions, were introduced to the meeting in the belief that their remarks would prove specially interesting at a time when so much is being said about these regions.

The opinions expressed by these experienced miners, in regard to the genuine inducements which the Klondike offers, were not just in harmony with much that has been said of them, not only through press reports, but through sources supposed to be reliable.

Mr. Christie, for instance, after referring generally to the state of things existing in the Klondike regions, said that under present conditions there were too many people in the district now, and those who were physically and intellectually unfitted to cope with the hardships of pioneer life should not venture their chances in the western scramble. Mr. Christie spoke of his own experiences at Dawson, and through the gold regions, and gave it as his opinion, based on personal observation, that many of the glowing reports which reached civilization in regard to the finds of gold there were largely exaggerated.

Now, there are two sides to the question of the value of the lands. There are the fabulous stories told by the people who have been working in the Yukon country and the truth of which we have never been able to test; and there are the reports given by these reliable men who have just come from there and who tell us that these stories are greatly exaggerated.

Mr. MILLS. Read the balance of what he says.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He says he made his way to that country by the Skagway trail. That is the trail these hon. gentlemen opposite want us to take. And he goes on to say :

There were some difficulties, there were some crevices and holes in it in which the pack horses got stuck, and he had seen them go down out of sight, packs and all, in the mud. He knew of something like 3,000 horses having been lost there, and had himself contributed 30 of that number.

Mr. MILLS. Does he not say that he believes it to be the storehouse of the world ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, but he says they have the liecrobe up in that country and you cannot believe a word they tell you. According to him there are two sides to the story, so that when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said, during the debate on the Address, that this was a huge gamble, he said what was the case in so far as Mackenzie & Mann are concerned. They are building this road and taking all the risks. In order to get their money back—and remember they will have to sink some four or five million dollars in it—they must get it out of the gold lands, if the gold is there. If it is not, they will not get it back.

The next matter of reproach is that we did not call for tenders. I have no doubt that I will be followed by a gentleman who has had a much longer experience in Parliament than I and who knows all about contracts and tenders, but let me put to him this question: Where in this country has a construction of a railway ever been let by tender? That question was asked a day or two ago by one of my hon. friends behind me, and I have yet heard no answer. Let me give my hon. friend this bit of information. In the Public Works Act it is provided that the public works of Canada shall be let by public tender, but it is also provided that in case of emergency, when it is important to proceed rapidly, tenders may be dispensed with. So that even under this Act, which is the only one that stipulates that tenders must be called for, there are cases in which that preliminary may be dispensed with. What is the practice followed with regard to railway construction? Our practice is to incorporate railway companies, giving them a charter under which they have the right to construct their lines from one point to another, and to give each company a certain aid in lands and in money almost invariably. In this case, what did we do? We incorporate this company to build this railway, and to aid them in its construction we give them so many acres of land. In the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway,

hon. gentlemen proceeded exactly as this Government has done. They made a contract in exactly the same way, and after that contract was made without tender, just as in the case of this contract, they brought down a Bill, exactly as we are doing, to organize a company and enable them to build the railway and take over the contract. But if you call for tenders for the construction of a public work, what are you obliged to do? In order that you may deal intelligently with those who tender and enable them to deal intelligently with you, it is necessary that you should give them some information as to the nature of the work. What information could be given in this instance which would be of any value? They would require to know what we were prepared to give; and when told that we were prepared to give land, they would require information as to whether these lands had been surveyed or developed, and what information we had as to their worth, and we could only reply that we were not in possession of any information and could tell them nothing. These hon. gentlemen have been for weeks declaiming to the whole country about the extravagance of this bargain, and inducing their friends right and left to rise and protest against it, and no doubt they have called on those to whom they have access—and certainly, so far as the contractors are concerned, their experience enables them to have access without difficulty to most of them—and sought to obtain some offer to build the road, but so far have failed to obtain one. We have heard about Mr. Hamilton Smith. His name has been mentioned here repeatedly and I just wish to say a word or two about his offer. It seems to me its value has been very much over-rated, and one fact in particular has been overlooked to which I think it well to recall to the attention of the House. In his offer of the 14th February, 1898, Mr. Hamilton Smith, speaking about the negotiations, said :

The answer I received was that the Government preferred the Stikine-Teslin route. To this I replied that, in my judgment, which I felt sure from my familiarity with the country was correct, the Stikine-Teslin line had practically no value as a commercial route, and that no sane capitalist would invest a penny in it, but, of course, if the Government would give the right assistance, we would build the line, while disclaiming any responsibility for its value when constructed.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have reproached this Government for not having given Mr. Smith the right to construct this Teslin-Stikine route road, although Mr. Smith said it was of no value and that no sane capitalists would put a dollar in it. If that was Mr. Smith's opinion about the road, I say that no sane Government would have anything to do with him. If he was satisfied that no man would put any money in it, and if the Government wanted the road, the Government should build the road itself, we could very well dispense with his services in its construction. Mr. Smith told us that this road was such that no sane capitalists would put a dollar in it, but that if we insisted on having it, we might have it at his price. That is to say, he would build the road for us and then abandon it, and we might do what we liked with it. That is to say: You build it yourselves, and when you build it, you can do what you like with it. But you have heard of the immense fortune which, it is said, these gentlemen are going to make, not only out of the lands they are getting, but also out of the working of the road. That is what gentlemen opposite tell you, and they tell you also that Mr. Hamilton Smith is a man whom the Government ought to have been glad to deal with, that the Ministers ought to have run after Mr. Hamilton Smith and asked him to do Canada the honour of constructing this road. Mr. Hamilton Smith must be an eminent capitalist, and, no doubt, knows all about that country and its resources. What does he say about this railroad, when it is built? He says: I will build the road for you at my own price.

But I disclaim any responsibility for its value when constructed.

That does not square with the information of hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. Hamilton Smith says the road is of no value; they say that it is a gold mine. They had better square accounts with Mr. Hamilton Smith before telling us anything more about him.

As I said a moment ago, I will not say a word more about the contract, because we shall be called to deal with that in committee. But I would like to call attention to Mr. Ogilvie's report made in 1887, which states, that at that time the Alaska Commercial Company was trading up the Yukon. At that time the Alaska Commercial Company had driven the Hudson's Bay Company out of that market. Mr. Ogilvie tells us in 1891, that the American Transportation Company, with headquarters at Chicago and its distributing centre at Fort Cudahy, had monopolized the trade of that country—another American company. Hon. gentlemen opposite were in power in 1887, they knew that these American companies had got possession and control of the trade of that country, that they were bringing in American supplies to the exclusion of Canadian goods. But they never interfered for the purpose of developing the resources of the country and drawing the supplies from Canada. They never did anything except in 1894, when they received from that country $3,000 in customs duties. But, after having allowed seven years to go by from the time of Mr. Ogilvie's report, they tell us still that we ought not to do anything, but await Mr. Hamilton Smith's convenience to build the road. I say, that this ought not to be allowed to go further. The time has arrived when we ought to stop it, when something is required to be done. We have done that something to stop the Americans going in and monopolizing the trade of that country. We have done that something which will enable us to ascertain what there is in that country and what its resources are. We have done that something which will ensure to the people of Canada a share in the development of the country, because they will be able to furnish the supplies and other things necessary to enable the people there to carry on their operations.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I was very glad to hear the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) to-night. I waited patiently to have my curiosity gratified on this question. I desire to know, if possible, whether the Solicitor General of Canada ever had anything to do with the contract that is now before this Parliament for its approval. I was satisfied, from the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), that he, to some extent, had exonerated his department from the responsibility of ever having been consulted with regard to a clause or a line of that contract; and I waited, with some interest, to know whether the Department of Justice had ever been referred to in connection with this astounding document—for never from the hands of any government in any province of Canada, or of Canada itself, or of the government of any country with the history of which I am familiar, has there come such a miserable, lame, halting, humiliating document as this Mann & Mackenzie contract, so far as the responsibility of the Government introducing it is concerned. Interesting as was the speech of the Solicitor General, I cannot, I am sure, be considered as taking extreme ground when I say that that hon. gentleman gave less attention to the contract and the terms of the contract than he did to the very interesting historical and diplomatic matters which only bear incidentally upon this question. Upon the international law that the hon. gentleman laid down, various positions may be taken. But, when we come to the very important question to the people of Canada as to the terms of this contract, he felt that he was skating on thin ice. I will do him the justice to say that he felt the awkwardness of his position, and so sheltered himself by saying—and saying very quickly—that the details of the contract are to be discussed hereafter. I venture to reply to him, to-night, that, in the opinion of most of the business men of Canada, it would have been better if the details of the contract had been considered before; it would have been better had the Government had the advice of the paid, and well paid, advisers of the Government in connection with the contract. Let us consider that question, for it is a practical one, and it meets us at the outset. I have said to-night that it is a guess, but, I think, a reasonable guess, that the Minister of Railways and his department knew nothing of this contract at all until the position of the Government was taken with regard to it. I shall be contradicted, of course, by the Minister of Railways, who is present, if I am wrong, when I state, subject to his correction, that there is not in the Railway Department, nor was there obtained from it, a report or advice as to the terms or drafting of these different clauses, or of any clause, in the Mann & Mackenzie contract. And we pay an engineering expert $6,000 a year, or thereabouts, to advise the Minister of Railways of the day on this and all similar questions. I venture to say, in the presence of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), and subject to correction, that, while we have in his department highly-paid officials—for instance, Mr. Dawson, who is known all over this country, and known among the scientists of the British Empire—we had not the benefit of the opinion of any of those experts in mining matters as to a single clause of the contract or of the contract as a whole. And to-night it is clear, it does not require argument, after the speech of the Solicitor General, that, not only was the Department of the Minister of Justice passed over in the arrangement of the terms of this contract, but the Solicitor General himself was so ignored that he is unable to deal with that contract or to defend it, or take up the different points in debate, but has sought to shelter the Government and himself by putting off the evil day until we reach another stage, and go into committee.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL. Allow me to ask the hon. gentleman whether the position I have taken is not correct, that on the second reading of the Bill the principle of the Bill alone is to be discussed?

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Quite so. I wish to deal candidly with the hon. gentleman. That is the rule, but the principle of the Bill is the all-Canadian route, the principle of this Bill concerns the operation of a railway, the principle of this Bill, if it has any principle, deals with the selection of the lands belonging to the people of Canada; and in regard to all these principles the hon. gentleman says: The Government will give you information as to the legislation they propose in this House after you have voted blindfolded for the second reading. They have studiously refrained from giving us the draft of any of the amendments that we have forced them to tell us they will make on these very vital phases of the Bill. Day after day when they have found the weakness of their position was so apparent that it were monstrous to attempt to hold to it, they have told us; We will alter all that if you will only let it go past the second reading. They will come down, as some hon. gentleman says. But here in connection with these vital features of the Bill, comes the confession of the Solicitor General, and he was wise to make it, that knowing so little about it, never having been consulted about it, he is unable to deal with the terms of these clauses, until they have been put before the House. Then what have we here except a statement that Mackenzie & Mann are going to run tremendous risks, risks that no other people, apparently, in the world would think of running, and that we are giving them a vast amount of property, it may be worth hundreds of millions, it may be worth not a song; and the terms and conditions have been so hastily considered that the people of Canada, and the Parliament of Canada, let alone being advised after Parliament was assembled, will know nothing definitely until Parliament votes that they will transfer to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann this large amount of gold-bearing territory in Canada if they will build this railroad, the conditions of the whole thing to be considered and to be discussed hereafter. There never was such a proposition as that made in this House, certainly since I have been in it, and I have yet to hear of any proposition concerning the construction of any railway that was ever introduced with such a limited apology. Now, Mr. Speaker, I followed the hon. gentleman's speech, and I must say that it is an alarming condition of affairs that any number of gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches should assume that they command sufficient confidence in this House of Commons that they can come down with such a proposition as is now before us, involving technical questions, involving most difficult legal problems, involving great legal questions in international law, and yet have to say that into those questions as a whole they have not looked, into those questions they hold their individual opinions, and as I shall show, the members on the Treasury benches are contradicting each other as fast as they speak, and although, it is true, they have not spoken so very frequently on this subject. That they should come down and tell us, that in regard to this momentous subject they cannot give us that which surely we are entitled to, even if they did not require the opinions of these different experts in the service of the Government. I say it is extraordinary; and when you add to that the secrecy of the whole thing, add to that the temper of these gentlemen, the violence of these gentlemen, when Mr. Hamilton Smith's name is mentioned, or the name of any man who would like to give Canada more for the money and upset this secret bargain, this bargain made in the dark, this bargain made without the benefit of legal advice, or engineering advice, or the advice of mining experts—I say the position is bewildering. At a previous occasion this session I opened my observations, and I take back none of them, by saying that I was going to make no charges against this Administration, nor will I do so, of corruption, or of nefarious conduct, on mere suspicion, and that I would wait for evidence. Well, I may not have evidence upon which to make a certain and direct charge of corruption, but I am bound to say here, speaking emphatically, that I see no other alternative except to indict the Government for the most monstrous ignorance, and a recklessness that is tantamount to criminal. If they have not been corrupt, intentionally corrupt, if they have not been perpetrators of a huge job, if they are not attempting to perpetrate it now, their ignorance is such that it is almost criminal; and I hope before I get through my observations to be able to show that I have some ground for impaling these hon. gentlemen on either horn of the dilemma, and they can choose upon which to remain. The Solicitor General, to whom I must first pay some attention, ventured to taunt the leader of the Opposition with a change of base, a change of opinion. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when in a difficult position of this kind, have been eager to refer to the endorsement which they claim the leader of the Opposition at one time gave to this scheme. Well, coming from the Solicitor General I suppose he is an authority on a change of base. I suppose there is no man in this House who ever pledged himself to a certain course and then took a more opposite course than the Solicitor General.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I challenge that statement, let us set that at rest now. Last session when that statement was made, I said in the House that the gentleman to whom I gave that pledge was the best judge as to whether I had fulfilled it. I made that statement publicly, and I challenge hon. gentlemen on the other side to show that it has never been carried out or fulfilled.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman would go further and state what the pledge was, and then what he did, it would be unnecessary for me to say any more. I do not wish to misrepresent the hon. gentleman.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You are doing it now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But I am basing my criticisms upon the remarks the hon. gentleman made, and if he will tell us what the pledge was and what he did, I will not add another word. But let us see whether he is fair. In the first place when the leader of the Opposition gave an opinion upon that subject, he had not this contract before him any more than the Solicitor General had; he, no more than the Solicitor General, ever dreamed that the colleagues of the Solicitor General would go about so serious a matter as this without any understanding, or any reliable arrangement with the people who had it in their power to thwart and destroy the whole scheme, whether right or wrong. Many things have occurred and have been explained to this House, which would enable gentlemen who had formed an opinion at the outset, to change it and to deserve commendation for the change. If I recollect aright the leader of the Opposition at the time to which the Solicitor General referred, laid great stress on this work being vigorously pressed forward as a Government work; but surely no man who heard the leader of the Opposition dissect the terms of that contract, and no gentlemen in this House, the Solicitor General himself included would be so mad as to contend that, having the information he had when he made his speech, he could have possibly entertained the opinion for a single moment to which the hon. gentleman referred. That information was such as to lead him, and to lead a great many gentlemen on this side of the House, and outside of the House altogether, to only one opinion, and that was in condemnation of this extraordinary proposition. Then the hon. gentleman refers to the action of the United States Senate as having been brought about at the instigation of the Opposition.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It was the Opposition of a few years ago, and the hon. gentleman who said "hear, hear," knows it was correct. The Opposition for many years in this House and out of it took such a course, as has already been explained, so as to lead any man who follows Canadian affairs to believe that the moment those hon. gentlemen occupied the Treasury benches, then every desire that had been nursed in the breast of many American citizens to get advantages at the cost of Canada out of Canada would be granted. Those hon. gentlemen were willing to compromise us or to grant concessions at our expense time and again. The St. Thomas speech and the Chicago interview mentioned this afternoon should have prevented the Solicitor General making so reckless a statement, unless when he referred to the Opposition, he meant the Liberal Opposition of a few years ago.

I have some reason, however, to quarrel with the Solicitor General for the manner in which he has dealt with a subject which in his hands I think he ought to have exercised more candour about than he did. The hon. gentleman was hard driven when speaking for the Government of Canada he gave such a representation of the authorities on international law as he did when discussing the Treaty of 1871, and the rights of upper proprietors of a river in regard to navigation over the river below when it went through another country to that to which the upper part of the river belonged. The hon. gentleman referred to Wheaton. Wheaton, of course, was an American authority. He referred also to Phillimore, and I am bound to suppose that he seemed to me to make a most unfair statement of Phillimore's opinion, because in that statement—and he would not otherwise have referred to it—he made it appear that Phillimore and Wheaton agreed, and every one knows that Phillimore was a great authority on international law. Let us see exactly what the passage to which the hon. gentleman referred was, and then we will understand to what desperate straits the hon. gentleman is driven. He quoted from chapter 5, paragraph 107, and he made this citation in connection with Wheaton, where he explains the well known view of writers on international law in the United States, and a few authorities on the continent.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Was Phillimore an American?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I said that this view was peculiar to United States writers and to some writers on the continent who agreed with them but that it was opposed totally and absolutely to the views of English writers on international law.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. With one exception, and that is Hall.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman did not refer to Hall, but I will do so. Hall is an undoubted authority on international law, and he is quoted at all great meetings of international lawyers. This was the section to which the hon. gentleman referred, but he did not read it, and that circumstance makes it necessary for me to read it, not the whole of it, but the conclusion. The hon. gentleman referred to the contention, not to Phillimore's opinion:

It has been contended that the principle of this law has been engrafted upon international law, and that it is a maxim of that law that the ocean is free to all mankind, and rivers to all riparian inhabitants.

After stating that that was the contention, at the end of the very paragraph to which the hon. gentleman alluded, this is what Phillimore tells us:

For the reason of the thing, and the opinion of other jurists, speaking generally, seem to agree in holding that the right can only be what is called (however improperly) by Vattel and other writers imperfect, and that the state through whose domain the passage is to be made must be the sole judge as to whether it be innocent or injurious in its character.

Between Vattel, Phillimore and Hall and the advisers of the Crown in England there is no dispute whatever in regard to that proposition. Would it be believed that the Government have got in this position, that the ablest man among them, their representative on legal questions, had to quote or deemed it necessary to quote from that paragraph of Phillimore to support the American doctrine that Wheaton lays down, when Phillimore's opinion is as different from that of Wheaton as are the poles asunder. Referring to Hall, it is not necessary for me to speak of his standing as a writer or the position given to him at different times by the Imperial Government. Dealing with the contention—the very contention of Wheaton—in respect to the River St. Lawrence and the contention of the Americans with respect to that river and the Mississippi, which subjects are considered by Hall, at the end of a long review, he says:

England, again, has always steadily refused to concede the navigation of the St. Lawrence to the United States as of right, and a controversy, which existed for many years upon the subject, was only put an end to in 1854 by a treaty which granted its navigation as a revokable privilege, and as part of a bargain in which other things were given and obtained on the two sides.

Let me give a little more from Hall, and I am not reading right along, as I wish to save time. At page 139 he says:

And it may be said without hesitation that so far as international law is concerned, a state may close or open its rivers at will, that it may tax or regulate transit over them as it chooses, and that though it would be as wrong in a moral sense as it would generally be foolish to use these powers needlessly or in an arbitrary manner, it is morally as well as legally permissible to retain them, so as to be able, when necessary, to exercise pressure by their means or so as to have something to exchange against concessions by another power.

That is not the exact reference I wish to make to Hall; but I say this, having some familiarity with Hall's views, there is no advantage to be gained to Canada by taking a position which no English Crown officer or authority has taken. Hall agrees to this doctrine as a matter of strict right, that without the Russian Treaty of 1825 or the Treaty of 1871 we could not use the Yukon or Stikine Rivers. That is a position unassailable and one that is not gainsaid in England to-day.

The difficulty in this way is this, that when we say: You are bound by such and such an American authority, they answer back: You are bound by such and such an English authority. The difficulty there is apparent, but at all events, it is more important for us to know what the Senate of the United States think in 1898 than what Jefferson thought many years ago. It is with the United States Senate of to-day that we have to deal rather than with Jefferson of long ago. Where, let me ask, did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) obtain the view that there was something new developed at Paris when Sir Charles Russell for the first time explained, as I understood the Solicitor General to say, that there was a distinction between the margin of land in Alaska, and the boundary running to the Arctic Ocean on the north-west coast. I might tell the hon. gentleman, for I imagine he has not looked closely into it, that so far as this question is concerned, England represented by Sir Charles Russell and Sir Richard Webster, the Attorney General and the ex-Attorney General, all agree that the Treaty of 1825 so far as it gave us rights of navigation to the rivers running through the Lisière or margin gave us no other rights of navigation whatever. It referred to the rivers below the Aleutian Peninsula and below the Behring Sea covering that part running south of Mt. St. Elias. There was no question between the two great powers in the construction they gave to the treaties then and there; that we got under Treaty of 1825 any rights whatever through the rivers above this Lisière or above Mt. St. Elias. There was a very good reason for that, because I think I am safe in saying that the Yukon River was not discovered until ten years after the Treaty of 1825.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Oh, no.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I may be wrong, but I believe that is correct.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There was a plan of the river in existence in 1815.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I can say that Campbell, one of the Hudson's Bay men, claim to have been the first explorer or discoverer of the Yukon River some years (I think it was ten years) after the Treaty of 1825. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will at any rate understand that in those early years that land was generally speaking a terra incognita. The right hon. the Prime Minister made a rather serious statement this afternoon, and as I think he spoke on the spur of the moment, I trust he will retract it, so that it may not go as an authoritative statement on the record. The right hon. gentleman said that Dyea had been in possession of the Russian authorities from time immemorial, and that since 1867 it had been in possession of the American authorities. I have looked into that question, not so much in regard to the Alaskan boundary as in regard to the boundaries between England and Russia, and I know that though both nations had by discoverers and adventurers and hunters visited different parts of that enormous territory casually, up to 1825, I am safe in saying that it would be ridiculous to pretend that there had been an occupation by Russia of such a place as Dyea, or that Dyea was a place of any name or notoriety whatever. Then, again, when the right hon. gentleman speaks of it having been occupied at the time of the cession to the United States, I feel that he spoke hastily and I would ask him to qualify that statement, or at any rate not to repeat it in this House without having some definite authority. There will be no dispute on either side of the House that there could be nothing more useful to the United States, than the admission of the Prime Minister of Canada that there had been this immemorial possession by either Russia or the United States in the country that we claim. The Minister of the Interior told us the other day that when these negotiations took place at Washington he was careful to arrange that the negotiations should proceed without prejudice to our claims to Dyea or Skagway, and what an idle precaution that would have been, if these places had been in possession of either of these countries from time immemorial.

The hon. the Solicitor General referred to the Fortune Bay cases, but I do not think he will find much comfort in that reference. Let me refer to Hall again, for this authority has gone over a good deal of these interesting questions and his deduction from this case is not exactly the same as that of the Solicitor General. Hall deals with that extraordinary claim that was put forward by the United States, that was resisted for a long time by the British Government, and which ended in a payment. Hall, after reviewing the claim and knowing of the payment, as a writer on International Law, higher than even Lord Salisbury himself—as I am sure the Solicitor General will admit—says:

There can be no question that no more could be demanded than that American citizens should not be subject to laws or regulations, either affecting them alone, or enacted for the purpose of putting them at a disadvantage.

He precedes that by saying:

That the American Government should have put the claim is scarcely intelligible.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. But it was paid.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Loyal as I am to the British Crown, I would be sorry to admit that every time England has conceded a point that has been demanded from her, the concession was based upon principles of international law. In support of that opinion, I can call to my aid the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the Hon. Edward Blake who have on more than one occasion stated that England had conceded even to the United States what the United States was not entitled to demand, and that these concessions had been made at the cost of Canada on one or two memorable occasions. The hon. the Solicitor General will see that the Fortune Bay decision settles nothing, because the facts, that instead of England acting in the assertion of these municipal regulations—for they were municipal regulations that were violated by the American fishermen—England was dealing with a claim made on account of great violence done to American fishermen in Fortune Bay, by subjects of England. The hon. the Solicitor General shakes his head.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, I have the text here.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I know the text. I have been over that case time and again, and I can tell the Solicitor General that the damages paid were for the fish that had been lost, the fish that would have been caught were it not for the violence of the mob which cut the nets and freed the fish that were caught by the Americans while exercising as they claimed their right under the treaty. There is no doubt that the damages were paid, but they were paid for the acts of the mob and not for the acts of the officers.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I understand my hon. friend to say, that the claim was one for violence. The complaints were of two classes. First, it is alleged that violence was used. The other complaint did not charge violence, but charged simply that American fishermen, having treaty authority, were forbidden to fish in certain localities.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The danger in this case is for the Solicitor General to read only a scrap of the correspondence; but I again tell the Solicitor General, that if he will take that correspondence as a whole, he will find, as I have told him, that the damage was done by this mob, and by no officer of the law or of the British Government, cutting nets, letting fish loose, and so on. I am satisfied, that if he takes the papers and reads them through, he will come to the conclusion that Hall came to, that it was an unintelligible thing, even under those circumstances, that the Americans should make the claim which England paid. But at that time the Americans were feeling sore for the payment of $5,000,000 to Canada and Newfoundland, and there was, perhaps, a question of expediency underlying all this, that a certain amount of money ought to go back or remain in the United States Treasury.

Then, I propose to deal, a little later on, with another position which, I think, the hon. Solicitor General was entirely unwarranted in taking—that we are bound to assume that the United States will observe treaties as construed by us or by England. They will observe the treaties as they construe them, or as they think they ought to be construed. That we all know; but no one knows better than the Solicitor General that here is the greatest difficulty to get minds to agree upon the construction of a treaty, and there is no greater difficulty anywhere in this respect than with the United States of America. While we may join in expressing the belief, as a matter of politeness, that the Americans will observe treaties, it is another question whether we should risk money or a great deal of money on that belief. We have the very best evidence—none could be stronger to put us on our guard in reference to the observance of treaties—in regard to the manner in which the United States will attempt to gain an advantage over Canada, whenever she can possibly do it. I think I shall be able to show you, Mr. Speaker, that she began some months ago, in regard to this very Pacific Coast, to tie up by the hands and the heels, so far as she could, and to give advantages to her own citizens over the citizens of Canada in the competition for the trade of the Yukon. A man would be blind, if he could not see the purpose; and, admitting that that purpose exists, I will show, without being disloyal to Canada's interests, and without making any admission, so far as I am in a position to make any, against our rights, that she never had a better opportunity than she has to-day to embarrass, harass and annoy us, just as she has done to a large extent and for years to gain her object—not by overriding treaties, but by violating the clearest principles of law ever written or enunciated, and without rhyme or reason doing millions of dollars damage to Canadian citizens and British subjects—damages which have not been paid. With these facts before us, it is, in my opinion, the height of madness to arrange for the expenditure of a large amount of Canadian money which, peradventure, by the temporary action, if you like, the caprice of the moment, or the feeling in the United States, may be rendered entirely useless or inoperative. I say that it becomes us now more than ever to arrange all our great national schemes of development on such a basis that the United States can in no way, directly or indirectly, interfere to hamper or embarrass us except by war; and I am sanguine, Mr. Speaker, that that is the feeling that pervades the breasts, not merely of the majority of Canadians outside of this House, but, if men would speak it, of those on both sides of this Chamber. We have endeavoured to be friendly in every way with the United States for many and many a year. Both parties in this House professed, at any rate, that it was their desire to extend the most friendly relations to the United States; and it would be improper for us now to add to the danger or the excitement of the moment that would keep them further apart. But surely self-respect and our rights as British subjects demand that we who speak on this subject, shall on all occasions, and never more than now, proclaim our entire independence of the United States, their threats or their actions. It seems to me idle, in connection with what is going on, unfortunate as these actions are, that we should be deliberating for a moment about a plan in regard to which the United States have it in their power to hinder us or bother us in the slightest degree.

The hon. gentleman also referred to the contract; and that, which is the very subject under consideration, received, after all, scant treatment at his hands. There may be, for instance, a reason why the experts in the Geological Survey were not referred to, why we have not their reports before us to guide us ; because the hon. gentleman does not himself think very much of Mr. Ogilvie. This land, which our Government has advertised to the world as one of the greatest gold-fields ever known, is described by the Solicitor General as a region of perpetual frost, and really an unknown region ; and in that region of perpetual frost, which is unknown, we have granted 3,750,000 acres of land to two poor individuals, Mackenzie & Mann, who take all the risk. Then, the hon. gentleman referred to the cases of public works which were let without tender. He was endeavouring to make a case for the Minister of the Interior or the Minister of Railways, whoever is responsible for this contract—and which is it ? They are both here. I do not think the Minister of Railways would like to assume the responsibility for this contract ; but the Solicitor General was ready to make him responsible ; and what do you suppose was his argument to justify him in passing over this technical necessity of advertising for tenders, or even shutting the door in the face of Mr. Hamilton Smith, one of the wealthiest men whose names have been mentioned in Parliament ? He says, the Minister of Public Works may do it in some cases ; and, I suppose, there is something in that argument. If it is safe to allow the Minister of Public Works to make secret bargains and to pass over these public advertisements, the Minister of Railways would be even a different man from what we suppose him to be, if it were not just as safe to trust him with that power. The hon. gentleman travelled very far when he resorted to this argument to defend the policy of the Government in ignoring the necessity of calling for tenders. He referred to section 13 of the Public Works Act, which allows the Minister of Public Works—not the Minister of the Interior or the Minister of Railways—to dispense with tenders in certain cases. That section provides :

The Minister shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of all work, except in cases of pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest.

But section 10 provides :

Nothing in this Act shall authorize a Minister to cause expenditure, unless previously sanctioned by Parliament, except for such repairs and alterations as the necessities of the public service demand.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). There is the same provision in the Railway Act.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But I am dealing with the Solicitor-General—one at a time. I say that the Solicitor-General had so little information on the subject, I say that the Department of Justice had been overlooked by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) to such an extent, that when the Solicitor-General was dragged into this debate and told to defend the contract and do the very best he could, he was not instructed on all the laws in force, for the Minister of Railways was ready to instruct him that there was another law on the statutes besides the one he quoted, but was told to quote an Act which, properly considered, is absolutely against this assumption of authority by the Minister of Railways or the Interior. Mr. Hamilton Smith is not a persona grata with the hon. gentlemen opposite because he—poor or rich man, whatever he may be—was willing to do this work for less than Mann & Mackenzie's offer. That is the only offence he committed. He has been slugged in the most violent manner simply because he is prepared to do the work on much more favourable terms. How much was he willing to put in of his own money ? asks the Solicitor-General. How much have Mackenzie & Mann put in ? My hon. friend the Solicitor-General knows as well as I do that no matter what may happen, no matter whether this contract be ratified or not, Mackenzie & Mann will never risk a sixpence of their money. The risk, if risk there be, will be the enormous money which, under the powers of this Bill, they may borrow ; and the gamble and the risk, instead of being Mackenzie & Mann's, will be the widows and the orphans who invest their money in this scheme, whether in England or elsewhere. Then the hon. gentleman, by way of harking back, blamed the Conservative party for having done nothing since 1887 to develop the country. He said we ought to be glad now to have a Government which, instead of merely sending men up to report, is ready to act.

The hon. gentleman again was not sufficiently instructed or he would not have made such an extraordinary argument in this House. The real work, the work which those who have gone into that country, have taken the benefit of, was done long ago. It was done under the auspices of the Liberal-Conservative Government. Mr. Ogilvie himself was sent up to that country, under the instructions of the Liberal-Conservative Government, and a greater than Mr. Ogilvie, Dr. Dawson, under a Liberal-Conservative Government, has, in my opinion, the greatest claim on our admiration and gratitude for the very valuable work he has done, not only in the Yukon and British Columbia, but in the Atlantic provinces, and in fact the whole of Canada. It is only because these hon. gentlemen had in their hands early in 1897, if not in the latter part of 1896, information that should have led to earlier action, that the question has come up as to whether they acted promptly or not. I think it has been sufficiently shown that instead of attending to the interests of the country, instead of taking advantage of the information which these reports of the officers sent out by the predecessors of this Government had put them in possession of, they went to England and all parts of the world, and the hon. Minister of the Interior—some think wisely but I do not—got out of the way among these passes, in a direction where he does not propose to build or does not approve of. In fact, we had no Government here for months.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I suppose you mean between the 1st of January and the 20th of January, 1896.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman likes to go back to the older days when he was made a great deal more of than now. If he had the power in his party to-day that he had in that period to which he refers, I verily believe, to do him justice, that he would have been strong enough to prevent such a scheme as this ever coming before Parliament. The hon. gentleman is in a pitiable position. He must feel that he is. He has been ignored in everything. He cannot advise his colleagues much less lead them, and he is compelled at this time of life—and I regret it—to follow them in this matter much against his will, wholly against his better judgment, if we are to believe him to have been sincere in the principles he advocated in the past.

I propose to begin some observations that it will take me some time to get through. If hon. gentlemen will tolerate me, I shall do what I can to finish, but it would be a favour to them and certainly it would to me if I would be allowed to divide my observations by moving the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.25 a.m. (Tuesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Bill (No. 59) to incorporate the Victoria Fire Insurance Company.—(Mr. Quinn.)

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT—STANDARD FOR POTATOES.

Mr. FORTIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 60) to amend the Weights and Measures Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. FORTIN. The provisions of this Bill are very simple, but I believe the Bill will be found a most useful one if passed into law. It is to fix a standard for the weight of potatoes when they are sold or offered for sale by the bag.

The Weights and Measures Act fixes various standards. Section 16 fixes a standard bushel for various kinds of produce, such as wheat, barley, rye, corn, potatoes, turnips, and so forth. That standard is sixty pounds to the bushel. Other sections fix the standard for other kinds of produce, such as hay and straw. Section 18 fixes the standard of apples, when apples are sold by the barrel. But there is no standard fixed by law to determine the weight or quantity of a bag of potatoes. Now, it is a very general usage to sell potatoes by the bag. You have only to look at the market quotations in the daily newspapers to see how universal is that practice among farmers. I have before me the quotations of the markets at Toronto, Hamilton, London, Ottawa and Montreal; and in all these quotations the price of potatoes is stated at so much per bag. In the absence of any legal standard, the farmers who sell potatoes by the bag are subjected to a great deal of vexation and annoyance. Certain municipalities have thought proper to enact by-laws on this subject, although it is questionable whether such by-laws are intra vires of the powers of such municipalities. I find in the Montreal "Witness" of March 3rd instant, an item which relates to what has unfortunately taken place several times upon the market of the city of Montreal. I may perhaps be allowed to read this, as it states, in better language than I can use, as I am not speaking my own language, the kind of grievances the farmers complain of:

A number of farmers who habitually come to our different city markets have instructed a firm of local lawyers to lay their grievances before the Market Committee in connection with the application of the by-law which provides that bags of oats, potatoes, &c., shall be of a certain weight. These farmers allege that, in certain cases, the bags and their contents are confiscated without any reason, and their contention is that while goods to be sold by the bag must show a certain weight, the city has no right to confiscate bags not having the regulation weight if the owner thereof intends to sell the contents by the measure. They claim that some of the confiscations have taken place under the last mentioned circumstance, and they want the committee to remove the grievance for the future.

These seizures are made in the city of Montreal by virtue of a by-law passed by that municipality in 1897. By section 2 of this by-law it is enacted that whoever sells or offers for sale any produce mentioned in the section, including oats, potatoes, and so forth, must give ninety pounds per bag. Another section of the by-law provides that if potatoes are offered for sale in bags containing less than ninety pounds, the same will be confiscated. As I have said, numerous cases of confiscation have taken place on the market of the city of Montreal by virtue of this by-law. Now, Mr. Speaker, in the Bill I propose that the standard of a bag of potatoes shall be eighty pounds. When the by-law I refer to was passed in the city of Montreal it was assumed that a bag of potatoes would contain a bushel and a half; and formerly each bag of potatoes did contain a bushel and a half, though it must be remembered that this was not in compliance with the measure of sixty pounds to the bushel adopted by the Weights and Measures Act now in force. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are a good many farmers and representatives of farmers' constituencies in this House, and I think they will bear out what I say. It is alleged that the bags very generally used by farmers do not contain and cannot be made to contain ninety pounds of potatoes. The bags used by farmers are mostly empty flour bags. It is an economy for them to use these bags, and they are not bound to have bags prepared specially for potatoes. These bags do contain ninety pounds of potatoes in the fall, when the potatoes are still damp and heavy; but they cannot be made to contain that quantity in the spring, when the potatoes have become dry after having been kept all winter. The result is that this by-law is a great source of anxiety and uncertainty, and it bears very heavily on the farmers in the neighbourhood of the large cities, particularly around the city of Montreal. I have seen numerous farmers, who are not wealthy by any means, coming to market with loads of potatoes in bags, and the whole load has been confiscated. A case might be made to test the legality of such a by-law; but the idea of any farmer entering into a lawsuit against such a wealthy corporation as the city of Montreal is out of the question. Now as there is no standard of measurement by law, and as I think a standard should be fixed, we should adopt the standard prevailing generally throughout the country. In doing this we shall not interfere with any interest, and it will be perfectly known to any purchaser of potatoes by the bag that he shall receive eighty pounds and no more. It will also be known to those who sell potatoes by the bag that they shall be required to deliver only eighty pounds. Now, since no harm can be done to any interest by such a provision, I think it is only fair that the farmers, especially that class of farmers who cultivate and sell this kind of produce, should be relieved from the grievance they complain of. This measure, as you see, Mr. Speaker, is far from being a party one. It is designed to grant relief to farmers who deal in that class of produce, and I hope that both sides of the House will see their way to support it. I venture still further to hope that the Government will see its way to adopt this Bill as a Government measure, so that it will be enacted in the present session of Parliament, and it will do away with all those vexatious proceedings that have taken place on the market of the metropolis of Canada.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) I do not rise to participate, at any length, in the debate that is now in progress, but, as the representative of the most essentially agricultural constituency, not only of the province of Quebec but, I believe, of the whole Dominion, I deem it my duty to offer a few remarks on the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin). This Bill, as the hon. gentleman has just stated, is in no sense a party measure. It is a measure which, I hope, will meet with the general support of the hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. As to the policy of this legislation, it is framed with a view to the protection of agricultural interests in general, and more particularly to the effect of remedying the grievances and difficulties experienced by farmers when offering their potatoes for sale on the markets. Under the Act now in force, there is no specific weight provided for the sale of potatoes by the bag, and, as the hon. gentlemen know, potatoes are now generally sold by the bag, on the markets of our principal cities. Now, if we refer to the Act mentioned by the hon. member for Laval, we will find that section 16 contains the following provision:—

In contracts for the sale and delivery of any of the undermentioned articles, the bushel shall be determined by weighing, unless a bushel by measure is specially agreed upon—the weight equivalent to a bushel being as follows:—

Wheat, 60 pounds; Indian corn, 56 pounds; rye, 56 pounds; peas, 60 pounds; barley, 48 pounds; oats, 34 pounds.

Then follows a long list of articles generally offered for sale on our markets, and now we come to one of the last articles mentioned in the list :

Potatoes, turnips, carrots, &c., 60 pounds.

Potatoes, as stated by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) are generally put on the market and offered for sale in bags. It is quite a prevailing custom with farmers and tradespeople, and it is generally understood that a bag of potatoes must contain a bushel and a half. I understand quite well that, under the former Act a bag could hold a bushel and a half ; and then the farmers never experienced any trouble on that score. Then, ordinary bags, used by the farmers could be made to contain ninety pounds of potatoes, or a bushel and a half. But it is no longer so, under the new Act. It is this provision of the Act now in force that we wish to have amended as, under the practice now in vogue, the bags generally used cannot be made to contain a bushel and a half of potatoes. Farmers would, then, have to use empty rice or salt bags, which alone could be made to hold ninety pounds of potatoes. Now, the bags used by farmers for carrying their produce to the city markets are generally empty flour or oat bags. The Bill introduced by my hon. friend from Laval to amend the Weights and Measures Act in connection with the sale of potatoes, provides that the standard of a bag of potatoes shall be eighty pounds. In that way, the farmer would no longer be subjected to the hardship of having the fruits of their labour confiscated, just because there is a difference of seven, eight or ten pounds by bag of potatoes.

My hon. friend refers to the fact that the farmers are subjected, on account of that state of things, to a great deal of vexation and annoyance. And in this connection let me give an instance of what happened lately to a farmer in my own constituency. That farmer informed me, the other day, that he had gone to Montreal with a load of products containing ten bags of potatoes, which were all confiscated because they weighed ten or twelve pounds less than the standard weight. This is surely a very sad state of things which should be remedied at the earliest possible moment, in the interest of the farming community. The Bill now before this House will do away with all such grievances, and I hope that both sides of the House will see their way to support it. Such a Bill, in fact, should be supported, not only by the followers of the Government but also by all the hon. gentlemen opposite, as it is a measure, before all, calculated to bring relief to the farmers who constitute the revenue-producing class of this country. Our farming community is certainly entitled to the protection provided for by this Bill. While I am on my feet, let me give expression to the hope that, owing to the advanced stage of the session, the Government will take charge of this Bill, as a Government measure, for, otherwise, we could hardly hope to see the present amendment pass into law, at this session. I heartily approve of the position taken by my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Fortin), and let me say that the Government ought to take charge of this Bill and introduce it as a measure of public policy, so that it might come into force at the earliest possible moment. I may, perhaps, be told that this Bill is an exceptional Bill and that, if it were carried, it would create an objectionable precedent. We already have a similar precedent, and one which was adopted for the purpose of determining the standard weight of a produce which is in great use, namely, salt. That Act, which was introduced by the former Government, in 1888, reads as follows :—

Every barrel of salt packed in bulk, sold or offered for sale, shall contain two hundred and eighty pounds of salt, and every such barrel of salt, sold or offered for sale, shall have the correct gross and net weight thereof marked upon it in permanent manner.

The policy of the Bill now before the House is similar to that of the Bill of 1888, in so far as it applies to potatoes, an article as necessary and as largely used as salt is. I therefore venture to hope that this Bill will secure the support, not only of the Government, but also of all the members of this House.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). A number of representations have been made to the Government in connection with the very subject dealt with by my hon. friend from Laval in this Bill, and it is my intention to introduce a Bill dealing with this and other questions. The sooner we adopt a unit of measure and measure everything, as much as possible, by weight, the sooner we will be able to give satisfaction and do justice to everybody. My hon. friend may rely on the subject-matter of his Bill receiving due consideration.

Mr. PENNY. I did not intend saying anything on this matter, but since the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue intends introducing a Bill dealing with weights and measures, I wish to point out to him that this by-law, of which my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Fortin) complains, was passed by the Montreal City Council at the request of the retail and wholesale merchants in Montreal ; and before the hon. Minister introduces his Bill, I would ask him to communicate with the City Council of Montreal and obtain the views of the members of that body on the subject.

Mr. CHAUVIN. (Translation.) The hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier), in winding up his remarks, a little while ago, ventured to express the hope that the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House would support the Bill introduced by my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Fortin).

As a voter of the county of Laval, though not as an elector of the hon. member for Laval, I am free to tell him that, if the farmers of the county of Laval and of the counties in the neighbourhood of Montreal are in favour of this Bill, I shall be most happy to lend him a hand to have it carried; but I am not ready to give an opinion on the policy of the Bill which is not yet in our hands. Possibly, some amendments may be offered concerning the weight and the measure. At all events, I may tell my hon. friend that I quite agree with him that this Bill and all similar measures in the interest of the farming community should be considered without any party spirit, and let him rest assured that, on this side of the House, we will give our best attention to his Bill, which greatly interests the farming community.

At all events, should I commit a mistake in supporting the measure introduced by my hon. friend from Laval, I may find a solace to my grief in the thought that I blundered in company with the hon. member for Laval, and with the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. WALLACE. I am very glad to hear that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue intends to bring in a measure this session which will remove some of the difficulties now complained of. For my part, I think that a bushel and a half, or 90 pounds of potatoes, will be more convenient for this reason, that it is more easily measured as well as weighed, being three half bushels. In addition to that all the bags—for instance a bag that holds two bushels of wheat or oats and barley—will hold one and a half bushels of potatoes, so that in that way the same bags may be used, and it will be a convenience all round.

There is another matter to which I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister as of great importance to some constituencies, particularly East and West York. There ought to be some manner of regulating the size of milk cans. There is a very large business done in the suburbs of our cities in the milk business, and that business is rapidly increasing. There is a great deal of complaint among the farmers with regard to the size of the milk cans. In our district, I believe the milk cans are supposed to contain eight gallons, but it has been found that they hold eight gallons and a half and some eight and three-quarters, and the vendors only get paid for the eight gallons. This is a very substantial ground of complaint by the milk producers, and I think the hon. Minister should remove this by some enactment. I am well aware that in other places—perhaps in Ottawa—there are cans of different sizes, but I think the difficulty can be met in this way. Let the hon. Minister authorize his officers to stamp the cans to a certain number of even gallons where they reach over three or four gallons —say five or six or eight gallons, as the case may be. I think that in Ottawa they have two and two and a half gallon cans. In the case of smaller quantities, it may be necessary and convenient to mark the half gallon, but I think if the department would have the regulations under which the cans would be stamped an even number of gallons in the cases I have mentioned, that would remove a great grievance felt by the farmers in both ridings of York, and I am sure in the neighbourhood of other cities. The farmers have met many times and brought this grievance before the attention of Parliament, but no law has yet been enacted which would enable them to deal with it; and as the hon. Minister has now told us of his intention to introduce legislation this session, I hope he will take this matter into consideration and confer thereby a great boon upon our farmers. I know that the records are in his department, from which he can get all the information he requires in detail, and he will receive the thanks of the farming community for adjusting this matter, which at present does very great injustice.

Mr. MONK. I merely wish to state that we on this side are extremely pleased to hear that the Government intend taking up this question. The grievance complained of by the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier) probably exists to a larger extent in my county than in any other of the neighbouring counties around Montreal. I think that the limitation placed by the city of Montreal upon the weight of a bag of potatoes was an unjust assumption of authority, and I would venture to suggest to the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue that he should fix the weight at 70 pounds. That is a weight which would suit the farmers best of all, at least in my locality, and I do not see that anybody could suffer if it were fixed at that rate.

Mr. SPROULE. In our part of the country the farmers would not like that at all—70 pounds to the bag. They always consider that a two-bushel bag would hold a bushel and a half of potatoes. If the standard weight is 60 pounds to the bushel, that would be 90 pounds, or one and a half bushels for a two-bushel bag. It is on that basis that potatoes are usually sold now, but they are sometimes short in weight and sometimes over, and it would be much better to have a standard weight of one and a half bushels or 90 pounds for a bag of potatoes.

Mr. TALBOT. (Translation.) As I represent in this House an agricultural constituency, I may tell my hon. friend from Laval that he would much better compass the object he has in view, if instead of suggesting a reduction in the weight of potatoes sold by the bag, he would propose that the standard weight of a bag of potatoes, which is now fixed at 60 pounds, should be reduced to 56 pounds.

For several years past, I have sold hundreds of bushels of potatoes, and I very seldom found the regulation weight of 60 pounds a bushel. I think my hon. friend would better attain the object of this Bill by reducing to 56 pounds the standard weight of the bushel, which is now 60 pounds.

All those who are selling potatoes on the market will agree with me that it is almost impossible to find a bushel of potatoes having the regulation weight of 60 pounds, and that the difficulties experienced by the farmers are not due to the fact that the bags used by them are not large enough, but rather because every bushel of potatoes does not come up to the standard weight now in force.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 61) in further amendment of the Trade Mark and Design Act.—(Mr. Bertram.)

INSTRUCTIONS TO MAJOR WALSH.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to address myself once more to the First Minister, or the Minister of the Interior, or both, and make a fifth or sixth request for the instructions which were issued to Major Walsh. I see no reason in the world why these cannot be brought down; they certainly involve no trouble in preparation; they are there, and have been there for several weeks, and it seems very odd indeed that the House cannot get that little bit of information from the Minister of the Interior.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The reason why the instructions were not brought down was, that everything has been brought down already. A few days ago, I laid on the Table of the House the commission of Major Walsh. I made inquiries in the Department of the Interior and received information that no additional instructions had been issued to Major Walsh beyond those in the commission.

Mr. FOSTER. We are to understand, then, that Major Walsh is operating without any instructions from the Department of the Interior?

The PRIME MINISTER. All the powers that he exercises are exercised under the commission, which has not been supplemented by other instructions.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). On this subject, I may say, that Major Walsh has some general instructions from the Post Office Department, of which,

Mr. TALBOT.

I suppose, the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Interior were not aware. These instructions relate to postal matters.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Blair for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) an Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before leaving the consideration of the speech delivered by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) last evening, I desire to show the gravity of an observation made by that hon. gentleman respecting the intention of the Government to urge upon the House the further consideration of this Bill. Those who had charge of the Bill, it will be recollected, called our attention to the peculiarities of this contract, that it differed from other contracts in that it contained covenants on the part of the contractors. I would draw the attention of the House again, not only to the title of the Bill, which is "An Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company," but to certain of its clauses. Clause 1 of the Bill says:

1. The contract, a copy of which is set out in the schedule to this Act, is hereby approved and confirmed and declared to be binding upon the parties thereto, and Her Majesty and the contractors therein named are hereby respectively authorized and empowered to perform and carry it out according to the true intent and meaning thereof.

The usual and ordinary clause to make effective and binding this contract between the Government and these contractors. In addition to that, clause 2 of the contract which we are asked to approve and confirm by the second reading of this Bill, provides:

The Government shall submit to Parliament at its next ensuing session a measure for the necessary Act confirming this agreement.

And so on. Clause 11 of this agreement makes it obligatory upon the contractors, in order to earn their reward, only to construct a railway, but not to operate it. The last part of this clause 11 reads:

Such land to be and become vested in the contractors upon the said railway being completed and accepted as complete by the Government and upon the said land being selected as hereinafter set forth.

Clause 12 of the contract which we are asked to make binding upon the parties, provides, in its last paragraph, as follows:—

The contractors may also at their option select additional blocks lying on either end of any odd-numbered block along a base line, but such additional blocks must be three miles square each and they shall not exceed three in number on each end of each such odd-numbered block.

Clause S provides that, by the 8th of this month, that is by to-day, there shall be constructed a certain sleigh road, which is described in that clause. It is particularly agreed that, in any event, this road shall be constructed not later than six weeks from the execution of this agreement, that is, to-day.

Now, we were told that this contract which we are asked to approve, and which is appended to the Bill, is not to be approved in the form in which we have it, but that already it has been changed in marked particulars, and that it is not proposed by the Government, outside of the very letter of this Bill, to ask this House to ratify and confirm any such document as is appended to the Bill. We were told that there would be alterations made, not only in the Bill, but in the contract as well. These alterations were serious and important, even those we had heard of up to last night, but one of the most important alterations in that agreement is that proposed by the Solicitor General and promised on behalf of the Government, when he told us that as soon as we reach the committee stage, there will be put upon the contractors an additional and very serious obligation, an amendment whereby the contractors will covenant and agree to operate the road which, according to this agreement, they were only to build. Now, it might be said: But we will produce in committee a supplementary agreement; we will show that the contractors have agreed to these grave alterations, and therefore there is no necessity for any delay. But, whether this procedure would be, under the circumstances, in accordance with the practice of the rules of this House, we are face to face with the fact that, after the criticism that has been offered, the Government have receded from the proposition which they made to the House on introducing this Bill, and do not intend to ask that the House shall approve of the terms of the agreement which they entered into with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann on the 25th of January, 1898; but they intend to produce a contract signed and agreed to on some other day.

How ridiculous is the position which some have taken in this House that the Opposition, by discussion, by criticism and by the consideration they have given to the contract as it was originally proposed, have delayed or taken up unnecessarily the time of the House, when the result of that consideration and delay has been to obtain all these radical and important changes. Even last night, the night before one of the undertakings was to be completed, the Solicitor General announces a further and not the least important change which it is proposed to make. I do not believe that it is in accordance either with precedents or in accordance with common sense for the Government to presume so far upon their supporters in this House as to ask them to vote for a contract which they themselves condemn in all these important particulars, and which in no event, whether we agree to confirm that contract or not, will ever be the contract between the Government and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. Then, if I caught aright an observation made by the Solicitor General, he referred to a Mr. Christie as having said something not altogether favourable to this territory which is to be handed over, under the proposal before us, to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. An hon. friend has put into my hands an edition of the New York "World" containing a contribution from, I believe, the same gentleman, Mr. Jas. Christie, in which he says:

I do not wish to convey the idea that the country is not rich; it is so rich, in fact, that it is not necessary to lie about it.

I find in the same edition of the "World" this contribution from Director Walcott, of the United States Geological Survey:

The gold resources of Alaska appear to be practically inexhaustible. The miners who are attacking the placers in the Yukon Valley are gathering the gold sorted out of the debris washing down from the mountains during many centuries. In that region there is a belt of rich gold-bearing rocks 500 miles long, not touched as yet by pick or blast. Geologists who have examined the deposits are of the opinion that they may surpass the wonderful gold mines of South Africa in productiveness.

Again, referring to the extraordinary impatience of the Government, all the more extraordinary for the observation of the Solicitor General in announcing at this late date a further change, one cannot help recurring to a humorous illustration put by my hon. friend from one of the counties in Quebec, the other evening. In regard to this formal consultation on the part of the Treasury benches of the Parliament of Canada, concerning the contract which they have entered into, I would remind hon. gentlemen of an illustration which became noticeable during revolutionary times in France, when parliamentary government was threatened, and when Parliament was regarded merely as a body for the registration of the decrees of a certain collection of men. A rustic had called all the fowls of the barn-yard together, and having convened them, asked what sauce they would like to be dressed with. The cock replied: But we do not want to be eaten; when the rustic answered: You wander from the point. Here the Treasury benches bring down this contract which they themselves are now half ashamed of, and accuse members of this House, and of the Opposition, of wandering continually from the point, because they give ample and sufficient reasons to show that no such contract ought ever to be entered into. When a proposition is made to create the greatest mining monopoly on the face of the earth, I think it is well, even if it were not for the reasons with which we have justified our course, that the Opposition should dwell upon the enormity of this transaction, so that every man in the country who has its welfare at heart should have an opportunity to bring such influences as he can control upon representatives in this Chamber. All the efforts of hon. gentlemen so far to make what certainly is an ugly deal, look fair, have been singularly unfortunate. Fancy, Mr. Speaker, the manner in which intelligent men were talked to by the Minister of Railways. In this private conference, in the secret negotiations, the Minister of Railways tells us that the contractors were very reasonable. It would be more satisfactory, I submit, if he could show, what he has not yet attempted to do on the floor of this House, that the contractors were very reasonable. But upon what information is it possible that the Minister of Railways would be able to contend that they found, as he says, men willing to negotiate on a reasonable basis. Take his own language. Let us see the helpless condition in which he confesses he found himself, when dealing with these able, astute and successful men. In that very same speech he said :

I presume we may be asked : Why did you give so many acres as 25,000 ?

He meant, of course, per mile.

Why did you not give the contractors less ?

Now let us see the information and the knowledge of the hon. gentleman who tells us that these contractors were very reasonable.

Well, I may frankly acknowledge that the reason was because they would not take less. We could not force them to take less. We bargained and negotiated with them. Members of the Government and sub-committees of the Government—sub-committees constituting pretty nearly the whole numerical strength of the Government—urged on Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann every conceivable argument in order to get them to reduce their terms. And we did get them down very much below, I can assure you, the demands they made, but we could not get them below 25,000 acres per mile, and therefore, did not.

What were these first demands ? It would have been open and manly to have informed this House just the amount that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann thought that they could collar out of these lands in the Yukon at the hands of these hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. What were the different propositions and the different terms ? But let us see the humiliating position in which these hon. gentlemen found themselves when they undertook to hand over this huge monopoly to these contractors. The hon. gentleman goes on to say :

When you come to think about it, what is there in the question of 1,000, or 5,000, or 10,000 acres of the millions we have up there, and which we don't know whether they are worth anything or not ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

And again :

I do not know, for my part, whether the company of Mackenzie & Mann has made a big contract or not ; I do not know whether they are going to make a great lot of money out of this thing or not.

In other words and more briefly expressed, do I press the point unfairly when I say that this gentleman representing the Government practically tells us : We knew nothing whatever about the line ; we knew nothing whatever about this part of Canada, but we wanted to build the railway ; we put ourselves at the mercy of Mackenzie & Mann, and we asked them on what terms they would build it. Those are the only terms we could get from them ; we looked nowhere else ; and here we are. The Government, said the hon. gentleman, knew not whether there would be money in the enterprise or not ; but there were others. I must say, who could have advised the Government that there was a vast amount of money in it. But the Minister of Railways told the House that these gentlemen were "reasonable" in their terms and that when the Government made the bargain they did not know anything about the value of the land or any of these other very important considerations. Again, in the same speech, the hon. gentleman said :

I could not tell what value to place on the land, and no body of men, I do not care whether they possess the wisdom of Solomon, could decide what would be a fair and reasonable estimate to put on the land ; and yet we found them willing to negotiate on a reasonable basis.

Will the Government, that has given us so little information in respect to this contract, tell the House who drew the contract, as a matter of fact ; who drew the contract that is to be amended ; who drew the contract of which hon. gentlemen opposite are already ashamed ? Who drew this contract that is so incomplete that these important amendments are to be made ? Did the solicitor of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann draw the contract after those gentlemen had dictated to the Government what the Government were to give ? What officer of the Government drew the contract, and who gave the instructions to the officer of the Government ? I think we should have that information before we pass the second reading of the Bill, and that this question is a pertinent one.

You, Mr. Speaker, cannot have forgotten that when there was a Prime Minister of a Liberal Administration charged with the management of a large railway scheme, knowing as well as he did that in a position of that kind with such a large trust to execute it was necessary at all times that the Government, if possible, in dealing with that transaction should be above suspicion—what was the defence of the late Mr. Mackenzie when serious things were brought up in connection with the handling of the Canadian Pacific Railway contract in those days? Mr. Mackenzie on two occasions—on a great many more, but on two occasions which I have a note of—used this defence. On the first occasion, at Unionville, he said: "We acted on the advice of the chief engineer." Again, at Fergus, he said: "I have invariably in all matters requiring a scientific or a professional knowledge acted upon the opinion of my chief engineer of the department." We have a chief engineer to-day, as I have already reminded the House, who is paid as an expert officer; and yet asking the Government as I did last night whether that officer had ever made a report, my question was received in such a manner that I have no doubt that he knew nothing whatever of this matter until it was "un fait accompli." Why should there be, as I believe there is, a feeling of alarm, not to mention interest, widespread in the country in respect to this proposition? It is not merely a proposition that involves a huge mining monopoly, but it is a proposition having to do with our mineral resources, so reckless in its terms that there is not a case in the world's history like it, unless you go back to the old days of Spain, when huge grants in the gold regions that Spain had discovered and appropriated, were made, and it was found that these grants which had been made, without conditions as to working, to favourites, retarded the development of those gold regions. Away back in the sixteenth century Spain thought better of pursuing such a course and policy, and from that day down to this I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to show that any civilized country has adopted such a policy as is embodied in this Bill. The Government have ignored, for instance, what the mining laws of the United States, what the mining laws of Spain and of the different colonies have all regarded as important. They have ignored the discoverer's right, they have ignored the condition of working in order to hold title; they have discriminated against the free miner in favour of monopoly, and they have, in my opinion, not only sown the seeds of rebellion amongst that hardy and strong population which will be attracted by lust of gold to those fields, but they have laid a huge financial responsibility on this country, the like of which it is hard indeed to imagine, limit or describe. They have ignored, as I have said, the very important policy of preserving the mineral resources free for exploration, free for discovery, and those features, if hon. members will look into the laws of the United States and into the experience of mining countries, they will find have been considered essential for the full and successful development of such resources. Take the legislation of the United States, and their experience has been great and their experience has been wonderful. In the old times what did Congress do? Congress from the first until to-day has recognized these principles that commend themselves, not to mining corporations, not to huge collections of wealthy men, but which recommend themselves from the experience and fair-play involved in them to the actual miners on the ground. Hon. members will find this principle embodied in different sections of several statutes of the United States. It will be found in section 2319, and it has been continued from 1866 when the United States Congress began to organize a system for the development of their mineral resources. The section to which I refer, reads as follows:—

All available mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared free and open to the exploration and purchase by citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such, under regulations prescribed by law and according to the local customs or rules of mining districts, so far as the same are applicable and not inconsistent with the laws of the United States.

It will be found even in recent cases in the Supreme Court of the United States that the judges refer to this policy of their country in dealing with rich corporations and monopolies, and point out that Congress has adhered to the policy which prevents railways obtaining, in aid of construction or otherwise, mineral lands, which were reserved for the people; and Mr. Justice Miller, in a very interesting case decided recently, traced the history of that legislation and pointed out how necessary it was to distinguish between ordinary public lands and mineral lands.

But we have some other very serious cases to guide us in these matters. We have the experience of Australia. Many hon. members may remember the Ballarat riots in Victoria, and they may know what led to those riots among the miners; and I propose to make a passing reference to those landmarks in the history of mining countries, as well as the general course pursued by the British Government when the great excitement broke out in the Fraser River district in British Columbia. From what happened in these cases and from the opinion of the experts who looked into the matter, we can well take warning on the present occasion. In the case of the Ballarat riots, the commissioners who were appointed to consider the grievances of the miners which gave rise to these riots, reported against giving absolute grants of mineral lands to any one, and they said:

The new auriferous land prospected by the applicants should be liberally dealt out, but the leases in no event should exceed 80 acres.

The commissioners argued, that lengthened terms were detrimental to the public interest, and that no lease should be given for a term longer than fifteen years, and at no rent under £5 a acre. They suggested, as I have said, that 80 acres was a large grant for auriferous land, and then they have this sentence in this report to which I wish to call particular attention :

Countless treasures may possibly be passed from the public possession within such an area.

And remember, Mr. Speaker, that they are speaking of the comparatively trifling area of 80 acres. Again, the commissioners refer to the hostile feeling on the part of the miners being due to the natural fear that the wealth and influence of co-partners would gradually lead to the monopoly of auriferous land, and would be very unfair to the individual miner as well as detrimental to his interest. The commissioners argue that every care should be taken to guard against this.

In connection with the Fraser River excitement of 1858 there were some most carefully considered despatches of the late Bulwer Lytton, who was Colonial Secretary, and they form most interesting reading and contain valuable instruction. Douglas was then Governor of British Columbia, and people were pouring into the Fraser River district attracted by the great finds of gold. Every despatch of his shows, that notwithstanding that the responsible power lay with the English authorities, the Colonial Secretary took care to impress upon the Governor of British Columbia, that all the regulations should be such as would rally to their support every individual miner and make him believe that in supporting those regulations he was supporting his own title and his own property. Lord Bulwer Lytton sets out, that the greatest pains should be taken not to allow it to be supposed for a moment, that the Hudson Bay Company, a gigantic corporation in that province, could obtain a solitary favour at the expense of the miners from the Governor or from those administering the Government of that province. Governor Douglas wrote to Lord Stanley in 1858, referring to the importance of avoiding a cause for grievance, and for providing that there be no generally felt grievance to unite the miners in one common cause. Lord Lytton writing to Governor Douglas upon the question of the suspicion of favouritism to the Hudson Bay Company, adds :

This suspicion would be eminently prejudicial to the establishment of a civil government in the country lying near the Fraser River, and would multiply existing difficulties and dangers.

Again, Lord Lytton says :

I approve of you continuing to levy license fees for mining purposes, requesting you to adapt the scale of those fees to the general acquiescence of adventurers.

And, Sir, in the case we are now considering, it is extraordinary that this Government, going against such examples, and going against such wholesome doctrine, propose that they should attempt to collect ten per cent on the operations of the individual free miners, while the charge is only to be one per cent to these favoured monopolists. Again, Lord Lytton writing to the Governor of British Columbia points out:

In a colony like British Columbia, in which it is reasonable to assume that the first immigrants would be men accustomed to danger, not to be daunted by the means of force, but too eager for gold not to respect the means by which gold when obtained is secure to its owners, soldiers will be popular in proportion as the strength which they afford to law is tacitly felt rather than obtrusively paraded.

What, Sir, will be the well-founded grievances in these Yukon gold fields, should the proposition now before the House become law? Let us remember that we are dealing in relation to the free miner, with placer mines only. So far as it is proposed to deal with this monopoly, we are handing them over the placer rights, and we are handing them over the quartz mining in that absolute grant of that huge part of the country. The Government have only had time, so far as the individual miner is concerned, to deal with these placer rights; and before I point out the discrimination made between the free miners and this monopoly I would ask the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) if he was serious, when I understood him on a recent occasion, to question the criticism made from this side of the House, that these regulations for the free miner, adopted about two days before the contract was signed, did not apply in any shape or form to these contractors when they obtain that absolute grant. I say without any doubt whatever that these regulations which apply to the free miner are in no sense applicable in terms or by the separate regulations to these contractors, Mackenzie & Mann, or to their assignees or to the people who obtain in future title from them. The subject has been partially dealt with, but let us consider again the respective positions of the free miner in that country, and the favoured monopoly.

In the first place the free miner can only get a grant for a year, and by working and paying and continuing to work and pay he may go on from year to year; while in the case of the favoured monopoly he obtains his grant for ever. In the case of the free miner, there is a certificate to be paid for at the rate of $10 a year, and in the case of a company—not this favoured monopoly—$100 a year, if it has a capital of $100,000 or over. There is no such provision in the case of these contractors who can place their employees all over the land, and yet there is a regulation which makes it necessary for any other company, or any other free miner, not merely to pay for his own free miner's certificate, but to see at the peril of his property and the risk of his all, that every person in the company's employ shall hold an existing free miner's certificate payable for at the rate of $10 a year.

Otherwise there is forfeiture for the other company or individual, while there is no forfeiture, no risk, and no trouble of any kind on the part of the favoured monopoly. It costs a free miner $15 to enter a mineral claim, but there is no fee whatever charged for this huge gift to this monopoly when they earn from time to time the different portions of their 3,750,000 acres. There is a registry fee to be paid by the free miner every time a transfer occurs of his mineral claim, but there is no fee whatever charged for this favoured monopoly. When the entry fee of $15 has been paid by the free miner, there is a further fee of $15 a year payable by him, but there is no trouble or bother whatever on that score so far as this favoured monopoly is concerned. A royalty of 10 per cent payable by the free miner, or forfeiture of the title absolutely and at once, the very default creating the forfeiture—no trouble on the part of the Government. But in the case of these favoured contractors, forsooth, not only do we propose to let them off at 1 per cent, but should they be in default for one year or ten years or twenty years, there is no question of forfeiture; the land is theirs, the title remains theirs, and no action of the Government can take it from them for any default on their part. In the case of the free miner, let us see how careful the Government has been that no individual Canadian and no company of Canadians may do anything which would lock up several acres of these placer grounds. In the case of creek, gulch, river and hill claims, it is laid down, following good and wholesome practices in other countries, that they cannot exceed 250 feet in length and 1,000 feet in width in the case of creek or gulch claims, on each side of the centre of the creek or gulch, or 1,000 feet in width in the case of the river or hill claims. In the case of the individual, see how necessary it has been considered that everything he owns shall be held not only subject to tribute at the risk of forfeiture, but that as between free miner and free miner there shall be as little confusion as possible; so that he who runs may read, as far as the free miners' property and actions are concerned. There shall be first a well-located claim, and then a properly marked claim, so that it shall be easily identified. All this is for the purpose of order, to avoid confusion, for the development of the country, and based upon the experience of all countries that have been fortunate enough to own gold fields of this character. Now, turning to clauses 15 and 27 of the regulations, I find that clause 15 provides:

Every placer claim shall be as nearly as possible rectangular in form, and marked by two legal posts firmly fixed in the ground, in the manner shown in diagram No. 4. The line between the two posts shall be well cut out so that one post may, if the nature of the surface will permit, be seen from the other. The flatted side of each post shall face the claim, and on each post shall be written on the side facing the claim a legible notice stating the name or number of the claim, or both if possible, its length in feet, the date when staked, and the full Christian and surname of the locator.

The 27th regulation says:

Entry shall not be granted for a claim which has not been staked by the applicant in person in the manner specified in these regulations. An affidavit that the claim was staked out by the applicant shall be embodied in form "H" in the schedule hereto.

If these are reasonable regulations, and I believe they are, why in the name of common sense or fair-play, should you allow what would otherwise be orderly and regular to be plunged into indescribable confusion, by these mineral land-grabbers being allowed to claim by the mere fact of having run their base line in a certain direction, and then to run off, as the clause to which I shall refer shows, without marking, without staking, without notifying anyone in that whole field of what they have done? What would otherwise be order and regularity, becomes, by the interposition of this monopoly, without these checks and regulations being made applicable to them, endless confusion and a source of endless trouble and disaster to the free miners; and the man is, in my opinion, absurd who will say that any body of free miners in the Yukon or in any other part of the globe, would stand such a discrimination as that for a moment, or remain a law-abiding people. There are no clauses in the contract to compare with the regulations I have mentioned, because they are not applicable; but clauses 11 and 12 enable these parties to take up that huge amount of land, and you may read the contract from beginning to end, and you will see that they are required neither to pay a fee in the way of entry, nor to put up posts or notices in any shape or form. A reference to Mr. Jennings's report will show that there is a possibility of this mineral land coming to 6,250,000 acres instead of the 4,000,000 acres spoken of in the House, by the adoption of line 2, the length of which is 250 miles. Section 18 of the contract, at any rate, permits these monopolists to take 92,160 acres, or to have this quantity of land reserved to them, on the completion of each ten miles of their road; and they are permitted to make their selection at leisure. They may make their selection of the lands, one-half in three years and one-half in six years. Now, permit me to draw attention to some of the reasons for some of the regulations from which these contractors have been exempted, and the wisdom that has made them applicable elsewhere to miners and mining companies. For instance, Barringer and Adams, discussing similar regulations to those applying to the free miner here, say:

The location must be distinctly marked on the ground, so that its boundaries can be readily traced.

The test is that any one visiting the ground may be able to trace and identify the location. Again, these writers say :

The failure, however, to mark the location as required is absolutely fatal to its validity.

Speaking again of the validity of the location, they say :

This process seems to be the usual mode recognized among miners, to indicate the taking up of a claim of this sort, as in fact an appropriation or proof of appropriation of the claim.

And, as answering the question as to why these claims should be limited in extent, these authors say :

The claim, unless the regulations otherwise provide, is invalid if unreasonable in extent, as creating a monopoly.

To refer again to the limited extent in locating a placer, they refer to the fact that :

The regulations limit the extent of a placer location to twenty acres, a lode claim to 1,500 feet in the direction of the lode or vein, and 300 feet wide.

Then, on the question of limited claims, and the reason for them, they say :

It is a recognition of such local district regulations, and is admirably adapted to promote the development of our mineral resources, as well as to prevent any monopoly of mining ground, the requirement serving to prevent the location of land as mining claims, unless the locator has sufficient faith in the character thereof to justify expenditure in its location.

Touching the condition of working, they say :

These mineral lands being thus open to the occupation of all discoverers, one of the first necessities of a mining neighbourhood was to make rules by which this right of occupation should be governed as among themselves, and it was soon discovered that the same person could mark out many claims of discovery and then leave them for an indefinite length of time without further development, and without actual possession, and seek in this manner to exclude others from availing themselves of the abandoned mine. To remedy this evil a mining regulation was adopted that some work should be done on each claim in every year, or it would be treated as abandoned.

That gives one an idea of the radical discrimination which has been made between the free miner and this company, and for that discrimination there is no precedent—none has been given to this House, and I know of none—to be found in the world's history of the successful administration of any gold fields.

The right hon. leader of the Government told us, that he desires to have the road in operation by the first of September, and we are promised some amendment in committee by which the contract will be made to have that effect, but it is significant of the hasty and crude preparation of this contract that the agreement which the right hon. First Minister desired is not the one which is before the House.

As regards the clause touching the forfeiture of the deposit, I would like to call attention to the statement of the Minister of the Interior, as a sample of the confusion which prevails in the minds of the hon. gentlemen who have charge of this Bill. In his speech, the hon. Minister of the Interior told us, that the $250,000 deposit had reference only to the construction of the railway, and did not apply to the construction of the sleigh road. That is fortunate for Mackenzie & Mann, who are apparently defaulters in this respect. But he added : "We have the covenant with the contractors, which is just as good as a deposit." Would the hon. gentleman tell me whether, default having been made, he proposes to take any action against Mackenzie & Mann upon their covenant, which, he says, is just as good as the $250,000 deposit ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). When default is made, the Government will consider very carefully what they will do. But the hon. gentleman is making an entirely gratuitous statement when he says that default is made.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I accept the statement of the Minister of the Crown, but am entitled to ask the question: Has the sleigh road been built ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman is aware that there is no telegraph line between that point and this.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And the hon. gentleman is aware that Mr. Mann is in Ottawa. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman saw Mr. Mann. It is only reasonable that he should see him, if he takes any interest in the expediting of this work. Has the hon. gentleman the slightest supposition, from his conversation with any of these contractors, that one single mile of that road has been built ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I can say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that at the Rideau Club, this afternoon, I casually met Mr. Mann, and asked him if the sleigh road was completed, and he assured me that it was.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman was not as frank with me as I thought he would be, when this conversation began.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I told the hon. gentleman, that he made a statement he had no foundation for making, and that should have satisfied him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I was asking a question, and would now, with the hon. gentleman's permission, ask him another. If Mr. Mann's statement be not correct, will the Government take action on the covenant?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I think the hon. gentleman had better proceed with his speech.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No doubt, the hon. Minister would prefer that I should take that course. He referred, however, in his speech, to this forfeiture again. He said:

There is a forfeiture of $250,000 now in the hands of the First Minister, and there is the personal responsibility of Mackenzie & Mann, under a signed contract which renders them liable to the full extent of their means, whatever these may be.

Would the hon. gentleman tell me who drafted that security clause? I do not suppose he will, but I desire to show him the difference between it and the security clause in the Canadian Pacific Railway charter. I feel very positive that the clause in this contract was not drawn by any law adviser of the Government. Take the clause in the Canadian Pacific Railway charter, chapter 1 of the Statutes of 1881, paragraph 2, and compare it with this boasted security clause in this contract. The clause in this contract, which is clause 10, reads as follows:—

The contractors shall within ten days after the execution hereof deposit with the Government in cash or approved cash security, the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars as security that the railway from Stikine to Teslin Lake hereby contracted for will be completed and equipped in accordance with the terms hereof, and on such railway being completed and equipped and accepted as hereinbefore specified the said sum or security shall be returned to the contractors or to whom they may appoint, and if the same be deposited in cash, interest at the rate of three per cent per annum thereon shall be paid for the time such cash has been deposited.

Compare that with the clause in the Canadian Pacific Railway charter, section 2 of chapter 1 of the Statutes of 1881:

The contractors, immediately after the organization of the said company, shall deposit with the Government $1,000,000 in cash or approved securities, as security for the construction of the railway hereby contracted for. The Government shall pay the company interest on the cash deposited at the rate of four per cent per annum, half yearly, and shall pay over to the company the interest received upon securities deposited—the whole until default in the performance of the conditions thereof or until the repayment of the deposit, and shall return the deposit to the company on the completion of the railway according to the terms hereof, with any interest accrued thereon.

In the one case the interest stops on default, but in the other it does not. I submit this to the consideration of the Government, that when they reach—if they ever do—the committee stage on this Bill, they should take some pains to redraft that clause, so as to provide that, in case of default, the Government may lay their hands upon every dollar of the deposit. At present, the only risk which Mackenzie & Mann seem to run is this, that if they make default, instead of their getting their money back, it shall be held in the safe-keeping of the Government, for ever, if they like, and the company will draw the interest at 3 per cent per annum—not a very bad arrangement for Mackenzie & Mann.

As to the risk, let us consider that carefully in the light of some pretty good advice. Mackenzie & Mann, according to the Government, run the risk of losing $250,000 and of being made liable for damages, according to what rule, the Minister of the Interior did not know, and the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) took very good care not to enter into that very abstruse and difficult question. I should like indeed to be informed by some of the legal luminaries on the Treasury benches what the nature of the claim for damages would be, on default, outside of this penalty or liquidated damage—whichever it may be—embraced in that clause.

But, leaving these technical questions, let us come down to something which every one can understand.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Let us come down, for instance, to the understanding of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I ask him what is the risk which Mackenzie & Mann run with regard to this deposit. I am going to submit a brief quotation, for it is a shorter way than to give them the history of these different contracts, for the building of railways within a certain time. This is not the first we have had; we have had them by the score, even cases in which the contract said—as this contract does not say—that time was to be the very essence of the bargain, that the contractors should not be entitled to a single farthing unless a certain thing were done by a certain day. And yet, on the failure of the contractors to carry out their agreement, Acts have been passed by this Parliament extending the time or declaring the forfeit off and handing back the money. If hon. gentlemen opposite have forgotten the history of the indulgence of the Parliament of Canada in connection with the contractors who made bona fide attempts to build a railway within a certain time and failed, I call their attention to Mr. Mackenzie's utterances at Kingston in 1878 on this very subject. We have here a case exactly in point. Let every one understand from this just how much security we have and how much risk Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann ran when they made their bargain under these pleasant circumstances, for them, in connection with the building of this Yukon road. The late Alexander Mackenzie was defending his Government against a charge of having on such a contract, handed back the deposit and relieved the contractors. He said :

The Canada Central Company gave their contract to Mr. Foster, who, as I have stated, had the contract from us for the 85 miles which we were to build. The country proved to be much more difficult in way of railway construction than Mr. Foster had anticipated at the time he took the contract, and he asked for a revision of the terms of the contract, which the Government were unwilling to grant.

But when we found that he was not likely to proceed with the work as expeditiously as we could desire, we determined to cancel the contract, and pay back the money deposited, paying him such an amount for the work he performed as might be certified by the engineer as earned in the prosecution of surveys as far as they could be made available by the Government in finishing the surveys. This is what is characterized as a gross wrong. What is there wrong about it? The contract was fairly awarded.

A little different from this case, I submit.

It was fairly annulled, and we undoubtedly had the power to annul it; and, for that matter, our predecessors annulled many a contract. We just as certainly had the power to pay back the money and release the security, and we did so believing that it was in the public interest to do it. The previous Government did the very same thing, not in paying back $85,000, as we did, but over $1,000,000 to Sir Hugh Allan when they annulled his contract. If it was wrong for us to annul one contract and pay back the security, how much greater a wrong were they guilty of when they repaid back about twelve times as much as we did? We believed we were doing it in the public interest. It has been frequently done in the past, and no doubt will have to be done by every Government. There is nothing in the matter bearing the faintest shade of corruption.

Accepting his own version of that part of the great railway system of this country, are we to suppose, have we any reason to believe that, should default be made in connection with any of the terms of this contract, this Government will be more harsh than Alexander Mackenzie was or than has been our experience in these matters as between Governments and the contractors who undertake such huge contracts at great risk. Well, then, we have Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann able in this case not merely to quote the practice of Government in connection with these contracts as stated by the late Alexander Mackenzie, but, forsooth, to plead an excuse already provided for them by the Prime Minister of this country because he has already told us that, owing to the course of the Opposition in this very debate, they may be embarrassed and may be prevented from carrying out this contract to the letter.

In regard to monopoly, the Minister of the Interior affected to be indignant at the very suggestion of such a thing, so far as the power to build railways was concerned. During his speech, the hon. gentleman said :

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

They are mere charters for the construction of a line of railway, which any company might get upon application to Parliament in the usual way.

And again :

Now the reading of that clause will at once dissipate the idea that there has ever been any monopoly granted to this company. There is no monopoly whatever. There is nothing in this clause which, by any strength of imagination, can be called a monopoly.

Now, let us see how far apart these advisers of His Excellency are at times. Who was the authority for the statement, the frank, fair statement, of the meaning of this clause regarding railway construction? The first authority in this House on that subject was the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), and this is what he says in regard to monopolies :

Well, then, they said, somebody else will build that line if we go on and build this route, which is, from a business point of view, the most favourable. We said : We will not allow it for a term of years, at all events.

And again :

The contract could not have been entered into unless we were prepared to give them some protection against the destructive competition which would arise if this other route were built, destructive not only—

On that very important feature of the contract, you have these two gentlemen, one of whom is really in charge of the Bill, differing in the construction of the clause and the intention of the Government in introducing it.

Some hon. gentlemen have pretended that comfort could be got for those who support this contract by saying that if tenders were not asked for, there was the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway as a precedent. I wish to point out that there were features of that case which do not at all exist in the case under consideration. In the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway the subject had been threshed out and debated time and time again in this House. There was an obligation upon the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada to build that road. Parliament had approved of the system of building it by means of land grants and cash subsidies, and the Government had been empowered to carry out that policy; but there had been a complete failure so far as the implementing of that proposal was concerned. There were surveys and there were estimates; there was every guide necessary to enable the Government to reach an intelligent conclusion. And, under these circumstances, the Government submitted an offer which commended itself to this House and to this country, an offer which could be discussed in this House with the reports and estimates and surveys before hon. members. And in the preamble of that very Act we see the distinction between that case and the present all the more clearly. I again refer to chap. 1 of the Acts of 1881, relating to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in the second clause of the preamble we find the following:—

And whereas the Parliament of Canada has repeatedly declared a preference for the construction and operation of such railway by means of an incorporated company aided by grants of money and land, rather than by the Government, and certain statutes have been passed to enable that course to be followed, but the enactments therein contained have not been effectual for that purpose—

Therefore, the Act goes on to provide for the ratification of the contract which would carry out that object. Then, the Minister of the Interior was courteous enough to comply with a request of mine, when asked to be shown what I called a general form of contract, and he sent me copies of several Orders in Council prescribing the terms upon which contracts were to be drawn, where the Government was aiding the construction of a railway by a land grant. I call attention to the provisions of these Orders in Council, that they have been wholly ignored in the present instance. I will omit reference to those clauses which provide for, not merely the construction, but the operation of the road that is to receive the land grant. This is the clause that you find in nearly every one of these Orders in Council relating to these contracts:—

Tenth. That time shall be held to be the essence of the contract, and that unless the railway be completed, adequately equipped, and running for the whole distance from Winnipeg to the neighbourhood of Whitewater Lake, a distance of not less than 152 miles, by the said first day of October, 1885, the company's claim to land, under any and all Orders in Council relating to them and to the railway, including the present Order in Council, shall be absolutely null and void.

That was made the condition, and if the hon. gentleman meant to hold Mackenzie & Mann to that heavy undertaking, as they profess, this clause would have been found in this contract, and its absence, I say, is significant when we find it in similar contracts made between the Government and other companies in times past. Some hon. gentlemen have discussed this extraordinary statement of the Minister of Railways that this was a "gamble." There is no doubt that the hon. gentleman approached it with that view, that the Government had entered into a huge gamble, and I have an excuse for the Minister of Railways for not having resorted to anything like an advertisement asking for public tenders. If his statement be correct that this was a gamble, and if the manner in which he put the contract before the House was accurate, he would have become liable to indictment had he advertised for any public tenders. Under the Criminal Code, paragraph 205, he would have been liable to two years' imprisonment and a fine of $2,000 for advertising any scheme—this is the language of the statute:

Any scheme or plan for disposing of any property by any mode of chance whatsoever.

So if the Minister of Railways knows nothing about railway contracts and gold fields, he does understand the provisions of the Criminal Code. Then the Minister of the Interior took a long time to explain the ignorance of the Government in regard to the subject matter of this contract. I wish, however, to deal with the Minister of the Interior as opposed to the Minister of Railways on this subject, and then to deal with the Minister of Railways as opposed to himself, in order to show the confusion with which this proposition has been covered when introduced for the consideration of the House. Take, for instance, the speech of the Minister of Railways. He told us in the first place:

Hon. members of this House will recollect quite clearly that before the close of last session, evidence was pouring in upon us of the immense discoveries of gold that were taking place in the Yukon district, and returning parties from that remote region were bringing us the most fabulous accounts of its mineral deposits.

Then, again, he refers to the great gold discoveries coming under the consideration of the Government, and adds:

It became clear to us that we should immediately address our attention to dealing with these problems in a manner that would be most efficient.

And so on. Now let us take the Minister of the Interior. In a speech that was remarkable for the strength of the assertions which, on examination, became questionable, if we are to take the statements of the Minister of Railways as accurate, the Minister of the Interior said:

We all know exactly what we knew last session about the Yukon country; there is no dispute about it. If I recollect aright, the printed report was not brought down before the House prorogued.

He had the information of Mr. Ogilvie's report, in which he said there had been some extraordinary rich finds of gold made. He goes on to say, however, that it was an almost unknown district, a district that had attracted no attention whatever, a district that had not attracted the attention of the late Government. Then he refers to the mining in the Stewart River, and continues:

But will anybody in his sane senses undertake to say that when this Parliament prorogued we had any information whatever which led to the supposition that tens of thousands of people were going to the Klondike district last fall and the coming year? Why, nobody dreamed of such a thing.

The Minister of Railways dreamed of it. The Minister of Railways, with these reports coming in, not only from officials, but from returning parties, telling of the vast gold discoveries, says that in his opinion it became the duty of the Government immediately to consider what was to be done with this subject. I say the Minister of Railways speaks in such a way as to make the statement of the Minister of the Interior all the more remarkable and astounding. Let me show the evidence the Minister of Railways had under his hands at the end of last session, when, as a member of that Government, he was in charge of the information from 1896 down to the end of the session of 1897. Take, for instance, the report of Mr. Ogilvie, Sessional Papers, volume 30, No. 13. Writing on November 6th, 1896, he speaks of rich placer mines of gold discovered on the Klondike and branches, and gives the result of workings. I speak subject to correction, but I think the Minister of the Interior stated that that report of November, 1896, was in possession of the Government in 1896. Mr. Ogilvie goes on to say :

For the news has gone out to the coast, and an unprecedented influx is expected next spring (1897). And this is not all, for a large creek called Indian Creek joins the Yukon about midway between the Klondike and Stewart rivers, and all along this creek good pay has been found. * * * Now gold has been found in several of the streams joining Pelly River, and also along the Hootalinqua. In the line of these finds farthest south are the Cassiar gold fields in British Columbia ; so the presumption is that we have in our territory along the easterly watershed of the Yukon a gold-bearing belt of indefinite width, and upwards of 300 miles long, exclusive of the British Columbia part of it. :

Later on, he says :

I think this is enough to show that we may look forward with confidence to a fairly bright future for this part of our territory.

Then, referring to Bonanza Creek, he says :

From $1 to the pan of dirt up to $12 are reported, and no bed rock found yet. This means from $1,000 to $12,000 per day per man sluicing.

And again :

Enough prospecting has been done to show that there are at least fifteen miles of this extraordinary richness, and the indications are that we will have three or four times that extent, if not all equal to the above, at least very rich.

In January, 1897, he reports :

The reports from the Klondike region are still very encouraging.

Later on :

One thing is certain, we have one of the richest mining areas ever found, with a fair prospect that we have not yet discovered its limits.

On January 22nd, 1897, he reports :

I am confident from the nature of the gold found in creeks that many more of them, and rich too, will be found.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Then, on January 23rd, 1897 :

Placer prospects continue more and more encouraging and extraordinary.

Then, Mr. Speaker, how in the name of reason could the Minister of the Interior talk in that light way in regard to what had so much impressed the Minister of Railways when he issued the pamphlet published in August, 1897, that must have been prepared a long time prior to that, and informed the world, informed all for whom it was intended, that they were invited to come to our shores and to enjoy the conditions that obtained in Canada. He published this as early as August, 1897 :

The discoveries of gold near the southern boundary of British Columbia have recently been followed by still further discoveries on the Yukon River and its tributaries in the extreme north, and at numerous points between the two gold and silver have been found in such quantities as to create the belief that throughout the several ranges of the Rocky Mountains from the 49th parallel to the Arctic Ocean, additional fields for mining enterprise will annually be found for many years to come, and that as transport is afforded mining towns will arise from north to south of British Columbia. In no part of the world can capital be more profitably employed.

Then coming particularly to the Yukon, there is an article headed "The Yukon Gold Fields," which is published by that hon. gentleman in August, 1897. It says :

The greatest gold discovery of recent years has been made in the North-west Territories of Canada. No sooner had the great wealth of the gold and silver quartz mountains of British Columbia become known to the world than tidings were received of fabulously rich gold diggings on the Yukon and its tributary streams, particularly on the Thronduick, or as it is more generally called, the Klondike, as well as on the Bonanza, the Eldorado and other creeks.

And later on :

But of its richness in that respect there is no doubt, and it is impossible at present to limit the locality from which gold will be taken.

Further on in the same article there is the following :—

But the enormous quantity of gold brought out by a few prospectors resulted in a rush such as has not been seen for many years, and it became necessary to provide more amply for the future.

That was the statement made by the hon. Minister in August, 1897.

Let us now go a step further and see what information had been obtained by our neighbours to the south. The Minister of the Interior of the United States, in his annual report for the year ending June 30th, 1897, publishes some valuable information, and the United States Government had no officer more reliable or more deserving of praise than their representative in this regard. Speaking of Alaska, the Hon. Secretary of the Interior said :

The population of the district, according to the census of 1890, was 32,052, which has been greatly augmented since, notably so during the last two years when discoveries of valuable gold mines in Alaska, and particularly in the Klondike region, has caused a large influx of white people from all grades of society.

In the appendix to this report the Secretary adds some interesting information :

Near by is the mouth of the Koyukuk River (the Klondike), a tributary to the Yukon from the north. This river has been ascended 600 miles by steamer, and with its various tributaries is known to be rich in gold.

Again :

When the tidings came of the rich finds on the Klondike last spring, the entire population forsok the place. Circle City, and hastened to Klondike, and hundreds of good, comfortable log cabins were emptied.

Again :

The summer has been a memorable one because of the excitement created by the rich gold discoveries of last winter on the Klondike. I was at St. Michael the 1st of July, when the returning miners, with their valuable packages of gold dust, reached that port en route to the States, and later in the fall when thousands of miners reached St. Michael from the States en route to the Klondike mines.

Again :

My observations at the various mining camps along the river, and my conversations with miners that had been from one to several years in the country, and a personal inspection of gold dust brought out by various persons, have led me to feel that the public statements of the richness of the mines clustered around the Klondike have not been exaggerated.

Again, this officer reporting, who is the general agent of education for Alaska, Mr. Sheldon Jackson, says :

Wherever a prospector has experimented on the streams and creeks, not only in the Yukon valley, but also on the streams north of the Arctic circle running into the Arctic Ocean, as well as a number of the great streams running into the Pacific Ocean, evidences of gold deposits have been found, making Alaska probably the largest fields of gold deposits in the world.

Then we have another source of information in a lecture delivered by Mr. Ogilvie in Victoria, and a reference to this will strengthen the position I took at the beginning of my observations, that we are handing over not only a rich gold possession to these contractors, the extent of which the Minister of Railways confessed he could not even guess, but we are handing over what acknowledged authorities say is the largest tract of rich gold deposits the world has ever known. Mr. Ogilvie, in his lecture, at page 16 of the report, says :

We must have from 90,000 to 100,000 square miles, which, with proper care, judicious handling and improved facilities for the transportation of food and utensils, will be the largest, as it is probably the richest gold field the world has ever known.

Again, he says :

There are men in that country who are poor and who will remain so. It has not been their luck, as they call it, to strike it rich, but I may say that that country offers to men of great fortitude, steadiness and some intelligence an opportunity to make more money in a given time than they could possibly make anywhere else.

Again:

In conclusion let me say that we have in the far north land a vast region comprising from 90,000 to 100,000 square miles of untold possibilities. Rich deposits we know exist in it, and for aught we know many more equally rich may yet be found. We know now that there is sufficient to supply a population of 100,000 people, and I look forward to seeing that number of people in that country within the next ten years.

Hon. gentlemen may consider that in bringing to the attention of the House, not for the first time, testimony as to the mineral wealth of their country, there is not altogether a proper appreciation of the time of the House ; but it is a remarkable fact that testimony to the value of that country now comes from this side of the House and from hon. members opposed to this Bill, while hon. gentlemen who are seeking to minimize the mineral wealth of the Yukon are those who are seeking to put through this gift to Mackenzie & Mann.

But there is another matter which troubles hon. gentlemen opposite, I think. There has been confusion among members on the Treasury benches as to what they really intended to give these contractors, and as to what the conditions of the contract are. What have we to say in view of the conflict between the Minister of the Interior and the officer who was sent to that country with the most extraordinary instructions, or at all events clothed with very wide authority indeed ? The Minister of the Interior said :

Somebody the other night—I think it was the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace)—in a sarcastic tone, wanted to know why Major Walsh was camped far from Dawson City. In the name of common sense, what would he be doing at Dawson City ? We have forty mounted police and a sufficient staff of officers there to do the work.

Where are these instructions ? The Prime Minister, as I understood him, said that there was not a line to that effect in the instructions. We were told :

Major Walsh is at the place he was told to stay, attending to the business he was sent to attend to.

But Major Walsh has been heard from, and Major Walsh was asked :

“ Well, Major, were you disappointed at being held up here by the ice ?

“ Yes, I was much disappointed, I was very anxious to get to Selkirk at least, with all my party and with it to Dawson City.”

There is, not merely a contradiction between colleagues, but there is a very serious contradiction between the Commissioner and the Minister of the Interior in regard to a matter not wholly unimportant in this connection.

There is confusion as to the facts, but, what is even a more serious thing, there is a bewildering confusion amongst Ministers on the Treasury benches as to the rights of this country in our relations with the United States. Yesterday, the Prime Minister, in urging this Parliament not to pay any heed to what the United States authorities might do, in connection with the transshipment of goods on the Stikine River, told us, that if the United States attempted to contravene a solemn treaty, there was a remedy easily at hand. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, the Government are relying upon this, that if we in Canada are interfered with by the United States customs authorities on the Stikine River, and if that interference is against the letter or spirit of the treaty, we have our remedy, and that remedy is that we can go to a United States court, and in the face of a United States statute obtain a vindication of our rights under the treaty, because, as the Prime Minister says—and it is upon this supposition the Government are going—a treaty is paramount to a statute in the United States. I listened in vain for the opinion of the Solicitor General on that subject, and I say here and now, that neither the Minister of Justice nor the Solicitor General of Canada will endorse that opinion of the Prime Minister. Sir, what a plight are we not in, when, in pushing this enterprise on the assurances that are given to us against these threats, or supposed threats, from the south, are of that nature.

Let us see exactly what the law is in the United States; it was settled long ago. The law is, that a treaty which is ratified by their Congress—and, if it be not so ratified, it is not a treaty at all—is a part of the law of the land. It obtains its effect and vitality from the action of their Congress, just as a statute does, and it is paramount to all the statutes that contravene it which have been passed anterior to the sanction of that treaty. But, Sir, there is not a jurist in the United States who pretends that the body that brought that treaty into life cannot undo it and every line and every letter in it, the very next day or the very next moment. The responsibility is not between the law courts and the Government; the responsibility is between either party to the treaty. Their rights are not in the courts of the United States; their rights are in the diplomatic chamber; their rights have to be settled as they are generally settled, between independent governments. There is not a pretense of authority in the United States to support the proposition laid down by the Prime Minister of Canada yesterday. Whether clause 13 is contrary to the spirit or provisions of that treaty, or whether any Act is passed in the Congress of the United States, contrary to the provisions of the treaty, we have not the slightest ground to go upon to cause us to believe that we can obtain relief in any court of the United States. Our only remedy for the violation of that treaty would be in the usual way, namely, through the British Government. The Minister of Public Works does not seem to accept the law as I lay it down, but he will find it is said in Wharton:

A treaty may supersede a prior Act of Parliament, and an Act of Congress may supersede a prior treaty.

That is the law, and authorities are cited for it. But let me give the opinion of an Attorney General of the United States, long ago; for there has not been an occasion in recent years for an Attorney General of the United States to instruct any one either at home or abroad on such a condition of affairs in connection with the administration of their laws. Crittenden says:

I am not insensible to the sanctity of treaties, and appreciate the public importance of their faithful observance. But their moral effect and their obligation under the laws of nations is not now the subject of consideration. The question before us involves the legal effect of treaties under our constitution, and the political powers of this Government in respect to them. To say that a treaty annuls every Act of Congress that comes in conflict with it, is to place the whole political power of the Government in perpetual subjection to it. The supreme political and legislative power of this country is placed in the hands of the Government of the United States, under the constitution, and its Acts are uncontrollable, except only by that constitution; and that constitution does not say that Congress shall pass no law inconsistent with a treaty; and it would have been a strange anomaly if it had imposed any such prohibition. There may be cases of treaties so injurious, or which may become so by changed circumstances, that it would be the right and duty of the Government to renounce or disregard them. Every Government must judge and determine for itself the proper occasion for the exercise of such power, and such a power I suppose, is impliedly reserved by every party to a treaty, and I hope and believe belongs inalienably to the Government of the United States. It is true that such a power may be abused; so may the treaty-making power of all other powers, but for our security against such abuse we may and must rely on the integrity, wisdom and good faith of our Government.

These are authorities which it would not have been necessary for me to refer to, were it not for the extraordinary proposition solemnly laid down on a great and exciting occasion by the Prime Minister of this country, when he, yesterday, endeavoured to give comfort by telling us, that a treaty in the United States was paramount to a law that Congress made itself. I have just given the authority to show that no such idea obtains, and that that theory of the Prime Minister can afford no comfort or relief to any hon. gentleman who desires to support this Bill. It is bad enough to suppose that Ministers are proceeding in such ignorance of the conditions that surround them, and on this subject of treaties I may call your attention to the startling contradiction between the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). The Minister of Railways rushed to this House with this contract that had been arranged in haste, and with regard to the Stikine River he told us: We are not subject to any conditions. Then, the Minister of the Interior, finding that a very weak case had been made in support of the Bill, in a speech delivered loud enough for us to hear—whether we could understand it or not, is another question—told us, that our rights were curtailed under the Treaty of Washington, and later on, that same gentleman, forgetful of this difficult question and of these difficulties between his colleagues and himself, said:

So that we consider ourselves in a perfectly impregnable position in regard to the navigation of the Stikine River.

In one portion of his speech, when he was endeavouring to prove that Sir John Macdonald had lost us our right to the navigation of these rivers, we were always in danger, according to him; but later on, when speaking of that treaty, and when he had no point to make against the late Conservative chief, he assured us that our position under the treaty was unassailable. Later on, with no other treaty, no other understanding, we were assured that our position was sound and unassailable; and ten minutes afterwards, this same gentleman, hurrying over important subjects like these, so that he could not remember the positions he had taken up in the very same debate before, said, as to our right to tranship on the Stikine River:

That is a question upon which we can give no positive statement.

We who stand in an impregnable position, we who are subject to no conditions whatever on the Stikine—when you ask us how about our rights of transshipment, have to tell you that that is a question upon which we can give no positive statement. The Prime Minister, if I recollect aright, did attempt yesterday to give us a positive statement. We would like to back him up; we would like to back the Government up in the most extreme position, which it would be necessary for us to take, as to those treaty rights; but it certainly looks as if this weak and halting suggestion of the Minister of the Interior were what Congress is now acting upon. The Solicitor General insinuated that it was the observations made on this side of the House that suggested to Congress that they should embarrass us, that they should deal with this question of transshipment so as to render this scheme abortive; but the direct and positive evidence that gives force to the suggestion that the idea came from hon. gentlemen opposite I hold under my hand, in the fact that a Minister of the Crown in Canada told the United States several weeks ago, before these Bills dealing with transshipment or bonding were introduced into Congress, that this question of transshipment was one on which we could give no positive statement. Then later on, the Minister of the Interior said:

It is a question—

A question, mark you—our right under the treaty, a matter so plain that the Prime Minister would not consider for a moment the possibility of Congress doing anything to interfere with it—

It is a question which, if disputed, must be decided either by negotiation or by reference to a competent tribunal.

And what are we to do in the meantime? We have had negotiations with the United States. We have had negotiations this year, and most extraordinary things happened. The negotiators could not understand each other. We sent the Minister of the Interior to Washington, or at any rate he went there to advise, and he came back thinking he had made a bargain of a certain character; but it took him six weeks to find out that the other party to the bargain had never heard of it at all, and did not agree to it.

Now, let us see what is happening in Congress, and how much hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House know of it, from anything we have heard from them. There is the Prime Minister in his seat, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the Minister of Inland Revenue, and the Minister of Public Works, and the Minister of Customs, and the Postmaster General, and the Solicitor General—a very fair representation of the Cabinet; and I would ask them now, for the purposes of my argument, whether they are aware of any other measure than the Bill containing the clause 13 mentioned yesterday, which deals with the subject of transshipment, now before Congress. I ask that, for this reason. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries took the position that it is arguable whether clause 13 deals with transshipment at all. Am I not fair in saying that those hon. gentlemen endeavoured to allay alarm and excitement in this country over clause 13 by saying that it related to the bonding of goods, and not to the transshipment of goods? For that reason, I ask the Prime Minister, who is in charge of our interests at a most critical time—I ask him in good faith—is he aware of any other measure dealing with the subject of transshipment before Congress?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There may be, but I am not aware of any.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think this Bill had better be withdrawn. I think that, not merely for the reasons which I gave at the commencement of my speech, but I think it had better be withdrawn until we have the Government advised of a Bill which is now passing through Congress dealing directly with the subject of transshipment. I have under my hand, not merely the Bill dealing with the subject of transshipment, but a report of the Secretary of the Treasury recommending that Bill to Congress; and we are chided with taking up time discussing a Bill concerning transshipment on the Stikine when to-day members on the Treasury benches do not know of the legislation before Congress dealing directly with that subject. Were the Government ever in a more humiliating position? Is it possible for us to imagine a more humiliating position for them to be in—that in regard to transshipment, on which they say there is a question, they do not know that the Government of the United States are asking power at the hands of Congress to make any regulation they please concerning our privilege of transshipment on the Stikine River; and the legislation is of such a general character, that we are not to know what the regulations are until the Secretary of the Treasury has considered and made them—that he will be given such wide discretionary power that, after that Bill goes through Congress, at his own sweet will and in his own time—

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman cannot afford to sneer at my observation, for he has not read the Bill.

The PRIME MINISTER. Pardon me. If the hon. gentleman refers to the Bill which he has in his mind, I have read every line of it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I acted upon the hon. gentleman's statement that he knew of no other Bill.

The PRIME MINISTER. I know what Bill the hon. gentleman refers to. I am not aware that it affects this question. The hon. gentleman refers to a Bill whereby the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make regulations with regard to transshipment—a Bill which is perfectly consistent with the powers of the United States. I stated yesterday that the executive authority of the United States has the right to make regulations for their own protection, but not to defeat our right.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am willing to take this answer of the Prime Minister, that he did know of a Bill dealing with transshipment other than that containing clause 13.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman cannot find a clause in that Bill affecting this question. It is only for the making of regulations.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Excuse me; I have the floor. The hon. gentleman knew of the Bill after I explained it. Before I explained it, the hon. gentleman told me that he did not know of any other Bill than that containing clause 13.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

The PRIME MINISTER. This is an insinuation that is hardly worthy of the hon. gentleman; but, Mr. Speaker, let the hon. gentleman read his Bill, and he will find that there is nothing at all in it but power given to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the other proper officers to make regulations.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is what I stated. The hon. gentleman surely does me an injustice when, after I stated what the Bill contained, he informed me that he did know of it. Of course, the hon. gentleman withdraws what he said before, when he told me, as distinctly as anyone could, and as "Hansard" will show, that he did not know. The hon. gentleman evidently had forgotten, and I think he will find that this Bill is not the insignificant Bill which he supposes it is.

I shall, if the House will permit me, take time to show that this is part, and a part and parcel, of a systematic plan attempted by the United States on the western coast of the Dominion, for the purpose of capturing and securing trade at the expense of Canadian enterprise; and it is a dangerous thing for the First Minister of this country to regard so lightly a provision which he says he understands.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Legislation promoted by Mr. Hamilton Smith.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is making an extraordinary statement. Does he make it seriously or in chaff?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I believe it is true—Mr. Hamilton Smith and his associates.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says, that Mr. Smith is promoting a Bill which the First Minister declares is a harmless and a very ordinary Bill regarding the subject of transshipment; and so we are somewhat bewildered. I venture to say, that the right hon. the First Minister, at any rate, does not share the supposition that Mr. Hamilton Smith is the suggestor and prompter of these Bills for the creation of difficulties by means of vexatious bond and transshipment regulations of the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is what he and his associates are doing, and you are giving them the time to do it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Let me point out, that on the 15th of January Congress was informed, not only of the Bill having to do with this transshipment, but of a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Lyman J. Gage, who, to my knowledge, has been in communication, not with Mr.

Hamilton Smith, but with parties out on the Pacific Coast whom he was assisting—and he was right from his own point of view—and co-operating with, and who are competing with Canadians for the Yukon trade. This report of Secretary Gage is a very important document, and had considerable weight in the discussion of the Bill by Congress. It is dated the 9th February, and, in referring to the subject under discussion from different points of view, he says :

In order to cover more explicitly the situation, sea-going vessels can proceed to St. Michael, near the mouth of the Yukon. The Yukon is very shallow, in some places only four feet deep. Transfers of cargo and passengers from deep-draught sea-going vessels to river vessels drawing little water are therefore necessary at St. Michael ; substantially the same as is true of the Stikine River, and Wrangel, near its mouth.

Then other clauses of the Bill—for the Bill deals with other subjects as well—come in ; and, after referring to these provisions, touching particularly the coasting trade, Secretary Gage goes on to say :

Section 3 is designed to give the Secretary of the Treasury full powers to regulate the transfer of cargoes and passengers from deep-sea vessels to shallow vessels bound up the Yukon and the Stikine. The conditions under which such transfers will occur cannot now be fully foreseen, so the bestowal of discretionary power in the Secretary of the Treasury seems the only way to meet the situation.

Hon. gentlemen opposite can only comfort themselves by assuming that the Secretary of the Treasury will make those regulations in conformity with treaty rights and obligations. But the trouble is, that he is vested by that Bill with wide and ample power to ruinously embarrass and impede our trade and shipping up the Stikine River. That Bill was under consideration on February 15th in Congress, and that report was read in conjunction with it, and this explanation was given why this discretionary power is vested in the Secretary of the Treasury :

This is made to apply to the new station in Alaska in the navigation of the Yukon and Stikine rivers. The Secretary says it is impossible to frame a statute which might not do great injustice, and so it is left in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to make such laws and regulations as the commerce on this river requires.

That Bill is Bill No. 17808, and is the one referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The Secretary explained that the Bill covers the Yukon and Stikine rivers, so that, until the Secretary of the Treasury makes the regulations or has come to a conclusion, we are left absolutely in the dark as to whether we are to be bothered unfairly, or as to what the nature of these regulations will be at all.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Is the hon. gentleman aware whether any regulations have already been made with reference to the Yukon ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, the hon. gentleman told us so.

The FIRST MINISTER. Not under this Bill.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, it is not law, and whatever regulations are made, the hon. gentleman will understand, can be very easily unmade by a party that has these wide discretionary powers, and Mr. Gage states particularly that he is desirous of getting into his hands this power, so as to make regulations that may fit the circumstances. All the regulations that are now existing will, of course, stand in the way very little time, should the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States consider it necessary to replace them by others.

But let us take section 13 of another Bill, a Bill with a title not exactly generic to this question. It is an Act extending the homestead laws and providing for right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska. I have it as it was introduced, and I have it as it passed, according to the newspapers. Section 13 of this Bill provides :

That under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the privilege of entering goods in warehouses and merchandise in bond, or of placing them in bonded warehouses at the port of Wrangel, district of Alaska, and of withdrawing the same for exportation to any place in British Columbia or the North-west Territories without payment of duty, is hereby granted to the Government of the Dominion of Canada and its citizens, or citizens of the United States, whenever, and so long as it shall appear to the satisfaction of the President of the United States, who shall ascertain and declare the fact by proclamation, that no exclusive privilege of transporting through British Columbia or the North-west Territories, goods or passengers arriving from or destined for other ports in Alaska, is granted to any persons or corporations by the Government of the Dominion of Canada, and that the privilege has been duly accorded to responsible persons operating transportation lines in British Columbia or the North-west Territories of making direct communication with transportation lines in Alaska, and that the Government of the Dominion has consented to, and is allowing on behalf of the citizens of the United States the entry free of duty of all miners' outfits and a supply of provisions and clothing, the whole not exceeding in quantity one thousand pounds for each citizen of the United States proposing to engage in mining in British Columbia or the North-west Territories, and that the Government of the Dominion of Canada has removed all unequal restrictions to the issue of miners' licenses to all citizens of the United States operating or intending to operate in British Columbia or the North-west Territories.

And then it provides that we shall grant American fishermen privileges denied them by treaty.

There is, therefore, the embarrassment to be considered. Business men know better than I, that, owing to the condition of the sea. It may be impossible, when a ship reaches Wrangel, to unload from the vessel into lighters, and it may be necessary to land and warehouse the goods for a longer or shorter time, according to the circumstances. The embarrassment that may be caused under that clause will not be minimized by one who looks at these matters in the light of the ordinary principles of carrying on business.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am sorry that, on continuing my observations I have only the pleasure of seeing the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) in their places. However, I take it that the absence of other hon. Ministers may be simply a reflection upon myself. I hope that, so far as they are concerned, it is not an indication of any diminishing interest in this interesting question. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), I see, has arrived—and it is only fair to say that since my observation was made the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) has been good enough to enter an appearance, and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) is also ready for the fray.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. If the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will only have patience for a little, he will have a distinguished audience.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It could not be more distinguished, now that the hon. Minister of the Interior is here. The hon. gentleman, speaking some time ago, but speaking in this debate, said among many other extraordinary things, that, forsooth, we had no cause of complaint against the United States. Let me not misrepresent the statement of the hon. gentleman. Let me read the very language he used:

We have had no cause of complaint against the United States Government because of their dealings with us upon this question.

And again:

When I was there—

Speaking of his visit to Washington and of a member of the United States Government, who is called here the Secretary of the Navy, but really, I suppose the Secretary of the Treasury—I do not suppose that "Hansard" is correct in that.

—he said that he would have them issued in such a way as to facilitate our trade in any reasonable way that we had any right to expect, and that he would be able to get them out in a short time.

And again:

The Secretary of the Treasury did assure that he would at once—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

I call your attention to this, Mr. Speaker,— "that he would at once"

—issue regulations which would have the effect of doing away with the necessity of paying these fees, and I so telegraphed to the Board of Trade of Victoria, and, I think, that of Vancouver.

The regulations were to have been drafted and issued at once. So that then, we had this state of facts admitted by the Minister of the Interior of the Dominion of Canada to exist—that long ago he went to Washington and reached an agreement with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in regard to regulations concerning the customs upon goods passing from Canada through United States territory into the Yukon country. And, after many weeks, after extraordinary and unexplained delays on the part of the United States, costing the people of this country, east and west, many thousands of dollars, embarrassing the business of Canada, I venture to say, to an extraordinary degree, there came regulations which dealt wholly with Dyea and Skagway and ignored the Stikine River altogether.

All this was the result of the visit of a member of the Canadian Government to the city of Washington, and he had no cause of complaint against the Government of the United States. Must we eat humble pie all the time, Mr. Speaker? Must we go hat in hand to the governors of the United States, and be thankful that they courteously receive us? Must we not complain if an understanding is not complied with? Either the Minister of the Interior is exceedingly deceived or his statement is incredible, that he had no cause of complaint. Well, let us see. I have given you what he stated to this House, and I will sow you from other statements he has made, how our Minister of the Interior was dealt with by these gentlemen in charge of the public affairs of the United States. It appears that he had made all the concessions that the United States desired he should make. He was frank and explicit, let us give him credit for that, as to how far Canada would go in regard to the concessions that they desired, and those were made in no doubtful manner. He received from them promises, and though the promises stood for weeks without any performance, and though definite regulations issuing out of those negotiations from the United States wholly ignored this route that is so indispensable now in the eyes of the Government, and so necessary for our purposes, the hon. gentleman chided in advance any one who would dare to rise in his place in this House and find fault with the manner in which the United States Government had dealt with him. Dealt with him! Why, they played with him, Mr. Speaker; they played with him as they would play with a child; and the extraordinary thing is that the child, after being played with, did not understand the game they were at. Now, let me see what he told the business people of the coast he had accomplished on this mission. On the 3rd of January, 1898, he wired to the Board of Trade of Victoria as follows:—

Have just returned from Washington where I have—

Got a promise? No, Mr. Speaker:

—where I have completed arrangements ensuring passage of Canadian goods by way of Dyea and Skagway sub-ports without charge for inspection referred to in your telegram and correspondence. Treasury Department will make arrangements to facilitate business.

Has the hon. gentleman no cause for complaint against the United States? or does he consider our position in Canada so humble and so contemptible that he dare not make complaints if the very best faith is not kept with him? If that statement is correct, and I believe when the hon. gentleman sent that telegram he believed it was correct, I know of no language sufficient to characterize the treatment that was accorded to him by the United States authorities, no language sufficient to deplore and to decry the spirit that prompted them so to delude, and so to deceive, the Minister of the Interior. He had completed arrangements on the 3rd of January which ensured this passage of goods forthwith, by a route which is now a secondary affair, not to be mentioned even in connection with the Stikine River; and perhaps the Minister of the Interior will confess that on that occasion he had no arrangement whatever in regard to the Stikine River, and no understanding with the United States Government. From what has occurred in Congress, from the action of the Secretary of the Treasury since, I take it there can be no question whatever that the Minister of the Interior entirely overlooked the necessity of coming to any arrangement with them in regard to this essential portion of the Government programme that is now submitted to us. However, on January 4th, the people of the Pacific Coast, relying on the acuteness of the Minister of the Interior, supposing that he was equal to the occasion, supposing that he understood what had happened at Washington, congratulated him in this manner:

Your telegram has created better feeling amongst merchants here. Most important Washington authorities wire proper instructions, Skagway and Dyea; any delay will greatly prejudice Canadian trade. North bound steamers with full Seattle passenger lists leaving frequently.

But little did the people of the Pacific Coast understand the administrative capacity of the Minister of the Interior and his instinct for government, upon which he dwelt to the immense amusement of this House a short time ago, when he having botched and bungled the whole of this business from beginning to end, dared to rise in his place and sneer at the instinct of government possessed by Sir John A. Macdonald. When I heard that hon. gentleman, when I saw his scorn, feigned or unfeigned, in regard to the career of that great statesman, when I heard him discuss and criticise the statesmanship of Sir John A. Macdonald, I remembered the old adage that a live dog was better than a dead lion. On no other principle that I can conceive would the Minister of the Interior be warranted in the sneers and scoffs that he threw against that great name. Well, the people of Victoria soon learned to measure the value of our new plenipotentiary at Washington, soon understood how much the telegram of January meant. Remonstrances came from the coast fifteen days afterwards, he informed the people of that coast:

Saturday regulations being issued immediately.

But still no cause of complaint, not a ground of complaint from the Minister of the Interior, we are to assume, had occurred. Remonstrances came from the coast having regard to this positive and unqualified statement, this unqualified assurance from a responsible Minister fresh from the negotiations at Washington, after business transactions had been based upon his assurance, remonstrances followed and followed quickly and daily. On the 20th January, this telegram went from the Minister of the Interior to the Board of Trade:

It was arranged that there should be no regulations at Stikine that would harass our trade, but not specifically provided that same regulations adopted at Dyea and Skagway should apply to Stikine.

Still no regulations; still the officers of the United States at the Sound, up on the Stikine, at Dyea and Skagway, everywhere that they could be found on that coast, were embarrassing every Canadian steamship company, stating that there were no instructions received from Washington. Still, of course, those who had an abiding faith in the Minister of the Interior, and there were some even then on the coast, excused the Minister by stating that the instructions no doubt had been settled, but there had not been time to communicate them to these outposts. In the meanwhile, our rivals in the United States ports, at Seattle and other ports on the Pacific, were clutching, and grasping, and controlling trade in connection with our own Yukon country. That was on the 20th. But again on the same day another telegram came from the Minister of the Interior:

Am advised this morning by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury that the collector of customs for Alaska would be in Washington in two or three days, and that regulations are held pending conference with him.

This shows the manner in which the Government acted, against which there is no cause of complaint! The hon. gentleman, acting as the representative of the British Crown, had exhibited the very best of faith. Everything he had assured the people at Washington would be done he had implemented to the very letter, which it was his bounden duty to do; and I can understand him resenting, even if he thought it was not politic to express it, the action of those authorities, but I cannot understand him under the circumstances endeavouring to excuse this extraordinary conduct on the part of the United States Government, unless he was wholly erroneous, wholly inaccurate in regard to that telegram of January 3rd in which he stated that the arrangements and regulations had actually been completed. It was not necessary to bring from Alaska the collector of customs to discuss regulations that had been arranged and agreed to, according to the telegram of the Minister.

Again, we had another version from the Minister as to what happened. On 22nd January, he telegraphed to Captain Irvine in Victoria:

Arrangement was that instructions should be given which would do away with customs charges and inspection fees. Treasury Department has not yet issued instructions. Have been wiring them constantly. Last telegraph says they expect to close in a day or two. Have done everything possible; do not see what more I can do. Expect it is only a matter of a few days.

I am in the hearing of the hon. Minister of the Interior, and he knows he was grievously disappointed; that though he sent this telegram on 22nd January, it was not a matter of a few days but of weeks, and the matter was not settled until after 22nd January, when the Minister of Customs had to come down to the House first with regulations and instructions that concerned the Dyea and Skagway only, and afterwards he supplemented the statement by saying the Government would obtain further information and advice applicable to the case of the Stikine River. I therefore, join issue with the hon. Minister of the Interior, and I say we are doing our duty here in expressing our resentment against the treatment shown to a Minister of the Crown who went to Washington, and in good faith conducted these negotiations with the authorities of the United States, and was treated in the contemptible manner in which the Minister of the Interior was treated, and he had not the spirit to resent that treatment though it has cost the people of this country many and many a dollar. I come again, then, to make good my position in regard to the absolute futility of relying on the good will of the United States or upon the United States view of international law as heretofore expressed in connection with any scheme or proposition that aims at the development of the Dominion of Canada. I have just as high an opinion of individuals in the United States as any hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House, and when I charge against that government hostility to this country, when I charge against that country every ungenerous effort that can be made to thwart us in advancing Dominion interests, I refer to their pernicious system of politics, deplorable and humiliating, and I believe many thousands of Americans are as much disgusted with their system of government as are our own people so far as relations with Canada are concerned. I am against voting a single dollar or a single acre of land in Canada, mineral or otherwise, to any project that depends on the good will of the United States for the successful carrying out of that scheme for which the land is appropriated. We may have done so before, if you like; but having had experience of the United States, we should look at the facts, and look the position in the face, and place our lines and arrangements and our plans, as we can do and as this country is rich enough to do and willing enough to do, wholly apart from them and wholly irrespective of what they wish or seek. I say we cannot rely on those people showing towards us the slightest measure of fair-play. Some hon. gentlemen seem to speak with bated breath when referring to the conduct of the United States; it is an awful thing to say anything respecting even a United States citizen in this House of Commons, as I have heard during this debate. If there is any British subject afraid of saying what he thinks, I have under my hand the authority of those who advise directly Her Majesty the Queen to show that they are not built of that stuff. I have under my hand the language of those advising the Queen now that points out directly, emphatically and in the strongest language possible not only how those people to the south of us, represented by their Government, will not only twist and vary treaties and will twist and torture principles of law, but will scheme and arrange so as to grasp every advantage possible, regardless of any consequences whatever. Let me give the House an example. For instance, there has been a difference of opinion in this House as to whether the Treaty of 1825 gave the people of this country the right to navigate the Yukon. Mr. Blake, no mean authority, was of the opinion, contrary as I have endeavoured to show, to the opinion prevailing in England, that we had under that treaty, notwithstanding the purchase of the country by the United States, the absolute right to navigate the Yukon. No one will doubt we got the right, whatever the other question may be, under the Treaty of Washington, and we got the right to navigate the Stikine under that treaty, if we did not enjoy it in 1871 under the Treaty of 1825. Yet there is the best authority to show that after that Treaty of 1871 and for several years thereafter no

British bottoms could go up the Stikine River. There was the treaty. Hon. gentlemen opposite are willing to risk the resources of this country on the assumption that the United States will understand and carry out a treaty as we read it; and yet with the Treaty of 1871 it is a fact that in 1873 the customs officers of the United States Government on the Stikine prevented and were instructed to prevent any British bottom ascending the waters of that river. We have the authority of Sir Donald Smith, the present Lord Strathcona, who in this House stated, notwithstanding the contention of Mr. Blake, notwithstanding the views of hon. gentlemen opposite, who even now think that under the Treaty of 1825 we have a right to navigate the Yukon. British bottoms were not allowed to navigate that river. Let me give the House the language of Sir Donald Smith during the discussion on the Treaty of Washington, as reported in the "Globe." He said:

As to the assumption that free navigation of the Yukon in the North-west was of no practical use to Canada, he thought it was otherwise. That river goes into British territory for a distance somewhere of 300 or 400 miles, and while it now takes the Hudson Bay Company several years to get their goods from England to points on that river, they will, if the treaty is ratified, be able to get their goods to their destination in eighteen months.

The hon. gentleman read a letter from the Secretary of State of the United States to prove that no vessels other than those of United States citizens can go up that river. As to the Stikine River, the fact is, that, notwithstanding the Treaty of 1871, as late as 1873 the British vessels were not given their rights under the terms of that treaty, and for confirmation of that I refer hon. gentlemen to the correspondence in the Sessional Papers, vol. 11, for the year 1878. These are facts pertinent to the very case in point, and let us see whether that excuse cannot be given again by the Americans in connection with the proposition now under consideration. They can say: Oh, yes, the treaty did arrange that you should navigate the Stikine, but the regulations concerning the treaty and the instructions have not been sent forward to the officers on the Stikine River, but they will be sent forward. In the meantime, notwithstanding the treaty, years elapse before the officers of the United States have instructions to obey it; on the contrary in the case mentioned up to that time they had instructions which prevented that treaty being operated. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, and I have the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce for saying it, although he is not a lawyer, there never was a more monstrous assertion of an untenable right on the part of any country than there was by the United States of America in connection with the Behring Sea fisheries. They had not a single shadow of excuse for the action they took, and which they took for the purpose of breaking up a great Canadian industry and paralyzing a large portion of our mercantile marine on the Pacific Coast. Without any foundation in international law, against all the traditions of their country, against all their previous interpretations of international law, they simply instructed their revenue cutters to seize right and left on the high seas, fifty, sixty and seventy miles from land, any ship floating the British flag that dared pursue an industry which they desired should be locked up in the hands of a monopoly of their own citizens. Eleven years have we been discussing this, but yet, with decisions of a most unmistakable character against them, and vacillating from position to position, the Americans have fought us during the whole period. Some of the men that they ruined have died, many of the ships that were concerned have disappeared, and we are still waiting for one dollar of indemnity in compensation for that gross violation of international law and comity of nations—a violation that was perpetrated by the United States simply to break down, as they almost succeeded in breaking down, by virtue of the power they were allowed to exercise regardless of principle—the Canadian sealing industry. Hall, referring to this action of the United States, says:

With flagrant inconsistencies, the United States, when acquiring possession of Alaska, have claimed as attendant upon by virtue of cession from Russia about two-thirds of Behring Sea—a space of 1,500 miles long and 600 miles wide—and upon the ground of this claim have seized British vessels engaged in seal fishing.

Let me pass from this subject to another phase of the question. The Minister of Customs smilingly attempted to answer the expression of my fear that injustice might be done us under the Act by which the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States will be permitted to make regulations concerning the transshipment of British goods at Wrangel; but let me give him some of our experience with the United States authorities on the subject of regulations. Having whipped them from pillar to post on the questions I have referred to, having obtained the judgment of an international tribunal that they they had no case at all, regulations were prescribed under which the seal-hunters in Pacific waters were to be guided and governed. The Colonial Office, after some experience of these gentlemen in their administration of international regulations which had their birth in the treaty and the judgment under the treaty, speaks of the treatment Canadians received at the hands of these people, concerning whom the Minister of the Interior says we have no cause of complaint whatever. Mr. Chamberlain's department, addressing the Foreign Office and discussing that United States despatch, vulgarly known as the "Shirt Sleeves Despatch," of General Sherman, thus wrote only in September last:

The extent to which British sealing vessels have been unnecessarily harassed by the United States patrol vessels during 1895 and 1896 may be judged from the fact that in 1894, when the British sealing fleet numbered only 22 vessels, 36 boarding operations were performed, an average of one and a half per vessel, while in 1895, when a fleet of 40 British vessels were engaged, the number of boardings rose to 183, an average of four and a half per vessel, and in 1896 the British fleet of 57 vessels was subjected in Behring Sea alone to 171 boardings by the United States patrol, an average of three times per vessel. It is interesting to note that in 1895, 76 United States vessels were subjected to only 156 boarding operations.

If the direct adviser of Her Majesty the Queen is not afraid to call a spade a spade, when dealing with the United States, any member of this House may without fear warn the Government of Canada that they are relying upon a broken reed when they rely upon the good faith of the United States in maintaining inviolable the spirit and letter of the different treaties. Lest any one should be timid in this House at the utterance of such language, let me refer again to the language of the Colonial Office in that same despatch, and let us see how they understand the position of the United States touching obligations of any kind. In the despatch I find the following:—

The nation which is now so zealous for prohibiting the killing of seals on the high seas was, in 1832, with equal zeal asserting a claim of rights for its citizens, not only to kill seals on the high seas, but to land and slaughter them on the shores of a friendly nation. The power which now reproaches Her Majesty's Government with "unneighbourly" conduct because they decline to abolish an industry, the lawfulness of which has never been questioned except by the United States, and has, only four years since, been vindicated by the highest international tribunal, did not shrink, in 1832, when the United States sealing vessel "Harriet" had been seized for violating the territory of the republic of Buenos Ayres in the pursuit of fur seals, from landing an armed party at Soledad and carrying off the crew and cargo of the vessel, and from declaring that the seal fishery on those coasts was in future to be free to all Americans, and that the capture of any vessel of the United States would be regarded as an act of piracy.

They, notwithstanding their action in 1832, notwithstanding their views that certain things would be an act of piracy, did not hesitate to commit against British subjects in 1886 and afterwards, the very self-same acts of piracy, and worse than that, attempted to justify them. Again, this despatch, coming from the office of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, says:

They (British subjects) have performed with the utmost rigour all the requirements of the award, but they have had to make continual and unavailing protests against the attempts of the United States to hamper and embarrass the operations of British subjects pursuing their lawful vocation.

Out on these very waters, on the very coast now under our consideration. You have the evidence from the British Government, new and fresh, you have the opinion of the authorities of the Crown in England, that, in spite of international law, in spite of the judgments of tribunals, in spite of the regulations under treaties, the United States pursue and are pursuing their fell purpose of embarrassing and harassing in every possible way, manner and form a British industry in that vicinity. And can you doubt, Sir, can any man doubt, that whatever the result of a collision on these questions may be—I mean a collision of opinion, a difference in regard to the interpretation of the treaties that have been discussed—that the spirit that induced them to hamper us as they have hampered us on the deeper waters, will prevail when thousands and hundreds of thousands of their citizens on their Pacific Coast are bringing all the pressure they can bring to bear on the Washington authorities, to give them every conceivable advantage in this Yukon country, and in the trade connected with it. I have no manner of doubt whatever, Mr. Speaker, that not only is that their purpose, but from the legislation now before Congress there is cause for any reasonable man to assume that, so far as they can go, short of actual offensive and warlike demonstrations and action against us, the people of the United States will compel the Administration of the day to go. If you do not agree with me, if this is perhaps an extreme position, at any rate it seems to me there is just cause and just reason for the caution that I have endeavoured to inculcate in my speech, that is, that we should have no plan and no proposition for the expenditure of money, or involving financial responsibility for Canada in regard to the development of this country, where it is possible that people who have taken the action they have taken, who are considering the measures they are considering, can by any manner of means come in and even for the time thwart us and embarrass us.

I am, therefore, in the strongest manner against, and will vote against any proposition for the expenditure of a dollar, or the assumption of responsibility for any action, which is dependent upon United States good-will at the present time for its successful accomplishment. I am as anxious as any man in this House or out of it can possibly be for all fair and legitimate aid being accorded for the development of this, the richest gold field, as I believe it to be, in the world, for the benefit of Canadians and Canadian trade. Indeed, I go further than hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), reverting to the old spirit that pervaded the Liberal party, that fear of the future, that fear to risk a dollar to gain anything for the people of this country, spoke of this proposition as worthy of commendation because there was not any money of the people of the east to be risked in it, and because after all we were only risking the gold field itself, and what it might produce. I go further than that, and I say that I believe the bulk of the people of Canada to-day, with our credit as it is, with the confidence that pervades the Canadian breast, in our own strength and in our financial independence of any other country, would rally round a Government, Grit or Conservative, that would have the pluck and courage to risk the dollars of the Canadian people, not merely to manage and control in a wholly independent manner the trade of that part of Canada, so rich as it undoubtedly is, but to enable the Government, by a wise and statesmanlike policy, to rely upon the possibility, the human probability, too, of being recouped tenfold by wise and reasonable regulations in the administration of that country, for every dollar expended in order to hold and keep it in our hands. I believe the gentlemen on your left, Sir, are ready to support this Government in an active and energetic policy that will pledge the resources of this country, wholly apart from any surrender of our mineral lands, wholly apart from any gambling or speculation in them; so that we could say to the world: "We told you, and we meant it when we told you, that we had a rich and vast heritage in the Yukon country, and when we asked you to come and risk your resources and your lives in the pursuit of wealth in that part of the world, we believed every word we published; and if it will pay you to venture everything you have, you see that we believe it will pay us and the people of Canada to risk some of our credit to enable you to go to that country by an all-Canadian route, and to come out of it when you desire." I believe that a speedy and successful route into that country can be found, and can be constructed within a reasonable time, from a port on the British Columbia coast. Though I do not profess to be thoroughly proficient as to the merits of the different routes, I believe, from what I have heard in that province from gentlemen who are familiar with the country in general, that a route from a British Columbia port into the Yukon can be built, which would be partially, if not wholly, adapted to the other different routes—at any rate, to the Edmonton route and the Ashcroft route, with very slight deviation later on. At present I believe it is our bounden duty to push on at any reasonable cost, but with the honest, bona fide risk of the money of the people of this country, in the construction of such a road. But under no circumstances, I say again, will I vote for a national gamble in this case or in any other case. With the general purport of the amendment, I am in full and hearty accord. The only qualification I would make in it is that I have no hesitation in being a little more definite than that; and instead of saying, "the best available route, judging from all we have heard," I would vote for a route which begins in the province of British Columbia, and went to the points that have been mentioned; as our practical friend, a gentleman of great experience, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope), has said, not to begin up in the ice region to build a railway between different icicles, but to build on the coast and push our way in—building a cheaper road; cheaper to the men who would undertake the contract, and cheaper in the end to the Dominion of Canada.

Those are my principles, Mr. Speaker, and of those principles I am in no sense ashamed. If the country is not with us to-day in our resistance to this monstrous proposition, this wild speculation, this unholy gamble, it will not be long before the people throughout Canada will give no uncertain sound as to their condemnation of the vilest and worst scheme that was ever submitted to an independent Parliament.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The question under debate, Mr. Speaker, has assumed quite a new aspect during the past two or three days. The eminent baronet who leads the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) moved yesterday the adjournment of the House in order that he might offer his views to the Government as to the policy which this country ought to follow in view of the action taken by the United States Senate. He gave us the benefit of his advice, and that advice was that, owing to the action taken by the American Senate, the Government of this country should cancel the arrangement we have made with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. To-day the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) followed in the same line. He deliberately tried to impress upon this House the conviction that the action taken by thirty-four American senators is of such a nature that we ought not to hesitate a moment in stopping the national work in which we are now engaged. Sir, on behalf of this Government, on behalf of the loyal representatives of the people who sit on those Ministerial benches, on behalf of our young and proud Canadian nation, I beg to take issue with the hon. gentleman on that ground. Their policy is that we ought not to go on with the Stikine road. Well, Mr. Speaker, the policy of this Government is what it was and what it will be—to push on this enterprise with more vigour and more determination if possible. I hold in my hand the book published by Mr. Pope on the life of Sir John Macdonald. In that book, I find the following letter written by Sir John to Mr. Bridges in 1870, and which I commend to the attention of the eminent baronet who leads the Opposition:—

Many thanks for your letter of the 26th giving me an account of your conversation with ———. It is quite evident to me, not only from this conversation but from advices from Washington, that the United States Government are resolved to do all they can, short of war, to get possession of our western territory, and we must take immediate and vigorous steps to counteract them. One of the first things to be done is to show unmistakably our resolve to build the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Sir, those words seem to have been written for the present emergency. History seems to repeat itself, and although I must at once protest against the idea put forth by my hon. friends opposite that these thirty-four senators who have voted for the Bill alluded to, represent the American nation, we must not forget that the American Senate has taken the position they have, and that that position is worthy of our earnest consideration. The veteran knight who leads the Opposition is, in this House, the last representative of the Macdonald-Cartier regime and the Macdonald-Cartier school, and the language he used when the policy of this Government was first made known to the Canadian public was that of a true Canadian and I must say a true Liberal-Conservative. It was the language to which I listened so many times, in my younger days, in the press gallery, in the mouth of the then leader of the House. But you will permit me to say, Sir, that I am sorry he has been obliged to adopt another language and another attitude; and I beg leave to appeal from the present position he has taken and the language he has used, to all true Liberal-Conservatives of the old Macdonald-Cartier school, and to every patriotic Canadian who feels in his heart that Providence has sown in the fertile soil of this fair Dominion the seed of a free nation. Sir, the hon. gentleman has been overpowered by smaller men than he, for I say it—and I say it in all truth—he is not a small man by any means, and I am sorry that in his declining years he has been obliged to go back from the high position he occupied in the past.

What is the position in which we are placed to-day? The American Senate, by a vote of 34 to 16 has told us that if we do not give the Americans permission to build railways where they like on our own territory, if we do not allow their miners to enjoy the same customs privileges as our own, if we do not allow their fishermen on the Atlantic Coast privileges to which they are not entitled by the Washington Treaty—if we do not do all these things and many others, they may violate treaties to which they have assented. This is the position that the American Senate has taken, in which they are helped by hon. gentlemen opposite. The eminent baronet has been quoted very often in this debate. I would ask permission to quote him once more. On the 15th February he used the following language:—

Mr. TARTE.

I said that although difficulties have presented themselves, difficulties that ought not to have presented themselves in connection with this Stikine route recently, notwithstanding these I do not hesitate to say that I infinitely prefer the route now under consideration to any route that crosses a foot of territory claimed by the United States, and all the other routes to which I have referred are open to that objection. From Pyramid Harbour down to Dyea and Skagway and Taku Inlet—not so much Taku Inlet but all the others; the Taku Inlet route is placed beyond consideration by the fact that glaciers render it absolutely dangerous for vessels to attempt to reach the waters of that lake—but all the other routes from the Pacific Coast are, in my judgment, infinitely more objectionable than the route now under consideration. There are other routes all-Canadian routes. There is the projected route from Ashcroft by the old Telegraph trail away through to Telegraph Creek. There is the route through Edmonton, and also the route from Prince Albert, whose greater length would perhaps render it more objectionable. These are all-Canadian routes, but not routes that can be made valuable to-day for the purpose of facilitating ingress into that country. It is on that ground that while I feel that the Edmonton, and the Prince Albert, and the Ashcroft routes will all furnish valuable trails, their long distance from the sea is against their practicability from a commercial and national point of view, as compared with the route chosen. They will be used for the important purpose of carrying cattle and supplies out of the great North-west and the Peace River to this great Canadian Yukon gold field, and to a certain extent by persons proceeding from the eastern portion of Canada, but it is impossible—

I call particular attention to these words:

—to expect that they could be used for the purpose of rivalling the modes of ingress that now not only cross territory claimed by the United States but have had the effect of absolutely making Seattle and San Francisco the basis of supplies for the whole of that great Canadian Yukon.

Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman states there, in the most positive manner, that the route chosen by the Government is the only route which will put Canadian producers, Canadian merchants, Canadian cities, in a position to compete successfully with their American rivals. And yet, in the face of that statement, which cannot be disputed, which has not been disputed, the Opposition moves an amendment condemning the route, and the leader of the Opposition moved the adjournment of the House in order to ask us to abandon that route. In the statement I have read, the hon. gentleman recognized that there were difficulties. He realized that, perhaps, our American friends would throw obstacles in our way. But, in spite of all that, he had then fully made up his mind that we should go on with this work. On the 15th February, he stated, in so many words, that our rights on the Stikine River, which are to-day disputed, were indefeasible rights. In the very same speech as I have already quoted, he said:

The next day, Mr. Fry, a senator of the United States, introduced a Bill into the United States Senate to adopt a policy by which if a Canadian vessel, in the enjoyment of her indefeasible right of navigation from the mouth of the Stikine River, should neglect at Fort Wrangel to pay a certain deference and respect to the United States authorities, what happens? Is she fined? No, but confiscated.

On the 15th February, the hon. gentleman recognized the fact that our rights on the Stikine River were indefeasible, but now, those rights, which were so clear, so unquestionable, it would seem do not exist at all to-day—we have no rights, and we must give up our trade, our commerce and our national dignity. Sir, what is this trade going to be? The hon. leader of the Opposition has given us a description of it. I shall not read what he says, but he tells us that it is impossible to estimate the importance of that trade. That trade means commerce, not only for Victoria and Vancouver, but for Quebec and Montreal, for Toronto and Hamilton—trade to keep our mills working, our industries busy. Are we paying too much for that trade? Hon. gentlemen on the other side have given us brilliant descriptions of the immense wealth in that Yukon district. They have reproached us with having thrown away great public properties. I think they have minimized the question, that once more they have failed to understand the feeling of this Canadian people. Have we given away too many acres of land to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann? I am sure we have not done so; the people of this country are sure we have not done so.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Let hon. members wait until the next by-election, and then they will see whether I am right or wrong. But suppose—I do not admit that it is so, but let us for the sake of argument suppose—that we have given a few thousand acres more than we should have given. What is the position to-day? The hon. leader of the Opposition will not contradict me, I am sure, when I say that the trade of the Yukon to-day amounts to $10,000,000. And, Sir, what will that trade be if in a few months we have in the Klondike district 50,000 or 100,000. Suppose, I say it again, that we have given a little too much. Would it be a wise policy to abandon that work? The question brings its own answer. If we abandon the construction of the Stikine Railway we would lose all that trade. Let it once be known that the Canadian Government does not go on with that road, and what will happen? Seattle, San Francisco, and other American cities on the Pacific Coast, will then be, in the words of my hon. friend, the basis of supplies for the Canadian Yukon. But we might lose more than our trade. May we not suppose that we might lose the Klondike itself? Suppose that next year there are 50,000 foreign miners in that district, if we have not direct communication with that far off region, who can say that we would be able to maintain the authority of Canada there? But we have been accused of building up a huge monopoly. Well, I was very much surprised to hear language of that kind coming from the lips of the hon. leader of the Opposition. I remembered when I was in the press gallery years ago, and heard speeches that he then delivered in this Parliament. I remembered hearing a speech that he made in 1879 in introducing a measure for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. One of a series of resolutions upon that subject, reads as follows:—

That it is further expedient to provide that one hundred million acres of land, and all the minerals they contain, be appropriated for the purpose of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway.

One hundred millions of acres of land with all the minerals they contain. My hon. friend went on to say this:

But we are not only prepared to give the sound, untarnished credit of Canada in support of any aid or assistance we might ask, but we are prepared to place at the bottom of that national credit of Canada one hundred millions of acres of the most fertile land in the world. Exception may be taken to the appropriation of such a large extent of land for the building of this road, as exception was taken by hon. gentlemen opposite to the appropriation of fifty million acres of land to be under the control of a company. We do not propose here to put the land under the control of a company, although I confess, so far as I am concerned, I would be glad, did the condition of things permit of it, if a company liberally aided could be found to take this work up, and at their own responsibility and risk, carry it to completion. But, in the absence of that means of attaining our object, we believe we are right in placing in the hands of a commission, on which the Imperial Government should be with us jointly represented, a hundred million acres of land for the construction of this work.

Now listen to this:

Why, if we gave the whole of the land in the North-west Territories for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it would be better than to leave those immense fertile districts untrudden, for, I may say, an age to come, neither contributing to the benefit of the world nor the consolidation of British power and the extension of British interests on this continent.

Sir, the hon. gentleman was prepared to give, as he said, the whole of the North-west Territories to a private company to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. Still, they speak of a monopoly when, out of eighty million acres of land, we give less than four million acres of that land. There is no monopoly in this scheme; there is a wise arrangement by which, if the Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann find gold, the Canadian people will have their share alongside of it. But I think that objection has been sufficiently answered. The main point to which hon. gentlemen have addressed themselves is that the route chosen by us will be useless if the American Government make up their minds to refuse us the rights to which we are fully entitled by the Washington Treaty. Again, I take this opportunity of saying that the Canadian Government have no ground of complaint to make against the American Government. We have been treated so far by them in a friendly spirit, and we do not hesitate to believe that we will be treated in the same friendly manner in the future, in spite of the dangerous and unwise language which has been used in the House by hon. gentlemen opposite. Why, Sir, the language of the learned baronet has been quoted in the American Senate against this country; the speech that he made at the beginning of the session in which he appealed to passion against the American Government, was used by Colonel Lewis a few days ago against this country in support of the Bill which has been so often mentioned here. The same violent and unwise language has been used to-day by my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). Those hon. gentlemen have been Ministers of the Crown, they are experienced men, they are Privy Counsellors, and I ask them whether, in the present emergency, they think they are doing their duty to this nation and to the British Crown. I say they are trying to create complications between two nations that I hope will live in peace and harmony for all time to come. I have just said a word of the Washington Treaty. I was much astonished when I heard the other day the eminent baronet criticising the conduct of Sir John A. Macdonald in the negotiations at Washington in 1871. My hon. friend the Solicitor General, in his able speech, called the attention of the House to a letter that was written on the 27th April, 1871, by Sir John A. Macdonald to Sir Charles Tupper, who was then leading in Ottawa, when Sir George Cartier was sick. The letter which Sir John Macdonald wrote to Sir Charles Tupper deserves to be quoted again:

Then it happened that Donald A. Smith mentioned to Sir Stafford Northcote and myself that it was of great importance to the North-west to secure the free navigation of the three rivers mentioned in item 8. He says that the use of the Yukon is absolutely indispensable. That already American vessels from San Francisco carry goods via the Yukon into our country at rates much cheaper than they can be conveyed by any other route. The Stikine River, he says, goes through a gold country, and its navigation is also of importance. The Porcupine is a branch of the Yukon. As the Americans contended for the general principle, they were obliged to consent with respect to these three rivers.

Sir John Macdonald wrote those words to Sir Charles Tupper, and the eminent baronet, the other day, found fault with the manner in which Sir John conducted the negotiations. He added: Let us say nothing about it, for Sir John Macdonald is dead. But the eminent baronet who leads the Opposition is not dead, and it was to him that Sir John Macdonald, on 27th April, 1871, wrote those words. The Treaty of Washington was signed on 8th May. Sir John Macdonald was deeply engaged in conducting these negotiations; he had to make a very hard struggle against the Americans, and I may also say, against the English negotiators, and he was asking the advice of his Cabinet. The eminent baronet was his adviser here, with his other colleagues, and it appears that they never read the Treaty of 1825. If there was any blame attachable to any one for the sacrifice of our interests then made in Washington, the blame and responsibility must rest on the Government of that day. The question, however, is as to whether we possess the free navigation of the Stikine River. The English language is a very clear one, and the Treaty of Washington is couched in very clear and unmistakable terms. It gives Canada the free navigation of the Stikine, subject to the regulations of the United States Government. Free navigation, if it means anything, means what was described yesterday by the right hon. Prime Minister—the right of transshipment. On this point I do not believe there can be any doubt or dispute whatever. But even if the Washington Treaty did not give us the right of transshipment at Fort Wrangel, we would still occupy a good position. When the Minister of Agriculture stated in the House his opinion, that boats could be constructed that could carry passengers and freight from Victoria to Glenora, he was ridiculed and told that he did not know what he was saying. The fact that at this very moment there are three boats under construction at Toronto for the purpose of carrying passengers and freight from Victoria or Port Simpson into the Stikine River, is the best evidence of its feasibility. That river can give passage to boats drawing between three and four feet at low water mark, and I repeat, that the best argument in favour of the practicability of this scheme is the fact that these boats are being built. But I do not think our American friends will deny us the right of transshipment at Fort Wrangel. It is situated seven miles from the mouth of the Stikine River, and is undoubtedly the best place for transshipment. But suppose we had some difficulty with our American friends and we could not agree with their regulations, we would then fall back on Port Simpson, where we could transship to advantage. As a matter of fact, the Hudson's Bay Company's boats have been transshipping for years at Port Simpson for navigating into the Stikine River.

Mr. WALLACE. Have they carried passengers?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Certainly; there was no reason why they should not. At this moment the officers of my department are organizing an expedition which will go by boat from Port Simpson, the boat drawing over three feet of water. It will start from Victoria and go right up the Stikine River. I have in my desk a report from one of my officers to that effect. There is no doubt that vessels drawing three or four feet of water can carry passengers.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the hon. gentleman mean, when crossing the ocean ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman must not forget that from Port Simpson to the mouth of the Stikine there are only 40 or 50 miles of open sea.

Mr. WALLACE. Sixty miles.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Let us say 60 miles. I grant that, in a big storm, a vessel drawing three or four feet would not be as safe as a vessel drawing 20 feet. But for all practical purposes, if we are denied our rights to tranship at Fort Wrangel, Port Simpson will still remain as a good place for transhipment.

A great deal has been said during this debate about an offer made on 14th February by a gentleman called Mr. Hamilton Smith. I happened to meet that gentleman, and in my presence, and in the presence of several of my colleagues, he stated that, before coming to Ottawa, he had had several interviews with Ministers at Washington, and especially with Mr. Gage. He came here from Washington and spent a few days in Ottawa, and during those days he made the offer we know of, after having communicated it to the hon. gentlemen opposite. That offer was made in co-operation with hon. gentlemen opposite. It was communicated to them ; it was communicated at the same time, it is quite evident, to the American Senate. He and his associates deliberately played the game of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I am sorry to say that hon. gentlemen opposite have to-day deliberately played the game of Mr. Hamilton Smith and thirty-four American senators who sympathize with him. These gentlemen opposite have now been obstructing this measure for two weeks, and yesterday our hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope) told us they were only beginning to discuss it. Well, let these hon. gentlemen understand once for all, that we can stand that kind of business just as well as they can. Let these hon. gentlemen discuss it to suit themselves and prolong the discussion as they like ; we will stand the racket. Sir, this scheme will go through, and it will go through because the Canadian people will insist on it. It is a national scheme ; it is essentially a Canadian scheme ; a Canadian scheme against the efforts of our friends in the United States to capture the Yukon trade from us. The position is very clear. On one side the Canadian people are anxious to get the millions and millions of dollars the trade of that vast district will bring them, and on the other side are the Americans also anxious for that trade. After all, we cannot find so much fault with the American people, for if they can get the Yukon trade by legitimate means it is their right to do so ; but what is to be said and thought of hon. gentlemen opposite who are deliberately helping our American rivals to take away that commerce from us. The hon. the leader of the Opposition, when introducing the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill in 1880, uttered words to which I then listened, and which came to my mind when I heard his speech the other day. He then said :

Under the circumstances, hon. gentlemen opposite are unwise and unpatriotic in making this a battle ground of party. There was no necessity for it. I recognize, to the fullest extent, the advantage of having two great political parties grappling with each other, not on the low ground of personal or party ambition, but on a great national question on which a broad line of demarcation can be made between them, and regarding which they can do battle for great principles on which they differ. We have such a question in the National Policy, without dragging in the Pacific Railway. If we are defeated on that issue, hon. gentlemen opposite will take our places irrespective of the policy of the Pacific Railway. Having that line of demarcation between us, let us, on the great national question of the Canadian Pacific Railway, unite as a band of brothers, irrespective of old parties, show not that we are Liberals or Conservatives, but that we are Canadians, and that in every word that is uttered, whether we sit on the Treasury benches or on the Opposition side of the House, we feel we owe it to Canada, to ourselves and to our children, to do all that men can do to strengthen the hands of those who are engaged in a great national enterprise, upon the success of which the rapid progress and prosperity of our common country depends.

I ask my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) why does he not follow the advice that he gave the Opposition of that day. The construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was of great importance indeed, but in view of what is taking place now on the other side of the line, I ask that hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) if the construction of a line of communication between the Yukon and the rest of the Dominion is not of more importance. Yet, in the hope of gaining a party advantage, hon. gentlemen opposite are opposing a policy in which in the bottom of their hearts they believe. I cannot make up my mind that the hon. the leader of the Opposition especially is in earnest in the position he is taking. He has been forced to take the role he is playing to-day, and without intending to be offensive to him, I say that perhaps he is more to be pitied than blamed. When this Bill was first talked of in this House, he took a stand as a Canadian statesman, but he has been obliged to abandon it because of party exigencies. There was a time when the Conservative party claimed, nay, proudly boasted, that they were essentially the party of progress, the party of devotion to Canadian industries, the party of devotion to Canadian commerce, and the party of devotion to British rule on this continent. It was on this ground that for over twenty-five years they appealed to the electorate—I may say “we” appealed, because I was then with them—for their support and their suffrages. They succeeded in creating on the public mind of Canada the impression that the Liberal party was composed of timid men, of unprogressive men, of men incapable of grappling with great and broad questions. In his last appeal to the Canadian people in 1891, Sir John Macdonald propounded this very idea, that the Liberal party had never been able to grapple with big questions. To-day, I ask the country to judge the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite in the light of the teachings of Sir John A. Macdonald. The leader of the Conservative party, in the statement I read a moment ago, set forth that in a great emergency it was necessary to build the Canadian Pacific Railway in order to secure to the British Crown and to Canada the vast territories of the west. The position is the same to-day. We have to keep secure for the Canadian people that vast district of the Yukon, and our friends on the other side of the House, instead of assisting us, instead of uniting like a band of brothers, to use the words of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), these hon. gentlemen opposite are simply engaged in the unpatriotic work of helping our opponents and our rivals. It is no use detaining the House very much longer on this question, but I may be permitted to say a word or two in answer to a few points raised by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). He has accused my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior with having been simply rolled over by the American statesmen, with having been deceived all along, and he cited in support of what he said the fact that my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) had gone to Washington and made customs arrangements. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) said: How is it you telegraphed at such a date that arrangements were made, when those arrangements were not carried out until some time after.

A man who has been a Minister, who has occupied a responsible position, knows right well that in dealings between nations some little difficulty may arise without anybody being chargeable with bad faith. Those arrangements which the hon. Minister of the Interior concluded have been carried out since, and they are working very well indeed. Then, Sir, he asked, over and over again, by whom the contract was drawn? Had the contract been drawn by such and such gentlemen? Well, the Government of this country is to-day in the hands of Ministers who are trying to do their work themselves, as much as they can.

Mr. TARTE.

That contract has been drawn by this Government, and every member of this Government is responsible for it. My hon. friend has called attention, over and over again, to the fact that the contract was not signed by the Minister of Railways and Canals. The arrangement had been concluded, the whole thing was over, when the Minister of Railways and Canals was obliged to absent himself, and the day that contract had to be signed he was not here. That is all there is in that. As I said, there is not much more to be said. This scheme will be carried through; let my hon. friends make up their minds to that; they may speak just as long as they please. My hon. friend from Pictou in his speech described the anxiety of a poor fellow of a cock that was afraid to be eaten. Well, I can assure him that the Government cock is all right; it will not be eaten up. Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for the kind attention it has given me.

Mr. BERGERON. Mr. Speaker, when the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) rose to answer the very able argument of my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), I thought that after having listened for two days to the arguments of two very able lawyers, the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) and the hon. member for Pictou, we might learn something more in the line of practical men from the Minister of Public Works. I must say, with all deference to the hon. gentleman—and I hope he will take it in good part—that I was disappointed. He has not convinced myself, nor will he convince the people outside of this House, who are, I am sure, just as much interested in this discussion as we are, when they read his speech. The hon. gentleman commenced by expressing his surprise that the chief of the Opposition in this House and those who surround him should have asked the Government, especially since we have heard from Washington, to abandon the scheme which is now before Parliament. Mr. Speaker, it would not be something extraordinary for the Government to abandon this scheme if they were convinced that in abandoning it they would be serving the best interests of this country. It would not be surprising, because they have already commenced by abandoning some very important parts of the scheme. They have, by the mouths of three of their Ministers, very materially altered some of its provisions. For instance, they have abandoned the system of laying out the blocks of land which the measure contained at the commencement; later on they declared that the directors of the company would be all British subjects, a provision that was not in the Bill as brought down; and last night the hon. Solicitor General declared that the company would be bound to operate the railway after it was built. These are three very important alterations; and most of them were made before the action taken by the American Senate, which, to my mind, as has been contended on this side of the House—and the contention has not been answered on the other side—is a reason for abandoning the whole project. The hon. Minister of Public Works read something from the book written by Mr. Pope on Sir John A. Macdonald about the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the hon. gentleman, who was at that time a very good Conservative, declared that the scheme which is now before Parliament is similar to the Canadian Pacific Railway contract of 1881. Why, Sir, it is not similar; very far from it. The Canadian Pacific Railway scheme had been before the people of Canada for many years. It had been tried by the Conservative Government before 1872; it had been tried by Mr. Mackenzie during all the time he was in power, by means of the water stretches and by other experiments which failed; and when the people of this country placed their destinies in the hands of Sir John Macdonald in 1878, one of the first things he had to do was to provide for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in order to keep faith with British Columbia. But what we have before us to-day is not like that. A year ago who heard of the Yukon or the Klondike with all its riches? What we complain of to-day is that the Government have done a thing which, if it had been done by a Conservative Government, would have kept hon. gentlemen here talking for six months; that is, they have given one of the hugest contracts ever given in this country, about ten days before the opening of Parliament, and without calling for tenders; and the reason they give for this, which might be accepted outside of this House, is that it was necessary that the railway should be built as soon as possible. Will it be built soon? And just here let me say—and I call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to this—if the Ministers who are sitting to-day on the Government benches, instead of promenading last summer, as most of them did, everywhere about this country and some of them in Europe, had sat down at their tables and examined the reports of Mr. Ogilvie and prepared to ask for tenders for the building of a railway to the Yukon, the people of this country would be in a position to examine in a more cognizant way the scheme that has been put before this House. The Government have also sent broadcast throughout Canada the statement that they were building a railway entirely on Canadian territory. Do we find that to-day? No; and this is one of the reasons why we say this scheme should be abandoned, and abandoned as soon as possible. As the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) said, and as the amendment of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) declares, we are ready to aid in every possible way, so long as it will be for the best interests of this country, in the building of a railway for the development of the Yukon country; but when the hon. Minister of Public Works compares this scheme to that for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, he forgets one thing.

The men whom he supported at that time have not changed, but he has changed; and I wish to remind him that the gentlemen who are sitting around him to-day had not, in those days, the opinion of his former leaders which the hon. gentleman has expressed to-night. They opposed in every possible way the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Just let me quote a few words then said by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the House, and in whom my hon. friends has now so much confidence. The right hon. gentleman, who has been styled the silver-tongued orator, has had his speeches published in a book. This is the due of great speakers, and it is sometimes dangerous to them afterwards, but of course those who enjoy the glory must stand the consequences. The question was the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway along the north shore of Lake Superior, and this was the language used by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the House, with regard to the enterprise which my hon. friend still believes, despite his present associates, was a patriotic work, and the work of patriotic men:

Would it not be better, under those circumstances, to bring the road immediately to Sault Ste. Marie, tap the American system of railways, and secure not merely the trade of our own North-west, but a large share of the traffic from those states. This is so evident from a geographical point of view, that I will not stay to discuss it. There are two policies before the House at the present moment. The policy of the Government is: That the road should be constructed at once to the north shore of Lake Superior. What would be the consequences of carrying out that policy? There would be no communication with that road with the eastern railways for ten years to come; and although we may secure the incipient trade of our own territories we would lose the traffic from the north-western states of the Union. The other policy would be to bring the line at once to Sault Ste. Marie, thus securing us immediate connection, not only with the North-west, but with the American railways.

The right hon. gentleman always had a great inclination for American railways and American connections.

Can any one hesitate for a moment in the presence of that policy? What reason can be urged for the adoption of the route along the north shore of Lake Superior?

At that time the hon. Minister of Public Works did not credit the right hon. First Minister with the broad ideas for which he commends him now.

Though the question has thus far been discussed entirely in an unsectional spirit, I think I might well inquire which of these two policies will be of most benefit to my own province? The immediate connection of the road to Sault Ste. Marie would at once carry over the railway system of Quebec the trade of our own North-west and of the American north-western states as well—a state of things which would prove of immense and obvious benefit to the cities of Montreal and Quebec.

Those were the broad ideas which the Prime Minister then held. To-day, the Government, by the scheme before us, are squandering away most important parts of our mineral territory and giving to monopolists what properly belongs to the poor man, the placer miner, but let us see how the right hon. gentleman wanted to build the Canadian Pacific Railway at that time :

Without venturing any expression of positive opinion, it may be a question whether, if the road, instead of being built, as it is now contended it must be built, had been gradually and step by step constructed, as the necessities of the country might require, it might not have been a consideration whether it should be built by a subsidy of lands and money, or whether the Government of Canada should proclaim to the world that the needy and poor of the whole world could find free lands and free soils throughout the whole of the North-west, and that they should be enabled to obtain the best market prices for their products. Perhaps, if that system had been followed, there might in a few years have been a few less millionaires in this country, but there would have been a much greater number of happy and contented homes. But another system has been followed. Twenty-five million acres of land are to be given to this company, and are to be locked up at the option of the company. The result of that policy must be the same in the North-west as it has been in every place where we have had land companies.
