Now, I do not wish to refer to the subjects which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) has referred to, but which he has not taken the responsibility of dealing with in his Bill. The hon. gentleman says that amendments can be suggested when we get into committee which he has not put in his Bill. That would be a dangerous course of procedure for this House to follow. I would suggest that if an amendment to the Criminal Code is to be proceeded with, some hon. gentleman should take the responsibility of moving it in the form of a Bill and putting it through its various stages so that it may be properly discussed. The remarks I shall make will be confined to three suggestions covered by the hon. gentleman's Bill. The first relates to section 181 of the Code, which enacts that one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a certain term who seduces a girl between the ages of 14 and 16. The repeal of the wise provision which requires that some corroborative evidence should be given in some material particular is a proposal which, I think will not commend itself to the judgment of the House. I do not know why the hon. gentleman selected that particular section, but I remember very well that for years before this Criminal Code was passed my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) introduced a Bill containing a clause similar to this, and it was only after a great many years of agitation and argument that he succeeded in inducing the House to accept the principle of his Bill. But when the House reluctantly accepted that principle, they surrounded it and guarded it with this among other precautions to the public, that is that the person accused of the crime should not be incontinently convicted unless there was some corroborative evidence. That was the guard that the House in its wisdom thought fit to throw around the accused. And, for one, unless there is strong evidence that it has worked badly, I would be very loath to remove that protection from the statute-books.

The second suggestion is that in certain cases where there has been a conviction and the courts refuses to reserve a case for the Court of Appeal the party may move the Court of Appeal for leave to have a case reserved. The present law provides that he shall not so move the court where the judge refuses him leave, unless the Attorney General gives his consent in writing. My experience in criminal cases is that it is a very wise provision that, if the judge refuses to appeal or to move for appeal, the party asking for leave shall not have a right to move unless the Attorney General of the province consents in writing to the motion. And the reason is this: We know that in the United States the criminal law has become a perfect farce, in very many cases by reason of the frequent appeals which criminals can take as of right from court to court until, by lapse of time and death of witnesses there is not sufficient evidence to convict the parties. If a man is convicted after fair trial in a British court of justice, and the judge says: Your case is so absolutely clear that I will not reserve a case for the appeal court, if he seeks to appeal, he should get the consent of the Attorney General.

The last suggestion of the hon. gentleman is as to section 748, and provides that the Minister of Justice, if he entertains a doubt whether a person has been improperly convicted of a capital offence may allow a new trial. The only case that has arisen under this section is the Sternaman case. For obvious reasons, I will not discuss that case. It is now sub judice, and I hope that no hon. gentleman will give expression to any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of this woman. She will be tried according to British rules and before a jury of twelve of her peers, before a British judge, and according to the evidence, and I would deprecate any expression of opinion as to her guilt or innocence. But I would say that the suggestion of my hon. friend who moved this Bill that the Minister of Justice may be moved by political considerations is not a very weighty objection. I agree with the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) that the Minister of Justice when exercising the great and grave responsibility which this section casts upon him very soon sets aside any political considerations. When a matter of life or death hangs upon their judgment or determination, they have the same responsibility as a judge sitting upon the bench. I know, in this case, the Minister of Justice gave the most continued and careful consideration to all the facts before he exercised his judgment. I think the clause sought to be repealed is a good one, because there are cases known to hon. gentlemen frequently, whereby, when convictions are obtained and the death sentence passed, the Crown must either exercise its prerogative and commute a sentence to imprisonment for life or let the death penalty be enforced, and they have no power of determining or sending the case back for a new trial. Now, in a matter of pounds, shillings and pence, where three or four thousand dollars, or any other amount, is at stake, we make provision constantly that there should be new trials, that there shall not be a miscarriage of justice. Look at the case of Mrs. Maybrick in England to-day. There are many people of the highest judicial standing, amongst them the Lord Chief Justice of England, who have avowed their belief in that woman's innocence, but there is no power in the English Act, as there is in our Act, if grave doubts are expressed, as they have been expressed by the Lord Chief Justice, as to the proper conviction of that woman—there is no power to send her back for a new trial, and the Crown is left in this position, that it must either release the woman altogether or let her remain there for life. Therefore, I think we have not had that experience under section 748 of the code, which would justify us, at this stage, in repealing it. I am certain that the one case to which my hon. friend refers, instead of being an argument in his favour, is one very strongly against him. I am glad to see that his main object is established, the laudable one of bringing what he considers to be grave defects in the Criminal Code to the notice of the House of Commons and to the Department of Justice. He does not ask the House to take up any more time than the hon. members who are interested in the Criminal Code think absolutely necessary for its discussion. For my part, if he will accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), I think the circumstances of the case will be well met, and I need not say to him, that his remarks and his Bill will have very careful consideration by the Department of Justice.

Mr. BRITTON. I do not think the hon. gentlemen who have spoken have dealt quite fairly with the argument first presented in favour of this clause. Of course, if the Minister of Marine and Fisheries intimates that it cannot go any further, I must accept that intimation. But I must say to the Minister who is leading the House now—and I see the Minister of Justice is within hearing distance, and will hear what I say—that I have discussed the matter, in part, with the Minister of Justice and expected to discuss the whole question at greater length before the Bill will reach the other House, and I have also discussed it with the Solicitor General. I have brought it up to-night because it seemed to be the only opportunity I would have of getting it considered by the House during this session. I think there certainly ought to be, on the lines I have indicated, some Bill introduced this session to make some changes in the Criminal Code, some change apart from all these that are now before the House in the different Bills that have been introduced. However, I leave it for the Department of Justice to say, whether they are going to present a Bill that will embrace all these matters and cure these defects, during this session. Now, a word or two with reference to my own Bill. I am asked why I selected section 181. I selected it because it is the only section to which the argument applies, for the reasons that I give. If the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will look at sections 188 and 189, he will see that there is no more reason in the world why there should be any corroborative evidence in regard to that than in regard to any other offence that is committed. These persons who are named in section 189, are persons who cannot give evidence themselves, and therefore, although a man of perfect veracity came forward and swore positively to an offence under this section, under our law as it now stands, the accused could not be convicted unless somebody else swore to the same thing, or could give some corroborative evidence against the accused. There is an absurdity on the face of it, and that has not been dealt with by any hon. gentleman. I do not think this case occurs often, and very likely no great harm will be done by leaving the section unamended. But if such a case should arise in the community, there can be no conviction unless there happen to be two persons to testify to the fact, as the offence cannot be testified to by the person upon whom it is committed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Any material evidence implicating the accused.

Mr. BRITTON. Yes, but it must be material evidence, corroborating the evidence of some one witness. There is no such requirement with regard to nine-tenths of the criminal cases that come before the courts. If, therefore, the person upon whom the offence is committed, cannot be a witness, then, I say, there is no reason why corroboration of an independent witness should be required. But why did I select section 181? Because that refers to the age of unprotected girls. These girls go out from their home into service, and if the offences are committed at all, they are committed in many cases where, perhaps, there is no doubt whatever about the commission of the offence, but the law cannot be complied with unless there is corroborative evidence implicating the accused. These are the words of the statute that I object to, and it is only as to that class of cases that I am asking to have an amendment made. Section 181 applies simply to a statutory age prescribed; the law prescribes that age. There is a Bill before the House asking that that age be increased. I am not asking for that, but the age is fixed by statute. At that age, girls are sent out from home into the service of strangers, and in an unprotected condition the offence is committed against them. It is not an imaginary case at all; it is a case that has actually arisen, where nobody in court doubted for a moment the statement that was made by the girl, but because there is no corroborative evidence, the guilty person escapes. Now, as to the next section, in regard to appeal, the hon. gentleman has misapprehended it altogether. This section applies to a case where the judge refuses to reserve a case. Before the accused can get his case before the Court of Appeal, as the law now stands, he has got to do two things. First, he has to get the consent, in writing, of the Attorney General; then he has to get leave of the court to appeal. Surely, there is no need for getting the leave of the court to appeal, if he has the consent, in writing, of the Attorney General. Neither is it necessary that he should have the leave of the Attorney General, if he has the leave of the court. As to the other section, nobody is objecting to new trials, but I do object to a Minister of Justice granting new trials. If a new trial is to be granted, let the accused person have a right of appeal; let it be argued in every way before the courts, and let the courts decide whether there shall be an appeal or not.

Under the circumstances, where the matter has not been fully argued and considered, either because it was feebly put or for some other reason, I would be glad if the Bill were allowed to stand. If, however, the Government cannot permit it to go further, I must accept the intimation; but I must say that if the Government do not think proper to take up a Bill remedying defects which it is absolutely necessary should be removed, I must bring in another Bill.

Amendment (Mr. Cameron) six months' hoist, agreed to.

PUNISHMENT OF SEDUCTION AND ABDUCTION.

Mr. CHARLTON moved second reading of Bill (No. 3) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, so as to make more effectual provision for the punishment of seduction and abduction. He said: I overheard a remark made on this side of the House that this is the old story. It comes from an eminent authority. There is a very old story, and one older than this, concerning doing righteousness and refraining from evil, and the object of this Bill is in line with that old story. The Bill of which I now move the second reading is supplementary to a Bill that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has alluded to, which was under the consideration of the House for two or three sessions before its provisions were accepted, and which after its passage by this House was regularly passed for three or four years before it finally succeeded in securing the sanction of the Senate. That Bill provided that an age of consent should be established by law, and that the seduction of a female of previously chaste character under the age of 16 and above the age of 14 should be a misdemeanour. The law provided that under 14 years the crime should be a felony. That law has been on the Statute-book for many years. The character of the law and its operation are no longer mere theory; but it may be reasonably claimed that the law has proved to be eminently satisfactory, that its working has been satisfactory, and that it is a law which a very small proportion of the people would ask the repeal of at the present time, although it was very bitterly opposed when first introduced and discussed. This Bill proposes in its first section to extend the age of consent from 16 to 18. I imagine there can be no doubt of the truth of the assertion that if it is proper to protect a young girl of the age of 16, it is not improper to protect a young girl up to the age of 18. It will be found on examining the statutes of the various states and countries which have dealt with this question, that in many cases the law throws its shield of protection around the girl up to 18 years. The Bill asks that the protection in this respect should be extended to that age. We had last session a deluge of petitions asking for this amendment to the Criminal Code. These petitions have not been placed before the House to the same extent during the present session, but there were hundreds last year, and the character of the petitions and the sources from which they came clearly proved that the feeling in favour of the age of consent being raised to 18 years is very widespread, if not universal.

1. Section 181 of the Criminal Code, 1892, is hereby amended by substituting the word "eighteen" for the word "sixteen" in the fifth line thereof.

Section 181 of the Criminal Code is as follows:—

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to two years' imprisonment who seduces or has illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character of or above the age of fourteen years and under the age of sixteen years.

The amendment proposed is to substitute 18 instead of 16. The same provisions in respect to corroborative evidence will apply under the Bill as now apply under the existing law. The principle of the change was accepted last year by the right hon. Premier and it was accepted by the former Premier, Sir John Thompson, if I am not mistaken, and with the sanction of both of these authorities, and with the evidence that so strong a sentiment exists in the country in favour of the change, we may reasonably conclude that the change asked for in this Bill is one that will meet with public approval; and certainly I consider that it will be a change in the public interest, that it will secure in a greater degree the chastity of young females, a matter of very great importance in establishing society upon a safe basis in this or any other country.

The second section of the Bill proposes to amend section 182 of the Criminal Code. That section is as follows:—

Every one above the age of twenty-one years is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who under promise of marriage seduces and has illicit connection with any unmarried female of previously chaste character and under twenty-one years of age.

The law as it now stands assumes that a male is not responsible for this crime until he is 21 years of age. I propose by this Bill to raise the age of consent to 18 years, from which time a female must care for herself, and it is proposed at the same time to make the male liable for the crime of seduction under promise of marriage from the age of 18 years. I can see no reason why a male should be exempt from accountability and punishment between 18 and 21 years. Certainly he is responsible at 18 years. The Bill, if passed, will change the age of consent by the female from 16 to 18 years, when she must care for herself; and the Bill also asks that the male shall be responsible for the Act declared criminal not from and after 21 years, but from and after the age of 18 years.

The third section of the Bill provides for an amendment to section 283 of the code, and it reads as follows:—

3. Section 283 of the said code is hereby amended by substituting the words "twenty-one" for the word "sixteen" in the fourth and last lines thereof.

Section 283, which we propose to amend, is as follows:—

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who unlawfully takes or causes to be taken any unmarried girl, being under the age of sixteen years, out of the possession and against the will of her father or mother, or of any other person having the lawful care or charge of her.

2. It is immaterial whether the girl is taken with her own consent or at her own suggestion or not.

3. It is immaterial whether or not the offender believed the girl to be of or above the age of sixteen.

This crime of abduction is certainly more serious than the crime of seduction, and the Bill provides that the abduction of a female up to the age of 21 years shall be a misdemeanour, instead of having as at present the age limit of 16 years. These are the three provisions that the Bill contemplates: The raising of the age of consent from 16 to 18 years of age, by which it will be made an indictable offence, a misdemeanour to seduce a girl of previously chaste character, between the ages of 14 or 18. The second provision is, the making of the male responsible for the crime of seduction under promise of marriage from and after the age of 18 years, holding him to be an accountable being from and after the age of 18, instead of the age of 21 years, which is the present limit. The third provision is, to make it a crime to abduct a female under the age of 21 instead of having it as at present under the age of 16. I think all these three provisions are in the interest of law, of morality and of society. The first provision, raising the age of consent to the age of 18 years, has been accepted by the right hon. the Premier last session, and was accepted I believe by Sir John Thompson on a previous occasion. I beg to commend this Bill to the favourable consideration of the House, and I now move its second reading, seconded by Mr. Scriver.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I trust my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) will not press this Bill.

Mr. CAMERON. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I take it that I have got one very energetic and active supporter at any rate. The reason I submit to the House why this Bill should not be pressed to a conclusion is in the line of the reason I advanced against the Bill introduced by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton). The criminal law as it stands in the code was not a hastily devised law; it was a law crystallized into the Statute-book after debates extending, to my own personal knowledge, over eight or ten sessions of Parliament. It was the consensus of opinion of more than one Parliament.

Mr. CHARLTON. Three.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. When we have the consensus of opinion of three Parliaments crystallized in a criminal law, I consider that it is not wise to use a familiar metaphor, to pull it up by the roots to see whether it is growing or not. I think the hon. gentleman would be well advised to leave it alone. Personally I think his Bill went a little further before than it ought to have gone, and I believe his persistency received a reward which the merits of his argument did not justify. The hon. gentleman now seeks to raise the age of consent from 16 to 18 years, but he has not given us a single argument why that should be done. He has not shown us that the present law worked unjustly; he has not shown us that there is any opinion from the judges, the attorney generals, or the criminal lawyers engaged in carrying out the present law, that it is defective. He has not shown us that there have been petitions from the public that its deficiency is recognized by them.

Mr. CHARLTON. I mentioned that hundreds were received last session.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not hear the hon. gentleman say so, and I do not remember the receipt of these petitions. I do not remember them being read in the House and I do not know that any of them came from the part of the Dominion to which I belong.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, from every province in the Dominion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not aware of any prosecution ever having taken place under that section in my part of the country. The second change which the hon. gentleman proposes to introduce is more objectionable still. The law provides now that a man at the age of 21 years, who commits one of these offences shall be liable to punishment criminally, and my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) seeks to make a boy of 18 years, who may not have left school, criminally liable for an offence of this kind. I totally object to that; I think it is a mistake and not a movement in the right direction. You cannot argue these things out logically; there must be an arbitrary age accepted somewhere; you cannot prove to a demonstration that the age of 21 years is the exact age that should be accepted and must logically under all circumstances be the true one, but it is the age generally accepted as the legal age, when a man assumes his full manhood and must be held responsible for all his acts. To say that a boy of 18 years shall be liable to these tremendous punishments is a step in a direction which I for one do not propose to take. The hon. gentleman also proposes in section 283, to substitute 21 years for 16. He wishes to provide that any one who abducts a girl under 21 years, whether, mind you, he has reason to believe she was 23 or 24 years, shall be liable to five years imprisonment. Well, I think that is going a little too far, as I think my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) on reflection will admit. The law now says that it is immaterial whether the girl is taken with her own consent or at her own suggestion or not, and it is further immaterial whether or not the offender believed the girl to be of, or above the age of 16. But my hon. friend wishes to put this age at 21. The offender may have believed her to be 25, and he may have had every reason to believe her to be of that age, and she may have left the House at her own solicitation, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) says that is no excuse or palliation, and the offender is to be imprisoned for five years in the penitentiary. I submit to my hon. friend that the law is Draconian enough as it is at present; a little more so than I think it ought to be. I protest against this constant tinkering with the criminal law; unless, I grant, that my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) who has given a great deal of consideration to the subject, is able to show that there are facts and circumstances existing in Canada which demand a change in these ages. I frankly confess he has not shown that to my mind, and I think he would be well advised in leaving this matter in the hands of the Minister of Justice, who, I happen to know has been considering many points of this code of late, and will when he has had full time to consider them properly, submit the result of his deliberation to Parliament.

Mr. CHARLTON. I cannot agree with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the position he takes with regard to these changes in the criminal law which I propose, being of a drastic character, and not having received due consideration. The hon. gentleman tenders the advice that the Bill should be laid over. Now, Sir, the portion of the Bill with regard to the raising of the age of consent has been frequently discussed in the House of Commons. As I have already said it has been accepted by the Minister of Justice in a previous Administration, and by the Premier of this Dominion last session. This Bill went through its second reading last year and was referred to a committee, and the reason that further action was not taken upon it was due to the fact that the Premier left Canada to attend the Jubilee celebration, and that all legislation was allowed to stand over. Now, the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) says that I would be well advised to leave this matter alone.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I said: To leave it where it is now under the consideration of the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice has not yet had time to give that matter the consideration which it demands, and I believe it is hardly fair to press the matter now until he has had that time.

Mr. CHARLTON. If this Bill goes to the committee and the Bill, or any portion of it, receives the sanction of the committee and the sanction of the House to its third reading, it will then go to the Minister of Justice for his consideration. I do not know that I would press so strongly for the second and third sections as I would for the first. It seems to me that the crime of seduction under promise of marriage is a crime which a person of eighteen years of age ought to know is a crime under the law.

Mr. MONK. I rise to a point of order. I do not know that the hon. gentleman has a right to speak a second time on a motion for the second reading of a Bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken, because the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has moved the Order of the Day, and I do not think he has a right to reply without the general consent of the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. I had one or two reasons to urge, if the House would permit me to do so. But I suppose I cannot trespass on the forbearance of the House, if any hon. gentleman objects.

Mr. REID. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BRITTON. I do not agree with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as to the reasons why the Criminal Code should not be interfered with. I suppose any one who heard what I said a little while ago would believe that, without my repeating it. But I could give at least twenty instances in which the legislation in the code is of the most slipshod character. I quite understand how that came about, from the hon. gentleman's statement a little while ago, that it went through the committee at railroad speed. But attention can only be called to these matters as they come up, either in actual practice or by a careful study of the code itself. Among other instances, there is no provision in the code at present for collecting an estreated recognisance from a surety in another county, unless by suit on the bond. If there is any legislation of an important character that requires revision, it is the code in very many important particulars. As to the Bill before the House, I do not want it to share the same fate as mine, and if the hon. member for North Norfolk would like to speak, I would move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, a year ago, when this Bill was before the House, a small deputation waited on the Premier in reference to it, and he expressed himself favourable to the passage of the first section. I think he expressed the same opinion in the House. As to the two other sections, I think he objected seriously to them. I think there is some force in the remark of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that the promoter of this Bill should show that the Act as it is at present does not work well. I do not think that he has shown that. I do not know that he has shown that any injury has resulted from leaving the age of consent at sixteen years. I do know that petitions have been sent to this House in favour of raising the age to eighteen years. I have myself seen requests to the effect from ladies connected with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. But I think it would be well for the hon. member for North Norfolk to show that the Act as it stands at present does not work well, because no doubt there is great objection to making changes unless they are required.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would not attempt to show that the Act as it stands now does not work well. On the contrary, I would say that it works exceedingly well, so well that it is desirable to extend its provisions and embrace in its operations a larger number of young females. The Act has proved to be beneficent for females between the ages of fourteen and sixteen, and I think it would be just as beneficent for females between the ages of sixteen and eighteen. That is my answer to the hon. member for East Durham.

Mr. CLANCY. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him, by that method of arithmetical progression, where would he fix the age in the end?

Mr. CHARLTON. I would be content to leave it at eighteen years.

Mr. CRAIG. I wish to say that I do not object to increasing the age to eighteen years. I only say there is a great deal of force in the objection raised by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I am prepared to support the Bill as it stands.

Mr. CHARLTON. Those who support this kind of legislation are almost unanimously in favour of extending the age to eighteen years. We received last year hundreds of petitions, largely from the Women's Christian Temperance Union, from every province and almost from every town and village in the Dominion, asking for the extension of the age of consent from sixteen to eighteen years. In various states, where the law has been called into operation to protect the chastity of young females the age of consent has been fixed at eighteen years. This is the case in the state of New York, with over 6,000,000 inhabitants. That law has been in operation in that state for many years, and has been found to be satisfactory in its operation. If it is necessary to protect young females at all, I can see no reason why that protection should not be extended to females up to the age of eighteen years, as is done by the laws in the state of New York, and in many other states. Of course, that is a matter that has not any particular bearing on this Bill; only it shows that human experience in many states has led to the adoption of this provision. Now, I would be willing, as the hon. member for East Durham suggests, to limit the Bill to the first section. I do not know that I expected to get more, but I did expect to get that; because, as the hon. member says, the Premier of this Dominion intimated to a highly respectable delegation that waited upon him last year, that he would give his sanction to the provision raising the age of consent to eighteen years, though he did say that he doubted the propriety of granting the other features of the Bill. The same position was taken by Sir John Thompson. If this Bill is permitted to go to the committee, and the first section is, as I believe and hope it will be, sanctioned, and any objection is made to the other two sections, they could be dropped at once. The important feature of the Bill is that raising the age of consent from sixteen to eighteen years—a feature which has been before the House a number of sessions and which received the sanction of Sir John Thompson and, I believe, the sanction of Sir Oliver Mowat. It certainly has received the sanction of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Under the circumstances, I think we may fairly assume that it is proper at least to commit this Bill to the Committee of the Whole and let the committee deal with it. The committee will probably deal with it by expunging all portions except the first section raising the age of consent to eighteen, and then it will pass to the Senate, and the hon. Minister of Justice may deal with it there.

Mr. CAMERON. I think the position of the hon. member for North Norfolk is very unreasonable. He heard the opinion of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). He was told by him that the matter was now engaging the attention of the Minister of Justice, and that the Minister of Justice proposed, when he had leisure, to deal with the whole question. Surely my hon. friend cannot want any more. He wants us to take the second reading and go into Committee of the Whole. By doing that, we affirm the principle of the Bill, and I am opposed to it. Surely what the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said ought to satisfy any reasonable man and ought to satisfy the hon. member for North Norfolk. I propose to discuss the matter fully, but do not propose to do so now, because I am still in hopes that the hon. member for North Norfolk will adopt the reasonable suggestion made to him.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

FREIGHT RATES ON RAILWAYS.

Mr. REID moved second reading of Bill (No. 7) to regulate freight rates on railways. He said: We all know that in the last few years the building of railways in our great Dominion has considerably increased, and I believe the time has come when we should have some law and rule for adjusting differences that arise between shippers and railway companies more effective than what we have at present. Also in cases where railways discriminate to the injury of different sections of the country and different classes of shippers, we ought to have some means of adjustment. I have therefore introduced this Bill to meet these conditions, and in that Bill I have embodied a provision for the appointment of a railway commission. I believe that public opinion calls for the establishment of a commission which will have the power to regulate injustices and grievances of the kind I refer to, and I hope therefore that if this Bill should become law the Government will appoint men on this commission well qualified for the positions, who will be able to carry out any and all parts of this Bill, and be competent to remedy any injustice. In the matter of freight rates on railways a great deal of injustice is being done. I shall not refer to many cases, but I see in the Toronto "News" of March 23rd, that the Toronto people are now making serious complaint against the railway companies. Just to show where great wrong exists, let me point out that, according to this list of discriminations published in the "News," the rate from Montreal to Toronto on first-class freight is 42 cents per 100 pounds, while from Toronto to Montreal the rate is 50 cents per 100 pounds. Thus shipping freight west, the rate is 8 cents per 100 pounds less than what it is going east. The same thing applies to freight from Montreal to Guelph, 381 miles, from which the rates is 48 cents, while from Toronto to Upton, 381 miles, the rate is 62 cents. I could give numbers of instances of this kind to show the injustice that is being done in the matter of freight rates. From Morrisburg to Montreal, 92 miles, the rates on milk is 8 cents per four gallons, while from Alexandria to Montreal, 62 miles, the rate is 11 cents for four gallons, or 3 cents more than it is for the longer distance of 92 miles. The object of this Bill is to have all rates fixed on a reasonable and fair basis, and where injustice of this kind is done to refer the matter to the railway commission which will have power to remedy any such grievances. I have also embodied in this Bill a provision to prevent any preference being given to any particular character of freight or any particular locality. We all know that some shippers at one point may be in with a railway company in such a way that he will get a little cheaper freight and thus be able to injure other shippers in that district, either in the purchase of grain or something of that kind. When anything of the sort is done, any shipper injured will have the right to apply to this railway commission and have his grievance investigated.

I also provide by this measure that the rates of freight shall be posted up, so that any person may know what they are. At present you must go to the agent, and it is difficult at times for him to know exactly what the rates are owing to his having not much shipping perhaps at his particular station and consequently not being thoroughly informed. But if the rates are posted up, any shipper can see for himself what they are at any time. Therefore I believe it is in the interests of the public that these rates should be published open to the inspection of the whole public. When a rate is made, it must be published ten days before it goes into force, so that no advantage may be taken of the shippers who are purchasing to ship from that particular point.

I have also embodied a clause to cover cases of accident or injury, which this commission shall also have power to investigate and adjudicate upon. It is a well-known fact that railway companies now take advantage of shippers who are shipping to points where there is no competition. For instance, you can ship from Montreal to Toronto much cheaper than you can ship from Montreal to Cobourg, or from Montreal to Peterborough, or to other points where they have not a competing railway. I have a clause embodied in this Bill according to which a railway may not charge more for the short haul than its rate for the long haul. In other words, whatever rate they might quote from Montreal to Toronto, they could not exceed from Montreal to any intervening point. Then, companies will, at present, carry from Chicago to Montreal for a less rate than they will from Windsor, or London, to Montreal. I do not think that is fair. We now have the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, but it is almost impossible, it would be quite impossible, for that committee to take up all the grievances that exist, and, therefore, I believe it best to appoint a commission that would be engaged almost all the time in looking into these grievances and getting them put right. In the United States they have a law similar to this. It has been in operation for several years, and, so far as I can learn, it has given the very best of satisfaction. In the old country they have a law something similar, or, at least, a law by which grievances can be remedied. Therefore, I think the time has arrived when something of this kind should be brought in in this country. And so I hope that the House will take this Bill seriously into consideration, and, if possible, see that it becomes law during the coming session.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have not been able to go over this Bill very carefully, but I notice that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Reid) proposes to constitute what he calls an Interprovincial Commerce Commission. He has made some provision in the Bill as to salaries, but I do not observe where the money is to come from that is to pay these gentlemen. Has the hon. gentleman clearly in mind where he gets the money to pay the commission?

Mr. REID. No. They are appointed by the Government as civil servants, and their salaries would be a small item. If this court is going to be in the interest of the public, I certainly think we may leave it to the Government to provide the $6,000 to pay them.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not suggesting that $6,000 would be an exorbitant sum to pay these gentlemen; but I had some difficulty, in a hasty glance at the Bill, in discovering just where the money was coming from. My hon. friend seems to think that he ought to be able to throw the matter on the generous consideration of the Government, but unless he made some provision in his Bill, the Government itself would not be authorized to pay these officers. And if he put that provision in the Bill to enable the Government to pay, it would, unfortunately, prevent his Bill from being entertained by the House. So, we have a rather awkward dilemma to face. I understand that the hon. gentleman has given a great deal of consideration to this subject, and has matured his views in this form. I would feel, for one, like examining the Bill very carefully. I presume that, before another session of Parliament, the whole subject may receive the consideration of the Government. I hope it will be possible to do that. I apprehend that the hon. gentleman would not think of pressing the Bill further during this session, having opened the discussion and given us the benefit of his views and placed them on record in the form of this Bill. If I am able to give attention to the subject during the recess, I can avail of the suggestions contained in the Bill, and would do so very gladly.

Mr. REID. Under those circumstances, I would move for leave to withdraw the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill withdrawn.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). As it is now growing late, and we have done a good deal of work, and as I anticipate a rather heavy day to-morrow in the discussion of the Franchise Bill in committee, I would move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 1st April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE POST OFFICE ACT.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 110) to amend the Post Office Act.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It would be interesting if the hon. gentleman would explain what the provisions of this Bill are.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The first clause in the Bill provides that books for the use of the blind shall be entitled to free transmission through the mails. That suggestion has been made to me by Mr. C. F. Fraser, of Halifax, who, I understand, is connected with an institute for the blind, and the subject has also been pressed upon me by Mr. Dymond, who is the superintendent of the Blind Asylum in Brantford. These books are large and bulky and very heavy; the letters being raised so that the unfortunate blind who have lost the priceless treasure of sight may know them by the sense of touch. I have been furnished with a list of these books which are to be found in many libraries now, and I have a statement showing the cost of their transmission through the mails. In some cases the postage alone is equal to the cost of the book in ordinary type. For instance, it would cost to transmit the Bible when prepared for the blind nearly $4.80. I am sure every member of this House will approve of this suggestion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The next clause provides for the decentralization of the dead letter branch which is now centred at Ottawa. At present if a letter is put in any post office and if the writer omits to stamp it or direct it or otherwise makes it impossible for it to be delivered, it has to be sent to Ottawa to the dead letter office here. The result is often productive of inconvenience and loss to those interested in the letter. For example, a wrongly-directed or unstamped letter dropped into the post office at Victoria would have to be forwarded to Ottawa and delay and loss frequently results. I propose to ask Parliament for permission to decentralize the dead letter office to a certain extent so that this work can be done at other convenient points throughout the Dominion. That is the practice in Great Britain, and it works to advantage there, I understand.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Sections 3 and 4 of the Bill have to do with the question of postage. Section 3 proposes a reduction of the letter rate from the present rate of 3 cents to 2 cents. Section 4 proposes a partial restoration of postage upon newspapers. The suggestion in the Bill as to the rate for newspapers is half a cent a pound, to come into force in two instalments; one-quarter of a cent per pound on the 1st of January, 1899, nine months hence; and the other quarter of a cent per pound on the 1st of July, 1899. It was thought advisable to defer the coming into force of this proposition about the reimposition of postage upon newspapers so that those interested in such publications may have opportunity to make such arrangements. In connection with that matter, it is not proposed to absolutely wipe out the free transmission of newspapers which now prevails all over Canada, but to circumscribe it within ten miles of the point of publication of any newspaper. With regard to the proposition to reduce the rate upon letters, it is not proposed that that shall go into effect at once upon the passing of the Bill, but upon the issue of a proclamation to that effect. The two propositions, to reduce the rate upon letters and to impose a rate upon newspapers hang together a good deal. The question of convenience has to be considered, and whilst I believe that in the near future the expenditure and revenue of the Post Office Department will be at an equilibrium at least; at all events, with the assistance that will be afforded by this measure, yet, of course, that state of affairs is not going to be accomplished before the 1st of July next. I trust that after the clause proposing the reimposition of postage upon newspapers has been fairly in working order, we shall then have the post office a self-sustaining department.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What is the change on letter postage?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. From the present rate of 3 cents per ounce or fraction of an ounce, to 2 cents per ounce or fraction of an ounce. We substitute two cents for three cents per ounce. The present rate is three cents per ounce; that is, the domestic letter rate within the limits of Canada. While some people may perhaps object to having to pay postage on newspapers—I do not know whether it will fall upon the publishers or upon the subscribers—they will at least have the satisfaction of knowing that if the papers are bearing part or the whole of the cost of their transmission, they will be getting at the same time a much lower letter rate. At this stage it would not perhaps be advisable for me to prolong the explanations, but since my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has asked me to explain the Bill, I will say that the tonnage of newspapers carried free through the Canadian mails, since free transmission has been the law, has grown to enormous proportions, and the system has been, I think, in many respects, considerably abused. In the year 1889 the weight of newspapers carried free through the mails amounted to 9,000,000 odd pounds; in 1891 it went up to 11,000,000 pounds; and in 1897 it had grown to 16,557,490 pounds; and new papers are constantly appearing on the scene, demanding free transmission—papers of more or less importance, and many of them questionable as being newspapers at all, but yet complying with the requirements of the law, and therefore getting free transmission. The cost of the free transmission of newspapers is becoming a very serious matter for the revenues of the country. We have demands now for enormous increases in subsidies to railways, arising out of the tonnage of newspapers that are sent to us for carriage. I have in my hand a schedule showing the quantities of bags which we are called upon to furnish to newspapers from time to time, and I am sure it will be a revelation to the House to be told that two newspapers alone sent a requisition for over 3,000 bags, and another for over 2,000 bags, covering a very limited period of time.

Mr. WALLACE. What do the bags cost?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The value of a bag is $1.04½ cents. The 2,500 bags we had to supply to two newspapers a short time ago cost us in cash $2,612.50; but that is only for a portion of the year. To these same two newspapers a short time before we had to send 3,700 bags, which cost us $3,886.50. The capacity of each of these bags is eighty-six pounds; so that for these two newspapers alone, we carried free during the short time that these bags were in circulation, 318,200 pounds in the 3,700 bags and 215,000 pounds in the 2,500 bags. For these two newspapers alone, the people of Canada have paid within the last two or three months for carrying over half a million pounds weight, and for handling the papers, and distributing them all over this country. If you go down to the Ottawa post office any morning, you will find our army of letter-carriers engaged in carrying free enormous quantities of newspapers which are published in the city of Montreal, or in the city of Toronto. We have to supply bags for these papers at all points; we have to convey them, or are liable to be called upon to convey them, from the post office to the stations; we pay large sums for railway freight; we have to put on a larger staff than we otherwise would to handle them on the cars and at the points of reception when they arrive; we bring them to the post office; we sort them there; and we have an army of letter-carriers to carry them around and deliver them at the houses of the people—all at the expense of the ratepayers of Canada. All this is going on throughout this whole Dominion at this moment. I think the evil is one that requires a remedy, and therefore I take the liberty of submitting to the House the measure now in your hands. There is one other clause in the Bill, providing that the only examinations to which clerks in the post office shall be subjected for promotion shall be those connected with the work of the office.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am greatly indebted to my hon. friend for the explanation he has given of the character of this Bill. It will greatly facilitate its discussion when we come to the point, to have had this explanation, which will inform both the House and the country of the general features of the measure. I do not propose to detain the House at any length in regard to this matter; but I would draw the attention of my hon. friend at the outset to a conclusion at which I have arrived from the enormously rapid increase in the number of newspapers carried through the mails. How does the hon. gentleman account for that? I attribute it, Sir, to the anxiety of the great mass of the people of this country to obtain information. I regard the publication of newspapers as one of the most potent educational influences that the country possesses. I believe that the fact that Canada can boast to-day of having a better informed population among all classes throughout the country than almost any other country throughout the world, is attributable largely to the eagerness with which they look for the information which can only be conveyed to the great mass of the people by newspapers. I do not want to prejudge this question before we come to consider it on its merits; but I want at the outset to throw out for the consideration of the Government that the fact of this enormous increase in the circulation of the newspapers of the country is one of the most potent reasons why the dissemination of knowledge and information in reference to public questions should not be circumscribed by preventing the publication of these newspapers, if that would be the natural result. Now, Sir, I regard the movement on the part of my hon. friend and on the part of the Government as a great compliment to the position which the Liberal-Conservative party occupy to-day. A few years ago, after one or two years of Liberal administration—almost at the commencement—we had an attempt to suppress the "Hansard." Why? Because it was found that the reporting in the "Hansard" of the discussions which took place on public affairs was so detrimental to the position of the Government that they suppressed its publication, and it was only by compulsion that that suppression was removed and the reporting and publishing of the proceedings of the House was again begun. In the same way I regard this attempt at the suppression of the newspapers, and particularly the suppression of the most influential organs of public opinion, because this is a very partial measure. It strikes at the great newspapers of the country, it strikes the great organs of communication between Parliament and the people. The hon. gentleman is willing that any number of insignificant newspapers, which cannot obtain a circulation outside of ten miles from the place of publication, should go free, because he thinks they will not do any great harm. But what this measure strikes the most potent blow at is the dissemination by the press of the proceedings of this House and the discussions of public affairs. I, therefore, take this measure as an indication that the hon. gentleman wants to limit especially the circulation of the leading organs of public sentiment throughout the country and prevent their reaching the mass of the people. Why? Because he knows that the discussions of Government measures which took place in this House during the last session of Parliament, and especially during this session, are calculated to be most damaging to the party in power, and wishes to prevent, as much as possible, the reports of these discussions reaching the country. The hon. gentleman is aware of what we all know to be the case, that at this moment the people are, to a large extent, in a condition of revolt against the present Administration. That condition is due to the publication by the newspapers of the transactions of this Government in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, the Drummond Line Railway, and the Yukon Railway, and the discussions thereon. He knows that unless some means can be adopted to prevent the publication of what takes place in this House and its dissemination to the people through the leading journals in the country, which are in a position to do the work, his Government is bound to lose ground every day in public opinion. He therefore asks this House to interpose by an Act of Parliament and cut off communication between the outlying portions of the country and the leading journals of public opinion. The hon. gentlemen pay a poor compliment to the organs of their own party. They, with no unstinted hand, are doing their utmost to sustain hon. gentlemen opposite. But because, with all their efforts, they are unable to maintain the ascendancy of their party, this House is called on to cut off the avenues of communication between this Parliament and those great organs of public sentiment that spread through this country, with all the ability that both parties possess, the facts in relation to public affairs. I look upon the free dissemination of the very class of newspaper which the hon. gentleman proposes to suppress as one of the greatest educational means the country possesses. The very fact that the mails are loaded down, as they are, is evidence of the hunger of the masses for such means of informing their minds and increasing their knowledge of public affairs. I take, therefore, this measure as a great compliment which the Government are paying to the Opposition and to the press that is disseminating throughout the country the discussions that take place in this House and the animadversion of the Opposition upon the conduct and policy of the Government. Hon. gentlemen opposite find these so much to their disadvantage that they wish to suppress these newspapers. I shall not say more at present than express the hope that the hon. gentleman will pause and reconsider his Bill and not seek to prevent the dissemination by the ablest journals in the country, of discussions and facts which are of such great public interest.

Mr. ELLIS. I do not propose to enter upon a discussion of the question as to whether the law should be changed so as to impose postage on the newspapers or not, but I should like to meet one statement which the hon. Postmaster General has made. He mentioned, in support of his Bill, the cost of the bags furnished the newspapers. Well, that is an arrangement of the Post Office Department itself for the convenience of the post office clerks, because the newspaper publishers might otherwise send their papers in carts or any other form of conveyance and have them dumped right down on the post office floor. It was the Post Office Department itself which proposed, as a matter of convenience, that the newspapers should be put up in bags, which the department furnished, and furthermore, should be put up in bags ready for distribution. Those newspapers that were intended for Toronto were put up in bags labelled Toronto, and those intended for St. John, N.B., were put up in bags labelled N.B., and so on. The system was the result of an arrangement between the Post Office Department and the publishers, and, therefore, the publishers are not in any way at all responsible for the cost of the bags.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that distribution done by the publishers?

Mr. ELLIS. I understand it so. The papers are put up in bags addressed to the different places.

Mr. FOSTER. Then you are helping the post office?

Mr. CLARKE. I would ask the hon. Minister if it is his intention to provide in the Bill now before the House, and which re-imposes the rate on newspapers—that such papers shall be distributed by the letter-carriers in the municipality in which they are published? Or is it intended to continue to charge $\frac{1}{2}$ cent rate?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is not proposed to distribute by letter-carriers newspapers in the municipality where they are published. We propose to leave the law as it is in that respect.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not wish to discuss the Bill at its present stage, but I think it would be very much more convenient, when it is brought down, if the hon. gentleman would also bring down a statement of the difference in revenue which he considers the change from three cents to a two-cent rate will cause. The hon. gentleman knows that that has been the stumbling block. More than once a proposition was brought before the House, in one shape or another, to reduce postage on home letters from three to two cents, but the difficulty has always been that the reduction would inflict too great a loss on the revenue. When the United States reduced their postage, they did so on the supposition that the increase in the number of letters would make up for the deficiency in the revenue, and I think the hon. gentleman will find in his own department statements which indicate that that expectation was not carried out, and I think that in discussing this Bill the hon. gentleman should bring down the statement of what he supposes will be the loss or gain. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman believes that the re-imposition of stamps on the newspapers will make up for a great part of the deficiency which will occur from the reduction, but I think that before the Bill can be gone into and discussed intelligently, we should know exactly what the hon. gentleman expects will be the loss or gain by the proposed change.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell us that now.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will give you my views at a later date.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not the hon. gentleman's views that are wanted. He certainly cannot have taken the first step in the consideration of this Bill without making the calculation as to what he would lose by a one-third reduction of the letter postage. He must have that information before him, and it must be information that he could give.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I would prefer to discuss that point on second reading of the Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, the hon. gentleman does not wish to give full information. No information he has given, especially that wrong information with regard to the bags, can compare in importance with the information I have asked for, which is the foundation of the whole movement, that is, what the loss will be that will accrue to the country by reducing the letter postage from 3 cents to 2 cents. It is a little more difficult to find out what the gain would be upon the newspapers under the change proposed, though we could make a calculation based upon last year's circulation and tonnage of newspapers. These are not things that require investigation; the Postmaster General must have them before him, he must have them at his finger-ends, for he could not take the first step towards the framing of this Bill without investigating these points. If we are to cogitate over this Bill for a week or so, the information upon such points as these, which is a determining factor in the case, should be given to us also. I would also ask the hon. gentleman if he will have the papers and correspondence asked for with reference to the attempt to lower the foreign newspaper postage, which was granted, I think, some time ago, laid upon the Table. I should like very much to discuss these both at the same time, as they are co-related one with the other. If the hon. gentleman will lay that information on the Table of the House before he moves the second reading of his Bill, he will facilitate the discussion of it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am not aware of the House having passed the order to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) refers. I am aware that there is a motion on the Order paper for such papers.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it not passed?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am not aware of it having passed. I think it is still on the Order paper.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The request was made that it should be allowed to stand.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), as I understood him, said that the House had passed the order. I think he will find himself in error there. If that motion were before the House now, I should be obliged to say to the House that the correspondence between the Home Government and the Canadian Government on this subject is in an incomplete state, because it has to do with approaching negotiations, and at the present time it is of a confidential character.

Mr. FOSTER. I see the motion I referred to has not been passed.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I thought not. For the reason I have just given, it would not be proper to lay the correspondence between the Home Government and the Canadian Government before the House. First, we should require the sanction of the home authorities, and, second, even if they were disposed to grant it, there are matters of a confidential character in the correspondence that the hon. gentleman, I am sure, after perusing it, would not think it fair to the country to present to Parliament. With regard to the other information the hon. gentleman desires, I have not lost sight at all of the question as to how the reduction of the letter rate will affect the revenue from postage. But I will say this, that the deficit in the working of the department, at the close of the fiscal year 1896, was nearly $800,000. I expect that, before this reduction in the letter rate is asked to be brought into effect, that deficit will be wholly, or almost wholly, wiped out. Further, even if a reduction of the letter rate did not cause one single additional letter to be written, the loss to the revenue through the reduction in the letter rate would not cause a deficit equal to that for 1896. So, if the country was able to pay a deficit of nearly $800,000 a year and have the three-cent postage, it certainly could afford to pay the same with a two-cent rate, but even if the reduced rate does not increase the number of letters, the deficit will not be so great.

Mr. FOSTER. How much would it amount to?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Not as much as the figure for 1896.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) means to discuss the financial state of his department at the present moment. It would be very inconvenient to do so. I do not altogether agree with what the hon. gentleman has said, and I think I may point out to the hon. gentleman some other reasons—

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think it would be in order for the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) to go on.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I was merely answering the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock).

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) has already spoken.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has spoken three or four times.

Mr. SPEAKER. He (Mr. Mulock) answered a question at some length.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg leave to interpose there, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) did not answer the question, but went on into new matter.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I would ask the hon. gentleman as to the Berne Convention—I would not imagine that the hon. gentleman considers that he is giving an answer on that point. It is on the paper, and ought to come up for discussion in its proper place.

Mr. HUGHES. The Postmaster General, in introducing this Bill, gave, as one of his reasons for imposing postage on newspapers, the great cost of railway carriage. Now, I think I am correct in stating—at least, I make the statement subject to correction—that it makes no difference what weight of mail matter is carried under a given contract, but the railways enter into a contract to carry the mail, whatever it may be, for a certain number of years at a fixed rate per year. I would ask if that is not the case?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The rate paid to railways is, from time to time, subject to rearrangement, and I am aware that the railways have demanded a large increase in their remuneration, and I have no doubt that that is partly based on the increased tonnage in consequence of this volume of free mail matter. I may say I received a report from Mr. Sweetnam, the chief inspector, a short time ago, in which he told me that they had been called upon, before I took office, to increase the subsidy of the Grand Trunk for carrying the mail between Toronto and Montreal, being $25,000 for one car, and he attributes a large part of that increase to the increased volume of mail matter arising from the free transmission of newspapers.

Mr. INGRAM. I would ask the hon. gentleman, if there is not some difference in the rate paid to the Grand Trunk and that paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and if so, is that not a cause of complaint on the part of the railway companies now?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In 1864 there was a rate fixed, and the Grand Trunk was paid according to that rate. But, from time to time, there have been exceptions and modifications and extra allowances on this road and that, and the Grand Trunk is paid at different rates under different contracts. In one case it is so much per car mile for a baggage-car service; in another place it is so much per postal-car mile; in another case the rate is so much per mile of railway, regardless of service performed. So, there is no fixed rule. But if hon. gentlemen will look at the Estimates, they will observe an item of $5,000 for the expense of a commission to consider this whole question and endeavour to formulate a scheme upon which payments can be made.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understand the hon. Postmaster General to say that he proposed this Bill to reduce the postage on letters from 3 cents to 2 cents, and he hoped to increase the revenue by charging postage upon newspapers. Now, looking at it from the farmer's point of view, I think it is very objectionable, and I hope the hon. gentleman will see fit to withdraw his Bill here and now, for this reason. Ninety per cent of the letters that pass through the mail are written by manufacturers and business men; the average farmer does not send probably more than four letters a year, and the saving to him would be probably about 4 cents. But 90 per cent of the newspapers are supplied to the farmers of this country, so that for the 4 cents he will save on his letters he will pay an additional cost of 25 cents on his weekly or daily newspaper. It looks to me like another blow at the farmer. My hon. friend posed a few years ago as the farmer's friend, the Patron's friend; now he is giving it to him in the neck by adding postage to his newspaper. In my opinion, the farmers will look upon this as one of the most objectionable pieces of legislation that has ever been proposed to this Parliament by any Government.

Mr. CLARKE. Let me ask the Postmaster General if he intends to make any change in the rate on drop letters? Last fall a deputation waited on the Minister in the city of Toronto complaining of the system that obtains there in reference to drop letters; and I understood, having accompanied the deputation, that the Minister promised to take that matter into his consideration. I would like to know if it is the intention of the Postmaster General, in reducing the general rate of postage throughout the Dominion, to reduce the rate for drop letters in the cities from 2 to 1 cent?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There is no provision in the Bill dealing with drop letters.

Mr. CASEY. I do not intend to discuss the Bill on its first reading, with the imperfect knowledge we can have of it from a verbal statement. But I would like to call the Minister's attention to one or two matters that I have pressed on previous Postmaster Generals, and that I would like to press upon his attention. One of them is a matter which I think would aid him in obtaining the increased revenue which he wishes to get in order to permit a reduction in letter rates. I think a great development could be made in the revenue of the Post Office Department by a system of registration combined with insurance, such as, I understand, is the practice in Great Britain. No doubt, he is better posted as to the practice there than I am; but I understand it is possible in Great Britain to insure parcels and letters transmitted by mail, on a graduated payment. I am sure that if it were possible to send small parcels and money in registered letters by the post office with the same certainty with which they are sent by express companies, for example, a large profit could be made on that line of business. The securities at present given by registration are not sufficient to induce people to send anything very valuable that way, and consequently not much of that kind of business is done. Perhaps the hon. Minister has looked into this matter, if not I would suggest that he look into it as thoroughly as possible before this Bill reaches a subsequent stage, so that we may compare it with the British Bill; and I think he will find he could get a good deal of money out of that. Another point is that the present rate for registration on letters seems to me rather high in comparison with the degree of security afforded. I do not mean to say that there is a great deal of money lost in registered letters, but for all the extra trouble that is taken with them, I think 5 cents is a pretty high fee. It does not bear heavily on the business man who is sending something of moderate value through the mail, but bears very heavily on one large class of people, those who pay a monthly or frequent assessment to benefit societies, that assessment often not being more than a dollar in each case, on which the subscriber has to pay 3 cents postage and 5 cents for registration. It is a pretty large percentage on the amount of his remittance, and if he remits ten or twelve times in the course of a year, it becomes quite a heavy tax upon him. I think there is room for improvement in the direction of reducing the registration fee, and in the direction of instituting an insurance and registration system such as I have referred to.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In answer to my hon. friend's inquiry, I would say that the subject of insuring letters has received the attention of the department, but at present we do not see our way to suggesting that change. To do so would, in the first place, require the department to equip the cars with burglar-proof safes, which alone would amount to a very large sum. An estimate was made for me of the cost of such equipment, by the president of the Bankers' Association, and my recollection is that according to his estimate such an equipment would involve an expenditure of between one and two million dollars. Therefore, inasmuch as there is, as my hon. friend correctly said, an express company doing that branch of the public service to-day, I have not felt warranted in suggesting it to the House. With regard to the 5-cent registration fee, that was imposed many years ago on the advice of the then Postmaster General, the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart). At that time the House discussed the question as to whether 5 cents was too high, and the majority of the House concurred in the recommendation creating the change, when it went into effect and has continued ever since. I myself have often felt that 5 cents was too high, but I am not yet prepared with any scheme upon the subject. But I would tell my hon. friend that in regard to the class of remittances he alludes to, of a dollar or under, and involving a registration, that objection will be removed on the 1st of July, when the postal note system will go into force, and I think it would not then be necessary for letters to be registered containing anything but postal notes, they being payable to order, and payable at particular places.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INSOLVENCY LEGISLATION.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is leading the House, to a very important question that is now before Parliament; and if necessary, I will conclude with a motion, in order that I may make the few remarks that I desire to make. I refer to the Insolvency Bill introduced by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) in a very able and luminous speech, showing that that hon. gentleman has taken a great deal of trouble to grapple with that important and complicated question. But I wish particularly to draw the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who fortunately, in regard to that question, is at this moment leading the House, to what I regard as its paramount importance. I know it is a question involving a great diversity of opinion among hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. I have had occasion during a somewhat lengthened residence in England to learn how very important it is to the commercial interests of Canada that some measure of insolvency should be adopted by this Parliament that would relieve the commercial mind of Great Britain and other countries from the impression that they are under great insecurity in trading with this country on account of the risk of being subjected to most unjustifiable and improper loss. I had occasion again and again to listen with great mortification to statements made by commercial men in the great commercial metropolis of the world, pointing out the frightful injustice they had suffered, the losses they had sustained, because a few parties in Canada had obtained their property, and were enabled to divide it among their friends and others in whose hands they wished to place that property, absolutely ignoring all the claim of the persons from whom the property came. I have great reason to know that the effect of that is to place commercial transactions with Canada at a very great disadvantage, and that disadvantage could, I believe, be very easily obviated by a judicious measure in regard to insolvency. I draw the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce especially to this subject at the present moment, because one of the hon. gentleman's colleagues, Mr. Dobell, is not now present in the House or in the country. Mr. Dobell and I attended a very large and important meeting of the British Empire League, presided over by His Grace the Duke of Devonshire, during the time I was recently in London, when Mr. Dobell happened to be there at the same time.

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose, the hon. gentleman means the hon. member for Quebec.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg pardon for naming him—I mean the hon. member for Quebec West; but it was in his capacity as Mr. Dobell that he was acting with me on that occasion. At that meeting the hon. gentleman seconded a resolution which was moved by myself, pledging ourselves to press on the Government of Canada the great importance of the introduction and passage of a measure through this Parliament in respect to the question of insolvency; and, having undertaken that duty, and in the absence of the hon. gentleman who acted in London with me at that time, I wish to take this opportunity of redeeming that pledge by pressing on the Government what I regard as the great importance of this measure, a measure that hon. gentlemen know perfectly well, however ably it may be handled by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin), and notwithstanding the great time and care he has bestowed on the subject, it is impossible to hope can pass this House in the hands of a private member during the present session. I, therefore, rise for the purpose of pressing on hon. gentlemen what I regard as a duty we owe to the House and the country, to place that measure, so ably introduced by the hon. member for Laval, upon Government Orders on the Order paper, and take the responsibility of affording it an opportunity of receiving that full and complete consideration at the hands of the House that otherwise hon. gentlemen opposite know perfectly well it cannot hope to receive when in the hands of a private member. I think that too much importance cannot be attached to this subject. I believe hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, diverse as their opinions may be, entertaining, as they no doubt do, different opinions, as do hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House—I believe both sides of the House would be disposed to approach this subject with a sincere desire to see if some practicable measure may be arrived at and adopted which will place the commercial position of Canada in respect to its trading with other countries on a greatly improved footing, as compared with that which it occupies today. I do not wish to detain the House, but I take this opportunity of pressing on the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his colleagues the great importance attaching to the measure, and that the Government should adopt the only means by which a full discussion may be had, and sincere efforts made to reach a measure that will prove greatly to the advantage of this country and redound, I think, to the credit of this Parliament. I am quite aware that the right hon. First Minister, when he spoke on this subject at the time the Bill was introduced, referred to the fact that the insolvency measure that passed this House was introduced by a private member. That is quite true; but it is also quite true that the private member, Mr. Abbott, afterwards Sir John Abbott, was a gentleman recognized on both sides of the House as perhaps better able to deal with that question than any other hon. gentleman on either side of the House. I conclude by expressing the hope that this measure, to which too much importance cannot be attached, will receive full consideration at the hands of the Government.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I am not at all disposed to underestimate the importance of passing such a measure as is proposed. But the hon. gentleman and I know that, of all the questions which can be discussed in this House, the question of insolvency is the one on which hon. gentlemen of the legal profession and other hon. members are most divided in opinion; and he knows also this, that it is of very great importance, if we are to have an insolvency law over the whole Dominion, that it should be most fully and carefully considered. At the present time, the hon. member who has taken charge of it, and who, I believe, stands in the very foremost rank in his profession in the province of Quebec, has done a great public service in bringing the matter to the attention of the House and the public. But I am afraid I cannot go the length of promising that the Government will take this Bill under their charge as a public measure. Had it been possible for them to have done so, they would have done it in the first instance. Moreover, although it is perfectly true that very considerable abuses in the administration of the law regarding insolvency, or regarding the distribution of assets, in certain of the provinces, have been reported, I am given to understand that the worst of those cases, at all events, is now being remedied. In the various deputations which have waited on the Government on this most important question, so far as I can recollect, it was admitted that the laws in the principal provinces, namely, in the province of Ontario, and in the province of Quebec, where, on the whole, fair and reasonable, particularly in the province of Quebec; and the hon. gentleman probably knows that was true, though perhaps not to the same extent, as regards Ontario. The province in regard to which most objection was taken was the province of Nova Scotia, and I am informed by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) that at the present moment an Act has been passed by the legislature of Nova Scotia, or is in the process of being passed, which, it is believed, will largely remove the abuses that have prevailed in the administration of the law there. All I can say is, that we desire, as much as the hon. gentleman can desire, that the insolvency laws of the various provinces should be such as to afford full redress to all creditors, whether they be English or Canadian, or the people of any other nationality; but we do not think that it is in our power, particularly at this stage of the session, to undertake to press this as a Government measure.

Mr. FLINT. From the remarks made by the right hon. Premier, when the Bill was introduced, we were encouraged to believe it was possible that the Government might at a later stage move to place the Bill on Government Orders. I am sufficiently in the confidence of my hon. friend (Mr. Fortin) to say that when the Bill comes before the House he will ask for a special committee to consider the phases of this Bill, and thus have it submitted to Parliament with the endorsement of the members from both sides of the House who will form that committee. This, together with the friendly action of the Administration, will give the Bill a standing which I trust may lead to its being passed before the close of the session. There can be no doubt as to the strength of the argument offered by the leader of the Opposition on behalf of the adoption of a reasonable insolvency measure, because we know that the credit of individuals or the credit of the country is likely to suffer from the want of a uniform insolvency law. I trust that at a later stage the House may feel in a mood to take this question up on a non-partisan basis, and to put it through as a commercial measure. There is no doubt of the great importance of this Bill, and from what I have heard from my colleagues in this House I believe there is a strong disposition in favour of some measure of this kind.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ADJOURNMENT FOR EASTER.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). In reply to the question put to me by the hon. leader of the Opposition yesterday, I will state that I propose to give notice that when the House adjourns on Wednesday night it stands adjourned until Tuesday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Wednesday night at 6 o'clock ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Well, no ; whenever the House adjourns on Wednesday.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw attention to something which I see in "Hansard" of March 30th. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), speaking on that occasion, says :

Now, my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), when he made his maiden speech in this House, referred to the promises that had been made by the Liberal party. I have here the words of his speech, which will be found in "Hansard" in the debate on the Address. He, relying on such promises, did not think it necessary to support my contention in regard to implements, because he said :

If it is the intention of the Government to place agricultural implements on the free list and to meet the desire of the farmers of the North-west Territories, and carry out the promises made by the Liberal candidates, and by the supporters of the Liberal candidates in the North-west Territories, why delay it ? Can any reason be given for delaying ?

Now, Mr. Speaker, what I did say on that occasion, as reported in "Hansard," is as follows :—

Mr. Speaker, I will tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), and I will tell the House, that there is no feeling of disappointment in the constituency that I represent, at any rate—and it contains a great many more votes than the constituency of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) represents—there is no feeling of disappointment at the Address which has been delivered from the Throne. The election which was carried in my constituency for the Government was not carried by any promises made by the leader of this Government in regard to a reduction of the duty on agricultural implements.

I called the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) to the fact that he attributed to me words and sentiments which I had not used, which were not reported in "Hansard," and which evidently were the words and sentiments of some one else. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) instead of making the matter right at the time, threw out an insinuation that I find further on in his speech, to the effect that I had not stated a fact. It is only fair to myself that I should make this explanation.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) is quite mistaken in saying that I suggested he did not state a fact. What I did do was to send at once to the Library for the "Hansard" in order to see what he said, and I told my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) afterwards, that I quoted from the Medicine Hat "News" which attributed these words to my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver). I probably ought to have verified whether the Medicine Hat "News" had quoted him as he is reported in "Hansard," and I now find on referring to "Hansard," that my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) is quite right and that the Medicine Hat "News" did not represent him correctly. But, I think my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) is quite mistaken in supposing that I suggested he in any way varied from the fact ; on the contrary, I sent at once for "Hansard," and if we had spoken longer than 6 o'clock I would have set the matter right, as I intend to do when the subject comes next before the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, may I quote from "Hansard" what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) said ?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) having made his personal explanation, it seems to me he stands in a very good position now.

THE FRANCHISE ACT

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. KAULBACH. For the want of a certain newspaper which I was unable to obtain before the second reading of this Bill, but which I obtained since, I will ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I offer some few words of comment.

To my mind this Bill is a very important one, not that it purports much good, but on the contrary it is liable to much evil, and therefore I beg to state that whilst I object to the Dominion Franchise Act of 1885, owing to its being cumbersome and expensive in its operation, still I consider we are not in any sense improving our condition by the present intended enactment, inasmuch as we are not placing ourselves in that independent and dignified position we are entitled to possess, neither are we placing ourselves in the position we justly merit—the principles of the Bill being unwise from the fact of its intending to have our rights of franchise surrendered to the dictates of the respective provinces of this Dominion, as subordinate bodies, they to determine the description of franchise best suited for us, which to my mind is so unnatural. Besides one province adopting universal suffrage, another manhood suffrage, another open voting, and another a something else, to say nothing of the iniquity liable to be practiced in the preparation of the voters' list appears to me to be lacking uniformity, is impracticable and unjust.

Permit me to state that were the Government to submit a Bill allowing us a franchise that is uniform from the Atlantic to the Pacific, on a broad national basis; strong with federal and national sentiment, that would be giving the greatest benefit to the greatest numbers, and giving at the same time the least expense to the people, it would meet as I verily believe with the approval of both sides of this House, as it would be within our control, and would be acceptable to the people of the Dominion.

The present franchise of Nova Scotia is not satisfactory, as corruption can be practiced by assessors, and revisers, and in the making up of the voters' lists, the lists being in writing can be interfered with very considerable, of which we have had the practical proof time and again in the past recent elections, and not only in the making up of the voters' lists, but in the manipulation of ballots, and that by officers of the Crown supposed to be free from guile.

To give an example of how corruption is sometimes carried along by unscrupulous partisans in the shape of officials, I would state that we have a certain functionary in the county I have the honour to represent who possesses the happy faculty of electing or rejecting a candidate as his own sweet will may dictate. This was clearly shown in the last provincial election in Lunenburg county, N.S., in April last, when a Cabinet Minister, C. E. Church, in the Nova Scotia Government was defeated at the polls, his opponent, Mr. A. J. Wolff, a Liberal-Conservative, having had a majority over him of 17 votes, and another Liberal-Conservative, Mr. Emmanuel Hebb, a majority over him of 8 votes, but by the action of the sheriff the Cabinet Minister was returned although having the smallest number of votes at the poll, he being at the foot of the list, and nevertheless to the surprise of every one, even his own party, this very man Church occupies the important position of Commissioner of Mines for Nova Scotia at this moment, without his having the voice, nor being the choice of the people of that county.

To give the idea more clearly to the House I will read, by permission, an account of the procedure, or an extract that appeared in the "Bulletin" newspaper:

THE RECOUNT ATROCITY.

Lunenburg county's majority for Wolff is 17. Sheriff Creighton's majority for C. E. Church is 2.

Majorities by electors count for nothing nowadays, and it is a wonder the Grit machine did not procure Church a larger majority.

When the result of the election became known, the Grits said the whole thing would be fixed by a recount. Mr. Church himself plainly stated at the dinner table in a Bridgewater hotel that a recount would make him all right.

They have had a farcial apology for a recount, and, as predicted, Church was "counted in."

People of Lunenburg county, calmly consider this matter and judge for yourselves. Over 2,500 electors of this county have been robbed of their votes and their legitimate representative, for so surely as the sun shines above us, through some atrocious rascality, A. J. Wolff has been shamefully cheated out of his seat in the House of Assembly.

Here are the facts, briefly: A. J. Wolff received 17 votes more than C. E. Church. The Grits endeavoured, in the first place, to get Sheriff Creighton to declare Church elected without counting eight ballot boxes, because the poll-books were not tied on the outside of said boxes. The Conservative solicitors prevented this injustice. Then the Grits demanded a recount, and on this they vauntingly relied on electing Church. Now, no one can foretell the result of an honest recount of ballots. It is a game where one candidate has about the same chances as the other, with, perhaps, the odds in favour of the opposition man, because presiding officers at the time of election are supposed to be government partisans. The recount came off, and we are within bounds in stating that the proceedings were a travesty on an honest semi-judicial inquiry, their history would bring the blush of shame to the cheek of a Tammany Hall manipulator. The sheriff's friends may endeavour to excuse him by pleading ignorance on his part, and in a great measure we agree with the plea; but to say he was partisan in his rulings would be to faintly express the popular opinion. He was not even civil to Conservative counsel. On one occasion he told one of the lawyers representing the Conservative candidates to "shut up," at which the other Conservative lawyer sarcastically remarked, "Yes, you are only a Tory." Precedents was something Sheriff Creighton had no respect for. He would make a ruling at one time, and then at another, when it was likely to favour Mr. Church, he would disregard his previous ruling and do the reverse. He admitted ballots for Mr. Church which in all fairness and justice should have been thrown out. He threw out ballots for Mr. Wolff which, according to law, should have been counted. He threw out a ballot for Wolff which he himself received and counted whilst acting in the capacity of presiding officer at the court-house, Lunenburg. Then again, a number of ballots crossed for Hebb and Wolff were spoiled by a cross placed opposite the name of Church, and partly obliterated with a finger or thumb. (See sample in another column.) These "thumbed" ballots were a frequent occurrence, and the subject of much serious argument, and were vehemently declared by the Conservative counsel to be "cooked" ballots. Many other instances of unjust rulings and manifestly unfair actions on the part of the sheriff and his Grit legal advisers could be cited, but we think we have given the public enough for them to conclude that A. J. Wolff has been juggled out of his seat.

We ask, is it reasonable that in nearly every district Wolff should lose and Church should gain? We are of firm opinion that if Wolff's majority had been 30 he would not have got his seat in the House.

Electors of Lunenburg county, remember this outrage. Remember how you have been deprived of your votes and representative. Remember that now-a-days the only way to win an election is to roll up at least 100 majority for a Conservative candidate. Store these injustices in your memory, and when the time arrives give voice to your indignation by snowing under these election manipulators and unmanly opponents.

I will also read an episode on the same subject which will probably interest hon. gentlemen as well as be a source of amusement:

THE SPOILING OF THE EGYPTIANS.

In a certain land were two Sunday school superintendents, and the name of the one was Trusty Samuel, and the name of the other was Holy Tom.

Now these two men were lawyers, exceeding righteous above all other lawyers that dwelt in that land.

Now there was an election in that land, and afterwards a recount, and the two superintendents watched over the same after the inner ring, called Tammany, had put in their work.

Now before the commencement of the recount the one superintendent cocked his eye at the other and said, "Let us 'prey'."

And, lo, they both "preyed" earnestly for the space of three days, even from the sitting of the court unto the rising thereof.

Now Joseph was the ruler, or judge, of said court.

And it came to pass that as they "preyed," behold, the 17 majority of the man called Wolff gradually disappeared like unto the early cloud and the morning dew. And at this Joseph winked, and was exceeding glad.

And, behold, the 17 minority of the man called Church also died away, and lo, in the stead thereof a majority of 2 arose from the depths of the ballot boxes.

But the figures of "Manny" and the man called "John" changed not. And thus they spoiled the Egyptians.

And one of the Egyptians said unto Joseph, "Show us the riddle, we pray thee, and the interpretation thereof."

And Joseph smote his beard, and spat thrice upon the ground, and answered, "Ye are exceeding fresh. Behold those ballot boxes and the keys, and the remains of the seals thereof. Here are the keys, but the seals, do they last for ever?" And he winked at the two Sunday school superintendents, and the elder thereof snuffed and cocked his eye at the younger.

"Behold, I show you a mystery. Didst thou not see the many ballots of the man called Wolff, which were daubed over even as with the thumb of a man's right hand? Lo, those ballots availed Wolff as naught, and I cast them aside as the chaff for the burning. Behold, I am judge of all this land from Vogler's Cove even unto Hubbard's Cove, and from the great sea even unto Queen's.

And the Egyptian answered and said unto Joseph, "Who daubed those ballots of the man called Wolff, and why were there not any ballots of the man called Church daubed withal?"

But Joseph spat upon the ground, and answered him never a word.

And the Egyptian said unto Joseph, "Tell thy servant, I pray thee, what was the matter with the ballot of the man called Wolff, which thou and thy prophet Samuel pronounced all very good on election day and which thou didst reject in the recount? Tell thy servant, also, what became of the two ballots of the man called Wolff from the Cove called Mader's, and whence came the stray ballot for the man called Church into the box for Lily Dale?"

But Joseph stroked his beard, and answered him never a word.

And the Egyptian said unto Joseph, "What became of all the plumpers from Petite Rivière, the place of the man called John? Thy servant cannot understand this mighty change. Was it wrought by thine own great hand?"

And Joseph answered and said unto the Egyptian, "What dost thou take me for? Thinkest thou that 17 is too great a number for the judge of all this land to monkey withal? Perchance I could monkey with 50."

And the Egyptian said unto Joseph, "Where did my lord have the ballot boxes stored after the election and before the recount, and what guard did my lord have placed over the same?"

Now at this Joseph waxed exceeding wroth, and smote his beard, and spat upon the ground and said, "Go to, ask the Sunday school superintendents."

So now the Egyptian went and sought the Sunday school superintendents, and when he found them, lo, they were in the office of an ungodly Grit lawyer in the town which is called Lunenburg, and, behold, the two Sunday school superintendents were expounding the school lessons for the next Sabbath day to the members of the inner ring called Tammany.

Now this is the material in the shape of an official this county (Lunenburg) had to tolerate at the time of an election, and although obnoxious to the people, and the government are aware of it, still he is kept in office whilst honest and honourable officials without cause, except exercising the right of franchise, without taking an active part politically, have been removed from office without a hearing or cause assigned. A more diabolical act on the part of an official could not well be thought of, and if he is capable of the iniquitous act as alleged against him, as shown by this newspaper, other papers, disporting in the same way, he is equally capable of repeating such acts, perhaps something worse at any time opportunity offers and giving the lie to cover up his guilt. Where is our Minister of Justice that this matter is not investigated? On the principle that "cheating never prospers" it is to be hoped his sins some day may find him out.

An official of this sort although a convenience to a party, is at the same time hateful to the better thinking people, and I must say in all sincerity it is not honest to the electorate of the county or any country that they should be compelled to suffer such infamous procedure on the part of an official and have it receive no recognition.

I consider when an honest elector goes to the poll to deliver his vote, he should have confidence in all officials handling the ballots, and particularly the sheriff having the custody of the boxes, that his vote would be counted as legitimate and not tampered with or his ballot manipulated in any way, but that his vote would count in the recapitulation sheet when summing up the totals.

I would, therefore, as a remedy to avoid this evil recommend manhood suffrage, which I might say is practically that now, and open voting, as the present system of voting by ballot is mean and contemptible, and opens the door to all sorts of fraud, and not only that but it encourages in cases false swearing, whilst open voting is simple in its operation, the least expensive and least liable to complications.

Mr. MILLS. Before you go into committee on this Bill, I wish to make a few remarks respecting clauses Nos. 4 and 5. Clause No. 4 reads :

The Electoral Franchise Act, being chapter five of the Revised Statutes, and all Acts amending it, are hereby repealed.

The next clause provides :

For the purposes of any Dominion election held within the limits of a province, except as hereinafter or otherwise provided,—

(a.) The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote thereat shall be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

That is the clause that I have particular objection to, and I think that the Government should give this House some assurance that that portion of the Bill will be remedied, even before we go into committee. The other evening, the hon. Finance Minister brought to the notice of the House the Act of 1882, and that there was no law passed by the legislature of Nova Scotia prohibiting or disqualifying an elector from voting in the Dominion elections. On the spur of the moment, I replied that that was true, and to a certain extent it is. There was no actual law passed by the province of Nova Scotia disqualifying an elector from voting in the Dominion elections, but it is also true that the very same party machine who placed that obnoxious Act upon the local statutes of Nova Scotia put an Act upon the statutes of this Parliament providing that the same law shall affect electors in Nova Scotia voting for members to be returned to this Parliament. In order to place the matter thoroughly and clearly before the House, as I do not think it has yet been done, I shall commence from the beginning and show the House very concisely and exactly what has been done. In the first place, the British North America Act was passed in 1867 by this House. Section 41 of that Act provides :

The qualifications and disqualifications in the provinces shall govern the election of members to serve in the House of Commons until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides.

Afterwards, in 1871, assented to April 4th, 1871, an Act was passed by the province of Nova Scotia to secure the independence of the House of Assembly of that province. That Act I read the other evening, and that is the obnoxious Act, that is the Act that disqualifies Dominion officials, particularly the employees of the Intercolonial, from voting for members of the House of Assembly in the province of Nova Scotia. That was the Act passed by the Nova Scotia Government at that time, and by which they determined to wipe out from the legislature of Nova Scotia and from Nova Scotia itself anything and everything that had the smell of Canada about it. I am now quoting from memory from the remarks of the Attorney General of that date when he introduced that Bill. On the 14th April, 1871, immediately following the passing of this obnoxious Act of Nova Scotia, there was enacted by the Dominion Parliament a Bill called the Interim Parliamentary Election Act of 1871, which was put in force for two years only, as shown by section 1. I will quote the section itself. It was evidently aimed to operate against the obnoxious Act passed in Nova Scotia that very month.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What is the date of it ?

Mr. MILLS. It was assented to on the 14th April, 1871, and the Act is entitled "An Act to make temporary provision for the election of members to serve in the House of Commons of Canada." And the first section of that says :

This Act shall be in force during two years from the time of the passage thereof and no longer, and may be cited as the Interim Parliamentary Elections Act, 1871.

Section 4 of that Act reads :

All persons nominated as revisers, under chap. 28 of the Acts of the Legislature of Nova Scotia passed in the year 1863, entitled "An Act to regulate the elections of members to serve in the General Assembly," shall, in the present year, 1871, in three months after the passing of this Act, and at any future year, at the time of their preparing the annual list of electors qualified to vote at elections of members of the General Assembly, prepare also and file with the clerk of the peace, a like alphabetical list of electors qualified to vote at elections of members to serve in the House of Commons of Canada, by adding to the list of voters for members of the General Assembly the names of all officials and employees of the Dominion Government qualified to vote at elections of members of the General Assembly under the laws in force in Nova Scotia on the first day of July, 1867, but who may have been disqualified by any Act of the legislature of that province passed after the said day. The lists first made shall form the register of electors of members of the House of Commons until the next year's list shall be made and perfected, and the provisions of sections 25, 26 and 27, respectively, of the said chapter shall be held applicable to such future lists. For any neglect or wilful breach of duty under this section, the revisers shall be subject to the like penalties prescribed in section 24 of the said chapter.

That was passed by this Parliament the very month that the obnoxious Act was passed in Nova Scotia. Understand, it was only to be in force for two years, being a temporary Act. On the 23rd May, 1873, there was another Act passed by this House. That Act is entitled "An Act to make temporary provision for the election of members to serve in the House of Commons." The first section of the Act provides :

This law shall be in force during one year from the time of the passing thereof, and from then until the end of the next session, and no longer.

Section 10 of that Act re-enacts the provision made in 1871. There is no necessity to read it. This Act was assented to on the 23rd May, 1873. On the 23rd November, 1873, the Government of Alexander Mackenzie took the reins of power, and on the 22nd January, 1874, the elections took place. The next legislation with reference to this matter took place in 1874 in this Parliament. This Act is entitled "An Act respecting the election of members of the House of Commons." Section 40 of that Act reads as follows :—

Subject to the exceptions herein above contained, all persons qualified to vote at the election of representatives of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly of the several provinces composing the Dominion of Canada, and no others, shall be entitled to vote at the election of members of the House of Commons of Canada for the several electoral districts comprised within such provinces respectively, and all lists of voters made and prepared, and which would, according to the laws in force in the said several provinces, be used if the election were that of a representative or representatives to the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly of the province in which the election is held (where such lists are required to be made), shall be the lists of voters which shall be used at the elections of members of the House of Commons to be held under the provisions of this Act.

In other words, it does not bring into voting power the Dominion officials as the Act of 1873 did, but goes back to the oldest disqualification Act of 1871. Section 43 of the Act also provides for the disqualifying Act I have mentioned in the obnoxious Act of Nova Scotia of 1871 :

Each elector being introduced, one at a time for each compartment, into the room where the poll is held, shall declare his name, surname and addition, which shall be entered or recorded in the voters' list to be kept for that purpose by the poll clerk, and if the same be found on the list of electors for the polling district of such polling station, he shall receive from the deputy returning officer a ballot paper, on which such deputy returning officer shall have previously put his initials, and an envelope.

Provided that such elector, if required by the deputy returning officer, the poll clerk, one of the candidates or one of their agents, or by an elector present, shall, before receiving his ballot paper and envelope, take the oaths or oath of qualification required by the laws in force in the province where the election is held, from a voter at the election of a member of the House of Assembly of that province, the words "House of Commons of Canada" being in such case substituted for "House of Assembly" or such other change being made to make the oath applicable to the election of a member of the House of Commons of Canada, and which the deputy returning officer or poll clerk is hereby authorized to administer.

The effect of that is to incorporate into the statutes of Canada, in the Dominion Election Act of 1874, the obnoxious Act of Nova Scotia in 1871, disqualifying Dominion officials and railway employees from voting for members to be returned to this Parliament.

Now, the Finance Minister asks : Why, then, was this Act passed, referring to the Act of 1882 ? There was very good reason why it should be passed. On the spur of the moment I gave the reason which was then uppermost in the minds of everybody—the manner in which the revisers had used the lists and left off these names from the lists in Nova Scotia. But there was another reason, and that was this obnoxious Act was on the Dominion Statute-book that it was legal to prevent the railway employees and Dominion officials from voting in elections for members to be returned to this House.

Now, the next legislation which occurs is the Act of 1878, which is entitled "An Act further securing the independence of Parliament." That Act does not do away with that obnoxious disqualification, but it further endorses it, and further engrafts it into the election law of this Parliament. I refer to section 5, which I will not read, because it simply re-enacts the provisions that I have just read. The very party machine that had caused the Act to be put in the Statute-book of Nova Scotia, caused it to be engrafted into an Act of this Parliament, and made it the law of this Parliament. Therefore, there was every reason why, when a Conservative Government came into power, they should immediately pass the Act of 1882. The next Act is that of 1882, which I shall refer to. This Act is entitled "An Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons, and for other purposes." That Act was passed by the Conservative Government in 1882. The Bill was introduced into this House, as I find by referring to the Debates of that time, without any reference to this obnoxious Act disqualifying Dominion officials in Nova Scotia from not only voting at local elections in that province, but also from voting at Dominion elections in Nova Scotia. But when it went to the Senate, the Senate asserted itself—which it frequently does, I am glad to say—they saw an evil was being done in Nova Scotia, and they determined to have it remedied. So, when the Bill came back to the Commons, it came with certain amendments having reference to the province of Ontario, and one amendment having reference to the province of Nova Scotia. That amendment I will now read to the House :

Notwithstanding anything in any law of the province of Nova Scotia, or of the Dominion of Canada, no employee on the Intercolonial Railway in that province shall be disqualified to vote as an elector at any future election of a member or members to serve in the House of Commons of Canada, if he shall have the necessary property and other qualifications therefor required by law. In the event of the name of any such elector, being an employee on the Intercolonial Railway, having been omitted by the revisers from the list of qualified voters for a member of the General Assembly of Nova Scotia under the laws in force in that province or to be returned to the county clerks or clerks of the peace, or omitted from the lists of voters deposited by the sheriff with the county clerk or clerks of the peace, or obtained by the returning officer or furnished to the deputy returning officer, it shall be lawful for such employee to vote as an elector at any future election of a member or members to serve in the House of Commons of Canada, on his taking or offering to take before the sheriff or returning officer the following oath, viz. :—

I (A.B.) do swear that I am legally qualified to vote at this election, and I verily believe that my name was omitted from the list of electors by reason of my being an employee of the Dominion Government on the Intercolonial Railway at the time such list was last perfected, and for no other reason.

So, the obnoxious Act was repealed by that Act, and at the same time the iniquities of the revising officers in the different districts in Nova Scotia were provided against. It was a fact that the revisers left these men off the list when they had a perfect right to go on the list ; and then others were met by the disqualifying oath, when they came to vote. But they did actually leave them off the list, simply because the party heelers told them it was the law, that they had no vote, and what was the good of putting these men upon the list. So that the Act of 1882 was passed, not only for the purpose of righting those wrongs which were done under semblance of law, but at the same time it was passed to repeal an obnoxious Act which was upon the Dominion Statute-book. That amendment was supported in this House by the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and was spoken to in the Senate by the present Senator for Colchester, Mr. McKay, and it was advocated by both these gentlemen. The present leader of the Opposition, at that time, in advocating that amendment, did so with a speech, the gist of which I will give :

All this amendment does is to enable those who pay the amount of taxation the law requires, and whose names have been left off the electoral lists in consequence of the local Act of 1871, to exercise the franchise upon being prepared to take an oath that they have been omitted from the list in consequence of the disqualifying Acts of 1871.

The Debates show exactly what they wanted to do. The very same party machine that did not wish that even the smell of Canada should be upon the electoral lists of Nova Scotia, the same party machine that placed that law upon the books of Nova Scotia, placed that law upon the books of this Parliament. Now, we want to know whether the same party machine, which has exponents even in this House, are going to do the same thing with reference to this Bill, because this Bill has a clause which provides for the very same iniquity. I do not care whether these Dominion officials are to be ruled by the men who are their masters now in Nova Scotia, or not, but they are free men, they are men who are as well qualified to vote as the ablest man in Nova Scotia, and being to-day qualified, having the property qualification, having the qualification of age, they have just as much right to be placed upon that list, they have just as much right to vote, as the ablest and wealthiest man in Nova Scotia. Now, will some member of the Government tell us whether these exponents, of whom we have some in this House, who are determined that not even the smell of Canada shall be in Nova Scotia—are these men going still to persist in this thing, to come again before this House and persist in leaving this blot upon our legislation ? I think, before we go into committee, it is proper for some hon. gentleman to assure this House that no such disgrace will be put upon our Statute-book. Before I sit down, I wish to refer to one other matter. The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) arose in his place, the other night, and said :

Perhaps it may be so in Annapolis, but in my part of the province I never knew such ignorance to exist.

Referring to the fact that the revisers left voters off the list illegally, being ignorant of the law. I have only to refer the hon. gentleman to the Acts of Nova Scotia of 1880, 1881 and 1882. In every one of those Acts, what do we find ? We find in 1880, an "Act to legalize jury lists and panels of assessment rolls, and revising lists for the present year." The enormities of the revisers were so great that the legislature had to take cognizance of them, and in order to give them a legal status in the country, they had to pass a special Act, so that the elections could be run legally. The Act goes on to say :

Notwithstanding any omissions, errors or irregularities in the preparation of such rolls or lists, or in any of the proceedings in connection therewith.

Thereby giving the rolls as they existed in their mutilated state, in their iniquitous state, a legal existence. The Act of 1880 had to be passed, the very same Act had to be passed in 1881, the very same Act had to be passed in 1882, and still the hon. member for Antigonish comes before this House and says that he knows nothing about any of these iniquities. That may be, but other people know about them, and the legislature of Nova Scotia knows about them. I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but I feel that it is incumbent on us to understand whether this anti-Canadian element in the Cabinet is going to bud and blossom out as it has on the Statute-book of the province of Nova Scotia and in this Parliament heretofore. It did so bud and blossom out when the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was in power here. Now we see the commencement of the same budding and blossoming in this Parliament. The Bill exhibits the cloven foot Act and, to use an expression that has been bandied backwards and forward in this House, the question is whether that cloven foot Act is going to be crystallized into law. That is what we want to know.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into committee.

On section 1,

Mr. BENNETT. Since the adoption of the principle of this Bill was approved by a majority of this House, the only question now before it, as I understand, is: first, to endeavour to frame a Bill, which will, as far as possible, meet the wishes of hon. gentlemen on either side of the House, in this, that first, there will be honesty in the preparation of the election list, with a view to carrying on the elections in a proper manner; and second, the question of cost to the country. The second proposition, however, is a very minor one compared to the former, that of honesty in elections. I should have imagined from the amount of discussion that has preceded this Bill there would be to-day in the House when this Bill is going into committee some of the representatives of the Cabinet from Ontario besides the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I presume, however, the Postmaster General is whetting his appetite by dismissing a couple of country postmasters before dinner, one of his usual indulgences; and as regards the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Pater-son), the hon. Minister of Customs, I presume, after the result of the local election in North Grey the other day, the hon. gentleman is wondering where he will be able to find some place to rest the soles of his feet, after having been driven out of the riding he represented so many years and at last found a temporary abiding place in North Grey. However, I am glad the Minister of Trade and Commerce is here, for, to borrow a phrase used by that hon. gentleman during the last Parliament when referring to Ministers on the other side of the House, then the Conservative side, I admire him most of the "whole gang," because I know the hon. gentleman has a high sense of honour. I am glad also that the hon. Solicitor General is here, because I believe the Solicitor General has a high sense of honour, and I would prefer to direct my remarks to those two gentlemen, together with the Minister of Inland Revenue, whom I highly esteem and respect, because I think from those three gentlemen we will get a much fairer measure than we would obtain, if I may be allowed to use the phrase, from the rest of the gang. An hon. member mentions the name of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I might hope something from him, but not a great deal. I know that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries comes from the maritime provinces, and if all can be believed that is stated in the House as regards the manipulation of the voters' lists in those provinces one cannot help but think that those hon. gentlemen will cling to the old love, and when an opportunity is given to take a party advantage, they will take it, and with a vengeance, too. I propose to direct my remarks to the Bill with a view to obtaining something like a semblance of honesty and of justice. The Bill, as it stands to-day, has not a semblance of honesty or justice. The Bill itself and every law in the Statute-book are all right; but it is the administration of the law that always brings about its condemnation, and if I can prove to the distinguished trio to whom I particularly address myself that this Bill which is to-day before the House offers to give to party partisans every despicable and contemptible advantage, then I say a change of radical nature should be brought about. In the preparation of the old Dominion list there was this to be said, that when an elector went to the polling place on polling day he had known that his name was on the list even six months before, and he was satisfied that he had a perfect right to vote on that occasion. Hon. gentlemen know what the Dominion list was. It was a list plainly printed; the name of every voter entitled to vote was there; there was no out-scoring of names, and no interlineation of any names, and at least a month or six weeks before polling took place an elector knew that his name was on the list and that he would be given an opportunity to vote. But this Bill, if it goes into force, gives no such assurance, and no voter will know until he tenders his vote whether he will be permitted to vote, and I shall prove that conclusively from the local voters' lists. If the hon. gentleman will refer to section 6 of the Bill he will find as follows:—

obtain from the officers who are the legal custodians thereof, or of duly certified duplicates, or copies thereof, such provincial voters' lists or such certified copies thereof or extracts therefrom.

Let the hon. Solicitor General see what he obtains. There will be placed in the hands of the revising officer voters' lists furnished to him by the proper custodian. Then the voters' lists for the different divisions will be handed to the different deputies, and every hon. member knows that every deputy is chosen by reason of his party affiliations. What would be the result? I have here the list of the township of Tay. I shudder to think, when the lists have been in possession of the deputies two or three days before the elections, how many Conservative voters will be permitted to remain on the lists up to polling day. I should equally shudder to think how many names of Liberals would be written in, in that same voters' list. Let me show to you one page that happens to have 37 names written in. When this list is placed in the hands of a partisan deputy, he is not required to change it at all; he simply may permit it—as it will be in his possession for a few days—to remain down somewhere, where a party friend can come along and score out the names of several men, and the result is that these men cannot possibly vote. I know that there has been that scoring out done in connection with the provincial voters' lists, and that men have been disfranchised in consequence. And if the fight is a little more keen and bitter, something better could be done. A friendly deputy could leave his list in an easy place of access, and a partisan—a designing scoundrel, because he would be such—could write in a number of names on the list. Consequently every semblance of fair-play will disappear by the adoption of the provincial voters' lists, which hon. gentlemen opposite now propose to the House. Here is the voters' list for the township of Flos, and on page after page there are names written in. Let the House recollect that this list remains in the hands of a friendly deputy for a couple of days preceding elections; the deputy need not make the changes at all; all he has got to do is to leave the list where the changes can be made. I say that the idea of putting such a law on the Statute-books of this country is simply a scandal and an outrage on all decency; when in the province of Ontario, and I am not going to discuss the other provinces at present, no man can know until the very moment that he tenders his vote whether he is on the list or not.

But, Sir, it is not only a question of saving expense, but the greater question of all should be this wrong that could be done, on the face of an Act which affords every facility for doing wrong. We are told that it is to be borne in mind that there is going to be a great deal of expense saved to the individual candidate. I deny that statement in toto, and I say that any man who knows anything about the revision of the voters' list in the province of Ontario, will find this out to his cost. He will find that it costs a great deal more money to revise the voters' list under the local Act than it does under the Dominion Act, and I will show some proofs in support of that statement. Under the old Dominion Act the voters' lists were publicly displayed, and if you had an objection to the name of the voter as being there improperly, you simply had to notify him by registered letter and then the appeal came on before the judge at the trial. That is not at all the principle in the Ontario law. If you find the name of a voter on the local list which you think is improperly placed there, you have got to bring that man to court and pay his witness fees. I ask hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House who are not conversant with the Ontario franchise law, to hesitate before making some of these changes and to not allow this Bill to go through as it is. So far as I am concerned, and I think most gentlemen will bear me out, the revision of the voters' lists in the province of Ontario has not been fought by the Conservatives with that vigour with which the Dominion lists have been contested, because the Conservatives were at the disadvantage of being in opposition in the local legislature. But let any hon. gentleman fight the local lists in the province of Ontario with the vigour that has been bestowed on the Dominion lists, and he will find to his very bitter cost, that the expense to him under the Dominion Act was comparatively nothing as compared with the expense which such a contest would be under the local Act. The right hon. the Premier fell into the error of stating that these local lists are already prepared, that all we have to do is to take advantage of them, and that no extra cost will be entailed on any one. The right hon. gentleman was wrong in that statement, because the county judges are paid in the province of Ontario, true, not a very considerable sum, but it amounted to some $8,000 for the small number of appeals that were disposed of under the local Franchise Act. If there is that same vigour thrown into the revision of the voters' list, that has been the case with the revision of the Dominion list, that cost to the province will very materially increase. Again, let us remember that it is all rot and nonsense to state that it costs nothing to the municipality. I defy any of these gentlemen who are making these reckless statements, that there is no cost at all to the municipalities; I defy them to produce a statement from their own municipalities, and if they do, I will be bound to say that it will be shown that the cost to the municipalities will aggregate as much, if not more, than the revision of the Dominion voters' lists. In the first place it must be borne in mind that it is only once in three or four years that candidates for the Ontario legislature ever devote their time or attention to the local lists. It would be burdensome to these candidates, to year in and year out, keep the lists in a perfect condition, and the result is that for three years as a rule the local lists go without hardly a name appearing, of what is known as "manhood suffrage men." But in the fourth year a rush is made by political parties and the result is that, prepared as these lists are in Ontario, and with the attack on these lists, a large expenditure is occasioned by the municipality. The whole trouble with the Ontario Act is this: That the lists are printed first and the revision is held afterwards. That is what prevents the possibility of any honesty in the acceptance of the provincial voters' list.

Now, Sir, what is the cost to the local municipalities when these revisions take place? After the list has been prepared by the clerk, and displayed the length of time provided by the statute, then the appeals are made to the clerk and afterwards the trials are held by the county court judge. Every municipality has to bear that expense. I take the township of Tay where the expense was $67.75 on a single municipality; I take the township of Medonte where the cost was $88.68; I take the town of Orillia where the cost on that municipality was $90.50, and the town of Midland where the cost was $50.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. How was that cost incurred; what is the nature of it?

Mr. BENNETT. I will come to that in a moment. In the town of Penetanguishene the cost was $48, and I might quote other municipalities which will bear out my allegation that at every revision of the local voters' list there will be an average cost to each municipality of from $60 to $75. I am not referring to the large towns where the registration is in force and where the expense runs from $300 to $500, and as in the city of Toronto to $3,000. The reason of that expense is this: The statute of Ontario provides that the clerk of the municipality shall be paid so much in respect to every appeal that is made. When the lists are prepared, there is no compulsion on the assessor to place the names of these manhood franchise men on the list at all. That is simply optional on his part. It is the duty of the assessor to assess all the property he sees, to get its ratable value for the purpose of raising taxes in the municipality; but there is no statutory duty imposed upon him of collecting the names of all the young men who are entitled to vote as manhood suffrage men. When these lists are prepared, then the work starts, and the candidates or the political organizations have to perfect them; and there is provision made in the Ontario statute by which the clerk is allowed 12 or 15 cents for every appeal that is had. What is the result? I showed the other night that in some municipalities there are as many as 400 appeals. Then it is necessary to have certain stationery provided for these purposes, it is necessary to secure the attendance of certain witnesses, and the expenditure for all these things is forced on the municipality every year. Since the last local revision in the county of Simcoe there have been deep and strong protests on the part of the townships and local municipalities against being driven by the province to bear the expense of perfecting the lists for the provincial elections. How much more deep-seated will that complaint be when it is found that the Dominion will come along and harass the townships more than ever? The result will be that these unfortunate local municipalities will year in and year out be driven to large expenditures simply because the Dominion of Canada refuses to revise its own voters' lists.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will that increase the cost of the revision if it is done for provincial purposes?

Mr. BENNETT. Certainly. If the hon. gentleman could give an assurance that the Dominion and local elections would be held in the one year, one cost would suffice.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is there not a revision every year?

Mr. BENNETT. Certainly; but the hon. gentleman knows that while that revision is permitted by the law, neither he nor his brother, who is a member of the local House, go every year about the county revising the voters' list; because, if they did, the unpopularity of the Act would be so apparent. If my hon. friend was a candidate for the local House, and each year went through every township in his riding and forced upon each of them an expenditure of $75, or in some cases upwards of $100, he knows what a protest would arise from those municipalities. While there is a local revision permitted by law, there is not a revision as a matter of fact, because it would be so expensive for a candidate year in and year out to perfect the list; and so he waits until an election is impending, and then revises the voters' list for the township.

Mr. BURNETT. Is it not in the interest of the municipality to have a correct list?

Mr. BENNETT. It is, but the municipality does not compel the assessor to place manhood franchise men on the list at all.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The hon. gentleman is more familiar with the law of Ontario than I am; but I would like to call his attention to this statement of the law as it has been given to me, and I would ask him to say whether it is correct or not:

Under the Voters' Lists Act, section 6, the clerk of the municipality is required to take from the final revised assessment roll a list of all persons of the full age of twenty-one years, subjects by birth or naturalization, appearing by the assessment roll to be entitled to be voters in the municipality. This list so to be prepared is to be in three parts: the first containing the names of the persons entitled to vote both at municipal and provincial elections; the second, those entitled to vote at municipal elections alone; the third, those entitled to vote at provincial elections alone; and opposite the name of every person qualified to vote at provincial elections, the clerk is to place the letters "m.f.", signifying manhood franchise.

If the law is as I have stated it, the clerk is required to do this every year.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman has quoted the law correctly; but there is no statutory duty imposed upon an assessor to go about the riding and collect the names of all who are entitled to go on the list as manhood franchise voters. The duty of the assessor is to assess all the property in the municipality. After he has made that municipal assessment for the purpose of local taxation, then the clerk takes the names of the parties and arranges them in three different ways.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is it not the duty of the assessor to place every manhood suffrage voter on his list, and does not the assessor take his oath before he enters upon his duties that he will perform his duties? And does he not certify at the close of the year that he has truly and faithfully and to the best of his knowledge and ability performed all the duties of an assessor that are incumbent upon him?

Mr. BENNETT. Well, the hon. gentleman does not know the law, if he will excuse my saying so. There is no duty at all imposed upon the assessor that is at all compulsory upon him.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to cite an instance in his own county where a name was tendered to an assessor, and he refused to enter it on the list?

Mr. BENNETT. I have shown the hon. gentleman that in a certain division in the township of Tay the assessor did place a few names on the list.

Mr. BURNETT. You would not expect him to put them on if he was not asked to.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT. There is the whole point.

Mr. BURNETT. I want to explain what I mean. How would a man know he was there if he did not ask—if his name was not tendered? I will give you an illustration. Suppose I have half a dozen men employed, and if the assessor comes to assess me. He asks me to give him the names of all the men over a certain age. If I give them I am carrying out the law; if I refuse, I am not carrying out the law. So, I am really compelled by the law to give every name, and the assessor is bound to accept them.

Mr. McHUGH. Here is the section, giving the oath by which the assessor is sworn to perform his duty, and it says:

That according to the best of my knowledge and belief I have entered thereon the name of every person entitled to be so entered, either under this Act or the Manhood Suffrage Act, or any Act amending either of the said Acts, and that I have not intentionally omitted from said roll the name of any person whom I knew or had good reason to believe was or is entitled to be entered thereon, under any or either of the said Acts; and I further say that the date of delivery or transmitting the notice required by section 47 of this Act is in every case truly and correctly stated in the said roll.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, we have in the province of Ontario—I do not know whether hon. gentlemen have it in the other provinces, but I rather think we have a monopoly of it in Ontario—what is known as fireside law, and it is usually administered by gentlemen such as the hon. member for South Victoria (Mr. McHugh) and the two other hon. gentlemen we have just heard from. It is a kind of law that is being launched on the people with great cost to themselves, but it yields a great harvest to the lawyers, because it is always reviewed under appeals from magistrates. However, the people have to suffer from it, and I will endeavour to protect the House from fireside law by explaining what the law is. It is quite plain, these hon. gentlemen have not read the law. The assessor is not to omit anybody who asked to be put on, and he certifies that he has not; but it would be monstrous to suppose that he would be obliged to run around a township and hunt up voters for the different political parties. The deduction which hon. gentlemen make is simply fireside law, and nothing else. I prefer to deal with the law of the Solicitor General.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I find it here stated that the assessor is bound to institute inquiries and put on the roll the names of those who are qualified.

Mr. BENNETT. The Solicitor General will find that the law is more honoured in the breach than in the observance. There is nothing compulsory; the assessor is not liable to a fine, and it would be monstrous to suppose that he should go chasing up the highways and down the byways to see how many men should be on the lists. There is no penalty at all attached to the obligation, and the result is, that candidates do not waste their money and time revising the lists year after year, but wait for the year preceding an impending election, and then devote themselves, at great cost, to that task.

What is the result? When a list is revised, page after page is added, and names are interlined, and others struck out. Surely, the hon. gentleman must see that a voters' list prepared under those circumstances is simply an absurdity.

When I was interrupted a little while ago, I was speaking on the question of cost, and I was showing that the municipalities are first taxed, and heavily taxed, for the revision of those lists for local purposes, and then they will be taxed for their revision for Dominion purposes. Assuming that next year there will be an election for the Dominion, and assuming that we were preparing the voters' lists of this year, 1898, then, the unfortunate municipalities would be visited with another and a heavy cost. But it is not only the country municipalities that will have to pay, but look at the immense cost that will be imposed on the cities. In Toronto, I have no doubt that the cost of revising the local voters' lists, under the system of registration, runs up to $3,000. In the city of Brantford, I was informed the other night by the representative of South Brantford, that the cost of revising the voters' lists amounted to $450; in the town of Stratford, it was $600, and in the town of St. Thomas, about the same amount. And yet you are telling the people in the country that you are going to wipe out this expense. You are not going to wipe it out at all, but you are going to shift the burden of expense from the Dominion to the municipalities. We all know that whichever party may be in power, a certain amount of information will be given their supporters as to when they had better prepare for the revision of the voters' lists. What will be the result? If we had a revision of the voters' lists under the Dominion system, then there would be only a close investigation and a close revising of the lists for one year. But what state will we be in, if this Bill is adopted? A candidate who has not a side line of information from the Government will be in this position. He will say to himself that, in the ordinary course of events, an election is not likely to be held until next year, but for fear the Government may appeal to the country before that, he will say: I will not be caught napping, but will go to the expense of revising the lists for this year. The result will be, that in an average riding of ten municipalities—and I am not including a town where there would be registration—the cost would be, likely, upwards of $600. Should the Government not go to the country on the lists prepared that year, then the candidate would, of necessity, be forced to go over the same ground in a subsequent year, and $600 more would be piled up on the riding that year. And if there had been a local election but a year or two before, the result would be, that the unfortunate municipalities in Ontario would each have about $180 municipal tax imposed on them in a period of three years. That cannot be gainsaid, because the figures are there. Where is the unfortunate candidate to be? In the first place, the revision of the voters' lists for the local elections is, as I have contended, much more expensive. The manhood franchise lists for the local elections are the creation of friendly assessors. I have known assessors who have made for Conservatives nearly as good a list as could be made, but I have known Liberal assessors who have made for Conservative candidates as bad a list as could be made, and as correspondingly good ones as they could make for the Liberals, because the law does not impose on them the duty to treat Liberals and Conservatives alike, but states that they shall put on the list the names of persons who tender their names. The unfortunate part of the case will come in where you reach a large city, and I ask the hon. Solicitor General to bear this strongly in mind. If next year the hon. gentlemen who represent the city of Toronto were to undertake a revision of the voters' lists in that city, what would be the result? They would be put to an enormous expense, because their party friends would have to go about and collect the information for registration. It is true that the city would not be put to the expense of two years succeeding each other, because, as I understand the Bill, there would be in the cities a system of registration preceding a Dominion election, such as there is for the local elections now, but the hon. gentleman must remember that the candidate, anticipating an election, has a lot of expense to go to in a large city in order to find the names; and, as a result, after the adoption of this Bill, he will be, in all probability, put to a large expense. I tell the hon. gentleman that it is unfair for the Dominion to subject the local municipalities to this cost. Why should he impose on each township in my riding, for two years in succession, the cost of $75 or $80 in having the local voters' lists revised for federal purposes? The whole question comes to this, that we have set aside the principle of uniformity, and that is no longer in discussion. But what we should have is honest lists, and I submit that the Solicitor General should not ask hon. gentlemen on this side to go into an election contest on voters' lists that offer such facilities for fraud and wrong-doing. It is a monstrous proposition that these lists should be left in the hands of friendly returning officers all over the country for two or three days, so that, if these officers permit them to lie around, they may be tampered with by any person and names scored out and others inserted, thus depriving some men of their votes and giving votes to others not entitled to be on the roll. The question of expense should never come into consideration at all, compared with the question of having honest voters' lists. What is to be done under the circumstances? If the hon. gentleman will consult the figures under the old Dominion Act, he will find that the great cost of the old Franchise Act—and I am applying myself now more to the province of Ontario—lay in the payment of fees to the judges. Hon. gentlemen have said that their opposition to the present law, when it was brought in, some ten years ago, was so determined that they fought against it day and night. All I can say is, that I have read a good deal of the discussion which then took place, and I have noticed that it was conspicuous by the absence of any suggestions at all to improve the Bill. And if these hon. gentlemen on that occasion had made some suggestions as to cheapening the lists, the lists would not have caused so much dissatisfaction as they have. Now, let us look at the figures. In the Public Accounts for the province of Ontario, 1897, it will be found that there was paid to the county judges, in round figures, $7,700 for revising the voters' lists for the local legislature, and I find that the judge of the county of Simcoe disposed of all the appeals in that county for the sum of $214. Now, what does that mean? I do not know how many appeals there were in the other ridings, but I do know that there were upwards of 1,400 appeals in the riding of East Simcoe alone. But hon. gentlemen will stand up and say that if there is in the county of Simcoe this enormous number of appeals, they never have anything of the kind in their ridings. Now, these fees to the county judges must be paid on some scale or allowance, and if hon. gentlemen will look at the accounts they will see that in many of these counties the cost to the province was a great deal more than for the county of Simcoe, and therefore there must have been a great many more appeals in the other counties than there were in the county of Simcoe. I assume that there must have been in the county of Simcoe upwards of 2,500 appeals. We find that the judge was paid there $214 for disposing of those appeals. Under the Dominion Franchise Act we find that the revising officer in the county, who is the county judge, Judge Ardagh, was paid $1,100 for disposing of the appeals in that one riding alone. My suggestion is to pay these gentlemen about $150 in each riding, and I will be bound to say that the county judges will be only too pleased to accept that amount and revise the appeals in each county. Do not run away with the idea that county court judges are driven to death. We find that they have time to go here and there to decide arbitrations. I know that at the present time there is an arbitration pending in the town of Barrie on the subject of waterworks, and the county judge of the county of Durham is one of the arbitrators. I think that a method could be devised which will be simple and inexpensive. My suggestion is to accept the local voters' list of a year preceding that when the revision is determined upon, and then provide a cheap system of appeal. Provide that the appellant may give notice to a man by letter, and let the appeal be heard without making the attendance of the man before the county court judge necessary as it is under the provincial system at present, where a man must be paid his fees to attend. I would have one month allowed in which appeals could be made. Let appeals to add names be made just as under the present arrangement—that is file an affidavit showing that the party whose name is sought to be added has the necessary qualifications, as to age, as to being a British subject, and so on, and, at the end of a month let the court be held. I will be bound to say that there would not be one riding, in the province of Ontario at any rate, in which the county court judge would not be pleased to dispose of all appeals for the sum of $150.

Now, we have disposed of the cost of the judge. Let us come down to the greatest question of all, the matter of having an honest voters' list—and I know that hon. gentlemen on the other side, some of them at all events, and I will give most of them credit for it, want to have a semblance of fair-play in these lists.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is what we have not had for twelve years.

Mr. BENNETT. I venture to say that the hon. gentleman will not stand up in his place and claim that the county court judge who revised his list did anything wrong.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have done that many times in this House before, and I am prepared to do it again.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) will not allege that Judge Bell, who I am told is a Liberal and an honourable man, ever tampered with these lists.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But it happens that Judge Bell is not the revising officer in my county.

Mr. BENNETT. Then I am misinformed as to who he was. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) will not rise in his place and say that Judge Woods ever tampered with the lists.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, I do, and have done.

Mr. BENNETT. Then all I can say is that the hon. gentleman was not sure of his ground, or he would have called for an investigation long ago. I stand in the judgment of the House when I say that the hon. gentleman never made a charge in this House that Judge Woods tampered with the lists.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I can prove by "Hansard" that I did.

Mr. BENNETT. That is neither here or there. We all agree that the costs are excessive. But there is no use agreeing that the horse is dead; what we want is to prescribe some medicine for the living horse.

Mr. McMILLAN. Why bring up the dead horse then?

Mr. BENNETT. To comfort hon. gentlemen opposite, because, when they have run out of everything else, they make an onslaught on the Franchise Act. Now, I say there is not a county court judge in Ontario but will revise the voters' lists in any one of these ridings at a cost of $150. Let us come down to the case of honesty in the printing of the lists. Over here in the Printing Bureau, as I am informed, they have standing the galleys of type from which the last voters' lists were printed.

Mr. BURNETT. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to tell what the county judge gets per day for attending the revisions of the lists?

Mr. BENNETT. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman that, but I can tell him that in the county of Ontario the judge got $200 for revising the local lists. There must have been more appeals in the county of Ontario than there were in the county of Simcoe.

Mr. BURNETT. Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to say how many municipalities there are in the county of Ontario?

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman comes from the county of Ontario, and he should know that. Now, as I have said, over here in the Printing Bureau the type of the last Dominion voters' list is standing. And when the last Dominion voters' list was printed, it was not necessary to reset all the type, but it was only necessary to make changes from the original, and the cost was only a trifle, comparatively speaking, for each riding. I think that the average was only about $150 or $200 for the corrections. There were twenty ridings in Ontario in which the correction of the list cost less than $100 each. There were thirteen in Nova Scotia in which the average cost was $130. In New Brunswick the average was $130. Some of the others were even less than that. If we are to adopt the local franchise in the province of Ontario, give us a chance for our lives at all events, and, after the lists are finally revised, have them reprinted at the department here. Then the cost will be about $200 per riding. But I ask hon. gentlemen, and I appeal to them in a spirit of fairness: Do not ask us to go into the elections with voters' lists like these. Do not give it into the power of every partisan deputy returning officer to permit his list to be tampered with by every one who comes along.

Mr. BURNETT. I want to call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact. He knows that the deputy returning officer receives his instructions and his lists from the judge's hand, it comes from no other person; therefore, no one else can tamper with them. The lists the hon. gentleman refers to are the lists that are first printed by each municipality. They have never been finally revised, and the hon. gentleman is trying to make this House believe that they are the revised lists all the time.

Mr. BENNETT. Now, the hon. gentleman is the possessor of more fireside law than I thought he was; and even at the cost of inflicting the law and its explanation on the whole House, I must do so for the benefit of the hon. gentleman. Now, when a court is held the lists have already been printed. I think we will agree on that. The judge then has in his possession a memorandum that all the changes that have been made, have occurred. That memorandum is handed to the township clerk, and the township clerk makes the changes on the printed voters' list and places it in the possession of the clerk of the peace of the county, with names written in and other scored out. Now, what is the result? The revised list is then in the hands of the clerk of the peace, and this Act says that from the clerk of the peace, who is the proper custodian, you shall receive a corrected voters' list. I ask the Solicitor General if that is not correct?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. As I understand it.

Mr. BENNETT. It is folly to talk about such an absurdity as the judge writing stacks of names into books, it is all nonsense. The hon. gentleman is a terrible victim of fireside law. Now, what is the result? Let us have this given to us, let us have a chance for our lives, at all events. After the list has been revised by the judge, and after it has been deposited in the office of the clerk of the peace, let that list be sent down here to Ottawa, and let corrections be made in the galleys of the type that is standing over here, and the result will be that you will correct this list in the Printing Bureau at an expense of about $200 for the riding. You will then give security to your political opponents that they are going to have an honest list. But if you force upon this House and upon the country a dishonest list like this, you are open to the suspicion that you are providing an engine that any honest man should be ashamed of.

Mr. HEYD. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? I do not do it merely for the purpose of finding fault. But I have listened to the hon. gentleman's representations of the manner in which these lists are corrected, and I do not think he has made it clear yet. He conveys the impression that the printed list is the genuine list. In the city of Brantford, for instance, after a judge has corrected the written list, the clerk makes a copy from it which he hangs up. Now, any one can strike names off that copy, or tear leaves out of that copy, but that don't affect the list which is in the vault of the city hall all the time. From that written list he makes various lists for the polling subdivisions, and no matter how those printed lists are altered, scored or fixed, that don't affect the genuine list at all.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman will see the position he places himself in. He says that you have got the list safely locked up in the vault, and that list nobody can see. Why, it is the lists that are in the hands of the deputy that are voted on, not the list in the vault at all.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Don't you call that fireside law?

Mr. BENNETT. I say such a law as that is not honest fireside law, and that is what I am contending against. Now, my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Heyd) could have said this, and have said it correctly: That in the cities you cannot make this complaint about the list because the registration is there. In the city of Brantford, and in the county towns where there is registration, he could have made that point. A dishonest list would not apply to the cities and towns for the reason that in those there is a special registration, and after the special registration of the city or towns, there is then an honest list printed and of that registration list nobody can complain. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman who is in charge of the Bill, when these lists are corrected, as they are corrected under the Ontario system, where is he going to get his voters' lists? When the candidate knows there is a corrected voters' list lying in the hands of the clerk of the peace, as there is one, I ask the Solicitor General where is the candidate going to get his voters' list? After the list has been finally revised, in Ontario, and when it is lying in the hands of the clerk of the peace, where is the candidate going to get his list to go into a fight with?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Section 6 provides that the revising officer shall apply to the legal custodian for a copy of the list that he has to use in the election. Candidates shall apply to the same person, and I take it for granted that they will get it. I am not familiar with the details of the law of Ontario, but it would appear to me a most curious thing if a public official should have possession of a public document and not be obliged to give a copy of it to any one entitled to it. I do not know of any law in the world that would justify that.

Mr. BENNETT. Now, here is the cause of complaint. I, being a candidate, require an ordinary number of the voters' lists. It is true I can go to the clerk of the peace, who is the custodian, but I suppose I should have to pay a dollar or two dollars apiece for them.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Is there no provision in the Ontario law which states that copies of municipal documents must be supplied at a certain fixed rate?

Mr. BENNETT. If my recollection serves me right it is this: That under the Act, 200 copies of the voters' lists are printed by the municipality. Now, what is the result? I know some municipalities in my riding where the clerk of the peace, who is a very strong Liberal, leaves the voters' lists very conveniently around, and the result is that we are unable to get one at all when they are very necessary. There are ten copies under the Act given to a defeated candidate, and to the member elected, but they are not the revised copies.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, they are.

Mr. BENNETT. Does the hon. gentleman say they are the revised copies?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. BENNETT. There is another victim of fireside law. Why, let me show the absurd position the hon. gentleman is in. How is the candidate to know what names are on the list until it is printed, displayed and distributed? Now, what is the result? I must appeal to the Solicitor General, because I prefer his law to the fireside law of the hon. gentleman. Now, let me call the attention of the Solicitor General to this case. I, as a candidate, have a limited number, some ten copies, of the list of each municipality placed in my hands. In some municipalities there are ten polling divisions, and as a result I have only got ten voters' lists for each municipality, or one for each polling division. Now, under the Dominion Act, and according to the suggestion I have made, these copies can be furnished from Ottawa at a trifling cost, a couple of cents apiece. In each township, it may be where there are ten polling places that one polling place may only have eight or ten votes, while in another polling place there may be two or three hundred voters. The result is that with my limited number of voters' lists I have got to go to a polling place with only ten votes with one of my lists, and when I go to a large polling division with 300 voters, I can only have one list, too. There is one course out of it. A candidate, if he is a Croesus, can go to work and get all the lists printed. But surely the Government are not going to force a Bill on the House that will cost every unfortunate candidate and member $60, or $75, or $100 to have a voters' list printed for every municipality. If that is going to be the law in the province of Ontario, all I can say is that men of moderate means had better get out of politics at once. Now, the hon. gentleman must see that his Bill, as it stands to-day, bristles with irregularities and wrongs that must be corrected before it goes out of committee. I can only say that you are not saving cost to the candidate, you are not saving cost to the public as a whole, because it is all the same whether the public pays it through the municipalities or pays it out of the federal tax. Worse than that and worst of all, you are placing a positive premium on dishonesty in the preparation of such lists. I do not know how the lists are prepared in the other provinces, although I have heard something in regard to them. If in New Brunswick and other provinces they have written and not printed lists, then I say that is worse than the Ontario iniquity, and I hope and trust the Government will see fit to provide that we shall have an honest voters' list, printed after the lists are finally revised under the local administrations.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 57) respecting the Manufacturers' Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company, and to change its name to "the Dominion of Canada Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company."—(Mr. Clarke.)

Bill (No. 59) to incorporate the Victoria Fire Insurance Company.—(Mr. Quinn.)

KETTLE RIVER VALLEY RAILWAY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 26) to incorporate the Kettle River Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Bostock.)

On section 6,

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). This clause was amended in the committee by reducing the capital stock from $2,500,000 to $1,000,000.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. As that does not appear in the Bill before the committee, I think we had better get the committee to rise and report progress, and send the Bill back to the Committee on Railways.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I made the motion myself, and it may possibly have escaped the notice of the chairman or the secretary of the committee. It was agreed by all parties that it should be reduced to $1,000,000.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is moved that the words, "two million five hundred thousand" be struck out, and the words, "one million" be inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. DAVIN. Does that not require notice?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. DAVIN. I would like to have your ruling on that, Mr. Chairman. Can an amendment be made to a private Bill in committee without notice being given?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand that the change that is asked for now is simply the correction of a clerical error.

Mr. CASEY. It was agreed to in the Railway Committee.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood that it was changed to $1,500,000.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I do not know how we can change this Bill, when it is the original Bill as it has come from the Railway Committee, whether it is a mistake or not.

Mr. HUGHES. If there is a motion to strike out the word "two," you cannot do that without notice. If it is an error, let us treat it as an error.

Mr. McINNES. At this stage, I would like to make a few remarks on this Bill. It is a Bill which received a great deal of consideration at the hands of the Railway Committee, and it is an important Bill, which certainly should not be rushed through this House without very mature and serious consideration. It is an important Bill, not only on account of the richness of the district into which it is proposed to build this railway, but also on account of its very material bearing upon the trade of Canada, and because it involves a question which is coming to the front more and more in our political life.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I ask my hon. friend, before he proceeds to that, to allow us to dispose of the very important question which is before the committee. The hon. Minister of Railways says that an amendment was made to this clause, which amendment does not appear in the Bill now before the committee. I understand him to say that the amount of the capital stock was changed to $1,500,000.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is the recollection of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule).

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I want to ask my hon. friend whether his recollection in the committee was that that clause was changed in the way the Minister of Railways recollects?

Mr. McINNES. I may say that the chairman seemed to be railroading this Bill through the committee without reference to the questions of order that were raised, and I thought it only right to raise some kind of protest.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does my hon. friend remember whether clause 6 was amended so as to make the change?

Mr. McINNES. I cannot recollect.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am told that there is no change whatever made in the original report as made to the House; and if that is the case, I am afraid it would be establishing a very dangerous precedent to allow an alteration of so important a character to be made upon the statement of any one member of the House if it were not generally concurred in; and therefore I am under the impression that it is only possible for the committee to take the report as it has come to the chairman's hands.

Mr. DAVIN. Under these circumstances, I move that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman who has just made this motion is intensely anxious that the committee should rise. He has a great indisposition to dispose of this Bill. With regard to the question of the amendment in this section, I concede at once that if we were proposing to make any alteration in any feature of the Bill which was at all vital, there would be some reasonable ground for objection to its being done in the absence of any note of it in the report of the committee. But it will, I think, be admitted at once that a change of this nature, reducing the capital stock, is not such a change as need excite any great alarm on the part of the members of this committee. It is one in the direction which I think would generally be approved. I do not speak simply from hearsay. I am stating what has come under my own knowledge. I myself moved that the capital stock be reduced and the promoter of the Bill conferred with his people—I saw him talk to Mr. Bodwell, and they agreed, in my hearing, to the reduction. I said myself that two million and a half of capitalization was excessive and Mr. Bodwell agreed that the amount should be reduced, and I was impressed with the idea that the secretary of the committee had made a note of it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) mistakes my opinion on the question. I should be disposed to concur in the view expressed by the Minister of Railways, but it is a question whether in conflict with the rules of the House it be possible to change a Bill as reported from the Railway Committee. We have the Speaker of the House now to express an opinion on that question. I believe it is perfectly understood that it is not competent to make an amendment without notice.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not insisting that it is competent. I take it that the committee is disposed to accept the assurance that I gave that it was by an oversight that the change was omitted to be made. If there is the slightest objection I would suggest to leave it as it is. It is no concern to me.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it would establish a dangerous precedent to change the Bill as it comes from committee.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not coincide with the view of the Minister. He tells us that the Railway Committee in its wisdom decided that the capital was excessive, and that the Railway Committee decided that the capital should be reduced by more than one-half. It does not appear on the face of the Bill that the reduction was made. If the Railway Committee held that the capital was excessive it would be a monstrous thing for this House to hold that we would have the right to establish the capital at two and a half million dollars. I think myself that the best course to adopt would be to move that the committee rise, and that this Bill be referred back to the Railway Committee. I move that seconded by my hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron).

Mr. MORRISON. May I suggest that the matter stand as it is. There is no evidence before the committee sufficient to justify the impression that the capital was reduced, and why not leave the amount at two millions five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. DAVIN. We cannot do that, because the rules of the House preclude it on the reason stated by the Minister of Railways. There is no evidence on the face of the Bill that the change was made in the Railway Committee, and that the capital should be reduced from two million five hundred thousand to one million dollars. It would be an extraordinary thing for this House not to recognize that recommendation of the Railway Committee.

Mr. CASEY. If this is the only thing objected to in the Bill it is quite open to let it go through the committee as it stands, and anybody who objects to it can, if he gives notice now, move on the third reading of the Bill that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole to make the change suggested.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The Bill was either amended or not amended in the Railway Committee, and if it is as is stated by the Minister of Railways, then we have not the Bill that we should consider in this House. My conviction is, from the evidence we have from the Minister of Railways, that the Bill was amended in the Railway Committee in the way suggested, and, therefore, as the Bill appears to us in this House, is not the Bill as amended in the Railway Committee, we cannot consider it.

Mr. CASEY. The fact is, I think, that this amendment was agreed to by the parties, but was probably not put from the Chair and carried in the Railway Committee. It is, however, quite competent for the House to refer this Bill back to the committee and have the change made that was agreed to in the manner that I have already suggested.

Mr. SPROULE. There is no doubt the change was made because when the question of capital was spoken of I myself said that the capital was out of all proportion to the length of the road, and the Minister of Railways suggested the reduction of capital to one million five hundred thousand dollars. Many members of the Railway Committee agreed to this and I was satisfied the change was made by the chairman.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My recollection does not carry me as far as the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule). I do remember very well that it was proposed, but I do not remember that it was carried by the committee, as having been put to the committee. I remember very well that the gentleman representing the promoters said it was agreed to, and if there is any question about it I do not insist. The course proposed by my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) is certainly a proper course and one that would be assented to on all hands unless there is a disposition, which I am almost inclined to think exists in some quarters, to raise obstacles to the passing of the Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I most suspect there is a little evidence of conflict to the Bill, but if there is not we can get rid of the question in the way suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Casey).

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The only way we can get rid of the difficulty is by moving that the committee rise and report progress. I can assure my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) that there is no disposition to do anything but comply with the rules of the House.

Mr. HUGHES. I heartily concur in what the hon. leader of the Opposition says, and I scarcely think that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals is justified in supposing that I have any desire to oppose the Bill.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I exonerate you.

Mr. HUGHES. Inasmuch as the railway is not more than thirty miles in length, running down into the United States ten or fifteen miles, and then back into Canada another ten or fifteen miles, with power to build branches in any direction they choose, I think the capital might very well be reduced. I have not the slightest objection to its being changed in the committee.

Mr. SPROULE. I would draw attention to the rule:

No important amendment may be proposed to any private Bill in the Committee of the Whole House on a third reading unless one day's notice has been given.

That is the rule, what are you going to do?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Since the question is under discussion, I sent for the original Bill, and I find that in clause 6 there is no amendment at all. The clause was carried as it stood originally, with a capital of $2,500,000; and on account of the divergence of opinion expressed by members of the committee, I cannot do otherwise than put the clause as it is.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the best reason why the motion of the hon. gentleman should not be carried, is that we do not know where we stand on the Bill. It was agreed by all parties in the Railway Committee that the capital mentioned in clause 6 should be reduced to $1,000,000. The motion was made, it was agreed to in committee, and the promoters of the Bill before the committee and the interested parties as well, agreed to the amendment. There can be no question about that fact. I expect, Sir, that there exists in certain quarters a disposition to prevent the Bill from being discussed so as to enable us to give an intelligent vote on the matter. There is, therefore, some evidence of conflict to the Bill, and it is impossible, under the circumstances, to proceed any further.

This Bill was amended in the Railway Committee, and as I read clause 6 which the committee is asked to adopt, it seems to me that quite a different construction is put on it from that agreed to in the Railway Committee. Under the circumstances, and should there be no other ground than this divergence of opinions, to induce us to adopt the motion that the committee do rise. I think we ought to take that course, in order not to waste the time of the House. The promoters of the Bill would benefit by it, and they should agree to the proposition that the Bill be referred back to the Committee on Railways.

There is still another reason why the committee of the House should not proceed now to consider this Bill, and it is that we have had before the committee such conflicting evidence, that it is impossible for the committee, as I said a little while ago, to give an intelligent vote on the matter. I think we did receive no less than a hundred telegrams and as many resolutions from all parts of the Territories. These telegrams and resolutions were in conflict with each other. I think, therefore, that it would be in the public interest, as well as in the interest of the private individuals concerned that the committee should now rise, and that the Bill be referred back to the Railway Committee, so as to allow us not only to embody in the Bill the amendment which was carried by the committee, but also in order that we might ascertain whether those resolutions sent by the Boards of Trade and the municipal councils of the North-west Territories are genuine or not, and also whether those telegrams signed by different parties, as mayors of the respective localities, are authentic or not. On these several grounds, I think we should not dispose of the Bill now, in order to inquire into the exact nature of the facts mentioned.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is discussing the general question, whether this Bill should be adopted or not, on a particular clause concerning the capital of this company.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I exceedingly regret to say that the point of order is not well taken. The motion before the House is for the committee to rise and report progress, and on such a motion the hon. gentleman has a right to discuss the general question.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) It is quite plain that there exists on the part of some hon. gentlemen a disposition to make obstruction, so as to prevent us from voting upon the motion which is now before the committee, and from discussing the Bill now under consideration. I exonerate the hon. gentlemen from all blame, for trying to call me to order; but, at the same time, let me tell him that I am happy to see, by the few remarks he has just made, that he understands French perfectly, so as to follow in an intelligent way the arguments I have submitted to the committee. According to your ruling, Sir, I have a right to discuss the motion now before us. It must be borne in mind that we are now discussing clause 6, but that we may also deal with the different provisions of this Bill. I do not intend to argue this question at any length, for I do not wish, in protracting the debate, to prevent the committee from voting on this motion before the time allotted to the consideration of similar Bills has expired. However, Sir, I think it right, before resuming my seat, to call the attention of the committee to the principle laid down here to-night. I draw attention to the fact that it would be establishing a very dangerous precedent, for this committee to accept a provision altogether different from that voted upon by the Railway Committee. As I said, supposing there was no other ground to induce us to vote in favour of the motion under consideration, I would not hesitate a single moment to take that course.

Mr. McINNES. This is an important matter, since it involves the question whether we are going to reserve for the citizens of our country the enjoyment of the benefits which will necessarily arise from the full development of our great natural resources. All those who spoke in the Railway Committee or who have given this matter any consideration at all agree that the Boundary Creek section of British Columbia is exceedingly rich in mineral wealth; and while it may be difficult to choose between the different sections of that province, without making invidious distinctions, yet it can be said that there is greater valuable mineral wealth in the Kootenay country than in any other part of British Columbia, the development of which will certainly give rise to a larger amount of trade than any other region of the same extent in that province. I have before me the "Hansard" of 1897 in which I find the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways upon the Crow's Nest Pass proposition. In that speech he dwelt at length upon the wealth not only of the eastern section of British Columbia, but also of this very Boundary Creek section, which we are now considering in connection with this Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Whose speech is that?

Mr. McINNES. The Minister of Railways, and I intend to read some sections of it, in which he said that he was in a position to speak on these matters with great confidence and considerable authority. I therefore quote with a great deal of confidence the remarks which he made, especially with reference to the mineral wealth of this section:

I have in my hand another authoritative statement which I think it proper to put in possession of the committee. A representative of the Imperial German Government took occasion to visit British Columbia, and spent some months in the portions that I have mentioned, including the Boundary district, of which he made a careful study. He himself was a mineralogical expert, and had studied the situation in Australia, in South Africa, and in other mining countries of the world; and, I suppose it was on account of his ability in that regard that the Imperial German Government charged him with the duty of making to them a careful report of the possibilities and of the outlook of the province of British Columbia, and of the neighbouring state of Washington. He went over both these sections of country. I will only take up the time of the committee by reading an extract from this interesting report. To me it was an exceedingly interesting report, because it was not only a careful and conservative report, the report of a man who apparently was determined not to exaggerate the condition of things at all, but it was a report at the same time of one who had no interest in overstating the case in any way, but who only wished to present the facts for the information of his Government.

Mr. WILSON. What is the name of the gentleman?

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. His name is Hans Geise. He went over all the different districts of British Columbia that I have named. He went first through Rossland, then into the West Kootenay section, the East Kootenay section and Boundary Creek, up to Lillooet, and his survey of the situation embraces all these various portions of British Columbia. In referring to Boundary Creek, he says:

"The third division is the Boundary Creek itself, with its various camps. Here it is not so easy to decide the question of the superiority of any one spot over the other. Midway is here the central point of a wider country, but it is outside the cluster of Boundary Creek camps. There have, therefore, sprung up in the Boundary Creek Valley three little villages, Greenwood City, Anacosta and Boundary Falls, of which each calls itself the most advantageous, and, therefore, the place of the future; but, as they are all close together, and the valley narrow, the supposition seems but natural that the whole valley will be, some time, one continuous line of city life for several miles."

Now, I want the committee to understand the value of this report; there is the information of an independent authority, there is the opinion of a man who had no interest whatever in exaggerating the favourable conditions which exist in that country. He was making a report for the information alone of his own government; and we find here that he makes a statement after having looked the ground over, and with the knowledge which he has of the effect of mineral development in other portions of the world, that the supposition is but natural that the whole valley of Boundary Creek will be some time one continuous line of city life. Well, now, what does such an ultimate accomplishment depend upon? Why, it depends solely upon there being transportation facilities afforded, and railway construction, and means by which the people who are willing to go in and develop that country may get in supplies, and fuel, and carry the products of their mines out of the country. It only depends upon that, and it does seem to me a serious question whether it is not the duty of Parliament to lend every possible aid, without delay, in order that we may come into possession, so far as possible, the exclusive possession, of this valuable territory. Because the committee must not lose sight of the fact that this important section of country lies immediately adjacent to the boundary of the United States, it is not very far from an extensive trunk line of railway. It will not take many miles of railway to be laid down in order to penetrate into that Boundary Creek section. Now, the people on the southern side of the border are liable to do in respect of that Boundary country what they have almost done in respect of the Kootenay district—they are liable, by building a section of railway into that country, to get possession of it from a business and a trade point of view, and they are liable to divert the trade away from our own country, from the east and from the coast, and carry it to the south of the line. To my own personal knowledge, they have been doing this with respect to Kootenay. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is a fact which only requires to be known, I think, to make a grave impression upon the minds of this House and of the public generally, that the people of the United States belonging to the state of Washington, appreciating the advantages of the possession of British Columbia and of the valuable minerals which are there undeveloped, built a railway up into the Kootenay country and got possession of the business and the trade of that country, and have built up the city of Spokane wholly out of the business which has originated in the province of British Columbia. To-day the city of Spokane is a flourishing city of 35,000 people. You go into that city and get into conversation with business men, and they will tell you that the business prosperity and growth of that place from a little village of seven or eight thousand inhabitants a few years ago, has been due to the development which has taken place in British Columbia. These people were there and they took advantage of that trade. I say that it is a matter of considerable importance for the committee to discuss as to whether we will retain possession of this country from a business point of view, or whether we will let the people to the south of us take that trade from under our eyes and become possessed of it in the sense in which the conditions of business will tend to the transfer of that trade in that direction.

The Minister of Railways and Canals proceeds to quote further, as follows:—

In a general way this German official concludes his survey of the situation in these words, and I think it will be of interest to the committee if I should read the closing observations of this gentleman upon this subject. He says:

"What the result of these rich and seemingly unlimited mineral deposits will be on the country in which they are found to-day, seems beyond conception."

I invite the attention of hon. gentlemen of this House to the importance of this statement. There is the testimony of an outside authority; it is not the testimony of a man who is looking for a railway subsidy, and who is probably under an impulse to colour the information which he furnishes. There is a competent and independent authority, to which we should attach importance. He says:

Then the hon. Minister continues to quote the report, as follows:—

"Experts who have seen—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not say that.

Mr. McINNES. This is Hans Geise's report. But I suppose there is a typographical error; it should be "Experts."

"Experts who have seen the South African and West Australian gold fields, are unanimous in their opinion, that the British Columbia mineral fields rank well with either of them, and, all circumstances considered, it seems superior to both. In South Africa, the gold-bearing rock is the bed of an old lake about 65 miles long and 35 miles wide, and the conglomerative rock in which the gold appears, varies in width from 3 to 100 feet. Only the bodies of smaller and medium width contain enough gold to be worth working. The average value of the ore is only $10. The country is dry and inhospitable, and the lumber for timbering the mines is lacking entirely.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I would like to know if it is in order for the hon. Minister of Railways and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) to interrupt the hon. member (Mr. McInnes).

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I did not hear any interruptions, and so I think the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. McINNES. I thank the hon. gentleman (Mr. Choquette) for giving me protection.

The West Australian mines may be very rich, but the conditions of the country are still more unfavourable; timber and water are lacking absolutely. To-day they are facing there a proposition to lift water 2,500 feet and to carry it over a desert country 225 miles. Besides this, the ore is said to be low grade. The British Columbia mining district has enormous bodies of high-grade ore, and still farther greater ones of low grade ; the ores are said to be most excellent for matting and smelting purposes, as they carry their own flux.

The territory in which the gold-bearing rock is found here, is without doubt far larger than the South African.

All the materials for mining and smelting purposes, as timber, coal, lime, water, &c., are plentiful and close at hand. Power to great amounts can be generated almost everywhere from the swift mountain streams. The climate is, all the year round, mild and agreeable ; winter does not set in until late in the year, and, although there is almost continuous snowfall, the winters are not cold, except for a short period in January.

Farming is possible in all the valleys ; large agricultural districts in the state of Washington and the Canadian province of Alberta are close at hand to furnish food enough for millions of people who will some time need their products.

The district will soon be traversed by several railroads, and every mining camp that will warrant it, will be tapped by them.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to ask the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes), if that refers to the Greenwood district ? Does it bear upon the same district that is to be traversed by this railway ?

Mr. McINNES. Yes, it deals with this district specifically. I have given the evidence of this eminent mineralogical expert, whose report is corroborated by that of the provincial mineralogist, Mr. Carlyle, and also by the testimony of everybody who has had the privilege of going through that part of the country. There is no doubt that this will be one of the richest portions of the country, and one affording the most permanent basis of industry. Various estimates have been made of the trade which would arise, if the resources of this district were properly developed. We had the pleasure, in the Railway Committee some two weeks ago, of hearing Sir William Van Horne upon this subject, and he ventured the estimate, that in the next ten years, if that country were properly developed, it would give rise to a trade of at least $100,000,000. Is it in the interest of the country to retain that enormous trade for Canadians ? That is the whole issue involved in this Bill. I am pleased to think that it is the policy of this Government to retain the trade of Canada for Canadians. I will again refer to a few remarks made by the Minister of Railways, last session, in connection with this Crow's Nest Pass Railway proposition. On the question of the advisability of developing that country by Canadian railways, so that the trade can be conserved to Canadians, the Minister of Railways, in the same speech from which I have already quoted, says :

It only depends upon that—

That is, railway connection with Canada.

It only depends upon that, and it does seem to me a serious question whether it is not the duty of Parliament to lend every possible aid, without delay, in order that we may come into possession, so far as possible, the exclusive possession, of this valuable territory. Because the committee must not lose sight of the fact that this important section of country lies immediately adjacent to the boundary of the United States, it is not very far from an extensive trunk line of railway. It will not take many miles of railway to be laid down in order to penetrate into that Boundary Creek section. Now, the people on the southern side of the border are liable to do in respect of that Boundary country what they have almost done in respect of the Kootenay district—they are liable, by building a section of railway into that country, to get possession of it from a business and a trade point of view, and they are liable to divert the trade away from our own country, from the east and from the coast, and carry it to the south of the line.

This was the attitude taken by the Minister of Railways and Canals last session, and the attitude taken by the Government, although I am afraid that in some respects we have reason to believe that it has been departed from by the Minister of Railways and Canals. But I sincerely trust that the Government will remain steadfast to the policy they enunciated last year in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and which they have enunciated again this year in connection with the Yukon Bill, to preserve the trade wherever possible for Canada. I continue quoting from the Minister's speech of last session :

To my own personal knowledge, they have been doing this with respect to Kootenay. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is a fact which only requires to be known, I think, to make a grave impression upon the minds of this House and of the public generally, that the people of the United States belonging to the state of Washington, appreciating the advantages of the possession of British Columbia and of the valuable minerals which are there undeveloped, built a railway up into the Kootenay country and got possession of the business and the trade of that country, and have built up the city of Spokane wholly out of the business which has originated in the province of British Columbia. To-day the city of Spokane is a flourishing city of 35,000 people. You go into that city and get into conversation with business men, and they will tell you that the business prosperity and growth of that place from a little village of seven or eight thousand inhabitants a few years ago, has been due to the development which has taken place in British Columbia. These people were there and they took advantage of that trade. I say that it is a matter of considerable importance for the committee to discuss as to whether we will retain possession of this country from a business point of view, or whether we will let the people to the south of us take that trade from under our eyes and become possessed of it in the sense in which the conditions of business will tend to the transfer of that trade in that direction.

That is the position, Mr. Chairman, which I take to-night. Now, I have another quotation to make from this interesting speech, and it bears upon the same subject which I am now considering, that is, the desirability of retaining this trade in this valuable district for our own people. The Minister of Railways and Canals further on made this statement, referring to the statement of Mr. Hans Geise :

Now, there is an opinion, I think, to which we might well attach importance. It comes from a source independent at all events of the country through which this road is to travel, and these statements answer the questions that I asked at the outset, and ought, I think, remove the doubts, if any exist, as to the wisdom of the Government of the country at once, before it shall have been exploited by others, before it shall have fallen into the possession of any outside power or country, availing ourselves of the trade that will result from the construction of this work.

So you see we have every reason to believe that the present Government is thoroughly in accord with the Canadian sentiment which is now ringing from one end of Canada to the other, in favour of Canada for Canadians.

The hour for private Bills having expired, the House proceeded to the Orders of the Day.

THE FRANCHISE ACT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act, and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BENNETT. When the House rose at six o'clock, I had made the statement that there was not each year in the province of Ontario that thorough revision of the voters' lists which would be necessary in order to bring out the voting strength of political parties at an election. That view was rather demurred to by some hon. gentleman opposite who intimated that it was the duty of the municipal councils and the duty of the assessor to see that in each year a fresh list was made, and that, taking one year with another, there would be a fresh roll, and consequently from it there would be drawn a fresh list of voters. Since I last addressed the House I have looked up some figures in that regard which bear out my statement that the list would be a comparatively inefficient one, and one very far short of the full voting strength of the county. In support of that, I will quote some figures. Last year when a provincial election was impending in the province of Ontario, when the two parties were vying with each other to have all voters placed on the list, I find that in the county of Huron there was paid to the county judge in respect of the revision of the voters' lists in that county, the sum of $204. But in the year preceding when there was no prospect that the list then being formed would be used at a local election, no regard was had to the list by either political party. That is evidenced by the fact that in that year there was only paid to the judge the trifling sum of $33 in respect of the services performed by him in compiling the list. Now, what does that mean? It meant that had there been a local election in the year preceding the last election, there would have been hundreds and hundreds of voters disfranchised in the county of Huron, owing to the fact that the assessor, no duty being imposed upon him by law to place these names on the voters' list, and no duty being imposed by law on the municipality to compel the placing of those men on the list, the matter being entirely neglected, the lists in the county of Huron would have been most incomplete, and have given rise to a great many complaints. Take the county of Ontario. I find that in that county last year prior to the general elections coming on, $200 was paid to the county judge, whereas in the preceding year the trifling sum of $27 only was paid to him. Now, what did that mean? South Ontario had as its representative until lately, the Minister of Agriculture in the Ontario Government, Mr. Dryden. But Mr. Dryden, as a member of the Government, knowing full well that there would be no election on the list of 1896, did not take upon himself the expense and the trouble of revising the list of that year. The result was that that trifling sum of $27 was all the expense that was incurred by reason of appeals being brought before the county judge by the two political parties in that riding. But last year, knowing an election was impending, the Liberal members and the Conservative candidates put their shoulders to the wheel, and what was the result? The imperfectly framed and formed lists which had been presented and submitted to the electors, were seized upon by the parties, and they vied with one another in their efforts to have them made complete. As the figures demonstrated, the lists must have been most inefficient until the appeals were made before the county judge. The records of those two counties show beyond doubt that the lists formed and framed every year by the local municipality are most incomplete and imperfect, and if an election ever took place on those lists, there would be a hue and cry from one end of the province to the other, for the reason that thousands and tens of thousands of qualified voters would be found omitted from the lists. I would ask the Solicitor General, what is the meaning of clause 18? Clause 22 says that section 54 of the Act shall be applicable also to electors entitled to vote otherwise than by being named on the list of voters. Let me direct attention to clause 21, which states as follows:—

21. Section 52 of the said Act is hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof it is hereby enacted that no voter who has refused to take the oath of affirmation, or to answer questions or produce evidence as to qualification as aforesaid, when requested to do so, shall receive a ballot paper or be admitted to vote.

Reading those two clauses in connection with clause 18, it seems to me that this clause is certainly a most objectionable one.

But clause 18 is the substitution of an old clause, and, about half-way down, appears the following:—

Any elector present shall, before receiving his ballot paper, answer such questions or produce such evidence as to his qualifications to vote. That places a deputy returning officer in the position of an inquisitor.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The object of these words is to meet cases that may arise.

Mr. BENNETT. There is no provision that this section shall not be applicable to other provinces. I submit that, in its present form, it will be applicable. Assume a man is entitled to vote, and there is no question of his name not being on the list. The deputy returning officer, favouring the powers that be, acts as an inquisitor, and asks the voter, whose name is on the list and whose name has been confirmed by the judge, certain questions, and then refuses to give the voter a ballot. Such a clause is placing in the hands of the deputy returning officer a power which he is liable to abuse. Not only has he the privilege, in his quasi-magisterial capacity, to rule that a voter shall not have a ballot, but where a man's name does not appear on the list, he can proffer to such man a ballot, and he will have the privilege of voting. If that section is to be applicable to all the provinces, I think we might as well dispense with the voters' lists altogether.

Mr. CLANCY. I have just been reading the first clause.

Some hon. MEMBERS. We are on the preamble.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. We are considering the first section. I have no objection, however, to an hon. member discussing the whole Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We will probably make greater progress in that way. Explanations, such as the hon. Solicitor General may be able to give on other clauses, will lead, no doubt, to the adoption of the first clause.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman is a little mistaken as to the practical result. It is really absolutely necessary to take a Bill clause by clause, otherwise the discussion wanders in every possible direction.

Mr. BERGERON. I suppose the hon. gentleman remembers the session of 1885. At that time, the same explanations were gone over about five hundred times. The committee is at present considering the first clause, which states that this Bill shall be cited as the Franchise Act, 1898. We can discuss the whole Bill on that clause.

Mr. CLANCY. It seems pretty clear, that the first clause practically includes the whole Bill, and, therefore, gives pretty full range for discussion. I am very glad to hear the conversion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I hope changed circumstances may not have been the means of his conversion. I had not the privilege of sitting in this House when the present Act was under discussion, but I had the privilege of reading many excellent speeches delivered by that hon. gentleman, in which he did not lay down such a rule as he is laying down this evening. I will call attention to some points that have already been mentioned, and I do so with the object of calling the attention of the Solicitor General to the clause to which the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) made reference, that is, regarding the very extraordinary powers placed in the hands of the deputy returning officer. Instead of placing a voter whose name may be properly on the list, at the disposal of the deputy returning officer, which is a very dangerous course to pursue, some mode should be provided by which he should not be subjected to any catechising or badgering, which may result in intimidating a voter, and the voter should then have the right to receive a ballot and vote. My hon. friend should not propose to place voters in a position in which they may be driven from the poll.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I would suggest the inutility of a discussion such as has been entered upon. The Solicitor General has stated that if real objections to the working of any one of the clauses are presented, he is willing to receive suggestions with a view to remove the same. We are at present discussing the first section, which simply provides that the Bill shall be entitled the Franchise Act of 1898. The principle of the Bill having been admitted, we are now proceeding to discuss each clause separately. Let them be intelligently discussed, amendments suggested and accepted, if necessary. If the present course is pursued, it will prevent the Bill being passed. The leader of the Opposition expressed his willingness to use his influence in getting through the Bill to-night. No one can want to prevent hon. members addressing the House, but I rise to deprecate the introduction of a discussion on sections 23 and 24, when the committee is at present considering section 1, which has no relation whatever to either of those clauses.

Mr. WALLACE. I quite disagree with the view taken by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I consider it is impossible to lay down a hard and fast rule, and say that a member, in discussing the Bill, shall confine himself to one clause, which may cover, as in this case, only the title of the Bill. As hon. members know there is an easy way of getting rid of the objections by moving that the committee rise, and then any hon member can discuss the clauses of the Bill as he wishes. It will not save any time for the Government to prevent discussion on any clause we wish to refer to.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My object is not to prevent a general discussion, but I think it would be better to confine our attention to the particular clause before the House. If there is any cognate clause afterwards we can discuss the whole matter. Our desire is to make progress.

Mr. WALLACE. Our only object is that the Bill should be a fair one, and we do not think it is a fair Bill as it stands now.

Mr. TAYLOR. I believe we all want a Bill that would be workable and as my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) suggests, there are things in this Bill which are unworkable. I would suggest, for the purpose of saving time, that a special committee composed of two members from each of the provinces, should be appointed to consider this Bill, and possibly if that committee consider the Bill whatever amendment they propose the House would adopt the suggestions. If we continue to discuss it in this House as we are doing now, the chances are that the Bill will take several weeks to get through.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope it will not. After what the Minister of Marine has said, and it entirely agrees with what has fallen from the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), who has charge of the Bill, I think it would be well for us, after the very full discussion we have had, to go on until we come to a clause on which we think an amendment desirable. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that there will be a reasonable disposition on the other side of the House to agree to any well considered amendment. If my hon. friends will support that, I think it will be the best course to adopt.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

On section 2,

This Act shall not apply to the North-west Territories.

Mr. TAYLOR. Why?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We must ask the Solicitor General to explain that.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Because we have a special statute in the North-west Territories. There is no municipal organization in the Territories to enable us to apply this law.

Mr. CLANCY. There are some places in the province of Ontario in which there is no municipal organization, and if your logic is good in one place it ought to be good in another.

Mr. BERGERON. There is none in Prince Edward Island.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Oh, yes, there is.

Mr. BERGERON. No.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is municipal organization in Charlottetown and Summerside. There is a special provision under the law of Prince Edward Island which covers the matter.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) Where do you find the law in the province of Prince Edward Island?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I quite admit that there are no election lists in the province of Prince Edward Island, but there is machinery to elect local members to the House.

Mr. POWELL. Their methods of conducting an election do not apply in this case.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I beg your pardon, there is no franchise law which can be independent of the election law.

Mr. POWELL. There is no parallel between the franchise law in Prince Edward Island and the North-west Territories. Every man who is a resident of Prince Edward Island can vote; and why not let the law in the North-west Territories be the same.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is a special Act which provides for the election of members for the House of Commons in the North-west Territories.

On section 3, subsection "d," (d.) The expression "voters' list," or "list of voters," includes, when provincial lists are referred to, any poll-book or official list of persons entitled to vote at a provincial election.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I move to strike out the words "poll-book or" in the second line. It does not appear to me that there is any necessity for these words.

Mr. BENNETT. Are we then to understand that in the province of Ontario we must have the printed voters' lists, with the changes which have been made marked on it—interlineations, and lines struck off?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am afraid that we shall have to take the same voters' lists as they use in the provincial elections. That is the principle of the Bill. If my hon. friend will read that paragraph, he will see that the words "poll-book or" are surplusage. They do not appear to me to add anything to the paragraph. I cannot imagine a case, so far as my knowledge of the provincial law goes, in which these words would be of any use.

Mr. POWELL. And they might do harm.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. Solicitor General may not understand the working of the Ontario law. This afternoon I asked if the list which would be placed in the hands of the deputy would be the printed list as it came from the judge, with names struck out and names added, and I understood him to assent to that. At present there is not one of these printed lists in the hands of the deputies on polling day. The list in the hands of the deputy is what is called a poll-book, which means a book containing the names of all those who are entitled to vote. I would like to know which of these two lists we are to have. Are we to have the printed list, with the corrections made by the judge on it, or the so-called poll-book which is in use to-day?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In cases where the list has been finally revised by the court, we are to have it in the form in which it is handed over to the clerk. There seems to be a great difference of opinion among hon. gentlemen on the other side as to what the provincial law of Ontario is, and I state the position in this way: we are to have as the voters' list for Dominion elections those used in the provincial elections in Ontario, whatever they may be.

Mr. HUGHES. When the list is finally amended and closed, it is printed with erasures and additions. That is not the list which the hon. Solicitor General proposes to use at all.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Why not?

Mr. HUGHES. Because it is never used. Copies of this are made in poll-books, which are handed to the various deputy-returning officers, and these are used in the election.

Mr. McMILLAN. When the voters' lists are to be revised in the province of Ontario, this is the practice followed. When the assessor completes his work, which is not later than the 30th of May, the assessment roll comes before the township council, and it has to be revised by them. In a great many instances where names are found not to be on the assessment roll, the court of revision gets the assessor to become the appellant, and those names are put on before the roll is finally completed. It is not finally completed until the court of revision closes its sitting; and the township council sometimes adjourns to allow names to be put on. Then, if there are other names, there is an appeal to the county judge, who holds a court of revision, and he gives to the township clerk a list of names to be added.

Mr. TAYLOR. No.

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes. Here is the law:

In case complaints are made as aforesaid, immediately after the list has been finally revised and corrected by the judge, the judge shall make, or cause to be made, and shall sign, a statement (Form 16) in triplicate, setting forth the changes, if any, which he has made in the list; and shall certify in triplicate (Form 17) a corrected copy of the list; and the statement in triplicate, and the corrected copies of the list shall, if the judge so order, and under his direction and supervision, be prepared by the clerk of the municipality, and for that purpose the judge shall forthwith, after the list has been so finally revised and corrected, transmit or deliver to the clerk all necessary papers and directions, which papers and directions, together with the statement in triplicate and the corrected copies, shall within, at latest, the week next after the list has been so finally revised and corrected as aforesaid, be re-transmitted and delivered by the clerk to the judge, who thereupon shall immediately sign the statement and certify the corrected copies aforesaid.

But should the statement and corrected copies not be re-transmitted and delivered by the clerk to the judge within the time above mentioned, the judge shall immediately thereafter make and sign the statement and certify the corrected copies of the list.

The judge shall retain one of the certified copies and one statement, and shall deliver or transmit by post, registered, one of the certified copies and one statement to the clerk of the peace for the county, or union of counties, within which the municipality lies, and one of the certified copies and one statement to the clerk of the municipality, to be kept by him among the records of office.

The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) stated this afternoon that any deputy returning officer would have full power, when the list came into his hands, where it would lie for two or three days, to strike off any name he thought proper; and the hon. gentleman was horrified to think what the list would be when it came to be voted on. The hon. gentleman had not read the law correctly, or he would have found that that list has to be returned by the deputy returning officer along with his other papers, with the words "voted on" after each name that had been voted on; and his list is retained and can be compared with the list in the township clerk's office. So that there is no opportunity for any deputy returning officer to mutilate the list without coming under severe penalties. The hon. gentleman told me that I knew very little about the law, and he said that there was nothing to make the assessor enter the name of any individual on the list. If he will turn to the Consolidated Assessment Act, section 14, subsection 3, he will find:

The assessor shall also make reasonable inquiries in order to ascertain what persons resident in his municipality, or in the section of the municipality in respect of which the assessor is acting, are entitled to be placed in the assessment roll as qualified to be voters under the Manhood Suffrage Act, and shall place such persons on the roll as qualified to be voters without the affidavit referred to in subsection 1 of this section.

Subsection 1 says that it is the duty of the assessor to find out every one who is entitled to vote and place his name on the list. The assessor first takes the oath of office that he will truly and faithfully perform the duties of the office to which he has been appointed; and at the close he says:

I have not entered any name in the above roll, or improperly placed any letter or letters in column 4 opposite any name, with intent to give to any person not entitled to vote a right of voting.

I have not intentionally omitted from the said roll the name of any person whom I believe entitled to be placed thereon, nor have I, in order to deprive any person of a right of voting, omitted from column 4 opposite the name of such person, any letter or letters which I ought to have placed there.

The assessor signs the affidavit that he has done what the law required of him, and he has to take the oath of office. I have been astonished to hear the charges made in this debate. No less than four hon. gentlemen have declared that the assessment rolls were stuffed in the province of Ontario. The hon. member for Halton said that the only qualification for an assessor was that he should be a man who would stuff the assessment with names that ought not to be there and keep out names that ought to be there.

Mr. HENDERSON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I never used those words.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have been in municipal life in Ontario for over thirty years and have never yet known an assessor who wilfully stuffed the assessment rolls. But I have no doubt that those hon. gentlemen who make these charges would, if they had the appointment of the assessors, only name those who would stuff the lists. I have never known an assessor to do anything of the kind. I have always found them intelligent men, sometimes with not as much experience as they ought to have, but always willing and anxious to make as correct a roll as the circumstances and their experience would allow. I have known assessors who have held the office for fifteen or twenty years, during which time the political complexion of the councils have frequently changed from the Reform to Conservative, and vice versa; and when the court of revision sits, every elector has a right to appeal against the amount of his assessment. Names must necessarily be omitted, in the cases of young men who have not yet completed their twenty-first year. The assessor begins on the 15th of February to make his roll, and must finish before the 1st of May. Many young men who are not placed on the roll by the assessor because they had not reached their majority, are put on the roll by the judge revising the list, because at the time of revision they were within sixty days of their majority.

Mr. CLANCY. Does that class of voters, those within sixty days of their coming of age, apply to the Ontario elections?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, if they are within sixty days of the time of their majority when the judge is revising the list, it is his duty to place them upon the list.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman had better read the Act before he makes a statement of the kind.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have read the Act to-day carefully and have read it before to-day. Hon. gentlemen opposite have decried the assessment rolls and municipal councils, but I would ask them what they would take as the foundation of the voters' lists, even under a Dominion Franchise Act, if they were to throw aside the assessment roll. Is there any class of men in Ontario, or in any other province, so capable of making correct lists as the assessors and the township clerks. As regards the extra expense for payment of the township clerk, there is no extra expense in the municipalities, whose councils understand their business, because a municipal council has a perfect right to make a by-law, when appointing a clerk, that he shall receive no extra remuneration for revising the lists or serving the notices. This will not only keep down the expense, but make the clerk very careful, because if any extra labour is involved, through his making incorrect lists, the expense falls upon himself. There is no body of men who can make more correct voters' lists, and they are independent of the local legislature. The township council is perfectly independent of the local legislature, and so is the assessor appointed by it, and so is the township clerk. In the revision of the lists, under the present law, the judge, in most cases, employs the township clerk as revising officer for the time being, so that in reality the very same individual who revises the provincial lists also revises the Dominion lists. The people of every township municipality have it in their own hands to see that the assessors do their duty. I was twelve years at the head of one municipality, the lists were carefully revised every year, and we never had the judge in the township but once.

As regards the statement that it cost $200 to pay the judge to revise the lists in the county of Huron, there are fifteen rural and ten urban municipalities in that county, or twenty-five altogether, which makes only a little over $8 each municipality had to pay the judge and the constable and the other expenses of revising these lists. That is a long way short of what it cost to revise the list under the Dominion Elections Act. Under that Act, it never cost a riding less than $700 for the expenses of the judge and the other expenses in the revising of the lists.

Mr. BENNETT. I always like to hear the fervid indignation of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan). He is always indignant at any imputation on the good faith of his own party, and yet the hon. gentleman comes from a riding which—be it stated to its discredit—is the only county in Ontario where they have absolutely gone to work and cut up the townships in order to gerrymander their political opponents. Why, the hon. gentleman of all men in this House, should never assume an air of virtuous indignation.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). How many townships were cut up?

Mr. BENNETT. I thought that other gentleman from East Huron would at least have possessed his soul in patience, but he, like the other hon. gentleman, seems to glory in his shame.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). We have no shame to glory in.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, I will accept the hon. gentleman's word that he has no shame. I say it is no business of the assessor to make himself a political machine for either party, to go about finding these so-called manhood suffrage voters. The Bill provides that he shall make reasonable inquiries in order to ascertain what persons are entitled to go on in that form. But there is no penalty prescribed if he does not place them on the list. In the very county of Huron there were practically none of these men placed on the list before last year, and then a large sum was expended to have them put on in view of the coming election. The hon. gentleman says look at the penalties prescribed. Does he not know that in Ontario any man can, in the interest of the local government, defy the law, and he will be whitewashed by the Ontario local government. He should know that as an employee of the Ontario Government, because he has been in receipt of hundreds of dollars from the local government as lecturer to the farmers' institutes, and I do not wonder at his coming to the defence of his friends. It is notorious that in Ontario most disgraceful things have been done by the local officers. We know that in a case at Rat Portage the local government intervened and whitewashed the man and prevented the possibility of his being sent to jail.

The hon. gentleman knows very well that the lists in Ontario have always had more or less, a tinge of suspicion about them, and he knows very well, and I believe that is why he contends for the carrying of this Act, that the voters' lists as printed in this form will offer facility for wrong-doing and will not give the country the perfect list that the present law affords. Not only does the law contemplate that the assessor is not bound to make this inquiry, but it further says that if the assessor has omitted a name from the list, by placing an affidavit in the hands of the assessor the party is entitled to have his name upon the lists. I contend again that everything I said this afternoon is quite borne out by the facts.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMILLAN), I am quite sure, read the Act correctly, but his interpretation of it is not correct, for he made his statement this afternoon and it was backed up by the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) and several other hon. members that the ten copies of the Ontario lists furnished to members of this House and to defeated candidates for this House were the certified and corrected lists.

Mr. BENNETT.

Mr. McMILLAN. No. I never said that; do not put that to my charge, for I knew better.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) made it, then, and several members backed him up in it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I cannot help that, I did not make it.

Mr. TAYLOR. Now, I have here lists for 1897—

Mr. McMILLAN. I admit that these lists are not the revised copies.

Mr. TAYLOR. I was going to say that I had the lists for nine-tenths of the municipalities in my constituency. There was one short, and I wrote to the clerk of the municipality for it, the list for South Crosby. I have it here, and here is one polling subdivision in which eight or ten names, and another some twenty names are added by the judge; and, as my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) says, in many places there are even erasures, names struck out by the judge. Now, as the ten copies that are supplied to us do not contain these changes, what good are the lists to us? There are no copies of the final lists except the three copies revised by the judge, one copy kept for himself, one for the clerk of the peace and a third for the clerk of the municipality.

Then, when the election comes on are these lists reprinted and distributed? No, they are simply poll-books made out. And I want to ask the Solicitor General what he calls a "poll-book." What is the meaning of "poll-book" if it is not the very identical book that is made by the clerk of the municipality from the revised copy furnished by the judge? That is taken by the deputy returning officer and is the poll-book. If this book is sent out with some names written in, and some others struck out, what is to prevent the deputy returning officer from striking out any names he pleases? The voter comes in, but the deputy returning officer has run his pen through the name, and the man is not allowed to vote. He can get a tendered ballot if he swears he is the party named or purporting to be named, and that he has a right to vote; but that tendered ballot is not counted except in the case of a protest. I saw that myself in a case in the last election. A man came forward. His name was on the list, but it was misspelled, a letter or two being wrong. He took the oath that he was the person named or purporting to be named that he owned the property in respect of which the vote was given, but he was only given a tendered ballot and his ballot did not count—all this because his name was given as "Joseph T" when it should only have been "Joseph." I rose to correct the statement that the lists sent out are the revised lists.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am aware of that.

Mr. TAYLOR. But you corroborated the statement made by the member for North Norfolk that they were the corrected lists.

Mr. McMILLAN. I did not corroborate any such statement

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), this afternoon said with a good deal of energy that persons who would become 21 years of age within sixty days would be entitled to be placed on the list as voters in the provincial elections. The hon. gentleman was a little severe in his criticisms of the lawyers and told them that they knew no law, and he got up as a teacher and read the Act. Now, whatever confidence the hon. gentleman has in himself, the House will have some doubt of the hon. gentleman's infallibility upon law questions after I have read the section to which the hon. gentleman referred. I am quite confident the hon. gentleman did not grasp what the meaning of the section was. It says :

Any person who is rated, or entered, or entitled or liable to be rated or entered in the assessment roll, either as a farmer's son, or for real property or income of the amount requisite to entitle him to vote at municipal elections, and who will be of the age of twenty-one years within sixty days from the final revision and correction of the assessment roll, shall have the right to apply to the judge to have his name entered on the voters' list—

What voters' lists ?

—or upon the assessment roll and the voters' list, as entitled to vote at municipal elections.

The hon. gentleman was teaching law.

Mr. BENNETT. Fireside law.

Mr. MACDONALD. You have the fireside law.

Mr. CLANCY. I think I have heard my hon. friend from East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) ask if there has been any township divided by the local government in what is called the gerrymander of 1885. He asks what they were. I am going to give that hon. gentleman some information, too.

Mr. BENNETT. He knows it.

Mr. CLANCY. If the hon. gentleman knows it, I will not read it.

Mr. MACDONALD. If you intend to give the divisions of the county to which I belong, I may inform you that I know it already.

Mr. CLANCY. Perhaps the hon. gentleman protested against that part of it that affected his own division for the House of Commons. If he did, I have only to say that the world has lost something, for the hon. gentleman's protest has never been heard. For the provincial electoral division of South Huron which, I fancy, comprises part of the riding represented by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), Hullett and Turnberry were cut in two, the other half being put in the riding of West Huron.

Mr. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) knew the situation there he would say that it was properly done.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD. It is more easily to laugh than to speak common sense in connection with these matters. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) knew the different roads leading through that county he would know exactly why those divisions were made, and would not find fault but would know that what was done had been done in the interest of all parties concerned.

Mr. CLANCY. Perhaps I could give the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) some of the reasons for that. I can tell the hon. gentleman that in order to do that it was necessary to displace certain Conservative members and put in certain Liberals throughout the province. I do not apply it particularly to the hon. gentleman's county.

Mr. MACDONALD. Better confine your remarks to your own county.

Mr. CLANCY. It would be better to confine your remarks to one subject.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I am in order. I want to answer the hon. gentleman in this way. He commenced to illustrate the iniquity of the Mowat Government by showing us how the county of Huron was gerrymandered, and the reason why it was gerrymandered. Now, I think that in order to be fair he should continue his illustration with the county of Huron till he gets through. And why? Because I am in a position to put him right if he goes wrong.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I fail to see the connection of the gerrymander in Ontario with the subject under discussion. I do not know who is responsible for first raising it, but I would remind members of the committee that we are now discussing section 3.

Mr. CLANCY. Let me give a few figures. West Huron possessed 22,900 voters before the reconstruction, and when it ended it had 2,605 more. East Huron had 26,248, and after it was re-arranged, the number was reduced to 22,758. What was the object? Why, to place the then hon. member for East Huron, Mr. Gibson, in a safe place for the next election.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). It made no difference at all in the representation, consequently I fail to see that it made any difference whatever after the so-called gerrymander was made. Therefore, it shows that these cases are not at all political in their nature. If he can show that there was any difference made in the representation of the riding after the so-called gerry-mander, then there would be some point to his argument.

Mr. POWELL. I would suggest to the Solicitor General that this section stand over. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals will bear me out in the statements I make, in so far as this clause relates to New Brunswick. I do not blame the Solicitor General for not being acquainted with the local conditions in New Brunswick, but the law is inapplicable to the province of New Brunswick as it now stands. Our method of voting at the local elections in New Brunswick is not the method adopted in Dominion elections. There a man may prepare his own ballot, and a dozen, or two dozen, or as many as the returning officer will allow, seeing it does not interfere with the proceeding of the election—a crowd of men can go into a polling room and the ballots are placed in the box as fast as the returning officer can receive them out of their hands and his clerk record the voters. The result is that our local polling divisions frequently include a population of several thousand, whereas in the Dominion elections they can in no case contain more than sufficient to afford at the most 200 voters. Now, to give an illustration which is within the knowledge of the Minister of Railways and Canals, who knows pretty well the condition of affairs. Take in New Brunswick, the old election Act, which is on page 49 of the Acts of New Brunswick, 1889. Under this Act which regulates their size, the parish of Shediac is divided into two polling districts. I will not read the particular divisions, but those of us who are familiar with the locality know the size of the parish of Shediac. There are no less than 1,200 voters in that parish, and at the present time I feel safe in saying in fact that at least there are more than 1,200, as the Minister of Railways and Canals knows. The heavy poll is in the Barachois district, where there are fully 800 voters, and it is absolutely impossible in a Dominion election that those 800 people can poll their votes, especially if there is any swearing to be done. I have no doubt that in the county of Queen's the same difficulty will occur. And in the larger parishes throughout the different counties in the province, the same difficulty will occur. Take the parish of Dorchester, another very large parish in the electoral district of Westmoreland. There are 1,100 voters in that parish. There is one very large poll and two smaller ones. At the McGinley poll, I suppose there are 600 or 700 voters. There is another very large parish—Sackville, in which there are only three polling places. In one poll there are 800 voters on the list, and it is impossible for these votes all to be polled in one booth under the Dominion law. If there is any swearing to be done or objections taken, fully one-half the voters at least will be denied the privilege of voting. It is so to a less extent in the remaining parishes of Sallsbury and Moncton where the voting lists are too large for practical purposes.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to sub-paragraph b, of section 5, which I think will be the clause that will require to be amended in the case of the difficulty he suggests.

Mr. POWELL. That does not provide for it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. But that is the place where we should discuss the subject when we come to it.

Mr. POWELL. There may be a little collision between the words in this section and the paragraph the hon. gentleman mentions. Now, I am not finding any fault at all, because as between the two methods, federal and provincial, of making up the voters' lists, there is about as much dissatisfaction under one as under the other. I may say that throughout our province, and the provincial members will substantiate what I say, there has been no well-grounded complaint against either the Dominion election law or the local law, so far as the evil of intentionally denying any person the privilege of voting is concerned. Under our law, three men are selected as revising officers. They revise the assessment roll for the parish, and have the privilege of putting on the names of any additional parties who acquire the right to vote, or whose names do not already appear. Now, there should be some way of appeal from the action of these parties. If a man is not placed by them on the roll, he should have the privilege of appealing to the county court judge and have his name put on. I have known several cases where people have complained, rightly or wrongly of unfairness on the part of the revisers. If these men, who are men taken at random and know nothing about the principles of law, in some cases, have done wrong, even if I acquit them of improper motives, I would ask the hon. gentleman to make some amendment, or to add a section, allowing the privilege of appeal. The point I wish to make is, that if this subsection is to apply to New Brunswick it will be necessary to add words such as the following:—"Official lists such as adopted by the judge on appeal."

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not see that I can very well adopt the suggestion, so far as giving a right of appeal. If we interfere with the machinery of the local legislature of one province, we may be asked to similarly interfere with another province. I would suggest that this point be left over, and, with the assistance of the Minister of Railways, I shall probably be able to devise a scheme to meet the case of New Brunswick, because a difficulty might occur which must in some way be overcome.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No doubt, the point mentioned by the hon. member for Westmoreland was overlooked in the preparation of the Bill. Last year, a similar Bill was presented to the House, and it contained a provision whereby the difficulty would be overcome. I had not the opportunity of examining the Bill this year before it was presented; but, on referring to the Bill of last year, it will be found that arrangements were made for dividing the list of voters into three divisions, alphabetically, or for the erection of separate booths. I will look up the Bill of last year, and will consult with the Solicitor General.

Mr. POWELL. The present Minister of Railways was Attorney General of New Brunswick at the time the Act was passed. He made a suggestion that worked very well in the local elections, but it would not work here. It was, that two or more ballot-boxes should be provided in each case. The system worked very well in Westmoreland, where there are some large polling divisions in which there were two or three ballot-boxes, and where the election list was divided alphabetically. But it would not work under the proposed Dominion law.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What would be the objection?

Mr. POWELL. It could not be carried out, unless the suggestions of the Minister of Railways were carried out and separate booths provided. Then, provision would have to be made, authorizing the returning officer, or deputy returning officer, to divide up the polling lists. I desire to call attention to another matter, which is a very serious one. At present, in most parts of the province, in fact throughout the province, Dominion elections are conducted in a very orderly manner, and a stranger would scarcely know that an election was going on. Under our local law, in districts where many people come together on election day, it is rather a disreputable day by times.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think that remark should be confined to the south-eastern part of the province.

Mr. POWELL. I have no doubt that in the county represented by the hon. gentleman the population are very pious and orderly; but that is neither here nor there. Under the election law of the Mackenzie Government, the revising officer took the franchise list and divided it up, so that in no polling district there were more than 200 voters. The result was, that perfect quiet and order were maintained. New Brunswick occupies an exceptional position. We have a different mode of voting from that adopted by the Dominion, and that province and Prince Edward Island are exceptional in that regard.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I suggest that this matter be left over, and an amendment be carefully drawn and submitted at a subsequent sitting.

Mr. QUINN. I should like to present the point as to whether a poll-book of a polling subdivision can be called under this Act an official list or a list of voters. Under our law in the province of Quebec, an official list is one certified by commissioners who have examined it. No portion of it is official until it receives a certain certificate. Under this provision, it would not be an official list.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. By subsection "d." the expression "voters' list" or "list of voters" includes any poll-book or official list of persons entitled to vote at a provincial election. In the province of Quebec, we have two divisions as to lists, city and rural. In the cities, such as Quebec, and Montreal, there are commissioners, and their certificate is put on the list, and it is obtained from the chairman of the revising board by the revising officer, when an election comes on. That is called, under our law, a voters' list. The difficulty is as regards the word poll-book, which we inserted in order to meet the law of Ontario. Under the Ontario law, a voters' list is entirely different from a poll-book. The poll-book is simply a record that is kept of the votes as they are polled.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. QUINN. That is hardly correct.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. When I speak of the law in Ontario I am happy to receive information from gentlemen from that province. I refer now to paragraph 33 of the Ontario Elections Act. I see there that when an election comes on, the returning officer obtains from the clerk of the peace for the county, the voters' lists and from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery he obtains the poll book. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery does not at all supply the voters' lists.

Mr. QUINN. Apply that to Quebec.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. As far as Quebec is concerned the poll-book comes to the clerk at the time of the election, and is absolutely blank without a name in it, and there he records the name according to the votes registered. No matter how we look upon it the question is whether or not this paragraph is sufficient for the purpose intended. What we mean is, that the voters' list as used under this Act shall include that official list. It seems that it is sufficient to cover it. I am not wedded to the change; I suggest it because I think it will improve the phraseology of the clause.

Mr. QUINN. I must confess that I am rusty on the law as regards subdivisions. My recollection is that the subdivisions were made by the commissioners themselves, who after having gone through the whole voters' lists, then subdivided into the polling subdivision, 200 names each. I think that applies to the electoral districts of the city of Montreal.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The word used in the Bill is "the voting subdivision."

Mr. QUINN. If the Solicitor General is satisfied I am quite willing, but I thought it necessary to make the suggestion.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I sent for the Bill introduced last year, and the 28th section says: that where the polling division contains more than 200 qualified voters according to the voters' list, the returning officer shall provide separate polling divisions, for the names in alphabetical order. I think a provision in the present Bill similar to that will remove all the difficulties.

Mr. POWELL. I think it is better to have the territorial division of 200. In my own county the sheriff is a Liberal and I do not believe he is going to commit any fraud, but it would be better not to have the people aggregated together in one polling division. The election, I believe, would go on much more respectably if we had not the people huddled together.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I believe it would not be well to interfere with the local arrangement to the extent the hon. gentleman suggests. I have not seen any serious disorder occur to the extent that my hon. friend suggests, and if we divide those polling subdivisions it will interfere with the local arrangement. I think myself that it would be well to make the arrangement as provided in the former Bill.

Mr. BELL (Addington). I admire the very kind manner in which the hon. the Solicitor General has handled this Bill; but I wish to call his attention to the argument of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), that irregularities have occurred and may occur again unless the voters' lists are reprinted after the final revision by the judge. Notwithstanding all the law quoted by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) and his long experience in municipal matters, yet it is beyond doubt or contradiction that the voters' lists are not completed when they leave the court of revision. As the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) drew your attention to the careless manner in which these voters' lists were handled after they left the court of revision to be revised by the judge. I have had some experience of that kind of carelessness. During the last local elections in my county, in one township there were sixty-six names left off the list, and they were put on by the judge. This led to considerable confusion and difficulty. But I apprehend that there is no use of discussing this question here, because the answer comes back to us, if we are going to adopt the provincial voters' list, we have nothing to say about it. Now, I do think we are placed in a most humiliating position by handing over to the provinces the entire preparation and revision of the voters' list. If we have any grievances, there is no use of our mentioning them here, because the only answer we can expect is the whole question is under the jurisdiction of the provinces, therefore, I think we are only wasting time to continue this discussion.

Mr. WALLACE. I entirely disagree with the last statement of the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Bell). I think this is an opportune time, at any rate, to place our views on record. To me, this looks like a most humiliating proposition, and it places the Solicitor General in a most humiliating position. What is proposed? These gentlemen say we are going to adopt a new franchise law. What is it going to be? We will abolish the old one—that is the first thing. What is to take its place? The franchise laws of the provinces. They do not stop to inquire whether these are just laws, or whether they are suitable for our purposes in the Dominion Parliament. No such inquiry is made. We must simply swallow the whole thing. The Solicitor General has given a hasty examination of the Franchise Acts of the provinces, with whose laws he is not familiar; and he comes before us with a brief which has been put into his hands, and he has to defend everything in the Ontario list. If he cannot defend it, why does he come here to press it upon the Parliament of Canada? He cannot defend it, even with the assistance of the hon. member from Huron and the members from some other counties, because there are portions of it that cannot be defended. I say it is a humiliating position to have the Government and this Parliament placed in—that we are to adopt laws which the Solicitor General is so unfamiliar with. I presume—and it is no reflection upon him at all—that until a very short time ago he had not studied the election laws of the various provinces of this Dominion outside of his own province of Quebec; yet he gets up here and defends, and will have to defend, the whole of the Ontario law. We cannot, apparently, change it, because the next clause says that "the qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote shall be those established by the laws of that province," and so on. We ask, what are the laws of the province of Ontario? What are the laws of the province of Nova Scotia? We must go it blind, and accept them. The province of Nova Scotia has passed a Franchise Act for that province. We do not know the circumstances or conditions of that province: we do not know the exigencies of the political parties there; and yet this Parliament is asked to say that that is a perfect law, or is as nearly perfect as we are capable of making it. We cannot do it. Then, as to Ontario; those who are familiar with that province can point out innumerable defects in its election laws; yet the qualifications for voters, and, I presume, all the other machinery, are to be the same, or practically the same, for this House as those that exist for the local legislature. We ought to adopt the principle, that if the franchises of any of the provinces suit us, and are found the most admirable for the purpose, we shall adopt their good qualities—those portions which may be adapted to our circumstances and conditions; but we should not hand over the control of these voters' lists to assessors or other officers over whom we have no control whatever. Hon. gentlemen say that they are under the control of the local legislatures. Well, my experience, where I live, in the township of Vaughan, during an experience of twenty years of revising voters' lists, both for the province and the Dominion, has been, that we have no confidence in the voters' list until it gets into the hands of the judge; and you have to bring witnesses there at great expense to spend one or two days waiting until their turn comes to give evidence, to correct the defects of the voters' list, as made out by the assessor. We have to fight against these difficulties in the province, and now we are asked to have them introduced here. The most serious point of all is, that we shall have a most imperfect list. The most important consideration in framing a voters' list is, that no man who is entitled to have his name put on shall be deprived of his vote. But you cannot find anything like a perfect list in the local elections. That is proved by the fact that, although it professes to be a manhood suffrage, yet the number of votes polled has always been far less than the number of votes polled in the Dominion election, where the franchise is more restricted, showing that it leaves off many men who are entitled to be put on. We found that, in the last local election, although the revision took place only a few months before—in September, October or November. We found, when we came to the elections, that, although both candidates had taken a great deal of pains to get it perfected, the list was a very bad list indeed, and that bad list you are trying to force on this Parliament. I can only utter my strongest protest against so utterly unfair and unjust a measure.

Mr. POPE. I find in the Quebec Election Act, that it is provided that, as soon as the list of electors has come into force, it shall be the duty of the secretary-treasurer of the municipality to certify it in duplicate, and place one duplicate in the archives of the municipality, and transmit the other to the registrar of the registration division in which the municipality is situated. That, I deem, would be the official list, and we propose to do away with the word "poll-book," and leave the official list of persons entitled to vote at a provincial election. Would the hon. Solicitor General say that this is the list that would be found at every subdivision, or is the list to be found at the subdivisions a list prepared by the deputy from this official list of the people entitled to vote at that polling subdivision? So far as I can see, by the Quebec Act, the only official list would be the one deposited with the registrar.

Mr. HUGHES. Inasmuch as it is possible that there may be some changes made in relation to the voters' lists used in the provinces, why not let this section stand over?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. For what reason?

Mr. HUGHES. Because if the hon. gentleman proposes to adopt the suggestion I took the opportunity of making the other day, the term "voters' lists" would have to be changed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I see the hon. gentleman's point.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It seems to me there is much to be considered in the remarks of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) with regard to the effect of this subsection. It is proposed to make the voters' lists in the different provinces the lists upon which the Dominion elections shall be run. In listening to the discussion of this Bill, and more particularly to the discussion in committee, I was very much struck with the fact that we are asked, to a very great extent, to vote it through without knowing exactly what it means. When we find that the hon. Solicitor General, with his very great ability and the great amount of time and attention he has devoted to this Bill, is not very sure himself, how can members of this House, who have not the time and a great many of whom have not the technical knowledge which the hon. Solicitor General possesses, be expected to understand what they are doing? We are asked to vote that certain enactments in the provincial legislatures shall form a proper basis for the voters' lists of this Parliament. I as a member of this Parliament, am called upon to determine what shall be the voters' list in the province of Ontario for an election to this Parliament. I must confess that although I have bestowed some little attention to the debate, I have a very hazy idea about that matter, and the learned Solicitor General, to some extent, has to depend upon the views which hon. members from Ontario give in regard to it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not conceal that, and if the hon. gentleman will take the schedule I have printed and attached to the Bill, he will find all he wants.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If my memory serves me as far back as yesterday afternoon, I think the hon. Solicitor General wanted light from hon. gentlemen on this side who are interested in the working of the Act in Ontario. When the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) was speaking, my hon. friend the Solicitor General stated frankly that he did not profess to understand the Ontario Act in the same way, for example, as he did the Quebec Act.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would not profess for a moment to know as much about the Ontario law as a gentleman of the standing at the Ontario bar of the hon. member for West Simcoe.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is all my point. My learned and hon. friend the Solicitor General does not understand me, for a moment, as imputing the slightest fault to him or as imputing that he does not know everything about these provincial Acts that any one in his place would be expected to know. But what I suggest is that we are dealing with enactments of which we have but a mere summary in the very useful memorandum which the hon. gentleman has appended to this Bill, and we cannot get a very good idea of the provincial legislation from that. But the great demerit is not only that, but something further. We are not only invited to pass upon legislation which we do not understand, but to pass an Act providing that everything which these provincial legislatures shall enact in the future will be all right. My hon. friend will suggest to me, I suppose, that if the provincial legislatures alter their enactments from time to time, we have the power to correct those enactments so far as they are applicable to elections to this Parliament; and I concede that at once to be the case, but what does that amount to? It means simply that we have to keep a watch over the principal legislatures and check their enactments from time to time. That simply brings us back to the principle that we ought to deal with this matter ourselves. But even if we do adopt the provincial law, I would suggest that we should not go beyond saying that the provincial enactments, as they exist at present, and the bases on which the voters' lists are now made up in the different provinces, shall be the bases on which we shall proceed in the future. I do not see why we should pledge ourselves now to the wisdom of what any provincial legislature may pass in the future.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That question has been thoroughly threshed out in the discussion on the second reading, and we have adopted the principle that the basis of our franchise shall be the provincial franchise. I may, however, suggest to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), who has said that I was rather in a humiliating position, that he must know that this is the lenten season and that to be in a humiliating position is not therefore out of place. I am not so sure, however, that when I ask, in a very humble way, I admit, for light from some of my legal friends from Ontario, it was a very bad thing after all; and if my hon. friend from Halifax, who tells us he knows nothing about this, will ask for light on any particular point on which he desires to be informed, I shall endeavour to explain it to him to the best of my ability.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think the hon. Solicitor General appreciates the difficulty which has been mentioned. He attempts to meet it by saying that the principle of this Bill is the adoption of the provincial franchises, whether we understand them or not.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We are supposed to understand them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is, perhaps, a violent supposition. I think the hon. gentleman himself would have difficulty in recounting now, without reference to his memorandum, the different franchises in the different provinces. We have passed upon the principle of adopting the provincial franchises, and we now come to the very important question of the procedure, the machinery, by which this Bill can be carried out. The voters' lists come within the subject of procedure. The hon. gentleman is very kind to confess—and that is not the slightest reflection upon himself or upon any other hon. gentleman who would be in his position—that it is impossible for him to speak with assurance with regard to the working of this machinery, except as regards the province of Quebec, where, of course, his experience justifies him in taking a very strong stand and in giving the committee a great deal of useful information. But he went on to admit that he cannot speak with any assurance with regard to the working of these different laws in the other provinces. Therefore, we not only have to adopt the laws of the local legislatures with regard to the franchise, but, what is more dangerous, their different machinery for giving voters the opportunity of exercising their franchise. On that very important subject, the discussion this evening has made it apparent that we are groping in the dark. We are in the dark as to what constitutes a poll-book in the different provinces and how these lists are made up. Nothing to my mind could make more clear the mistake the Government are making, could show more clearly that it is a plunge in the dark, than the admission of the Solicitor General that he is unable to tell us how these different systems are worked and the procedure to be adopted under a system controllable by this House, we should be not only in control of the system but in possession of certain and accurate information as to its working.

Mr. ERB. It appears to me that we are wasting a good deal of time on voters' lists. In reading over this Bill, I was struck with surprise to see that in Prince Edward Island they have no voters' list at all. That set me wondering whether the people of Prince Edward Island are more intelligent than the rest of us and whether there is more political morality and less partisanship than among the people of this province. If it is possible in Prince Edward Island to conduct an election without a voters' list and conduct it satisfactorily to the people—and I suppose elections there are held in a manner satisfactory to the people—why is it that we of the other provinces could not do the same? To do without a voters' list would be to save a great deal of expense and a great deal of wrangling. I would like to hear the Minister of Marine and Fisheries give an account of how they conduct the elections there and whether they are satisfactory. If they are, I think we could not do better than adopt the election machinery in use in Prince Edward Island.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I may tell my hon. friend (Mr. Erb) that the system that prevails in Prince Edward Island is perfectly satisfactory to the people, there is never the slightest hitch or the slightest trouble. It is largely an agricultural community. The province is divided into small districts where every elector is known. But though we get along exceedingly well, I should be sorry to try to force that system upon the large towns or upon the other provinces. The principle that this House has endorsed is that we should take as the franchise for this House the franchises which are found to be satisfactory in the several provinces. And in doing that, we adopt the machinery which experience has shown to be best adapted to carry out the end we have in view.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would the hon. gentleman state what that is?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. As to Prince Edward Island, the returning officer divides the constituency into districts of about 200 voters. On the morning of election, a man comes up to vote—

Mr. HUGHES. How do they know whether there are 200 or 2,000 voters?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is not the slightest difficulty in working the system. It has been working for forty years and no difficulty has arisen. The returning officer knows his county and he subdivides it, and the divisions are known to everybody and have been for years. At the polls are inspectors on each side and a deputy returning officer who sits as a kind of judge to receive the votes. A man presents himself to vote and gives his name. If his vote is challenged by one of the inspectors, he can if he chooses, take the oath swearing that he has the qualifications necessary to vote. But it must be understood that each individual is known. It is not like a large city, where, very often, the voter is unknown. My hon. friend from King's (Mr. Macdonald) knows that the system works admirably.

Mr. DAVIN. If his qualifications is questioned, he may be called upon to take the oath?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly. His name is entered on the poll-book and the fact that he has been sworn is also entered, in case of a scrutiny.

Mr. DAVIN. We have the same system in the North-west, and it works well.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The character of the population, is no doubt, somewhat similar. Under such circumstances, it works well. I do not know how it would work in large cities.

Mr. WALLACE. Why?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Because the people are not known. Take the case of the city of Toronto, for instance, how would it be known whether a man had a right to vote or not?

Mr. WALLACE. According to the hon. Minister it does not matter, when this man comes up to vote, whether he has the right to vote or not. When objected to, he takes the oath and votes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is a great deal of difference between a man taking an oath who is personally known to the deputy returning officer and the inspectors on either side, and that of a stranger who would at once disappear and nobody know where he was to be found. People do not take false oaths in the presence of their neighbours and friends.

Now I would like to submit a point for the consideration of the committee. What is the sense of discussing the principle of this Bill in Committee of the Whole? That principle has been affirmed. We have adopted the qualifications of the several provinces, and we are here to carry that out. I would suggest to the committee that it is not fair to discuss the principle of the Bill at this stage. We have taken up the discussion in committee in order to discuss the details. The Solicitor General has told the committee, with perfect frankness, that if any provisions of the Bill require amendment, he is prepared to consider any suggestions that may be made, and if he finds it desirable, to accept it, and I think that in that he has gone as far as hon. gentlemen can ask him to go. What are we discussing? Section 3 of the Bill, the interpretation clause, the question what a "voters' list" or a "Dominion election" may be. I would respectfully submit to the committee that we will never make progress in this way. When we come to section 5, which provides for the adoption of the provincial franchises, objections may be raised and these objections ought to be considered when they are raised. But to discuss these matters now, seems to me to be beating the air, because it is aside from the clause before the committee.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would occupy just a moment to point out to my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) that, while there is great force in what he says, I have been sitting here and listening with all the attention I could as a layman to half a dozen gentlemen learned in the law, and I find that they are absolutely unable to agree upon the construction of this very simple clause. What is the difficulty? The difficulty is that you have undertaken to adopt the legislation of half a dozen different legislatures, and, therefore, the question of the principle again presents itself. It strikes at the very principle of the Bill. If half a dozen gentlemen learned in the law cannot, after an hour's discussion, arrive at a solution as to what is the meaning and what will be the effect of this law, I want to ask you what the general public, what those uneducated in the law who are going to work out this law in all these various provinces can do?

It appears to me that the very fact that this difficulty has presented itself, naturally makes people question whether we have not made a mistake in adopting a principle which, when it comes to be applied, is found to be so impracticable. But that is not all. If we were adopting provincial laws, if we were basing a franchise for this Dominion upon the franchises of the various provinces, as they stand to-day, that would be bad enough. But there would not be a tithe of the difficulty that presents itself when you remember that, after you have arrived at a conclusion as to how it is best to solve this question and what form this clause should take, three or four of these legislatures, before the next session of Parliament, may change all these laws upon which we are now basing our law. Where are we then? Why, it will be a case of confusion worse confounded, when you attempt to work out the principle that has been adopted of taking the laws of all the various legislatures, not the laws as they are to-day, but the laws as they are changed from year to year, and attempt to take them as a franchise for this Dominion. I am much inclined to agree with the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Calvert), especially after hearing the statement of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I am inclined to think that it would be better to get rid of this whole difficulty by adopting the plan that the member for West Middlesex has suggested, and which my hon. friend the Minister says forty years of experience has proved to work in the most admirable manner.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In an agricultural community.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It appears to me, that great difficulties will arise by attempting to work out such a complicated system.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I submit to my hon. friend, that these difficulties are purely imaginary. Where does the difficulty come in? Section 1 enacts "That the expression 'electoral district' means any place or territorial area in Canada entitled to return a member to serve in the House of Commons." Is there any difficulty about that? Nobody has suggested any possible difficulty about it. "The expression 'Dominion election,' or 'election,' means an election of a member to serve in the House of Commons." Where is the difficulty about that? "The expression 'provincial election' means an election of a member to serve in the legislative assembly, or House of assembly, or general assembly, of a province of Canada." What does that mean? No difficulty about that. "The expression 'voters' lists,' or 'list of voters,' includes, when provincial lists are referred to, any poll-book or official list of persons entitled to vote at a provincial election." I have not heard any difficulty suggested about that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Solicitor General himself proposed to amend that very clause.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Solicitor General has amended that; he thought the words "any poll-book" were a surplusage, and I agreed with him; I did not see the use of them. And they were struck out.

Mr. CLANCY. The objection to that is, that involves the consequence of the adoption of the provincial lists in section 5 and subsections. If this is passed, and there was any alteration made later on, as to the qualification of voters, then we would have to go back to the old sections. The suggestion was made by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes), that that should be allowed to stand, pending any changes that might be considered by the Government.

Mr. DAVIN. Nothing can be more appropriate than that we should discuss at this stage the principle of the measure. It need not be supposed that the minority who voted, agreed with the principle of this Bill. It will be remembered that the Solicitor General, in introducing this Bill, made a very meagre explanation of it, and I understood from him that, on going into committee, he was to explain the Bill further. But when the highest legal authority on the Government side in this House tells us that he is comparatively ignorant of the provincial franchises, except that of Quebec, and when the Minister of Marine and Fisheries tells us, as an argument why we should forthwith pass this clause, that these provincial franchises have worked well, I think we have a right to consider what those provincial franchises are. Take the province of Manitoba. Within three short years, from 1889 to 1892, changes were made in that province in regard to the franchise, that reflected undying ignominy on the perpetrators of that legislation. And yet the hon. Minister tells us that worked well. It is notorious all over the North-west Territories that the majority in Manitoba consider the present law, under which local elections take place, as an outrage on justice. I have in my hand here the Revised Statutes of Manitoba, to which I wish to call attention. They have manhood suffrage, and this is the way in which there the lists are made out :

When it has been determined to make and revise a list of electors in one or more electoral divisions, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall, by proclamation, appoint a proper person to be called " a registration clerk "—

In fact, an enumerator.

—for each of such electoral divisions, and, by such proclamation, fix the date for the closing of the list in each electoral division by the registration clerk. Such date shall not be less than four weeks from the date of such proclamation.

Now, here comes an arrangement about divisions, because either a judge or a barrister of three years' standing may be appointed to revise the lists.

A court for the revision of lists of electors shall for that purpose be held in each electoral division, as hereinafter provided. * * * * * Whenever any such judge or barrister is unable or neglects, within two weeks after the date of such proclamation, to appoint a day for the revision of the list for any electoral division assigned to him not later than the day above limited, then the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may assign such electoral division to some other judge or barrister.

So that, if it should be in any division the interest of the party in power to delay the revision, all they have to do is, to tip the wink to the revising judge, or barrister, to neglect doing his duty, and all he has to do is, to postpone advising the Lieutenant-Governor to appoint another revising barrister, or another judge, to attend to the work. I have in my hand evidence that that very thing was done, and, in consequence of that being done, 165 electors were kept off. I have other evidence of other outrages.

Mr. T. Seaman writes :

Yours to hand re registration clerk and revising barrister, and in reply thereto I would say that personally I know but little re the action of these officers. I was ill at the time of Monkman's visit, and did not see him. The following, however, came under my observation : C. de Sumericourt (the reeve of this municipality) and myself went through the list as prepared, and found fully one-third of those entered to be on the list omitted therefrom, so far as our part is concerned. We filled in applications to all we knew that were so omitted, and de Sumericourt took the affidavits that he personally knew them, but out of about forty applications only three or four names were placed on by the revising barrister, Monkman. Amongst others, we applied to have on were Dan Macdonald and Robert Holland, of 28, 18, 2. Macdonald was the owner of the land and house, and Holland lived with him. Macdonald was known to be a strong Conservative, while Holland promised to vote for Burrows. Macdonald was not put on at the court of revision, but Holland was. They contended the forms we filled in were not the proper ones, but why put on one man and leave the other off ? Besides, Gilmour sent me the forms, and no doubt they were all right. At the settlement of Oak Point, the following to my knowledge were entitled to be on the list :—Pierre Chartrand, Joseph Lucier, Alexander Desjarlis, sr., Alex. Desjarlis, jr., Alex. Desjarlis, 18, 18, 5, Baptiste Lamoureux, Alexander Lamoureux, George Lamoureux, Baptiste Bruno, Moses Lucier, Stanislaus Desjarlis, François Desjarlis, Louis Desjarlis, and Antoine Desjarlis ; but only the two latter were on the list, while every name, or nearly so, appears on our municipal voters' list.

So that though they appeared on the much-belauded municipal lists they were not found on the list for the local election !

These people were natives, several of whom were between forty and fifty years of age, and were born at Oak Point. It was known that to a man they would vote against Burrows. The policy seemed to be to leave off as many as possible bearing French names, and to put on every one with an Icelandic name, many of whom were in Winnipeg, and had not lived here for many years. A young Iclander taught school here two months in the summer—he never lived here before, and left when the school closed. His name was on the list, while scores of people that had resided here for years were left off. To make it almost impossible for our friends to be put on at the court of revision, the courts were placed on the extreme end of the settlement, and many would have to go forty miles to get their names on. You are aware that it is the duty of the registration clerk to give notice by posting notices in all post offices immediately after his appointment, and requiring those desirous of placing names on the list to send the names to him at least, I think, five days before the list closed. The notice reached here on October 30, and the list closed November 5, or exactly the time allowed to send in names, while the clerk lived about 150 miles away, so that it was impossible to place names on in the first instance.

Fancy this ! Here is an outrage. The notice reached them six days before the list was closed.

You should, however, see Glen Campbell. He can give you a far worse story than this. You are at liberty to make whatever use you like of the foregoing, and, if it necessary, to mention my name as the author.

I have here the affidavit of Heriot C. Ross :

District of Lake Dauphin.

Province of Manitoba.

I, Heriot C. Ross, of the village of Dauphin, in the electoral division of Dauphin, province of Manitoba, clerk, agent for Glenlyon A. Campbell, one of the candidates at the recent election held in the electoral division of Dauphin, to elect a member to the Provincial Legislature, make oath and say :

That I attended the several courts of revision held by Albert Monkman, revising barrister, and that the accompanying exhibit, marked "A," is a list of the names applied to be placed on the list of electors at the said several courts of revision, and that the said Albert Monkman refused to state whether he would or would not add such names to the list of electors of the said electoral division.

And I know this to be true in substance and in fact.

(Sgd.) HERIOT C. ROSS.

Sworn before me in the village of Dauphin, this 29th day of February, 1896.

CHARLES HICKS,

A Commissioner in B.R.

Here is Exhibit A :

List of names for which applications were made to the revising barristers at the different courts of revision in the electoral division of Dauphin, to be placed on the list of electors, to be used in the elections held in January, 1896, and which at such courts he refused to state would be added or rejected.

Then follows a list of 165 names, every one of whom was entitled to vote. Then there is the following note :—

Many of the persons whose names are given above, and for whom applications were made to add at the court of revision, have resided in the constituency for a number of years.

(Sgd.) HERIOT C. ROSS.

That is the state of things which, according to the hon. Minister of Marine, has been working well. Here is a letter from Wawanesa, Manitoba, February 28, 1896 :

The time was rather short for them. I have only 7—17 and 8—17 fairly full, part of 7—16 and the numbers in 7—18. There are fully 200 names off that should have been on, and about 75 on should have been off. We don't claim all these Conservative, but goes to show had there been a court of revision things would have been different. Of course, the great majority were Conservative. The thing was managed in this way. Mr. Graham and his friends would go to Conservatives, as they came to me and said : "There is no call for any action on your side ; if you have not the time, as we are placing every one on we find entitled to be on. We are using the old lists—municipal, provincial and Dominion—and giving every one fair-play." With such arguments as this, I was satisfied to let them do the work, for, as I told both Haddow and Graham, at the court of revision, we could rectify errors. When it came near time for court of revision, I saw Haddow, and asked him for lists, then twelve days before. He said, "None yet received from the printer." I saw him again after this. He said, "There can be no court of revision now, for there is not time necessary to post lists, and none received from the printer yet." I had sent in some 28 names previous to November 4, and I was anxious to see if they were on. Time went by. Court of revision was to be on Thursday, the 19th. On Tuesday, the 17th, the first list came to our postmaster. I at once wired W. A. Macdonald, Brandon, for postponement of court, or what was going to be done. He replied : "McLeod says, 'No court in Wawanesa, as no applications or objections.'" We found that nearly every one of my 28 names were left off the lists. Now, why were the lists sent to Emerson to be printed ? I would like to know the government reason. My own solution of the deal is this : In 1892, Bailey, printer, came here dead on Greenway, sounded me as to Tory pap, said he had not been used right by Greenway, and if the Government at Ottawa would give him patronage, he would give the Conservative the support of his paper, "The Enterprise," in both houses. He said Greenway owed his $700 for election expenses in Morden district (not E. D.), that he (B.) had been the means of Greenway's election, that Greenway had induced him to go to Morden by promise of patronage, and after he (Bailey) going to some $400 expenses, Greenway refused to carry out his promises. I told Bailey I would see. In the following June, 1893, I was waited on by a couple of Conservatives, saying Bailey had been writing, and they came to see about it. I said, "Bailey no good, and using us to squeeze Greenway." In the following August, Bailey came in the store and showed the document from the Attorney General's department to the effect that he (Bailey) was to have the printing of several things, public health pamphlets and other things, and he (Bailey) agreed to drop his opposition to the local government.

I ask the hon. member (Mr. LaRivière) how many miles is Emerson away from—

Mr. LaRIVIERE. A hundred miles away.

Mr. DAVIN. Did you say 200 miles away ?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. A hundred miles away.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, that is a long distance.

I have no proof of any contract only Bailey's own words and the fact of from that time to this Bailey has done all in his power for the Greenway Government. His paper did not pay here so he went to Emerson and though Graham, Fowler and others here strongly objected, Greenway and Sifton insisted on him (Bailey) printing the South Brandon voters' lists, and he being a fit one for dirty work so managed that they did not reach Haddow, the clerk, until Friday night, the 13th, or only four clear days, not counting Sunday, before the court was called to sit, thereby not giving us any chance to object or apply—Graham's action in compiling the lists is explained by the fact. It was generally understood the Conservatives were going to run Reeve Canall of Oakland, and as Canall is very popular and strong, living near Graham, Graham used everything in his power to strengthen himself—all we can honestly complain of is the fact of no chance of adding and objecting on account of no court.

I see that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) as usual is not in his place to-night. It would be interesting if he were here for him to tell what part he took with Greenway in insisting that Bailey should have the printing of these lists at Emerson. We are getting on now to the witching hour of night ; it is twenty minutes past eleven.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And you agreed to put this Bill through committee this session of the House.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes ; does my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) remember the way you and your friends went on in 1885 ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not talking about that ; I am talking about the solemn agreement made across the floor of this House.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, and in 1885, you passed the second reading of the Franchise Act, and you went on arguing and discussing and jabbing for three months in committee.

Mr. QUINN. Where is the Minister of the Interior at the witching hour of night ?

Mr. DAVIN. I have been so devoted to politics now for many years that I forget these descriptive allusions of Byron to scenes of revelry. But I think it will be found in Childe Harold, and that they be- seem the terpsichorean movements of our friend the Minister of the Interior. Any way, it was before the battle of Waterloo, and as described in Childe Harold, that ball took place in the city of Brussels ; but I think the ball to-night may be in commemoration of a battle quite as disastrous to the young Napoleon of the Liberal party as was the ball at Brussels to the great Napoleon of history. The ball at Brussels described by Childe Harold was previous to the defeat of Napoleon, but this ball to-night is subsequent to defeat of the young Napoleon, the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The Duke of Yukon.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend (Mr. La-Rivière) suggests the Duke of Yukon, but I do not think that just now there are any strawberry leaves for the Duke of Yukon ; the spring frost has nipped the strawberry leaves in the bud.

Mr. BENNETT. This is the winter of their discontent.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, it is their winter—

Mr. TALBOT. That is all very interesting.

Mr. DAVIN. Not half so interesting as the beautiful countenance of my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot).

Mr. TALBOT. Do you think so ?

Mr. DAVIN. I can assure my hon. friend (Mr. Talbot) that nothing gives me so much pleasure as when he interrupts me. I turn around and I look at him and I remember the words of the poet Keats :

- A thing of beauty is a joy for ever,
- Its loveliness increases, it will never
- Pass into nothingness, but still will keep
- A bower quiet for us and a sleep
- Full of sweet dreams and health and quiet
- breathing.

Every time he interrupts me he affords me an æsthetic joy.

Mr. TALBOT. And you are quite an æsthetic man.

Mr. DAVIN. Now, Sir, I will be able to show the Solicitor General, and I will be able to show my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that the "Free Press" which is supporting them at the present moment, and has been supporting them for a couple of years past, and has always been a Liberal Organ ; the "Free Press," of Winnipeg has denounced the provincial election lists as an outrage upon justice ; an outrage, in that it completely throws into the hands of a partisan government the manipulation of the making of the voters' lists, so that in every constituency they can gouge the electorate, and make it a certainty that their partisan men shall be returned. In fact I have heard it said by an independent man in Winnipeg, that in the last election Greenway would not have allowed a Conservative to be elected were it not, in the first place that it would have been so patent that rascality had been perpetrated, and in the next place, that if all Liberals were returned he would have a more dangerous opposition than if he had allowed six or seven Conservatives to come in, and so he permitted, for the sake of appearance, a few conservatives to get into the legislature. Is it to be expected for one moment that whether we are in the committee stage of a Bill or not and when it comes to a question of allowing Dominion members of Parliament for Manitoba to be elected under such an outrage of justice, we should sit 'sub silentio' and allow such a Bill to pass without discussion. I may have no objections to accepting the voters' lists of the various provinces as a basis of the franchise, but to accept them without any safeguard or qualification, and to allow under this Bill six or seven members from Manitoba to be forced into this House without having a majority of the electorate behind them ; pushed through the doors of this free Parliament by the foul hand of corruption ; a mockery to this free Parliament ; an outrage on everything like justice. Before we will tolerate any such thing as that, we will fight and fight ; that is my feeling. I owe it to Manitoba and the west. I will certainly fight hard rather than sit tamely by and allow such a thing as that to happen ; and my hon. and learned friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should fight by my side, because in what he said about the local franchise in Prince Edward Island he implied that if the local franchise in any province is not fair, he did not want it, and if it did not work well he did not want it. He says that in the province of Prince Edward Island it works well, and I believe it does, because the same thing works well with us. Why not put in a clause providing that in the province of Manitoba a man who is entitled to vote, whether his name is on the list or not, can come up and swear himself on at the poll? Why not do that? Because, forsooth, the answer is, this Parliament would then be taking a slight hand in fixing its own franchise; it would be putting its little finger to the machinery of fixing its own franchise, and such an outrage as that cannot be tolerated for a moment! In the face of what fell from the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that the franchise in Prince Edward Island works well, what answer has he to the offer I make? He may say, you have a big city in Winnipeg. Well, except the big city. It is not more true in Prince Edward Island than it is in the rural districts of Manitoba that every man knows every other man. Manitoba has not a congested population. The rural districts of Manitoba are peopled by respectable farmers, just as are the rural districts of the North-west Territories and Prince Edward Island and Ontario. I have read some of their names to you. There are 165 of them who have been sworn to. If their names have been left off by carelessness, or by an infamous arrangement like sending the list to Emerson 100 miles away to be printed, and then coming back when it was altogether too late, let them have the same right as their brother electors in the North-west Territories and in Prince Edward Island, to swear that they have been residents of the province for two or three years and of the constituency for three months. The only objection to that is that it would be allowing this Dominion Parliament to put its little finger to the machinery that is to bring the electoral lists into force in Manitoba, and that would be such an outrage on the symmetry of our beautifully symmetrical Act, which has not a single principle in it except the principle of heterogeneity, so that it might be described as Dr. Johnson described higgledy-piggledy, as a conglomerated mass of heterogeneous matter.

Mr. HUGHES. I hope the Solicitor General will see the advisability of letting this clause stand. So far as I am personally concerned, I could not accept the provincial list of Ontario, but by a very slight amendment the provincial franchises might be made the basis of our list. Even though the Government do not see their way to have one uniform franchise from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but persist in adopting the franchises of the various provinces, I think in all fairness there should be some little concessions made, so as to provide for such names as have been pointed out by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) being placed on the list in some simple way. If that is done, this definition of "voters' list" would require some amendment. I would respectfully suggest that the Solicitor General allow the clause to stand.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the debate goes over, I want to refer to a statement which has been made by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries since the hon. leader of the Opposition has left the House. He made the statement that a bargain was made across the floor of the House that this Bill was to be passed to-night. I did not, nor did any one else on this side of the House, so understand it, and I do not think he can find in "Hansard" that there was any such agreement.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am glad the hon. gentleman has brought that matter up. By the well-known usage of the House it is customary for the leaders to make provisional agreements with reference to public Bills. During the debate on Friday night last the leader of the Opposition suggested that we should adjourn. The leader of the Government was not here, and as I was leading the House I consulted with the hon. leader of the Opposition. I told him that it was the desire of the leader of the Government that the division on the second reading should take place that night. He consulted with the hon. member for York, who sat beside him, and he said that he could not agree that it was possible to take a division that night, but he thought it could be taken on Tuesday. I said I would go and see the leader of the Government, and come back and if possible make an agreement. I came back, and the hon. leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for York and myself, acting for the leader of the Government, agreed that the division on the second reading would take place on Tuesday night, and that the Bill would be permitted to go through committee on Friday—at this sitting.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Go to or go through committee?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Go through committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am stating what took place—that the Bill would be allowed to go through committee to-night, so far as he was able to control the Opposition and advise them, and he would use his best efforts and exertions to that end. I could not ask him to say more than that. I communicated that statement to the leader of the Government, and on that agreement we consented to postpone the division until the following Tuesday night. Hon. gentlemen can carry that out or not. I submitted it to the hon. leader of the Opposition as what took place at that time.

Mr. TAYLOR. Was it made across the floor of the House?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was not made openly in the House. The hon. gentleman came over here and sat for a moment, and I went over and sat beside him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is a great pity the hon. gentleman did not refer to this before the leader of the Opposition left.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The argument was made when the leader of the Opposition was here and made twice to-night—when he came over to this side and when I crossed over to him.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman said, the first time, that the agreement was made across the floor of the House, but now he tells us it was not.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was not made publicly from my seat speaking across the floor of the House to the hon. leader of the Opposition, but it was made in the way I have stated.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is nothing clear. The leader of the Opposition left this Chamber at a quarter past eleven to-night. I happened to go out of the House with him and am satisfied I would have heard about this arrangement, but I heard no such observation from him nor from the hon. gentleman. I was following the debate very closely and am satisfied that if there had been any impression in the mind of the leader of the Opposition that the debate was to close to-night, he would have communicated it to me. From the time the hon. gentleman mentions this conversation took place, no hon. gentleman on this side heard a word about the arrangement.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. leader of the Opposition may or may not have communicated it, but it was made in the presence of the hon. member for York, who sits next to him.

Mr. WALLACE. According to the statement of the hon. Minister, there was no knowledge of that communicated to the House, and no consent of the House obtained. There was nothing but the conversation which he says he had with the leader of the Opposition. I was rather astounded at the assurance of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, when he said last Friday night that the House must that night come to a division. Well, Mr. Chairman, the House does not come to a division until it is ready. No Government can force the House to a division if the members are anxious to speak, and the members were anxious to discuss this measure, so that the House was not ready to come to a division on Friday night, it was late, as we all know, on the following Tuesday, when the House came to a division, and even then some hon. members, who were anxious to speak, had to be closed off. But to-night we have had the Minister of Marine and Fisheries get up on two different occasions and attempt to stay discussion. He took up the Bill, read various clauses, told us we could not object to the one or to the other because we had discussed the principle of the Bill, and that principle had been ratified. There was therefore, he said, to be no further discussion. On every clause that comes up, we are to have the same autocratic statement that we must not discuss it, because the principle has already been decided. Mr. Chairman, we are going to discuss this Bill, and it comes with very bad grace when the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, whose record we know in 1885, when he spent days and weeks and months in discussing a Franchise Bill—

Mr. TAYLOR. After the principle was affirmed.

Mr. WALLACE. After the principle was affirmed, too. I remember, as great a man certainly as the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the late Sir John Macdonald, saying that a Franchise Bill was of such an important character that a whole session should really be devoted to that one subject. Yet we have the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who does not know anything about this Bill, who cannot tell the franchise of any one province except that simple one of his own, saying he is going to push this through to-night. He tells us that we must put this complicated Bill, with all those different franchises of all the different provinces—indefensible as many of them are—through in the one night. We are not going to put them through in the one night, and not any sooner than we think it proper and convenient. These matters are too important to be hastily rushed through. We have had an interesting and important discussion here to-night, and yet the hon. Minister gets up on two different occasions and attempts to domineer and dictate to the House by saying to us: You must not discuss this Bill; all you have to do is to pass the clauses. That thing cannot be done. The Minister of Marine must understand that he cannot force a Bill through the House in that arbitrary and despotic manner. This Bill was being discussed in a very interesting way to me. I was listening occasionally, and taking a little part in the debate, and we are going to discuss it still further.

We have heard the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) point out the inequalities of the Manitoba franchise law, and produce incontrovertible evidence, the sworn statement of an honourable man, of the iniquity practiced under that franchise. We are asked to-night to shut our eyes and open our mouths and just swallow this Bill whole without any consideration. I should have expected that the gentlemen who are in charge of the Government would have got up and explained or done something to answer the charges and statements made by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). But instead of that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries gets up and says we must pass this Bill through to-night; we must finish a job which should take months for its consideration. That is no answer to the objections of the hon. member for West Assiniboia, though I am free to confess that the hon. gentleman who has the Bill in charge (Mr. Fitzpatrick) is manifesting the most courteous demeanour towards those who are discussing the Bill, and he misunderstood me a while ago when he took it for granted that I said that he was in a humiliating position because he did not know the law of Ontario. I wish to explain that he entirely misunderstood me, because I believe that he is the only member of this House to-day who does understand the laws of the various provinces; he is the only one who has made a study of them. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is familiar with the law of Prince Edward Island, but I am sure he is not with any other franchise law in this Dominion. The Solicitor General does know the laws; he has made a special study of them recently.

There was reference made this evening to the tendering ballot in the province of Ontario. There was never a bigger fraud committed on the people, because I am told that though that law has been in force something like twenty years, authorizing the tender of a ballot, no tendered ballot has ever yet been counted. Yet that useless tendered ballot, which has utterly failed of having any effect in any elections, but has simply deprived the voter of his vote, is retained in this Bill. I know of a dozen tendered ballots, tendered at an election by men entitled to vote, but which were not counted. These men went to vote and were told that their names were not on the list. They showed that they were on the assessment roll and had all the qualifications, and were told to put in tendered ballots, which they did. But no tendered ballot in Ontario has ever been counted for a candidate. The only time an attempt was ever made to count them was in the case of the county of Lincoln election, which after three or four months continuous trial and scrutiny was dropped, as one of the candidates was running for the House of Commons. In this case we are adopting that tendered ballot. What is the use of it? It is simply a fraud. It prevents an elector having his vote recorded as he should. As I pointed out the other night, this Ontario franchise law, instead of giving every opportunity, puts all the obstacles possible in the way of a man voting, and that is one of the reasons why I oppose the very idea of its being adopted by this Dominion Parliament.

Well, as has been stated here, no objection would be made to taking the Ontario voters' lists and making that the basis of a list, as Sir John Thompson has proposed, and these hon. gentlemen quoted approvingly. But why do they not adopt his plan, if they approve of it, to make the Ontario voters' list, or assessment roll—the list of voters, perhaps, would be better—as the basis, and from that make a voters' list? There are many methods that may be adopted. A registration before election has many advantages. It gives a list that is up to date, and gives every one an opportunity of being placed on that list, and thus makes the voice of the people heard in the elections. I think that this clause, No. 3, that is now before us, is one worthy of careful consideration. It is now near midnight, and I do not think the clause should pass to-night, because, although the Bill has been up on a previous occasion, I think it can fairly be said to have been rather sprung upon the House. I do not blame the Government in any way for that, but, as a matter of fact, we have been engaged very constantly in the Railway Committee and other committees and in the work of the House, and so we have not been able to consider the details of the Bill as thoroughly as we should like to have done. I think the Government should be satisfied with the discussion that has taken place on clause 3, and that they could fairly leave it over for consideration when the committee meets again, when further suggestions can be made. Most of the members have gone home, as is usual on Friday night. I hope that the Solicitor General will consent to a postponement for further consideration of this very important Bill. I would, therefore, move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. INGRAM. If it is the intention of the committee to rise, I would defer my remarks.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Before we come to an agreement on that, before the committee rises, at all events—if it is the intention that we should rise now—I would like to call attention to an amendment to the first section which I shall propose, to meet the difficulty in Prince Edward Island, where there are two separate classes of voters. I mention it now so that hon. gentlemen may have an opportunity to consider the matter. I propose that voters there shall include those who have the lower franchise, that is, those who vote for the legislative assemblyman.

Mr. HUGHES. I might point out to the Minister of Marine that there was a misunderstanding on his own side, because the Solicitor General did agree, deliberately agree, to hold the clauses over for another day.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the Solicitor General agreed to hold over clauses, I do not wish to press them forward. I did not know that that was the understanding. I have been here all the evening, too.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The understanding was, that any suggestions of amendment should be considered. I thought we would go through the Bill, and that any suggestions for amendment to any of the provisions should be taken into consideration, and the whole matter taken up another day.

Mr. POWELL. I suggested one particular that is unworkable. I have another to suggest.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. gentleman might communicate his suggestion to me.

Mr. WALLACE. Do the Government consent that the committee rise and report progress? I think we have done pretty well.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Flint). The motion is, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. Those who are in favour of that motion will please rise.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hon. gentlemen opposite have risen, but the question was not put, that I heard—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CASEY. Hon. gentlemen cannot rise to call for the yeas and nays until the Chairman has asked—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CASEY. The Chair gives me the floor. The point is—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) has the floor.

Mr. CASEY. Hon. gentlemen cannot rise until the question is put by the Chair—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) has risen to a point of order, and I wish him to state it.

Mr. BERGERON. The question has been put, and we are voting now.

Mr. CASEY. The point of order is—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You asked us to rise, Mr. Chairman; how long do you wish us to stand here?

The CHAIRMAN. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) has the floor.

Mr. CASEY. We cannot be asked to rise until the Chairman has called upon those in favour of the motion to say, "Aye," and those against it to say, "Nay." The point of order is, that the vote cannot be taken under the present circumstances. I ask the ruling of the Chair on this point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the hon. gentleman's point of order is not well taken.

Mr. CASEY. I never heard the question put.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Chairman,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would like to ask the Chairman a question. I sit very near the Chairman, and I did not hear the question put. If he put the question for the yeas and nays, I never heard it. I would ask the Chairman, if he called for the yeas and nays?

The CHAIRMAN. I may state, in reply to the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies), that I stated that the motion was, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. And I then said: "Those in favour of the motion will please rise."

Mr. CASEY. That should be done audibly, Mr. Chairman.

Committee divided: Yeas 20, nays 35.

Mr. INGRAM. Having had something to say on the principle of this Bill at a previous stage, I reserved my right to say something more on the different sections of the Bill in committee. In making my remarks I do not speak as a lawyer, but as a layman, and as having had some experience with the operation of the local election law in Ontario.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. If the hon. gentleman will allow me for a moment. I certainly understood from some remarks from the leader of the Opposition that he desired for one to have this matter disposed of to-night—at any rate so far as getting the major clauses of the Bill through. But if he left no intimation of the agreement, that I understood he made with the hon. gentlemen opposite, I do not think there is any use in our protracting the discussion at this time. I hope, however, that if we take up the committee now, the hon. gentleman will come to some understanding to make reasonable progress with the Bill on the next occasion. I would like to know from the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) whether he will endeavour to bring about some reasonable understanding on that head. I do not desire, nor does the Government desire, to choke off discussion in this matter. We are aware of its importance, and we wish also to hear the views expressed on both sides. There are difficulties, we know perfectly well, in adapting the local franchises to the needs of the Dominion. We recognize that, and we accept the assurance which was certainly given by the leader of the Opposition that, speaking for the Opposition, he desired as far as possible that the discussion should be conducted in a factious spirit. I hope his friends will not go back on their leader in that respect. If there is an understanding that reasonable progress will be made then, I will move that the committee rise. But I would like to hear from the hon. member for Pictou, or from whoever is at present leading the Opposition, assurances on that point.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am not at present leading the Opposition, but I have no hesitation in telling the hon. gentleman that I am somewhat familiar with the discussions that have gone on among gentlemen on this side of the House, both with the leader, and among themselves, in regard to this Bill. I have heard no suggestion from any quarter that there was to be the slightest obstruction offered to a single clause. But I do know that a very large number of gentlemen, both of the legal profession and others, have given a great deal of attention to the Bill; some of them are not here to-night. I know that a number of gentlemen wish to give their opinions to the committee; and I am satisfied that whatever the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce understood from the leader of the Opposition could not have wished to convey that this week, at any rate, this Bill should go through it at a sitting, because he knew that the criticisms to be offered would make it impossible to do so, even if we sat all night. I feel warranted in speaking for the hon. gentlemen here now, that when the Bill is taken up again we will be only too glad to take advantage of the invitation of the Solicitor General to make such practical suggestions as we can to improve the measure. Many criticisms will doubtless be offered, not for the purpose of obstructing, but to illustrate our objections made on the second reading.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce will accept the statement made by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). Certainly, we have no desire to obstruct the progress of the Bill, but there will doubtless be a good many criticisms made of these clauses, and they may occupy some time, and still we shall endeavour to make reasonable progress. It is not understood that we are going to pass these clauses without careful consideration. We want to make the Government realize, as we do, that we ought to keep control without the Dominion Parliament of the Franchise and of the Election law. Amendments will no doubt be offered with that end in view. The Government may be satisfied that nothing is intended beyond a full discussion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. HUGHES. In justice to the leader of the Opposition, I may recall what occurred while the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) was speaking this evening. He rose to suggest that all opposition to these preliminaries should be dropped and that we should make as much progress as possible.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is hardly worth while to go on with the discussion. I accept the assurances of the hon. member for Pictou and other gentlemen, that they are not disposed to be factious in their opposition. I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.05 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 4th April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

KETTLE RIVER VALLEY RAILWAY.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 26) to incorporate the Kettle River Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Bos-tock.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McINNES. Mr. Chairman, is there a motion before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Flint). The motion is that the committee rise and report progress.

An hon. MEMBER. That motion was carried.

Mr. McINNES. Then, I will move that the committee rise, and in support of that—

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. At the last meeting there was a motion before the committee that the committee rise and report; but the committee rose at the expiration of the hour for private Bills, so that the motion before the committee was not put, and that is the motion still before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. My information is correct, that the motion before the committee is that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. McINNES. Then, I will speak to that motion. When the committee was considering this Bill the other evening, I began a few remarks, and quoted at considerable length some of the remarks that had been made by the hon. Minister of Railways last session in connection with the country through which this railway is proposed to be run, and the policy which the Government then held with regard to retaining the trade of that district for Canada. An insinuation was thrown out by two or three hon. members last Friday evening that there was a desire on my part in making these quotations, and on the part of some other hon. members who were opposing this Bill, to obstruct its progress. I certainly disclaim any such intention. This is a very important measure. To my mind it is the most important measure that has been introduced into this Parliament this session. If you will reflect upon the permanent nature of the industries which are likely to arise there, and the large population which will undoubtedly go into the country, you will see that its trade will necessarily be enormous. In fact, I do not hesitate to say that the commercial interests involved in this Bill are even greater than those involved in the Yukon Railway Bill, because there is this difference, that while there will probably be as large a population in the Kootenay and Boundary Creek district that there will be in the Klondike, it will have this advantage over the Klondike, that it will undoubtedly be a permanent population, and the industries of the country will be permanent. I say I disclaim any intention of speaking simply for the purpose of obstructing the passage of this Bill. If it were necessary to do that, I could talk at considerable length, and might possibly attain the object of killing the Bill by this means; but such a course would be manifestly unfair to those who are seeking charters by Bills which are on the Order paper after this Bill; and, apart from that, I have every confidence in this House, that when all the facts in connection with this matter are presented, they will defeat the Bill, and it will not be necessary to resort to any such tactics as it was insinuated we were attempting on Friday evening I was dwelling, when I was interrupted last evening, on the enormous mineral wealth of this district. I quoted from the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) last session—a speech delivered by him, as he stated, with a good deal of authority and confidence, he having visited that district but a short time previously—as showing that that district was undoubtedly one of great mineral wealth. I also quoted the report of Mr. Hans Geise, one of the most eminent mineralogists probably of the world, who not only depicted in the most glowing terms the greatness of the mineral wealth of that district, but also made a forecast of the future and predicted that it would become one great line of city life. Having established that that country is undoubtedly rich in mineral wealth which is bound to give rise to an enormous and valuable trade, I proceeded to observe that it was the avowed policy of the Government to retain that trade for Canada, and in support of that statement I quoted some other sections of the same speech delivered last session by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. I have now before me a speech delivered on the same occasion by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), which I shall proceed to quote, in order to show that last year, at all events, it was the undoubted policy of the Government to do everything in its power to retain the trade of that promising region for eastern and western Canada alike. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, speaking on the Crow's Nest Railway proposition last session, said:

I believe that the construction of a railway into that country will, in all probability, lead to bringing there a population of many thousands of customers, who will afford a very valuable market to the inhabitants of the north-west portion of Canada, and also to our manufactures in the east. More than that, I agree with him also that it is a matter of moment to us that the great traffic which certainly will spring up, if the representations which have been made to us are confirmed even to only one-tenth or twentieth of the extent to which they appear likely to be confirmed, should be preserved to the people of Canada. A great deal of our trade is now being diverted to American channels.

I would call the attention particularly of hon. gentlemen to these observations:

I need not say to business men in or out of this House that there is no one thing more certain than that if once that trade be allowed to flow into American channels, we shall find it extremely difficult to recover it. These are two reasons sufficient to induce us to do what otherwise we might hesitate to do, ask the House to proceed with an enterprise which necessarily involves an addition of three or four million dollars to the public debt.

It is therefore evident, Mr. Speaker, that the policy of the Government last year with respect to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway was one intended to retain the trade of that section of British Columbia for Canada. But we do not require to go into the records of last session to arrive at the conclusion that this is undoubtedly the policy of this Government. During this session, we had introduced into this House a measure which was defended by the Government upon the very same ground. One of the great reasons, in fact the principal reason assigned for building the Yukon Railway was that the trade should be kept for our own people. While many of us differed in opinion as to the nature of the agreement by which this good purpose was to be attained, yet that sentiment being so strongly announced by the Government and being so prominent in that measure led a great number of us to deal with it far more mercifully than we might otherwise felt disposed to do. These two propositions then, I submit, are clear—that that country will give rise to an enormous trade and that it is a policy of the greatest prudence and wisdom and has been, up to the present at all events, the undoubted policy of this Government to retain that trade, like the trade of all parts of the country, for our own people.

I make this assertion, and will proceed to prove it, that if this charter is granted to these American promoters, that the trade will go to the United States and cannot be retained for our own people.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). That is absurd.

Mr. McINNES. The hon. member for Hamilton says that proposition is absurd. I say that I can prove it; and if he can disprove it, I shall be very happy to hear him enlighten this House when I sit down. It seems to me it is a self-evident proposition to any person who is familiar with the geography of the western part of this continent. If any person who has watched with any interest at all the course of commerce in this new district, it is practically a self-evident proposition that if this connection is made with the American railway system, that trade will flow south and not east or west. It has been suggested, however, that there is sufficient protection afforded by the tariff to give the advantage to Canadian trade against competition from the south. Well, we certainly know that the protection afforded by the present tariff will not have that effect. And the fact that it will not was dwelt upon by the Minister of Railways this session and by other members of the Government and was embodied in the Yukon Bill. Because you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that the Yukon Bill provided that there should be no competition whatever from American roads, and there would have been no necessity for such a provision if the tariff gave us sufficient advantage over the Americans. That proposition is, therefore, admitted by the Government, and it was admitted by every hon. member on this side who supported that Yukon Bill, namely, that the tariff itself is not a sufficient protection to give the trade to Canadians against competition from the south.

The contention was put forward in the Railway Committee by the advocates of this charter, that at present the bulk of the trade which is going into the Kootenay over these American roads was actually in Canadian goods. I took the trouble to make inquiries at the Customs Department, and found, so far from that being true—and I knew it could not be true—the very reverse was the case, and as the data may be of some value to hon. members in coming to a conclusion, I will read a few of the figures which will show conclusively that ever since the trade of the Kootenay amounted to anything, and ever since this connection by Mr. Corbin's road with the American railway system, the great bulk of the trade with that country has come from the south and not from eastern Canada. I have in my hand a pamphlet which is issued by the South Kootenay Board of Trade; and as it contains a few figures on this point, I will give an extract from it:

Take Nelson, for instance, one of the chief towns of the district. It was made a port in August, 1895. Previous to that time it was an outport of New Westminster. The collections there have grown so steadily that their total was more in 1897 than the total of the seaport of Vancouver, the collections at Nelson being $431,038 as against $407,762 at Vancouver.

In order that you may grasp the situation, let me point out that Vancouver is the third shipping port of the Dominion. And yet these figures which I have had verified, I may say, by the Customs Department, show that the imports into the Kootenays amount to more than all the imports at the city of Vancouver. The statement was made before the Railway Committee that, in the early days in the development of the Kootenay, the trade had gone south to the United States for the reason that the manufacturers of eastern Canada had not, up to that time, sufficient experience in manufacturing supplies suitable for a mining district, and that, until they got the machinery necessary to turn out supplies suitable for the trade there, the Americans, who had the experience, controlled the business. But I will quote figures which will show that, year after year, as time goes on, the trade with the United States is becoming larger. In 1895 the value of the imports at Nelson were only $397,393. Two years later, in 1897, they jumped to the enormous figure of $1,539,993, an increase of almost 500 per cent, and the duties collected increased in corresponding ratio. It was further argued that the imports into Rossland from the United States at the present time amounted to one-tenth of the imports from eastern Canada. Now, I have a statement before me, signed by a clerk of the Customs Department, which absolutely refutes that. In 1895 the duties collected at Rossland was only $14,349. In 1897, two years later, there had been an increase of about 1,000 per cent, the duties collected amounting to $122,646. So, it is absurd to say that the trade with eastern Canada is increasing or that eastern Canada is getting the bulk of that trade, as against the Americans. As I stated when this matter was before the Railway Committee, the facts are well known, that the trade of the Kootenays has been going to the United States, and it is unnecessary to adduce further figures in proof of it. Every person in British Columbia is aware of the fact, as also is every person who has had the pleasure of a trip through that country. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals saw it, and pictured it in glowing terms here last year. He said that the city of Spokane had increased from a small town of something like 8,000 to a bustling, prosperous city of over 35,000 last year. And he will have to state it again, because it is the fact that that city was built up altogether by the trade which came to it from the Kootenays. I was struck with the statement made by the hon. member for West Assiniboia, in the Railway Committee, when this matter was being discussed. He said: Let us have Spokanes in Canada. That is exactly the idea. If we increase these railway facilities to the United States, there cannot be the slightest doubt but that cities will spring up there, but that, if we pursue a different policy, those cities will spring up within our own border.

Now, I have another proposition, and it is this, that, if the trade of the district goes to the south, as it has been doing, and as it will continue to do if these railway facilities to the south are improved, the smelting of that district will also go south. You are aware that the parties who are interested in this charter, if not directly, indirectly, did all they could to build up a smelter just a few miles to the south of our boundary line at Northport. There was no valid reason assigned before the Railway Committee why that smelter should have been established at Northport, and not at Trail or at some other point in British Columbia. It was stated that at Northport there was a mountain of limestone just behind the smelter. But, Sir, that argument is completely refuted by the fact that it only takes 30 per cent of lime to smelt a given quantity of ore. That being so, it certainly was much cheaper to carry the lime to the ore than to carry three times the bulk of ore to the smelter. So, I say, there was no reason at all why that smelter should be established on the American side rather than on the British Columbia side. But all the interests of these parties are on the other side, and we have every reason to believe that what they did in this instance they will continue to do. Their commercial interests, their political interests—every interest they have lies to the south, and will induce them to build up the cities to the south of the line, and to carry the smelting industry thither, if it is possible to do so.

If this charter is granted and this railway constructed, I say unhesitatingly, the ores of the Boundary Creek country will largely go to the American smelter to be treated. It was argued in the committee, that that would not be the case, because, providentially, the ores of the Boundary Creek were self-fluxing, that is, they carried their own fluxes. I heard the statement which was read in the Railway Committee, on which that argument was based. But the statement did not bear out the argument. The mineralogical expert who was quoted in support of the proposition, was very guarded in his statements. He did not make the sweeping assertion that all the ores in the Boundary Creek country carried their own fluxes. He said it was understood that some of the ores in that country were self-fluxing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Has the hon. gentleman the quotation with him?

Mr. McINNES. I have not.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think that the quotation in the committee was broader than that the hon. gentleman has given.

Mr. McINNES. If it was broader, at any rate it was not sufficiently broad to sustain the argument which was advanced, that there was sufficient ore there carrying its own fluxes to warrant the establishment of smelters there as against establishing them in the United States and carrying the ore thither. We all know that no broad statement of that kind could be made at the present time with any accuracy with regard to the ores of the Boundary Creek, because no persons as yet, have sufficient acquaintance with the ores of that country to be aware of the facts. There has been a good deal of prospecting, and there is good reason to believe that the country is enormously rich in minerals; but I venture to say, that there is not a sufficient body of data before the Government, or before the British Columbia Government, or any one else, to warrant any person in assuming that all the ores of the Boundary Creek country carry their own fluxes. Now, if we have reason to believe that this road, when constructed, will carry the ores, in all probability, to the United States to be smelted, if there is reason to believe that it will stimulate trade with the United States, as against trade with Canada, why should we grant this charter?

Now, there have been two or three reasons suggested, and the most forcible of them all, to my mind, is that it will afford competition. Now, personally I have no faith at all in railways competing with one another. My hon. friend behind me (Mr. Wood) again laughs. I hope he will enlighten this House with something more than his laughter when I take my seat. I say I have no faith at all in railway companies competing with each other. We have had numberless instances in this country. A section was accommodated with but one railway line, and the people thought that they were being tyrannized over by a monopoly. These arguments have prevailed to the extent of giving another railway line but they no sooner get another line in there than they have two tyrants tyrannizing over them. They want a third line to go in there for competition, and when they get a third line, it will be a fourth line, and so on. Railway companies will not compete against one another. They will either enter into an internecine war, like we are having at the present time in this country, or they will come to a mutual understanding and pool rates, and there will be no actual competition in railway traffic like there is in any other kind of business. One of the best instances of this truth is that which was afforded in Manitoba some time ago. You will remember that our good friends on the prairies thought that the Canadian Pacific Railway was harshly exercising its powers which they had under their exclusive charter against the province of Manitoba. They sought connection with the Grand Trunk Railway system per the American railway system and succeeded in getting that connection, and what was the result? They found out that the line which was to bring them competition and reduce rates did not compete against the Canadian Pacific Railway, they found it afforded them no relief whatever. So I make the assertion that so far as the argument of competition is concerned, there is no great force in it under any circumstances. But in this present instance it is absolutely without value, and I will tell you why. The Canadian Pacific Railway in that Kootenay district is not in the same position as the Canadian Pacific Railway in any other part of this country. They have not got control over their freight rates, the control of the freight rates is left entirely in the hands of this Government and of this Parliament; and that differentiates the case out there entirely from what it might be in any other part of Canada. In order that you may see the full force of that argument I will read you a section or two from the legislation which was passed last year in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. The agreement which was then entered into between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway is embraced in these clauses. Clause "c" reads as follows:—

That so soon as said railway is open for traffic to Kootenay Lake, the local rates and tolls on the railway and on any other railway used in connection therewith, and now or hereafter owned or leased by or operated on account of the company south of the company's main line in British Columbia—

You will see that this legislation will operate in connection with this proposed extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway just as much as it does with that part of it which they are building at the present time under this contract.

—as well as the rates and tolls between any point on any such line or lines or railway and any point on the main line of the company, throughout Canada, or any other railway owned or leased by or operated on account of the company, including its lines of steamers in British Columbia, shall be first approved by the Governor in Council or by a railway commission, if and when such commission is established by law, and shall at all times thereafter, and from time to time be subject to revision and control in the manner aforesaid.

Mr. McINNES.

It seems to me that is very explicit, that it gives absolute control over the freight rates, not only upon that section of the Crow's Nest Pass line which is being constructed at the present time, but over any extensions or connections with the Canadian Pacific Railway south of their main line in British Columbia, now or at any future time. There are other sections which also give this Parliament a very large measure of control over the proposed extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway out there. Section "f" reads as follows:—

That the Railway Committee of the Privy Council may grant running powers over the said line of railway and all its branches and connections, or any portions thereof, and all lines of railway now or hereafter owned or leased by or operated on account of the company in British Columbia south of the company's main line of railway, and the necessary use of its tracks, stations and station grounds, to any other railway company applying for such grant upon such terms as such company may fix and determine, and according to the provisions of the Railway Act, and of such other general Acts relating to railways as are from time to time passed by Parliament; but nothing herein shall be held to imply that such running powers might not be so granted without the special provision herein contained.

Section "g" also gives considerable power and control over the Canadian Pacific Railway extension:

That the said railway, when constructed, together with that portion of the company's railway from Dunmore to Lethbridge, and all lines of railway, branches, connections and extensions in British Columbia south of the main line of the company in British Columbia, shall be subject to the provisions of the Railway Act and of such other general Acts relating to railways as are from time to time passed by Parliament.

It is, therefore, clear that the power to regulate the rates and see that the freight charges are reasonable, which shall be collected by the Canadian Pacific Railway on its proposed extension, is entirely in the hands of this Government and of this Parliament. Now, commenting upon these particular sections, last year the Minister of Railways and Canals spoke as follows—and I would call my hon. friend's attention to the interpretation which was placed upon these sections by the Minister of Railways and Canals, and if he is not disposed to take my interpretation of them, I hope he will follow his leader:

The committee will have noted that we have sought to ensure the country a large measure of relief from the rates which have obtained since the Canadian Pacific Railway was started. We have imposed conditions upon the company which are very largely restrictive of their present powers. We have embraced in one of the sub-clauses of these resolutions a considerable list of articles which go into very large consumption among the people of the western provinces, and we have secured an agreement on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway that very substantial reductions will be made upon existing rates. We have also received the consent on their part that the rates upon all goods, whether they are shipped in or shipped out, either going into or going out of any portion of the province, which is covered by the route of this railway, or any freight or merchandise which either is shipped into British Columbia over this line, or shipped out of British Columbia over this line, are to be subject to the control and supervision of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, as is the case with other railways in Canada. To the extent of the shipment of goods from any part of Canada to British Columbia, and the shipment of goods from any part of British Columbia traversed by this line, to any part of Canada, there has been secured in the contract between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Government, a recision of that existing ten per cent clause. From this day forward, so far as that class of merchandise between the several points is concerned, the tariff of rates shall be under the control of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council so long as that tribunal exercises control in these matters, or under the control of a commission, if a railway commission should ever be constituted for that purpose.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce also made a few remarks, some very pointed remarks, on those sections of the Crow's Nest Pass proposition, and I will read what he said :

Remember the Government of Canada are able to control the rates and everything which goes from any part of the Crow's Nest Pass to any portion of Canada, and on anything which comes from any part of Canada to any section of the Crow's Nest line. The reduction of 3 cents per 100 pounds on all the grains going eastward from Manitoba cannot be computed at less than several hundred thousand dollars a year. Now, the difference between the proposals is practically—

The hon. gentleman is referring here to the proposal which was submitted and entertained by the late Conservative Government.

—that we gave, if you choose so to call it, some $5,000 or $6,000 per mile to the Canadian Pacific Railway for constructing this line, and we are paying them a further sum of $5,000 or $6,000 in return for valuable privileges for the whole of the North-west and eastern Canada as well.

There is no doubt at all that it was the intention last year, and that it was the purpose of the Government last year to obtain complete control over the charges that could be exacted by the Canadian Pacific Railway on goods going from eastern Canada into that Kootenay country. If we have that control, there is no force in the argument that it is necessary to have another road for the purpose of getting reasonable rates. It seems to me it is tantamount to saying that we have not confidence in the Government or in ourselves to apply the powers and provisions we possess. This Parliament last year granted nearly $4,000,000 to acquire those rights, and are hon. gentlemen now going to say that the advantages for which they gave those $4,000,000 are of no value whatever? That is practically what the argument amounts to. We have power to compel the Canadian Pacific Railway to give reasonable rates into that district, and if we have confidence in ourselves and in the Government that the Government will do right to the people there and in eastern Canada, we can have no hesitation in concluding that there is no necessity, so far as securing reasonable rates is concerned, for a second or competing line.

As an excuse for granting this charter it has been further asserted that it will give the Grand Trunk Railway a means of entering into that district and an opportunity of sharing in some of the trade. I do not think the Grand Trunk Railway can be very materially interested in that way. This little piece of line, some 70 miles in length, is absolutely independent of the Grand Trunk Railway, and always will be. The distance from the most westerly terminus of the Grand Trunk Railway to the beginning of this little line is over 2,000 miles. If the Grand Trunk Railway Company are to take advantage of this line, they can only do so at the whim or at the desire of the whole American railway system, and at any time the controllers of the Great Northern or the Northern Pacific, or Mr. Corbin himself, saw fit, they could prevent the Grand Trunk having running privileges over their lines, and that minute the Grand Trunk would cease to have any connection with the Kootenay district. And, Sir, there is this feature in connection with the Grand Trunk argument, which I would like to point out. If as a matter of fact the company had always an opportunity of going in there, assuming that the American railway magnates would not prevent the company from enjoying this privilege, you have to recognize the fact, and face it, that by giving the Grand Trunk means of going in there, you at the same time open the doors to every state in the Union as well as to the American system of railways: and it is just a question whether we prefer to give the Grand Trunk a little trade there or to keep the trade for our own people, because putting it in the most favourable light, the Grand Trunk can never hope to get a large volume of trade from the Kootenay country. If that be so, that the trade at the present time which goes through the United States into that country is small, and if it is a fact that it is decreasing rather than increasing, and it is a fact, then the argument in favour of granting this Bill simply because we wish to give the Grand Trunk some little advantage, falls to the ground.

There has been a sentiment also created in favour of granting this charter to Mr. Corbin on the ground, as stated, that he was the first railway promoter to go into that district and open it up. As a matter of fact his railway was not the first railway to be built in that rich Kootenay district. He undoubtedly went in there in the early days of its development, and we give him full credit for his foresight and pluck in doing so; but he was not the first man to display pluck and energy in building a railway there. Even if he were, that fact should not unduly bias hon. members in this House in his favour in this matter. He has received a large return for everything he has done for that country; and let me tell the House that Mr. Corbin unfortunately, although he has received charter rights from this Parliament and although he has been in receipt of large land grants from British Columbia, this same Mr. Corbin has acted, when it was possible, so as to divert the trade from Canada to his own country, and in every way he has discriminated against the smelting industry of British Columbia. I do not make that assertion on the strength of my own word. I have here the Nelson "Tribune," of 12th March, and in it appears a report of a meeting of the South Kootenay Board of Trade held two days previous to the issue of the paper. That board of trade appointed a committee to investigate into the freight rates and charges which were made by Mr. Corbin, and they submitted a report which I intend to read to the committee. Before I do so, let me point out that in the Railway Committee the advocates of Mr. Corbin made the assertion that no such committee was appointed, and no such report was ever made. An hon. member stated dogmatically that an editorial appeared in one of the Nelson papers containing some idle statement to the effect that Mr. Corbin in operating his railway had discriminated against British Columbia interests. But the hon. gentleman stated that no report had ever been made on this subject. I wish to emphasize this fact, that the Board of Trade at Nelson, the terminus of Mr. Corbin's road, the headquarters of the road in British Columbia, testified as to the dealings of Mr. Corbin and the way in which he operated his road, and they have given us in this report facts which leave no doubt that Mr. Corbin has in every possible way discriminated against the interests of British Columbia and in favour of his own road.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. And yet the Nelson Board of Trade petitioned or asked that this charter should be granted.

Mr. McINNES. I will deal with that in a few minutes.

Next came the report of the committee on freight rates, laid over from last meeting. Subjoined is the report:

Your committee appointed to look into the question of freight rates, beg to report as follows:—

1. The rate on ore from Hall Siding, 11 miles (or any other point on the N. & F. S. Railway), to Nelson, is $2.25 per ton.

2. The rate on ore from Nelson, 55 miles (or any other point on the N. & F. S. Railway), to Northport, is $1 per ton.

Mr. McINNES.

The rate to the smelter in which Mr. Corbin is interested is $1 per ton.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Is he interested in any other smelter?

Mr. McINNES. I have no information on the point.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Why say he is interested in this?

Mr. McINNES. I say he is interested in seeing that smelter at Northport made a success. Whether he is directly interested in the management of the Northport smelter or not, I care very little. He has large interests at Northport; he is a large real estate owner at Northport; he gave the site on which the smelter stands; this is the central point of his railway system, and I do not think it can be contradicted for one moment that Mr. Corbin has undoubtedly the very greatest interest in seeing that smelter boomed. You will see from the very first item there referred to, that for hauling ore eleven miles to the Nelson smelter he charges $2.25 per ton, but he will carry the same ore fifty-five miles to the smelter in which he is interested for only $1 per ton.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That was absolutely denied by Mr. Corbin right there.

Mr. McINNES. I did not hear Mr. Corbin deny that in the committee.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, that was denied by him through his solicitor.

Mr. McINNES. Now, I have explained what kind of interest Mr. Corbin has in that smelter; he does not necessarily have to be a stockholder to have an interest in it. I say that everything tends to the idea that it is to the advantage of Mr. Corbin to make that smelter at Northport a great success, and no one can successfully controvert that.

Now, Sir, I will continue to read the report:

3. The rate on ore from Rossland to Northport, 17 miles, is 75 cents per ton.

4. The rate on ore from the Velvet Mine, on the Red Mountain Railway, to Nelson, is $2.75 per ton.

5. The rate on ore from Robson to Nelson, 28 miles, is $1 per ton.

6. The rate on ore from Siocan City to Nelson, 45 miles, is $3 per ton.

7. The rate on ore from Sandon and intermediate points to Kaslo, which is being shipped to United States smelters, is $3 per ton.

8. The rate on ore from Sandon and intermediate points to Kaslo, which is being shipped to Nelson, is $5 per ton.

9. The rate on ore from Nelson to Tacoma is $8 per ton.

10. The rate on ore from Hall Siding and other points on the N. & F. S. Railway south of Nelson to Tacoma, is $6.25 per ton.

A glance at 1 and 2 is sufficient to convince any one that this is a discrimination against Nelson in favour of Northport.

That is not my comment; that is the language of the report:

A glance at 1 and 2 is sufficient to convince any one that this is a discrimination against Nelson in favour of Northport.

The same thing applies to 7 and 8. It is clearly a discrimination against Nelson and Pilot Pay in favour of United States smelting points, and as both the N. & F. S. Railway and K. & S. Railway were subsidized by the provincial legislature, and their rates are under the supervision of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, we consider it is the duty of the board to protest to the legislature and the Lieutenant-Governor in Council against this discrimination, and we recommend that a letter be drawn up setting out the above facts, and addressed to the provincial secretary and our member, Mr. Hume.

With regard to freight rates on merchandise coming into this country, we consider that the most important point against the business welfare of Nelson is the practice of the distribution of carloads to different consignees at different points on straight carload rates, and the notorious "balance of rate" rebate scheme, by which merchants at Revelstoke and Nakusp can ship in carload lots to either of those places and re-ship in small lots to Nelson, Kaslo, Rossland and other points in the district, getting a rebate equalizing the rate to regular carload rates to these points, and as this privilege is not conceded to Nelson merchants, or to any one shipping carloads to Nelson for distribution, it compels jobbers doing business in the district to ship their goods and establish warehouses at Revelstoke instead of at Nelson. If the practice is continued, we consider that Nelson should be placed on the same footing in this respect as Revelstoke to Nakusp.

Your committee further recommend that a committee of this board be appointed to confer with the different railroads centreing in Nelson, as to what steps should be taken in order to make Nelson a terminal point, and thus allow her merchants to compete for the wholesale trade.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that report can leave no doubt whatever in the mind of any hon. member that Mr. Corbin, so far as he has had the facilities to discriminate against our people, has done so. That report and finding were communicated to Mr. Corbin, who was in New York at the time, some six or seven weeks ago, and I wish to read the reply which Mr. Corbin wired to Mr. Martin, who is his agent at Nelson. This is the reply:

Put Croasdale exactly on the same basis as Northport, provided we are not discriminated against;—

Here is this man talking about discrimination:

—but, to avoid misunderstandings, suggest waiting my return.

And so we have no assurance that he has equalized things even yet. He says:

But, to avoid misunderstandings, suggest waiting my return, when the whole question can be discussed and settled.

And here is a peculiar little wind-up:

I don't think Nelson is treating me or themselves well in opposing my extension to boundary; you can show this.

The Minister of Railways interrupted me a few minutes ago and said that the Nelson Board of Trade were in favour of granting this charter. You will see from that telegram that Mr. Corbin there recognizes the fact that at that time they were not in favour of it, for he says that he thinks the board of trade are not treating him well.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They sent a telegram in support of it.

Mr. McINNES. I do not dispute that for a minute, but I say that undoubtedly at that time the Nelson Board of Trade were hostile to Mr. Corbin's extension, and if they have turned since, I think we may possibly find a clue to it in the concluding sentence of this telegram, in which he intimates that these freight rates will be equalized when he gets back there.

Now, Mr. Speaker, considerable has been said along the line that this is an effort on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway to defeat this charter, so that they may monopolize the trade of that district for themselves. I do not think any person in this House will accuse me of being over friendly or partial to the Canadian Pacific Railway, but, Sir, I conceive that in this instance there are other and larger interests involved than any question of friendly or unfriendly feelings towards a single corporation. I conceive it to be a fact that in this instance, at any rate, the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway in seeking this extension, harmonize absolutely with the interests of the country. But it is not necessarily a question of giving the trade of that country to the Canadian Pacific Railway if this charter is not granted. There is another railway company in existence—the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern Railway Company—a British Columbia company, a company that has practically the unanimous endorsement and support and sympathy of the people of British Columbia. They have a charter from the local government to go over this very same ground, and they have a subsidy from the provincial government, which shows that they are considered in the province to be a substantial company, with the endorsement of the people; and there is no reason at all why, if this Bill is defeated that that company should not build the line as well as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. They are as independent of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as—

Mr. MORRISON. Oh.

Mr. McINNES. The hon. member for New Westminster says, "Oh." I know nothing to the contrary, and I have the assurance of those who are interested in the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern Railway Company, that they are as independent of the Canadian Pacific Railway as Mr. Corbin is, or ever will be. So, I say, it is not a question between the Canadian Pacific Railway and Mr. Corbin; it is not a question between the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway, because there are other lines which can give as many advantages to the country as the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to which this Parliament can show its favour. The assertion has been made—and I regretted very much to hear the member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) dwell upon this point in the Railway Committee—that this was a scheme on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to tie up that whole country. Well, I do not know how killing this Bill is going to operate in that way. There is nothing at all to prevent this Parliament, next year, two years from now, or whenever it is so inclined, granting a charter to Mr. Corbin, or to any one else, for a line of railway coming from the south. There is no tying up of the country involved in throwing out this Bill. The Canadian Pacific Railway will get in there first, if this Bill is thrown out; and that is the great point I wish to make, in conclusion—that we should let our Canadian road in first, that we should give it the advantage, if there is any advantage going; that we should give our own merchants the preference, if there is any preference at all. If the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should not treat the country fairly, or if this Government or this Parliament should be too weak to enforce the powers placed in their hands to control the Canadian Pacific Railway, there is no reason why, two years, or four years, from now, or at any time in the future, this Parliament should not charter a competing line to come in from the south. But, in the first instance, when we are starting the trade of the country in certain channels, let those channels run in favour of our own people.

There is another point which I wish to refer to before sitting down, that is, the feeling in British Columbia, and throughout the country, on this question. A considerable number of telegrams and resolutions were read before the Railway Committee, some of which had value, and some of which had very little value, to those who understood from what quarters they emanated. But, Sir, if there was one resolution read before that committee which should have carried weight, it was the resolution that was passed by the British Columbia legislature; and, as there are possibly some hon. members here who were not in the Railway Committee, and who did not hear it there, I will read that resolution. I quote from the Votes and Proceedings of the legislative assembly:

Mr. Helmcken moved, seconded by Major Mutter:

Whereas a Bill is now before the Railway Committee of the House of Commons of Canada, asking for the incorporation of a company to construct a line of railway, to be known as the Kettle River Valley Railway Company, which railway, when constructed, will be a portion of the Red Mountain Railway Company, whose terminal is at Northport, in the United States of America;

And whereas the construction of such line by the company seeking such Act of incorporation will draw the ores and traffic from the province of British Columbia into the United States, and will most materially affect the commercial and industrial interests of this province and of other portions of the Dominion of Canada;

Be it therefore resolved, That a humble address be presented to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, praying him to communicate with the Dominion Government, urging that Government to oppose the granting of such charter, or of any other having for its object the diversion of traffic from this province to the United States of America, and to request that the said charter be not granted.

There is no uncertain sound about that.

Mr. WALLACE. What was the vote?

Mr. McINNES. That was carried by a vote of 20 to 10.

Mr. WALLACE. Was it a party vote?

Mr. McINNES. It was not a party vote.

Mr. MORRISON. It was a straight party vote.

Mr. McINNES. It was not a straight party vote.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Who introduced the resolution?

Mr. McINNES. A government supporter, of course, as was very suitable.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). What connection had he with the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. McINNES. I am sure I do not know. I do not know that it is very material.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). It is very material.

Mr. McINNES. I might ask hon. gentlemen, if they are going into these little matters, what connection some have with the Grand Trunk Railway. I hope we have not to descend to such things. The hon. member for Westminster says it was a party vote. The majority who voted for the resolution undoubtedly contained nearly every member on the government side, there is no doubt about that. But equally it is true that all the opposition did not vote against it. In fact, a man on the opposition side who is considered one of the strongest men in the House, Mr. Williams, supported it.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose it is of much consequence, but, as a matter of fact, Mr. Williams opposed it.

Mr. McINNES. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to be so categorically contradicted. I stated that I had in my hand the Votes and Proceedings of the legislative assembly of British Columbia, and if any one can speak with authority on this matter, I think we can speak with authority with that document before us, rather than with any newspaper report which my hon. friend may have seen to the contrary; and, Sir, I will read the names now, for my own vindication:

Original question proposed and carried on the following division:—Yeas: Messrs. Huff, Williams, Smith, Mutter, Helmcken, Baker, Turner, Martin, Rithet, Adams, Higgins, Stoddart, Walkem, Pooley, Eberts, Bryden, Rogers, Hunter, Braden, McGregor—20.

Mr. Baker is the representative of one of the Kootenays, the very district interested in this matter, and a member of the government, and is probably as familiar with the question as any man in this House or in that House. Mr. Higgins was Speaker of that legislature up to, I think, three weeks ago. He resigned, presumably because he could not agree with the government. He is considered in that province as an Oppositionist; and, more than that, he is a man who has very large interests in the very district which is sought to be traversed by this proposed railway. I understand that he is one of the largest owners of real estate in Grand Forks; and, if there is a man in that House who stood to gain enormously by the building of a railway through that section, it was Mr. Higgins.

Nays: Messrs. Sword, Kennedy, Hume, Forster, Macpherson, Kidd, Vedder, Semlin, Cotton, Graham—10.

Mr. BERGERON. What about Williams?

Mr. McINNES. He supported the proposition.

Mr. WALLACE. What about the statement of the hon. member for Westminster (Mr. Morrison)? What is he going to say?

Mr. McINNES. He may make his statement if he wishes.

Mr. BERGERON. He ought to take it back.

Mr. McINNES. I make this assertion. Not only did that resolution pass by a large majority of two to one in the British Columbia legislature, but if all the facts were known then as they are to-day, it would have passed unanimously. I can prove that assertion. One of the brainiest and ablest men on the Opposition side of that House, and one who, should a change take place, will undoubtedly be a member of the new Government, is Mr. Cotton, who represents Vancouver City. He also is editor of the “News Advertiser,” of Vancouver, and in discussing editorially the vote that took place in the legislature the day before, he wrote as follows:—

The Opposition laid down the proposition that the interests of Boundary Creek district, and also of those of the province at large, required the immediate construction of a railway connecting that district either with the Canadian Pacific Railway or the American railway systems. Having stated that first proposition—the necessity of immediate railway construction—the Opposition expressed just as clearly its opinion—

Mark this, Mr. Speaker:

—that connection with the Canadian railway was, from a provincial standpoint of view, preferable to one with the American system of railways. It, therefore, earnestly asked the Government to either give the House such information as would show that if Mr. Corbin was refused the charter, the Canadian Pacific Railway would build a line at once, or give an assurance that such would be the case.

The Opposition would therefore have supported the resolution then if they had known that the Canadian Pacific Railway were ready to build a road.

Then the Opposition stated it could support the resolution asking the Dominion Government to refuse a charter to Mr. Corbin, without any fear that such action on its part might postpone the possibility of railway communication with Boundary Creek another year.

No one will deny that this was a wise and proper course for the Opposition to take, one, too, which the Government, if it was honest in its intentions, should have no hesitancy in meeting, by giving the desired assurance. But the Government did nothing of the kind. On the contrary, it absolutely refused to give any assurance that the construction of a line to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway would be immediately commenced if Mr. Corbin's request for a charter was refused.

I think we may fairly assume, in view of that statement and considering the position of the gentleman who makes it, that the legislature of British Columbia is unanimous in the sentiment expressed in the resolution which they passed.

I have here the “Rossland Miner,” which is the most important and influential journal in that part of British Columbia; and to show you that the feeling there is not what it has been represented to be, I will quote some portions of an editorial in the last issue of that paper which has come to hand, which will show you clearly that the feeling up there, as in the rest of British Columbia, is in favour of retaining the interests of that country for our own people:

By the granting of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway subsidy, the Dominion Government gained control of the Canadian Pacific Railway traffic rates in British Columbia, and it was also stipulated that, in all its extensions built subsequent to the granting of the subsidy, the Canadian Pacific Railway should not enjoy a monopoly of routes. It will thus be seen that the building the Canadian Pacific Railway from Robson into the Boundary Creek country would not necessarily monopolize the only available pass through the Gold Range.

The Penticton extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway will touch all points in the Kettle River Valley that would be reached by the proposed Corbin line, and will, besides, traverse the entire district of South Yale, east and west. The management of the Canadian Pacific Railway has emphatically declared that the Robson-Penticton road will be completed and in operation as quickly as it would be possible to build a road to the Boundary Creek by any other route.

The Canadian Pacific Railway also promises to foster and encourage the local smelting industry in Kootenay and South Yale.

On the other hand, the Kettle River Railway Company—

Mark this, because it is evidence from them right on the spot.

—has evinced no disposition to promote the prosperity of this country; on the contrary, Mr. Corbin has been at considerable pains to foster and encourage the smelting industry of the United States at the expense of British Columbia. This is best proved by the fact that he preferred to have the Le Roi smelter erected at Northport, Washington, instead of at Sayward, B.C., where the opportunities for economical smelting are just as favourable as at the first-named place.

That is a very good indication of the feeling on this matter in the very district which is to be most affected, but I am also aware that a resolution, purporting to have been passed at a mass meeting in Rossland, was sent to the Government, and we heard it read in the Railway Committee, in favour of this charter. The House will be amused to learn how many people were at that meeting. I take this report of it from the "Rossland Miner":

At a meeting of about twenty-five citizens held last evening in the city hall, a resolution was passed advising the Dominion Parliament that the resolution passed by the British Columbia legislature, opposing the granting of a charter for the Kettle River Valley Railway did not voice the sentiments of the people of the province. The fact that there was to be a meeting was not generally known, in consequence of which the attendance was small.

There can be no doubt that that was a little trumped up meeting and a very small affair. But notwithstanding that fact, the resolution which was sent to the Government was so worded—as such resolutions invariably are—as to lead the Government in the House to believe that an enormous gathering had taken place and that the feeling of the district was about unanimous in favour of the resolution. This is the form in which the resolution was transmitted:

At a largely attended meeting of mine-owners and merchants, held at the mayor's request tonight, it was unanimously resolved:

I therefore make this point, that a number of these resolutions sent to the Government, and which hon. members have heard read, are of very little importance compared with other evidences of public opinion to the contrary effect, which have come from that province. To emphasize that point, let me refer to a little incident that occurred in the Railway Committee, and which hon. members who happened to be present will remember. I was taken to task by my hon. friend from Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock) for speaking, as he thought, in a belittling way of the rising towns of that section of country. Well, nothing was farther from my thoughts than to speak disparagingly of any section of that country or of any of the new towns springing up there. But what I did try to point out was this fact, and I insist upon it to-day, that the resolutions passed in these little towns by two or three merchants meeting together—if there are three merchants in some of them—cannot be taken as having any value compared with resolutions such as have emanated from the British Columbia legislature, and from the Boards of Trade in Vancouver and Victoria and other large centres of the province. We were told that one of these towns actually had eight business places, and that was trotted out as evidence that the committee should treat with the greatest consideration the resolution which these eight business men possibly passed. If the truth were known of these eight men, possibly two were saloon keepers and two barbers, and what the others might be I do not know. I, therefore, insist on the point that the mere number of these resolutions ought to have no weight at all with hon. members. You should look rather to the bodies from which they emanate to see whether they are bodies of men who have had large experience in the trade of the country, who have watched the development of the Kootenay country and seen which way the trade was drifting. Resolutions coming from such bodies are entitled to every respect; I hope they will receive more attention and consideration on the part of this House than they have received at the hands of the Railway Committee. I do not intend to weary the House by reading a large number of these resolutions, but I have one that is typical, and passed by, possibly, the most representative board of trade of British Columbia, that at Victoria. I will read the resolution and also the letter to the hon. Minister of Railways which accompanied it, which will throw a flood of light upon the whole question:

Victoria, B.C., Feb. 26, 1898.

Hon. A. G. Blair,
Minister of Railways, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—The attention of this board has been directed to the application now before the Dominion Parliament for a charter for a railway, being a continuation of the Red Mountain line, running west, parallel with and a few miles north of the boundary. This board is of opinion that the granting of such a charter will be highly detrimental to British Columbia, and Canada generally, for such a line would simply tap a country very rich in minerals, making the natural outlet for the same the United States, where it is probable the smelting would be done.

The smelting industry is only next in importance to the mining, and should be conserved to Canada. This board therefore has telegraphed to you urging that the charter be refused. The exact wording of the board's telegram is as follows :—

"This board resolved granting of charter Corbin's extension Red Mountain Railway highly detrimental to British Columbia interests, simply outlet for our ores to be smelted in United States."

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) F. ELWORTHY,
Secretary.

Now this is the interesting letter which accompanied this resolution. It also is addressed to Hon. A. G. Blair, Minister of Railways :

Victoria, B.C., March 2, 1898.

Dear Sir,—When writing to you on the 26th ult. with reference to the application for a charter for the extension of the Red Mountain Railway, I omitted to state that this board had placed before it letters from residents of the Boundary country strongly advocating the granting of the charter which this board opposes.

I stop here to make a remark. The advocate of Mr. Corbin in the Railway Committee tried to make the committee believe that these men in Victoria who passed this resolution did not understand the situation, that they did not know the full import of what was being asked for here. Now, I wish to state that if there are any bodies of men in British Columbia thoroughly familiar with the needs of that country, thoroughly familiar with the way that trade is going and will go, they are the Board of Trade of Victoria and the Board of Trade of Vancouver. We have one hon. member of this House who is a member of the Board of Trade of Victoria, who, I believe, was present when this resolution was passed. I refer to the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Earle). He is not now present in the House. But as all hon. members know who have had any opportunity to discuss this matter with him, he is decidedly opposed to the granting of this charter. And it must not be forgotten that he is one of the largest wholesale men we have in Victoria city. He has up to the present done everything he could, as has every wholesale man in Victoria and Vancouver, to get a share of that trade, but he has seen that, unfortunately, they were handicapped, that these railway connections with the south have put the Americans in a position of advantage over the merchants on the coast. But not only are these bodies well informed upon matters of this kind, and particularly well informed upon this district, because it has received a great deal of attention lately, but when they were passing that very resolution which has been sent here, they were in possession, as they state in this letter, of arguments pro and con, and they adjudicated upon them, the result being that resolution. Now, I wish to call your attention to this section of the letter :

The letters in question were from real estate men, and the only reason advanced for the granting of the charter was that the building of the proposed railway would create a boom in the country, and enable the writers to dispose of property which is becoming a serious burden to the holders. No other reason was cited, and this board decided that the object of a railway should be something more than the above, and instructed me to telegraph you its resolution opposing the granting of a charter to Mr. Corbin.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) F. ELWORTHY,
Secretary.

And so I might go on. There is no doubt, I think, in the mind of any hon. member that British Columbia is practically a unit against the granting of this charter. That being so, I would appeal to some of my hon. friends here, who in the past, have been famous champions of provincial rights, to stand by the declaration of the province. The province has put itself decidedly upon record against this measure, and I ask these hon. gentlemen to stand true to their professions and as the people of British Columbia with united voice say that the granting of this charter will be detrimental to their best interest, I ask the hon. gentlemen to give heed to the wishes of the people. British Columbia is practically a unit upon this question, except—and I always make this exception—except the Americans, who unfortunately, are in possession of some of our best fields in the Kootenays. They, I admit, are in favour of the granting of this charter, for it plays into their hands in relation to their interests on the other side of the line. But with the exception of these Americans, who, commercially and politically, are identified with the United States, ninety-nine per cent of the people of our province are hostile to the granting of this charter. And fortunately the good sense of this country is not confined to British Columbia. We find the mercantile centres throughout the whole of Canada have raised their voices against this charter. The Board of Trade of Winnipeg has passed a resolution against, as also have the Boards of Trade of Toronto, Montreal and other places. Some people attach more importance to these kinds of resolutions than others do ; but when we find such remarkable unanimity of expression from the business men, from the solid commercial men of this country against this charter, I say that that should cause every hon. member to hesitate before he goes contrary to their wishes and to their judgment in a matter of this kind.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have about concluded my remarks. I wish finally to make the appeal to this House to throw out this charter. Let our Canadian company get in there first, let Canadian merchants get the preference while that country is new, let trade get started well in Canadian channels before we give opportunities to the people of the United States to get in there. There is nothing to be lost by refusing this charter. That country will get the same accommodation from the Canadian Pacific Railway, or the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern Railway. There is no doubt about that. The Canadian Pacific Railway have stated, and no person has denied, that they will build in there without a subsidy. There is no point of preference, therefore, as to time or the granting of a subsidy which would make you prefer the granting of a charter to an American road as against our Canadian road. There is absolutely no point of preference for the American road as against the Canadian road. That being so, I appeal to this House to give the preference which a Canadian road has a right to expect from a Canadian Parliament. We do not tie up the country by so doing.

For one year from now, ten years from now, any time this Parliament wishes in future to grant a charter to Mr. Corbin or any other United States railway magnate, there is nothing to hinder it, we do not tie our hands at all, we are absolutely free in the future in that respect. But I wish again to point out this fact, that this road, if built by a Canadian company, will not only conserve the trade of that section to British Columbia and to eastern Canada, but it will do something that Mr. Corbin's road will not do, it will develop that country to an extent four times as much. You who were in the Railway Committee and saw that peculiar map they had displayed on the wall, must have been struck with the fact that Mr. Corbin seeks to build only about thirty or forty miles in British Columbia, in Canadian territory. If the Canadian line is built, it will be built altogether in Canadian territory, and will extend this year alone something like 150 miles. That in itself, I submit, is a consideration which should throw the favour of this House on the side of the Canadian company. But after all is said and done, even if the American company should open up that country to the same extent as the Canadian company, I say it is the part of wisdom and of prudence for us at this time, when that trade is just beginning to get into settled channels, to refuse a charter to the American road and let our own Canadian road have the preference.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not wish to say anything on the main point, but simply to refer to the question at issue between the hon. gentleman and myself. I take it that neither of us have any other knowledge of how this vote went than that furnished by the material before us here. Now, the first vote was taken on the 23rd day of March. On the 24th of March, the Vancouver "World," which is the strongest supporter of the local government in that province, had the following paragraph referring to that vote, which appears in the Votes and Proceedings :

Let it be known far and near that those who are desirous of giving away the natural wealth which this province possesses, and the people's inheritance, are the Opposition, with the solitary exception of Mr. A. Williams, senior member for this city, who rose above partyism, and preferring country to faction, voted with the Government on this question, and in the best interests of Vancouver and the province generally.

That was on the 24th, the vote having been taken on the evening of the 23rd. Now, I find in the Vancouver "World" of the 26th, this paragraph :

It now appears that we were in error in stating the other day that Mr. Williams had voted with the majority in the House on Mr. Helmcken's resolution urging the Dominion Government to withhold its sanction for granting a charter to D. C. Corbin for the extension of the Spokane and Northern railroad from Marcus into the Boundary Creek country, and concerning which there is considerable feeling on the coast, in the interior and elsewhere in the Dominion.

That was three days after the vote, and therefore they must have seen occasion to retract the first statement as having been erroneous. If there is a strong supporter of the local government, it is the Vancouver "World," and a most excellent paper it is. Now, when you read the Votes and Proceedings in connection with this, I am bound to take the statement of Mr. McLagan, the editor of the Vancouver "World," that Mr. Williams did not vote as it appeared at first that he had voted. What are the facts? The main motion was put, as we heard read by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes), and to that motion an amendment was moved by Mr. Semlin, leader of the Opposition, and for that amendment voted every man of the Opposition, Mr. Williams included. Of course, it was voted down. Then, on the resumption of the debate next day, a member moved the previous question, and all the government members voted for it, and all the opposition, including Mr. Williams, voted against it. Then the original question was put and carried. Now, you will observe that Mr. Williams, who is a strong supporter of the opposition, in fact an indispensable factor of the opposition, at every previous stage of this question voted with the opposition. Then, why should he turn around again and, after voting for the amendment and against the previous question, when it comes to the main question, take a directly contrary course? On the 26th, after, no doubt, Mr. Williams having sought a correction, the "World" stated that it was in error in its first statement that Mr. Williams had voted with the majority. I think I am justified in saying that must have been a misprint, it must have been an error. It is quite inexplicable to me, knowing Mr. Williams as I do and his status in the opposition, that he would vote for the government in that connection. Even if I did not see that retraction by the Vancouver "World," I still would be perplexed to suppose that Mr. Williams did vote against his party on that occasion. That is the reason I had for controverting the hon. gentleman's statement. I think I am quite justified in assuming that Mr. Williams did not vote with the majority, after the statement by Mr. McLagan, a strong supporter of the government, and that he would not without good cause take such a strong ground from under his own feet as that of Mr. Williams voting with the government.

Mr. DAVIN. Would my hon. friend suppose a newspaper stated that a certain gentleman in this House voted a given way and it was found on the records of the House that he voted differently, would he take the newspaper account as against the Journals of the House?

Mr. MORRISON. If I knew the editor of the paper which published the vote and the other circumstances as in this case, I would be inclined to say there was a typographical error, as such errors occur so frequently in the printing of the proceedings of the House, and take the statement of the paper.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. The question whether this charter should be granted was so thoroughly discussed at the several meetings of the Railway Committee, that I, like my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes), do not desire to weary the House; but at the same time I would like to say a word or two in favour of this Bill. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver, and although I paid the closest attention to them and weighed them carefully as he went along, I was not so impressed with any of his arguments as to change the opinion I had already formed that this charter should be granted to the Kettle Valley Railway. I could not reconcile the vote against this Bill with the position that I took when the Crow's Nest Pass Railway discussion took place in this House. I opposed the handing over of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway to the Canadian Pacific Railway because I favoured a policy that might have given competitive freight rates over an all-Canadian route to the Kootenay, and ultimately to the coast of British Columbia. The hope of competition on that line, with all the advantages that it presented, has passed away into the dim and distant future. Now, the opponents of this Bill have the nerve to ask us to put the Canadian Pacific Railway in a position of supreme authority over our ever-growing interprovincial commerce. They coolly ask us that the producer, the manufacturer and the wholesale merchant of the east shall deal with the miner, and the smelter man, and the consumer of the west on whatever terms may be laid down by Sir William Van Horne and the incorporated capitalists who are associated in his enterprise. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I will not by my vote consent to place the miners and the smelter men of the Boundary Creek country, or the merchants and manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec, or the wholesale merchants of my own city, or of Montreal or of any other eastern cities, under the control of the iron hand of Sir William Van Horne or the bosses of the Canadian Pacific Railway. As to the opposition of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I think that if ever an effort was made by the Canadian Pacific Railway to tie this Boundary Creek country up, to use the expression of the hon. member for Vancouver, it has been made in connection with this Kettle Valley Railroad. The Canadian Pacific Railway has never in its history made so desperate an effort as it is now making in order to defeat this Bill. And the fact that we had the president and the vice-president of the road before the Railway Committee, and that every influence has been used, shows how materially interested in this Bill are the Canadian Pacific Railway, and how anxious they are that it should be defeated. Competition is the life of trade. We all know that. So, in order that the greatest amount of good may be done the greatest number, and that the manufacturing, the mining, the mercantile and the industrial interests of this country may receive the greatest benefit in connection with western trade, I think we should grant this legislation without the slightest hesitation.

I believe in the value of railway competition, and my belief is confirmed by the testimony of an hon. gentleman on this side of the House, a practical business man and shipper, the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Kloepper), who, at a meeting of the Railway Committee the other day, put forward some pertinent facts in connection with railway rates and competition. I think that hon. member has a more extended experience than even my hon. friend and colleague the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), who made the statement, in the Railway Committee, that he could obtain better rates to a non-competitive point than to a competitive point on one of the great railways of Canada. When I say the hon. member for South Wellington has a more extended experience, I mean a different kind of experience. The hon. member for Centre Toronto is an immense shipper; but the rates he obtains on half a dozen train loads of steamboats is no criterion as to the rates that smaller shippers would have to pay. A manufacturer, like the hon. member for South Wellington, has a more representative experience than many larger shippers, and I am prepared to take his word that a choice of freight routes is a good thing and advantageous to both the shipper and the consumer. It is, therefore, because I am in favour of railway competition that I am supporting this Bill. As to the interests of Canada, I am prepared to fight for the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any corporation, so long as the interests of that railway, or that corporation, are identical with the interests of my country. I cannot see how the interests of Canada are to be endangered by giving our fellow-Canadians in the Boundary Creek district the right to have this railway built at private expense; I think it is time, in the interest of Canada, to establish a precedent that there are, at least, some parts of the country rich enough to justify the construction of a railway for its own sake. Canada has been brought up in the belief that the people should be exceedingly thankful to any group of individuals who form themselves into a corporation and come here and accept enough of the country's money to build a railway for their own benefit. Session after session Canada's incorporated benefactors come here and always raise the same old cry—We are going to develop the country's resources. Yes, develop the country's resources on the usual terms; get a subsidy big enough to build a railway which they bond for a good deal more than it cost, and those bonds for ever remain a tax on the unfortunate people who are to use the road. It is proposed by this Bill to allow certain individuals to build a railway and develop the country at their own expense. I understand that the Canadian Pacific Railway under its various names, has built in the United States over 2,200 miles of road to develop the resources of the United States. I understand, these roads in the United States have been built without a dollar's worth of public aid in land or money; and I am told, by those who know, or ought to know, that alien farmers get lower rates over the lines which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have built in the United States with their own money, than the Canadian farmer obtains on the lines which the Canadian Pacific Railway has built in the United States with this country's money. So that, while the American farmer has never had to contribute anything to those Canadian Pacific Railway roads, over which he enjoys low rates, the Canadian farmer is charged higher rates over the Canadian Pacific Railway line in Canada, for which he is taxed up to the neck to provide subsidies. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company do not do this because Sir William Van Horne loves the American farmer better than the Canadian farmer. No; the Canadian Pacific Railway have to lower their freight rates in the United States in order to get away a share of the business from the competing lines in that country, and the company have been able to keep up the rate in the Canadian North-west because there are no competing lines. I am trying to view the request of our fellow-Canadians in the Boundary Creek district as I would desire them to view a similar application coming from myself, and as if they had the power to deny me rights I might demand, as this Parliament has the power to deny them theirs. To reject this Bill is to place our fellow-Canadians in the Boundary Creek district at the mercy of the Canadian Pacific Railway; it is, in effect, to say that trade between the Boundary Creek country and eastern Canada shall be taxed all that it can bear. I do not think it is in the interest of Canada to retard the development of the Boundary Creek country by placing the Canadian Pacific Railway in a position to exact extortionate and oppressive rates from the people of that district. I do not think it is in the interest of Canada to refuse the Grand Trunk Railway a chance to enter that country, to get into competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and take all the freight that our eastern wholesale merchants and manufacturers can offer.

I am a protectionist; but I am in favour of protecting this country's interest by a tariff, and not by refusing to meet the just demands of fellow-Canadians in the Boundary Creek district. I believe public opinion generally has approved the action of the Railway Committee, and I am perfectly certain, further, that it has approved and endorsed the action of the Minister of Railways. I have heard opinions expressed, since the meeting of the Railway Committee, by scores of people, merchants and shippers of both political parties, in Toronto and elsewhere, and nine-tenths of the opinions expressed were in favour of granting this Kettle River charter. In fact, the only people I have heard talk the other way were men who were not shippers, but who were doing the old flag business at the bidding of the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is no danger that public opinion will allow the Boundary Creek country to be drained of its wealth for the benefit of the United States cities. The granting of this charter will not relieve the Government or its successors from the obligation of protecting the interests of the people of this country by the imposition of export duties, and as a protectionist and as a Conservative, I say this country's interests can be better protected by the imposition of export duties than by the establishment of a railroad monopoly.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to say a few words on this matter. There is no doubt that the view just put forward by the hon. member (Mr. Ross Robertson) is the view that, at a superficial glance, will commend itself to nine-tenths of the people who talk or think about a railway, because the sound of competition has an attraction. If we had not the experience of England and the experience of the United States, if that experience had not been crystallized in volumes, of which I hold two in my hand, showing that what I stated in the Railway Committee, and, I think, in this House, when this question was up before, that competition in railways is a delusion, that you cannot, in the nature of things, have competition in railways, because the cardinal principle behind competition is, that the thing that supplies the competition can be multiplied almost infinitely in proportion to the demand, we should all take the same view. But nobody supposes that a railway is in that position. In fact, in England or in Canada or in the United States or elsewhere, a railway corporation is a body of men to which the Government of the country has given for public ends, part of its sovereignty. You cannot have such a thing as railway competition. I have in my hand, the book published by Mr. Hole on national railways, and chapter 4 deals with that question of competition, and this is what it says :

The idea that the rates for carriage of goods might be left to the competition of companies fell to the ground when it was found that the companies did not compete, although many of them obtained their Acts upon that suggestion. Some call this road we are discussing a Grand Trunk line ; I do not see how they show that ; but the bare fact that this is a line coming from below the international boundary will not prevent the rule that has been found to work in regard to operating railways, namely : That when you have railways contiguous, the very moment they find that their competition is injurious to themselves that moment they come to an arrangement and agree upon rates. If I did not think that competition in railways was a delusion, the eloquent argument of my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) would have great weight with me. Again, this writer says :

Not a ton of iron or coals, not a sack of flour, bushel of fruit, or basket of fish, nor any of the whole (nearly) three hundred millions of tons carried, but is taxed, not at the will of the individual trader, nor at the will of the state, which only fixed the maximum for goods, but at that of the companies (or, rather, their managers), who, it is admitted, charge "as much as could be got," without reference to the cost to the company of performing the service, and therefore cannot be left uncontrolled.

This is his conclusion, and it drives us to the proposition which I have myself laid down, and that my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) has laid down with such cogency and force : that the real control over a railway must come from the Government of the country through which it runs. This is Mr. Hole's conclusion :

No theory of railway management is tenable which regards railways as private property, to be carried on solely with reference to the gain of the shareholders.

Therefore if that proposition be sound, no theory of competition can hold water when applied to railways. I take this book of Hadley on Railways and I find he says :

It is to the credit of English statesmen that they did not deceive themselves in this respect. They learned more in a few years from the working of a few miles of railroad than the general public has learned from all the railroads of the world in half a century. They recognized that competition could not be relied upon or aimed at with any hope of success.

And in a whole chapter he elaborates that, and if the experience of England as crystallized in this volume is correct, then nearly the whole of the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Ross Robertson) falls to the ground, and railway competition is a delusion. My hon. friend, for whom I have the greatest possible respect, says it is not, but still we have here the long years of experience in England and the United States against the judgment of my hon. friend. My hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) also spoke about what we are all gratified at : that here you have a railway coming forward to construct a line without asking large sums of money as subsidies for so doing. Sir, I consider that we might have paused long ago before giving large bonuses for the construction of these railways. I consider that the time has come when we should look to what the country is, and what is the field offered for railway exploitation, and if that field is a field that is likely to pay well we may be perfectly certain that private capital will put railways in there.

But how does that afford an argument against discountenancing the Kettle Valley River Railway, when into the very same country, over Canadian soil one of our own railways is ready to build a line without asking for any money whatever. Therefore, if that line is going to be built without help, and if we are to throw up our caps for one railway, we may as well throw up our caps for the other.

Mr. BOSTOCK. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), but he seems to have forgotten that there is a provincial subsidy to the railway which is being built under the Columbia and Western charter.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not forget that at all, but that subsidy does not come out of our pockets in the Dominion. And what does that prove, but that the British Columbia people feel that the bringing of that Canadian Pacific Railway line will do what is most necessary to be done ; it will secure for the fisheries and other products of the province whence my hon. friend (Mr. Bostock) comes, this Boundary Creek trade. My hon. friend (Mr. Bostock) is in the same position as the Minister of Railways, who sits next him. He forgets what he said last year—and it is really very interesting to look up these gentlemen. The position that some of these gentlemen opposite are to-day illustrates the position that a Government cannot fail to get into which is a mere opportunist government. That government or that man who acts without principle must be inconsistent; no backbone of principle will run through its career. And to-day we find the Minister of Railways, with his bland and powerful advocacy and with the aplomb with which he always speaks on any subject, the air of a man who settles the thing when he speaks; we find him talking very differently now from what he did last year, and yet he expects this Parliament and he expects the country to accept his words. He expects us to accept his assurances now as he expected us to accept entirely different assurances from him only last session. Here is what my hon. friend from Yale (Mr. Bostock) said last year:

The danger we are under in that country is the same as we are under in the west Kootenay country with regard to Rossland. The natural tendency is for people to come into the country from the south, and we are very much in danger of all our trade and business being dragged that way. We have really to fight against the natural outline of the country, and try to direct the trade north instead of letting it go south. So that, speaking in the interest of the country itself, I think we have to take hold of this question at once and do the best we can with it.

That is the language of the hon. gentleman who is promoting this Bill; and now he is promoting this railway to do the very opposite. When a man, in the course of one short twelvemonth, blows hot and cold like that, what weight are you to attach to what he says or does or proposes? I think my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) read the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright)—very emphatic, very suggestive, very eloquent, as they could not fail to be, and at the same time, considering all the past, very extraordinary, if now, at the end of twenty months, anything is extraordinary that comes to us from these hon. gentlemen. Then we had our hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), and here is what he said on the subject of our trade with that region:

Our local position is this: At present North Alberta supplies grain, hay and vegetables, and South Alberta cattle, to the mining regions, over the Canadian Pacific Railway main line from Calgary, and its branch lines and steamboat connections. Our competitors, who supply by far the largest part of the produce consumed in Kootenay, are the farmers of the Palouse district of eastern Washington and northern Idaho, for whom the city of Spokane is the trade centre.

These are the competitors at the present moment; and the railway policy we are here discussing is to fortify those competitors to compete with the farmers of northern and southern Alberta and eastern and western Assiniboia. When we have the statement of so high an authority as the hon. member for Alberta, when we have the weighty authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and when we have the statement of the policy of the Government made by the Minister of Railways last year, and such a contradictory policy to-day, are not we from the North-west—nay, is not every member of Parliament—bound to ask the Government, what is their policy at the present moment? Did the Minister of Railways express the Government policy last session, or does he express it to-day? Or, if he does not, will some one who is higher in the hierarchy of Liberal leadership, get up and state to us what is the policy of the Liberal party on this question? In fact, I am told on pretty good authority—I would surprise hon. gentlemen if I told them the authority—that the Minister of Railways and Canals in the Railway Committee did not express the policy of the Government.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Let us have your authority.

Mr. DAVIN. I said I could not give it. Why, when I get a Cabinet secret like that, does the hon. gentleman think that I am going to give it away? Why, Mr. Chairman, if I gave away the gentleman who gives me the Cabinet secrets of hon. gentlemen opposite, I would never hear anything again. No, Sir; I will veil it under that convenient form: "a little bird told me"; but the little bird, I believe, spoke by the book. My hon. friend reminds me—I forgot that—that at the first two meetings of the Railway Committee we had the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) sitting next to the Chairman, and not far from him the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), and when anything was said in favour of the Kettle Valley Railway, we had the Napoleonic frown of the Minister of the Interior, and the Minister of Public Works shook his ambrosial locks, and looked dreadful things. What is the meaning of it? The heavenly twins of the Cabinet—the Castor of Quebec and the Pollux of Manitoba—were both against the Kettle Valley Railway, and they are not here to-day. We are often told by the press that the hon. gentleman who sits in that gallery—if I may so refer to him—who communicates hints beforehand of what is to be the policy of the Government, and who shapes in his great brain future leaders, has declared what a powerful mind the Minister of the Interior has—he is a young Napoleon, one of the masters of the party; and he ought to be here to tell us what the policy of the Government on this question is. Then, the hon. member for Alberta, said:

Until February last year their rate on grain was 25 cents per 100 to Nelson, which is a central point in Kootenay, while our rate was 50 cents per 100. Even with the duty in our favour we were not able to do business. In February last (no doubt in view of possible competition), the Canadian Pacific Railway cut the rate from Edmonton (which is the principal grain shipping point) to Nelson to 35 cents per 100.

Mark you, he says, that even with the duty they were not able to compete with those men below the boundary; how then will they compete when we have added to the facilities for coming in from the country below the line? The hon. gentleman goes on:

With the duty in our favour this enabled us to compete with the Spokane 25 cent rate to certain Kootenay points most conveniently situated for us, and less conveniently placed for them. But had it not been for the high duties we evidently could not have competed, except at very much lower price for produce at the point of production on our side of the line, as compared with the price on their side.

Why? Because the farmers of Idaho, Washington, and Oregon—because the fruit-growers of Washington and other districts—because the canners south of the boundary, were nearer to the Boundary Creek country. And we are asked to increase the advantages of those competitors, already so successful:

When the Crow's Nest Pass Railway is completed the difference in haul will be 150 miles from Spokane to Nelson, against 600 miles from Edmonton to Nelson.

There is a difference of 450 miles in favour of those competitors, and yet you are going to aid them still further to compete against our own people. He goes on to argue:

The question is not one merely of a cent higher or lower, but possibly involves, in the last resort, getting down to the bare cost of hauling in order to hold the trade for our own country.

The point has been made that this line is not really the Northern Pacific at all, that it is not really Mr. Corbin you are dealing with but the Grand Trunk Railway. Sir, the Grand Trunk Railway is a Canadian line just as surely as the Canadian Pacific Railway. But what came out in the committee? When it was asked how it was the eastern shippers supplied the shopkeepers in the various little towns with goods, we were told that the customers of Canadian shippers who wrote to Canadian firms asking them to send on certain goods were supplied not from Canada but Chicago. The Canadian shippers, instead of sending on the goods from Canada, wrote to their agents or principals in Chicago and elsewhere, and American goods were sent west.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Only such goods as were not manufactured in Canada at all, and the Canadians got the trade.

Mr. DAVIN. But supposing they were the same class of goods, does my hon. friend mean to say that if he had a means of getting goods in St. Paul as in Montreal, he would not prefer to telegraph to St. Paul and have the goods supplied from these, and get the rake-off, than ship from Montreal and pay the extra freight?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). That does not come into the question at all.

Mr. DAVIN. I want to show my hon. friend what is the character of the country that we will have to compete against. I have in my hand the Encyclopedia Britannica, and this is how it describes the very country south of the border, immediately south of that part of British Columbia which this Kettle River Valley Railway will tap. This Kettle River Railway is an American road, serving American territory, that just dips in and puts its hand into the wealth of Canada to haul it out to what is the main part of its line.

The principal tributaries of the Columbia within the territory are Clark's Fork, the outlet of Lake Pend d'Oreille, an unnavigable stream flowing through a deep cañon, which enters the Columbia just above the northern boundary of the territory. The Spokane River, one of the most important tributaries, is the outlet of Lake Cœur d'Alene, which drains a large extent of the Bitter Root Mountains. The Spokane, from the lake to Spokane Falls, a distance of about 30 miles, flows just below the level of a lovely prairie country.

Such as we have in the North-west, in Alberta and in western and eastern Assiniboia.

At the falls the river takes a plunge of 156 feet, and from there to the Columbia it flows through a deep cañon. These falls of the Spokane furnish one of the finest, most accessible, and most easily controlled water-powers in the world, and already they have been utilized to a considerable extent for manufacturing purposes. The Okinakane is the next important tributary; it rises in British Columbia, and flows southward from Lakes Okinakane and Owoyoos, and enters the territory in 119 degrees and 30 minutes W. longitude.

I call attention to this:

Its course lies through a rich and inviting country.

According to that, our friends below the line have a rich and inviting country, just contiguous to the boundary, and we rejoice to know it. But if we are to carry out the policy which is dear to the heart of Canada, the policy of the Canadian Liberal-Conservative party, and which I thought hon. gentlemen opposite had taken up in imitation of us, if we are to pursue the policy of Canada for the Canadians, of keeping our own wealth within our borders and not doing, as we did in the past, scatter with a lavish hand the wealth of Canada to enrich aliens and foreigners, we will not invite the farmers of that rich country to compete with our farmers in Assiniboia, Alberta, and elsewhere. Turning to Idaho, which is one of the points served by this company, I find it thus described:

Fruit Acreage.—In April the state horticultural inspector reported that about 20,000 acres in Idaho are devoted to fruit culture—6,695 acres producing apples, 5,632 prunes, 1,838 pears, 1,030 berries, 972 peaches, and 526 cherries. Various other fruits being cultivated on the remainder of the 20,000 acres. From experiments he has conducted, he says that Idaho soil will produce an average of 17 tons of sugar beets to an acre, the Idaho product containing from 17 to 21 per cent of saccharine matter.

Live Stock.—The United States Department of Agriculture in July estimated the number and value of farm animals in the state as follows:—Horses 134,705, value $3,328,570; milch cows 28,034, value $567,689; oxen and other cattle 395,852, value $5,583,492; sheep 1,011,852, value $2,281,726; and swine 77,518, value $398,290; total value $12,189,741.

I have called attention to this to show that not merely shall our farmers have competition in cereals and dairy produce, but from the three states of Idaho, Washington and Oregon we shall have competition in the production of meat. Every man around Regina or Moose Jaw, or southern or northern Alberta, who wants to send a cow or bullock into Kootenay or Boundary Creek, will have these men, with the advantage of short haul, to compete against, and as the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) pointed out, that advantage of short haul is destructive of our competition. We have large flocks of sheep in the North-west Territories. We have exported sheep to Great Britain, but have found that the long haul and the trip across the Atlantic and the consequent deterioration that took place put us at great disadvantage in the British market. We found that although we can ship cattle successfully to England, we cannot send sheep profitably from the North-west Territories to that market, and have to turn to British Columbia. British Columbia is the market to which our sheep farmers are looking. We were told, when voting four million dollars for the Crow's Nest Pass line, that we were going to have the Kootenay trade for our exports of sheep and cattle and wheat, but now these hopes are to be dashed to the ground by this proposed legislation. Take Oregon again:

Oregon has 2,486,247 sheep, from which were secured in 1896 19,389,976 pounds of washed and unwashed wool, with 69 per cent of shrinkage. The scoured wool amounted to 6,165,892 pounds.

Here, again, we shall have competition from Oregon. And I wish to show you what this book says concerning the farm animals in Washington territory. According to the information furnished by the United States Department of Agriculture, in Washington state as it is now, the number and value of farm animals in 1896, were as follows:—

	Number.	Value.
Horses	192,055	$5,574,956
Milch cows	117,381	2,591,772
Other cattle	381,550	5,803,002
Sheep	756,346	1,318,462

So that from Washington also our sheep farmers, who are looking to this country

as their special market, will have great competition.

Mr. Chairman, if the committee will bear with me in making one personal remark, I may say that I take strong personal interest in the policy embodied in the Crow's Nest Pass Bill. I do not think that my hon. friends from the Treasury benches will think I say a harsh thing of them when I say that whatever else their friends may give them credit for, they cannot give them credit for originality. I do not think they have produced an original policy, I do not think they have struck out an original idea with regard to the government of this country since they came into power. Whose idea was it that they copied when they dealt with the Crow's Nest Pass Railway last year? A short time ago, when I ventured to say that it was by being aggressive that I carried so many things in this House—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes. There was an ignorant guffaw.

Mr. CHARLTON. An ignorant one?

Mr. DAVIN. I will not characterize the guffaw I am listening to now. But I will tell the hon. gentleman this, that I can prove it, as I have done—

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman's (Mr. Davin's) manners are exceedingly good and should be copied.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) objects to my manners. Of course, I did not have that unexceptional training that has turned out the finished gentleman in my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He must excuse me, my education having been neglected. I did not have the advantages that have given us such a Brummel as we have in my hon. friend. Now, Sir, on July 8th, 1895, the following resolution was moved in this House:—

That the commissioners appointed to inquire into Canadian Pacific Railway freight rates have reported that Canadian Pacific Railway existing rates for grain are from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 1 cent per 100 pounds less than the Dakota schedule from all points west of Regina, which last, however, applied to Edmonton and Prince Albert, would be 6 and 7 cents lower than the Canadian Pacific tariff; that, as regards live stock, the Canadian Pacific Railway rate runs at \$1.35 and \$1.84 per car to Montreal, while the Northern Pacific and Great Northern charge from \$1.63 to \$1.91 for the same distance; that, as regards coal and lumber, the comparisons show still more favourable rates to the Canadian public. That this House would suggest—

I ask the attention of hon. gentlemen to this—

—That this House would suggest to the Government that it would be well to open negotiations with the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, with the view of coming to an arrangement with that company to carry for the next twenty years produce from the North-west to the sea-board 10 per cent cheaper than at present, on condition of the Government guaranteeing bonds to a certain amount for twenty years, and should the railways of the United States lower their rate, the Canadian Pacific Railway shall lower theirs proportionately.

That was the first time that such a proposition was ever made in this Parliament, and when it was made originally on the platform, it was the first time it was ever made in Canada. Well, now, compare that with the Government's policy on the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. I will not read the clause of the Act, it has already been read. But I would refer hon. members to clause 1, subsections "c," "d," "e," and also subsection 1. Reading this, you will see how closely, in some respects, the Government followed that resolution. Where they departed from it, they departed from it for the worst. They departed from it in this—instead of guaranteeing bonds or granting money in some such form, they gave $11,000 a mile much more than was necessary to give in order to get these concessions. But, generally speaking, the policy laid down in this resolution in 1895 is the policy adopted by this Government in 1897. And, Sir, I am very glad indeed to have such distinguished followers. I am especially glad to have the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) endorse the policy laid down in that resolution. That is not the only thing in which they have carried out my views. I congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) particularly in what he has done in that way. The only thing that I might object is that the Minister of Agriculture talks as if it were his own policy. The only thing I object to in the case of the Minister of Railways in this regard is that, having laid down that policy, as he did it last year, he is now, in some respects, departing from it. After I had spoken in support of that resolution my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) replied. He said :

I do not know whether there is a prospect of the Canadian Pacific Railway entertaining such a proposition ;—

And again :

—but I do not see that the Government could, in any way, guarantee bonds of the Canadian Pacific Railway—

And so on. The only Liberal exponent who spoke on the subject—it was moved on a Wednesday and rather late in the session, and the debate closed at six o'clock, and the subject was not again reached—was Mr. Martin, who is now in British Columbia. Mr. Martin threw cold water on the idea ; he laughed at it. He said :

The hon. gentleman comes forward with a proposition so absurd and ridiculous that the Minister of Railways simply rises and tells him that he cannot consider it.

Why, Sir, when I originally proposed to get the second homestead for the farmers of the North-west Territories who were entitled to it and put $400 apiece in the hands of hundreds of farmers, both Liberals and Conservatives laughed at me. But I kept at from 1887 to 1891, when, after I had divided the House and brought the majority down to fourteen, Sir John Thompson came over to my place and said : We will put your resolutions and Bills on the Government Orders. I throw that out to my hon. friends the soi-disant independent members on the other side to encourage them. Mr. Martin further said :

I understood him to say that to expect other provinces of Canada to devote public funds to the Canadian Pacific Railway in order that the company might reduce its rates in favour of a small portion of the Dominion was a proposition—the Minister did not use the words, but I use them—so absurd and ridiculous that it did not require any consideration.

Well, Sir, as on previous occasions, these words appeared at the time to fall on idle ears, but it turns out from the legislation of last session, that they must have been pured from a golden urn. Then Mr. Martin said :

Well, I cannot help it. This is one of the unfortunate things. We are not a party of repudiation.

This is the Mr. Martin, a burning and shining light, who placed the gentlemen opposite where they are now. He it was who contrived the machine—though hoisted with his own machine—that placed you there.

When a thing is done in this House, and when Canada has pledged her name and credit to a contract, we propose as Canadians to carry out these pledges.

I said :

Then you are opposing what is suggested—

Because I knew very well that if he remained in public life and opposed my proposition, I should be able, if I met him on a platform in the west to pound him to some purpose. This is what he says :

I am not opposing it. It does not require any opposition. I am stating what the Minister of Railways and Canals says in regard to it.

He then begins to hedge. Well, there is the fact. I take a deep interest in this subject, and I want to see it carried out fully and successfully. We have been told something about the benefits that would accrue to these towns. I do not think the member for Vancouver misrepresented the situation when he described two or three persons passing resolutions. But I have had a communication from a Canadian living in Greenwood, where, I think, the great majority of the people are citizens of the United States, stating that—and I ask the attention to this of my hon. friend from Yale (Mr. Bostock)—the majority of the people in Greenwood are citizens of the United States, that they talk of the country as if it was their own, that they bear themselves most arrogantly to the people of Canada who happen to be there.

Mr. BOSTOCK. May I ask the hon. gentleman, where he gets that?

Mr. DAVIN. The letter was sent in confidence; I cannot give the name. If I had permission of the writer, of course, I could tell the hon. gentleman, but he does not give me that permission. But is it to be supposed that he excogitated such a thing as that? Has my hon. friend visited Greenwood?

Mr. BOSTOCK. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, if my hon. friend is in a position to contradict that, and if he gives his word to this House, of course, I would not doubt his word. But mind this, everything my hon. friend says now on this subject will be taken 'cum grano salis,' for this reason, that there are his own words of last year in letters of fire, written against the position he has taken here. Now, here we have news from Rossland, from Trail, from Nelson, from Vernon and from Kaslo:

Rossland, B.C., April 1.—The despatches of to-day announcing the passing of the Kettle River Valley Railway Bill through the Railway Committee, meets with the entire satisfaction of a portion of our American population, who are supporters of Mr. Corbin, but the general feeling seems to prevail that the line, if built, cannot but at once hurt west Kootenay, and ultimately injure Boundary Creek. The only hope for the county, should the Bill pass the House, is that the Canadian Pacific Railway will build through the district. No one in British Columbia credits for one moment Mr. Corbin's reported promises to safeguard the interests of the province, or to develop the smelting industry. It is not in the nature of things that he should. He is a business man. His interests are American, and must remain so.

There is a telegram from the accredited correspondent of one of the first papers in Canada, and he is bound to send to his paper what is the state of feeling. He says that in Rossland the American population is rejoiced; but the British Columbia, or Canadian, population, who are anxious for the future of the country, and who desire to see it go forward on Canadian lines, are not rejoicing, but, on the contrary, they are somewhat anxious.

Mr. BOSTOCK. Does my hon. friend mean to say that the "Gazette" has a correspondent in each of these towns?

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I am not in the secrets of the "Gazette" office, and I never asked my friend Mr. White about it; but I assume that, when that paper publishes correspondence, it comes as correspondence, and not as private letters. When I edited a newspaper, if anybody, no matter how high his position, were to send me a telegram, I would not put it in as a telegram belonging to the paper, but I would put it in as a letter or note coming from that person; and, if he did not want his name to appear, I would make an explanation to that effect.

Trail, B.C., April 1.—In announcing the Railway Committee's report favouring Corbin's Kettle River Valley Railway charter, the Northport, Washington, paper of yesterday rejoices exceedingly, and says: "Now look out for great prosperity for Northport."

"For great prosperity for Northport." We heard a great deal of that. All this points to Northport. The smelting will be done at Northport, and, in order to prevent the ore from going out, we have got a clause in this charter which everybody knows is not worth that much, to keep the ore in our country and to build up some other place besides Northport. Can any one suppose that an exceptional piece of legislation like that would be put in force against the interests that will be brought to bear? Look at the way this Government is going on about the lumber question. Notwithstanding what the Dingley Bill has done, and notwithstanding the promise that was made, notwithstanding the representations of the business people of this country interested in lumber, who are crying out, clamouring and beseeching to have that duty that was promised to be put on, put on now, the duty is not put on. And when they won't do it in one case, do you suppose we can trust them to do it in another? This telegram goes on:

To-day's despatch telling of Mr. Corbin's success before the Railway Committee with his Kettle River Valley Bill, is hardly credited. The hope is expressed that if it has really passed the Railway Committee it will be defeated in the House. Mr. Corbin's advent in Rossland impoverished this community, and it is felt that if aided to further tap the riches of British Columbia, it is all day with us.

Then, from Nelson we have this:

Nelson, B.C., April 1.—Much surprise is expressed here over the reported passing of the Kettle River Valley Railway Bill through the Railway Committee. The statement is not credited. So apparent are the dangers to Canadian trade of such a line, to those living in British Columbia, that they imagine that the situation must be equally clear to all. Should the charter be granted and the line built, it is felt that the death knell of smelting in British Columbia has been sounded.

But is it only the death-knell of the smelting that will be sounded; is it only that Northport will be built up? Why, the obligation will be still greater soon than it is now. The fishing interests, the canning interests, the wheat-growing interests, the beef-raising interests of the North-west will all be deplorably and irretrievably damaged, so far as this great market is concerned that we were to have secured to us by last year's legislation.

Vernon, B.C., April 1.—Although the need of a railway in Boundary is fully acknowledged, to-day a despatch reporting the passing of the Kettle River Valley Railway Bill through the Railway Committee is looked upon as ominous for this section of the country. It is hoped that the Canadian Pacific Railway will be able to come to the rescue and prevent the farmers of the Colliville Valley, Washington, supply the Boundary Creek district, as must follow the construction of an unopposed line into that territory from the United States.

Kaslo, B.C., April 1.—The Kettle River Railway Bill has created no interest to speak of here, until to-day's despatch reporting Mr. Corbin's victory before the Railway Committee over Sir William C. Van Horne and Mr. Shaughnessy, became known. Those who know the Boundary district are of one voice as to the need of a railway in that section. The feeling seems to prevail that a line from the United States would prove most injurious to the general interests of the country, and should only be permitted in the event of it not being possible to arrange for the construction of a Canadian line through that district.

Sir, if it should turn out that competition is necessary, by shutting out this line now we do not preclude ourselves from the option of near competition or ultimate competition. If it should appear that those clauses which were put into the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill last year for the purpose of enabling the Government to control the freight rates on every line of the Canadian Pacific Railway which communicates by any route with the Crow's Nest Pass road, which means the whole line practically, are delusive, which they are not—if it is found that they are not sufficient to do what I hold is the true policy, to control these lines by Government surveillance and Government control, then we do not surrender our option of obtaining this company, and we may be perfectly certain here will be persons always ready to come in and build a line. It is a departure from the policy of last year; it is contrary to the policy of Canada for the Canadians; it is a retrograde step, and is one which should not be made with the approval of this House. Some hon. members may say: did not this Bill pass the Railway Committee? How did it pass the Railway Committee? With a majority of only six, when a large number, or at all events a considerable number of hon. members opposed to it were absent; and when it is a large national question such as this, is it to be supposed for one moment that we are to be controlled by the mere pedantry that the Bill passed the Railway Committee and should thereby be led not to revise or review the issue here? Let me say to the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) that I do not want to place anyone at the mercy of the Canadian Pacific Railway. No one is at the mercy of the Canadian Pacific Railway now with the Act of last session in our hands; and if the people are at the company's mercy, the Government should exercise the power given them by that Act. My hon. friend has spoken of the anxiety of the Canadian Pacific Railway. What about the country through which the Canadian Pacific Railway goes? It runs through Manitoba, Assiniboia and Alberta. Does the hon. gentleman suppose that that part of Canada is not anxious for the trade of Boundary Creek? I can understand that a great railway makes many enemies, as in fact every railroad does. The Grand Trunk did so in the past, and no doubt has many enemies now. The Canadian Pacific Railway made many enemies in the past, and the fact was not surprising; but the mere circumstance that it may be popular to cry out against the great railway corporations is no reason why, when an issue like this comes before Parliament we should allow our eyes to be blinded and should not consider the question in a judicial frame of mind. Taking the circumstances of the North-west into account, considering the circumstances of Assiniboia, Alberta, the Saskatchewan and Manitoba together with the interests of British Columbia, we should decide whether the best course to adopt is not to prevent this road going through.

Mr. BOSTOCK. I desire to make a few remarks in answer to what has been said in the committee by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes). The hon. gentleman occupied a large portion of the afternoon in placing before the committee the same arguments that had been used before the Railway Committee as to why this Bill should not pass, and he travelled over very much the same ground as was traversed on that occasion. One strong point which I wish to bring before hon. members constitutes a very good answer to what has been said by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) in regard to the stand that I took when speaking about the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. At that time I explained the geographical conditions of the country, and pointed to the fact that the mountain ranges in British Columbia run in such a direction that trade would pass down into the United States to the south; but on this occasion that fact is one of the strongest reasons why I am in favour of the present Bill, for we have the geographical conditions with us. The Kettle River, as any one who has studied the map knows, winds in and out of the boundary line, and runs into the Columbia below Northport. The streams running north from the mountain to the south of the boundary line enter Washington Territory; and one of the strong reasons why, from the point of view of British Columbia and the constituency which I represent, I favour the measure is, that by allowing this railway to be built in British Columbia, on the line laid down by the present charter, it will tend to draw the ores from the Eureka country in Washington Territory and from the mountains around which the Kettle River runs into British Columbia. If this charter be not granted, the railway, which can be built by Mr. Corbin without being in any way under our control, will come up to the boundary line, and will build up on the southern side of the line cities which will take away a large volume of trade from our own cities near the Boundary Creek country. It is a very important matter and one which my hon. friends ought to take into consideration when voting on this question, because we have found in British Columbia, and especially in the Kootenay mining district, that where we have had competition between railways we have been able to build up cities that are making rapid and continuous growth, while those towns which have not had competing railways have not advanced to anything like the same extent. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) in speaking on this question quoted figures from the customs returns respecting Nelson and Rossland, and the returns for those two ports showed a considerable increase. I presume in quoting those figures the hon. gentleman wanted the House to accept the view that the whole of this trade was due to the fact that a line ran into Nelson and Rossland from the south, but it must be remembered that the Canadian Pacific Railway is ready to handle freight from the United States as well as from any part of Canada, and that company is always trying to extend its branches into the United States in order to draw trade from that country to Canada as much as possible. Only the other day when I was looking through a newspaper I found a paragraph showing that that company are now making arrangements for the construction of a line which will run from Portland to Vancouver, and allow the company to get down to cities on the Pacific Coast and tap the Southern Pacific and Union Pacific, and thus place the Canadian Pacific Railway in a position to take hold of trade coming from San Francisco and points to the south, which they have not been in a position to secure heretofore. Now, I do not at all blame the Canadian Pacific Railway for pushing their business in this sort of way, but when they are trying to extend their railway in every possible way into the United States, they should not in my opinion put up such a fight against this Kettle River Valley Railway because it comes from the United States into a part of Canada, in respect to which they desire to keep the whole trade for themselves. The hon. member for Vancouver Island (Mr. McInnes) contended, that the boards of trade and the people on the Pacific Coast knew better what was good for the people in the Boundary Creek district than did these people themselves who have been investing their money to develop that country. Hon. gentlemen will probably remember that last year we had before the House two railway charters for lines to go through this Boundary Creek country; one of these, the Columbia and Western, was in the hands of a gentleman who has lately sold it out to the Canadian

Mr. BOSTOCK.

Pacific Railway, and the other was the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern, which my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) says is going to bring the trade of that country down to the coast and benefit the coast cities. At that time there was a fight between the promoters of these two Bills, and so this Boundary Creek country was deprived of the very requisite railway facilities which they desired to get in order to develop their territory. The people of this particular part of the province of British Columbia are not opposed to any of these different railway charters, but they desire to see a railway into that country which will help them to open up their mines and realize on the money which they have invested there. They know they cannot develop the country any more than they have done at the present time, until they get this railway transportation, and they also know that they have a very rich mineral country which as soon as they get a railway in there will supply sufficient ore, and will support a sufficiently large population, enable not only one, but two, and possibly three railways to do a profitable business in that region.

After Recess.

Mr. BOSTOCK. Mr. Chairman, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was trying to bring before the committee the reasons why this Bill should be allowed to pass. I desire to refer to a few more of the points that were made by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) this afternoon. He would give you the idea that the towns in the Boundary Creek country are small towns, which are not to be very much considered owing to their being very largely composed of Americans. But, as I stated in the Railway Committee, there are in that Boundary Creek country a larger percentage of British subjects than in any other part of the mining districts of British Columbia, and the towns that have been built up in the Boundary Creek country have been for the greater part started either by Canadians or by Englishmen who have been in the country a long time, and have invested a considerable amount of money there. I was trying to show that these people are very anxious to get railway communication in there, and they were very bitterly disappointed last year that they were not able to get a railway started, in consequence of the fight that occurred in the Railway Committee between the Columbia and Western and the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern people. Now we have the gentlemen who were supporting the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern coming forward and opposing the granting of this charter; and I understand from what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver the other day, when speaking of this matter in the Railway Committee, that he is also prepared to oppose the charter to the Columbia and Western, which will come before the Railway Committee later on.

Now, the people in the Boundary Creek country certainly think they are entitled to have the railway facilities which will enable them to go ahead and develop their mines in a way in which they cannot do at present. There are some twenty-two mines that have already shipped ore out of the country for the purpose of testing what its product would be when subjected to a straight smelter test. They have done this at considerable cost to themselves, but it was a cost which they considered justifiable in order to see whether they had valuable properties or not; and they are now very anxious to see this railway charter granted, because they realize that it would be the same for them as it has been for Nelson and Rossland—that the fact of having railways giving them competitive rates would materially assist them in developing the mines in a way which they will not be able to do if they are simply in the hands of one railway.

The hon. member for Vancouver made a great point of the resolution which was passed by the provincial legislature; but in mentioning the vote that was taken upon that resolution, he did not go into the question of the representation of the different parts of the country, which is a very material point in considering a matter of that kind. When that vote was taken in the provincial House, there were only two members of the Opposition who voted with the Government; it was very nearly a straight party vote. If the representation in the House had been according to population, the vote would have shown a very different result. As it is arranged at the present time, there are 2,328 voters in a district that would be in no way affected by the building of a railway in the Boundary Creek country; and these 2,328 voters have ten members in the provincial legislature, who naturally voted in favour of the resolution; while 2,497 voters in the districts that would be affected by the railway when built have only three members in that legislature, and all of these opposed the resolution. I do not think it is necessary for me to go through the whole list on this question of representation. I think the figures which I have quoted are sufficient to show hon. gentlemen that although there was a majority in the legislature voting in favour of that resolution, if there had been a proper representation according to population, the vote would in all probability have gone in a very different way. The hon. member for Vancouver referred to the fact that Colonel Baker voted in favour of the resolution, as if Colonel Baker was very keenly interested in that part of the country which would be benefited by this railway. Colonel Baker represents a constituency in what is known as East Kootenay, which is some hundred miles to the east of the Boundary Creek country, through which this railway will run, and he is not altogether in touch with the wishes and desires of the people in the Boundary Creek country. I cannot state it as a fact, but I believe Colonel Baker has never made a trip through that country at all. But the members of the provincial legislature most in touch with that part of the country—the men who represent it, Mr. Graham, and the member of the adjoining constituency, Mr. Hume—both voted in favour of this resolution, and they are the best qualified in that House to realize what it means to that mining country to have the facilities for developing it that would be given to it by the granting of this charter.

I do not know that it is necessary for me to go again into the question of smelting, although it has been raised in this debate. It was very fully explained by the promoters of this Bill when it was before the Railway Committee, that the reason why the smelter was placed at Northport, instead of at some place on the Canadian side of the boundary line, was, first, owing to the necessity of having lime to mix with the Rossland ores for the purpose of forming a flux, and secondly, owing to the necessity of obtaining water for smelting. The hon. member for Vancouver to-day suggested that that smelter could have been as well placed at some point on the Canadian side of the boundary line, and I think he mentioned a place called Sayward. Now the hon. gentleman may not possibly know that when the gentlemen who are most largely interested in the smelter were looking over sites for it, they took into consideration the site at Sayward, and they were to some extent favourably impressed with it, and thought it would be a good position for a smelter. But when they came to look further into the matter and to try to find out how they were going to obtain the necessary water for the purpose of carrying on the smelter industry, they found Mr. Heintze had got control of the only available water in that part of the country for their business, and, therefore, they were absolutely precluded from establishing a smelter there, although they desired to do so. The further fact that they had a much better means of obtaining lime at Northport decided them to place the smelter down at that point. I do not think that any gentleman who looks at this matter from a business point of view will consider that they were wrong in taking the position they did. They were practically driven to put in their smelter at the point where they did put it, and any body of men who are going into that country for the purpose of putting up smelters must be guided by the same business principles. I do not consider myself, that the smelter question is very material in this particular point, because there is a syndicate prepared to start a smelter at Grand Forks, right in the Boundary Creek itself, and which has gone so far as to put a considerable sum into that enterprise, and will go ahead as soon as the necessary railway facilities are provided. Once started, this syndicate will naturally do all in their power to have the smelting done in that part of the country, and will no more desire to see the ore going out of the country than the gentlemen who are opposing this Bill.

The hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) read some telegrams from the Montreal "Gazette," as showing the feeling of the people in that particular section with regard to the granting of this charter. It is very strange that such a number of telegrams from different points in the Kootenay country should all appear in a newspaper published in Montreal. I am not aware that that newspaper has correspondents in all these different towns, interested in sending telegrams to the editor on this particular point at this particular moment. It appears to me, there must be some motive power behind which is instigating these telegrams and arranging for their publication. But I have here a telegram from Nelson, which may throw some light on the way this sort of thing is being done, and the sort of fight that was put up to try and throw discredit on this particular charter. Here is a telegram from the Mayor of Nelson. It reads as follows:—

Forty members of the Nelson Board of Trade met to-night and adjourned without giving the Canadian Pacific Railway official a chance to introduce rescinding resolutions. They were smashed properly.

The rescinding resolution here referred to is one that was introduced for the purpose of doing away with the resolution passed by the Nelson Board of Trade in favour of this charter. That shows the means taken to create the impression on this side of the Dominion that our people in the Kootenay are opposed to this charter.

In talking of the smelter question, the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) referred to the resolution which was passed by the Nelson Board of Trade concerning freight rates on the Nelson and Fort Sheppard Railway. He was trying to make out that, in voting for this Bill, the House will be doing an act of philanthropy to Mr. Corbin. Hon. gentlemen know that Mr. Corbin does not desire any favours from this Government, further than what he deserves to get as an ordinary business man. Mr. Corbin has put his money into this country, and he has done all he can to develop it, but he has done that as any other railway and business man would, with the desire of helping himself at the same time that he builds up and helps the country. He does not desire to be treated on any other basis, he does not desire to be looked upon as a philanthropist, but he does desire to have, and I think he has a right to receive, fair treatment at the hands of this House, and not have the charter for which he is now asking refused simply on the ground that the scheduled rates of his railway, the Nelson and Fort Sheppard, are said to discriminate against the smelter at Nelson. An attempt has been made to show that Mr. Corbin has had discriminating rates from this point in favour of the Northport smelter as against the Nelson smelter. As a matter of fact, I do not think that a single carload of ore has ever been shipped. And, as gentlemen who understand this question of railway rates will know, very often, in drawing up a schedule, a rate is put down for the carriage of goods from one point to another, and if no shipment is made from there, no question is raised about the rate and it may stay on the schedule for a long time without any attention being paid to it. And this is the case in the rates that were mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver to-day. Now, I have here the "Globe" of March 28th, which contains a letter written by Mr. Corbin referring to the statement made by the hon. member from Vancouver:

The rate on ore from Hall's Siding to Nelson is stated at $2.25 per ton, the distance is 11 miles. The fact is there has never been more than two or three carloads of ore shipped from Hall's Siding, and the distance from Nelson is over 20 miles. This ore is concentrates of fine sulphide of iron saved on vanners or tables of the Fern Mine stamp mill, which has only been in operation about three months. I do not know what rate was put in from that station when the schedules were originally made up and before any shipments made from that point. But since it became apparent that there would be such shipments instructions were given to make the rates to Nelson and Northport exactly the same, and this is what has been done.

Then, with regard to the second point, that the rate from Nelson to Northport is $1 per ton, he says:

This is not correct. The rate from Nelson to Northport is $1.25 per ton and has never been less, and not a single ton of ore has ever been shipped from Nelson to Northport smelter.

Then, as to the third charge, which states that the rate on ore from Rossland to Northport is 75 cents per ton, he says:

This is correct as far as it goes. Our contract with the Le Roi mine is 75 cents per ton on a tonnage of 3,000 tons or over per month, and $1 per ton for less than that amount. This, added to the rate of $1.25 per ton between Nelson and Northport gives $2.25 per ton, which is exactly the rate on ore offered by my company to the Hall Mine smelter at Nelson, more than a year and a half ago, the distance between Rossland and Nelson being 87 miles.

The fourth charge was that the rate on ore from the Velvet mine on the Red Mountain Railway, which takes the Rossland rate, to Nelson was $2.75 per ton. Mr. Corbin says :

This is evidently a mistake in the figures, it should be $2.25 per ton.

Charge 5 gives a rate of $1 per ton from Robson to Nelson, twenty-eight miles. This is on a Canadian Pacific Railway line, which had nothing to do with Mr. Corbin, and over which he has no control. The sixth charge gives a rate on ore from Slocan City to Nelson, forty-five miles, of $3 per ton. This is also a Canadian Pacific Railway line, over which Mr. Corbin has no control. Charges seven and eight refer to the Kaslo and Slocan Railway, a line in which Mr. Corbin has no interest, except he receives their freight, as he would the freight of any other company, and ships it over his line. The ninth give a through rate from Nelson to Tacoma, Everett and Great Falls. This is a rate made in common with the Canadian Pacific Railway, Grand Trunk, Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railways. The tenth is also as to a through rate of which the Nelson and Fort Sheppard and Spokane Falls and Northern Railways only get their proportion, but I think it should be $6.75 instead of $6.25. And in this letter, Mr. Corbin goes on to say :

This matter is thoroughly understood by the Board of Trade at Nelson, and that they have no quarrel with me on the question of freight rates is evidenced by the fact that that body passed a resolution favouring the Kettle Valley Railway, which is now before the Railway Committee of the House of Commons.

Now, I think that is a very fair statement of the position as to the rates on the Nelson and Fort Sheppard Railway, and I think it shows that there is no discrimination on that railway between the Nelson smelter and the Northport smelter. Another point which I tried to bring out the other day in speaking before the Railway Committee was that, owing to the way that Mr. Corbin had been treated in the claim put forward by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the whole of the foreshore right within the limits of the town of Nelson, he has not had an opportunity to get his railway into the town of Nelson, nor is he able to ship ore to the Nelson smelter in a way that he ought to be able to do, in a way that would enable him to give better rates to the smelter. It can easily be understood that if ore has to be transported by means of freight teams a mile and a half to two miles from the station to the smelter, it makes it very much more expensive than it would be if the railway cars could be run right up alongside the ore bins in the smelter and the ore be thrown into the bins.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to detain the committee very much longer. Hon. members have heard a great deal about this matter, and I think they have heard sufficient from those on both sides to form an opinion as to what is best in the interest of the country. For my part, I desire, most certainly desire, to see this railway charter go through, because I think it is in the interest of that part of the country which I represent. I believe that it will materially assist in building that part of the country, and that it will provide a competing line and enable the shippers and traders in the eastern part of Canada to get their goods into that country in a way that they are not able to do when simply left in the hands of one railway. I think it is a matter which very materially affects the people of the east. They may realize it a little more clearly from an incident which occurred in relation to the carrying of the machinery for the working of the Le Roi mine.

At the time that the company were intending to put in a large compressor plant which they use in that mine, they had occasion to get different rates from the Canadian Pacific Railway and from the Grand Trunk Railway, and they found that they could get a rate amounting to some 15 or 20 cents a ton less from the Grand Trunk Railway into Rossland than they could if shipped over the Canadian Pacific Railway. The consequence was that out of eight carloads of machinery going to that mine from Sherbrooke, in the province of Quebec, seven of those carloads were carried by the Grand Trunk and shipped over the Great Northern to Spokane, and then up to Rossland, and only one was carried over the Canadian Pacific Railway. The owners of the mine were by that means enabled to get a considerably better rate than they would have got if they had been entirely in the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, the point has been made more than once that this railway will be throwing trade into the hands of our neighbours to the south, and hon. gentlemen seem to think that that is something we ought not to do. But I think that there is a very much more serious matter to look after, if they are going to take hold of a question of that kind, and try to keep our neighbours from getting any benefit out of the valuable mineral deposits which we have in the Kootenay country. I think that a great deal more money has been made out of, and possibly taken away from the people of Canada, by Americans from the south who have come into that country and have staked out and worked claims, and who have certainly, some of them at least, become very wealthy from the fact of their being able to hold these mineral claims in our country. Now, if hon. gentlemen who are opposing this Bill are so anxious to stop the Americans from getting any benefit out of these mineral regions of British Columbia, I think they would be doing much greater service to the people of Canada if they would take hold and start, I was almost going to say, an agitation for the purpose of preventing Americans from holding claims in that country. At the present time Americans are able to go into the Boundary Creek country or the Kootenay country, and stake out claims there in competition with British and Canadian subjects; and they can then go across the line to the south which is, so far as one can tell, almost as rich a mineral country as that which we have on the north side of the boundary line, and they can stake out claims there. The consequence is that they are able to hold and develop claims on both sides of the line, or on whichever side they think most advantageous. But a British subject going into that country can only take up a claim in British Columbia. He is handicapped to this extent, that if he should happen to go across the boundary line, as it is possible for a man to do without knowing it, he might take up a claim on American territory, and then find out that he could not hold it because he was a British subject. But up to the present time, if a man is an American citizen it does not matter on which side of the line he operates. Therefore, I say that hon. gentlemen who are opposing this Bill on the ground of putting money and trade into the pockets of our neighbours on the south side of the boundary line, would be doing much better service if they would take up this question from what I may call the foundation, and say that they are prepared to prevent Americans from holding mineral claims on our side of the line. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to detain this committee any longer, but I hope that they will seriously consider this matter and will not vote against what I consider the best interests of the miners and of the mining interests of British Columbia.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I had expected that we would enjoy the advantage of hearing some of the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. Certainly it does seem to me that we were entitled ere this to know what they would say, if this subject is so important as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Bostock) thinks it is, and if the hon. gentleman from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) is also right in attributing to the measure so great an importance as he did this afternoon. For myself I would have been particularly glad to hear from those hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches who have been pointedly referred to in this debate, whose utterances have been mentioned several times, utterances made last session when the Government were asking for a very large amount, some four million dollars, in aid of the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass road. These statements are serious, they are of very great importance, and particularly so because they are directly in line with the policy of the British Columbia legislature as expressed in the resolution which was read in this debate. The hon. gentleman who has taken his seat also shared those views last session. His observations on the general principle were brought to his notice to-day, and in listening very attentively to him I failed to hear from him any explanation of the views he held then as compared with the views that he expresses now. It does not seem to me that the hon. gentleman can hold the same view that he held on that important occasion, and advocate the adoption of this Bill. The hon. gentleman, it is true, endeavoured to get rid of some of the statements from the localities so far as they were attributed to newspaper correspondents. But in that part of his argument it is important to observe that he was unable to deal at all with one of the important communications that the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) read to the House in which the "Northport," a paper published in Washington Territory, confirmed, so far as the expression of the opinion of a paper on a subject like this can confirm, the views of those hon. gentlemen who are of the same opinion as the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Minister of Trade and Commerce were last session. The hon. gentleman overlooked, I say, this rejoicing on the part of the "Northport" at the announcement that the Railway Committee had reported in favour of this Kettle River Valley Railway charter. This is what it said: "Now look out for great prosperity for Northport." The view they take is the view of the hon. gentleman then, as it seems to me, so well expressed last session and concurred in by this House. Therefore, whether we are right or wrong in attributing to those observations the great importance attached to them as coming from Cabinet Ministers during the discussion of a very large grant and in advocacy of that grant—whether, I say, we are right or wrong in attributing importance to them, it does seem to me that the duty devolves on hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches to deal with the subject, and harmonize, if they can, the position of the Minister of Railways and Canals, at any rate, in regard to this measure. The hon. gentleman is said to have spoken in the Railway Committee, and being a Minister of the Crown, of course his observations must have had great weight there. It would be fair to this Committee of the Whole House that it should have any advantage that might attach to his observations made in another place. Hon. gentlemen, all through this debate, have been referring to the discussions that took place in the Railway Committee; they have done so, contrary to the rules of the House, but apparently with the consent of this committee. Yet no one would pretend that hon. gentlemen have given accurately, that is fully, the various arguments used before that committee. I should like to understand, too, in connection with the apparent change of position taken by the Minister of Railways, whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce has changed his opinion on the great principles involved, because, in the debate on the Crow's Nest Pass Railway last session, there were two very important positions taken by the hon. gentleman to whom I have referred. One was in regard to the great question of preventing connections with the United States railway system in the Kootenay country, on account of the danger, even more than danger, on account of the probability that Canadian trade would be diverted from north to south; and the hon. gentleman then expatiated strongly on the duty of Parliament to do everything possible to divert that trade north instead of south. The second position was in regard to the question of Government control, in connection with which very important principles were laid down, wholly inconsistent with the position by the Minister of Railways, as reported on the present measure. Last session, the Government held the key to the situation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce boasted of the statesmanship that had caused the Government by that measure to have absolute control, or, to use his own language, to ensure the absolute security of the country against the possibility of a monopoly being created which would have any objectionable or ill effect on the future of the province. Quoting the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I find he said:

Remember the Government of Canada are able to control the rates on everything which goes from any part of the Crow's Nest Pass to any portion of Canada, and on anything which comes from any part of Canada to any section of the Crow's Nest line.

And later on he said:

A great deal of trade is now being diverted to American channels. I need not say to business men in and out of this House that there is no one thing more certain than that if once that trade be allowed to flow into American channels, we shall find it exceedingly difficult to recover it.

That is a very important utterance, and those observations covered those points on which this House seemed to be almost unanimous: that is, the ability of the Government to protect, or, at all events, largely protect this country against a monopoly in the operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway system, as it was advanced through that important mineral country; and the other was the necessity of preventing, as far as possible, the possibility of Canadian trade being diverted south. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been signally silent, and it is, of course, curious, because it is no secret in this House that the Minister of Public Works, when this Bill was announced, was open in his consistent opposition to its provisions. He allowed it to be announced, or, at all events, he was credited with having sympathized entirely with those who saw in this Bill a subversion of the important principles that prevailed last session, and he, with others, gave expression to opinions adverse to this Bill being adopted, and later on, even now, it is said, the Government have by no means come to a unanimous opinion in regard to advice to be given to this committee as to what it should do with the Bill. Under all these circumstances, it would be very interesting to know exactly where the Government stands. I would not be surprised to learn that they unanimously agreed to take the very opposite position to that which they occupied last session; that, in my opinion, would be a very natural position for this Government to take, and a natural course for them to take. But, having regard to all the statements made, I do not think it possible for the Minister of Railways to say that the members of the Government are a unit in regard to the course which this committee should take on this Bill. Perhaps, the silence of the Minister of Railways is wise. Perhaps, the Bill will have an opportunity of being considered on its merits, and, so far as I am concerned, and, I think, so far as other hon. members are concerned who have opposed this Bill, that is all they desire to be done.

So far as these observations are concerned about the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, and the Canadian Pacific Railway putting up a fight, as the last hon. gentleman who represented the opposition to the Bill said, I think a great deal has been stated without the slightest warrant. I have never heard, directly or indirectly, from any person representing either the Grand Trunk Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway, what their particular desire was in regard to the Bill. I know, of course, that the Canadian Pacific Railway, very wisely from their own standpoint, opposed this Bill, and no doubt the Grand Trunk Railway, in other words the railway behind this charter, are as anxious that the Bill should pass; but I do not believe that hon. members on one side of the House or the other are posing, or desire to be considered as posing, here for one road or for the other road. Those statements are made very cheaply and very easily, but what we must be guided by here, and what the whole country will certainly be guided by, are the reasons and arguments advanced on one side or the other. The utterances of the Minister of Railways, of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the member for Yale and Cariboo being all in line one with another, are of additional interest this year, because they are in line, not merely with the resolution of the British Columbia legislature, but, as it seems to me, regardless of what particular division was had on that resolution, with a large majority, almost the whole, of the British Columbia legislature; for it is interesting, since reference has been made to that division, to see what position the leader of the opposition, Mr. Semlin, took when the question came up, or, at all events, to see the position that was taken when the resolution was moved asking the legislature to make representations to the Dominion Government with a view to prevent this charter being granted by the Dominion Parliament. There was not a direct negative vote taken. The motion was a motion to defer consideration, and that motion would, in itself, suggest great caution in overriding the wishes, not only of the boards of trade on the coast, but of the legislature itself. The speech delivered by Mr. Semlin is reported in the "Daily Colonist," of Victoria, and, as it is comparatively short and has not been quoted during this discussion, I will read it :

Mr. Semlin was not sufficiently acquainted with the Boundary country to make up his mind at once on the subject. He, and he supposed all the members, had at heart the best interests of Canada. A railway was not a patriotic institution, but a business enterprise. The Canadian Pacific Railway was built for business purposes. When they wanted to shut off an opponent they raised the patriotic cry, but they were in their business actuated by their own best interests.

He was not at all in love with Mr. Corbin or his railway actions hitherto. Mr. Corbin was not actuated by sentiment in his railway enterprises any more than the Canadian Pacific Railway. He wanted to make money and so did the Canadian Pacific Railway. The ground Mr. Graham had taken was that railway competition was best for the people of the district of which he spoke. He would, however, like to be better informed as to the condition of things in the Boundary Creek country, and he was of opinion a committee should be formed to make inquiries and report to this House. He moved that the question be referred to a select committee of inquiry. The committee to be composed of Messrs. Rithet, Graham, Higgins, Stoddart and Hume.

The Premier said : There was a certainty of a railway going in there this summer from this side of the line, a line that would be much better than the one under discussion. He referred to the line from Penticton, a line that would connect with the Shuswap and Okanagan and make that railway, in which the province had an interest, and which was costing largely every year, a paying line.

Hon. Mr. Baker said : There could not be a doubt that the Corbin road would carry the ore out of the country to the American side, and the trade would go south instead of being kept in British Columbia. If they voted against the resolution they could not take a more effective way of injuring the business interests of the province.

Hon. Mr. Eberts said : The road from Penticton would be a great help to the province, and put the Shuswap and Okanagan road on a paying basis. For his part, he believed in taking care of ourselves first, and not going against our own province in favour of American roads. The Penticton road, they might be quite sure, would start before next August, as they had to do so in order to hold their charter and get their subsidy. He had nothing to say against Mr. Corbin, who was a most estimable man, but the whole question was whether it was better to allow a road to be built from the United States side or to have a British Columbia road.

The reference to that debate in the British Columbia legislature is, I think, very important, for we must consider the opinion of the British Columbia legislature just as much as any action of this House would be taken to be the expression of opinion of this body. We have from the legislature of British Columbia and from the different boards of trade, overwhelming representations to impress upon this House that in the interests of the trade of British Columbia, and in the interest of the trade of Canada as done in British Columbia, it would be against good policy to grant such a charter as this. I was rather struck by the argument advanced by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bostock) who tried to make out that we in this House should take the opinion of his electors—even supposing he does represent the opinion of the majority in his constituency on this question—against the opinion of the local legislature. Now, the legislature of British Columbia has to do with granting of railway charters in that province and it is but a weak argument to advance in this House, that in a certain district of that province there is a public sentiment against the decision of the local legislature. In considering this measure we cannot attach too much importance to the opinion of the local legislature, because we must remember that there was a time when hon. gentlemen opposite paid the greatest possible respect to the expression of provincial opinion and to provincial rights. It must be remembered that it is on account of a very slight circumstance that we are dealing with this Bill in any shape or form in this Parliament. It is a Bill authorizing the construction of a very few miles of railway in British Columbia, and it is merely owing to the fact that this short line of road connects with the international boundary that it has to come before the Federal Parliament at all. If this railway were a great deal longer than it is, but did not connect with the international boundary, then the British Columbia legislature would have the matter completely within their own power. Therefore, I say that if hon. gentlemen opposite have regard to their past record they will think very seriously before interfering with even the slightest semblance of what they used to consider a provincial right. I have already dealt with the observations made last year by some hon. gentlemen opposite and which are entirely inconsistent with the arguments that they have made this session. I am not going out of my way to attribute any very great importance to their utterances ; but I have no hesitation in saying that these gentlemen opposite struck a popular note in the country last year when they based their policy in regard to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway on this principle. Acting on that principle which was adopted by Parliament last year, I shall exercise my privilege of voting against the adoption of this Bill.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Within my recollection no railway Bill has ever received greater attention than has the Bill now before us. It was discussed during three entire meetings of the Railway Committee, and because of the length of that discussion my remarks now shall be very brief. Among the members of this House few have been stronger in their advocacy of Canada for the Canadians than I have been. I am not going to discuss now whether the members of the Government have agreed among themselves as to their policy in regard to this railway. They have disagreed on more than one occasion, and we are accustomed to their disagreements; but if this measure is one which commends itself to the judgment of those who take an interest in the matter, that their disagreements is no reason why we should not consider the Bill upon its own merits. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat has twitted an hon. gentleman on the other side with having spoken of a fight having been put up by the Canadian Pacific Railway against the present Bill. Well, I do not blame the Canadian Pacific Railway for putting up a fight against this Bill, nor do I blame the Grand Trunk Railway for taking the other side. But we all know that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company opposed this Bill as strongly as it was possible to oppose it. We know that the president of that company, whose voice, I believe, was never heard before within the precincts of the Railway Committee, came up and addressed the committee against the Bill; and we know that the vice-president of that great corporation also came up and addressed the committee against it. So that we must admit that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company put up a very strong opposition. But, Sir, without going into the history of the Bill, which has already been gone into very thoroughly, the reason which induces me to support the Bill is that I believe the future of the mining interests of that region is intimately connected with railway competition. It is all very well to say that within the year the Canadian Pacific Railway, in extending the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, will construct a road more perfect and complete than the Kettle River Railway. But what is to prevent the Canadian Pacific Railway, who will have expended a much larger amount of money upon the building of a much more expensive line, coming to the Government and saying, "How can we reduce the rates which we are now charging to the mining interests, when you know the large amount of money we have expended to build our line?" Whether the Canadian Pacific Railway would urge upon the Government this consideration or not, there is a check against the possibility of the miners being overcharged for the transport of their ore in the fact of having a railway like the Kettle River Railway, which is a competing line against the Canadian Pacific Railway. Whether the Canadian Pacific Railway line will have cost a large or a small amount of money, that railway will be compelled by competition to make its rates as low as those of the other line; and, Sir, it is impossible for me to comprehend how any man who has at heart the interests of Canada at large, can object to the Grand Trunk getting a footing in that country. The representatives of the Grand Trunk interest, as well as Mr. Corbin, stated openly before the committee that the Corbin line was to be run in connection with the Grand Trunk; and an hon. gentleman on the floor of Parliament to-night stated that some machinery used in the great Le Roi mine was taken from Sherbrooke, in the Eastern Townships, into that country over this line.

I believe that I am supporting the best interest of the miners of that district when I say that if one line does not treat them properly, another line cannot fail to operate to their advantage, since it will afford competition, and the miners can avail themselves of the one which treats them best. I do not altogether agree in the opinion expressed that because the promoter of this line came from a foreign country, we should treat him as an alien who has no interest in this country. Sir, the alien who comes into Canada and spends $1,600,000 of his money in building a railway to accommodate Canadians is, it seems to me, almost as good as a naturalized citizen. In any case, he is displaying his great confidence in the future of our country, and it cannot be denied that were it not for this road that country would not be in the position in which it now is, and would not be offering to the miner and investor the great opportunities it now does. This road has been the pioneer of that region. Even those who oppose this charter do not deny that were it not for this road that district would scarcely be opened at present. If I could convince myself that through the building of this line, for which a charter is asked, the trade that should legitimately come to Canada would be diverted to a foreign country, I would oppose this Bill; but from the evidence adduced before the committee, from telegrams received from collectors of customs in the various districts traversed by this line, it has been established, to my satisfaction at least, that 95 per cent of the trade which has come into that country is trade that was furnished by Canadian industry and sent forward by Canadian merchants. My hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood), who knows more about that question probably than any of us, because he does a very large business in that section, confirms the statement that 95 per cent of the trade came from Canadian sources. Under these circumstances, I find it impossible to believe that this Parliament will refuse to grant the charter asked for, especially in view of the fact that the promoters do not ask a shilling of subsidy from the Government. I would certainly oppose any measure to prevent the Canadian Pacific Railway from going into that country, just as I would equally oppose any attempt to prevent the Grand Trunk Railway from getting a foothold there. But if there were three or four railways in that country instead of one, the miners and others who have invested their capital in it would derive the benefit. I recognize all that the Canadian Pacific Railway has done for Canada. I am not supporting this measure because I believe it is hostile to the Canadian Pacific Railway, for I do not believe it is, but I am supporting it because I believe it is altogether in the interests of Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to say that for certain reasons I am opposed to this Bill. I have always been in favour of railway competition, in so far as such competition is in the interests of Canadian trade and commerce; but when that competition will confer no benefit, but the reverse, on the people of Canada, then I am opposed to it. I have always been strongly in favour of keeping our own possessions for Canadians. Every acre of land, every bushel of grain, every ton of minerals, every portion of raw material we have, should, in my judgment, be used and handled and manufactured by Canadians, so as to be of the best advantage for the Canadian people. If this charter should be granted, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that the road, when built, will be operated so as to take the raw material out of Canada to the United States, and thus prevent Canadians from enjoying the full advantages they otherwise would reap from the manufacture of their own raw material. If this railway should be built, it will assuredly assist in transferring Canada's raw material to the United States, and therefore I am opposed to this Bill. If any one is disposed to take the contrary view let him look at what has been done since Mr. Corbin first got his foothold in that section of British Columbia. We have been told by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Sir Adolphe Caron) that what Mr. Corbin has done in opening up and developing that portion of country justifies us in giving him greater rights and powers. But I say, if experience teaches us any lesson, it is this, that although Mr. Corbin's railway is short and the time comparatively limited since it struck Canadian territory, the amount of raw material which it has taken out of Canada in that time to be manufactured in the towns south of the line, and the market which it has thus furnished the American farmers, manufacturers and lumbermen to the disadvantage of our people, should teach us the lesson that the sooner we provide for doing that work at home, the sooner we provide for the keeping of that market for the Canadian people, the better it will be for us. Markets are the urgent need for the Canadian farmers, manufacturers and lumbermen. From the great cattle ranches of Alberta, at the base of the Rockies and from the North-west Territories and Manitoba, we are sending on our food supplies eastward down through the other provinces to the ocean and across the ocean to England to find a market, but when we have a market right at home, should it not be our object, as far as possible, to save it for the Canadian people? By preventing this home market from being monopolized by our American competitors, our farmers out in the Territories would have a market right at home, to which transportation would be cheap and the profits greater, and the money from that section of British Columbia, instead of going across the line, would be used to develop our own country. For these reasons, it is the duty of this Parliament to refuse a charter to this company. Canada has a plentiful supply of the needs of the miner, and the Canadian farmer and manufacturer are justly entitled to that market; and because they are justly entitled to it, there is no reason why we should build a railway across the boundary line so that the farmers from the United States territory lying south may capture it from our own. It is said that the people want transportation facilities and that therefore there is urgent need for this road. But last session we were plied with argument after argument to induce us to grant a very large subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the purpose of building the Crow's Nest Pass line. For what purpose? For the very purpose for which we are now told the miners require this road to-day—the purpose of giving the miner the transportation facilities he so much desires. But we are told by the Canadian Pacific Railway that they are pushing the road on as rapidly as possible and that before another year passes they will equip that country with their road, so that the people of that locality will have transportation facilities. The only question that can arise in connection with this charter is: would the people thereby get better transportation facilities than what they would get from the Canadian Pacific Railway? Or would their freight rates be lower? Some say they will, but I am justified, after what has taken place in the committee, in saying that the control which the Governor in Council retains over the Canadian Pacific Railway in the regulating of freight rates is a sufficient guarantee, at least so far as we can keep down freight rates, that these rates will be controlled in the interests of the miner. If we were to grant this charter, would the miner get any better freight rates? I do not think so, because the experience we have had all over the country is that where two railways run in competition, they will combine or come to an understanding regarding freight rates, and the people do not benefit from competition to the extent I often hoped they would.

Str ADOLPHE CARON.

If we believe what the hon. Minister of Railways told us last year and what he has told us again this year with regard to this road and others, we are justified in the conclusion that the people will have as good freight rates and as good railway facilities in that section of the country at the end of the year if we do not grant the charter as they would if we do grant it, because the Canadian Pacific Railway will occupy that territory, and if we exercise proper control over their freight rates, the people there will have the advantage of railway communication and also of moderate rates. Will these freight rates be as favourable? I think they will. The control we exercise over them is a guarantee of that. Does the country require a railway in the interests of the miners to haul the raw material out of that country? We are sometimes told that it is absolutely necessary to take the ore across the line and to smelt it there. It is true that in that country they have been hauling out the products of the mines to a smelter in the United States at Northport, and we are told that were it not for the benefits afforded by the Corbin Railway, very little progress would have been made in that country. But we are also told that they have built up a very large and important town at Northport, and that it is built up by reason of the raw material taken from Canada, and when we are told by Mr. Corbin that the natural condition is such that in a short time these minerals must be smelted in British Columbia. It is not reasonable to contend that this railway is absolutely necessary in order to have the raw material taken out of the country and have it smelted in the United States. And if the Canadian Pacific Railway is passing through that country, as it will soon, the miners will be as well supplied by it as they would be by a railway coming from the United States.

I have been not a little amused and interested watching the Government in its attitude on this question. The Government is made up of a class of men who have heretofore been known all over the country as strong defenders of provincial rights. We have had election after election in Ontario in which their cry was provincial rights. The same has been the case in Manitoba and in other provinces from which we have obtained the heads of the various departments who, to a large extent, compose the Government of the present day. If these gentlemen were true to their convictions, or their expressed convictions in favour of provincial as against federal power, we might expect to find them arrayed in defence of the interests of the province against any other country or against the federal power. Now, as I understand it, British Columbia has spoken against giving this charter. In the course of this debate we have heard cited expressions of opinion of boards of trade, of members of the legislature and resolutions passed by the legislature. These things justify us in saying in concluding that the province is against this charter. How, then, is it that these gentlemen who were such strong defenders of provincial rights are arrayed against that province? When Manitoba was fighting against the monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway, none more strongly upheld provincial rights than those who are defending the granting of this charter. I would like to ask these hon. gentlemen, whether if the province of Ontario spoke as a province against a charter being given to a certain railway within the province, if it was declared by the legislative assembly that such a charter would be detrimental to the province, would they be found opposing the opinions of Ontario as they do now those of British Columbia? Or if the case were in Manitoba or in Quebec or Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, I venture to say, these gentlemen would be found standing up for the rights of the provinces. Why, then, should they not stand up for the rights of the provinces to-day. British Columbia has spoken with all the force she can command, through her public men, through her legislative assembly, through her boards of trade, through her town councils—the people have spoken with one voice against the granting of this charter, and yet hon. gentlemen are found forcing this measure upon this distant province to her disadvantage and to our shame. I am opposed to this Bill. As is well known, I am in favour of competition. And I do not think that gentlemen in this House will say that I have ever hesitated to oppose the Canadian Pacific Railway where I thought I should do so in the interests of the people. In fact, I have generally been found opposing. Hon. gentlemen may be sure, therefore, that I do not oppose the granting of this charter because I desire to see the Canadian Pacific Railway getting more power than they have or more lines of railway, but because I think the extension of their railway to that country is going to be for the best interests of the people of that country and is going to retain for the Canadian people what belongs to the Canadians and ought to be kept at home. For these reasons I am opposed to this charter and in favour of supporting a company that is putting in a railway that will not cost the people a cent. It is sometimes said that Mr. Corbin does not ask a bonus. I know he does not, because the outlook upon the future justifies the belief that he will have ample return in the freight rates he can charge. But neither does the Canadian Pacific Railway ask any bonus, and the effect of their building a line will be to keep Canada for the Canadians so far as this matter is concerned. They keep that country for the eastern manufacturer and the western farmer, and keep money at home which is now being taken away from that mining region to the detriment of the people. I am opposed to this charter and will be opposed to it until it is dealt with finally by this House.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to relieve the minds of those members who seem to be so greatly concerned about the agricultural interests of Alberta, and the North-west Territories generally, in connection with this Bill. If the great agricultural interests of the North-west are likely to be sacrificed for a twopenny-half-penny-thirty-mile railway, I am going to range myself against that danger. While I believe in railway competition, as does every person in the North-west Territories, neither I nor they are so bigoted in our views that, if railway competition meant injury to us in getting a good market for our agricultural supplies, we would not be in favour of competition. But in this particular case I for one do not see that the building of this 30 miles of railroad will bring destruction upon the agricultural interests of the North-west Territories, and particularly of the district of Alberta. On the contrary, it appears to me that the building of this trifling 30 miles of railroad will, to that extent, benefit the agricultural interests of the Territories by increasing the number of consumers who will buy their products; that is to say, the miners who will be employed in the mines in the Boundary Creek country; which mines will become productive whenever that 30 miles of road is built, which mines are not operated now and probably will not be operated if it is not built. Inasmuch as the completion of this road will increase the number of consumers of the produce of the North-west Territories, I am in favour of its being built, and I do not want to be understood as favouring it for any other reason. Hon. gentlemen who have argued against this road appear to think that if this 30 miles is built the whole of the agricultural products of the United States are going to be pushed into the Boundary Creek country, and that the agricultural products of the North-west Territories are going to be kept out. Why? Hon. gentlemen have never told us why. Is it because the Canadian Pacific Railway, whose cause they are advocating so strongly here, would charge the people of the North-west Territories a higher rate of freight to take food supplies into that country than this vile scoundrel Corbin would charge the people of the United States for taking their products in? Hon. gentlemen would do well to consider that point. If that is their position, I think they are putting up a very poor argument on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But as it happens, the matter does not rest on that ground. Let me say that as circumstances now exist, it would not necessarily kill our trade if Mr. Corbin carried freight in there for nothing. If he carried all the supplies required in the Boundary Creek country for nothing, and the Canadian Pacific Railway only charged us the rate that they do now to like points, we would still be in a position to supply the food products of the Boundary Creek country; for the reason that the rate of freight at the present time from Edmonton—which is the principal source of food supply for that country—to Arrow Lake points, is 30 cents per 100, and the duty on oats and flour, which are the principal food products imported into that country, is 30 cents per 100; so, if Mr. Corbin carried the freight for nothing, inasmuch as those products would have to pay as much duty as the Canadian Pacific Railway now charge in freight, we would still be at no disadvantage as compared with the producers of the United States. That is a fact which does not seem to have come to the knowledge of hon. gentlemen who have seen such dire catastrophe threatening from the construction of this road.

Then, it may be asked, Why, in particular, should the people of the Territories desire to have this road built? For the reason already alluded to, that by the building of this road the Boundary Creek mining country, which is acknowledged on all hands to be a good mining country and capable of very large development under certain conditions, would be developed. Those conditions would be met by the construction of this road, that development would take place, and we would be able to sell many thousands of bushels of grain and many thousands of sacks of flour which we do not now sell, and which we cannot in the nature of things expect to sell unless that development does take place. Hon. gentlemen have said that this road is going to carry the ores of Boundary Creek to the States to be smelted there, and that means the employment of American capital and American labour in smelting those ores. Let me put the matter this way: These ores will not be carried to the States to be smelted unless the circumstances are such that they have to be carried there to be smelted. Then if they have to be carried there in order to be smelted, I say it is in the interests of the food producers of the North-west Territories to have them carried there rather than that these mines should not be developed, and that miners should not be employed in producing that ore. Hon. gentlemen who are so much interested in the prosperity of the Canadian smelting industry seem to forget that in demanding that the Canadian smelting industry shall be made to pay at any cost, they are demanding that it be made to pay at the expense of the mines; and if the ore is of low grade, there is a possibility that the mines cannot stand the expense and will not be worked. Therefore, when hon. gentlemen rest their case so strongly on the necessity of compelling the smelting of ores in Canada, they are possibly doing the very thing that they declare themselves against doing, that is to say, they are possibly preventing a market for Canadian products which otherwise would certainly exist. On that point, as to the possible absolute necessity of transporting Canadian ore to the United States smelters, I would recall to the memory of the members who attended the Railway Committee, the utterances of Vice-President Shaughnessy of the Canadian Pacific Railway, who stated to that committee that the silver ores of Sandoz had to go to the United States smelters in order to be smelted economically, and that that was why his company carried those ores to the United States smelters. Now, I do not suppose for an instant that Mr. Corbin will do any differently from what the Canadian Pacific Railway would do. If it will pay to smelt Canadian ores in Canada they will be smelted in Canada. But if it will not pay to smelt them in Canada, just as we prefer to see the Sandoz ores go to the States to be smelted rather than to see the mines lie idle, so the food producers would prefer to have the ores of the Boundary Creek country go to the States to be smelted rather than that those mines should not be worked. The ores will not go to the States to be smelted unless it is necessary that they should go there in order that the mines may be worked. In regard to the trade that is going to the States from this Kootenay country and Boundary Creek country. The district of Alberta, as hon. gentlemen have themselves said, is in a position to supply the food products of the Kootenay country. As a matter of fact I beg to say that the district of Alberta does supply those products. Three years ago the district of Alberta did not supply those food products, they came almost entirely from the United States. Now, these food products come in large proportion, that is to say, the largest proportion of both cattle, oats and flour, come from the district of Alberta and Manitoba. Now, I ask hon. gentlemen if that is an indication that Canada is losing trade in that country, although Mr. Corbin has his two roads in there. I say it is not. It establishes beyond question the fact which I stated, that Canada is in a position to hold the trade of that country in food products. Under present conditions she is holding it. What she wants now is the further development of the country in order to increase the market; and that development cannot be secured except by the very best and most improved facilities. That is acknowledged on all hands.

As regards the money voted last year for the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, hon. members seem to rather misapprehend the position. We paid $3,500,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway to enable that railway to get into the Kootenay country and compete for the trade there. We are asked this year to burk legislation which would allow another company to enter that country to compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway. It does not seem to me that because we paid

$3,500,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway to put them in a position to compete for certain trade, we thereby bound ourselves to burk legislation that would enable another company to compete with them. It seems strange that this company, which came to Parliament, last year, declaring that if they did not obtain $3,500,000 from this Parliament, the trade of that country would be lost to Canada, should, after getting the money on that understanding, now come forward and declare that the same trade will still be lost if we permit this 30 miles of railway to be built.

In regard to railway competition, I have heard some hon. members argue that competition on railways does not compete. What do we expect in railway competition? Do we consider that, so long as two railways are running along side of each other and are charging like rates, there is no competition and no necessity for both roads? Let us apply this argument to other business interests. In the city of Ottawa there are mercantile establishments in which the same classes of goods are sold at practically the same prices. Do those hon. gentlemen hold that that competition does not compete? Although those different mercantile establishments do sell goods from time to time at very much the same prices, we know there is competition, and keen competition, and it would be a bad thing if competition between mercantile establishments here was destroyed. It is the same in respect to railways. If the railways should at the moment charge the same rates, it does not follow that we were not the better for having the competition, or that there is no competition. It is a notorious fact throughout Canada, that wherever there is a railway point that has competition, that point is thriving, and wherever there is a point that has not railway competition, no matter how many railways it possesses, it is not thriving. It is not very long since the manufacturing city of Hamilton, which had three or four lines of railway, they being all under Grand Trunk management, felt it necessary, in order to protect its business interests, to vote to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company a quarter of a million dollars in order to get railway competition; and they have not regretted their bargain. It is all very well for hon. members who live at points where there is railway competition, to say that competition does not compete; but no hon. gentleman who lives at a non-competing point will make such an assertion. Take the North-west Territories, and it will be found that it costs as much for passengers and freight from Montreal to Calgary, or Edmonton, practically as it does to Vancouver. Why? Is it because the road to Vancouver is shorter or there are less difficulties to be overcome? The railway has to cross three ranges of mountains to reach the coast and is hundreds of miles longer, but the rates for passengers and freight are cheaper. The reason is, there is competition to Vancouver, and no competition to Calgary. That is the story all over the country. It comes with very ill grace from hon. members residing at centres which enjoy railway and water competition, to come here and say there is no benefit in railway competition, and that competition does not compete. In this case, I hope they will allow us who have not the benefit of competition to say what we want. What has made Montreal the leading city of Canada, if it is not competition between the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway? What would Montreal be to-day except for that competition? What is necessary in that case is necessary in others; the principle is the same; and there is no part of the whole Dominion in which such competition is more necessary than in the western country, and especially in the Boundary Creek district.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have sat here for some time, during the whole of this debate, and have heard a very strenuous demand from certain quarters on the other side of the House calling upon the Government to declare its policy upon the subject of this Bill; and it has been assumed by hon. gentlemen who have made this demand, that it was a proper request to make, and that there was a duty resting upon the Government to declare its views upon this question. I am unable to acknowledge the soundness of that proposition. I entirely deny that the Government must sit in solemn conclave upon every private Bill that is submitted to this House, and marshal its followers as supporters of the Government on every piece of legislation that is submitted for treatment. I entirely deny it; and I think some of the hon. gentlemen who have been so urgent that we should make our voice heard and declare our policy, are too well informed upon the constitutional view of this measure to have seriously believed that their claim was well founded. My hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who is at this moment not in his place, who is usually fair, and whom I am always glad to hear, is one of the sinners, if I may say so, in this respect; and the hon. gentleman has not only been very anxious to hear but exceedingly solicitous that we should tender our advice upon this question. My hon. friend, so far as my acquaintance with him as a member of this House is concerned, is never exceedingly anxious for the advice of the Government in guiding his judgment or leading him to a conclusion on any question, particularly if it happens to smell of a political nature. The hon. gentleman knows the Government is under no constitutional duty at all on a question of this sort, but that, rather, its duty lies in the other direction; unless it is impelled by a sense of duty and having regard to the magnitude of the question to make it a Government question, it would be wrong in doing so. Its first duty is, in matters of private legislation, so far as it can do so consistently with public interest, to leave its supporters entirely free from Government influence, and that is the position in which, I think, this Bill stands. Some hon. gentlemen have said that, in a discussion which took place in another place, and which I thought it was a very exhaustive discussion and rendered it quite unnecessary that the debate should be continued in this Chamber, I took some pains to leave the impression that I was speaking for the Government in expressing my views on the question. I challenge any hon. gentleman who was present on that occasion, to say that I used any language which could fairly be interpreted as having that meaning. On the contrary, I simply expressed my own individual views upon it, and I carefully abstained from expressing an opinion for the Government, or any member of it, other than myself, because I was not authorized to speak for the Government. The Government had not taken the question up as a Government measure, and did not regard it as one of sufficient magnitude. Now, Sir, another complaint which has been made, and one which has really constituted a large portion of the subject-matter of this debate is, that, in my views on this Bill expressed elsewhere, I had taken an entirely inconsistent attitude with that which I took upon the Crow's Nest Pass Bill a year ago.

Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) says "hear, hear." He has done all that in him lies to establish that proposition. He read from what I said a year ago, it was read before that by a prominent member of Parliament in the committee, and it has been read a third time since the present debate commenced.

Mr. DAVIN. I read it first in this House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) is entitled to the distinguished honour of having read it first, and it is perhaps my duty to say that he read the speech very well and with a proper amount of emphasis; but I have to add, without any understanding of that speech. What I said a year ago was said with regard to a totally different question, and I would say the same thing to-day if a similar question were before this Parliament. Last year I was dealing with a problem, the very antithesis of the problem before us in the present Bill. Last year we had before us a proposition from the Government asking Parliament to grant substantial aid for the purpose of enabling a Canadian road to be constructed in territory which was then not occupied by a Canadian railway, but was occupied by a railroad coming from the south, and the connections of which were wholly to the south of the boundary line. We had no Canadian road into that country then, but we had what we may distinctly call an American railway; a railway whose interests were American, whose ownership was American, and whose connections were with a system entirely and exclusively American. Last year we never heard of their having any traffic alliance or any other kind of alliance with the Grand Trunk Railway system of Canada; not a syllable was said with respect to that, so that I presume it was not then a fact. Last year we had in this part of southern British Columbia, no Canadian railroad which was capable of securing that traffic, but we had, on the other hand, a road from the south which had secured the traffic of that country and was carrying it to the States. Why, Sir, the case is practically the reverse of that of today. We have in that country now a Canadian railway, and we have it affirmed in the most emphatic manner by the president and vice-president of that road that by this fall they will have their line extended into this very Boundary Creek. Therefore, we are in possession now by and through a Canadian road; we are in possession from a Canadian railway point of view, I may say, practically of the Boundary Creek country.

Being in that position we are now asked the question: Shall we allow any other railway that happens to have connections to the south of the boundary line into that country, or shall we exclude it? Is not that a very different proposition from that of last year? That we should by all means force a road having Canadian connections and being Canadian, into a country which was then possessed solely by a railway, American in its ownership, in all its interests, and all its connections. It appears to me that it is practically impossible to state two propositions which are more directly opposite, the one from the other. I did not urge this House last year that we should not allow an American road to throw its connections into our country when that country was already possessed by one of our roads; and yet in order that I may be charged with inconsistency, it would be necessary that I should have taken that position last year. I did nothing of the kind. I am in favour—and I so stated to the committee as an individual member of this Parliament—I am in favour of allowing connections in from the south. I am in favour of it for many reasons; and if I had no other reason I should be in favour of it because of the special circumstances and conditions which exist in that Boundary Creek country. I stated in the committee the other day, and I ask indulgence while I repeat it again, that that country is full of low grade ore; it is full of a class of ore which may be profitably worked, which may be the foundation of one of the greatest series of mining camps we have in Canada or any country in the world, providing you permit of all the conditions to concentrate in that country which will insure the cheap production and treatment of that ore. You will have to get all possible facilities there in order that its low grade ores may be turned to profitable account; and these ores cannot be turned to profitable account without causing an immense influx of population, which will vastly enhance the trade of the country. So far as I can form an opinion, the person who undertakes to say that he will not allow this railway or any other railway from the south to come into our country, is taking upon himself a very grave responsibility and one which I as an individual member of the House am not prepared to assume. I am not going to be intimidated into assuming a different attitude, because I am to be told, that in respect to a question before Parliament last year which involved entirely different considerations, I expressed the views which I then did. Mr. Speaker, this whole question has to my mind been sufficiently threshed out in this Parliament, and I think that every member probably has made up his mind as to what his vote is going to be. I merely rose for the purpose of stating that I have not expressed a different view this session from that which I expressed a year ago. If under the same circumstances the question came before Parliament now as it did last year, I would do exactly as I did then. I am glad to know, Sir, that an opportunity is now being afforded to the people to have their interests in that country safeguarded; I am glad to know that an opportunity is now open to them to obtain that railway competition which I am sure they would not obtain unless this railway entered their country. I am glad to know that the people of that district have now an opportunity of getting the facilities necessary for the successful prosecution of their valuable industry.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Mr. Chairman, I shall not answer the explanations given by the Minister of Railways as to how he came to stultify himself between last year and this year in the policy he thought proper to pursue on this railway question. I only wish to remind the committee that we are far from the object of the motion for the committee to rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again. The other day, when we were considering this Bill in committee, and when we had reached clause 6, the hon. Minister of Railways made this statement:

This clause was amended in the committee by reducing the capital stock from $2,500,000 to $1,000,000.

I then made the following statement:

As that does not appear in the Bill before the Committee, I think we had better get the committee to rise and report progress, and send the Bill back to the Committee on Railways.

The hon. Minister then stated: "I made the motion myself"; that is, in the Railway Committee. Under these circumstances, the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) moved that this committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again, with the intention at a later stage of referring back this Bill to the Railway Committee, so as to have rectified the mistake or the omission which appears to have been made when this Bill was considered by that committee. We have the statement of the Minister of Railways that the Bill was amended in the Railway Committee, but that amendment does not appear in the copy of the Bill which we have before us; and I said that under such circumstances, we should not consider this Bill, because it is not the Bill as passed by the Railway Committee. Whether it was done by error, omission or commission, is not for this House to decide, but it is a question for the Railway Committee themselves to decide. Therefore, I believe we ought to vote for the proposition made by my hon. friend from Western Assiniboia, that this committee rise and report progress. It is not killing the Bill; it is just in order to rectify the mistake that has been committed, and it is the only way in which, I think, this committee can proceed in order to make matters right.

Motion of Mr. Davin, that the committee rise and report progress, negatived: Yeas, 30; nays, 50.

On section 6,

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I beg to move the amendment of which I have given notice, to reduce the capital stock of the company from $2,500,000 to $1,000,000.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if that motion is in order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Certainly, I see no objection to the motion, because notice has been given of it.

Amendment agreed to, and section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 13,

Mr. HUGHES. I want to present to the committee this point. Here is a road altogether in Canada not thirty miles long, and the company is asking for power to construct branches twenty miles long. This is reduced to ten miles, but I think six miles, which is the limit provided in the Railway Act, should be the limit here.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think the additional mileage is given for the purpose of accommodating the mines, because a road which would not accommodate the various mines would, of course, be useless. I can understand reducing it from twenty miles to ten miles, but I think it should be left at that.

Bill reported.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 101) respecting the St. John Harbour.—(Mr. Ellis.)

Bill (No. 104) respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 105) respecting the Montreal Island Belt Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 107) to incorporate the Yukon Overland Transportation Company.—(Mr. Domville.)

Bill (No. 108) to incorporate the Alaska and North-western Railway Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 109) to incorporate the British American Light and Power Company.—(Mr. Rosamond.)

MONTMORENCY COTTON MILLS CO.

Bill (No. 102) to incorporate the Montmorency Cotton Mills Company.—(Mr. Penny.)

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I do not want to raise any objection, but not one of these Bills are printed in French. I think that those who have the printing of these Bills in charge should see that we get them in French the same time as in English.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, if the hon. gentleman insists on his objection, these Bills will have to stand over.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I do not insist, but simply draw the attention of the House to the fact, and ask that a change be made in the future.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is, no doubt, right, and of course if these Bills stand over they will be translated and printed and distributed in French. I may tell the hon. gentleman, however, that they are translated and printed in French before the committees consider them.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. DOUGLAS (by Mr. Lewis) asked,

Is it the intention of the Government to withdraw the Mounted Police station now at Moosomin? If so, when? Will they be replaced by others? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). It is not the intention of the Government.

ALIEN LABOUR ACT.

Mr. WALLACE asked,

Have any proceedings been taken to enforce the provisions of the law known as the "Alien Labour Act"? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Proceedings have been taken, as contemplated by the Act referred to.

AUTHORIZED EXPORT DUTY ON LOGS, &c.

Mr. WALLACE asked,

Was an Act passed by the Parliament of Canada in 1897 authorizing an export duty to be placed on logs, bolts and pulp wood, on proclamation of the Governor in Council? Has such proclamation yet been made? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). No proclamation has yet been issued; the matter is still under the consideration of the Government.

NAVAL MILITIA CORPS.

Mr. CAMPBELL (for Mr. Britton) asked,

Has the Government considered the advisability of establishing a naval militia corps, either in connection with or independently of the present militia?

If not, is it the intention of the Government to take up the matter at an early date?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The matter is now, and has been, receiving the earnest consideration of the Marine and Fisheries Department. A final decision has not yet been reached, but it is hoped that it will be reached shortly.

BERTHIER CHANNEL.

Mr. BERGERON asked,

1. Was the work of deepening the Berthier channel, for which a sum of $7,000 was voted last session (1897), given out by contract?

2. Were tenders called for in relation to the contract?

3. Was the contract awarded to the lowest tenderer?

4. Who secured the contract, and what was the amount?

5. What is the ordinary calling and occupation of the contractor?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:—1, 2 and 3. No, the work was given out in accordance with the usual practice followed by the department for a number of years. 4. The contract was given to Mr. J. E. Robillard, and the work was done by the dredge "St. Pierre" for the price of $7 per hour for a day of ten hours, being $1 less than the price usually paid by the department. 5. He is a merchant.

DOMINION GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO CREAMERIES.

Mr. McINNES asked,

1. In what provinces has Dominion assistance been given towards the erection and maintenance of creameries, and to what extent in each such province?

2. What creameries have been so assisted in the North-west Territories, and in each case to what amount?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to extend similar aid to the creamery industry in British Columbia?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). In answer to the hon. gentleman's questions, I beg to state: Various creameries have been operated by the Dominion Government for a few years. They were as follows:—

ONTARIO.

Woodstock, from 1891-92 to 1893-94..	$518 50
Mount Elgin, from 1891-92 to 1893-94..	790 50
London, 1892-93 to 1893-94.
Wellman's Corners, from 1892-93 to 1893-94	916 05
Chesterville, 1893-94 to 1894-95.
Renfrew, 1894-95.
Kingston (as a dairy school), 1894-95 to 1895-96.

QUEBEC.

St. Hyacinthe (as a dairy school), 1892-93 to 1895-96.
Lennoxville, 1894-95.

NEW BRUNSWICK.

Kingsclear, from 1892 to 1893.
Sussex, from 1892-93 to 1893-94.
Sussex (as a dairy school), from 1894 to 1897.

NOVA SCOTIA.

Nappan, from 1893 to 1898.
----------------------------	--

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Crapaud, from 1894 to 1896.
Tryon, from 1894 to 1896.
New Perth, from 1894-95 to 1896-97.
Charlottetown (central), 1895-96 to 1896-97, and five tributary stations.

In the North-west Territories, before the arrangement made last year by my department, the creameries were run as follows:—

Moose Jaw, from 1894 to 1897.
Prince Albert, from 1896 to 1897.
Indian Head, from 1896 to 1897.

Assistance by direct grants of money has not been given by the Dominion Government to establish any creamery except that at Nappan, Nova Scotia, and those in the North-west Territories. The places at which creameries are managed in the North-west Territories by the Dominion Government, and the amounts advanced to the butter and cheese associations at these places, are as follows. The amounts are loaned to the various associations, and are to be repaid, without interest, through the charge per pound on the butter made at the several creameries. In 1897, there were, in all, 16 fully equipped creameries and 16 tributary stations:—

Yorkton	$1,561 38
Moosomin	1,850 90
Whitewood	2,165 93
Grenfell	1,753 87
Wolseley	1,823 37

Moffat (tributary station).....	$ 508 20
Indian Head	382 66
Lebret (tributary station).....	63 76
Qu'Appelle	1,752 03
Fort Qu'Appelle (tributary station)—Nil.
Regina	735 01
Craven (tributary station)—Nil.
Duck Lake (tributary station).....	670 41
Prince Albert.....	1,201 38
Moose Jaw	1,658 78
Maple Creek	1,565 84
Calgary and two tributary stations.	3,704 35
Innisfail and five tributary stations	5,417 86
Red Deer and one tributary station.	199 57
Wetaskiwin and one tributary station.....	1,911 77
South Edmonton and two tributary stations	3,989 97

Since 1890, the Dominion Government has provided such assistance to the dairying interests of the various provinces as seemed best suited to the particular conditions and circumstances of each of them; and it is now relinquishing that work in the provinces to the various provincial authorities who are taking it up. The conditions on which financial assistance is to be given by the Dominion Government to creameries in the North-west Territories are set forth in the bulletin "North-west Territories Creameries," which has been distributed. In regard to the second question, I have answered that already. As to the third question, I may say that it is the intention of my department to continue to give, in the manner that seems best suited to the circumstances and conditions of dairying in the provinces, such aid as the Government can give to it.

SUB-AGENT, DOMINION LANDS, TENBY, MAN.

Mr. ROCHE asked,

1. Has a petition been received by the Department of the Interior, asking that Henry Robert Gebler be appointed sub-agent of Dominion lands at Tenby, Manitoba?
2. Was any other petition received by the department, asking that John McClung be appointed to the position above referred to?
3. Has Mr. McClung any knowledge of German?
4. Upon whose recommendation was Mr. McClung appointed?
5. What salary does Mr. McClung receive?
6. Where does Mr. McClung keep his office?
7. What is his post office address?
8. Does the Government intend to appoint any German-speaking agent in the vicinity of Tenby?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:—1. Such a petition has been received. 2. The department has not received any other petition asking that John McClung be appointed to the position referred to. 3. The department has no information upon the point. 4. Mr. McClung was recommended by Mr. J. G. Rutherford, M.P. 5.

Mr. FISHER.

Mr. McClung receives a salary of $10 per month from the department. 6. Mr. McClung keeps his office at Tenby. 7. Tenby is his post office address. 8. No decision has been arrived at upon the point.

PIERS AND WHARFS, P.E.I.

Mr. MARTIN asked,

1. What arrangement, if any, has been arrived at between this Government and the Government of Prince Edward Island in reference to certain piers and wharfs in that province not hitherto assumed by the Dominion as under its control?
2. What are the names of the piers and wharfs, if any, over which such arrangement, the Government has agreed to assume charge?
3. What is the proposed expenditure for repairs if any, to be made on those piers and wharfs, and when is the expenditure proposed to be made?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1, 2, 3. No arrangement has been made for any pier not now under the control of the Federal Government. Several piers were handed over to the Dominion last year and necessary repairs will be made as and when required.

POSTMASTER AT CHAPLEAU.

Mr. POUPORE asked,

At whose request was Patrick Lynch, postmaster at Chapeau, dismissed? 2. Was there a petition sent the Postmaster General asking for such dismissal? 3. Is it true that a very large and influential petition was sent asking that Mr. Lynch be not disturbed?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). 1. The postmaster, owing to unsatisfactory management and having ceased to be able to discharge the duties of the office, was dismissed. 2. No. 3. A petition was sent.

WHISKY PERMITS—YUKON DISTRICT.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Who recommended to the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories to issue permits on 5th May, 1897, to the Alaska Commercial Company for 4,137 gallons of whisky and other spirits, ale, &c., and also 2,000 gallons? Who recommended the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories to issue to Binet Bros., on the 6th May, 1897, a permit for 2,000 gallons of whisky? Who recommended the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories to issue on the 11th of May, 1897, a permit to T. M. O'Brien for 2,000 gallons of whisky? Who recommended to the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories to issue a permit on 7th August, 1897, to William Chambers for 1,000 gallons of whisky; on 20th August, 1897, to Sullivan, McLeod, & McPhee for 500 gallons; on 30th August, to D. Menzies for 500 gallons?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The permit to Binet Bros. was for 600 gallons. With this correction, the permits referred to were recommended by the Department of the Interior.

Mr. DAVIN. What about O'Brien ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman sees that with the one correction made, the rest were recommended by the Department of the Interior.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Who recommended the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories to issue a permit to James H. B. Brown, on the 24th February, 1898, for 15 gallons of whisky ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The answer to the last question applies to this.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Have any permits to take whisky into the Yukon district been issued by any other authority than that of the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories ? Has the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories been advised to issue any permits to take liquor into the Yukon by the Dominion Government, or by any member of the Dominion Government, or by the deputy head of any of the departments of the Government.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. As to No. 1. Not to the knowledge of the Government. As to No. 2. As stated in the foregoing answers.

FUEL—INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. MARCOTTE asked,

1. How much was expended by the Intercolonial Railway for the purchase of coal, wood and fuel generally, from 1st July, 1891, to 30th June, 1897 ?

2. What was the quantity and value of fuel available on 1st July, 1897, in possession of the Intercolonial Railway ?

3. What was the quantity and value of the fuel purchased by the Intercolonial Railway from 1st July, 1897, to 1st March, 1898 ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The amount expended yearly by the Intercolonial Railway for the purchase of coal, wood and fuel generally, from 1st July, 1891, to 30th June, 1897, is as follows:—For the year ended 30th June, 1892, $428,645.37 ; 1893, $387,535.98 ; 1894, $399,122.80 ; 1895, $362,278.32 ; 1896, $366,525.13 ; 1897, $346,959.10. 2. There was available on the 1st of July, 1897, in possession of the Intercolonial Railway 13,410 tons of coal of the value of $32,529, and 311 cords of wood of the value of $311, being a total of $32,840. 3. There was purchased from the 1st of July, 1897, to 1st March, 1898, 107,035 tons of coal of the value of $234,640.94 ; and 1,200 cords of wood of the value of $1,200. Total, $235,840.94.

POSTMASTER—ST. TITE.

Mr. MARCOTTE asked.

1. Has the postmaster of St. Tite, in the county of Champlain, been dismissed ?
2. At whose request, and through whose influence ?
3. Why ?
4. Was an inquiry held ?
5. At whose request ?
6. By whom was it held ?
7. What sum was paid to the person who held the inquiry, if it took place ?
8. Who has been appointed to succeed the postmaster, if so dismissed ?
9. By whose influence ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The member for Chicoutimi having shown that during the Dominion by-election in Champlain, in 1897, the postmaster at St. Tite took an active part in such contest, canvassing and acting as a political leader for one of the candidates, holding election committee meetings in the post office and on election day occupying himself actively in getting voters to the polls, he was relieved of his office, no further inquiry being necessary, nor was had, with regard to the acts referred to, and Mr. Odilon Lacoursière was appointed to the position.

ASHCROFT POST OFFICE.

Mr. PRIOR asked,

1. Who is the present postmaster at Ashcroft Station, British Columbia, and where did he reside previous to his appointment ?

2. By whom was he recommended for the position ?

3. Was he recommended by the M.P. for the district.

4. How many applicants were there for the position, if any, what were their names ?

5. What were their post office addresses, and by whom were they recommended ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). 1. James Charles Shields is the present postmaster at Ashcroft Station. 2 and 3. He was not recommended for the position by the member of Parliament for the district, nor by any one. 4 and 5. There were no other applicants for the position.

Mr. PRIOR asked,

1. Has the contract been awarded for carrying the mails between Ashcroft Station post office and the Canadian Pacific Railway station at Ashcroft, British Columbia ?

2. If awarded, to whom has it been given, and at what price ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. 1. The contract for the mail service between Ashcroft Station post office and the railway station has been awarded. 2. It was awarded to Mr. James Charles Shields, the rate of pay being $180 per annum.

ADJOURNMENT—TRANSLATION AND PRINTING IN FRENCH.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would like to call the attention of the Government again to the fact that the printing in French is very much behind. Two or three weeks ago I asked the right hon. the Premier when the translation of Mr. Ogilvie's book on the Klondike would be brought down and distributed among the members of the House. I was told at that time that the translation was ready, and that the book would in a few days be distributed among the members. Every day we receive requests from people living in the province of Quebec for this translation, and we cannot supply it. I would like to state that generally the printing in French has been behind. We have this evening seen that all the private Bills which have been brought before the House this session are printed in English, but not one of them printed in French. I think it is time we should enter our protest against this method of dealing with the French section of the House. Of course, this is a right upon which we will insist. I may say that for my part, when the Bills come up the next time, I will enter my objection so that the Bills cannot be put through.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think any objection can be taken to the complaint or the protest made by the hon. gentleman. The Prime Minister unfortunately has been indisposed for the last few days. I will take care to call his attention to the remarks the hon. gentleman has made about Mr. Ogilvie's book on the Klondike. I am in hopes that the Chairman of the Printing Committee will be in his place to-morrow, and I will take care that his attention is also drawn to the remarks the hon. gentleman has made about private Bills.

Mr. ELLIS. As a member of the committee, I may say that no reference has been made at any of the meetings of the committee, and I have attended all of them, to the subject to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. This work is done entirely outside of the control of the committee. It is being done under orders from the Minister of the Interior; I refer to the English copy, and I believe the French copy is being printed outside of the Printing Bureau and the Printing Committee has not been consulted, and has nothing whatever to do with it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The remarks of the hon. gentleman refer entirely to the printing of Mr.

Mr. FISHER.

Ogilvie's reports and not to the fact that private Bills have not been printed in French.

Mr. SPEAKER. In regard to private Bills, I should like to say that these private Bills were all introduced too late by special leave, and that there was only time to print them in English, and not time to translate them. They were given their second readings by consent of the House, and will be translated before they go before the Select Committees, where they will be considered. The translation of these Bills into French proceeds as rapidly as it can be accomplished by the staff, and it will be a difficult matter to adopt means so as to enable members to have the Bills printed in French before them at the second reading, when the Bills are introduced in this irregular way.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Of course, Mr. Speaker, you are perfectly well aware that we vote on the principle of the Bill on its second reading, and therefore, if Bills have to be printed in both languages, they should be so printed for the second reading, because, after the Bills go to committee, there is no record on the Order paper to show whether they are printed both in English and French. This appears only on the second reading, and it is for that stage they should be printed in both languages.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not wish to be understood as quarrelling with the rule of the House which requires that all Bills be printed in English and French. But the matter is entirely and absolutely in the hands of any individual member, who is in a position to stop the second reading until the Bill is printed in both languages.

YUKON DISTRICT—LIQUOR PERMITS.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not rise for the purpose of objecting to the adjournment of the House, although I think it is a somewhat early hour. I have, however, a very important motion that stands first on the Order paper. Unfortunately, we have fallen into the habit in this House, for which there is in the House which we regard as our model no precedent, that when an important question comes up it runs on from day to day, and private members who have the business of the country, other than Government business to attend to, are thrown off till a late period of the session, and then the leader of the Government takes another day. The consequence is that the most important portion of the business—I do not mean legislation—is often in this way put aside. I would not propose to proceed to-night with my motion, because it is one affecting the North-west members and the Minister of the Interior. The Minister of the Interior, as usual, is not in his seat. There is not a North-west member present, not a Manitoba member present.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Here is one.

Mr. DAVIN. I see the hon. member for Lisgar is present.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have been waiting patiently for this motion to be reached.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad the hon. gentleman is here.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Do not omit the hon. member for Provencher.

Mr. DAVIN. I mean Liberal members—of course Conservative members are present. I wish to bring before the attention of the Minister of the Interior a very important thing which has occurred. I, with other members, asked the Minister of the Interior a question in regard to liquor permits in the Yukon, and he answered question after question put by myself, by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), with a syllabic answer that conveyed an impression to our minds and to the public mind other than that we now know to have been intended.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is nothing at present before the House.

Mr. DAVIN. There is the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is not a general motion to adjourn.

Mr. DAVIN. We know now that, under the recommendation of the Department of the Interior, the Alaska Company has received a permit to take in 4,370 gallons of whisky.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot allow the hon. gentleman to go into a general discussion of this subject on a motion to adjourn, when the motion is simply one for the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Every motion to adjourn is open to discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER. There are three kinds of motions to adjourn. If during the course of the debate an hon. gentleman who has spoken wishes to speak again on the subject, and if another hon. member moves the adjournment of the House, the former may speak again on the subject of that debate and not on any other subject. When no question is before the House, in an interval of proceedings, it is open to an hon. member to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific subject, which he must state in his speech. The debate can then proceed on that subject, which must be adhered to by all the hon. members who discuss it. The other and the third kind of adjournment, is a motion by the leader of the Government, when the business of the House is supposed to be over, for the actual adjournment of the House, and on that motion my impression is, and my ruling will be, that no general discussion can take place, except such as is material in connection with the adjournment of the House from to-day until to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIN. I bow humbly to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. But how is it that you are aware, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries meant the motion for adjournment to be a motion for the House to adjourn at this early hour?

Mr. SPEAKER. That is my ruling. Every hon. member knows it is so, and he certainly did not introduce any other subject for discussion when moving the adjournment.

Mr. DAVIN. I humbly submit that hon. members should at any time give a reason why the House should not adjourn.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, a reason why the House should not adjourn, but not bring on, by a side wind, a general discussion. The hon. gentleman must give me credit for some intelligence, and that I will not allow an irregular discussion. If the hon. gentleman wishes to give reasons which are germane, that the House should not adjourn, very well.

Mr. DAVIN. You would not for one moment, Mr. Speaker, suppose that I would be guilty of the least disrespect to the Chair. There is not a member in this House who regards the Chair with more reverence than I do, either because of the Chair itself or its present occupant. I was going on to show why at this early hour the House should not adjourn. If the Minister of the Interior were here, I wanted to read the statement that the Alaska Company had received a permit for 4,137 gallons of whisky, and T. M. O'Brien a permit for 2,000 gallons.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is trifling with the Chair.

Mr. DAVIN. Evidently it is too strong for the Government.

Mr. FRASER. But not for the hon. gentleman.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11 o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 5th April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I beg to move that the order of the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means and any motion in relation thereto be made the first order of the day after questions, on Wednesday, 6th April, and on subsequent days until the debate of such order is completed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ADJOURNMENT FOR EASTER.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved that when the House adjourns on Wednesday next it shall stand adjourned until the following Tuesday, the 12th April.

Motion agreed to.

POINT OF PROCEDURE UNDER RULE 47.

Mr. SPEAKER. Before calling the Orders of the Day, I desire to read to the House my conclusions as to the point of procedure which was discussed on 28th March.

On 2nd March, private Bill No. 32 was read a second time and referred to the Railway Committee. On 17th March, it was reported from the Railway Committee with amendments, and was then set down for consideration in Committee of the Whole. On 23rd March, Mr. Henderson moved that the Speaker leave the Chair, but a debate arose and the motion was not put when the hour for private Bills expired. The debate was continued on 28th March, the motion agreed to, and the House went into committee on the Bill, which was reported without amendment.

The Speaker then put the question: "When shall the Bill be read a third time?" and, being unable to decide from the voices as to the time of reading, he submitted the question to the determination of the House: "that the Bill be now read a third time," and a division having been called for by five members, the question was resolved in the affirmative. Accordingly, on the motion of Mr. Hughes, and after a prolonged debate, the Bill was read a third time and passed at the same sitting of the House.

This appears to have been the first occasion when a division was called for upon the question arising under Rule 47, as to the appointing of a time by the House for a third reading of a Bill which had been reported from Committee of the Whole without amendment. Being to that extent at least, a new point, an interesting discussion took place before the motion for the third reading was made, as to the proper procedure. I have since considered the matter carefully, and wish to give the House my views upon the points involved.

My course was based upon the third sentence of Rule 47 of this House, which rule is in these words:

"Rule 47. (1). All amendments made in committee shall be reported by the chairman to the House, which shall receive the same forthwith. (2). After report, the Bill shall be open to debate and amendment before it is ordered for a third reading. (3). But when a Bill is reported without amendment it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the House."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

This rule applies to private as well as to public Bills. See Bourinot, 748.

The comment made by Bourinot, p. 623, upon Rule 47, is this:

"Accordingly, when a Bill is reported without amendment the Speaker puts the question: 'When shall the Bill be read a third time?' The Bill is either read immediately, or on a future day, as the House may decide."

In exact compliance with the rule, and with this interpretation of it, the question was put to the House who were not agreed as to whether the Bill should be read "now" or later. To inform myself of the true opinion of the House, I asked for yeas and nays, and a division was called for, by which I ascertained beyond a doubt that the House wished the third reading to be moved at once.

The last clause of Rule 47 not only enables the House to fix a time for the third reading, but directs that this shall be done forthwith.

A point was raised in discussion that Rule 43 was to be read as governing the interpretation to be put upon Rule 47, but to my mind it seems to have no bearing upon this case. I will quote the language of Rule 43:

"Rule 43. Every Bill shall receive three several readings on different days previously to being passed. On urgent or extraordinary occasions a Bill may be read twice or thrice, or advanced two or more stages in one day."

The Bill in question, No. 32, was read a second time on 2nd March, and a third time on 28th March, so that Rule 43 was complied with, without the ground of urgency being invoked.

It was, however, pressed upon me that the second reading was not technically completed until after the Bill had passed through committee, and was ready for a third reading. If that contention were valid then this Bill would have improperly received two readings on the same day, contrary to the provisions of Rule 43.

The argument, however, is quite untenable, because Rule 59 says: "Every private Bill when read a second time is referred to the Standing Committee charged with the consideration of such Bill." Bill 32 was referred to the Railway Committee on 2nd March after its second reading, which was then technically and literally completed.

It was further claimed that the practice of this House has been uniformly not to read a Bill the third time at the same sitting as it has passed through committee without amendment.

During my occupancy of the Chair the practice has been, with few exceptions, to give the third reading at the same sitting. I have, however, but followed the practice of my predecessor, for in the session of 1894, out of 46 private Bills which were reported without amendment, 45 were read a third time at the same sitting as they were reported, and only one was postponed to a later day.

The whole matter is in the hands of the minority after all. On the question being asked whether the Bill be now read a third time, a full debate can be had, and amendments can be moved as to the time of reading. It is unnecessary to suggest what other parliamentary rights may be invoked by a minority who may be determined to postpone any question that is before the House.

It is most improbable, therefore, that any one desiring the early passage of a Bill will try to press on a third reading, if it be against the wishes of any considerable number of members.

The provision which permits the third reading to take place at once, after a Bill has passed committee without amendment, seems to me to be based on the sound reason that the House has just had unlimited opportunity to consider and debate every clause of the Bill in Committee of the Whole.

My conclusion is that the course which I adopted as to this Bill was in accordance both with the rules and practice of this House.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

The House again resolved itself in committee on Bill (No. 71) further to amend the Weights and Measures Act.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). If I am not mistaken, there is only one section in this Bill which has not been passed in the Committee of the Whole House. I refer to the second section which has been left standing, as a great many amendments are to be proposed by some of the hon. members on different questions affecting the regulations contained in the Bill. I will mention just a few of them: The weight of a bag of potatoes, the weight of a bushel of lime, the contents of a milk can, the contents of an apple barrel, the contents of canned goods, the weight of a barrel of cement, abolishing the practice, which has given rise to so much complaint among the farmers of Ontario, of using testers in order to find out the price to be paid by the millers for wheat. I am waiting to hear what arguments my hon. friends who have given notice of these amendments will bring in support of theirs.

Mr. FORTIN. As will be remembered, I introduced a Bill with the object of amending the Weights and Measures Act with regard to the sale of potatoes by the bag. That Bill has passed its second reading, and was called the other day on the Order paper for consideration in Committee of the Whole House. By request of the Minister of Inland Revenue, it was allowed to stand in order that the object of the Bill might be embodied in the Bill submitted by the Government. I have already explained the reasons which commend to my mind the measure which I proposed to the House. I have stated that the practice of selling potatoes by the bag is universal, more particularly in the old provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Now, the Weights and Measures Act contains no provision by which the standard of that measure is determined. There are provisions regarding the standard of a bushel, there are provisions regarding the standard of hay or straw when these products are sold by the bundle; there are provisions determining the standard of a barrel of apples; and there is a certain statute which was passed in 1888 making special provisions for the standard of a bag of salt, determining how many pounds should constitute a bag of salt. Now, if it was found useful or even necessary to determine the standards of those various measures, I see no reason why such a standard should not be adopted with regard to one of the most important articles of produce of the farm—I mean potatoes. Therefore, I take it for granted that as a matter of principle the measure which I now propose as an amendment to the present Bill, should commend itself to the members of this committee. Now, as regards the question of practical utility, it seems to me beyond dispute that the absence of any provision to that effect is a cause of inconvenience. In the absence of such a law, municipalities avail themselves of their powers to enact by-laws; and we have already pointed out that one by-law was enacted by the city of Montreal, determining the standard for that kind of measurement. Although it is questionable whether the city of Montreal or any other municipal corporation has power to pass such by-laws, as there might be some doubts, I think the best and most useful way to dispose of the question is to make a provision in the Weights and Measures Act that is now before the committee. I may mention that it has been stated in this House during my absence that nobody ever demanded the adoption of such a measure, that there have been no farmers' institutes calling for such legislation, that no board of trade has demanded the same. Since this measure was introduced I have received almost daily resolutions adopted by various municipal corporations and letters from other public bodies, endorsing the principle of the Bill. Perhaps the committee will allow me to quote some of those resolutions. I hold in my hand a resolution adopted by the municipal council of the county of Hochelaga, a portion of which I will read :

(Translation.) Whereas, it is impossible for farmers, even when using the imperial measure, to obtain a weight of 90 pounds for a bag of potatoes ; and, whereas, it is in the interest of the farming community in general, and of the farmers of the county of Hochelaga in particular, that the weight of a bag of potatoes should be reduced to 80 pounds.

This Council begs both Houses of Parliament to grant the petition of the honourable member for Laval, Mr. Fortin, and to reduce to 80 pounds the regulation weight of each bag of potatoes.

I have here similar resolutions from a number of municipal councils. It is unnecessary to read them all, but they are all to the same effect, if not all in the same language. I have a resolution adopted by the municipal council of Rivière des Prairies on March 29th last ; a similar resolution passed by the municipal council of St. Dorothée on the 28th March ; another by the parish of St. François de Sales on the 29th March ; another by the parish of St. Léonard, Port Maurice, on the 25th March ; another by the municipal council of St. Martin on the 26th March ; a similar resolution passed by the municipal council of the parish of St. Constant, county of Laprairie, on the 26th March ; a similar resolution adopted by the municipal council of the village of St. Rose on the 24th March ; and another by the parish of Ste. Rose on the 25th March.

Mr. BERGERON. Where is Ste. Rose ?

Mr. FORTIN. My hon. friend surely knows where Ste. Rose is, for if I remember well he was in Ste. Rose some time in 1886, working for the National party, so-called at that time, and against his friends on the opposite side of the House.

Mr. BERGERON. That probably explains the appearance of the hon. gentleman here to-day.

Mr. FORTIN. I do not think it is due to that influence, but I am willing to allow my hon. friend the pleasure of remaining under that impression.

I beg to quote also a letter that I have received from the Chambre de Commerce, of Montreal, in which this measure is also endorsed. The secretary says :

(Translation.) I understand that you are introducing a Bill to the effect of determining the standard of the potato bag, when potatoes are offered for sale in bags.

Allow me to tell you that such a Bill is necessary, as the practice of selling potatoes by the bag prevails throughout the country.

The standard which your Bill proposes to fix seems to meet with general approbation, as well among the farming community as among the merchants, because everybody complains of the by-law of the city which requires that each bag should weigh 90 pounds, a quantity which ordinary bags cannot be made to contain.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think these will answer the objection which was made on a previous occasion, that such legislation was not needed, and had not been called for. I could, without any trouble, have obtained scores of resolutions from other municipal bodies throughout the province of Quebec, to the same effect. Now, although I believe that the standard should be adopted for the whole Dominion, I have been told, and it has been declared before this House, that in some of the provinces it would be an inconvenience. I have been told that in the province of Ontario, for instance, where potatoes are exported to the United States by the bag, it would be an inconvenience to reduce the standard of the bag, because ninety pounds is the standard in the United States. Therefore, in view of this circumstance, I propose to add the words, "in the province of Quebec" in the beginning of the Bill, which I propose to be adopted as an amendment to clause 2 of the present Act. The effect of the amendment will be to make the standard applicable only to the province of Quebec. I think this will remove all the objections that were brought to this measure. It will probably be said that this is exceptional legislation, that it would be unwise to adopt a special standard for one province and that the law should be made applicable to all the provinces. Now, I may state that we have already in the Weights and Measures Act several provisions which are applicable only to the province of Quebec. We have a provision with respect to the measurement of land. The old measurement of the French system is still conserved in our statutes, and is applicable to the province of Quebec. The old measurement with respect to the bundle of hay or straw is also applicable in the province of Quebec. If there are already in the Weights and Measures Act exceptions, the insertion of an additional one would not make much difference. The Weights and Measures Act is by no means an ideal legislation. The whole system will have, one day or another, to be changed. We shall have to adopt the decimal or metric system, applicable to all kinds of measurements ; but until we have reached the time when such legislation should be passed and placed on the Statute-book, we may properly take cognizance of provincial exceptions, and there is no strong reason why the amendment I now propose should not be inserted in the present Bill. I move :

That clause 2 be amended so as to read as follows :—

"In the province of Quebec, when potatoes are sold by the bag, each bag must contain at least 80 pounds of potatoes."

Mr. QUINN. Is there at the present time any standard of measurement for potatoes?

Mr. FORTIN. There is the standard of a bushel, 60 pounds. This is provided for by section 16 of the present Act.

Mr. MACLEAN. Why make a change ?

Mr. FORTIN. We propose to adopt a standard for a bag, because there is no such standard adopted by law. In the absence of law, farmers are interfered with by municipal regulations, which may vary every day. In Montreal, the regulation is, that a bag of potatoes must weigh 90 pounds. There is nothing, as the law stands, to prevent the adoption of a by-law by another municipality providing that a bag of potatoes shall contain 100 pounds, or anything to prevent another municipality adopting a different standard. It is a mode of selling that kind of produce, and it is just as rational to adopt a standard for that measurement as it is to adopt a standard for the bushel. In my Bill there is a second section to provide for the penalties that are already provided for by subsection 2 of section 16 of the Weights and Measures Act.

Mr. SPROULE. We go far enough when we make a standard bushel. The adoption of the amendment would lead to confusion. Our people move around the country, and may reside at one time in Quebec, another time in Ontario, or in the North-west, or in British Columbia, and if there is a standard bag in one province, it may not prevail in another. It is quite true there is at the present time a standard bushel, and it should be allowed to remain, but there is no necessity for making a standard bag which will be applicable only in the province of Quebec.

Mr. MACLEAN. I would suggest that, instead of complicating this measure, there should be a conference between the United States, Great Britain and Canada, looking to the adoption of a decimal system of weights and measures and of a uniform system applicable all over the world. I believe the time has arrived for such action to be taken, and that the Government should take up the matter. I believe there is a movement in England and in the United States looking to that end; and so, instead of making our system more complicated, we should seek to adopt a uniform system based on the decimal system for use throughout the Empire and the world.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the proposal of the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) would be utterly useless. It would not even remedy the grievance he has stated to the House. He has mentioned that the city of Montreal has passed a by-law making a bag of potatoes 90 pounds, or one bushel and a half. That by-law would, no doubt, remain in force, and the proposition of the hon. member would not affect it. What does the hon. gentleman propose? It is that a bag of potatoes shall not be less than 80 pounds in the province of Quebec. The weight may be more than that, of course. In other provinces, a bag would be 90 pounds, but it would be anything over 80 pounds in Quebec, and 90 pounds in the city of Montreal. I oppose the amendment for this reason, that it does not define what weight a bag of potatoes shall have in the province of Quebec, for the amendment only provides that the weight shall not be less than 80 pounds.

Mr. FORTIN. It might be made to read, "80 pounds."

Mr. WALLACE. The amendment does not state what the weight shall be. It might be 85, 90 or 100 pounds. That would lead to a great deal of confusion. Another objection, and a very strong one, to my mind, is, that, under the proposed arrangement, a bushel of potatoes might have one weight in Quebec and another weight in all the other provinces. I do not think the proposal of the hon. gentleman would lead to anything beneficial, but would add to the confusion, and it should not be adopted.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I do not think the opposition expressed by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) is quite fair in regard to the proposition of my hon. friend from Laval. The amendment is simply for the purpose of overcoming the regulation in a certain local market, which, by reason of a by-law, has injured seriously a large number of people living immediately around them. The proposal is, practically, that a new measure of weights and measures should be made. As a matter of practical working, it has been found very difficult to secure 90 pounds of potatoes in an ordinary bag. The result is, that a large number of perfectly innocent men, without any design or thought of wrong-doing, are laid open to prosecution, fine and confiscation of the produce they bring to that market. My hon. friend proposes to adopt a weight for a bag. He does not mean to say that a bushel and a half measure shall be 80 pounds, but that a bag of potatoes, when used as a unit of sale, shall weigh 80 pounds.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman does not propose that.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. He proposes that a bag shall weigh at least 80 pounds. That simply is to say, that it shall not be less than 80 pounds. If grain is sold by the measured bushel, and it happens to weigh more than the fixed number of pounds, we know that does not contravene the law. A bushel of oats, by our standard, is 30 pounds.

An hon. MEMBER. Thirty-four pounds.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, of course; that was a slip of the tongue.

Mr. WALLACE. I thought a farmer would know the weight of a bushel of oats.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think the hon. member (Mr. Wallace) can recognize a slip of the tongue when he hears it, if he wants to. The measured bushel of oats although fixed by law at thirty-four pounds, will frequently weigh 38 or may be 40 pounds, but nobody would say that this would contravene the law. So also, if a bag of potatoes happen to weigh 84 or 86 pounds, it would not contravene the provisions proposed by my hon. friend. I believe that in the interests of the farmers of the province of Quebec, the proposal of my hon. friend is fair and just. I do not see that it can interfere in the slightest degree with the arrangements in the province of Ontario or elsewhere, where potatoes happen not to be sold by the bag. If the proposition were made that the weight of a bushel of potatoes should be changed it would be a serious one, and I myself would not support it; but where we are adopting the weight of a measure which has not been fixed by any law of Canada, and has only been fixed by certain municipal regulations, I do not see that there is a reasonable objection to the Parliament of Canada fixing the weight of such measure in the province of Quebec. It would, in my opinion, be unfair for the members from other provinces to object to that. Of course, as suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Fortin), if we pass this law it will override any municipal regulations imposing a penalty for the bag of potatoes not being 90 pounds.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) is not well informed as to the custom in other provinces, because it is a very common thing in Ontario to sell potatoes by the bag. It is distinctly understood there that a bag of potatoes shall be one bushel and a half, or 90 pounds, and consequently it would be very confusing to make this change. If we look at the market quotations in Montreal and Toronto and find that potatoes are selling at so much a bag; then if the standard of weight be different in the two cities, one would have to enter into an elaborate calculation to find the comparative value of potatoes in these markets. That would be, to say the least, confusing.

Mr. CLANCY. We have at present a good law fixing the number of pounds for each bushel of potatoes, and no matter what the size of a bag of potatoes may be, it contains an equivalent for the bushel or some proportion perhaps in excess of it. I am unable to see that the proposed amendment would relieve the farmers from the necessity of weighing their potatoes. Suppose we fix a bag of potatoes at 80 pounds, and that a farmer without weighing it puts in 79 pounds; he would still be subject to penalties as provided under the municipal regulations. This amendment does not relieve him of the necessity of weighing. In my opinion it is a dangerous thing to change the law to suit every whim and change that may be suggested by every municipality in Canada.

Mr. TAYLOR. If potatoes that are grown in the province of Quebec were marketed and consumed in that province, there could be no objection to this law passing, but such is not the case. Every year grocers and speculators from the province of Ontario, and I presume other provinces, buy potatoes in Quebec, and ship them by rail and water along the shores of Lake Ontario and the River St. Lawrence, where they are sold by the bag. If they purchase an 80-pound bag of potatoes in Montreal, then it will not comply with the Ontario regulation which requires 90 pounds; and there will be a grievance against the province of Quebec for giving light weight; for I take it that nine out of ten of the dealers will not know that this law has been passed at all. If the potatoes grown in Quebec were confined for sale and consumption to that province, there would be no objection to this amendment, but as they are sold in other provinces where the regulation is 90 pounds to the bag, then I maintain that the regulation in Quebec should be the same.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It would appear at first sight that this matter was a very easy matter to settle, but the more we discuss it the greater the difficulties appear to be. In order that we may consider it better I move now that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House resolve itself into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

He said: I rise to move, Mr. Speaker, in accordance with notice, the motion which you have put from the Chair, and before concluding my remarks I shall place upon the Table of the House a series of resolutions to which it is my desire to invite the attention of the House.

A little less than one year ago, under circumstances which perhaps marked the occasion as one of some importance in the history of Canada, I had the honour to deliver in this House my first Budget speech.

In rising to-day to perform a similar duty, I am sure that I have ample grounds on which to congratulate the House on the condition of the country, and on the results of the policy of the Government which it was my privilege to announce to the House in April last. Canada has had an eventful year, a year marked by great political advancement, material progress and steadily increasing prosperity.

Following the usual practice in Budget speeches, I shall first ask the attention of the House to a brief review of the operations of the financial year 1896-97, which ended on the 30th of June last, the accounts of which have been in the possession of the House for some time past. The revenue for that year yielded $37,829,778, as against $36,618,590 for the year 1895-96, or an increase of $1,211,187. The total expenditure on Consolidated Fund reached $38,349,759, as against an expenditure of $36,949,142 in 1895-96, or an increase of $1,400,617. The outcome of 1896-97 left us with a deficit of $519,981, as against a deficit on the previous year of $330,551. That, in brief, is the result of the year's operations on account of Consolidated Fund.

Following the usual custom, I give the details of the revenue, as compared with the previous year :

	1896-97.	1895-96.	Increase.	De-crease.
	$	$	$	$
Customs..	19,478,247	19,833,279		355,032
Excise...	9,170,378	7,926,005	1,244,372
Miscellaneous..	9,181,152	8,859,305	321,846
	37,829,778	36,618,590	1,566,219	355,032
			1,211,187

It will be noticed that there was a slight decrease in the customs revenue, which can be attributed to the restrictive effect on the imports of the anticipated changes of the fiscal system inaugurated 23rd April of last year, and to the reduction in the duties between that date and 30th June. The large increase of excise is, of course, accounted for as an anticipation of the current year's receipts, in view of expected changes in the duties of excise. In the items composing miscellaneous, the chief increase is in the receipts from post office. Taking up the report of my colleague the hon. the Minister of Customs, I find that, on the following articles, important increases in duty have been received :—

Animals, living.....	$ 17,122
Carriages	59,072
Fancy goods	9,902

The per capita consumption of the following articles usually finds a place in the Budget, and I give it, as follows :—

	Spirits, Galls.	Beer, Galls.	Wine, Galls.	Tobacco, Lbs.
1894	·742	3·722	·089	2·264
1895	·666	3·471	·090	2·163
1896	·623	3·528	·070	2·120
1897	·723	3·469	·084	2·243

It will be noticed that there is an apparent increase in the consumption of spirits in 1897, but that, I think, is to be accounted for by the fact that in anticipation of the changes in the excise duties last session, very considerable quantities were entered for duty, which will probably affect the consumption for the next year, so that the figures which show an increase, rather show an increase in mercantile operations than in actual consumption. The average per capita consumption was as follows:—

Spirits	Gall.	1·026
Beer	do	2·920
Wine	do	·130
Tobacco	Lbs.	2·173

We come now to the expenditure of the year.

Mr. FOSTER. Before going to the expenditure of the year, can my hon. friend tell me what amount of the increase is due to the Jubilee stamps of 1896-97?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have not included that in my statement, but I shall be glad to give it later on. The post office revenues in the public accounts show it in general terms. I shall furnish it later on if the hon. gentleman desires.

The expenditure on consolidated revenue reached $38,349,759, being an increase of $1,400,617 over that of the previous year. Taking up the details of the outlay, I find that in the following services there is an increased expenditure:

Interest on public debt	$143,233
Charges of management.....	29,905
Sinking funds.....	46,526
Premium, discount and exchange...	36,833

Indians	27,655
Miscellaneous	9,392
Customs	48,912
Post Office	124,467
Trade and Commerce	5,141

On the other hand, there have been decreases on the following:—

Superannuation	$ 3,439
Mounted Police	6,852
Lighthouse and coast service.....	20,314
Scientific institutions	1,705
Government of the North-west Ter- ritories	10,167

Weights and measures and gas....	6,150
Railways and Canals, collection....	100,535
Dominion lands.....	8,492
Public Works, collection.....	11,892

The main increases will be found to be in the interest on public debt, legislation, militia, public works, and post office, and the causes operating in these cases were explained in my remarks of the 22nd of

Mr. FIELDING.

April last year and are sufficiently well known. I need not refer to them further than to say that they are the direct result of the apparent economy accomplished by my predecessor in 1895-96, an economy, which I am justified in saying was only apparent, because I think hon. gentlemen themselves will admit that it was not possible to continue the expenditure on the figures of that year. Indeed, hon. gentlemen on the other side, by the remarks they have made on these subjects, have frequently admitted as much.

In concluding my observations upon the business of the fiscal year of 1896-97, ending the 30th of June last, let me express the hope that my hon. friends opposite will allow me to congratulate them on the very happy failure of some of the very gloomy predictions which they made respecting that year. It may be remembered that in the closing hours of the first session of this Parliament, my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) and my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) made very strong attacks upon the financial position of the Government, and predicted that very direful things would happen in the first year of Liberal administration. I do not propose to detain the House with lengthy quotations from their remarks, but I may summarize their predictions very briefly. My hon. friends stated that we were entering upon a year of reckless expenditure which could only end in financial disaster. They declared that within that current year of 1896-97, I would be obliged to borrow at least $10,000,000, and that I would have to go on the money market under conditions that would greatly damage our public credit. They will, I hope, be gratified to learn that during that current year we did not have to go on the general money market at all; that our total temporary borrowing, in the usual way of treasury bills, did not amount to ten million dollars or even half of ten million dollars; and that the only borrowing in which we indulged, over and above the renewal of a loan contracted by my predecessor, was less than three million dollars, and that when at a subsequent and proper time we did proceed to place a loan on the London market, instead of going with a damaged credit, as my hon. friends predicted, we went under favourable conditions and met with gratifying success.

They also stated that we would not be able to come out of the year's operations with a deficit of less than $3,250,000. As late as the month of April last, my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance modified his calculation, but even then he predicted that we could not come out of the year with a deficit of less than $2,000,000. He will, I am sure, be glad to learn that we came out of the year with a deficit, not of $3,250,000, not of $2,000,000, but of the modest sum of $519,000. My hon. friend said that in the first year of Liberal administration we would have an expenditure of at least forty million dollars. He will be glad to learn, I hope, that the expenditure of that year amounted to only $38,349,759.

My hon. friend said that he could appeal with confidence to the great arbiter, time, to decide these things. Well, the great arbiter has given judgment, and has given judgment against my hon. friend and in favour of the Administration. I suppose it would be too much to expect of my hon. friends opposite that they will take the cheerful view which we, on this side, are disposed to take of the prospects of the country under a Liberal Administration. I suppose it is even possible that their sense of duty may oblige them to continue to draw the same alarming picture of the future under Liberal rule. We, on this side, will have to comfort ourselves with the thought, when we have these alarming predictions, that time, the great arbiter, will continue to decide against my hon. friends and in favour of the present Administration.

I have given some figures respecting the consumption on spirits and intoxicating liquors, but it has occurred to me that, in view of the agitation on the subject of prohibition, which is likely to be continued and to take a more emphatic shape at an early day, there will be frequent references, no doubt, to the amount of duty and the revenues of the various departments of the Government arising from the liquor traffic. I think that, therefore, it might be convenient to include in the Budget a statement showing exactly what are the revenues derived from that source. The statement is for the year 1896-97.

	Quantity.	Duty.
Customs—
Alc. beer, &c...Galls.	327,216	$ 65,245 30
Excise—

Or,
Customs		$2,471,775 11
Excise		5,759,158 32

Summing it up, we find that the revenues received from these sources are: Customs, $2,471,775.11; excise, $5,759,158.32, making a total revenue from that source of $8,230,933.43.

So far, Sir, I have dealt with the financial year ending June last. Now, let us turn our attention to the current year, of which nine months have elapsed. With this elapsed period as a basis of calculation, I shall endeavour to estimate what our position will probably be on the 30th June next. Up to 31st March last, according to the latest statements we have obtained, our customs revenue amounts to $16,111,029.82.

Making due allowance for the increase we have lately been experiencing in the receipts from this source, and keeping in mind that after 1st July the preferential feature of our tariff obtains its full development and consequently there will be a slight check in the imports in May and June, I think I am within the mark when I estimate the customs revenue at $21,000,000, as against last year's yield of $19,478,247. From excise, I do not expect to receive more than $8,000,000, as compared with $9,170,378 received last year, on account of various disturbing causes. As between the two years, there is no doubt our revenue this year from that source will be less. From miscellaneous sources I anticipate our revenue will be $10,300,000; or $39,300,000 in all.

So much for the revenue. On the other hand, the actual expenditure up to the 31st March on account of consolidated fund amounted to $22,987,258, which is just on about a level with last year, if we take into account the fact that there is a quarter's post office expenditure of last year which does not appear this year but will come in at a later stage of the accounts. We must add to the outlay against us the expenditures which will be imposed upon us in connection with the opening of the Yukon district and the maintenance of law and order in that territory. So, to be on the safe side, I put the total consolidated fund expenditure for the current fiscal year at $38,750,000. If this estimate proves correct, and if we receive the estimated revenue of $39,300,000, the business of this year, closing the 30th June next, will end with a surplus of $550,000.

My aim and expectation in that respect are that we shall have in this current year a surplus which will wipe out the deficit of last year, and leave a balance, possibly even a larger balance than I would now care to state, on the right side. I feel confident that this is a safe and conservative estimate of the result of the year's operations. Some features of the year's business have been so abnormal, there has developed such buoyancy in trade, that I should not be surprised if the outcome of the year should be more favourable than I have indicated. The total consolidated fund expenditure for the current year I have just estimated at $38,750,000, or some $400,000 over last year's actual expenditure. The reasons for this are to be found in the additional interest on the public debt that has to be paid on account of the loan of last autumn, the necessary outlay in connection with the opening up of the Yukon district, an increased outlay resulting from a vigorous policy to be pursued in the Department of Agriculture, and also in the branch of the Department of the Interior which has special reference to immigration. The extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal will also go to swell our gross expenditure, although I am assured by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways that the increased outlay will be offset by increased receipts that will accrue from the working of the extension. Although our borrowings in London, last October, as I shall show, were less than half the amount authorized, and it might be supposed therefore that we should have occasion again to resort to temporary loans at an early day, I am glad to be able to say that, owing to the buoyancy of trade and of revenue, our financial position has become so strong that I do not anticipate that it will be necessary, during the current year, to issue a single Treasury bill or borrow any money in any shape or form.

I desire now to refer to the debt statement for 1896-97. On the 30th June, 1896, our net debt stood at $258,497,432.77. As a result of the year's operations, it has been increased by $3,041,163.69, the details of which are as follows :—

Expenditure on Capital Account and on Canadian Pacific Rail- way	$3,519,875 59
Deficit of the year	519,981 44
Railway subsidies	416,955 30
Rebellion in the N.W.T.	3,284 64
Consolidated Fund transfers, including liabilities incurred prior to 30th June, 1896, Post Office Department	682,880 52
Total	5,142,977 49
Less—Sinking Fund investments	2,101,813 80
Net increase	3,041,163 69
 Making the net debt on 30th June, 1897	 $261,538,596 46

For the current fiscal year, I find we have expended up to the 31st March on capital account, for railway subsidies and for discounts and charges in connection with the late loan, in all $4,506,185. To complete the year's requirements on capital account and railway subsidies it is estimated that we shall need $3,000,000, making a total of $7,506,185. In order to ascertain the net increase of our debt, we must deduct the sinking fund investments which are estimated to amount to $2,300,000 and estimated surplus of $507,000, leaving an increase in the net debt of $4,500,000 in round numbers for the year 1897-98.

Mr. CLANCY. Where are the cheers ?

Mr. MACLEAN. We are sitting on them.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We propose that hon. gentlemen opposite shall continue to sit on those chairs for a long time yet. With regard to the fiscal year beginning on the 1st July next and ending on the 30th June, 1899, it is, of course, too early at this day to estimate in more than general terms. However, I do not think that, so far as the customs revenue is concerned, we should fall behind this year's income, which I have estimated at $21,000,000. We have to remember, of course, that on the 1st July this year the second stage of our preferential tariff will be reached, and the reduction of 12½ per cent already accrued will be followed by a further reduction of 12½ per cent, making a total of 25 per cent. The first reduction of 12½ per cent was, perhaps, not large enough to make any great change in the stream of British imports. Besides it takes time for the British merchant to understand the operation of these tariff changes, and just about the moment when he became aware of the reduction, and was prepared to deal with it, the difficulty arose with respect to the Belgian and German treaties, which resulted in the so-called preference being for a time extended to a large number of countries, and therefore Great Britain was not in a position to enjoy the 12½ per cent reduction as fully as we had expected and desired.

Mr. FIELDING.

Mr. FOSTER. The difficulty arose before that, did it not ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, only in the minds of my hon. friends opposite. There are no difficulties in this question on this side of the House ; there were difficulties which my hon. friends opposite for years sought to remove without success, and which have been removed by this Government. I expect, therefore, that when the full reduction of 25 per cent takes place, when the preference is confined, as it will be, to imports from the mother country and from certain British colonies to which I shall refer, I expect there will be a considerable increase in imports from Great Britain, and on these imports we shall receive a smaller amount of revenue than we have hitherto received. With a view to maintaining our position as a sound one financially, to upholding our credit and guarding against deficits, it will be the part of wisdom to anticipate loss of revenue in that respect by making some increase to the revenue in other quarters, and of that I will speak later on. Excise should provide at least eight and one-half millions, and from miscellaneous sources, making due allowances for increase in railway receipts, from post office and interest on investments, we should receive eleven million dollars. These I estimate will give us a total revenue of $40,500,000. I am speaking now of the year beginning on the 1st of July next, concerning which, of course, our estimates will have to be of a very general character, with very little opportunities of coming to close quarters, not such opportunities as we have with regard to the current year. We have laid on the Table of the House the Estimates for 1898-99, to the extent of $39,124,000. These Estimates include two new items, one of $396,000 for the expense of the Yukon district, and another of $760,000 for the running expenses of the Intercolonial Railway extension to Montreal. Under our method of keeping accounts, the increased cost of operating the Intercolonial Railway has to be added to our general expenditure, even though it might be a source of profit to us, represented by an increase on the other side of the account. These two new items for the Yukon and for the Intercolonial Railway, items which were not necessary in our past Estimates, but that we all recognize are necessary now, amount to $1,156,000. If we take this from the total amount of the Estimates, it will be found that the remainder, $38,168,000 is about the same as asked for in the main Estimates for the current year.

In April last, in the course of my remarks on the financial outlook, I expressed my belief that when the details of the tariff were once settled and announced, trade would not only continue to flow in its usual channels, but that we might expect a large increase. When those words were uttered, the circumstances that I then enumerated pointed unmistakably in this direction. The good harvest, however, and increased prices have since that time lent their force to the tide of events, and the period of resulting prosperity that Canada is and has been for some time past enjoying must be indeed gratifying to every hon. member of this House, and to every citizen of Canada, and must confirm the conviction that we all have as to the great possibilities of the future development of our country.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you will bear with me when I turn aside for a moment to enumerate a few of the directions in which this development and prosperity have made themselves felt. I propose to speak first as an illustration of the increased prosperity of the country, of the increased business of the country—I propose to speak of the deposits in the banks. In the bank circulation the effect has been most pronounced. I need not weary the House by giving the details of the bank statements, but I may present a table showing the deposits in the chartered banks for the past six years, together with the totals:

	Chartered Banks.	Govt. Savings Banks.	Total.
30th June, 1892.....	$ 160,942,778	$ 39,529,547	$ 200,472,325
30th June, 1893.....	170,817,433	41,849,658	212,667,091
30th June, 1894.....	174,930,936	43,036,012	217,966,948
30th June, 1895.....	180,664,121	44,450,498	225,114,619
30th June, 1896.....	183,769,992	46,799,318	230,569,310
30th June, 1897.....	201,141,688	48,934,975	250,076,663
31st December, 1897.....	222,002,147	49,466,656	271,468,803

That is to say, that in the six months from June last to December the deposits have increased by over $21,000,000.

To carry on the increased business of the country there has been a very heavy demand for Dominion notes and bank notes, which the elasticity of our banking system has been fully able to meet. I append the figures relating to note circulation for six years past:

	Government.	Banks.	Total.
31st October, 1892.....	$38,688,429	$18,647,063	$57,335,492
31st October, 1893.....	36,906,941	19,844,248	56,751,189
31st October, 1894.....	34,516,651	22,212,884	56,729,535
31st October, 1895.....	34,671,028	22,893,259	57,564,287
31st October, 1896.....	35,955,150	21,607,553	57,562,703
31st October, 1897.....	41,580,928	24,751,932	66,332,860

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask my hon. friend if he took the same date in each case for the Government bank figures?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, the figures in both cases are for the 31st of October, 1892, and continuing at the same date each year.

The October circulation, which is, as a rule, the highest of the year, on account of the moving of the crops, ran about 56 or 57 millions of dollars for the year 1896 and the four preceding years. The business of October, 1897, required over 66 millions, or an increase of close to nine millions over 1896.

The volume of the general business of the country was such as to very markedly increase the aggregate bank clearings of the five principal cities—Montreal, Toronto, Halifax, Winnipeg and Hamilton. The total clearings for the three years, 1895, 1896 and 1897, according to the "Monetary Times," were:

1897.....	1,151,906,000

or an increase of $126,000,000 in the clearings of 1897 over 1896. For the four weekly periods—ending Thursday—in January, 1898, the total clearings were $108,509,673, against $89,901,000 for the similar periods of January, 1897, or an increase of over $18,000,000. For February last, the total clearings for the five cities mentioned were $108,385,302, as compared with $74,612,552 for February, 1897, an increase of $33,772,750.

The railways, too, have experienced the benefits of this upward movement in trade, and the published traffic returns are an index of the extent of the betterment so far as they are concerned. From 1st July to the end of February last, the weekly statements of the two great railways of Canada show continual and steady increases over the corresponding weeks of last year. The gross receipts of the Canadian Pacific Railway for the year ending 31st December, 1897, were $24,049,534, against $20,681,596 for the previous year. The gross receipts of the Grand Trunk Railway, according to their weekly returns, for the same period were $19,521,588, against $18,731,885 for the previous year. The increase in the earnings of the roads is mainly attributable to their freight and live stock business. The share and bondholders have, of course, profited by the improvement in the earning capacities of the roads, and the market values of their securities have advanced by bounds. Take the Canadian Pacific Railway ordinary $100 shares. The closing price of December, 1896, was 56½; the lowest price of 1897 was 46½, and the latest December price was 83½. The closing price on 29th of January last, according to the "Economist," was 91½.

Mr. FIELDING.

In Grand Trunk securities the advance was equally marked. Taking their 4 per cent guaranteed and their first preference stocks, I find the lowest price of 1897 was 39½ and 30½ respectively, while on the 29th January they were quoted at 76½, 77½ and 67½ to 68½ respectively.

Taking the Canadian Pacific Railway stocks quoted in the "Economist," and the principal Grand Trunk issues, I find that securities of these two railways to the nominal value of £88,187,497 were worth on the market: On 31st December, 1895, £48,814,887; on 31st December, 1896, £50,430,613; on 31st December, 1897, £62,317,910.

I will now take a few figures from the Trade Returns for 1896-97.

The total value of the imports into Canada for the year amounted to $119,218,609, which is nearly a million and a quarter of dollars in excess of the previous year, and over eight millions in excess of the fiscal year 1894-95.

Canada's export trade during the year was, by far, the largest and greatest in its history. The total value of the exports for the year amounted to the sum of $137,950,253, which is over 16 millions of dollars in excess of the previous year, and 24 millions in excess of the fiscal year 1894-95.

The total value of the imports for home consumption, exclusive of coin and bullion, for the eight months of the current year, up to the end of February, amounted to $80,821,831, which is $12,081,330 in excess of the corresponding period of the last fiscal year.

Including coin and bullion, the imports for home consumption for the eight months amounted to $83,785,737, which is $10,506,815 in excess of the corresponding period of the last fiscal year.

The total exports for the eight months amounted to $119,644,464, which is $26,451,521 in excess of the export trade for the corresponding period of last year, and which is also in excess of the export trade for any whole year in the history of Canada, prior to 1896.

While we have thus placed before us the many evidences of the growing prosperity of Canada, let us not be unmindful of the chief causes of this happy condition of affairs. The general business of Canada has been prosperous because prosperity has come to the great agricultural class. There have been some mistaken notions in the past as to relations between manufactures and agriculture. The idea existed in some quarters that we could build up a prosperous farming community by stimulating manufactures. The home market was everything. Canada for the Canadians was the cry. There are some things in which it is well to have Canada for the Canadians, but we would do well to put a wise limitation on the meaning of the expression, and seek for prosperity through the markets of the world. I think the country has awakened to the fact that, in the effort to make prosperity for the farmers through the stimulating of manufactures, the cart was being placed before the horse. If we can fill up the farm lands of Canada with industries, prosperous and happy settlers, producing, not for the home market only, but for the markets of the world, we shall have the truest possible foundation for a successful manufacturing industry and for general prosperity. Let us then, while we rejoice in these figures which I have the privilege of presenting to the House, and while we rejoice in this prosperity, let us remember that that prosperity is due chiefly to the success of the farmer, and let us see that by every reasonable and proper effort we shall endeavour to encourage the development of agriculture throughout the Dominion of Canada.

I desire now to draw the attention of the House—though it may be necessary only as a matter of form—to the new loan which I had the pleasure of raising on the London market last autumn. You will recollect that a Loan Act was passed last session for $15,000,000. There were outstanding borrowing powers at that time to the amount of upwards of $8,000,000, and that together with our powers under the Act of last session, gave us borrowing powers to the amount of upwards of $23,000,000. The objects of these large borrowing powers are well known. We had entered upon large expenditures in respect to canals; we had incurred considerable obligations in respect of railways, and it was necessary to make provision for these as the obligations might arise. I may say that at the time the Loan Bill was before the House last session, the impression upon the minds of some hon. gentlemen was that the $15,000,000 was rather less than we should require. However that may be, taking the $15,000,000 which Parliament authorized us to borrow, together with the $8,000,000 outstanding borrowing powers, we were entitled to borrow $23,000,000. We did not, however, think it wise to exercise that power to the full extent. We came to the conclusion that it would be a wise policy to make our new loan for a moderate amount, and it was decided that we should make a loan for £2,000,000 sterling, or about $10,000,000. There were several reasons for that. We did feel hopeful, in view of the growing prosperity of the country, that we should not need to borrow so large a sum as many hon. gentlemen thought would be necessary, and there was the further consideration, that after due deliberation we resolved to try a very serious experiment—if one can call anything like that an experiment—we resolved to take the somewhat serious step of making a break in the rate of interest in the London market, Canada up to that time had no securities below 3 per cent, nor had any other colony. In view of the favourable condition of the money market; in view of the high position of Canadian credit; in view of the general tendency towards a reduction in the rate of interest, we thought the time had come when we could make the experiment—some called it a bold experiment—of going on the London market and asking the investors to buy our bonds at a 2½ per cent basis. And, Sir, having thought that matter out, we came to the conclusion that it would be a wise policy to make our first loan at that rate for a very moderate amount. We so decided for this reason: that in going upon the market with a new loan at a new rate, one always has to meet a certain degree of prejudice; one will never get in a first operation of that character so good a price as may be expected later. We thought, therefore, that if we could get along comfortably with £2,000,000 sterling, it would be wise to confine our loan to that amount in order that we might establish the market for our securities on a 2½ per cent basis, with the expectation that they would increase in value and that at no distant date, when it would be necessary for us to go on the market for the balance, we should have our credit fairly established on the 2½ per cent basis. Believing the moment favourable, in the month of October, we arranged to place our loan upon the market. The conditions of the market up to that time had been reasonably favourable, but the money market did take a slightly unfavourable turn at the eleventh hour of our transaction. After our prospectus had been issued the money market hardened somewhat, and on the very evening before our tenders were to be received, the Bank of England rate—which is the standard which governs all money transactions in London—was advanced a half per cent. Taking such a serious step as we were at that time, one might well have some anxiety as to the result in view of that unfavourable turn. However, I am glad to be able to state that so strong was the position of Canada in the money market, that when this proposal was made, even under that momentary adverse circumstance, the response of the public was very satisfactory and our loan was more than doubly subscribed. We placed the bonds on the market at the price of 91 and they were taken at 91 pounds 10 shillings and 5 pence.

Considering, Sir, that it was the first operation of the kind that any colony had ever attempted, I feel that we all have great reason—and I am sure my hon. friends opposite will join in my words heartily when I say it—we have all great reason to congratulate ourselves, irrespective of party, upon the very high position that Canadian credit has taken in England. I have here a statement showing the rates of interest that have been paid for the various Canadian loans since confederation, and as it may be found useful for future reference I shall read it.

In 1869 Canada issued a loan which was partly a guaranteed loan, one portion bearing 4 per cent and one 5 per cent, at a price which made the cost to Canada $4\frac{1}{8}$ per cent.

In 1873, another loan was issued which was also a guaranteed loan, and the cost to Canada was 3 9-10ths per cent.

Of course I need hardly say that where a loan had the guarantee of the Imperial Government the rate was more favourable.

In 1874, a Canadian loan cost Canada $4\frac{7}{8}$ per cent.

In 1875, a loan which was partly guaranteed cost $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

In 1876, a 4 per cent Canadian loan cost $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

In 1878, a guaranteed loan cost $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

In 1879, a Canadian 4 per cent loan cost $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

In 1884, a $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent loan cost $4\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.

In 1885, the cost of a 4 per cent loan was 4 1-12th in one case, and in another class of bonds 4 1-10th.

In 1888, the cost of a 3 per cent loan was $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

In 1892, the cost of a 3 per cent loan was $3\frac{3}{8}$ per cent.

In 1894, the cost of a 3 per cent loan was $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

In 1897, our $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent loan was sold in London at a price which represents about $2\frac{7}{8}$ per cent.

I have a more elaborate memorandum showing the comparisons between the various Canadian loans for some years, and this comparison has usually found a place in the Budget speech. If the House will permit me I shall, without reading it, have it incorporated in the statement so that it may be convenient for future reference.

Mr. FOSTER. Has my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) finished his remarks on the loan business ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. For the present ; there is one point further, but I shall be glad to have my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) ask me any question now.

Mr. FOSTER. Would my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) lay the prospectus on the Table ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I shall be very glad to.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the length of the last loan ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Fifty years. There is one other element in connection with that loan to which I may make a passing reference. Not only was it desirable that we should have our loan placed on a 2½ per cent basis, if possible, for the sake of the transaction itself, but such a change to the 2½ per cent rate became of further importance in view of the early maturity of a large amount of our existing loans.

By reference to page lxiv. of the Public Accounts, it will be found that between the years 1903 and 1910, we shall have loans maturing to the amount of £34,443,136, or $167,623,262. To assist in meeting the payment of these liabilities, I estimate that we shall have accumulated sinking funds to the value of $66,971,181. So that we shall have to renew or convert the balance of these maturing loans to the amount of over $100,000,000. The net rate of interest on our last loan, taking into account all charges, was 2.86 per cent. At the rate of interest which these loans that are to mature now bear, it would take about $4,000,000 to pay a year's interest on the $100,000,000 ; but at the rate of 2.86 per cent. the interest on the $100,000,000 would amount to $2,860,000, or a difference of $1,140,000. That is to say, if the money market when these various loans mature should prove as favourable to Canada as it was when we placed our recent loan, there would be a saving of interest to the extent of over $1,000,000 per year, as compared with the rate of interest which these loans now bear. We may reasonably hope to effect that saving, and something more ; for we all anticipate, I am sure, that the credit of Canada, high as it is now, will continue to improve, and that before the date is reached at which these loans fall in, we shall be able to borrow, not simply at the rate of 2.86 per cent, as we did last year, but at a rate which will come much closer to 2½ per cent, which will be the face value of the securities. I think, then, in view of these large maturing loans, as well as from the nature of the recent transaction itself, hon. gentlemen on both sides of the

Mr. FIELDING.

House will have been pleased to learn that we took the step of placing a 2½ per cent loan on the market ; and I am glad to know that the transaction was not a subject of party dispute, but that its success was recognized by the press of the country irrespective of party.

I shall now address myself to a question which was brought very forcibly to my mind and to the minds of my colleagues of the Tariff Commission during our investigations of a year ago. Among the many complaints which were made to us by manufacturers and business men as to the disadvantages under which they laboured, one prominent complaint was that the cost of capital was considerably in excess of what many of their rivals and competitors had to pay. A very large amount of the business of the country is carried on by credit, and the cost of money to the merchant and the manufacturer is a very serious consideration. It might be said that this is a matter with which the Government has little or nothing to do—that it is a matter which must be left to the general law of demand and supply. But a little examination will show that in some ways the Government have the power of influencing the money market, and that, in fact, the money market has been influenced to some extent by the policy of the Government. The banks of the country are borrowers as well as lenders. The banks receive from the public a large amount of capital which they use in the business of the country in the way of loans. This capital is in the form of deposits, and when the banks have to pay an unreasonably high rate of interest on deposits, that is a reason—at all events, it is an excuse—for their not giving lower rates of discount to the business men of the country. It has been said that the position of the banks in this respect has been a forced position. It has been said that they have been obliged in times past to pay more than a fair value for money, because the Government of the country has been doing so. I suppose it will be generally admitted that in the Government savings banks we have been for a long time paying a little more than the fair value of money ; and some gentlemen may say that we ought to do so in the savings banks. But I do not think we ought to accept that position. I think the savings banks of the country were designed to afford a place of safe deposit to the people interested in that class of institution. By the way, I am inclined to think that the original design of the savings bank as a place in which the thrifty classes could put their small savings, has been long since lost sight of, and a very large proportion of the money in the savings bank does not represent that class of depositors at all. However that may be, we find that the Government in past years have been paying a little more than the value of money in the way of interest on savings bank deposits; and we came to the conclusion, after careful consideration of the matter, that it was desirable, in the interest of the business of the country, in the interest of successful manufacturing, in the interest of every man who had to carry on his business to some extent with borrowed capital, that we should not have an artificial value of money in Canada, but that a man should be able to borrow according to the reasonable laws of demand and supply. We believed that it was a desirable thing to encourage to some extent the savings bank deposits, and we remembered that the number of those deposits was large and that the advantage to the depositors was a matter of some importance; but we came to the conclusion that the interest of the greatest number of the people demanded that we should not pay to the savings bank depositors a larger rate of interest than the reasonable value of money. Therefore, in July last we reduced the savings bank rate of interest from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per cent. Although it was not a matter of public criticism, there were some who felt at the time that it was a policy which would probably lead to large withdrawals of money from the savings banks. Such, however, did not prove to be the fact. I believe, as a result of that reduction, that there was some reduction in the cost of capital throughout the country—not universally, but to some extent. The banks of the country have their different classes of customers, of varying credit. There is the inner circle, who can get their discounts at pretty good rates; there is the next circle, who do not get them at so good a rate; and there is the outer circle who are glad to get them on any terms at all. I think that the inner circle, the class of corporations and business men who are in a very sound financial condition, already appreciate the reduction that has come to them in the rate of interest. Since that time an incident has occurred which has led us to go a step further. We did not think it was wise to make so radical a reduction as from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent at once; but we did make the reduction to 3 per cent; and since we have been able to place on the money market our own securities bearing a $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent rate, we thought we should regard that as a standard value of money, and that we ought not to pay a rate in excess of that. We know that it costs about $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent to manage the deposits, and if you add that to the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to be allowed upon them, you will be paying $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent, which is about the same as we are paying for our money in the English market.

An hon. MEMBER. Less.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend is right—a fraction less. But, as I have already stated, we expect the securities of Canada to advance in value. I have pointed out that in making a new loan at a reduced rate of interest, we suffer some disadvantage at the moment; but we all expect—barring temporary difficulties, wars and rumours of war, which we hope may soon pass away—that the securities of Canada will increase in value at a very early date; and we may fairly regard a fraction above $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent as the rate at which Canada can borrow all the money she requires. If therefore we pay the depositor $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent for his money and pay $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent for the management of the savings bank, we are practically paying him $2\frac{3}{4}$ for the money, and at a very early day we shall no doubt be able to borrow money at that rate in England. We therefore propose that on the 1st of July next there shall be a further reduction of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in the interest payable to depositors making the rate $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Mr. SPROULE. A grand stroke of business for the poor man.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend, no doubt, thinks that there are many poor men who have their money in the post office savings bank, but there are many more poorer men who are paying the interest, and who have no money in the savings banks. And the question is, whether a limited number of poor men shall be paid a higher rate at the expense of a larger number of poorer men who have no money to put in the savings banks. I quite sympathize with the desire of my hon. friend to pay a good round rate of interest, but I think he will agree with me that a very large amount of the money in the savings banks to-day belongs to a class of people who do not need any sympathy from us, but are very well able to look after themselves. And as far as the other depositors are concerned, if we give them the security of the public credit and pay them $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, besides the other $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent which the management costs us, I think we are dealing fairly and justly with them. But I do not put it before the House in that light only. The main ground I am arguing on is this, that it is not merely an advantage to the Treasury—though that is a point not to be lost sight of—but that the rate of interest we are now paying on savings banks deposits has a material effect on the cost of money to the business community at large in the Dominion; and if, by this step, we can bring about—not hastily, but gradually and surely—a reduction in the cost of capital to the merchant, the manufacturer, and to every man who has to go to a bank to borrow money, we believe we shall be doing something which is for the good of the whole country.

Mr. SPROULE. The discount charged by the banks since the last reduction has been just as high as ever; so that the reduction has not resulted as the hon. gentleman predicts it will.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am afraid the difficulty must be that my hon. friend and I belong to the outer class which cannot dictate to the banks, because I have reason to believe that that favoured inner circle is already receiving some advantage. But I do not put it on that ground alone. If that inner circle were receiving the advantage, and nobody else, then I would not argue that the step was a very advantageous one in the sense I mention. But we all know that the rates of interest do not change in a moment, and, if the borrower who now pays 6 per cent, can get a lower rate—my information is, and I believe it, that many are getting their discounts done at lower rates than twelve months ago—although for the present the advantage may be confined to that favoured inner circle, I believe it will gradually work out of it and my hon. friend and myself may some day get the benefit.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there any hope of our getting into that inner circle?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not while we are in politics.

I want to say something now with regard to the tariff policy of last year. I find that there is a change of front on the part of some hon. gentlemen opposed to the Government on that question. When the tariff policy was announced last year, the Conservative speakers and organs—I remember particularly an article in a leading organ of public opinion in Toronto,—took the ground that we were making changes which were threatening the business interest of the country, that the business of the country could not stand the policy which this Government had enacted. The Conservative speakers and organs told us that we were going to destroy the great industries of the country. Well, Mr. Speaker, the cry has changed to-day. Looking over the year's operations under that tariff, and finding that the business of the country has gone on increasing and expanding every day, finding that that cry cannot any longer be used, these hon. gentlemen have turned around and say: You did not make any changes in the tariff at all; you have the old National Policy after all. Well, each of these claims is unjust. We made a change in the tariff—a change that was moderate and reasonable, a change that guarded against rash disturbances, but which, nevertheless, effected substantial reductions on the rates of duty, so that the tariff of the country is no longer the old National Policy. I wish to remind the House that in the old tariff, which hon. gentlemen opposite admire so much, there were specific duties which ran up as high as 40 and 50, and I do not think I go too far when I say,

Mr. FIELDING.

60 per cent of the value of the article. All these high duties, at all events a great many of them, have been removed. Many of the articles which in former times paid a duty, under the old tariff, of 40 and 50 per cent, and as high as 60 per cent, will be found scheduled in the present tariff at 35 per cent, subject to a further reduction, under the preferential clause; so that, as between the old and the present general tariff there is a considerable reduction of duties on a number of articles. And, when you take into account the reduction which has taken place, and which will be increased on the first of July next, by the operation of the second stage of the preferential tariff, you will find that this Government has given the country a very substantial measure of tariff reform. I hold a list of about sixty items taken from the tariff. I might have made the list much larger, but that sixty will be sufficient for my illustration, and, perhaps, hon. gentlemen opposite will not want to listen to the whole list. The only reason I ask them to do so is, to get the list on "Hansard," but if, after I have read from the list a few minutes, they will dispense with my proceeding further—

Mr. FOSTER. Read it through.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend is relentless; but other hon. gentlemen on that side may not be so insistent.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the only way you can get it on the "Hansard."

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend used to get some things into "Hansard" which he did not read in his Budget speech, and I hope he will not object to my being given the same privilege.

Animals, living, n.e.s.—Under the old tariff the rate is 20 per cent. Under our general present tariff the rate is 20 per cent; but if they should come in under the preferential clause, it will be 17½ per cent, and, after the first of July, the rate will be 15 per cent, as against 20 per cent under the old tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend expect many?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not very many; but, such as they are, they will receive the benefit of tariff reform. There are a few cases in which you cannot expect the articles to come under the preferential tariff, because they will not come from Great Britain or the countries entitled to that preference. That is a fair criticism, and I do not want to urge that in every one of the cases the preferential rate will apply, but it will to most of the articles on this list. There are very few cases in which I quote a rate in which the importer will not receive the benefit of the preferential clause. The following is the list—

I am afraid that I have wearied the House by reading that long list, but I think it was necessary, in view of the criticisms that have been offered, to show that we have made, if not all the reforms that we desired, a very extended tariff reform and one which I am sure the country will appreciate.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Has appreciated.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Has appreciated, my hon. friend says, and I accept the amendment.

The most striking feature of the tariff policy of last session was the preferential tariff. That policy was designed chiefly to bring about preferential trade with the mother country, and I am sure the House will agree with me when I say that that portion of our tariff policy has been successful beyond measure, and has given Canada a world-wide fame. When I say this I do not forget that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, not many days ago, stated that that policy had been a complete failure. I do not know whether my hon. friend wished us to take that remark seriously. But if we are to treat it seriously for a moment, let us consider what grounds he has for that statement. In order that he might give himself some apparent ground, my hon. friend had to create a policy in his own imagination in order that he might have one much easier to attack. He says, addressing the members on this side of the House: "You told the House that you were going to establish preferential trade with the mother country, you said you could do it, you said you would do it, you said you knew all about it, that you had not any doubt about it and you were going to do it; but you did not do it, therefore your policy is a complete failure." That in substance was the statement of my hon. friend not many days ago. Now, what was the attitude of the Government on this question last year? Was it described correctly by my hon. friend? Did we say we knew all about this matter, that we were going to give preferential trade, that there were no doubts and no difficulties, and that we were sure to do it? No, Sir, every fair-minded man knows that that is not a correct description of what occurred in this House.

What we did say was this: That while we knew well that the Belgian and German treaties had for years been regarded as standing in the way of any such arrangement, we felt that the issue respecting these treaties had never been fairly and properly tried out before the British Government; we felt that the moment had arrived when we should challenge the position that was taken on that question, to see if something could not be done to bring about a change for the better. I have stated that we knew that the Belgian and German treaties appeared to stand in the way, but we felt the time had come when we could present the question before Her Majesty's Government in a new form. In the first place, there was room for argument, and we did argue, that inasmuch as the Belgian and German treaties had never been ratified by the Parliament of Canada, or by the legislatures of the province of Canada, or by any particular legislation anywhere, there was fair ground for contending that those treaties could not be made to apply to a self-governing colony like Canada. We had to take the position, in Canada's interest and as the advocates of Canada, that it was our duty to put forward every argument we could put forward in favour of and in support of our claim. We had presented the question to the House in a form not confined to preferential trade with the mother country alone. We presented our proposition to Parliament in the form of an offer to extend preferential trade to such countries as might be willing to extend equal advantages to us. There was a reciprocal condition in the treaty which opened a new question, new at all events as regards Canada and the mother country. There had been no previous proposal on such lines, and therefore we felt there was room for argument, and we were bound to argue, that new conditions that existed enabled us to question whether those treaties would have the effect which hon. gentlemen opposite in this House said they had. We went on to contend, and we did contend, that even if Belgium and Germany were standing in the way, as they had been standing in the way in the past, the new conditions that were imported into the question since the offer was made to other countries, even to Belgium and Germany, if they were prepared to avail themselves of the offer, placed Canada in a position which Her Majesty's Government should consider. We were well aware that these were debatable subjects, that some of them in times past had been the subject of difficulties; we knew there were doubts and difficulties surrounding them; and we further knew that Her Majesty's Government, in dealing with foreign nations, would always be disposed to interpret treaties in a very liberal spirit to the contracting parties; but knowing all these facts, we nevertheless felt that we were bound as the advocates of Canada to put forward every claim which could be put forward in its behalf. That was the position the Government took, and that was the position which my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries took in this House, and which he took outside of this House, and as an advocate of Canada he was bound to put forward every claim he could in order to sustain Canadian interests.

In order to show that this was the position we took, that we knew there were doubts, that we did not take the position which hon. gentlemen opposite say we took, I am going to ask the House to bear with me while I read a quotation from my Budget Speech of last year, and I read it because I desire to show that from the beginning the position we took was this, not that there were no doubts, not that the course was clear, but that doubts and difficulties prevailed, and that we were resolved to go forward with the firm conviction that even though the views we held could not be sustained by Her Majesty's Government, the outcome of the whole matter would be to present the Belgian and German treaties in a new light and one which was likely to bring about good results. Speaking at the time when I was asking the adoption of this new policy, I used the following language:—

Now, I shall not undertake to pass any judgment upon this very important question of the most-favoured-nation clauses of these Imperial treaties. It is an international question, and it is well that we should reserve our final judgment upon it. We recognize that it is a question upon which we shall ultimately have to consult with Her Majesty's Government, and I need not say that any view that may be taken by Her Majesty's Government will be considered by the Government of Canada with the respect that is due to any representation that might be made upon any subject, but above all, on the question of an international character. I say that it does not seem fair and reasonable that we should be obliged, while we are offering certain terms not to Great Britain only, but to all countries which will place themselves in the same position—it does not seem to be fair and reasonable that we should be obliged to extend the privileges of this schedule, which we call a reciprocal tariff, to nations which are not willing to do anything in return.

I admit there may be difficulties in the way. It may be possible that the view we take of this matter is not the correct view, but we say it is only fair and reasonable in the interests of Canada, in the interests of fair trade between ourselves and Great Britain, that we should to-day take the position that the favoured-nation clauses do not apply;—

I regret that I have mislaid for the moment the page on which I have extended the balance of the sentence.

Mr. DAVIN. It is as follows:—

—and that this resolution, which I put upon the Table of the House, will only extend to such countries as are prepared to give admission to our products under fair terms.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will proceed with the reading, because it is very good sense.

Mr. DAVIN. Sir Charles Tupper then said—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. At that stage of the discussion the leader of the Opposition exchanged a few words with me in which he took the ground that the treaty in express terms stood in our way. I continue the quotation:

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Even if it does, the world moves, and possibly the step we are taking to-night may have the effect—and that may be one of the advantages of it—of drawing the attention of Her Majesty's Government and of the English public to the position of those treaties, and thus opening up the question. Meantime, Sir, recognizing the difficulties, recognizing the possibilities that our judgment may be mistaken, and recognizing the obligations we may owe as part of the Empire, we intend for the present to take the view that inasmuch as we offer these conditions to other nations, if they do not see fit to accept them, the responsibility rests upon them and not upon Canada.

From these passages, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that from the beginning we recognized the debatable character of the subject, and the doubts and difficulties which were before us; and we went forward, not with the assurance that the views which we had advanced would in all respects prevail, but that even if our interpretation of the treaties should not be upheld, we should place the question before the public in such a manner as would show most effectually the objectionable character of the Belgian and German treaties.

True, Sir, the hon. leader of the Opposition said from the beginning that there was no ground whatever for our contention, and that no good could come from our action. But better authorities than he admitted that the grounds we had taken demanded grave consideration. A great organ of British opinion, usually well informed in Imperial and colonial matters, the London "Times," emphatically declared that it was doubtful whether these treaties applied to such a case as was created by the action of Canada. Her Majesty's Ministers in London deemed the position taken by our Government so important that they reserved their judgment until the question could be fully argued before the law officers of the Crown.

Our views were presented to Her Majesty's Ministers and to the law officers and to the British public by my hon. friends the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, assisted in the legal argument by Hon. Edward Blake. Sir, what was the result? The Imperial authorities held that under the treaties in question Germany and Belgium were entitled to receive in the British colonies the same tariff conditions as were available to Great Britain.

Well, Sir, if the matter had ended there, if that were the whole story, undoubtedly my hon. friends opposite would be in a position to tell us that our policy had borne no good fruit. But we all know that the matter did not end there. While these negotiations were going on, while arguments were being heard before the law officers of the Crown in England, as to the position of Canada under these treaties, a great public opinion was being created in the United Kingdom and throughout the Empire which became a potent factor in settling this question. For the first time the people of England were made to fully understand what these treaties meant, and how they stood as a barrier between the mother country and her colonies. Public men in this country had been talking of preferential trade for years, but they had never got beyond the stage of talking. If we had followed on the same lines no doubt we would have been equally unsuccessful as others had been in disturbing the objectionable treaties. If we had continued to make speeches on preferential trade, and to pass meaningless resolutions which could accomplish nothing. I have no doubt we should have failed in removing the barriers which stood in our way, and I have no doubt we should have gone on for years without accomplishing any substantial result. Efforts have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite to make it appear that we could have obtained preferential duties in the British markets in return for our concessions, if we demanded such. It has been said by these hon. gentlemen that my right hon. friend the leader of the Government had opportunities when he was in England of receiving what are called better terms from the mother country, and that he failed to take advantage of these opportunities; indeed it is said that he refused offers which it is alleged had been made to him.

I believe, Sir, for my part that every man who has had opportunities of sounding public opinion in England on this subject realizes that there was no ground whatever for expecting such preferential terms as we are told we should have demanded. I do not believe that any intelligent man will say candidly to-day, that there is any probability in the immediate or early future of the British people adopting a policy of preferential trade on the terms mentioned by my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Nor on any terms.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend (Mr. Fraser) says "nor on any terms," but I will not go so far as that. I will however go this far, and I will say that upon the terms which hon. gentlemen opposite talked preferential trade, there is not and never was a ghost of a chance of Great Britain accepting it. I believe that every man who has gone to England and has met public men there, and has met the representatives of the press, and has got down among the masses of the people, must realize the fact that you cannot get the masses of the English people to impose differential duties for the benefit of the colonies. There is a cardinal point in respect to these duties which reaches the masses very quickly. The first step is a movement of preferential trade of that sort must of necessity look towards the imposition of duties on grain; a renewal of what are called in England the old Corn Laws. I ventured to discuss this phase of the subject in my remarks a year ago, and I shall ask the House to bear with me while I read a brief extract from what I then said. These were my opinions then:

This question of preferential trade has been mentioned in the House in times past. Leading public men have advocated preferential trade, but always annexing to their suggestions a demand with which it was well known England could not comply. All the advocates of preferential trade, at all events all who have taken an active part in that movement, have assumed that as the first step, England must consent to put a duty on grain. We know that England does not view that project with favour. We know that no more unpopular project can be offered the English people than to ask them to put a duty on breadstuffs. It may be, as time rolls on, and at an early day, they may change their views. It may be that they may see it in their interest to make this distinction, and they may offer some preferential terms to the grain of Canada. If they can be induced to do that by fair argument, I have no doubt it will be a good thing for Canada. But why should we wait for England to take action? England has dealt generously with us in the past. England has given us a larger degree of liberty perhaps than is possessed by any other country on the face of the earth. She has given us liberty to tax her wares even when she admits our goods free, and we have taxed them to an enormous degree. Why should we wait for England to do more? Somebody must make a move in this matter, and we propose that Canada shall lead the way.

As a gauge of the public sentiment in England I believed that these words were true on the 22nd of April last, and I believe they will be found to be equally true to-day. There was no prospect then; there is no prospect now that the English people will agree to tax their bread to please the Canadian people.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not say that such a thing is impossible. On the contrary, I admit it is within the bounds of possibility, though by no means likely to come in the near future.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I venture to say, with the fullest confidence, that if such a policy is to be adopted by the mother country, it will not be brought about by any huckstering policy on the part of Canada, or on the part of any of the colonies making demands of an unreasonable character; but it will come as the result of a grand Imperial sentiment which will override all questions of an economic nature. I repeat, that if such a policy is to come it will come as the fruit of the growth of an Imperial sentiment, and nothing that has occurred in colonial history has done so much to create and develop that sentiment as the very measure which the Parliament of Canada placed on the Statute-books of this country last year.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock I had been discussing for a few minutes the question of preferential trade, with some reference to the denunciation of the Belgian and German treaties, and also with particular reference to the views on preferential trade which are sometimes expressed by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. In order to show the views which the Government entertained last year on that subject, I had taken the liberty of quoting a passage from my own speech. It had been represented occasionally—and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister had been particularly attacked on that score—that the Government of Canada, in return for concessions granted to Great Britain, could and should have obtained certain preferential advantages in the British market. I had quoted from my remarks of last session to show that the view which the Government entertained of that question was that, owing to the strong opinion known to prevail in the mother country on the question of protective duties generally, but particularly on the question of protective duties affecting articles of food, there was no reasonable ground for believing that any such preferential terms could have been obtained in the British market.

What was it that moved the British public as the British public had never been moved before by a colonial legislative enactment? It was that the Government and Parliament of Canada, not demanding impossible conditions, not asking things which they knew or should know the British public were not prepared to grant, not raising any demand of an unreasonable character, not trying to have any huckstering or bargaining in the transaction, but in a free and generous spirit, in recognition of the liberal manner in which England has always treated her colonies, had not been content to talk preferential trade, but had acted preferential trade. It was because Canada had thrown open the door, and had declared that at every custom-house, from ocean to ocean, the goods of the mother country should be admitted on terms of preferential trade. It was when that step was taken that the great heart of the English people was moved on this subject; and so, when the moment arrived when the Imperial authorities were obliged by the terms of the German and Belgian treaties to declare that they were not at liberty to accept the conditions of preferential trade which we offered—when the English people found that Canada had opened the door of her custom-houses in the manner I have described, and that by the conditions of those treaties the Imperial Government were obliged to close the door and refuse the offer—then the British people understood, as they had never understood before, the true character of those treaties, and thus there was secured the public opinion which enabled Her Majesty's Government to take the step from which in former years they had been obliged to shrink. I pointed out, Sir, that if we had simply failed to sustain our ground with respect to the application of the Belgian and German treaties, that the reciprocal character of our tariff entitled us to claim that the treaties did not apply, and that had been the whole story, there would have been some ground for the claim of hon. gentlemen opposite that our tariff policy in that respect had not been a success. But when we were able to show, as a direct and immediate result of the step which Canada had taken, that the denunciation of those treaties, which had been sought by the colonies for so long a time without success, was brought about, then I say the Government of Canada had a splendid vindication of the policy they had pursued on that question. We all know, Sir, with what joy the view taken by the Government of Canada was received by the English people. We know that while the Government of Canada was backed up, and promptly backed up, by the action of the sister colonies, it was backed up still more strongly by British public opinion; and but for that public opinion, which I claim was the direct outcome of the Canadian policy itself, those Belgian and German treaties would not have been denounced down to the present moment.

I have spoken of the effect of the Belgian and German treaties on our movement for preferential trade; and now I must say something with regard to another class of treaties, those commonly called favoured-nation treaties. Great Britain has treaties with many nations, containing what is called the favoured-nation clause, by the terms of which it is declared that if at any time Great Britain should grant to any third power any commercial advantages, she shall be obliged to grant those advantages likewise to the contracting power. When, therefore, by the action of Her Majesty's Government, it was determined that the Belgian and German treaties must apply to Canada, and that we must admit Belgian and German goods on terms as favourable as the goods of England, then it followed that by the terms of the favoured-nation treaties, we were obliged to concede like advantages to every one of the nations which had a treaty of that kind with the mother country. I have here a statement showing the several countries which have been brought under the operation of the Canadian preferential tariff:

Countries admitted by the reciprocal character of their tariff: New South Wales, British India, Netherlands, Japan.

Countries admitted under the Belgian and German treaties: Belgium and Germany.

Countries admitted under the favoured-nation treaties: France, Algeria and the French Colonies; Argentina, Austria, Hungary, Bolivia, Columbia, Denmark, Persia, Russia, Sweden and Norway, Tunis, Venezuela, Switzerland, Liberia, Morocco, Salvador, South African Republic, Tonga, Spain.

The case of France, Algeria and the French colonies was governed by our own Franco-Canadian Treaty, which had, of course, received the approval of the Canadian Parliament. In the other cases, the favoured-nation treaties had never received the approval of the Canadian Parliament; but they were nevertheless held to apply to Canada. Thus it will be seen that the preference which we wished to give and which we actually did give for several months to Great Britain, had to be extended to the countries I have named; and we refunded to importers duties which had been collected in the interim upon goods from those several countries.

But all this will come to an end at a very early day. At the end of July in the present year the Belgian and German treaties will expire. Canada will not then be obliged to give the preference to either Belgium or Germany.

With the fall of the treaties, the claims of other nations, under the favoured-nation treaties, to receive equal advantages will also fall. Canada will then be free to confine the benefits of her preferential tariff to the mother country and to such colonies as, in the judgment of Canada, should be admitted. That is, Mr. Speaker, what we can do, and that is precisely what I shall have the honour of proposing to the House. Under the terms of the preferential tariff, as it now stands, the second reduction of 12½ per cent, making 25 per cent in all, will take effect on the first of July next. For the moment, it will be necessary for us to give that greater reduction, not only to Great Britain, but to the various nations I have mentioned, because the treaties do not expire until the last day of July. We propose to repeal the section of the law and the schedule dealing with the preferential tariff. We propose that that repeal shall take effect on the first of August next, which will be the day when Canada will no longer be bound by the Belgian and German treaties, and we propose to substitute for the existing law on the subject a new section and schedule, in accordance with the statement I have made. This new section and this new schedule will provide that the preferential tariff shall, in the first place, apply to the products of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and also that it shall apply to the products of any British colony or possession, the tariff of which is deemed to be favourable to the trade of Canada. Under this provision, new South Wales and British India will be admitted, as they now are to the benefits of the preferential tariff. There will be a further provision respecting the operation of the preferential tariff, to which I shall refer as I proceed.

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. gentleman kindly say how the denunciation of the Belgian and German treaties affect the favoured-nation clause with regard to other countries?

Mr. FIELDING.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. By the favoured-nation clause we are obliged, as part of the Empire, to give to any country having a favoured-nation treaty with Great Britain any privilege which may be granted to any third power. Belgium and Germany are third powers within the meaning of these words. Therefore, when we were obliged, by the decision of the Imperial authorities, to give the privileges of the tariff to Belgium and Germany, these being third powers as respects all other nations, the favoured-nation treaties began to apply, and we had to extend the advantages to the several countries as well.

Mr. McNEILL. I think I did not make my question quite clear to my hon. friend. I was not asking with regard to Belgium and Germany, but with regard to other countries. For example, Holland had a right to come in under our reciprocal offer; would not all other nations having the favoured-nation clause in their treaties have the right to come in as soon as Holland was admitted, irrespective of Belgium and Germany altogether?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I see the hon. gentleman's point now. The point is, that having admitted Holland, we would be obliged, even irrespective of the German and Belgian treaties, to admit the other nations as well. That would be quite correct, but we could easily have refused to admit the goods of Holland, and then there would be no trouble. But we could not refuse to admit the goods of Belgium and Germany with the same freedom as we could the goods of Holland.

Mr. McNEILL. Does the hon. gentleman say that he could, in the face of his reciprocal offer of last session, have refused admission to the goods of Holland?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That, possibly, is a question upon which legal gentlemen might differ. I am strongly inclined to think that there was a measure of discretion remaining in the hands of the Government on that question. I will not say, however, that the question is beyond debate. I think, perhaps, there is room to doubt whether or not we were obliged to admit the goods of Holland. However that may be, Holland received the benefit of the doubt, and we did admit her goods. The hon. gentleman is quite right in stating that the moment any foreign nation, no matter by what method, received the benefits of our preferential clause, we were then obliged, under the Imperial decision to give every other nation having the favoured-nation clause in its treaty the same advantages.

I wish now to say something with regard to changes which may be deemed necessary in the present tariff. The Government have been gratified, and exceedingly gratified, by the manner in which the tariff policy of last year has been received by the country. We believe that that policy has given unbounded satisfaction. We did not make the mistake, and we do not make the mistake now, of supposing that the tariff is perfect. There are duties in it which are higher than some of us would like them to be. There are duties which we hope will not remain for ever or for a very long time. There has been, however, a very general recognition among the friends of the Government of the fact that, in a matter of this kind, it is necessary that we should proceed in the spirit of compromise. It was realized that, in a large question, affecting such a wide area of country, with so many conflicting interests, we could only hope to work out the details of the tariff by giving and taking, as respects the different sections of the country. It was recognized by the people that we ought to avoid, as we did, such radical changes as might be calculated to seriously disturb the business of the country. All these considerations, into which the Government were bound to enter, and which influenced the policy of the Government to a considerable extent, have been recognized by the public at large. I believe the people are reasonable in that respect, and will not ask us to make at once that which would be a radical change, and that which might have a disturbing influence on business. I think it will be admitted that frequent tariff changes are not desirable. Something in the nature of tariff stability is much to be desired. It is better, even, that we should bear with some inequalities that may exist, than suffer the greater evils which would arise from frequent tariff changes. We have had representations made by a number of interests which, they think, ought to receive more consideration. Some of these presented cases which have, to some extent, commended them to our judgment, and if we were opening up the general revision of the tariff, or a revision to any considerable extent, we would be able to lend a willing ear to some of the representations that have been made to us. But we think, Sir, on the whole, believing as we do that the changes in the tariff should not be numerous or frequent, believing that we should have a large measure of tariff stability, believing that the public understand the policy of the Government in this respect and will be content to have us carry it out in that spirit of moderation and caution that we have so far evinced, we wish to announce to the House that it is not our intention to make any numerous changes in the tariff at the present session. In fact, I may state that, so far as the rates of duty are concerned we have only one change to announce. There are some other changes which are more matters of form than of substance. The preferential tariff will have to be amended in the direction I have already indicated. We think it is expedient to make a change that is purely technical in the section of the law relating to prohibited goods. As respects the duty on raw leaf tobacco, which we imposed a year ago, we propose that, after the 1st July next, it shall be collected through the Department of Excise instead of through the Department of Customs. It has been arranged that in the Excise Department the duty shall be collected on a basis on what is called in the Inland Revenue Department the standard weight. Under the existing law, tobacco is dutiable on the weight when it passes through the customs. Arrangements have been made by some of the large manufacturers to dry tobacco before it passes out of the warehouse, so that they do not pay on the moist weight. Other manufacturers, not being so well able to do that, are obliged to pay on the moist weight. It seems only fair and equitable that we should treat all alike, and when it is to be dealt with by the Excise Department, that the regulations of that department should be adopted in the matter. With regard to the duties on tobacco, which were increased last year to a considerable extent, I am free to say that I have doubts that this is as wise a measure as we hoped it would prove. I may say frankly that I am afraid it has led to an increase of smuggling to a very considerable extent, and we may well consider, at a future day, whether or not we can successfully enforce so high a scale of duty. However, the law in that respect has been in force for a very short time, and we think it only reasonable to give it a fairer trial before we condemn it. So we do not propose to make any change with regard to tobacco except as I have just announced.

But, Sir, while it is a good thing to avoid what is called tariff tinkering, there is just a possibility that in condemning that practice we may go too far. I find that tariff tinkering is an expression which means different things in the minds of different men. A man who is quite satisfied with the tariff thinks that any interference with it is tinkering, whereas a man who is not satisfied thinks that some change such as he desires would be high statesmanship. We wish to guard against frequent changes in the tariff, against tariff tinkering, but let us be careful how we convey the impression to the public, because we do not mean it, that we regard the tariff as final. Let it not be supposed that the tariff is settled for ten years or even for five years. So long as there are high duties, there must be demands for tariff changes. Nothing is settled until it is settled in accordance with right, and so long as there are high duties, we may expect agitation for reduction. I am afraid there is no rest for the protected manufacturer. I am inclined to think, Sir, that he will find eternal vigilance to be the price of his protection. He must be on guard all the time against the attack that he knows must always come. So long as there are high duties, there will also be consumers to protest against them, and I think that the manufacturers will show the best understanding of their own position, and best consult the permanent interests of manufacturing enterprises, if they will realize that very important fact. It is well, if they are to-day in a position which affords them some comfort and advantage, that they should apply their time and use their opportunity to get their business upon such a basis that it will be as little as possible dependent upon tariff aid. The tendency of a high tariff policy is to lead men to look too much to tariff and too little to the efforts they should make for the benefit of their business. What a world of good might have been accomplished for the true interests of manufacturing in the Dominion of Canada, if all the time, and all the energy, and all the labour, and all the money that have been expended in the last twenty years in tariff watching and tariff wire-pulling at Ottawa, had been expended in the factories, in the development of business, in new invention and discovery, in producing labour-saving machinery, in learning what might be done with waste products, in dealing with all those forms of industrial progress which have to be dealt with by the manufacturer when he has keen competition. We would, therefore, say to the manufacturer that if he desires permanency in the tariff, he must never expect permanency until the tariff gets down to a moderate point; and to-day there are duties in the tariff so high that I am sure the Government are not prepared to treat them as part of a permanent tariff. I say this, Sir, in no spirit but that of friendliness to the manufacturing interests. While the manufacturers are in a fairly good position to-day, it would be a mistake for them to fail to realize the fact that Canada has turned her face away from a high tariff policy, and though we may proceed slowly, whatever progress we make from this time forward must be and should be in the direction of greater freedom of trade.

Hon. gentlemen have already observed that in the Imperial Parliament the Colonial Secretary, the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, made some reference to negotiations that were taking place between the Dominion of Canada, United States and the West Indies with regard to reciprocal trade. These negotiations, so far as Canada is concerned, have not gone very far, and we have not much to communicate to the House concerning them. But we are of opinion that, without waiting for the completion of these negotiations, without waiting for the development of all that is likely to arise in connection with that subject, there are opportunities opening to us to-day of which we should take advantage to enlarge the trade between Canada and the West Indies. We think that something of this kind should be attempted in the interest of Canadian trade, because there are large opportunities of development in that quarter. There are a million and three-quarters of people in the British West Indies, if we include Bermuda, who are our natural customers, with whom we should have more extended trade relations. When we remember that of the 330,000,000 pounds of sugar consumed in the Dominion of Canada, only 25,500,000 pounds come from the British West Indies, our natural customers, and that the remainder comes from other countries, largely from continental nations which supply us with beet sugar and take little or nothing from us, I think the House will agree with me that we ought to desire an extension of our trade with the West Indies and to consume to a larger extent the products of that country. If we were to put aside all other considerations, the advantages of trade with that country appeal so strongly to us that I am sure the House would desire us to make some special effort to extend our business in that quarter.

But there is another consideration which we may well take into our minds. The West India question to-day is one of the great problems of the Empire. In the olden days when sugar was king, when cane sugar was in great demand and at high price, the West India colonies were among the most prosperous colonies of the Empire. But times have changed in that respect, to some extent, and the West Indies are suffering to-day from a very severe depression. What the causes of that depression are, may possibly be a subject of contention, to some extent. It is alleged that the depression is the result of a failure on the part of the West India planters to live up to the times, and to improve their methods of growing and their methods of treating sugar. I give that as one reason which is sometimes alleged against them, not that I endorse the opinion. There is no doubt whatever that another condition has operated very largely against them, and that is the development of the beet sugar industry, particularly in the case of the continental nations where bounties are given. The West Indies claim that as respects the conflict between cane sugar and beet sugar, the West Indies could hold their own but for the difficulty which is created by the bounty system of Europe, notably of the various continental nations. Just how far that is correct is perhaps a matter upon which none of us can give a conclusive opinion. What we do know, however, is that these million and a half to a million and three-quarters of people in those islands, are suffering a very severe depression. Their finances are in a bad position, the business of the islands is in a bad position, the condition of the West Indies is at this moment a very serious subject to the people of the colonies, and a very grave problem for the Imperial Government and the Imperial Parliament. So keenly has this matter been felt of late, that a few months ago a royal commission was appointed by Her Majesty to inquire into the condition of the British West India colonies. That commission was composed of General Sir Henry Norman, Chairman, Sir David Barbour and Sir Edward Grey. These gentlemen made a very exhaustive inquiry into the condition of the West Indies, and they reached conclusions, some of which were unanimous, and some of which were matters of division. It was agreed that the financial position of the West Indies was so embarrassed that the Imperial Government would have to grant aid in the way of loans and grants for public works, and that, I may say, is being done at this moment by measures which are before the Imperial Parliament. The chairman of the commission, Sir Henry Norman, went further. He claimed that they were not likely to be successful in dealing with the West India question unless they were prepared to adopt a policy of countervailing duties, that is to say, that wherever a continental nation granted a bounty upon its beet sugar, there should be a countervailing duty upon that sugar if imported into Great Britain. That subject has been very much discussed in Great Britain. I do not think the advocates of countervailing duties there are very numerous, but they are certainly very intelligent, able and influential, and an impression existed in the minds of many people that Her Majesty's Government would yield to the recommendation of Sir Henry Norman and establish countervailing duties. However, any doubt that might have existed on that score has been removed of late by a speech delivered at Liverpool by the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Chamberlain. In that speech he indicated that the British Government were not prepared to accept the remedy of countervailing duties, but that they would seek in other ways to assist the position of the West Indies. I have already stated that measures are before the Imperial Parliament now to give aid in the shape of grants and loans for public works. It is also the desire of Her Majesty's Government to assist the West Indies in other ways. Efforts are being made to induce the West India people in some of the islands to give up the growing of sugar, and devote their attention to other products which it is thought the islands will successfully produce and no doubt something will be done in that direction. While the production of sugar has been steadily falling off, the production of other articles, chiefly fruits, has been very largely extended. Still, sugar is and must be the chief product of the West Indies for the present and for a long time to come; and unless there can be a profitable market for the sugar of the West Indies, I am afraid there is not very much hope of the relief which the West Indies desire being obtained. Knowing as we do that Her Majesty's Government are following this question very closely, knowing that they are dealing with a serious problem in the face of many difficulties, it has occurred to us that, as the West Indies are our natural market, as they are British colonies, though far away in one respect, colonies with which we have close relations, that we have some Imperial responsibilities in this matter—it has occurred to us that we should be willing in a small way to lend a helping hand to those colonies in the sunny south. If we adhere too rigidly to the underlying feature of our preferential tariff, I am afraid we shall have to admit that the terms of the tariffs of the West Indies are not favourable to us, and perhaps we could not by a mere reciprocal clause extend the preferential tariff to the West Indies.

We have examined the tariff of the West Indies, and we find that while they are high tariffs to a considerable extent, they are in no sense protective tariffs. The duties imposed are largely on food products, and these, as we can well understand, are the very things that Canada might hope to sell. I have here a statement which I shall summarize, if my hon. friends will permit me to do so, showing the operation of these West India tariffs on some of the chief products of Canada:

I think it cannot be contended that in any case these are protective duties. They are not designed to exclude the products of Canada, or indeed to exclude the products of any country, but those people find that the necessities of their revenue oblige them to tax food products very heavily. Therefore, as I said a moment ago, were we to apply too rigidly the principle of our preferential tariff to those colonies, I am inclined to think we could not properly admit them to the benefit of that tariff. Nevertheless, in view of the condition of affairs which exists there to-day, in view of our own desire to extend our trade relations with the West Indies, in view of the difficulties which are presented in the treatment of the question by Her Majesty's Government, and with a desire to assist in some small and modest way in working out these great and difficult problems, we propose that without waiting for anything further, without demanding concessions from our West India friends which their needs might not allow them to grant, without insisting upon a rigid compliance with the conditions, we propose, after the first day of August, when the treaties expire, and when we can give full play to our policy of preferential trade, to extend that policy to all the British colonies in the West Indies.

The principal imports to be expected from the West Indies will of course be sugar, but we may expect other things, and notably fruits. On the other hand, we should be able largely to increase our sales of Canadian products to those islands. The maritime provinces have long carried on a trade with those islands, chiefly in fish and lumber, though other products have been sold as well. If we increase our purchases of West India sugars, as we hope to do, there is no reason to doubt that our exports in these lines will be increased. But, Sir, we do not think this trade should be confined to the maritime provinces; there does not seem to be any reason why the products of the province of Ontario and the great west should not find a large market in the West Indies. If we look into the statistics of the islands we will find that the West Indies are large consumers of food products such as we raise in Canada, but we find that the bulk of those products are being received from the United States. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce says, through the United States. There is something in that point; but I think the great bulk of the food products for the West Indies are the products of the United States as well as having been shipped from the United States. There does not seem to be any good reason why the flour, cheese, bacon, ham, lard, butter, and the various articles which the farmers of Ontario and the west produce could not have as fair a chance of sale in the markets of the West Indies as similar products from the United States. There has been a difficulty in the past, I think, through lack of attention to these markets. Sometimes a merchant, with an unsaleable stock, thinks it a very simple thing to dump it on the West Indies market, and then he complains that he has not made any money on it. You cannot do business in the West Indies or anywhere else in that way. Our producers must realize that in order to sell their goods in the West Indies they must ascertain the conditions of the market and adapt themselves to these conditions. But surely there is no reason why the farmers and merchants of Canada cannot adapt themselves to those markets just as well as the farmers and merchants of the United States. We believe if care be taken to investigate the market, if care be taken in collecting the right articles as to quality, in sending them out at the proper time and in the manner of packing them, taking care that the quality is what the West Indian market wants and the style of package is what is required, there is a fair chance of very considerable extension of Canadian trade in that quarter. For some years we have had two steamship lines running to the West Indies; one from Halifax to Jamaica, and the other from St. John and Halifax to Georgetown, Demerara, which is on the mainland of South America. But the line from Halifax and St. John down to Demerara is by a route involving so many ports of call that by the time the destination is reached the voyage is a very long one, and the importers at the distant points claim they have not the same opportunity to trade with Canada as with the United States. It is very desirable, if it can be accomplished, and though we have no proposal to make on the subject to-day we hope something of the kind will be brought about, that a quick and direct line from Canada, not calling at all these way ports, but calling at Barbadoes, Trinidad and British Guiana, may be established. If attention be given to this trade in the way suggested, we have a strong hope, from inquiries made, that a very considerable trade will be built up in that direction. Whether we are successful in doing so or not, one thing is certain, namely, that the present condition of the West Indies and the Canadian West India trade demands that some effort should be made on these lines, and we think the best we can do for the people of the West Indies is to say: We will give you the benefit of our preferential tariff, without bargain or anything else, and we do not expect you to make very great concessions to us; but if any means can be devised whereby obstacles to Canadian trade can be removed in that quarter, we have no doubt that you, our brother colonists, will meet us in the same spirit as we desire to meet you.

There is another direction in which we think we can do a little to help the people of the West Indies. The present method of levying the sugar duties in Canada operates unfavourably to the sugar trade with the West Indies. The duty is a flat specific duty of one-half cent per pound on raw sugar. It admits of very large variations and very large injustices. A sugar testing by the polariscope at 75 degrees is worth 86c. per 100 lbs., and 50c. duty represents 58 per cent. Sugar testing 96 degrees is worth \$2.27 per 100 lbs.; 50c. duty represents 22 per cent, as against 58 per cent on the lower grade. I do not pretend that we can have absolute equality in these matters, but it will be admitted that the system of levying duties operates unequally. We had for some years in Canada the polariscope test, and I learn from the customs authorities and from all whom I have asked information, that it worked very well. Then, for several years raw sugar was free. In 1895, $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound was levied. I am not informed, of course, as to what was in the mind of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) when he levied it. It was probably levied in a hurry, without much thought being given to it, and it has operated unfairly. The duty was a small one, and I can readily understand that one might imagine that there could not be very much inequality in applying it. But experience has shown that even with half a cent a pound there is inequality of duty against sugars of the lower grades, and a considerable quantity of the West India sugars is not of high grade.

When we deal with food products generally, it is not desirable to encourage low grades, and for that reason a specific duty on food is advocated by some hon. gentlemen who do not believe in specific duties in other cases; but I call attention to the fact that raw sugar, especially of low grades, is not a food, and is not likely to be eaten. Raw sugar is a raw material which only becomes a food after it is refined, and therefore we have no particular desire to legislate against it. Inasmuch as there is a considerable quantity of low grade sugar, not so low as 75 degrees, but of moderately low grades, on the market, it is not the business of Canada to turn away the trade which this sugar offers. While our tariff is operating in that way, the tariff of the United States is graduated so as to encourage the trade in these low grade sugars. They have adopted the polariscope test, and the effect is to establish a graduated scale of duties whereby low grades pay in proportion to their value. The polariscope system is practically under another name an ad valorem duty; low grade sugar pays its proportion and high grade pays according to its value.

We therefore propose to return to the polariscope system used in Canada so successfully a few years ago. We propose to begin at the limit of 75 degrees by polariscope test and charge for that degree or anything below it a duty of 40c. per 100 lbs., and we add $\frac{1}{2}$ c. for each additional degree. The average test of raw sugar used in Canada to-day is, so far as we can obtain information, 92 degrees by the polariscope. That information come from the refiners, who possess the best knowledge; one gave 91 $\frac{1}{2}$ and the other 92 degrees. Assuming that to be the correct average, and applying our new scale of duties to the present consumption of sugar in Canada, we find that on 92-degree sugar the duty will be 65 $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per 100 lbs., as against 50c. per 100 lbs. under the present tariff.

In the early part of my remarks, I stated that in consequence of the reduction we are obliged to make in duties on British imports after 1st July, and to maintain our finances in a strong condition, we want to make some material additions to our revenue in some other quarters, and we propose to do it in the way of making a small increase in the duties on sugar, although the duties we propose will be very much less than those which prevailed in Canada a few years ago. At 92, if we take that as proper standard, the duty shall be 65 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents per 100 pounds. But there must be considered in that connection the preferential tariff to which I have referred, and which will take effect as regards the West India sugar after the 1st day of August next. If we apply that preferential tariff to the 65 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents per 100 pounds, the quarter of it under the preferential rate will be 16 $\frac{37}{50}$ ths, which will leave the preferential rate at 49 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents as against the existing rate of 50 cents per 100 pounds. That is to say, upon so much of our sugar consumption as we may be able to obtain from the British West Indies under the new order of things there will be no increase, but on the contrary there will be a slight reduction of duty, it being—if the average as given to me is correct—49 $\frac{1}{2}$ as against 50 in the present tariff. But as respects that portion of the sugar which may not come from the West Indies, but which may come from other countries there will of course be the small increase I have mentioned.

Mr. WALLACE. It must be the production of the West Indies; not only sent from there but produced there.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Oh, yes; certainly. In the case of fractions of a degree we propose that where a fraction is five-tenths or less it shall not count, but where it is more than five-tenths it shall count as a degree, so that for the purpose of revenue we will have no fractions, not even to the extent of half a degree.

The effect of this upon the revenue is a very difficult question to deal with and we can only guess at it. It depends entirely upon how much sugar may come in under the preferential rate. Upon all sugar that may come in from the West Indies under the preferential rate we will receive no increase whatever, but will receive a little less duty than under the present tariff ; but for whatever may come in from other countries we will receive an increase to the extent of 15½ cents per 100 pounds. We think it will give us a moderate amount of revenue. One can only guess at how much revenue it will give, because we have no means of knowing as to what proportion of West India sugar will be drawn into our markets by this arrangement. Our hope and desire is that we shall largely increase the consumption of West Indies sugar. As I mentioned a moment ago, our consumption of sugar is 330,000,000 pounds out of which we receive at present only 25,500,000 pounds from the British West Indies and British Guiana, but we trust that the effect of this arrangement may be to largely increase that. If our anticipations in that respect are realized, we will of course get no increase of duty from that source but will actually get a little less. However, upon so much of the sugar as may not come from the West Indies, we will get an increase to the extent of 15½ cents per 100 pounds.

With respect to the duty on refined sugar, we propose to apply the polariscope to that also. In the case of raw sugar we take as our starting point 75 degrees, but in the case of refined sugar we take as a matter of course a higher starting point.

We propose that the duty on refined sugar shall be $1.08 cents per 100 pounds on sugar testing 88 degrees, or anything below that ; and for every additional degree there will be 1½ cents per 100 pounds added, just as in the case of the duty on raw sugar. On what is called yellow sugar testing 88 degrees, the increase of duty under this arrangement will be 8 cents per 100 pounds ; although the increased duty on the raw material, or so much of it as may come from other countries than the West Indies, will be considerably in excess. If you start at $1.08 for 88 degrees, and if you add 1½ cents for each degree, you will find that the granulated at 99½ will bear a duty of $1.24½ per 100 pounds as against the $1 duty of the present day. That is to say, the increase of the duty on the refined sugar will vary from one-twelfth of a cent per pound on the yellow or soft sugars, running up on granulated as high as 24½ cents per 100 pounds, or practically on the higher and more valuable sugar an increase of a quarter of a cent per pound ; while in the case of the cheaper refined sugars the increase will be about 8 cents per 100 pounds and upwards.

I have now explained all the tariff changes which we propose to make. I want now to read, with your permission, Sir, the new preferential section and schedule :

That it is expedient to provide that section seventeen of "The Customs Tariff, 1897" shall be repealed on and after the first day of August in the present year, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, and that the following section shall be substituted therefor :—

17. Articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of any of the following countries may, when imported direct into Canada from any of such countries, be entered for duty or taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada at the reduced rate of duty provided in the British preferential tariff, set forth in Schedule "D" to this Act :—

- (a). The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.
- (b). The British Colony of Bermuda.
- (c). The British Colonies commonly called the British West Indies, including the following :—
 - The Bahamas.
 - Jamaica.
 - Turks Island and the Caicos Islands.
 - The Leeward Islands (Antigua, St. Christopher-Nevis, Dominica, Montserrat, and the Virgin Islands).
 - The Windward Islands (Grenada, St. Vincent and St. Lucia).
 - Barbadoes.
 - Trinidad and Tobago.
 - British Guiana.

These colonies are admitted specifically without regard to any reciprocal conditions.

- (d). Any other British colony or possession the customs tariff of which, on the whole, is as favourable to Canada as the British preferential tariff herein referred to is to such colony or possession.

Provided, however, that manufactured articles to be admitted under such preferential tariff shall be bona fide the manufactures of a country or countries entitled to the benefits of such tariff, and that such benefits shall not extend to the importation of articles into the production of which there has not entered a substantial portion of the labour of such countries. Any question that may arise as to any article being entitled to such benefits shall be decided by the Minister of Customs, whose decision shall be final.

2. The Minister of Customs, with the approval of the Governor in Council, shall determine what British colonies or possessions shall be entitled to the benefits of the preferential tariff under clause (d) of this section.

3. The Minister of Customs may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, make such regulations as may be deemed necessary for carrying out the intention of this section.

You will see, Sir, that under the arrangement proposed we admit by name the products of Great Britain and the products of the British colonies in the West Indies ; and then we have a general clause whereby we may admit the products of any other British colony the tariff conditions of which are deemed to be favourable to Canada. Under that clause we will admit at once the products of New South Wales and the products of British India ; and if the tariffs of any other colonies are or shall be made favourable and satisfactory to Canada, the same benefit may be extended to them. I shall move :

That it is expedient to provide that Schedule "D" to "The Customs Tariff, 1897," shall be repealed on and after the first day of August in the present year, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, and that the following schedule shall be substituted therefor :—

SCHEDULE "D."

BRITISH PREFERENTIAL TARIFF.

On articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of any British colony or possession entitled to the benefits of this preferential tariff under section seventeen, the duties mentioned in Schedule "A" shall be reduced as follows:—The reduction shall be one-fourth of the duty mentioned in Schedule "A," and the duty to be levied, collected and paid shall be three-fourths of the duty mentioned in Schedule "A."

Provided, however, that this reduction shall not apply to any of the following articles, and that such articles shall in all cases be subject to the duties mentioned in Schedule "A," viz.:—wines, malt liquors, spirits, spirituous liquors, liquid medicines and articles containing alcohol; tobacco, cigars and cigarettes.

Provided further, that the reduction shall only apply to refined sugar when evidence satisfactory to the Minister of Customs is furnished that such refined sugar has been manufactured wholly from raw sugar produced in the British colonies or possessions.

That is to say, that inasmuch as we would not admit foreign sugar in its raw state under our preferential tariff, we will not admit the refined sugar made from that raw sugar; but if any sugar is refined in countries entitled to the benefit of this preference, from sugar grown not only in the West Indies, but anywhere in the British possessions, that refined sugar shall be admitted into Canada on the terms of the preferential tariff.

As we look back, Mr. Speaker, on the events of the past year, we have much cause for gratification, and when we turn to the future we find it bright and encouraging. The signs that meet us everywhere in Canada are those of peace, progress and prosperity. The one question which seriously threatened the harmony of our people and the good-will which should prevail between our citizens of different creeds—a question which a few months ago was a burning one and a cause of great anxiety—has been so happily settled that now it is scarcely mentioned. At no time in the history of the Dominion have the people been more united, more harmonious, and more hopeful and confident respecting the future of our country. In the centres of manufactures, trade and commerce, there is an activity which tells of confidence in the present and in the future. The great agricultural interests, which are the foundation of our country's prosperity, are on a better footing than for many years past. Encouraged to produce not only for the home markets but for the markets of the world, our farmers everywhere are applying themselves to their work with intelligence and skill. The ships which have come to our seaports during the past year, are insufficient to carry the increasing volume of commerce, and the shipwrights of the world are busy in constructing new vessels for this trade. Our long delayed canal enlargements are being pressed forward to early completion, and give promise of affording increased facilities for the transportation of the products of the great west to our shipping ports. Railway enterprises east and west are actively assisting in the good work. The fishermen of our Atlantic and Pacific coasts continue to reap the rich harvest of the sea. In all directions we find an extraordinary development of the mineral wealth of the Dominion. The powerful magnet of gold, which is found in several quarters of the Dominion, is doing much to attract capital and population. The new mines in the province of Ontario give promise of great development and profit. In the east, the mines of Nova Scotia, which have been working with considerable success for many years, are to-day giving most satisfactory results, and new discoveries are constantly being made. In the west, the province of British Columbia is steadily growing in fame as a rich mining country. The northern regions of our Dominion, which were long regarded as of little value, have become sources of boundless wealth. A few years ago, as I sat at the breakfast table in a Paris hotel, I was addressed by a neighbour, of whose nationality there could be no doubt. "Sir," he said, "from what part of our little Republic might you be?" I answered that I was not from his "little Republic" but from the greater one to the north. My friend was puzzled for a moment, and I had to remind him that the greater part of the North American Continent did not belong to his "little Republic," but was under the British flag. "Well, sir," he said triumphantly, "we do not claim to own the ice house." These great northern regions, which my American friend described so contemptuously as "the ice house," are to-day counted among the famous lands of the world. The "Yukon" and "Klondike" are world-wide names, and the land through which these rivers run is attracting to itself many thousands of people from the great centres of civilization. In nearly every department of industry in Canada there is activity and confidence.

We are not foolish enough to claim that all this has been brought about by our policy, although we are well aware that if the results had been the reverse, the blame, justly or unjustly, would have rested upon our shoulders. We are well aware, and we gratefully recognize the fact, that the prosperity that has come to Canada is due to the liberality of a kind Providence in giving us a bountiful harvest. One thing we do claim, and all we claim, as respects our policy, is that so far as legislative measures may help to encourage and strengthen a people, such has been the result of the action we have taken. Against the representations of our opponents we place the record of the past year, and the judgment of the Empire at large. Never was a tariff policy submitted to Parliament, which was received with greater satisfaction by the people of Canada, than that which was announced a year ago. Never in the history of the British colonies was a measure proposed which in so large a degree commanded the interest and received the approval of Great and Greater Britain. It was hailed with joy by the friends of British Imperial unity in every land. It was commended by Her Majesty in her Speech from the Throne in the Parliament at Westminster. It was the subject of thousands of articles of the most commendatory character, in the British and colonial press. Rudyard Kipling, the poet of the Empire, was quick to feel the wave of sentiment that passed over Great Britain, and within a few hours from the announcement of the tariff, he embalmed the subject in spirited lines which will live in the history of Canada, and which, even if, as some have thought, they may convey inaccurate impressions as to the coldness of our climate, will, nevertheless, tell to every reader that in 1897 the heart of "Our Lady of the Snows" was full of warmth and devotion to the interests of the Empire. British statesmen, both publicly and privately, expressed their satisfaction with Canada's action. The Colonial Secretary, the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, in an official despatch to His Excellency the Governor General, which I shall place on the Table, a despatch communicating the decision of Her Majesty's Ministers respecting the effect of the Belgian and German treaties—used some words which I may properly quote here :

"I desire," said Mr. Chamberlain, "to add, in conclusion, that the action of the Dominion Government and Parliament in this matter, although, unfortunately, its full effect will be temporarily postponed, has been warmly welcomed and appreciated by Her Majesty's Government and the people of this country as a measure which cannot fail to result in material benefit to the mother country and to Canada, and to weld together still more firmly the ties which now unite them."

Sir, the policy which Her Majesty's Government so warmly commended, was a policy designed to establish preferential trade between Canada and the mother country. To-day we submit a proposal which enlarges the sphere of that preferential trade. To-day we propose to include within its benefits a large group of British colonies, the affairs of which are at this moment a cause of much anxiety to Her Majesty's Government. Thus step by step the good work goes on. One step remains to be taken, and I believe the day is not far distant when we shall be able to take it—a step which will extend the benefits of the preference, not only to Great Britain and the colonies which we have now included, but to every colony and possession of the Empire.

The following are the resolutions :—

1. That it is expedient to repeal section six of "The Customs Tariff, 1897," and to substitute the following section therefor :—

6. The importation into Canada of any goods enumerated, described or referred to in Schedule "C" to this Act is prohibited; and any such goods imported shall thereby become forfeited to the Crown and may be destroyed or otherwise dealt with as the Minister of Customs may direct; and any person importing any such prohibited goods, or causing or permitting them to be imported, shall for each offence incur a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars.

2. That it is expedient to provide that section seventeen of "The Customs Tariff, 1897," shall be repealed on and after the first day of August in the present year, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, and that the following section shall be substituted therefor :—

17. Articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of any of the following countries may, when imported direct into Canada from any of such countries, be entered for duty or taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada at the reduced rate of duty provided in the British preferential tariff set forth in Schedule "D" to this Act :—

- (a). The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.
- (b). The British Colony of Bermuda.
- (c). The British Colonies commonly called the British West Indies, including the following :—

The Bahamas.

Jamaica.

Turks Island and the Caicos Islands.

The Leeward Islands (Antigua, St. Christopher-Nevis, Dominica, Monserrat, and the Virgin Islands).

The Windward Islands (Grenada, St. Vincent and St. Lucia).

Barbadoes

Trinidad and Tobago.

British Guiana.

- (d). Any other British Colony or possession the customs tariff of which, on the whole, is as favourable to Canada as the British preferential tariff herein referred to is to such colony or possession.

Provided, however, that manufactured articles to be admitted under such preferential tariff shall be bona fide the manufactures of a country or countries entitled to the benefits of such tariff, and that such benefits shall not extend to the importation of articles into the production of which there has not entered a substantial portion of the labour of such countries. Any question that may arise as to any articles being entitled to such benefits shall be decided by the Minister of Customs, whose decision shall be final.

2. The Minister of Customs, with the approval of the Governor in Council, shall determine what British colonies or possessions shall be entitled to the benefits of the preferential tariff under clause (d) of this section.

3. The Minister of Customs may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, make such regulations as may be deemed necessary for carrying out the intention of this section.

4. That it is expedient to provide that Schedule "D" to "The Customs Tariff, 1897," shall be repealed on and after the first day of August in the present year, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, and that the following schedule shall be substituted therefor :—

SCHEDULE "D."

BRITISH PREFERENTIAL TARIFF.

On articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of any British colony or possession entitled to the benefits of this preferential tariff under section seventeen, the duties mentioned in Schedule "A" shall be reduced as follows:—The reduction shall be one-fourth of the duty mentioned in Schedule "A," and the duty to be levied, collected and paid shall be three-fourths of the duty mentioned in Schedule "A."

Provided, however, that this reduction shall not apply to any of the following articles, and that such articles shall in all cases be subject to the duties mentioned in Schedule "A," viz.: wines, malt liquors, spirits spirituous liquors, liquid medicines and articles containing alcohol; tobaccos, cigars and cigarettes.

Provided further that the reduction shall apply only to refined sugar when evidence satisfactory to the Minister of Customs is furnished that such refined sugar has been manufactured wholly from raw sugar produced in the British colonies or possessions.

5. That it is expedient to repeal items 435 and 436 of schedule "A" to "The Customs Tariff, 1897," and to substitute the following therefor:—

435. All sugar above number sixteen Dutch standard in colour, and all refined sugars of whatever kinds, grades or standards, testing not more than eighty-eight degrees by the polariscope, one dollar and eight cents per one hundred pounds, and for each additional degree one and one-half cents per one hundred pounds. Fractions of five-tenths of a degree less not to be subject to duty, and fractions of more than five-tenths to be dutiable as a degree.

436. Sugar, n.e.s., not above number sixteen Dutch standard in colour, sugar drainings or pumpings drained in transit, melado or concentrated melado, tank bottoms and sugar concrete, testing not more than seventy-five degrees by the polariscope, forty cents per one hundred pounds, and for each additional degree one and one-half cents per one hundred pounds. Fractions of five-tenths of a degree or less not to be subject to duty, and fractions of more than five-tenths to be dutiable as a degree. The usual packages in which imported to be free.

6. That it is expedient to provide that items 445 and 446 of Schedule "A" to "The Customs Tariff Act, 1897," shall be repealed on and after the first day of July in the present year, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight.

7. That it is expedient to provide that on and after the first day of July, in the present year, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, the following items shall be added to Schedule "B" to "The Customs Tariff, 1897":—

636. Tobacco, unmanufactured, for excise purposes, under conditions of the Inland Revenue Act.

8. That it is expedient to provide that on and after the first day of July, in the present year, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, in addition to the excise duties at present levied on manufactured tobacco, cigars and cigarettes, there shall be levied and collected the following excise duties, that is to say:—

(a.) On all foreign raw leaf tobacco, unstemmed, taken out of warehouse for manufacture, in any cigar or tobacco manufactory, ten cents per pound.

(b.) On all foreign raw leaf tobacco, stemmed, taken out of warehouse for manufacture, in any cigar or tobacco manufactory, fourteen cents per pound.

Mr. FIELDING.

Provided that the weight upon which such duty shall be computed shall be with reference to the standard mentioned in paragraph (c) of section 247 of the Inland Revenue Act.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have been asked by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), who is suffering from rather severe indisposition, to move the adjournment of the debate. I have already mentioned the subject to the hon. gentleman who is leading the Government, and he has been kind enough to agree to this course being taken, as for obvious reasons it would be inconvenient to break the order of debate which usually takes place when the ex-Finance Minister discusses the features of the Budget as exposed by the Minister of Finance. In his behalf, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). There is no objection to this motion. We regret the cause very much, we regret the indisposition of the hon. member, but as arranged with my hon. friend, there will be no objection to adjourning the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I suppose if my hon. friends opposite have received as much information as they can very well digest, even though it may have been somewhat sweetened by the concluding paragraphs of my hon. friend's speech, and under those circumstances I would best consult their wishes and the views of my friends behind me by moving that the House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 9.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 6th April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ANCIENT ORDER OF FORESTERS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 113) to incorporate a Subsidiary Court of the Ancient Order of Foresters in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand that the 49th Rule was suspended in this case by a previous motion.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DUTY ON PULP MILL MACHINERY.

Mr. FOSTER (by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked,

Has the Chicoutimi Pulp Mill been permitted to import and use in their factory machinery without the payment of duty? If so, has this been done on a general system which is to be extended to other like companies? What is the amount of duty so held in suspense, if any?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Machinery for the Chicoutimi Pulp Mill was permitted to be entered in bond for three months during the construction of the mill and pending examination by a customs appraiser from the port of Quebec. The arrangement was only temporary and was a special one, made owing to exceptional circumstances. The time has elapsed and payment of duty has been demanded. The amount of duty held in suspense is $2,137.

QUEEN'S PRINTER.

Mr. COPP asked,

Who is the Queen's Printer or deputy head of the Printing and Stationery Department? When was he employed? What profession or calling did he follow previous to his appointment? Is he a practical printer?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The Queen's Printer and Controller of Stationery is Mr. Samuel Edward Dawson, Doctor-in-Letters of Laval University and Fellow of the Royal Society of Canada. He was appointed on 7th November, 1891. From early youth he has been continuously engaged in publishing, importing, manufacturing and selling printed books; in dealing in paper and manufacturing blank books and other manufactures of paper. From 1862 to 1889 he was head of the publishing house of Dawson Brothers of Montreal. His practical knowledge of printing is derived from his experience as a publisher of books, and from twenty-five years' experience as the principal of a very large factory in Montreal. In that factory every kind of printed matter was made up—editions of printed works, pamphlets and forms of all kinds, as well as every kind of blank books. He is not a practical printer in the sense of having been a compositor or an apprentice to the trade.

MANITOBA SCHOOLS.

Mr. BERGERON (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

1. Has a document concerning the Manitoba schools been presented to His Holiness the Pope, or to the Sacred Propaganda, signed Wilfrid Laurier?

2. If so, could such document be put before Parliament, and will the Government bring it down?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I am not aware that any such document has been presented to His Holiness the Pope.

MR. A. H. HARRIS AND THE INTER-COLONIAL.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

1. What is the position of Mr. A. H. Harris on the Intercolonial Railway system?
2. Is he independent of the general manager?
3. What are his instructions?
4. May he fix rates without first obtaining the sanction of the Minister of Railways and Canals thereto?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:—

1. Mr. A. H. Harris's position on the Canadian Government railway system is General Traffic Manager.
2. No, he is not independent of the general manager.
3. To devote his attention to the traffic generally in consultation with, and under the direction of the general manager.
4. Yes.

THE DEPUTY MINISTER OF JUSTICE.

Mr. COPP asked,

Who is the Deputy Minister of Justice? When and by whom appointed? What salary did he receive for the years 1895, 1896 and 1897? Has he received any additional salary or remuneration since 23rd June, 1896? If so, how much, and for what services?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The Deputy Minister of Justice is Mr. Edmund Leslie Newcombe, Q.C., appointed Deputy Minister by Order in Council, 13th March, 1893. His annual salary is $4,000. He has received no additional salary or remuneration since June 23rd, 1896.

NEUFRAGE POND, P.E.I.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) asked,

Has the Government or Minister of Public Works received a petition from the inhabitants of Neufrage, Prince Edward Island, asking that a survey be made at an early day of Neufrage Pond, with a view of having a harbour opened there? Is it the intention of the Government to grant the request of said petition, if received?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I received a petition within the last three days of the nature referred to in the question asked by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald, King's); and, as it related to a matter in the Public Works Department, I referred it to my hon. colleague, Mr. Tarte, with the request that he should have the facts examined into and, if possible, brought before Council.

MR. JUSTICE WEATHERBE.

Mr. ROCHE asked,

1. Is Mr. Justice Weatherbe, of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, absent from that province by permission of the Government or the Department of Justice ?

2. Did the said Mr. Justice Weatherbe, before his departure, apply to the Government or Department of Justice for leave of absence ?

3. If so, what is the date of the said application, and for what period did he apply for leave to be absent from duty ?

4. Was his application granted, and if so, to what date does it extend ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). In answer to the hon. gentleman I may say that leave was granted Mr. Justice Weatherbe by Order in Council of January 12th, 1898. The answer to the second question is : Yes. The answer to the third question is : Application, dated January 5th, 1898, asking for five months leave ; and to the fourth : Yes, to June 12th, 1898.

COLOURED EMPLOYEES ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to refer to a matter of very great importance to a great many people in this Dominion, and more particularly to myself and other members from the western part of Ontario, with reference to an article that appeared in the Chatham "Planet," the Conservative organ in the city of Chatham. This article is headed : "Have no use for them—Coloured men on the Intercolonial Railway all fired—Premier Laurier promised them fair-play and then they were dismissed—Examples of his preaching and performance." And it goes on to say :

The Liberal leaders at Ottawa seem to have completely lost their heads, and the latest move of Intercolonial management, while hard to explain, is only consistent with the action of men utterly unable to deal with the weighty matters of government which have temporarily devolved on them. It is the old story of Grit professions and practices being inconsistent with each other, for while Premier Laurier speaks in the most flattering manner of the African race, his officials strike them down in a most brutal way, no complaint, no investigation—just kick them out. What have Mr. Campbell, M.P., and Mr. McGregor, M.P., to say to this action ?

The article then goes on to quote an article supposed to have been printed in the Halifax "Herald" giving the names of porters on the Intercolonial Railway who, it alleges, were dismissed without warning.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) to this—that if he proposes to do more than ask a question, it will be necessary for him to make a motion—

Mr. CAMPBELL. If I get out of order, Mr. Speaker, I will put myself in order, by making a motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point is very plain. If the hon. gentleman is going beyond asking a question, he must conclude with a motion.

Mr. ROCHE.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will conclude with a motion. Immediately this article appeared, my attention and the attention of the members from Nova Scotia, was called to it. The hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Russell) immediately took the matter up, and he has handed me to-day a letter from Mr. L. B. Archibald, superintendent of the parlour car service on the Intercolonial Railway, and a good Conservative as well. I desire to read what Mr. Archibald says in reference to this matter. The letter is dated Halifax, March 30th, 1898 :

A great outcry has been made here lately by the "Herald" and "Mail" about the dismissal of coloured men from the service. Now for the facts. Now, as you are aware, our service is much larger in summer than in winter, and we drop the men as soon as we have no work for them. At the first of last month, when the dining cars were put on, we only had five sleeping car porters regularly employed, and they were running between Halifax and Montreal. Their names were : Joseph H. Berry, Thomas Arthurs, Jas. Daniels, Charles Dixon, Thos. Wilson (under suspension, and his place filled by R. L. Johnston). Owing to the buffets in the sleeping cars between Halifax and Montreal being discontinued, it was decided to run only one man on each sleeping car (the conductor). The parties affected by the change were provided for as follows :—Joseph H. Berry, given a position in dining car, in charge of the lunch counter, former salary $35 per month and finding himself, now given $20 per month and board ; Thos. Arthurs, same as above ; Jas. Daniels, same as above. These men did not lose a day's time. Charles Dixon was given a place in dining car as above, ran a few trips and resigned of his own account to better his position. Thos. A. Wilson, as stated above, was under suspension, and as it had been his third offence in a short time, no offer of service was made to him. R. L. Johnston, who was filling Wilson's place, was a temporary man and belonged to Toronto, his family living there. Thomas Johnston, the last coloured man taken on, on your recommendation, was given a place as assistant cook at $25 per month and found. While on the sleeping car he had only been getting by our rules $20 and finding himself. Another temporary employee, Charles Pinhero, was offered a similar position, and threw up the job on account of not being able physically for the work. He is employed as occasion requires at $20 per month. I trust you will always give me a hearing when complaints are made.

Yours very truly,

L. B. ARCHIBALD.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that sufficiently answers the charge, the unfounded and unwarranted charge, that was made in the Halifax "Herald," and which has been copied widely by the Conservative papers of this Dominion. You will see by the facts that there is not one tittle of evidence for the statements made. They are made out of whole cloth, without any evidence at all. That is usually all the foundation there is for statements emanating from that source. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I wish to add one word to what has been said by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. The other day, my attention was called to this subject, and I think, if I mistake not, that the hon. member for York evinced a good deal of interest in it, and put a question upon the Notice paper. At that moment I was not in a position to give information on the subject, and I immediately communicated with the general manager, with the result that he furnishes me with practically the information as that which has been read by the hon. gentleman, supplementing it, however, with this statement, which I wish to add, that to-day there are really more coloured porters in the employ of the Intercolonial Railway than there have been at any previous period.

Mr. FRASER. I also had a communication from Mr. Archibald, as I wanted to know about this matter. I think all the members of the House will deprecate the attempt, which can only have one meaning, namely, to raise a race prejudice upon reports that are not founded in fact at all. Everybody that travels on the Intercolonial Railway knows what excellent employees those coloured porters are, what attention they give to those who are travelling. The report that the Government would at once draw the colour line and dismiss all these men, ought to have been rejected by the common sense of the editors of those papers. I trust that, hereafter, those who publish those statements will understand what the country understands, that there must be a terrific dearth of any ground of attack upon the Government, when they are compelled to fall back upon an attempt to raise the prejudices of the coloured population of Canada.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I regret very much that I should have to ask the further indulgence of the Government to-day. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), who desires particularly to follow the Minister of Finance, is still quite seriously indisposed. I have an idea that he had some conversation himself, yesterday, with the acting leader of the Government, when that hon. gentleman was good enough to agree that the debate should be adjourned last evening at his request. I had a note from him, when I moved the adjournment, and had I known, as I should have known, that the House had resolved to make this the first order for to-day and to proceed with the debate from day to day until it was completed, I would have mentioned, when I asked for that adjournment, that the hon. member for York, in his note to me, had stated that he was satisfied it would be impossible for him to be in his place to-day; and I imagined, when I made that motion, that this debate would not come up again until Tuesday next.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The Government, under the circumstances, will accede to the hon. gentleman's request, and are very sorry for the cause of it. But, under all the circumstances, I think we will best facilitate the business by meeting the hon. gentleman's wishes. I am not going to make any argument, but I would suggest, for the consideration of all parties concerned, that, as there are not many changes in the tariff, my hon. friend who has moved the adjournment, should communicate with his friends and endeavour to have some sort of understanding come to, that we would not prolong this Budget debate unnecessarily.

Mr. HUGHES. Five minute speeches.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Can you get the consent of the hon. member for York to that?

Mr. HUGHES. After the leaders.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will just express the hope to the hon. gentlemen opposite, and to our friends on this side, that the debate might be confined within some reasonable time after the hon. member for York has made his remarks; and, if it is necessary for me to speak, I will endeavour to set the example of compressing my remarks within reasonable limits.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Speaking for myself, I appreciate very much indeed the courtesy of the hon. gentleman, and I believe this side of the House will make every effort to show their appreciation also.

Mr. WILSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

DUTY ON AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

Mr. DAVIN continuing his speech on the motion: That good faith on the part of the present Government with the farmers of the North-west should compel them to place agricultural implements on the free list, said: Mr. Speaker, six o'clock came the other day before I was able to conclude my speech introducing the motion on the paper, and I have a few remarks to make to which I would ask the attention of hon. members on both sides of the House. What

I did up to six o'clock was this. I proved that in the Liberal Convention of 1893 a reduction of the tariff was promised on the lines of providing merely for the revenue and of giving the North-west farmers and the farmers generally exceptional advantages, in case the Liberal party came into power. I then proved that the leader of the Government went west, accompanied by some of his colleagues, and that at Winnipeg, at Moosomin, at Regina, at Moose Jaw, Edmonton and Prince Albert promises were made on the same lines, only more definite; and I quoted a passage from a speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture which amounted to a definite promise that if the Liberals came into power agricultural implements would be placed on the free list. Those words are in "Hansard." I quoted also from the campaign sheet of 1895-96, which I have here bound with other precious documents issued by the Liberal party, where they expressed an opinion adverse to the present tariff on agricultural implements. I also showed from the "Farmer's Sun" that the farmers throughout Canada were disappointed. I showed by quotations that the hon. member for Winnipeg and the hon. member for Lisgar stated openly and in public in Winnipeg, that they were disappointed; and now I shall proceed to quote statements made by my hon. colleague the member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) to show that he was also disappointed. In fact, he told the Government—what? It is a most extraordinary thing that with the tones of the Finance Minister's speech last night in his ears, knowing that nothing has been done for the farmers or for the farmers of the North-west, the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia sits complacently in his seat, happy and smiling. On that occasion to which I refer, however, he told the leader of the Government that his policy had not left his supporters in the west a leg to stand on. Lest that mere description should be considered too vague, I will quote the language of my hon. friend, and I ask the attention of the Finance Minister to this statement, because some personal references are made by the member for Eastern Assiniboia to that hon. gentleman. This is what the hon. member (Mr. Douglas) said at Wapella:

The tariff had, in a word, been a disappointment. The change was made on the basis of a 10 per cent reduction. We didn't get the changes we wanted. He (Mr. Douglas) had done most of his talking on the subject, not on the floor of the House, but in committee.

What committee? If it was in committee, it was in Committee of the Whole, and was in public. But I think he refers to some secret conclave they had. I may tell the hon. member that it is not a parliamentary proceeding to conduct business that should be conducted on the floor of the House in camera and in secret with the Ministers.

Mr. DAVIN.

The Government must have a revenue, and he did not want any Administration to do that for the farmers which we condemn them doing for the manufacturers. He claimed that he made no promise of free implements, &c. What he wanted was justice.

So, when the hon. gentleman attends an open conference with his party he does so on a good Conservative's advice. That shows the modesty that may be in a bosom like that of my hon. friend. A Latin writer penned that well-known and hackneyed line, which may be familiar to the hon. gentleman:

Tantæne animis cœlestibus iræ?

Dwells such dire anger in celestial minds?

How can such complacency as the following fill the bosom of a divine?

He had made the strongest speech he had made in the House on the excessive rates on implements, &c. He had told the Government he would rather kick them in their own shanty than outside. When Messrs. Fielding and Paterson met with these manufacturers they (the manufacturers) said, "You are making a general reduction of 25 per cent? If that is so, we ask you for an advance on the implement duty to put us on a fair basis," and to compromise the matter they had allowed them free raw material, and the machine men had promised to make a $5 reduction in the prices of machines.

Do you see, Mr. Speaker, what is admitted? The hon. gentleman has no confidence in the Ministers, who, instead of giving a reduction in the duty on agricultural implements, have given increased protection to the manufacturers.

As soon as he saw the new tariff he wrote to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and asked for an interview. It was granted, and he told the Premier he had come to talk on agricultural implements and coal oil. He had said to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, "Sir, I want to tell you this, you haven't given the members from the North-west a leg to stand on, because this is a large question to our people, and we have not now an argument to meet them with.

In the town of Grenfell the hon. gentleman spoke on the same subject, and used this language:

The farmers did not ask for special favours, but justice. He was not satisfied with the present tariff, and according to Mr. Fielding's budget speech the Government themselves were not satisfied with it. But it was the best that could be done under the circumstances. At least, that was the Government's explanation of it. The old tariff was placed upon a rate of 35 per cent. This was a considerable reduction, but the Bill was, upon the whole, a disappointment to the Patrons of Industry.

Now twelve months have elapsed, and I never saw a man in my life who evidenced complacency more than the hon. Finance Minister, who in his speech last night showed perfect delight in the present tariff, in fact, I thought he was well satisfied with everything. No changes in the tariff have been made, that is to say, no changes have been made to carry out the promises made by hon. gentlemen during eighteen years, because any changes in the tariff are against the interests of the farmers and against the poor man.

As soon as he saw it he wrote a note to the Premier asking an interview in reference to it.

He repeats this important interview.

This was granted, and he told Mr. Laurier that they had not left their supporters in the west a single argument with which to meet the people. Against this it was held that the general reduction of about ten per cent was a marked improvement, and it was shown as an argument by the manufacturers of machinery that they had been reduced at one fell swoop from 35 to 20 per cent.

But who reduced it from 35 per cent to 20? Not this Government, not the present Minister of Finance; but the Conservative Government and Mr. Foster.

He had been put off from time to time.

Now, this is what I thought would be interesting to the Minister of Finance:

After thinking a good deal over the situation (Mr. Douglas) decided to ask for a hearing respecting the valuation of implements imported from the United States. He had been put off from time to time, but finally having caught Mr. Fielding in the lobby he asked him when he could be heard, Mr. Fielding said, in a good-humoured way, "O, Mr. Douglas, I will hear you next August." To this he (Mr. Douglas) replied, "You shall hear me within twenty-four hours," when Mr. Fielding replied, "I will hear you in twenty minutes."

But he did not succeed in getting the duty reduced. Sir, we have in Grenfell, N.W.T., a man of great ability; a man well known to my hon. friend (Mr. Douglas); a man who is a farmer himself; a man who has founded, I believe, most of the Patron lodges in western Assiniboia, Mr. Charles Nichol. This is the way Mr. Charles Nichol comments on what was done:

Speaking of the duty on agricultural implements, which was one of the points of the old tariff most strongly and persistently attacked by the Liberals—

I ask the attention of the House to this:

—and by Mr. Douglas himself, we believe, previous to the general elections, he said the Massey-Harris Company demanded that the duty be raised from 20 to 25 per cent, and that they had reason and logic on their side, and that in asking that implements be placed on the free list the farmer was trying to shift at least a fair share of the public burdens to other shoulders.

In the course of an article characterized by principles of sound political economy, Mr. Nichol refutes this paltry argument of the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), and he thus concludes:

We are told that the Massey-Harris Company have a greater sale for their implements in other countries, such as Great Britain, Australia, &c., than any of their competitors. Assuming that to be correct, and that they do not sell in those markets without a fair profit, on what grounds of "reason and logic," as Mr. Douglas puts it, can a 20 or 25 per cent duty be defended here? We venture to say neither Mr. Douglas or the Government saw reason or logic in it previous to the last general election. And we venture still further to say that the shallow fallacies of either Mr. Douglas or the Government, or other interested parties, will not impose upon the intelligent electors in the North-west for the time to come.

That, Sir, was written by a man who before he was a Patron was a strong, vigorous Reformer, and if he is anything but a Patron to-day, he is yet a strong, vigorous Reformer. That is the way this gentleman writes in a western town, taking the language of the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas); taking the language of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson), and Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), when brought before their constituents in which they say they were disappointed in the tariff. I say, Sir, that I have established beyond cavil that good faith on the part of the present Government would necessitate their taking the steps that I mention in that motion.

Now I am going to show that even the imps and familiars of the Government thought they would take another course. And what must have been the horror in the bosom of one of these who, looking down at the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) last night, heard him when he told us that the debt had been increased which they promised to reduce, and that the expenditure had gone up which they promised to reduce; yes, Sir, by millions. Last night the Minister of Finance told us that both the national debt and our annual expenditure had increased, and he was cheered by his supporters for it. He showed us the country was prospering, by giving us what we could have had from the Trade and Navigation Returns, but he did not explain to us why the debt had increased.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Order.

Mr. DAVIN. I won't be out of order; I will retire at once; I see my hon. friend has got a little paler and I will not be the cause of making another Minister sick. Two of them are ill now, and I certainly do not want to make a third ill. I am glad to know at any rate that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister will soon be convalescent, and in fact I have heard—although I have always understood that my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was a man of great abstemiousness—I have heard that what he is suffering from is partaking too much of pastry; he has had too much Tarte.

Now, Sir, a pamphlet was published by a gentleman who sits in that Press Gallery and has sat in it for many years. He is a gentleman named Magurn, and he published a pamphlet on the tariff revision in the spring of 1897, to which pamphlet he attached his name; it was criticized in the "Citizen," and this is what Mr. Magurn says in the pamphlet:

What is to be the tariff of the new Liberal Administration to be laid before Parliament and the country in a few weeks? To go over the tariff item by item, as Mr. Foster did in the revision of 1894, is only necessary in the maintenance of a protective system, and would be a task of great magnitude, as it proved to be at the time. In the present case the tariff commissioners consist of men who believe in the principle that the prime duty of a tariff is to raise a revenue, and that being the main object, the work of revision is simple compared with the other. To classify the imports and deal with them on some general principle is the only thing to be done. A low duty must be placed on the necessaries of life.

Hear that; hear that, ye farmers throughout the North-west and Manitoba, and now sugar is being taxed still higher. Is sugar a necessary of life or not?

Specific duties must be set aside—

And there are 135 specific duties in the present tariff:

Specific duties must be set aside in order to relieve the tariff from the scandal of making the cheapest goods pay the highest tax. Raw materials must be subjected to a low rate of duty in order that legitimate manufacturing shall not be heavily handicapped.

That is written by a devoted henchman of the present Minister of the Interior, and when he was coming back from the Klondike with the Minister of the Interior, he was enabled to put up a deal in Winnipeg by which he became correspondent of the Winnipeg "Free Press." He was already correspondent of the "Witness," and I do not know how many other papers and, Sir, I am sorry to say that on his taurine adolescence I act like a red rag on a bull. The moment he has to write about me he loses himself completely—I know he cannot help it, he is not responsible for it—but the moment he has to write about me he lies like a misplaced milestone which under no circumstances can tell the truth. So, Sir, I tell my friends in the North-west who read the "Witness," and I tell my friends in the North-west who read the Manitoba "Free Press," that when they read anything about me in either of these papers—if they read the leading articles, that is different; the leading articles are written with great ability and with fairness—but whenever that correspondent mentions me in any paper, let them remember the misplaced milestone, and remember, too, that there is an equation that I defy Sir Isaac Newton, if he were to rise from his grave, to find a flaw in; it is: Magurn and misplaced milestone; misplaced milestone and Magurn.

Now, Sir, I think I have demonstrated the proposition. Is there to be any relief?

Mr. DAVIN.

Clearly, none. I must not refer, it seems, to the Finance Minister's speech; but I may say that nothing that has occurred in this House this session can hold out any hope to the people of this country that the promises made will be fulfilled. I see, by the way, that the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), as usual, is not in his place. He is never in his place, whether it is late at night or early in the day. This is too early for any terpsichorean exertions, for which I would excuse him at nine o'clock in the evening. But with regard to the young Napoleon, I would say:

Oh, blame not Napoleon if in pleasure's soft dream

He should try to forget what he never can heal.

because I am quite certain that he would feel a strong desire to do better things, only the social duties call him to those terpsichorean exercises.

Oh, give but a hope, let a vista but gleam
Through the gloom of the Klondike, and mark how he'll feel;

Every passion it nursed, all the hopes it adored.
That instant his heart at Yukon will lay down,
And he'll smile as he can at Mackenzie & Mann,
And deal out dredging claims to his friends standing round.

That is a parody sent to me by a young friend from Montreal. The hon. Minister of the Interior when at Vancouver, put the stroke of finality on the tariff of last session. He said—and he said the same thing at Regina—and I call the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to it:

Sir Richard Cartwright is a pretty good free trader, and Sir Richard Cartwright is satisfied with the tariff.

Thus we have on the authority of the Minister of the Interior—I do not know whether it is a very good authority or not—that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is satisfied with this tariff. Now, Sir, I have demonstrated that hon. gentlemen opposite on several occasions promised that they would, if they got into power, place agricultural implements on the free list. They have got into power, and I say that good faith should compel them to do it. Are we for one minute, Sir, to tolerate the spectacle we are confronted with on these front benches, of men who have got into power upon definite promises, and who, although they have had three sessions, have not yet attempted to redeem a promise? They have betrayed the people to whom they made the promises; they have gone back on their promises. How well I remember how the stalwart form of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) used to rise on this side of the House, and how he would denounce the least tax on the necessaries of life. Where are his sympathies now? They have gone to his boots, as the "Sun" said. Then there is the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who also denounced all taxes on the necessaries of life, and we know what is now taking place. It is a thing not to be tolerated for a moment; and the farmers of the North-west would hold me as false to my duty to them if I did not put this motion on the paper, declaring that good faith should compel the Government to place agricultural implements on the free list.

But before I sit down I have to say something—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. I have to say something else—hon. gentlemen should let me finish the sentence. In the course of my remarks the last time, I referred to my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver). My hon. friend evidently thought that I had done him some wrong, though certainly if I did, I did it unwittingly, and my hon. friend sent me the "Hansard." What I did was to take a quotation from my hon. friend's speech that had appeared in the Medicine Hat "News," and I am free to confess that it does not quite accord, as sometimes happens in a newspaper, with what was said; but I am very glad that my hon. friend called my attention to it, because I think what he said suits me almost better than what was in the Medicine Hat "News." My hon. friend said:

I will say further, that the people of the North-west—at least that section of them I claim to represent—are sensible people, and they are not disappointed at the leader of this Government not doing what, in the first place, it would be unreasonable to expect of him, and what, in the second place, would be an impossibility. They do not expect a revision of the tariff at a moment's notice. But they do expect a revision of the tariff, and they expect a thorough revision.

That expectation is still unfulfilled:

They expect a revision of the tariff that will be in their interest, and I have every confidence they will get that revision from the present Government, and they will get it in good time.

My hon. friend is an instance of misplaced confidence, because he has not got it yet.

I wish further to point this out, sir: the agricultural season in that country is very nearly over, the purchase of farm machinery for the season has been made, and the reduction of the duty which will take effect during the coming winter will be just as beneficial to the people of the North-west as if it were made now.

Showing what my hon. friend expected, and it has not taken place yet, because implements are still at 20 per cent, as they were at that time. Why, Sir, the snows of 1896-97 are gone, and the snows of 1897-98 are pretty well gone, and still what my hon. friend expected has not taken place.

Now, Sir, the same person to whom I have already referred commented on a reference I made to my right hon. friend the leader of the Government. That reference, it seems, struck my friend as not in good taste because the right hon. leader of the House is poorly. I wish to read what I did say, because, of course, the papers only gave the briefest summary of my remarks. I could not expect them to do otherwise, because they have only a certain amount of space, and I might well be content with the space I got in most of them. They reported me as saying:

Now the people were rising against the Government which did not keep its promises, and the colour of death was upon it. He had noticed that the people of Hull named a street of their city Laurier Avenue, but following it up he found the avenue led to a graveyard.

What do you think the same writer led the people of Winnipeg and Manitoba to understand from that? That I was speaking of the health of the Prime Minister. I, therefore, feel bound to read what I did say, and it will be seen that I was not thinking of the health of the right hon. gentleman at all, but of the health of the Government. This is what I said:

I want to call the attention of my hon. friend who is now leading the House (Sir Richard Cartwright)—and I am glad to see him leading it, because he leads it with grace and dignity—I want to call his attention to what he said in 1895:

"This is not a case for half measures. You have in the fate of the Democratic party of the United States a warning and an example of the doom which will overtake any party that palter with its convictions, and after having placed itself at the head of a great popular movement, will offer the people a stone instead of bread."

That was what the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said would be the fate of a party that did not keep its promises, and it was because of hints thrown out here and there, which came to his ears and, no doubt, shocked his sense of principle and convictions as a free trader, that he held out this warning flag to his party. Commenting on this prophetic warning, I went on to say:

That is the language which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce used when speaking of the Liberal policy with regard to the tariff.

Now, Sir, these are weighty words, and they seem to be prophetic as well as weighty, for already the indignation of this people of Canada, this outraged and betrayed people, is rising against a Government that does not regard its promises, its programmes or its professions. And, Sir, what I said in 1896 could be said with still more truth now, the pallor of death is already upon the face of that moribund Ministry.

It is quite clear that I was speaking of the Ministry, and not at all of the right hon. gentleman who is leading it. Then I went on to make a perfectly clear and legitimate use of a circumstance, because, as Virgil says, there are tears in things, and another Latin poet says there is a prophetic element in the commonest events. I went on to say:

I was walking in the city of Hull the other day. I found that they were changing the names of the streets there, and that in this baptizing of streets they called one avenue Laurier. I thought I would have the glory and pride of walking down this new-named street. While passing along it I began to think how, when the late Emperor Napoleon came into power, they changed the names of the streets in Paris, substituting names that rang with republicanism to those that reminded passers-by of Napoleon and Louis Napoleon. And I remember when I went through those streets of Paris afterwards, the names significant of Napoleonism had been torn down, and the names substituted that were significant of its decheance. I went along this street in Hull, called the Avenue Laurier, and do you know whither it led? I hope it will not be injurious to your health, Mr. Speaker, or to the health of the Liberals. It led—"absit omen"—to a graveyard.

Is it not palpable, that the whole thing was a reference to the Government, and not to the leader of the Government, and that use was made of the circumstance to shadow forth the decay and destruction of that Government, of which my right hon. friend is the head. But what has been the result of the short report that appeared in the newspapers in Toronto? A letter has come to me from a prominent man there, saying that he was very much impressed by what appeared in the papers, but still more by something that he, too, had noticed; for but a few days before he had been up in that quarter of Toronto where St. James Cemetery is, and he sent me a map of that part, which I now hold in my hands. Here you have Parliament Street in one place, Wellsley Street in another, Amelia Street and Sackville Street, and there is St. James Cemetery, and another street leading into it, which has been rebaptized Laurier Avenue. I need hardly say, that the coincidence is very peculiar.

Sir, there is not a man in the Liberal ranks who would feel more sorry than I, if there was anything serious the matter with the right hon. leader of the House. Strong friends of mine have, again and again, taken me to task for what they call a custom of mine, of saying nice things about my right hon. friend. Well, if I ever said nice things about him, it was because I felt them. I am glad now to know that there is nothing serious the matter with him. We know, from the papers, that it is nothing serious, and, therefore, I am free to-day, as I was when originally speaking, to say, "absit omen." There is a prophecy in things, as well as tears, and that prophecy seems to point to the destruction of that Government which has been false to all its promises, and which is false to-day than we ever knew it to be before. The sun that rose this morning and looked down on our fair Dominion, knew that we have, in the present Government, a more perjured Administration than we ever knew it to be before—false to all its professions, false to all its programmes, and, with cynical disregard of its most cherished convictions, nailing its flag to the mast of protection and striking at the poor man in his deposits, in his newspaper, in the sugar that sweetens his tea. And then, we have the Finance Minister, just as if he were cross-fishing a stream, winking pleasantly at Mr. Bertram and saying: Tinkering of the tariff is a thing of the past; and then winking, with equal gusto, at the free traders behind and saying: Never mind what we say to Bertram and the manufacturers, eternal vigilance is required of them; that is what they will have to pay, if they are going to keep their place in the world; we must stick to free trade.

We now know what they will do. We know very well that they have completely gone back on all their professions; we know, from the language of one Minister after another, what they propose to do. We have had the leader of that Government declaring, with a curious cynicism that it pained me to see and that I did not think was possible in him: "I do not mind wearing the clothes of my opponents, provided they fit me." I thought that was a wanton boast on the part of my right hon. friend, seeing that, in his habits of dissimulation he has a vast wardrobe all his own.

Mr. ROCHE. Owing to the very full manner in which my hon. friend from West Assinibola (Mr. Davin) has treated this question, it will not be necessary for me to engage the attention of the House but for a few moments. The motion is one to which I can give my most hearty support, not only because I know that the people of the Northwest Territories are anxious to secure their agricultural implements free of duty, if at all possible, but also because they were led to expect that boon, upon the accession of the Liberals to power, by the speeches delivered during the late Dominion campaign by Liberal leaders and candidates all over the country. As you are aware, that country is a purely agricultural country whose settlers labour under many disadvantages both of the artificial and the natural variety such as, possibly, are not experienced by people living in eastern Canada. To be sure, these natural difficulties cannot be overcome by any legislation within these walls, but those of the artificial variety can very materially be alleviated by the people's representatives here assembled, if they do their duty. Removed as those people are so far from the markets of the world, many commodities imported into that country, articles for consumption, wear or use, are materially increased in price, because of the long haul and the high freight consequent upon that long haul from the centres of manufacture and production. On the other hand, all products raised and exported by the farmer are correspondingly depressed in price for a similar reason. Anything, therefore, that will tend to reduce the price of production on the farm means so much more profit to the farmer, so much more money in his pocket. And, as agricultural implements are the raw material of the farmer, he, in my opinion, is as much entitled to receive his raw material free of duty, if the necessities of the revenue will permit, and, if not, to have as low a rate of duty as is consistent with the raising of the revenue, as is the manufacturer of those machines. On this question, I am aware, the Conservatives have proved to be the true tariff reformers. They reduced the protection given to the manufacturers of those machines from 35 to 20 per cent with a promise of still further reduction if deemed necessary. This, however, was declared by our Liberal friends to be entirely inadequate, and so far as my own constituency is concerned, it was ornamented from end to end with such placards as: "Vote for the Liberal candidate and free agricultural implements." The people were educated by such means to believe that free agricultural implements would be the natural consequence of the Liberals attaining power. The Winnipeg "Tribune," the organ of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) contained article after article practically in the same strain. And when during the first session of this Parliament, a motion similar to this now before us was introduced by the hon. member for West Assiniboia, the hon. member for Lisgar, in company with his Liberal confreres from the west, opposed the motion on the ground that it was ill-advised and ill-timed. Wait, said that hon. gentleman, until the Government has had time to form their tariff policy and present it to the House; time enough to condemn the Government when they have proved recreant to their pledges. Well, the House and the country waited until another session came and the tariff policy was propounded. And what then did we find? Instead of finding that the protection heretofore enjoyed by the manufacturers, those bloated monopolists, those robbers, those "scoundrels great and scoundrels small," as they were so endearingly called by our Liberal friends, we find that it was materially increased, the protective duty being left as it was and a sweeping reduction made of the duties on the raw material entering into the construction of those machines. This caused a profound feeling of disappointment among that western people, a sense of disappointment not at all confined to one political party. Possibly it was felt most keenly by those poor deluded people who, by the hundred, were drawn away from their own party by those pledges, and who are now realizing how they have been hoodwinked. This was participated in also by the Liberal members from the west, and when, a few months ago, the meeting of the Liberal Association of Winnipeg was held, as has been stated, the hon. member for Lisgar and the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) at that meeting expressed their disappointment. They declared that the whole tendency of the Government was to raise rather than to lower the duties, and they instanced several cases which proved that, while the Liberals were very good free traders in theory, when it interfered with their own interests and the interests of their friends, they proved to be the best of protectionists in practice. They instanced the hon. member for North Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost) in regard to the duties on agricultural implements, and the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) with regard to coal oil, and others. But, notwithstanding this, those members from the west voted for the Liberal policy that was produced last session on the ground that the very few concessions that were made, the very small reductions in two or three articles entering into common use on the farm, marked the entering of the thin edge of the wedge of free trade, and formed only an instalment, to use their own words, of what was to come; and from the pledges they had received from the members of the Government, they felt confident that their promises would ultimately be fulfilled.

Another session has come. And what have we had in the interim? We have heard from the gentlemen who originated this tariff policy, who prepared the brief and handed it over to the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), and that gentleman is here now as the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram). And that hon. gentleman has declared that this tariff policy was to remain as it is at present for the next ten years. That hon. gentleman was endorsed by the Ministry, several of whom appeared on the platform and spoke on his behalf. And after the Budget speech we have had from the Finance Minister yesterday, I fear that the members from the west who are depending on the Government meeting their wishes in regard to the duty of agricultural implements are depending on a broken reed. It is true that there exists a prejudice in the minds of many farmers in favour of American-made machinery. Whether this prejudice has any right foundation or not I am not personally aware. Many farmers prefer Canadian-made machines, while many others prefer the American. So far as I am concerned, I think it is only right for our farmers to give the benefit, all other things being equal, to the Canadian manufacturers. That was the design of the National Policy—to lead the people to patronize home industries and keep the money in our own country. If it is the case that American machines are better and can be sold cheaper than the Canadian made article, I hold that it is not the duty of the Government to hamper the farmers in this respect by an unusually high tariff. I recognize also that the manufacturers of those Canadian machines have had their business built up through the wise protective policy of the Conservative party. And a very thankless lot they proved to be. They have had their manufacturing establishments built up to this extent that they have, in one combination now gobbled up all the smaller concerns. And while I am not accusing that combination of having raised or even kept up the prices of machines because of the combination—on the contrary, I believe that, on account of the improvement in modern methods of production, they are producing a better article for less money—still, in view of the fact that they have so long enjoyed protection and in view of the fact that such sweeping reductions were made in the raw material used in the manufacture of these machines, they should be able to stand now pretty nearly on an equality and be able to compete with their American rivals across the line. Because of this, and also because the farmers of the western country have been promised that this would be the result of the Liberals coming into power—that they would receive free agricultural implements—and because scores and hundreds of those electors have been deluded to give support to the Liberal candidate on the strength of these promises, I most heartily give my support to the motion of the hon. member for West Assiniboia.

Mr. CRAIG. I am rather surprised, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) should speak about good faith on the part of the present Government with regard to agricultural implements. If we examine their history since they came into power, we will find that they have not kept good faith on any question. Now, what is meant by good faith? I understand it means keeping their pledges. I think if we examine the pledges they made before they came into power, we will find that almost all of them have been broken. Especially is this the case with reference to protection. The cry of the Liberal party before they came into power was, Death to protection. Protection was to be uprooted root and branch. Well, Mr. Speaker, we all know that that has not been done. For my part, I do not blame the Liberal Government for not doing it; I commend them for it. I might blame them in a theoretical way for not keeping their pledges, but, in reality, I give them praise for not keeping their pledges, because, in breaking their pledges, they have benefited this country. We have heard about the feeling of satisfaction with which the tariff of the present Government has been received in the country. Well, I know, from conversation with business men that this feeling of satisfaction arose, not on account of the changes that were made, but on account of the changes that were not made. There was a feeling of apprehension abroad in the country when the Liberal party first came into power, that they would carry out their pledges, that when they talked about rooting up protection, they meant what they said; that when they talked about doing away with all protection, and when they called the manufacturers of this country robbers and all sorts of hard names, and said they were going to take away this protection from them, the people thought they meant it, and they have been gratified to know that they did not mean any of these things at all, that they were only election cries, that these were only appeals made to their own party, and perhaps to moderate men of all parties, so that they might get into power. Now, I may say here that I am not going to support this resolution, because I do not blame the Government at all for not keeping faith with anybody on this question, but I commend them for it. I think that while they have not kept faith with the country, while they have broken nearly all the pledges that they made so far as the tariff is concerned, yet in so doing they have done a great benefit to the country.

But at the same time I think something might be said about the duty on agricultural implements. We find that the Government did not make any reduction on that duty at all. But what did they do? They made raw material lower by reducing the duty on raw material. Now, it would be a very interesting question to discuss as to why they did this, why they discriminated in favour of the manufacturers of agricultural implements. I do not know. I do not pretend to be on the inside and to know all the reasons. But I do know that while they reduced the duty on a few articles, they did not reduce the duty on agricultural implements, but in reality, by making raw materials lower, they increased the protection to the makers of those articles. I think that is rather an inconsistent position for them to take. But, Mr. Speaker, there is one article in which they did reduce the duty, and which they have made free at the present time, and that is the article of binder twine, in which my constituents are somewhat interested. I find that that is placed on the free list. Now, in the town of Port Hope, which I have the honour to represent, they have a factory for manufacturing binder twine, one of the best in this country, I am told, with the most modern and improved machinery. That factory to-day is standing idle, and the prospects are that it will stand idle. The men who have been working in the factory and who worked there up to last fall when the factory was closed, are very anxious to know whether the Government is going to impose a duty on binder twine in order that they may have some prospect of getting employment again. Well, it does not look so by the tariff which was brought down. I regret very much that the Government have not looked on this matter in a favourable light. I think they might well have considered this question. Why should they take the duty off binder twine and make that article absolutely free, while they do not even reduce the duty on agricultural implements, although both are used by the farmer? I hold that binder twine has a claim to a small protection, say 10 per cent or 12½ per cent. Now, there is a great deal of talk about giving the preference to Great Britain and to the British colonies, we hear a great deal of talk about loyalty and patriotism and binding all the Empire together in this way. But what are we doing by making binder twine free? Why, we are giving to the United States more than a preference, we are giving them this whole country as a market for their goods without paying a cent of duty. We find that the binder twine for this country is being manufactured in the United States, the people who make this binder twine do not contribute one cent to the revenue of this country, while the men who were making it here are now walking about the streets. I consider that is a condition of things which is a disgrace to this country. I really think the Government should impose a duty of, say 10 per cent on binder twine, in order that our workmen may have some advantage in that way, and be protected against the binder twine that is sent in here free from across the line. It may be said that this is done in the interests of the farmers. Well, I hold that the farmers will not buy their binder twine one cent less on account of the duty being removed, there will be no reduction at all in the price to them. If a duty of 10 per cent was imposed on binder twine the price could not be put up. Binder twine is manufactured in the Central Prison, in the penitentiary at Kingston, and in Brantford by a farmers' company there. There are plenty of manufacturers in this country that would keep down the price by competition. I think that argument has no weight at all. I do not think the Government have any ground at all to stand on in refusing to put a duty on binder twine. I would here make a strong appeal to them, as strong as I can, that they should reconsider this matter, now that the matter has been brought to their attention. I know they have decided not to do it for the present, but I hope they will reconsider their decision, and make another one in the interests of the workmen of this country. I am not advocating this in the interests of the Consumers' Cordage Company or of any other cordage company. I have no particular interest in them, but I have an interest in the workmen of this country who have been making this binder twine up to the present, and who, if the duty is not reimposed, will probably suffer considerable injury.

Mr. TAYLOR. I cannot agree with the compliment that the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) has paid to the Government. He compliments them for breaking faith with the people of this country. I am a protectionist, have been, and intend to be as long as we have a country to protect. I believe in protecting every article that we can grow or produce in this country. But those hon. gentlemen opposite came into power promising the people that if they got in they would reduce the duty on coal oil, or give the farmers of this country free coal oil; that they would reduce the duty on almost every article that the farmer consumes. We have their tariff brought down last night by the Minister of Finance with a flourish of trumpets, saying to the people of this country that after the 1st of July we will give a general reduction of 25 per cent on all articles imported into this country. Articles imported from where? From England only. Now, I have carefully read over that list. What can I find in that list that is going to receive the benefit of the preferential duty and that is going at the same time to benefit the farmers of this country? The first article on the list is animals, living. The old duty was 20 per cent, the new duty is 20 per cent, but under the preference, after the 1st of July, it will be 15 per cent. What benefit is that going to be to the farmers of this country? The only animals imported into this country are thoroughbreds for the improvement of stock. These come in free to-day, therefore the preference clause in the tariff on animals is not going to benefit the farmers any. The next item is books. If applied to school books for the different provinces, there might be some benefit in it. But the farmers of this country are not very much interested in a duty on books published in England. So you might go through the list. Another item of great interest to the farmers, is the article of corn, and there we find about the only reduction in the tariff of any importance. Corn they have made free, to the great injury of the farmers, particularly of Ontario, and it will prove to be an injury to those of the North-west and to all others throughout the Dominion. Because all the provinces produced coarse grains, which should be used in feeding and fattening our own cattle. Therefore, as a protectionist, and a strong protectionist, I support the motion of my hon. friend in condemnation of this Government; and I think many hon. gentleman opposite should join us in condemning the leaders of their party for having gone to the country and promised they would do certain things if placed in power. They have been placed in power, on the faith of those pledges. Have they kept their pledges?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. I say, no. The hon. gentleman comes from a part of a country near where coal oil is produced. He in fact carried his election on coal oil; but the Government have not reduced the duty on it, and have not carried out their promises. The hon. member for Durham (Mr. Craig) gave hon. gentlemen opposite credit for not having reduced the tariff, because it was in the public interest that the old tariff should be retained. The Minister of Finance, in the course of his speech last night said that we did not have the old National Policy any longer. Yet if hon. members will read the present tariff and the old tariff, which was called the National Policy tariff, they will find there is practically no difference.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Was the country ever more prosperous than it is now ?

Mr. TAYLOR. Taking the circumstances into account I say, yes. Why is there prosperity ? Is it due to the fact that manufacturers are more prosperous or that employees are receiving larger wages ? It is because Providence blessed the farmers with a bountiful harvest. I again ask, are our manufacturers more prosperous ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, they are making money hand over fist.

Mr. TAYLOR. You cannot show that the manufacturers are making money hand over fist, except in such a case as that of the Minister of Customs, who is connected with an industry which is in a combine. Of course those who are manufacturers and in a combine are making money ; but other manufacturers, who are competing with Canadian manufacturers only, are cutting the prices so low that they are making very little profit.

Mr. CAMPBELL. They are running day and night all over the country.

Mr. TAYLOR. Hon. gentlemen opposite promised to reduce the price of binding twine. Have they done so ? I have looked at the papers brought down to-day. The Government advertised for tenders for binding twine manufactured at the penitentiary at Kingston. The prices offered were 4·4 cents for Sisal, 4·9 cents for Beaver, and 5·25 cents for Maple Leaf. The tenders accepted were as follows :—4·4 cents for Sisal, 4·7 cents for Beaver, 4·90 cents for Maple Leaf. I find the prices at which they were delivered to the company were 4 cents for Sisal, 4·70 cents for Beaver, and 5·25 for Maple Leaf. Hobbs & Co. control the output of the Kingston penitentiary and the Toronto prison, and they make the prices. Why are the farmers this year charged for binder twine 7½ to 8½ cents per lb., or nearly 100 per cent advance ? Hobbs & Co. have fixed that price and they are charged with having made $25,000 out of binding twine manufactured in Kingston penitentiary and Toronto prison.

Mr. CAMPBELL. How is it that the Cordage Company's factory is closed up ?

Mr. TAYLOR. It is not closed up permanently ; it is only closed up this year. The output was all sold together and brought the same price, and then the market came under the combine in the United States for which Hobbs & Co. are agents. We will obtain explanations in the Public Accounts Committee as to why, when the price was 4·4 cents, the goods were delivered at 4 cents. Perhaps the Hobbs combine contributed the four-tenths of a cent per pound to the election fund ; we do not know that as a fact, but we will investigate the matter before the Public Accounts Committee. The Government promised that the farmers should obtain binding twine at lower prices, but they are called upon to pay this year higher prices than they did during the preceding year. I think hon. gentlemen opposite who are of the opinion that the Government should keep faith with the people, should unite with hon. members on this side of the House in supporting the motion of my hon. friend condemning the Government for having broken faith with the people of the North-west, as with the people of the provinces of the Dominion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was sorry I was not in the House to hear the latter part of the speech of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). Since I observed his motion on the Order paper I have attended almost every sitting of the House with the object of hearing what the hon. gentleman would have to say and of learning the position he would take in regard to this matter. With respect to the form of the hon. gentleman's motion, I confess I do not exactly like it. It seems to me designed to secure votes on the Opposition side of the House without committing the Opposition to support a reduction in the duty on agricultural implements. Had the hon. gentleman made a square motion to take the duty of agricultural implements altogether, I for one would have supposed it. I would have had no difficulty in doing so, because I have always advocated as a member from the west the abolition of the duty on agricultural implements, although I am free to say that the duty at present is such that is not very far from a revenue basis. I am informed that at least one-half of the agricultural implements imported into the North-west at the present time are manufactured in the United States. If that be so, it will be seen that the duty is approaching at all events a revenue basis.

Mr. SPROULE. It must have been on that basis before the present Government fixed the tariff, because they did not reduce the duty on agricultural implements.

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, they did.

Mr. SPROULE. No.

Mr. McMILLAN. I shall show it.

Mr. DAVIN. Permit me to say that mowers and reaper knives, mowing machines, self-binding harvesters, harvesters without binders, sulky and walking ploughs, harrows, cultivators, seed-mills and horse-rakes are all 20 per cent, as they were under the previous Government.

Mr. McMILLAN. There were a lot of agricultural implements reduced from 35 per cent to 25 per cent by the present Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Of course, my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) does not mean to contend that I said there had been a reduction in the duty on mowers, reapers and that class of implements. I did not say that, for I know there has been no reduction; and, although there has been a reduction of the duty on separators and other implements used by farmers, still, I would have been very much pleased to have seen the duty on other implements reduced, if not entirely removed.

Mr. DAVIN. You said the duties were down to a revenue basis.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I beg pardon. I did not say they were down to a revenue basis. What I said was, that in view of the fact that about half of the reapers used in Manitoba last year were imported from the United States, it would lead to the belief that they were not far from a revenue basis. However, I might say that, during my election campaign, I had the impression that it was the intention of the Government to take the duty off agricultural implements entirely.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I might add, however, that my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) has not proven that the members of the then Opposition declared it to be their intention to do so. Holding the views I do, I would be extremely pleased to see the duty taken off agricultural implements altogether, and, had my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) made his motion to that effect, I would have found no difficulty in supporting it. However, it was my opinion, that the farmers of the North-west, as well as of other parts of Canada, would not, I think, be adverse to bearing a reasonable share of the tariff burdens of the country; and last session, in the committee, I myself moved that the duty on these implements be reduced to 10 per cent. I am prepared to move now, Sir, in amendment:

That all the words after "That" be struck out of the motion, and the following substituted:—

"The duty on agricultural implements be reduced to ten per cent."

If hon. gentlemen opposite are in earnest in this matter, if they desire to relieve the farmers of at least a portion of their burdens in that regard, they will have no difficulty in supporting this amendment. I would be the last one not to welcome any support, no matter from what side of the House it comes, in order to secure relief for the farmers of that country in the matter of these duties. I do not take a great deal of stock in the position my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) takes in this regard. In fact, I think I can prove to the House, by a reference to his record on this question, that he is entirely insincere.

Mr. DAVIN. Order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think I am in order, Mr. Speaker. If I do not succeed in proving to the House that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) is not sincere, I will be quite willing to tender him an apology. I will prove he is not sincere from his own record. I will take the liberty of reading from "Hansard" some remarks which I made last session in reference to the hon. gentleman's record.

Mr. DAVIN. What page of "Hansard"?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Page 4162. This is what I said in the House last session:

In the session of 1891, the present Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) moved that binder twine be put on the free list, and my hon. friend from Western Assiniboia voted against it; and I understand that he excused himself on the ground that he did not know what his constituents wanted in the matter. I took the trouble to turn up the hon. gentleman's paper, and I find in an article on "binder twine" printed on the 7th April, 1892, these observations:

"In the interests of the farmers of Western Assiniboia, the "Leader" raises its voice against the duty on binder twine. We have felt for years that the National Policy bore too heavily on the North-west, and with regard to the particular item of binder twine, no one has come forward to defend a proceeding which compels the farmers to pay some $400,000 more for the twine than the twine is actually worth."

He made a speech in Parliament supporting the reduction in the duty on binder twine, and it will be interesting to see how he voted. On Wednesday, the 26th April, 1892, nearly three weeks after the above article appeared. Hon. Robert Watson, then M. P. for Marquette, moved that binder twine be placed on the free list; and the record shows that the hon. member for Western Assiniboia shirked the vote.

I do not think it will be necessary, Mr. Speaker, in view of that, for me to withdraw my accusation of insincerity against the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin).

In the session of 1893, the present Postmaster General again moved that binder twine be placed on the free list, and the record shows that the hon. member for Western Assiniboia supported the motion in a speech, but voted against it. Then, in 1893, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) moved the resolution to the following effect:—

"Since the introduction of the protective system, sufficient time has elapsed for the establishment and development of such manufacturing industries as, under existing conditions, can be successfully carried on in Canada. Moreover, many manufacturers sheltered behind the rampart thus erected have formed combinations and trusts which prohibit competition and maintain monopolies.

"That the existing tariff, defensible only as a protective measure, has proved in many instances oppressive and burdensome to the great mass of the consuming classes, and especially to those engaged in agricultural pursuits; is unfair and unequal in its incidence, and has been productive of discontent, verging on disloyalty, among those who suffer from its injustice.

"That no sufficient reason has been adduced, or exists, requiring investigation respecting the foregoing facts, which are notorious, nor justifying delay in the passage of remedial legislation, which is imperative."

And the hon. member for Western Assiniboia, on that occasion shirked the vote. But he explained the matter in an article he sent to the Regina "Leader," that court journal to which I have already referred. If you will allow me, I will read the reasons which the hon. gentleman gave for his course. I think they will be extremely interesting to the House. I shall quote very briefly:

"Any resolution impugning the existing fiscal policy is, as demonstrated on the strictly party vote on Mr. McCarthy's motion, regarded as one expressing want of confidence in the Government. It was impossible for Mr. Davin, advocating a protective tariff, to support a resolution condemning such a tariff and suggesting unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, but we do not exaggerate when we say that Mr. McCarthy's proposals of reduction of customs met with the private approval of many members of both parties. It is easily understood that, with party discipline—

No matter what the hon. gentleman thought in private, we see what he did when it came to a vote in the House. I will not say as I said last session—

Mr. DAVIN. You may say anything you like.

Mr. RICHARDSON. For fear of being called to order I shall not say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) took to the woods. I will merely say that he retreated to the tall timber.

Mr. DAVIN. Turn to the page of the same volume, where you will see that I brought down the Government majority to 14.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) is getting uneasy now.

Mr. DAVIN. Not a bit of it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The hon. gentleman had better wait until I get through; I have a good many other things to remind him of.

And I would call special attention of the House to this sentence:

—with party discipline carried to the extreme to which it is in this country, individual action must be controlled by party reasons. Parliamentary procedure here leaves the private members no initiative. Expression of honest and true opinion is restricted. The individual responsibility of the people's representatives is overshadowed by the power of the Cabinet."

I think that the House will agree with me after listening to these sentences, that when it was charged recently that the hon. gentleman had crawled under the barn, the statement was warranted by the facts. The article continues:

"Members of Parliament, in order to be supporters of the Government, would not require to be extreme protectionists, just as there would no longer be a necessity for a Liberal being a free trader."

Now, in order to keep up the ruse with his constituents, on Monday, 13th February, 1893, the hon. member moved as follows:—

"That it is the opinion of this House that the duty on barbed wire, on agricultural implements, on coal oil and on cotton should be reduced so as to give no more than reasonable protection, and that the duty on binder twine should be abolished."

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) was willing to have reasonable protection then, but he is extremely anxious now to have it abolished.

But he never pressed that motion to a vote. He conveniently took to the woods.

The present Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) had previously introduced a resolution to make binder twine free, but this the hon. member for Western Assiniboia had opposed. I will read a brief extract from his speech as reported in his own paper:

"Mr. Foster had promised to make known the Government policy on the tariff, and in the face of such a request he (Davin) could not have voted for the motion. Had he done so, he would have been supporting what, coming from a member of the Opposition, was practically a vote of want of confidence in the Government."

And yet my hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and others argue that members on this side would be derelict in their duty—in fact, would be behaving outrageously—if they did not vote want of confidence in the Government of 1898—

Now, in the session of 1893, Mr. Cleveland had a motion for free coal oil, and respecting this, the hon. member for Western Assiniboia sent the following to his paper on 13th February, 1893:—

"A proposal was now before the House to abolish the duty on coal oil. He (Davin) could not go that far,—

But he has no hesitation in seeking to hold up the Government to ridicule, because they have not taken the duty entirely off coal oil—

—but that the duty should be reduced. Speaking on binder twine, he (Davin) made a strong appeal for free binding twine for the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west."

Members from the west can congratulate the hon. gentleman on any strong appeals he may make, but we would like to see him at least consistent enough to vote as he speaks in the House.

Then came the visit of the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) and Hon. Mr. Angers to the west, when the hon. member for Western Assiniboia proclaimed that what was wanted was free lumber, coal oil, agricultural implements, barbed wire, &c. He pointed out that coal oil at Regina was 50 cents a gallon. Yet when Mr. Cleveland's motion was up to put it on the free list, the hon. gentleman voted against it.

So you will see the inconsistency of the hon. gentleman.

Then came the tariff revision of 1894, when agricultural implements, lumber and barbed wire were reduced; binder twine was reduced and coal oil was made 7½ cents, though, before the session closed it was reduced to 6 cents. It would be interesting to see what the hon. member for Western Assiniboia said at that time. In the "Leader" 29th March, 1894, he spoke thus:

You see the hon. gentleman had been making a pretense of advocating a reduction along these various lines, for the purpose of standing in with his constituency; and when the Government did make certain reductions, taking some of the duty off agricultural implements, this is what the hon. gentleman said in his paper:

From a commercial and political standpoint, the tariff reductions are bold throughout, and, looking at them all round, are eminently satisfactory.

When the Conservatives reduced the duty on coal oil to six cents a gallon, it was "eminently satisfactory." When the Conservatives reduced the duty on agricultural implements to 20 per cent, it was "eminently satisfactory." What has occurred since to change the hon. gentleman's view? Is it because he sits in Opposition? We know from his own words that he was quite content, when sitting under the whip of his party, to vote against the way he was talking in the House—in one case even voting against his own motion, I am told.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman says that he is told that I voted against my own motion. Will the hon. gentleman say who told him, and, as far as parliamentary etiquette will allow me, I will brand that hon. gentleman as he deserves.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not see the point of order in the remarks made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DAVIN. I will try to put it properly, to suit you, Mr. Speaker. The point of order I make is that the hon. member for Lisgar states that somebody told him that I had voted against my own motion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is no point of order in that.

Mr. DAVIN. He should give the name.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not say that the hon. gentleman had moved a motion and voted against it. What I said was that it had been reported to me that he had done so. It was a matter of common report in the North-west, and from the most inconsistent record of the hon. gentleman, I do not think there is an hon. gentleman here but would be surprised if he did not make a motion and vote against it. I will sit down for a moment to give the hon. gentleman an opportunity to deny the statement, and if he does deny it, I will look up the record.

Mr. DAVIN. Deny what statement?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The statement that has been made to me. He declines to deny it, Mr. Speaker, and I will go on.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I did not do anything of the kind. I wanted to know what statement I was to deny. I say that the statement which the hon. gentleman makes, he knows, that is, the statement made by any one, that I voted against a motion of my own, is false.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has no right to say that. He is saying that the hon. gentleman is making a declaration which he knows is not true.

Mr. DAVIN. No. I said he quotes somebody—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Take it back.

Mr. DAVIN. Take what back?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the statement made by the hon. member for Lisgar was not correct, and that he knew that it was false.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not say that. The hon. gentleman quoted somebody as saying that I voted against a motion of my own. I said that somebody, whoever he is, that told the hon. gentleman that, if anybody told him, stated what was false. Is that out of order?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. No.

Mr. DAVIN. Where is the cheering now?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Evidently, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has lost his temper. I am not surprised at it, in view of the record which I have been able to lay before the House this afternoon; and I am sure that when his constituents read what the record is, he will be disposed to lose his temper to a much greater degree than he has on the present occasion. I may go on now with his record:

The present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved in amendment to the motion for Committee of Supply on 1st April, 1894, the effect of which amendment was to lower the duties on agricultural implements and the necessities of life. The hon. member for Western Assiniboia opposed that and asserted:

That, if the Opposition were in power, they dare not reduce the tariff lower than it has been reduced in the measure just brought down. The changes were too radical to suit Laurier and his friends; it left them but little to complain of, and for that reason they were not pleased.

The hon. gentleman says that if the Liberals were in power, they dare not reduce the duty below 20 per cent; yet he demands now that the duty must be swept away altogether. If it is any worse to introduce a resolution and then vote against it, than to take the course which I have proved my hon. friend has taken, I would like to know it. I think I am in the judgment of the House in saying that the hon. gentleman's position is quite as bad, if not even worse, as if he had introduced a motion and then voted against it.

I looked over the correspondence sent by my hon. friend to the "Leader" and in the issue of 19th April, 1894, I find the following:—

In Mr. Davin's speech on the tariff, he dwelt on the absurdity of the suggestion made by Sir Richard Cartwright, Mr. Charlton and others, that the Government, if sustained at the elections on the tariff, would not carry out its promises. He (Davin) pointed out that such a thing was never known as a government propounding a policy and winning on it, and then going back on it.

Now, forsooth, because he thinks that the Liberals won on a certain policy, he condemns them for not putting that policy in force. According to his own words, copied from his correspondence to the "Leader"—

He (Davin) pointed out that such a thing was never known as a Government propounding a policy and winning on it and then going back on it. But he said it was not uncommon for men in Opposition to propound opinions and propose measures in regard to which, on getting into office, they became silent.

I do not propose to devote very much more time to the hon. gentleman. His position recalls to my mind a couple of verses which I came across in a book I was reading the other day; and as the hon. gentleman himself has a weakness for inflicting quotations on the House, I presume he will not object to my giving him a return in kind, and to my taking the liberty of changing a few words in the quotation to suit the case.

Nick Davin, down at Moose Jaw's the blamed-est feller yet!

When he starts in a-talkin' other folks is apt to quit—

'Pears like that tongue o' his'n wuzn't made fer nuthin'

But jes' else to argify 'em down and gether in their pelts:

He'll talk you down on tariff; er he'll talk you down on tax,

And prove the pore man pays 'em all—and them's about the fac's!—

Religion, law, er politics, prize-fightin', er baseball—

Jes' tetch Nick up a little and he'll post you 'bout 'em all.

He stumped old West Assiniboia, through the sunshine and the rain,

And heit the banner up'ards from a-trailin' in the dust,

And cut loose on monopolies and cuss'd and cuss'd and cuss'd!

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In that portion of the hon. gentleman's speech which I read the other day, he compared our honoured leader to Napoleon, and after referring to the fact that certain streets in Paris had been called after Napoleon, when in the zenith of his power, and that, after his fall, their names were torn down and changed, he told that when promenading through Hull the other day, he saw that the name of an avenue had been changed to that of Laurier Avenue, and discovered that it led to a graveyard. Well, Mr. Speaker, I had occasion, the other afternoon, to take a constitutional through that locality, and I also came across the same avenue, but found that it did not lead to, but from a graveyard. And the graveyard was that in which the Conservative party was interred on the 23rd of June, 1896. And I would advise my hon. friend to get a plot there, just as quick as he can, because he will require it after the next general election. I would conclude with suggesting a motto for the little slab that may be raised over the mound beneath which the hon. gentleman is sure to sleep:

Under the spreading branches of these goose-berry bushes (planted by the remnants of the party who survived the tornado of June 23, 1896, and whose remains have not yet been interred), repose all that is mortal of Nicholas Flood Davin, poet, orator, statesman and philosopher, whose pretended efforts on behalf of the farmers of the North-west, whom he misrepresented for many years, were too transparent to preserve intact his majority of one.

P.S.—R.I.P.

I beg to move in amendment:

That all the words after "That" be struck out and the following substituted:—"The duty on agricultural implements be reduced to 10 per cent."

Mr. DAVIN. I do not think there is very much in what my hon. friend has said that requires any extended remarks from me, because it is quite evident his intention is to treat this serious motion of mine in favour of the farmers of the North-west as a farce. The hon. gentleman dwelt on my record. I do not need any defence, in the eyes of the farmers of the North-west, against any attacks by the hon. gentleman. Five hundred members for Lisgar, and his newspaper multiplied a hundred fold, would not affect my position with the farmers of the North-west Territories, because that position is entrenched in fifteen years of faithful service.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. What animal is that I hear? I saw a young lion in the window of one of the stores on Sparks Street, but that voice is clearly not the voice of a lion. I rather think it is the voice of an animal which I will not mention, because he has long ears and might hear me.

But take the session of 1891. In that session, in the matter of binder twine, I voted and even spoke against the motion of my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). Why? Because I was, as I am now, a protectionist, and up to that moment—nay, until

I went back and met my constituents at Moose Jaw—I had never heard in the Northwest a syllable against the duty on binder twine. But after I went back and my friends in that country explained to me how the thing was, what did I do? From the moment I became convinced that it was necessary to deal with the subject of binder twine, I pressed it on the Government, and it was in consequence of my pressure and action that the duty was lowered. It was not in consequence of any action on the part of the Postmaster General, because the Government did not care a snap for that hon. gentleman. If the hon. member for Lisgar will take the hint, let me impress on him now and the other members from the west, that if they will only exert pressure on this Government, we will get something done. What happened in the session of 1891? I moved the motion with regard to second homesteads, which I had been pressing on the Government ever since 1887. Sir John Macdonald, the most powerful politician that ever lived in Canada, and my personal friend as well as political leader, was against it, but that did not prevent my fighting that battle. When Sir John Macdonald was ill, and Sir John Thompson took his place, he was also against it and spoke against it that session of 1891, but that did not prevent my pressing it on. But what did the man do, who, the hon. member for Lisgar says, went back on his own motion? Sir, I divided the House and brought the Government majority down to 14; and I succeeded in obtaining for every farmer in the Territories who wanted it, a second homestead. I succeeded in enabling him to second homestead his pre-emption, and thus put $400 into his pocket and into the pockets of every homesteader in the west. Yet this man, who blows hot and cold in that newspaper of his own at Winnipeg, according to what he thinks suits his own purpose, and who only came into the House the other day, and who wimples and wobbles around here, putting up bogus motions like the one you have read, he says I do not prove my point. Let me tell what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) said when he was in the west, and then—

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a point of order. Is it in order for the hon. gentleman to characterize my motion as a bogus motion?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The expression is, perhaps, not out of order, but I do not think it is an expression that should be used. And I would say the same with regard to another expression that has fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), when referring to a member of the House he said "that man."

Mr. DAVIN. Did I say that man? I apologize to the hon. member (Mr. Richardson) for calling him "that man." It shows how one, in the heat of debate, is apt to forget himself. It would be impossible, with the deepest plummet that ever sounded the depths of the Atlantic to measure the depth of my respect for the hon. member. I am sorry I called him a man. Nothing on this earth would lead me to repeat any such misnomer with regard to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. EARLE. You will not do it again?

Mr. DAVIN. No, I will not do it again. I am easily corrected; I am corrigible, and, in that respect, I differ from the hon. member, who is incorrigible. I think that is parliamentary. Now, this is what the present Minister of Agriculture said when he was in the west. Speaking at Moosomin, as you will find in the Moosomin "Spectator" of October 4th, 1894, he said:

Because the United States Congress had made a standing offer of reciprocity in implements, and it was the duty of the Canadian Government to take advantage of that offer. Last year the farmers of western Canada imported $120,000 worth of American implements, on which they paid $40,000 duty. Referring to the Massey-Harris combination, he claimed that the fact that these people spoke of going to the States to fight the Yankees in their own market showed that Canadian manufacturers were able to get along without protection. Canadians were able to hold their own with the Yankees in any walk of life. If Massey-Harris got protection, why should not the farmers?

Now, that is exactly what we say. The hon. gentleman says I did not prove my point, though I quoted from the programme of 1893, I quoted the campaign sheet of 1895-96, I quoted his own leader and have just quoted the Minister of Agriculture. Sir, I might have quoted the hon. gentleman himself, because he is aware—and he has the proof in his own pocket—that there is a combine with regard to spades and shovels. He has placed before this House the evidence of that combine. And I say here that it is one of the strongest doctrines of protection that the very minute any industry resorts to a combine, that very minute, in the interests of protection, you should strike at that industry. And he himself, I think, knows that there is actually a combine in agricultural implements as well. One great industry has swallowed up a number of the others, and therefore he is bound, not only by what has taken place in this House, but by his own professions—because I believe his constituency was placarded, "Vote for free agricultural implements"—to take radical action upon that subject.

Let me deal briefly with one argument of the hon. gentleman. Would it be parliamentary to say that my hon. friend is a little fresh? It would not be elegant. I will not say it, therefore. He quoted an argument of mine in reply to the criticisms that though an amended tariff was put forward by the Conservative Government in 1894, represented by my hon. friend the member for York (Mr. Foster) as Finance Minister, that they would not adhere to it if they won the election that was supposed to follow in 1895—it was supposed that at that time that it would be held in that year. I argued that there was no such thing known up to that time as a Government winning on a policy that they had propounded in Parliament and carried before the people and going back on that policy, and he says I am inconsistent now because I say in regard to this Government that it should carry out its pledges made before it went to the country. Why, he should see that my argument means that these gentlemen are bound to carry out their pledges. What I said was that there was never such a thing known as a Government having propounded a policy in Parliament and having gone to the country upon it and won, going back on that policy. I had known instances before it was added to by this Government, I had known instances in the history of England where a party, though propounding a policy in opposition, had failed to carry it fully out, not indeed a formal policy, but had failed to carry out many pledges. But they were reprobated as I reprobate this Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Would the hon. gentleman allow me a word? The comment I made was made a little too soon. I should have read this paragraph before making it:

But, he said, it was not uncommon for men in opposition to propound opinions and propose measures in regard to which, on getting into office, they became silent.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear. Is that not what I say now; and is this not what these renegades say? Is not that parliamentary? If you will read in the speeches of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, I think you will find it used. If not, I will fall back upon the word "gang" or "crew," which, I think, was a favourite expression of his. If my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) is through with the "Hansard" containing Mr. Cleveland's motion, I would like to see it, as I cannot see it here.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will send the hon. gentleman the "Hansard."

Mr. DAVIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, what do you think that farmers of the country have paid on agricultural implements on which we here demand relief? They have paid, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, $93,474. That is on agricultural implements, pure and simple.

Sir CHARLES HUBBERT TUPPER. That is, if they pay the duty, as hon. gentlemen opposite say.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, if they do. I am arguing on the theory of hon. gentlemen opposite. Here we have the item of "harvesters, self-binding and without binders." The whole duty paid under this item for the year ending 30th June last was $40,647, of which $25,980 was paid in the west. On hoes the amount paid was $365, of which more than half was paid in the west. On horse-rakes, the duty was $2,760, of which $1,887 was paid in the west. On mowing machines the duty paid throughout Canada was $18,000, of which $8,700 was paid in the west. And so on. This shows that we in the west are deeply interested in this matter.

Now, in regard to the hon. gentleman's amendment, if he will tell me that there is any chance of its doing any good, I will help him. I will take it as an instalment. I do not refuse to vote for people on the opposite side, if I can help forward the end I am aiming at. The new members in this House must know that I have treated the Government side in a different way from what they have treated me. I have not shrunk from supporting them, if I could do anything for the farmers. Now, I will not cavil at the hon. gentleman's motion. If that will carry, if that motion that we will have 10 per cent—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Be reduced to 10 per cent, instead of 20 per cent.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I will vote for that motion, and next year, if the farmers are not content with that, and I do not think they should be with the promises they have from the Government, we can press further. But, with the hope of making some progress, I will vote for my hon. friend's motion, reducing it to 10 per cent, and I hope his own Government will now support him.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not intend to say anything on this motion, but after listening to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), I cannot refrain from noticing the peculiar position that he took with regard to this question. He moved an amendment to the motion, which amendment is, to have agricultural implements reduced to 10 per cent; but, instead of supporting that amendment by some argument, he used up nearly all his time in trying to convince the House that the hon. member for West Assinibola (Mr. Davin) was inconsistent, that he had not been sincere in his advocacy of the interests of the farmers of the North-west. The hon. member did not bring any argument to show that the western farmers required this reduction, or that they were suffering for want of it, or that his own party had been unfair to the people in leading them to believe that they would get such reduction upon coming into power. There was not a word in the interest of the western farmer, but his whole time was taken up in trying to prove the inconsistency of the hon. member for West Assinibola. He finished up that admirable speech by making some reference to a graveyard. He said he had been over to Hull and had made an examination of that new avenue, named Laurier Avenue, and he found that, instead of its leading to a graveyard, it led away from a graveyard. Well, I think it depends very much on which way the hon. gentleman was walking, and what time of the evening it was. May it not be possible that, when he examined it, he was going backwards? Then he went on to give us what he regarded as a beautiful epitaph that might be placed over the remains of the hon. member for West Assiniboia at some future time, when he would be laid in that silent place. I thought at the time, that the people of Canada, remembering the professions of his friends the Reform party, before they came into power, as to what they would do for the farmers and for Canada, remembering their promises to effect economies that would redound not only to the credit of the party, but to the benefit of the people of the country, how they would reduce the expenditure in this line and in that line, how they would effect sweeping reductions in the tariff in the interests of the farmers—I say, that the people of Canada, remembering all this, and remembering how little the Government has done in fulfilment of their promises, would be inclined to say that the sooner they are buried in oblivion, the better it will be for the country. If their remains were interred in that noted graveyard where that beautiful avenue has been named after the leader of their party, I think a proper epitaph to put up over them would be that which was said to be put up by the Cornishman over his wife after she died. It was this:

My wife is dead, and here she lies,
Nobody laughs and nobody cries;
Where she has gone or how she fares,
Nobody knows and nobody cares.

And so it would be with the Reform party. If they were buried in that notable place, I am sure the country would say:

Where they have gone and how they fare,
Nobody knows and nobody cares.

The hon. gentleman went on to show that, as a considerable number of agricultural implements had been imported, last year, from the United States, therefore the tariff which we now have, might fairly be considered a revenue tariff. Now, I do not know what impression he meant to convey, either to the House or to the country, by that argument, because his party declared, before they came into power, that their tariff would be at least a revenue tariff, that they would make such sweeping reductions in it as would make it a revenue tariff. Now, he adds that about one-half the implements used have been brought in from the United States, therefore the tariff might fairly be considered a revenue tariff. I presume, he meant the people to infer that they ought to be satisfied with the tariff we have to-day, that they ought to be inclined to believe that the present Government had, at least, been consistent in promising that the tariff would be a revenue tariff. But it is interesting to know what that hon. gentleman thought of the requirements of the situation before that tariff was made. I have here a copy of the Winnipeg "Tribune," which, I believe, is his paper, and I may be allowed to read to the House the view that he entertained as to what the western farmer was entitled to expect from his party, in the event of their coming into power. This article was written in December, 1896, before their tariff was introduced, and it is an interesting article to read at the present time, especially in view of what the hon. gentleman has said here to-day with regard to the amendment that is moved by the hon. member for West Assiniboia. Here is what I find in the Winnipeg "Tribune" on December 1st, 1896:

It would probably be unfair to prejudge the Dominion Government in the matter of tariff reforms, but to those of us who have entertained a deep conviction that the advent to power of the Liberal party meant sweeping reductions in the tariff—

And he goes on to speak of agricultural implements afterwards, upon which we now know there has been no reduction at all:

—and the placing of a large number of important articles upon the free list, the action of the Government in sending a committee of its Cabinet about the country to take evidence as to the tariff, has a rather disquieting effect. One would have thought that the leaders of the Liberal party knew enough about the tariff and its myriad of iniquities to effect a reformation without going to the manufacturers and saying in effect, "Will you tell us just what you can stand in the way of reductions? It seems to us that while no harm may probably be done by the inquiry, it is not calculated to inspire the confidence of the people who felt confident that tariff reform of a sweeping character would follow in the wake of the advent to power of the Liberal Government.

Mr. Speaker, how that hon. gentleman and his friends must have been disappointed, when they found that these sweeping reductions did not take place which were promised in the event of the advent of the Liberal party to power.

It may be that the Government will redeem the pledges made so profusely in the speeches of the Liberal leaders for the past five or ten years, as well as the promises contained in campaign literature.

It may be the wail of the future, but evidently they have not done it up to the present time.

We can only await the meeting of the House next February, when the Tariff Bill will doubtless be produced. There is no denying the fact, however, that there is considerable uneasiness felt in many quarters that the Government will not go as far in the matter of reforming the tariff as the country had been led to expect that

It would go if the Liberals were returned to power. With the example of the consequences that came to the Democratic party in the United States through failure to redeem the ante-election tariff reform pledges, the Liberal Government of Canada, if it makes a similar mistake, will make it with its eyes open.

I ask if hon. gentlemen opposite made the mistake with their eyes open? The country and the western farmers will notice that not a word has been said since.

The farmers of Canada have for years been led to expect from the speeches of the Liberal leaders, and especially the speeches of Mr. Laurier himself, that the advent of a Liberal Government to power meant the sweeping away of the tariff from all articles which entered into the life of the settler;—

I presume among those were agricultural implements.

—or if not the sweeping away of that tariff, at least a very great reduction.

Where did the reduction come when the tariff was remodelled? There was no reduction made whatever.

In this country we want free agricultural implements,——

Did the hon. gentleman vote for it?

—free twine,——

They have had it since January.

—free barbed wire, free lumber, free nails, free fruit, and the tariff reduced on a great many articles. If the Government is unable to grant us this boon, it ought at least to go as far as possible in slashing down the tariff on all such articles. It may be that the Government will do all that we expect along this line, but meantime it can do no harm to stir up its pure mind by the way of remembrance.

The party's mind was disturbed, and hon. gentlemen brought down a tariff, but it left the farmer very much in the same position as before in regard to many articles that enter into the settler's life, and especially agricultural implements, which are so important, and which the hon. gentleman now moves should be reduced to 10 per cent. The hon. member for Lisgar does not think they need be made free.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the hon. gentleman vote for the amendment?

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman should be more concerned as to whether he will vote for it. I have shown what hon. gentlemen opposite promised to accomplish in the event of their accession to power, and the hon. gentleman should now endeavour to square himself with the Government and with his constituents. It is not my funeral, it is that of the hon. gentleman and his friends, and it rests upon the hon. member to show where he stands as regards the position he occupied a few years ago, and to satisfy the western farmers, either that he was wrong then, or that he is inconsistent now, or that he was shielding his friends when he stated what he regarded to be in the best interests of the people of the west at that particular time.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Although this is a motion on a particular item, I think the House will agree that we appear to have drifted into a general discussion of the Budget, notwithstanding the fact that we agreed this afternoon that the Budget debate should be postponed to a future day.

Mr. SPROULE. I was only referring to last year's Budget, not to this year's Budget.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is not the only member who spoke, and consequently my observations are true. We all agree, I think, that it would be better not to go into a discussion of the Budget, and as there is an unavoidable tendency on the part of hon. gentlemen who rise to discuss this motion to drift into a debate on the Budget generally, I think I shall meet the wishes of both sides of the House, if I move, as I now do, that the debate on this motion be adjourned.

Mr. CLANCY. It seems to me that this is scarcely the proper way for hon. gentlemen opposite to get rid of a rather awkward motion. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman in moving the amendment is sincere or not. It is pretty clear that hon. gentlemen occupying the Treasury benches have no notion of voting for that motion, and the Finance Minister has taken occasion, on the plea that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House are liable to enter into what would be a very undesirable discussion, to move the adjournment of the debate. I agree that as regards the tariff discussion, it should be left to a time when it can properly be taken up. But is that the true reason actuating the hon. Minister in moving the adjournment of the debate? I think if a division be taken, he will find that his colleagues and himself will vote against the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment on this occasion. The question before the House is simply whether there should be a reduction on farming implements or not. It is a question whether the Government have fulfilled their pledges to the people of the North-west. It is easy to understand why the farmers of the North-west and Manitoba are most anxious to have free implements. It is not because a protectionist tariff is unfair in its provisions, but owing to the heavy railway freights they have sometimes been compelled to buy goods in the United States rather than in Canada. I am not, however, going to enter into a discussion of that phase of the question; but let us not trifle with the issue now before the House. I observe that the hon. member (Mr. Richardson) is now withdrawing from the Chamber.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not doing so.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman should not tamely assent to an adjournment of the debate, but he should insist on having a division.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Take a division, and let us see the result.

Mr. CLANCY. I am glad the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has assented to a division being taken. I am not in favour of a proposition to reduce the duty to 10 per cent on farming implements. The interest of the farmers are wrapped up with those of the manufacturers, and no industry can stand alone. I am disposed to vote condemnation on hon. gentlemen opposite on the ground that they made pledges they have not fulfilled. It is a sad condition when leaders of a great political party make pledges and fail to carry them out. We should lay down a rule that when a great party commits itself on any important question, as hon. gentlemen opposite have committed themselves, they should fulfil their pledges, unless they are able to submit substantial reasons, such as changed circumstances, or that public opinion was against them, or that pledges had been made which could not be fulfilled. For my part I shall vote against it, as I have consistently believed on all occasions that we should have a proper means of distributing the burdens of the people of this country, on the manufacturers, the farmers and all classes alike. I believe that all should bear their fair share of the national expenditure.

Mr. DAVIN. It looks to me as if the amendment of my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) was made with a view of allowing a motion like this of the Finance Minister to come from the Treasury benches and so let them down easily. Before I speak on the question of adjournment, I call your attention to the fact that the motion is out of order and I ask your decision on it. I may say that if we are allowed a vote, and if my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) will assure me there is a chance that the Government will accept his proposition, I will vote for his amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) be kind enough to state his point of order.

Mr. DAVIN. The point is that a private member moves that a certain definite change be made in the tariff. It does not add to the burdens of the people, I admit, and in that way it may be held to be in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. If this motion of the hon. member (Mr. Richardson) is out of order, then the motion of the hon. member (Mr. Davin) would be out of order for the same reason.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There seems to be a distinction, Mr. Speaker, between the two motions if my reading of the text of Dr. Bourinot's book be correct. There is a distinction between a motion for the removal of duty altogether, and a motion to establish a certain fixed duty. At page 557 of Dr. Bourinot's book I find this in connection with the imposition of taxes :

But it is not regular to propose a new and distinct tax, which is not a mere increase—

That of course does not apply.

—or diminution of a duty upon an article already recommended by Government for taxation. But any proposition for the repeal of a duty is always in order.

I understand the main motion is a recommendation for the repeal of a duty.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). No, it is simply a censure on the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think that either motion is out of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish a few words of personal explanation. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has insinuated that the motion of the Minister of Finance is the result of an understanding with myself, in order to side-track the question and prevent a division. I am sure the Minister of Finance will exonerate me from any charge of the kind. My amendment was in perfect good faith, and the idea of adjourning the debate was never suggested to me.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There was certainly no understanding between my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) and myself. I quite understood that in making the motion, in all probability the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) would not concur in it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He accepts the situation, though.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not know that he does.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend (Mr. Richardson), amongst a number of statements he made about myself, quoted what he said last year and to which I did not think it worth while then to reply. He (Mr. Richardson) said :

When Mr. Cleveland's motion was put to place coal oil on the free list, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) voted against it.

Now, Sir, there was no division whatever on Mr. Cleveland's motion. Mr. Cleveland, on Thursday, February 9th, 1893, moved :

That is it expedient to place coal oil on the free list.

And at six o'clock the debate terminated and there never was any division on it. I look in "Hansard" amongst the list of divisions, and there is no division whatever on the motion. Here is the "Hansard" of 1893 to prove it. This is just a sample, Mr.

Speaker, of the reckless statements made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) here. There is not a shadow of foundation for the statement that I voted against Mr. Cleveland's motion. If the motion of the Minister of Finance is carried now, it will throw the matter over and we will never reach it again this session. I think it very desirable that we should have the opinion of this House as to how it regards the conduct of the Government in being false to its pledges on this matter of agricultural implements. Question, Mr. Speaker.

House divided on amendment to amendment (Mr. Fielding) to adjourn the debate:

YEAS :

Amendment to amendment agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) has not voted.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I am afraid I have committed an error in voting. I have a standing pair with the hon. leader of the Opposition, and, although I am not sure that I am at all breaking it, yet, for safety's sake, my name had better be omitted.

Mr. HUGHES. I am paired with the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram).

Mr. FORTIN. I am paired with the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin). I thought I might vote on this question, but as doubts have been expressed, I wish to withdraw my vote.

Mr. CLARKE. I am paired with the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmalee).

Mr. FEATHERSTON. I am paired with the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Carscallen). Otherwise, I would have voted for the amendment to adjourn the debate.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I have a standing pair with the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Gilmour). If I had not been paired, I would have voted for the amendment to adjourn the debate.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Perhaps, after this exhausting and exhaustive debate, I may perhaps suit the wishes of the House by moving that the House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 12th April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FAST LINE SERVICE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask my right hon. friend, who, I am delighted to see, is able to be in his place in the House to-day, and especially as I observe the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Dobell) is also in his place, if he is able to give the House any information as to the present position and prospects of the fast line service.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am much pleased with the kind words of the hon. gentleman with reference to me personally. I am not prepared at this moment to make any statement on the matter to which my hon. friend has just alluded, but to-morrow I will be able to make a statement.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding: "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to acknowledge the kind courtesy of the hon. gentlemen opposite in allowing this debate to be adjourned from a day of last week until to-day, owing to some slight indisposition of my own. I hope I shall be able some day to retaliate in like kind by allowing the Finance Minister one or two more days of grace when he gets into a hard place, and does not find himself quite ready at the moment.

The Minister of Finance, in the opening part of his address, congratulated the House on two things: On the condition of the country, and on the results of the policy of the party now in power. I think it would probably have been wiser if he had confined his congratulations to the first subject, and not have mooted the second. In congratulating the House on the condition of the country, he would not raise a very debatable question. I am happy at the outset to be able to agree with him, in the main, as to the general condition and progress of the country, and to agree with him in the main on the panegyric—I can call it nothing else—not undeserved, not unbased, which he passed upon the results of the year 1896-97, and which took up the larger part of his speech. Before, however, going into the subject matter more particularly, there are one or two smaller matters to which we may devote a moment, not for their intrinsic merit, but as forming merely controversial subjects which have come up. The Minister of Finance rather rallied me on certain statements and forecasts or predictions which I made at a preceding session of the House as to the general outcome, from a financial point of view. As I said, it is not of very much importance whether myself or the Finance Minister, for that matter, were strictly accurate in forecasts which were made a year or so before the event; but for fear some of the more thoughtless partisans on the opposite side of the House may have been led to believe that I only was the sinner in this respect, and that the Finance Minister's predictions were well based, it might be well for me to make just a passing reference to that matter.

I acknowledge that my hon. friend had the advantage of me, as the person who holds the reins of the expenditure always has the advantage of the outsider, who is not able so far to look into the workings of both revenue and expenditure as the Finance Minister holding the portfolio for the time being, and who certainly has little or nothing to do with restraining expenditure. It will be remembered that I made my forecasts upon the condition of things and the trend of the Administration so far as it was apparent at that time. I stated that the revenues for 1896-97 would be $36,000,000. They turned out to be $37,829,000, an excess of some $1,200,000. It is a singular circumstance that on looking over the Canadian Gazette a day or two ago, I found that when you compare the excise revenues for the current year with the excise revenues for 1896-97, up to 31st March of each year, the deficit during the current year, that is the overplus during the preceding year, was exactly $1,211,000; so that if it had not been for that extraordinary pressure under which the excise accrued with such astonishing rapidity out of its normal rate, my estimate would have been right to $10,000. But the Finance Minister, who was inside and should have been able to have made a very accurate forecast, was also the small matter of half a million dollars out of his calculations as to the revenues. In expenditure I have still more the advantage. I estimated that the expenditure, taking the basis of the expenditure up to that time and arguing that the same trend of expenditure would be observed, would be $38,600,000. I estimated it just $200,000 too much. But the Finance Minister represented that the expenditure would be $37,850,000, and in that forecast he was exactly $500,000 too little; so that in that respect, although I overshot the mark by $200,000, the hon. gentleman undershot the mark, so to speak, by $500,000. When we come to the matter of deficit, that does not need to be followed out, because if one makes a mistake on revenue or expenditure or the forecast does not come out in these, the result will be in accordance therewith, so far as deficit is concerned.

On capital expenditure I estimated that $4,300,000 would be spent. The Finance Minister estimated that he would spend $3,400,000. There was actually spent $4,500,000; so that my estimate was $200,000 too little, but the estimate of the Finance Minister was $900,000 too little. In the addition or increase of debt, I estimated $4,000,000 increase. The Finance Minister estimated an increase of $1,750,000. I was $900,000 too much; my hon. friend was $1,290,000 too little. If the receipts from inland revenue had been at all normal, my predictions would have been carried out almost to the figure. As they were, my predictions, of course, being based only on what might normally occur, were out that much. I thought it worth while to bring this matter to the attention of the House lest, as I have said, some too excessive partisans behind the Government benches might think that the present Finance Minister was infallible, and that the only fallible predictor was the ex-Finance Minister.

The hon. gentleman also rallied me on my statement that he would have to borrow $10,000,000 in 1896-97. He declared he did not borrow $10,000,000 in 1896-97. No, he did not; he postponed it exactly three months, and then went into the money market and borrowed $10,000,000. I am willing to let the hon. gentleman have the benefit of that small period of grace he can possibly wish. He said I declared that they were entering on a year of reckless expenditure which was to end in disaster. I wish I had used the word era, instead of year, and then we should have obtained a little more time, and in order to get a good arbiter time must be given in which to prove it. But if the end is disaster, when a Government supported by a party which in its rank and file and leadership made its greatest canvass in the country on the plank that it was going to lop off from the expenditure, succeeded during the very first full year in adding $1,400,000 to the expenditure, I may well say that even that year ended in disaster; and if the succeeding year, with an expenditure of $1,800,000 promised to us greater than 1896-97, does not, in view of the pledges publicly given and accepted, end in disaster. So far as party faith and party consistency is concerned, I am not willing to take back my words. Let time be the arbiter; but let us have a sufficiency of time, and I think it will be found out that hon. gentlemen in return for the pledges given to the country on the side of economy in expenditures, will be found to have recorded promises violated and repudiated, and the year certainly will end in disaster to them in that way.

I next wish to say a word or two with respect to the loan. As regards the rate at which the loan was placed upon the British market, I entirely agree with the Minister of Finance in his action in placing it at half per cent lower than the two preceding loans were placed on the market. I disagree with him entirely in his unfortunate remark that it was an experiment. I deny that it was an experiment. The Finance Minister in placing his loan on the London market at a lower rate was following a long line of precedents and a safe line of precedents, and with the premium at which our lowest rate loan then stood on the English market, it would have been a blunder, to say nothing stronger, to have placed a loan on the market at 3 per cent; it was nothing more or less than any prudent business man would have done, and was not in any sense an experiment for Canada, with her credit so safe, assured and undoubted as it was at the time the Finance Minister put the loan on the market. We have had drops in the rate per cent. In 1884 there was a drop from 4 per cent for 1879 to a $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent loan. The net cost was $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; and the net gain was one-quarter per cent from the ruling of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent before. In 1888 another drop took place, and a 3 per cent loan was placed on the market, following the $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent loan of 1885. That cost $3\frac{1}{2}$ and was a gain of $\frac{1}{8}$ ths of 1 per cent upon the rate of the preceding loan.

In 1897, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) placed a $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent loan upon the market, following the 3 per cent loan of 1894, netting $2\frac{1}{2}$ in cost, with a gain of 7-24ths of 1 per cent over the preceding ruling of $3\frac{1}{2}$. Now, Sir, let us compare these. The gain in 1884 from 4 per cent to $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent was 6-24ths of 1 per cent; in 1888 from $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to 3 per cent it was 20-24ths of 1 per cent, and in 1897 the loan of the hon. gentleman (Mr.

Fielding) was a gain of 7-24ths of 1 per cent. Therefore, the gain in percentage on the net cost of the loan, governed by the rate of interest, was 20-24ths in 1888, as against 7-24ths in 1897, and as against 6-24ths in 1884. Consequently, although the loan in 1897 was a good loan, and although the gain was a perceptible gain, the gain was not half as much as the gain in the drop from $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to the 3 per cent loan in 1888. Neither was it so popular a loan. The loan of 1892 had 420 tenderers; the loan of 1894 had 566 tenderers, and was subscribed six times over; the loan of 1897 had 183 tenderers only, and was subscribed only twice over. While we may justly laud our country and its credit, and feel satisfied with the loan of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), it is a mistake, in the first place, to say, that it was an experiment; in the second place, that it was the best loan that was ever put on the market, and, in the third place, that it marked the greatest drop in the rate of interest of any loan put upon the market.

Now, having said all that, I grant that, when you come to 3 per cent, or $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, or 2 per cent, you cannot expect such large drops in the absolute credit; but what I mean to say is this, that, taking the precedent history of Canada, taking its high range of credit at the time—its threes running to 106 and 107—taking the stable home conditions of this country, the Minister of Finance could have done nothing else, and he did perfectly right in placing the loan at a $2\frac{1}{2}$ rate. And though he did not get within a point or two of what some of us hoped he would get, he made a good loan, and the effect of it will be felt in succeeding financial transactions which this country will have on the money markets of England. It was a good loan and well placed; but it is Canada that stands at the back of that loan, and it was the condition and progress of the country running through an antecedent history of thirty years, which made it possible for us to congratulate ourselves on both sides of the House, upon the fine position which Canada has assumed in the money markets of the world.

While I am speaking on the loan, I will mention the cognate subject of the reductions which have been made in the savings bank interest rate. When I was incumbent of the office of Minister of Finance, a considerable time after the $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent loan had been placed upon the market in London, I recommended a reduction of the rate of interest on savings bank deposits from 4 to $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I did so because the difference between the rates at which money could be borrowed at that time upon the London market, all costs and charges included, and the savings bank rate, was too great a difference to justify the country in calling upon the taxpayers to pay the difference between these two rates. But, at the same time, I recognize the view—which I think, is a view which will be recognized by this House—that, owing to circumstances which I shall detail a little more hereafter, it is a wise and prudent thing for the Government of this country to give to the lenders inside the country itself as good, yes, and a little better interest than is given to those who loan us money from the outside. There are so many advantages in connection with the latter that it weighs against even a considerable percentage of difference between the amounts that you give as interest. Now, Sir, on July 1st, 1897, the present Government, acting upon the same rule, with our 3 per cents up to, and a little above, par, came to the conclusion that the rate should be reduced, and it was reduced from 3½ per cent to 3. With that I was entirely in accord, but I think it would have been well if the Government for the present had rested there, and had gone no further. To me it is plain that they would have rested there, if their necessities, or their lack of courage, had not counselled them to the course which they have taken, and which is the opposite of the course for which I have been arguing up to this time.

What were the reasons given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) as to why he proposes, on the first of next July, to reduce the rate of savings bank interest from 3 per cent to 2½ per cent? The reason that he gave is this, that he wanted the banks to borrow more cheaply than they otherwise would be enabled to do. He said that the banks were lenders as well as borrowers, or borrowers as well as lenders, and his argument was, that if the banks could borrow more cheaply, they would lend more cheaply, and, consequently, that the general business of the country would be benefited thereby. Now, suppose we admit that reasoning; the moment you carry it beyond a certain point, and that point a fair and reasonable value for money, that moment you are reasoning upon false premises, and if you come to a conclusion from them, you are coming to a conclusion which is not well based. The banks are borrowers as well as lenders, and the Government is a borrower as well as a spender.

The Government, to spend, must borrow; and it has to borrow in the outside market or in the country itself, or in both. Up to this time, the policy of the Government has been to borrow part of its moneys from the people of this country itself. There was one other reason to which the hon. Finance Minister gave expression, in which I do not agree. He gave as the reason for the establishment of the Government savings bank the necessity of having a place of safe deposit for the savings of the people. Sir, I make bold to say that if that had been the reason, and the only reason, we would never have had a Government savings bank established in this country at all. The banking system of this country has proved itself so safe and so sound, that as furnishing an element of security for the deposits of the people has, it has never been called into question to such an extent, as to make it necessary for the Government, in order to safeguard the deposits of the people, to establish a Government savings bank. But the underlying principle of the establishment of a Government savings bank was the encouragement of habits of thrift among the people at large, by placing this means of saving at their disposal. The hon. Minister of Finance was therefore upon entirely unteuable ground when he narrowed the argument for the establishment of Government savings banks down to the statement that they were necessary in order to furnish the people with places of safe deposit for their savings. Whereas the main reason, the sole reason, in fact, for their establishment was the encouragement of thrift and saving habits among the people at large.

Neither do I agree with him in his effort to make us believe that the savings banks, established and maintained by the Government, have lost their old purpose. Strange argument, too! He gave us, first, as their only purpose, the providing of a place of safe deposit; but by using the second argument, he showed that, in his mind, he went back to the real reason why these banks were established, and that was the encouragement of thrift and saving habits in the people. He said that the reason for Government savings banks, namely, to furnish a place of deposit for the savings of the poorer classes no longer existed, because, as a rule, the deposits in them were made, not by the poorer classes, but mainly by people who use these banks as a convenience. I take issue with the hon. gentleman on that point, and the statistics of the savings department will, I believe, bear me out in the statement that the deposits in the Government savings banks are those of men of small means—men of salary, with gains not sufficient, in any one year or six months, to enable them to make an outside and permanent investment, but only sufficient to allow them a little margin between their earnings and what is necessary to keep them, which they can conveniently place, from time to time, in the savings banks, and so add to their little store, and in this way is encouraged that most useful of all habits, the habit of thrift and saving. Why is it that my hon. friend should be so concerned for the bases of supply for the banks of the country that he refuses to do justice to the small savers the whole Dominion through? Why is it? Did he justify himself, when in reply to my hon. friends who said to him: "You are not doing much for the poor man," he made that smart, but not very well based retort, that there are a great many poorer men in the country who object to paying the interest to the poor men who have deposits in the banks. To my mind the proper way to look at it is this. The taxes of the country are taken, to a certain extent, to pay what? To pay the interest on the debt which the Government owes. The Government owe to the savings bank depositors \$50,000,000. That is a Government loan. The taxpayers are paying interest on the Government loan; and it is an unfair way of putting it, to say that they are paying interest to a number of depositors and that therefore it is a grievance to them. What rule of right is there by which the hon. gentleman can fly to the rescue of the banks as against the savers of the country? By what rule does he pay $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest to money lenders and refuse to pay that much by $\frac{1}{2}$ of one per cent to the people of the country who deposit in the Government savings banks? For fifty years the poor men and the rich men of this country alike will be paying $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest on the ten million dollars that my hon. friend borrowed, whilst the thrifty savers of the country are docked $\frac{1}{2}$ of one per cent for every dollar that they loan to the Government. For forty years from this date, the poor people and the rich people of this country will be paying interest on fifty million dollars which does not mature until 1938, and will be paying a rate of one-half per cent more than my hon. friend is willing to allow to the savers of this country who deposit their money in the Government savings bank. And for eleven years yet the Government will be obliged to pay $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on 25 million dollars which does not mature until 1909 or thereabouts, while they are paying just one per cent less to the poor thrifty classes of the country who put their money in the Government savings banks and thus make a loan of it to the Government. Why make this distinction? Was there not enough reason for the establishment of the Government savings bank in the argument that it does conduce to thrifty habits? Where is the enlightened and advanced country in the world that has not its Government savings banks established, and established for that purpose and on that principle? Not one. Suppose, for instance, that the depositors in the Government savings banks should take my hon. friend at his word and should say to him: Then get your money in London at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; we will take out our fifty million dollars. What would that mean? It would mean that \$1,500,000 per year of interest, which now is distributed throughout the length and breadth of the country to these savers, would be sent out of the country into the pockets of the money lenders of foreign countries. Is it a slight thing to have the interest upon a large proportion of the money that the Government must loan to carry on its administration distributed among the thrifty class of this country as a income coming to them every six months of the year—distributed everywhere, permeating every channel of business, every artery and vein of trade and traffic in this country? Or would it be better to have all that paid out of this country into a foreign country? I think no one will say that the latter is the better plan.

Take another argument. Is it not well that the masses of this country should have that intelligent and permanent interest in its institutions and Government which comes in no way better and is held in no way stronger than by the fact that they have not only a stake in the country, but a direct personal, monetary interest in the Government and the institutions of the country as well. The stability of France and its wonderful progress and prosperity among its peasant class is due to that fact very largely indeed. And, therefore, I say, my hon. friend has made a mistake in reducing the interest on savings bank deposits in this country one single fraction less than the rates we are obliged to pay for money in the other markets of the world. And, Sir, I state broadly my conviction, which I hinted at a moment ago, that if it had not been for the necessities or cowardice of my hon. friend, he would not have made this cut in the savings bank interest. Why, Sir, in the cut of 1 per cent which will take place after 1st July, 1898, in the interest of the savings bank deposits, the Government will save half a million dollars. Are they giving that money back to the country? Have their estimates of expenditure been cut down by that amount? Their estimates of expenditure, Sir, are above, and much above, what they were, even though they will save $500,000 a year by this cut. Having determined upon their rate of expenditure, there was one of two things for them to do. One was to put that much extra taxation upon the country. They did not dare to do that. The other was to put this tax upon the thrift, upon the saving habits of the people and dock the savings bank depositors by that amount. I leave it to this House and to the country to judge which was the better way.

Now, Sir, after having made these observations, I desire to ask whether my hon. friend felt that he could congratulate the House and the country upon the policy of the Administration as shown in its management of the finances for the year 1896-97. Hon. gentlemen must expect, so long as they make pledges and do not fulfil them, so long as they obtain their seats by promises, which they first evade and then violate, and then repudiate, that they will have this state of things brought to their minds, and that very forcibly. Not, I candidly say, because I believe that it will have any effect upon the hon. gentlemen themselves, but because I know and believe that this country demands the fulfilment of the pledges of public men, and, though hon. gentlemen ignore it, they must reckon with it by and by when they meet the electors face to face. On this matter of the administration of the finances for 1896-97, does my hon. friend venture to congratulate his party and the country? Let us see?

The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who is not now present, but who is somewhere within the precincts of the House, in 1895, after the memorable convention of 1893, which laid down the platform of the party, declared, in elucidation of one section of that platform:

The Liberal party, if in power, could at once reduce the public expenditure and effect other savings to the extent of $5,000,000 per annum, without impairing the efficiency of the service.

The Prince Edward Island political primer—and now you will see my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) wake up—which is responsible for the utterances of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) declared in well accentuated and well defined terms and under broad headlines—

The Liberal party says that several millions may be lopped off the present expenditure, without injury to the public service. Hon. David Mills estimates the probable saving at $4,000,000.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). What paper is the hon. gentleman quoting from?

Mr. FOSTER. I am quoting from the political primer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no such paper.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a periodical paper.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I never heard of it.

Mr. FOSTER. It came into existence and was distributed by hundreds of thousands of copies, I suppose, all through the hon. gentleman's province about the time of certain elections that took place in 1896.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) lay a copy of it on the Table?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) has had several copies on his table which he now, very conveniently, lays under the table.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I never heard of the thing at all.

Mr. FOSTER. It gave the platform and principles of the Reform party, gave the statements of the Liberal leaders, and was the political primer by which the Liberal party in the maritime provinces, and in Prince Edward Island especially, were to be guided in their estimate of political parties. And so, in that political primer, the hon. gentleman gave voice to the statement which I have already read. Well, Sir, the leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who is now convalescent and may be able to bear the shock of even a repe-dition of a pledge which he made to the public, said:

And, moreover, they tell us that, if we were in power, we could not retrench and economize. But I do not believe that it will be a difficult task. It would not be a very difficult task to economize to the extent of one, two, three, and Mr. Mills told his constituents a few days ago that it was possible to retrench to the extent of four millions a year.

In Toronto the hon. gentleman said:

Has the expenditure gone down? No. It has gone up. It went up by one, two, three, five, ten millions, and more, until it is now thirty-eight millions and the Conservatives do not shrink from it, but swallow it all. If we get into power we will follow the example of Mr. Mackenzie, and I say that, although we may not be able to bring back the expenditures to what they were under him, we can reduce the amount two, yes, three millions of dollars per year.

And, Sir, the party itself, in solemn conclave assembled, under the motion of Mr. Gibbons, which was unanimously passed, declared:

We cannot but view with alarm the large increase of the public debt and of the controllable annual expenditure of the Dominion, and the consequent undue taxation of the people under the Governments that have been continuously in power since 1878, and we demand a strict economy in the administration of the Government of the country.

And last, Sir, but not least, as representative of these pledges, is a citation from my hon. friend, now the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who, on a certain occasion, to wit, in 1896, in his place in this Parliament, declared, after I had brought down the Budget:

For my own part, I do not hesitate to tell him that I consider a yearly expenditure of, $40,000,000, or $38,300,000, altogether too large for the present resources of Canada. I say it is a disgrace and a shame to the Government that have been entrusted with our affairs that they come down to us and ask for an expenditure of $38,300,000 a year for federal purposes. Sir, the thing is utterly unjustifiable. Sir, there is very little use for hon. gentlemen whining over this matter. They ought to try and meet it, and the way to meet it is to reduce our present establishment, to reduce your present extravagant mode of government, and to reduce your extravagant ideas. I have said before, and I repeat it, that $38,000,000 is, in my judgment, a monstrous sum for this people to be called on to provide for.

These, Sir, are simply sample statements of the leaders of the party, and of the party itself, in which they solemnly pledged themselves and their party to the country as to the policy they would pursue, if they were put in power by the votes of the electorate. They have been put in power by the votes of the electorate on that pledge. Let us now see whether the hon. gentlemen can congratulate themselves upon fulfilling this particular pledge. What about the debt of the country? Well, the debt of the country increased while we were in power, from 1890 to 1896, on the average, $2,652,900 per year; the last year of our administration the increase was $3,028,000. The increase in 1896-97, under hon. gentlemen opposite, was $3,041,163, and the increase for 1897-98, the current year, as given by the Finance Minister himself, after eight months of the year has elapsed, is $4,500,000, or $1,500,000 over the increase of 1896, and $1,900,000 over and above the average yearly increase of the debt from 1890 to 1896. So much, then, for their pledge with reference to the increase of the debt.

Now, how about taxation? Well, from 1892 to 1896, the customs revenue of the country averaged $19,839,684. In 1897 it went up to $19,891,996. In 1898, the Finance Minister estimates that it will be $21,000,000, and in 1899, he estimates that it will be still $21,000,000. So, Sir, for 1898 and 1899 the amount that will be raised from the people of this country by customs taxation alone will be $1,200,000 greater than it was, on the average, between 1892 and 1896—that is customs impost alone. It was strange, that, when the hon. gentleman was telling what a large amount he proposed to collect next year from customs, to wit, $21,000,000, some one on that side of the House, in a moment of thoughtlessness, or of weakness, commenced to cheer him, but suddenly left off when they recollected that what they were cheering was an increase of the burdens of taxation upon the people, which they pledged their constituents to lower. Well, go a little further. We will take the total taxation, made up by both customs and excise. The average, from 1892 to 1896, was $27,710,000. But, when this economical Government came into power, the taxation suddenly raised, in 1896-97, to $28,648,620. In 1898, it is estimated at $29,000,000, and in 1899 it is estimated at $29,500,000. So that the total of taxes to be raised in 1899 is $1,800,000 greater than it was in 1896-97, and that much greater than it was, on the average, from 1892 to 1896. Take the total revenue of the country, which must come from the country and be paid by the country, and whereas we raised, from 1892 to 1896, $36,400,000 per year, in 1896-97 they raised $37,800,000; in 1897-98 they are to raise $39,300,000, and in 1899 they are to raise $40,500,000, or $4,000,000 more of a total revenue than we raised, on the average, between 1892 and 1896.

But hon. gentlemen may say: We are not increasing the burdens of taxation. Well, the burden of taxation is measured by the amount that you take from the pockets of the people. The amount that you take from the pockets of the people will be $4,000,000 more in 1898-99 than it was in 1895-96. If you take it from the people, the people must pay it. Oh, but you say: We have reduced the tariff very largely; and the Minister of Finance read, the other day, a list of reductions they have made in the tariff. It is wonderful, Mr. Speaker, how often this reduction in individual rates brought down by the Minister of Finance does not work out the enormous reduction that he expected, when he comes to the actual results of trade and commerce. Let us see how it works out in this respect. In 1893 the rate per cent on dutiable and free goods entered for home consumption was 17·88; in 1896 it was 18·28; in 1897, 17·87. The average from 1892 to 1896 was less than the rate per cent upon dutiable and free goods in 1896-97. But on dutiable goods alone, entered for home consumption in Canada, how do the figures stand? In 1893 that duty was 30·28; in 1894 it was 30·87; in 1895, 30·87; in 1896, 30·07, and in 1897, 30·04, or a reduction in that year of exactly 3-100ths of 1 per cent. But my hon. friend says that is not a fair comparison, because in 1896-97 we only have about two months, from the 22nd April to the 30th June in which the duty was lowered. Grant that. Then, let us take the records of the trade for the first six months of this current year, when hon. gentlemen have had their tariff in operation up to the extent of one-half of the preferential, at least. And what happened, Sir? We find that the rate per cent upon the imports of dutiable goods taken for home consumption for this six months is 29·59 per cent, which, subtracted from the rate for 1896-97, gives a lowering of exactly 4-500ths of 1 per cent in the rate of duty which this country is paying upon dutiable goods entered for home consumption. That is the whole saving. So whereas, in the last year, we charged 30·07 per cent, this year, or the half of it, they are charging 29·59 per cent upon all dutiable goods entered for home consumption.

But, outside of that, we are asked to put on new taxation this year. Not only is there to be a saving of half a million dollars after the beginning of next year, screwed out of the savers and thrifty depositors in the savings bank, for which the country gets not one dollar in remission of taxation, but there is also to be new taxation placed upon the country. To what amount, and under what pretense? Under the pretense, Sir, of helping sister colonies in distress, under the pretense of taking part of the Imperial load, and helping England to carry it. A proposition is made, first, quietly to raise the taxes on raw sugar and refined sugar, and then with a blare of trumpets to say to the West Indian colonies: We will let you in here with your sugar at the preferential rate. They first take the precaution to so far raise the dead level rate that when the percentage taken off for the preferential reduction is made, they will still pay a greater tax than that imposed when brought in here to-day. Under these circumstances and this pretense we are asked to place a duty on sugar. Three hundred and thirty million pounds were brought into this country last year; 25,000,000 of that came from the West Indies. How much will come under the new arrangement? The Finance Minister could not tell, he could not even guess. No man can tell accurately; but I have this to predict, and I will hazard it and let time again be the arbiter: that the Finance Minister stands to-day to gain, under this imposition of the duty on sugar, somewhere between $250,000 and $350,000 of revenue in the full year from the time it goes into operation. How splendid it is to help the West Indian colonies in their struggle! How equally splendid it is, under the guise of high Imperial sympathies and brotherly help, to obtain $300,000 or $400,000 of taxes to aid the expenditures of the country, but to give no relief to any home interest by your action. So much with respect to the pledges of hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to taxation.

Now as to the expenditure? From 1887 to 1896 we, under our administration, expended an average of $36,850,000 on consolidated fund account. In 1896, the last year of our administration, for a time, we expended $36,949,142. The right hon. Prime Minister, when he was not Prime Minister, but when his word was trusted as I fear to-day it is not trusted, declared that when he and his party came into power, they would reduce the expenditure by one, two or three millions of dollars, and the Hon. David Mills said four millions. How has the right hon. gentleman redeemed his word? By reducing the expenditure for 1896-97 by one, two or three million? No; but by increasing it by $1,400,000, as his own Finance Minister acknowledged when he stood before the House last week and delivered his Budget speech. But time is required, and as the hon. gentleman could not make the reduction last year, perhaps my hon. friend intends to implement his pledge during the current year. If so he has an account to settle with his Finance Minister, who publicly declared that during the current year the expenditure would be $38,750,000 on consolidated fund account, which is exactly $1,800,000 more than we spent in 1896, and is $400,000 more than hon. gentlemen opposite themselves spent last year. But perhaps time is not yet ripe, and my right hon. friend will see fit to implement his promise during 1898-99. Already he has been forestalled by his Finance Minister, who has declared in this House by bringing down the Estimates, which are simply the first Estimates, and various others must be added, that $39,124,000 is the estimated expenditures for 1898-99, a sum which will be, if expended, $2,174,000 more than was expended in 1896-97. How wonderful the promises of my right hon. friend have been fulfilled! He declared to the electors of this country: Place me in power, and I will reduce the expenditure by one, two or three millions. The right hon. gentleman was put into power, and within two years instead of reducing the expenditure one million, two millions or three millions he has reached a point within $500,000 or $600,000 of the three millions, and the first Estimates for 1898-99 have only been announced by the Finance Minister.

Do hon. gentlemen opposite believe that there is anything whatever in a pledge? When they first came to this House they were not so bold as they are now. They simply evaded their pledges, and the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) still gave them his support, because they did not declare out and out that they would not carry out their pledges. Another year passed, and they deliberately violated their pledges, but they apologized for the act. That stage has now passed, and still the hon. member for North Wellington supports them. Now the Finance Minister has torn off all disguise, and a few days ago he stood up in this House and declared that he repudiated their pledges to reduce the expenditure on consolidated fund account. First, they evaded their pledges; then they violated them, and were quiet about it; then they gained courage to stand up before the country and repudiate them, and declare that it was folly to think that this country could be administered with $37,000,000 and that we ourselves must acknowledge that this could not be done. I ask the right hon. First Minister: Does he have any respect for his word as a man? No man can hold up his head who makes a square pledge to his brother man and without rhyme or reason violates it; but if a pledge made to a brother man is binding, it is five million times as binding when the pledge is made to 5,000,000 of people, and when the right hon. gentleman gets into position and power by the fact of having made that pledge. A cynical expression sweeps over the face of the young Napoleon from the North-west. He has no qualms of conscience, but the leader of this Government might be supposed to have. What is he going to do about it? Does he deny his promises? No. Will he implement his promises? No; he is as putty in the potter's hands and the men who sit behind him and the men who sit around him use him at their will and raise the expenditure by one million, two millions and even three millions of dollars during the three years they are estimating for. Where, Sir, is the big policeman from Ontario? Where is that big policeman from Ontario who was paraded in the columns of the Montreal "Star" by that "Grit M. P. from Ontario" as a man with huge club who would stand before the Minister of Public Works, and in doughty war if need be, would make him lower his flags of extravagance and promise—even if he did not perform the promise—to be more economical in future. The big policeman is off beat to-day.

An hon. MEMBER. Dead beat.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend suggests "dead beat," but I will not go that far.

Mr. DAVIN. He has burned his baton.

Mr. FOSTER. He has evidently given up the contest, at all events. Now, Sir, what about capital expenditure? On capital expenditure, from 1887 to 1896, we spent $3,639,000 a year; in 1897, hon. gentlemen opposite spent $4,460,000; in 1897-98, the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) tells us that they will spend $7,506,185. Adding the two together, and whereas our average expenditure was forty millions and a half from 1887 to 1896, and in 1896 was $41,800,000; in 1897-98, by the Finance Minister's words they propose to spend $46,256,185 on consolidated fund and capital expenditure. Are they economizing? Did they promise they would economize? Do they treat the people with contempt? How is it with their own consciences?

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend says, "oh oh." It is a very happy illustration indeed when the "oh, oh," comes from the source it does. What a silly thing is conscience. Why are men troubled with it? The hon. gentleman who said "oh, oh," evidently is not troubled with it, but there are some sober people on these benches who have consciences, and there are a great many people outside in this country who will call these gentlemen to task at the bar of public opinion, and demand from them why they made their pledges and first quietly violated them, and lastly, openly repudiated them. There is but one of two alternatives for these gentlemen to take. Either they were fooling the people when they were making the promises, or else they were ignorant of what they were talking about, and it is remarkable that politicians of ten and twenty years' standing could have been so ignorant. Which horn of the dilemma will they take? Both will be equally unpalatable to many of the hon. gentlemen who support the Government.

I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to one reason which he gave. He said: There is an excess of expenditure of $1,400,000 in 1896-97. Now, Sir, it has been stated often that expenditures are of two kinds, namely, controllable and uncontrollable, and these hon. gentlemen opposite try to make it appear that the increase of $1,400,000 is in the uncontrollable expenditure. A list was given by the Finance Minister, and what does it amount to? It amounts to this: that with $1,400,000 of increased expenditure, $256,000 alone went to what you may call the uncontrollable items, and $1,140,000 went for controllable items, which the Government have full power over. They have not even the excuse that this $1,400,000 was pulled out of them for interest on the debt. The main increase, as I have stated, was on controllable expenditure over which the Government had the rein, and over which they could exercise the power if they wished. But, Sir, in explaining that they called for $400,000 more for 1897-98 than they spent in 1896-97, the Minister of Finance says there is an excess of $400,000, and he told us he called for that because of certain reasons, one of which was to pay the increased interest on the loan made in 1897. I call the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) to that, and I ask him the following question: Is it not true that in 1896-97 the hon. gentleman was paying on from four to seven millions in the shape of temporary loans, of the amount for which he afterwards went, in 1897, upon the London market and borrowed. I think I am right in saying that the temporary loans were between four and seven millions, before the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) made the loan in 1897. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) was paying in 1896-97 on these temporary loans 4 per cent—if I am mistaken he can correct me. In 1897-98, these temporary loans at 4 per cent are retired, and they are met by the six or seven millions from the $10,000,000 on which he is paying 2½ per cent only. He is making a saving in that of $79,000 or $80,000. More than that, in 1896-97 the hon. gentleman was paying 3½ per cent on the savings bank deposits. The reduction of ½ per cent comes into force on the 1st of July, 1898; so that as compared with 1896-97, in 1897-98, the current year, he will have the benefit of ½ per cent upon fifty million dollars, which makes $250,000 that he will save in this current year, as against the year 1896-97. Add the two together and you have a full saving of $330,000, and take away the whole interest on the ten millions loan for the nine months, which is $216,000, and the Finance Minister has a saving of over $100,000 on account of interest on the debt. And yet, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) tries to make this House give the $400,000 increase, on the ground that he requires a part of it—he did not say how much—in order to pay the increased interest on the public debt. As a fact, he will be paying less interest on the public debt than he paid the preceding year, and when July of next year comes he will save, as compared with that year, $500,000 on the savings bank deposits alone, for which, as I have stated, he has given the country no relief in any way. The Minister of Finance has now taken the bull by the horns, so to speak, and whereas from the time of the elections up to this year they accomplished the evasion and violation of pledges, with apology or with silence; the Minister himself comes forth with a statement this year which is a virtual repudiation of their intention to carry out these pledges at all. I notice that the Minister of Customs (Mr. Pater-son) is laughing heartily over these violations of pledges. I should not think my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) would laugh, because of all other men in the Government my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) should consider that a pledge is a sacred thing and ought to be carried out. I am very sorry to see the extreme levity with which he treats such an important matter as the violations of public faith by himself and by his colleagues.

Mr. BENNETT. He is sitting too near the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid that he sits too close to the Minister of Public Works, and I am afraid that the bad example is contagious in that respect. The Minister of Finance said:

I think that hon. gentlemen opposite themselves will admit that it is not possible to continue the expenditure on the figures of last year.

That was the year 1895-96 the expenditure of which, in round numbers, was thirty-seven million dollars. There is a statement, straight and clear, made by the First Minister, that he does not propose to reduce the expenditure upon the consolidated fund by one, two or three millions, while his practice has increased it by one million, by two millions and for 1898-99 pretty nearly three million dollars. Having detailed these, I leave the condemnation of the Government to a sturdy stalwart—one of the old guard, and one of the hon. gentleman's old time supporters—the Huntingdon "Gleaner." In July, 1897—what would it say now coming on to July, 1898?—the Huntingdon "Gleaner" said:

Sir Richard Cartwright pledged himself to end all this if he was given opportunity; he would give the people lower taxes and taxes honestly imposed and expended. Within a few months of his making that offer he was taken by the electors at his word, and last week, while acting Premier, and leader of a majority strong enough to do his will, instead of lowering either debt or taxes he submitted the largest Supply Bill yet known, and obtained permission to borrow $15,000,000 more to add to the debt. There is no reconciling the promises of this man with his performances, for his own acts give the lie to his pledges. He has disgraced himself, and, worse still, disgraced the Liberal party, unless it disavows him, and compels Laurier to dispense with his services.

There are two motives why prompt and decisive action should be taken with the men responsible for the breach of faith with the country. First, as Liberals, we are bound to see that the pledges given by our party are carried out. For eighteen years the Liberal party bore beautiful testimony against the extravagance and jobbery which was piling debt and taxes upon the country. Now that it is in power is it going to redeem its pledges, or is it going to outdo the Conservatives in all that it condemned? Honesty and honour demand that the Liberal party be true to its promises, and disagreeable and difficult though it may be, any Minister who stands in the way must be set aside. Unless this is done, every sincere Liberal will feel there has been a breach of faith with the electors, who never looked for a Government of our party giving the C. P. R. more money, or resuming the business of dickers in railways subsidies and local contracts. Second, the needs of the farmers require a Government of economy and retrenchment. We know whereof we speak when we say the farmers cannot stand a continuance of the policy of the past month. They are struggling to make ends meet as they never have struggled since the country was first settled, and are utterly unable to be taxed to pay interest on subsidies to enterprises which, even when desirable, can easily be postponed until our finances improve.

When Tupper left office with an interest-bearing debt of $280,000,000, thoughtful men breathed freely, for they believed the danger that menaced, the country was at an end, and that the debt, under Liberal rule, would begin to be reduced. Instead of that, the close of the current fiscal year will show twenty millions more added to it, which means so much more of the earnings of our farmers snatched from them—so many hundred thousand dollars more sent across the Atlantic to pay interest to the holders of Canada's bonds. This is intolerable, and if the farmers were alive to their interests they would miss no opportunity to make known their demand that all grants to railways and new public works must cease until such time as the revenue exceeds the expenditure, and that under no circumstances must the public debt be increased. That is the platform of the farmers, and the country was led to believe that was the platform of the Liberal party. If Laurier and his Ministers are not prepared to give it effect, the sooner they cease to call themselves Liberals the more they will deserve respect. The country comes before party, and party before individuals. In this instance the interests of the country and of the Liberal party are identical, and no individual, however high his position, can be allowed to stand in their way. The interests at stake are too serious for either Liberals or farmers to stand upon ceremony or to show forbearance.

Having detailed these pledges, having given the proofs that they have been violated, and at last repudiated, I leave the condemnation of the Government to one of their old time supporters, who claims to be a Liberal still, wherever the party leaders may have gone.

Now, I come to another and more congenial part of the Finance Minister's address. It is that part in which he told the story of the great year, the year of plenty and progress, the year, to wit 1896-97. What more could the Finance Minister say about it than he has said?

Canada's export trade during that year was by far the largest and greatest of any year in its history.

He detailed the savings bank deposits, which the gentleman who sits beside him to his right (Sir Richard Cartwright) was wont, during the Liberal-Conservative administration, to pooh, pooh, as an evidence of prosperity. He depicted these in glowing colours; he detailed the deposits in the chartered banks in the same way, the returns of the clearing houses, the carryings of the railway and their consequent appreciation in share values. All these things he depicted in glowing and befitting terms before the House and the country, and challenged the attention of Canada to the results of the year 1896-97. I bow to the hon. gentleman's power of praise and panegyric, and simply wish to ask him and this House what year was that whose history he was recording. It was the year from the first of July, 1896, to the first of July, 1897, during every month of which the policy of this Government, if they have any, had no more influence or effect, and no more weight than if they had never sat in this House. The year 1896-97—what are the elements that made that year so favourable in a trade point of view and so noteworthy in my hon. friend's mind? Why, the exports of this country rose from $121,000,000 in 1896 to $138,000,000 in 1897—$17,000,000 of an increase. To get down to facts, let me ask my hon. friend to drop off three of those millions and to take, not the basis of the total exports, but the basis of the domestic Canadian exports for those two years, and if he does that he will find that the increase in these exports was just $14,000,000—a notable increase, an increase worthy of all the glowing colours in which my hon. friend painted it. And, Sir, in what was that increase? The exports from the mines increased by $3,150,000. Will any gentleman tell me that what influence in the wide world the hon. gentleman's accession to office and remaining in office from July 1st, 1896, to July 1, 1897, had upon the products of the mines of Canada? If there were any things that contributed to the prosperity of the mines, they were antecedent conditions, all of which had been laid under Liberal-Conservative rule and Liberal-Conservative policy. Not one ounce of ore of lead, or silver, or gold, was raised to the surface and sold in that year from any impelling effect that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite had. They had not then announced their policy. In the products of the forest there was an increase of exports to the amount of $4,100,000. Will any hon. gentleman tell me what influences the Liberal policy had upon the amount of lumber which was marketed in the year 1896-97, almost every foot of which was cut before the elections were held as a result of which these hon. gentlemen came into office? If any portion of what was sold in that year was cut in 1896-97, no policy of the hon. gentlemen could have had any effect upon it, because they had not yet given forth their policy. There was an increase in the exports of animals and their products to the extent of $3,000,000. No hon. gentleman will tell me that the increase of $3,000,000 in the marketed animals and their products was in the least degree affected in any way by the fact that the Liberals came into power or by their policy, which was undetermined and not announced until within two months of the end of the year. The animals sold must have been one, two, three or four years old before the elections were held, in June, 1896, which brought these hon. gentlemen into power. Then take the agricultural products. There was an increase under this head of $7,700,000, and to this the same general remark applies. If you add these all together, you have an increase in these four items of $17,900,000, whereas the total export increase was only $14,000,000. The whole of the increase and $3,900,000 more is accounted for in these four products, upon the production and sale and price of which the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite had not the least appreciable effect.

So far as the sources of supply are concerned, this whole year of plenty was based upon antecedent conditions which grew up under the National Policy and the administration of the Liberal-Conservative party. So far as the crop conditions were concerned, they were entirely the result of the circumstances of the season and the overruling care of Providence; while, so far as the prices were concerned, they were due to want and scarcity, and, in some cases, even to famine and dire disaster in other food-producing countries of the world, which made the supply less, and so raised the prices, and so the sum total in value of our exports. The hon. gentleman did not in that year 1896-97, find a new market for one single pound of Canadian products anywhere the wide world over. Neither, as I said before, did the policy which they announced in April, 1897, have the least appreciable effect upon these productions, all of which had been raised or marketed before that policy was promulgated. The panegyric of the hon. gentleman was a good and a just one, but it was the glorification of an accomplished policy and not the birthsong of a new policy. That is still to be sung by my hon. friend.

Now, let me take up the next question, and ask my hon. friend whether he can congratulate himself and his party on the fiscal policy with which they have been experimenting from 1896 up to the present time? And first, with reference to the faith kept with the public and consistency as amongst themselves on the policies or principles of policies which they advocated. Whenever you come to this subject, Sir, in their dealings with it, you find, on the one hand, broken pledges, and on the other, confusion and hesitation in business. Going back to the hon. gentlemen's career five years and more before their assuming office, there are three great distinctive trends that their policy took. In the first place there were the long years of crusading for the overthrow of protection and the bringing again into effect of the revenue tariff policy of Alexander Mackenzie from 1875 to 1878. Then, there was this demand for an open door to the United States and a door barred and closed to Great Britain and to every other country in the world. And lastly, there was the holding up of the British model for Canada, the uprooting of the curse and bane of protection and the ushering in of the free trade principles which governed British commerce and British administration. These were the three great lines upon which they conducted their campaigns before the public within a short time prior to the elections. And when the elections were passed and these gentlemen were in power, everybody asked: Which of these will they embody in their tariff policy? The leaders of the Government themselves knew as little which they would embody in their policy as did the great outside public, and so they were, perforce, obliged to wait for a year to see if they could agree upon something amongst themselves. And, although they had been breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the established fiscal and industrial system of this country, they left it with these threatenings and menaces against it for one whole year whilst they were trying to make up their minds what they would propose—to the confusion of business, to the doubt and timidity of capital and of enterprise in industrial pursuits. Well, Sir, in 1897, on the 22nd April, they came down with something that they could agree upon and threw it upon the Table of the House. They let it lie there without action from the 22nd of April until the 25th of May, in order that they might find out what it meant. And, on the 25th of May, they came down with a revised tariff from top to bottom and stood before the House and the country to explain what they had brought.

And what was it? They faced both ways, in fact, they faced all ways at once. As introduced, this measure was a measure of reciprocity open to the world. As explained after its introduction, it was a preferential policy exclusively to Great Britain; as amended, after months' waiting, it was a preferential policy open to be availed of by all most-favoured nations, and as carried out afterwards it was a reciprocal offer open to all most-favoured nations, plus the Netherlands, plus Japan, and, if time had served before another meeting of Parliament, plus, dear knows how many other countries. Now, Sir, am I right or not in stating that these were the phases through which their policy passed? But at first, and from the first, there was, I think, as nearly as I can get at it, amidst the haze, one underlying idea that they proposed to carry out, namely, that it was to be a broad and reciprocal policy, that it was not to be confined to Great Britain, that it did not contemplate narrowing Canada's commercial outlet to any one country, but that in that offer there were the germs of what, worked out, would bring a reciprocal trade on fair and equal terms with any country in the wide world that would listen to their proposals and meet those terms in a fair and equitable way. The Finance Minister said in 1897, in his Budget speech:

By the Belgian and German treaties any colony would be forbidden to make a preferential agreement with Great Britain alone. We do not by our resolution offer anything to Great Britain alone. * * * We make our offer, not to Great Britain only, but to every nation which is prepared to accept it. We make it to every nation which is willing to establish fair and reasonable trade relations with Canada.

The very night of his address, in reply to a statement from my hon. friend who sits opposite me, he said:

To-morrow morning at every custom-house in Canada, from ocean to ocean, the doors will be opened on terms of preferential trade with the mother country.

At first you would think there was a decided antagonism between those statements. There is as great an antagonism as words can make unless you read between the lines, and between the lines you can get the hon. gentleman's contention that the treaties do not apply—this is a reciprocal tariff open to the world—Great Britain is in a position now to be immediately brought in, and we hope the time will come when all other nations will come in. Now, Sir, if that was the statement of the Minister of Finance, let us see what the opinion of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was:

I therefore submit that in the face of our customs autonomy, and in the absence of any such restrictions as exist in the Australian Constitutional Acts, and in virtue of the limitation of the treaty-making power of the Crown, and the absence of Imperial and colonial legislation giving effect to these treaties, they do not apply to Canada.

Nothing could be more positive.

I say this resolution neither discriminates nor differentiates. It attaches no terms which are not common to Great Britain and to all countries, and if Great Britain's fiscal system entitles her—as it does—to the immediate benefits which are daily flowing from the acceptance of our conditions, and if Germany and Belgium do not get the same advantages now it is not because of our legislation or our offer, but because of their own refusal to comply with the conditions which we have put in our offer.

There it is again—the treaties do not apply—we affirm that Great Britain is in a position to take immediately the advantage, but this is open to the world and we hope the world will take advantage of it. What about the Premier? When I asked him the question straight, before the vote:

I ask the Prime Minister to-night if he will tell the House, before we are called upon to vote, whether he considers that if this resolution passes and becomes law, he is bound to give the same treatment to Belgium and Germany and other countries that have with Great Britain most-favoured-nation treaty clauses? It is of the utmost importance to the action of this House to know it; it is of the utmost moment that the country should have a clear idea upon this subject.

The answer came from the Prime Minister:

If you want my answer now, I say decidedly that it does not apply to either Belgium or Germany.

The same note—the treaties do not apply—we do not acknowledge that—ours is a reciprocal offer open to the world—Great Britain can take immediate advantage of it—no other country can. Coming again to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, let us hear what he says :

Any gentleman who sat here and listened to that resolution as it was explained by the Minister of Finance knows that it was, and was intended, to be an offer of reciprocal trade to any country which would accept the conditions embodied in the resolution. It was not confined to one country more than another.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce himself was good enough to say :

But I say with respect to the offer we now make, that it is not a preferential offer at all in the true legal sense of the word. That offer is open to all the world. The Americans may avail themselves of it, so may the Germans and the Belgians. The whole world are welcome to avail themselves of it on the same terms and conditions on which England may take advantage of it. * * * We have undoubtedly offered better terms to those countries who trade with us fairly, but that offer has been made to the United States just as freely as it is to any other country, even Great Britain herself.

And again :

I tell the hon. gentleman that this is an offer of preferential trade to all countries that are qualified to come in. * * * If the Americans were willing to give us full, and fair and reciprocal advantages, I would recommend trading with them for the benefit of Canada and the Empire, too. I think Mr. Foster may find out before he is many years older that very probably, although I admit it is a little roundabout way, this is not a bad way to get it.

Now, Sir, you can only take one straightforward interpretation from these expressions, and that is that the hon. gentlemen proposed as their policy a policy of reciprocal trade open to all the nations of the world and denied to none. In looking over the nations of the world we deny, they said that any treaties that exist preclude them from this legislation, and preclude the governments from taking advantage of it. In looking over the nations of the world we declare that Great Britain is in a position at once to take advantage of it. But that does not prevent other countries from taking advantage of it, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce hoped that before I was many years older I would see the United States coming in by that door. They were not going to narrow trade. Canada was to have the markets of the wide world over, and to get them by barter and trade, giving to every other country that would give her compensating advantages, and so enlarging the bounds of trade. That was what they started with. Did they continue in that road? No, Sir. They had not long been launched upon that road before they had to admit the force and cogency of the remarks that we made upon this side of the House, and to place a clause there which would allow them to get out if the Belgian and German treaties were found to be operative, more than that, which allowed their Bill to get the sanction of the Governor General by giving a loophole by which the British authorities could assent to the Bill and save the rights of the treaty nations of long years standing. Well, Sir, time went on and those treaties were upheld, the contentions of hon. gentlemen opposite were shown to be a blunder and wrong, from the beginning. When the law officers of the Crown buoyed up my hon. friend by giving him a chance to argue his case before them, that did not mean at all that they had any doubts upon the rights of the treaties, but it showed that they were courteous to the hon. gentleman, that they were not unwilling to deny him the right to argue his point, at least, before that august and learned body.

Then came the decision. And where were my hon. friends? They had, although they brought in a treaty which was not, and which was not intended to be, preferential to Great Britain exclusively, which they declared was not so intended, placed before the British people and British countries the argument, inducement and thought, that here was completely exclusive preferential treatment to Great Britain, that it applied to them, and was intended to apply to them, and to them alone. For consumption in Great Britain it was a good argument in Jubilee year, and it bore fruit in many ways, and it bore fruit quickly. But I am inclined to believe that the latter end of that business will be more prejudicial to the best interests of Canada and to the feeling of good faith between the two countries than if the hon. gentlemen had taken the square and manly position and had put before the British public just what they did do, nothing more and nothing less; for the British public awakened to the idea, a little later, that they were not getting exclusive privileges, but that Germany and Belgium and thirty-one other countries were getting exactly the same rights and privileges as the British manufacturer and the British trader. More, Sir. Those hon. gentlemen, in carrying out their measure, went further than the most-favoured nations; they went further than Germany and Belgium, and stepped outside of the pale of favoured nations, and were forced to take Holland and Japan, and would have been forced to have taken in many other countries, as well.

The hon. gentlemen come down to the House this year, and what is their position? Directly opposite to the position they occupied last year. Last year, they stood on broad phrases: the world for Canada; markets wherever you can get them; markets on the reciprocal plan, giving compensation, if compensation is given to us ; no restrictions in trade. That great principle of freedom of trade, consecrated by the acceptance of the Cobden medal by the right hon. First Minister, was the rule and guide. To-day where are they ? To-day they have deserted that position entirely ; to-day they stand—they have been forced there, not from their liking, but from the relentless logic of the circumstances, mostly inflicted by themselves and by their blunders of previous legislation—before the world with an exclusive one-sided preference in favour of Great Britain and certain British colonies, and a closed door against the other nations. This reciprocal clause, which was to go out, as an angel of invitation, and gather trade reciprocally and mutually beneficial from every country in the world, has passed away, and to-day they have, by a discrimination, closed the doors against every country in the world, with the exception of Great Britain and of certain colonies, by favour, and not on principle, this one-sided preference having nothing in it as regards compensation to Canadian traders and producers. So, they have gone half the round of the compass, and are diametrically opposed, in their position to-day, to the general principles and practically carrying out of them, as compared with the position in which they stood a year ago.

Just at this moment it might occur to us to ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, what has become of the sixty million market of which my hon. friend was so enamoured, not in his callow days, when his beard was just sprouting and an elementary moustache was making its appearance, but in his maturer days, after having grounded in every fibre of his mental and physical system, by long years of active conflict and experience in political warfare, tariff and fiscal questions. What did he say ? At Chatham the hon. gentleman said :

But what is of even more immediate consequence, we propose to obtain for you the power to trade freely with the rest of this continent ; to have leave to make the best you can of your great natural advantages, which can only be done by full, free, and unrestricted reciprocity with our kinsmen in the United States.

And again, he said at Chatham, 1891 :

But let us always bear in mind that the geographical position of the bulk of Canada is such that at the best, very best, all and every other foreign market is but a makeshift, and can in no way ever really replace to you the market of the United States.

At Oakwood ("Globe," November 6, 1891) he said :

The fact is plain, and clear and simple, the best market for the articles you produce, not by the decree of man, but by the decree of the Almighty, lies in the country which extends to the south of you, separated generally by a mere imaginary line along the 3,000 miles of our southern frontier, reaching from that line almost to the equator. There is your market, there is one market you can hope to hold, there is the market you have the natural advantages to enable you to compete for.

I deliberately tell you that the market of the United States is absolutely and exactly worth all the rest of the world to us, situated as we now are.

That was the mature opinion of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, only six or seven years ago. Where is he to-day ? By the force of political necessity, not of his own free will and from conviction, he has taken the diametrically opposite position. Then the United States market was worth everything to us, and for it we must impose discrimination against Great Britain, if it were necessary. To-day it is discrimination against that very best of our markets to give one-sided preference in the British market. What about the right hon. First Minister ? I think it was at Montreal, or Toronto, since he came back from England, he parodied that phrase so well known to us, Canadian trade for Canada, and he said he had a higher and wider motto now, and it was, the trade of the world for Canada. It was not simply the trade of one or two restricted countries, but the trade of the world ; let us go out into the world and capture its trade for Canada. Five, six or seven short months have passed since then, and no longer is the cry, the trade of the world for Canada ; but it is narrowed down to the trade of Great Britain and such British colonies as the Minister of Customs may allow to come into this arrangement for an exclusive preference on one side only.

Summed up, what have these hon. gentlemen, in their fiscal ramblings, got for Canada ? For years they assailed the National Policy, on the ground that it was not opening enough new markets, that it was too restrictive, that it secured us nothing. If they were in power, said the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), they would go down to the United States, and in one year have obtained a favourable reciprocal treaty. We could not get it, for we were Tories and Jingoists, and were not grateful to the people of the United States. Turn out that Government, they said, put the Liberals in power, and they will go down and get reciprocity from the United States in the twinkling of an eye. Those hon. gentlemen have been placed in power, they have made their request, they have come back, they have brought us nothing in the shape of reciprocity from the United States ; but, after all their honeyed words, their representations and protestations of good will, they get a higher tariff imposed against the products of Canada entering the United States than we have ever had to meet before. They gave the United States free corn ; they did not get free barley. They gave them half the duty on iron ; they got nothing in return. They reduced the duty on coal ; they got nothing in return. They have turned the cheek towards the United States, and have been well smitten on it —they have got nothing from the United States. From what country have they secured anything? That is a simple question, and one to be asked and answered. After two and a half years in power, what markets have these people got for us as Canadians? But the hon. gentleman says: Why, we have introduced preferential trade with Great Britain. Does a single pound of meat, a single bushel of grain, a single product in this country anywhere go into the British market to-day, or will it go after the 31st of July next, at one cent advantage, that it has not had these last thirty years. Whilst you give off against the industries of this country, one-quarter of the protection which they have enjoyed for a while back, whilst you give that off and enlarge and intensify the competition to our industrial people here to the products they make, what compensation do you get for that in the market of England? None. What compensation do you get in the markets of the West India Islands, that you have brought in? None. The United States is your competitor in the West India market for all the products of the field, which the West Indian people have to buy. The United States have now nine-tenths of that trade in their hands. It would have been something if you could have got a compensation for Canadian products in that market for giving them a lightening of the tax upon their sugars. You have given them a preferential tariff on their sugars, but you do not put a pound of butter, or a pound of cheese, or a pound of anything that our farmers raise, into the West India market at any advantage over and above that which you have had during the last five or six years. It is all very well, as far as good-will is concerned, but the question which the people of Canada will ask is: Was there not a way by which you could have got something in return, and had a mutual advantage? We are told: "Oh, but it will weld the Empire more together." I am somewhat doubtful of that. I do not think you weld two peoples together when you make them live side by side under unequal conditions. I do not believe that you add to the real feeling of love and respect and attachment between two peoples when it is always "give" on one side, and "not give" upon the other. And in the course of this competition which is to take place, when British manufacturers begin to come in with the 25 per cent reduction; when the harder times come; when these more buoyant times will have passed away, as they will, and when the stress and strain of competition comes and our industrial people—capitalists and labourers—meet that competition and fall here and there under its power; it will not add to their loyalty or strength of devotion to feel that they themselves are being made poor in order that the manufacturers, even of the mother country, may be made rich. It would seem to me that you lay the most lasting foundations for that good feeling, which can only be founded upon mutual fair treatment, when there is give and take on both sides. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had the right idea if he only had held to it. He had the true preferential idea when he spoke in London and when he spoke in Toronto. He had it perhaps when he started on his vessel to cross the Atlantic; but in some way or other the right hon. gentleman on his voyage across, if not before, had a change of heart, gave up his opinions, and put the whole weight and strength of his great influence at that time against the preferential idea in Great Britain. And to-day we have the Minister of Finance rising in this House and giving the most cogent of reasons to the British public, and to the West India public, why they should not give us any return for what we have given them. He has done that by trying to make it apparent as his belief that the time never will come, and that it is idle for us to expect that the people of Great Britain will allow themselves to be taxed in regard to food products from the colonies, for the purpose of cementing and binding us together in business as well as in Imperial relations. Sir, these hon. gentlemen opposite have got no reciprocity for us anywhere. They have got no compensation for us among the preferred countries. They have not found any new market for the Canadian products. They have told the British public practically not to reciprocate. The right hon. gentleman who leads the Government has told them so. And when our advocates in England, numerous and powerful as they are, go to the British public and say, "Let us give a slight differential duty on the food products of the colonies in return for what they are doing for us, and in order to weld the Empire together," the British public will look in the face of these advocates and say: That is all very well, but the Prime Minister of Canada scouts that idea, and the Canadian Finance Minister scouts that idea; why, they have given us all for nothing. So wedded are they to the freedom of trade embedded in the Cobden principle that they do not believe that even for this great purpose, it is better to deviate in the least from that principle of unrestricted freedom of trade, even though it may be to give the colonies a 'quid pro quo' for what the colonies have given them. The outside world has been antagonized by the differential tariff. It certainly will not make the outside world any more favourably inclined to Canada. The possibilities are that it will make them less favourably inclined to Canada and more inclined to be retaliatory. No advantages have been got from abroad by this Government, but there is an intensified competition, the area of which has been extended, and it will be thrown into the centre of every industrial operation in this country, in so far as that competition is strengthened by the reduction of one-quarter on the protected duties now imposed. And, Sir, more than that, and I think most unfortunate of all; even after having made these reductions, even after having made them without compensation, even after having subjected the industrial forces of this country to that intensified and enlarged competition, the Minister of Finance had nothing better to do at the end of his speech than to stand up in this House and declare:

That so far as the protected industries of this country are concerned, eternal vigilance must be the price of their protection.

He said that the days of the protected industries of the country—what protection remains—are few in number and full of harassment; that, in one way or another, they will be pursued until they are wiped off the face of the Dominion and an era of free trade or tariff revenue established to stay. Sir, in all the annals of the pronouncements of Finance Ministers, I have never heard anything so signally stupid and malevolent, in a political sense, as that statement. What is the first requisite that capital requires? It must first have some thing like stability, or it will not seek investment. Where is the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), who conducted his campaign almost entirely upon the National Policy as it is, with no disturbance for ten years, backed by the Toronto "Globe," with all its power, and flanked by Ministers of the Crown, when he made his canvass and appeal to the electorate? What is the hon. member for Centre Toronto going to do about it? Capital, before it will make its investment, must have something fairly stable to rely upon. The mutations of a tariff are disturbing and menacing enough, in all conscience, without a Finance Minister adding to their disturbing influence by making from his seat in this House the standing menace to the industries of this country that they must buy their safety. What did the hon. gentleman mean when he said that eternal vigilance must be the price for their protection? Why, Sir, the statement will have the effect of preventing the putting of money into industries, which are supposed by those who have the investing capital to require at least a fair protection in order to keep them up. So far as this phase of the matter is concerned, nothing could be more calculated to prevent the development of industrial life in this country, because, as I have said, the mutations of the tariff which will take place from time to time, under parties and governments in this country, are sufficient for capital and industry to contend against and it was not necessary—it was quite the opposite—that the hon. Finance Minister should make this menace, the tendency of which is not only to cripple the industrial enterprises already established, but to cripple and restrain the investment of fresh capital and fresh energy in these or cognate industries. In a country like this, where party politics run so high, and where political methods are used which, although they may not be much, if any worse, than in other countries, are still well known, this declaration of the Finance Minister looks very like a threat. By it the Finance Minister gives fair warning to our manufacturing industries: If you want to live, pay the price. If you do not, you will not be allowed to live; you will be harassed; you may be wiped out. But there is a certain way by which you can gain our ear. You must make certain arguments to us, and if these are conclusive you will not be disturbed; but beware from this out, for you are in a condition of utter insecurity, and you only buy your existence by being eternally vigilant—and, he might have added, everlastingly subservient.

What else have the Government to congratulate themselves upon? Upon economy in administration? I think I have said enough to show that they cannot congratulate themselves upon that. Upon having fewer Cabinet Ministers? That was the bait held out to the country, but the fact is they have one more. The right hon. First Minister's pledge lies dangling on the Table of this House, that he would have fewer Cabinet Ministers, but instead one more is added, and the salaries are larger and so are the expenses in every way. We do not find, therefore, that they have carried out, in any sense, that part of what was to be their framed policy. Have they made a reduction in the expenditure of the civil service? Look at the Estimates. There has been a change—but has there been a reduction? No. There has been a change for efficiency sake, or patronage sake, whichever you will, but their promise was that there was to be a material reduction in the expenditure, and that has not been fulfilled. Then there was to be cessation of the granting of railway subsidies, which they claimed, were chiefly remarkable for their power to corrupt the constituencies. Well, since these hon. gentlemen have been in power, have we found any progress in this respect? We have found progress, but it has been the progress of the crab, backwards, because in no similar number of years have there been larger operations and more extravagant ones attempted, if not thoroughly carried out, than have been attempted by these hon. gentlemen. True, they put through the Crow's Nest Pass scheme but at an added cost of two million dollars. And what was the promise they held out? A large proportion of that added cost of two million dollars was paid in order that we might buy the control of the rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway and thus prevent exorbitant charges. But this year we have had the influence of Ministers cast in favour of the granting of a charter to a railway from the United States into the very heart of the mining country, connecting it with every great line of railway in the United States—and for what purpose? In order to make sure that extortionate rates will not be charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway—in order to make sure that we shall secure what we were asked last year to pay two million dollars more to the Canadian Pacific Railway for. Or is the Drummond County or Grand Trunk deal, one they can congratulate the country upon? Rushed into with secrecy, and brought before this Parliament in the dying days of the session, but happily laid over for a brief season of counsel and contemplation by the Upper Chamber, the utter extravagance and unwarranted nature of that deal is shown by the fact that after that season of rest and contemplation, the Government have been able to make another bargain over these very lines, involving a saving of $500,000 or $600,000 as compared with the last one. Have they to congratulate the country and their party upon that part of their forward policy? Or the Yukon deal—rushed into in secrecy against all the canons laid down by the party ever since they were a party; in utter defiance of the rules of tender and contract; rushed through within a few days of the session, with the half of a kingdom of gold as a recompense for that part of the gamble as the Minister of Railways calls it—but that also happily held over for a period of contemplation by the Upper Chamber. And the country will save by that action of the Upper Chamber, no one knows how much, but no doubt a large amount, on a bargain which was characterized by haste and extravagance, if by nothing worse. What about the independence of Parliament which used to be a favourite theme with hon. gentlemen opposite? In these two or three short years, what have we found? We have found a member of Parliament sitting behind the Government with the Premier's written pledge of a judgeship or a Governorship in his pocket—sitting there and voting against his own free will and under compulsion for measures, of which he did not approve, and kept on dangling by that beautiful device of purity in the party, until he kicked so long and so hard that he was elevated to a judgeship. We have found the right hon. First Minister himself sitting down and writing to a member of Parliament pledging him a railway subsidy in order that that hon. member might hawk it around in a contested election, and so mildly influence his constituency. Independence of Parliament! Sir, independence of Parliament is a by-word and a reproach with my hon. friend under these circumstances. Independence of Parliament, Sir! With the blanketing of gold rivers, to the Merciers, and the Guerins, and the Drolets, and other hangers-on of the party, for small sums of money, giving franchises which to-day are hawked about the streets at from one to three thousand fold increase, and disposed of at these rates, as I am informed. And yet, you talk about the independence of Parliament and the Liberal party in relation thereto.

The Pacific cable—what has been done by the hon. gentleman and his party with regard to that? Of paramount importance, as it was declared to be by the Colonial Convention in this city and by the Australasian colonies and by Great Britain, in the two years that they have been in office have these hon. gentlemen made one single forward step? If they have done so, they have not informed Parliament of it.

The fast Atlantic line—what about that? They found when they came into office a contract ready to be executed which would have put a fast line of steamers on the ocean between Canada and Great Britain by this time or very soon after. But these hon. gentlemen tore up the contract, and have been doing absolutely nothing for two years. And, to-day, so far as Parliament knows, they have made no substantial progress.

Sir, to-day the timbermen and lumbermen of British Columbia and throughout our country have a grievance against this Parliament and against this Government, in that, whilst the United States have privileges of export into this country either free of duty or at low rates, our exports to the United States are met with an almost prohibitory tariff. This is allowed to go on long after it is plainly seen that nothing that we offer serves as an inducement to the United States to give anything in return. The tariff is brought down and the policy is promulgated, and nothing is said by the Government as to its policy in regard to that great interest.

Then, Sir, there is a most important subject, which affects the mining industries of this country. To-day, Canada imports every ounce of the lead she uses. It is not a very large consumption, but it is a fairly large and constantly increasing consumption, and I think I am not wrong in stating, that we import it all. Out in the mining districts of British Columbia where men toil to bring forth the hidden riches of the earth, where mighty industries are nascent, which industries are asking for a helping hand, this question of the lead duties plays a prominent part. To-day, Sir, you may mine ore with 60 per cent of lead in it, and send it, as you have to send it, to the American smelter and pay the American duty, and you cannot get the cost of your mining and your treatment out of it by the sale of your lead. The duty is 1½ cents per pound, to which you must add $22 for freight and treatment for every ton of ore that is sent out to be smelted. It is contended by mining men that an import duty equal to that of the United States upon lead would effectually establish a great smelting industry in those regions which would give employment to many and which, by its consumption of farmers' products and of the mercantile supplies of the country, would be a great element in the progress, the business, and the upbuilding of Canada. The Government has no time for these things. Nothing has been done by them to solve those vexed questions, they are all lost sight of while my hon. friend, with his great good nature, is congratulating the House and the country and panegyricizing this great year of plenty and progress which is really the crowning year of the Liberal-Conservative policy and not the opening year of the Liberal policy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have about finished the remarks I had to make. I thank the House for its kindly interest and attention. I have endeavoured to criticise the statements of my hon. friend, and though I have criticised them vigorously I think I have not criticised them unfairly. When it came to that branch of his speech upon which he threw out the challenge of his administration and eulogized their policy, I think it was my duty as it is the duty of gentlemen upon this side of the House, to call the attention of the House, and more particularly the attention of the country, to the fact that the gentlemen now in office for one year and a half, have implemented scarcely one pledge that they made when they were seated in Opposition; and that they come up to this, the third year of their administration without having carried out these pledges. On the other hand, they have not originated anything in the shape of a fiscal and tariff policy which has opened to the products of Canada one single market in any portion of the world. In one thing, Sir, we on this side of the House will always agree with hon. gentlemen on that side. They can say nothing too much in praise of the conditions and resources of this country, of its progress and its great prospects for the future. They will find that, so far as we are concerned, we will draw a strong and steady line between the errors of an Administration and the condition of the country, its industries, its progress, its prosperity. He can say nothing too much in praise of the great future which we as Canadians so plainly see before us and which it will not be within the power of any single party whatever its blunders to more than retard for a brief period, but certainly not to restrain or prevent of ultimate fulfilment. But it is our duty on this side of the House to call the attention of the electorate at large to the lapses of hon. gentlemen opposite and to demand of them that they keep their pledges or give a reason why they should not do so. We believe too much in confidence being maintained between the electorate and the rulers of the country, who are a committee of that electorate, to allow any set of men to get into office by making pledges and then cynically and indifferently to break and violate those pledges, and not call them to account for this violation of faith with the people. We believe that every Government will have its faults, that no Government, being a collection of human beings, can be perfect. But we believe, with all this, that it is the duty of an Opposition to criticise faithfully and keenly, even if strongly, these lapses, these faults and these failures for the information of the electorate and to keep the conscience of the electorate pure and strong as regards these great public questions. I wish to thank again my hon. friends opposite for having allowed the debate to be held over for two or three days. Grippe is sometimes more powerful than any of our desires and I cannot think too highly of the courtesy they have shown me while its victim.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend's arithmetic is in other respects as faulty as in the computation he makes of the number of years we have been in office, I am afraid he has a good deal to learn. I beg to inform him that twenty months of office do not by any system of arithmetic that is known to me, equal two and a half years, though I can well believe that the twenty months have seemed as long as thirty to my hon. friend.

Now, Sir, it has been remarked by persons who take an interest in that kind of thing that there are few sights dearer to gods and men than to see good men struggle with adversity.

I am bound to say that I, like a noted Scotch divine, feel a little compassion even for a naughty man under similar circumstances. My hon. friend, I think, will in future bear in mind that it is wise not to prophesy before he knows, and he undoubtedly did indulge, two years ago, in various prophecies as to the results of the Government policy, which have hardly been fulfilled by the actual issue of events. Sir, I think the hon. gentleman might learn, by this time, that it is folly to struggle with manifest facts. He does not deny—and so far I do not find fault with him—the fact of manifest prosperity, the signs of which meet us on every side; and it is equally idle for him, under any pretext whatever, to deny the significance of the political gain which Canada has made within the last year under the guidance of my right hon. friend, and most particularly in the reception which our trade proposals met with at the hands, not merely of the English Government, but of the English nation at large. Sir, I could not but feel how grievously the tables had been turned upon my hon. friend, when I heard the hon. the Minister of Finance go over, one by one, all these various indicia of prosperity to which, in former times, he had been wont to point as incontrovertible evidences of the goodness of their policy.

Now, Sir, I do not take it for granted that the increases of savings deposits are inevitably a proof of the great prosperity of the country at large, nor yet the bank deposits, nor yet the circulation, nor yet any of these matters. What I have said before, and what I repeat now, is this: They are all good, and very good, so far as they go. I never denied that, so far as they went, they were good indications of prosperity; but I pointed out then, and I point out now, that there are other far more important indications of prosperity which accompany these indicia to-day, and which were notably absent during the entire period of the administration of the hon. gentleman and his friends. It is good, it is very good, to see our savings bank deposits expand, to see our circulation expand, to see our exports and imports expand; but it is not so good when, as in his time, certain of those indications were accompanied by a marked diminution in the value of properties over an enormous area of the country, and, what I always esteemed a far more important matter, when they were accompanied by an enormous exodus of the best elements of our country. But, Sir, were it the case to-day, as it was then, that the people of Canada were flying from their country by tens of thousands, aye, and hundreds of thousands, I would not, as I do now, claim that these are proofs that a new era of prosperity had dawned upon her. Sir, I am happy to tell the hon. gentleman that circumstances have changed; I am happy to be able to tell him—and I have not the slightest doubt that the approaching census will confirm, in the highest degree, all that we state here to-day—that, at long last, after eighteen years of misgovernment, the tide has turned, that Canadians are now remaining in their own country, and that we are not likely again to see the miserable spectacle which his own province exhibited to the world, when, in 1891, it turned out that the total growth of the great province of New Brunswick, with room and space enough to accommodate twice or thrice its present population, was, I think, some 32, all told. Now, I would ask the hon. gentleman, why he cannot quietly accept the present situation? I am not going to dispute with him the fact that luck has been on our side to a very considerable extent during the last year or two. I remember the time when times were not so prosperous for the Liberal party; I remember the times when none were more forward than the hon. gentleman who sits immediately opposite to me (Sir Charles Tupper) in denouncing the Liberal party because of a world-wide depression, which affected all the other countries with which we had any acquaintance or knowledge, infinitely more than it did Canada.

But what I more particularly wish to call the attention of the House to is the new role of economist in which my hon. friend appears. He is very grievously alarmed at the extravagance which distinguishes the present Administration, and, very early in his speech, I perceived that he made a very special charge against us, that we had added

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

$1,400,000 to his last year's expenditure, and that, in this identical year, we were about to add $1,800,000 to his last year's expenditure. Now, Sir, I like to see an honest statement made, particularly by an hon. gentleman in his position; I like to see an honest statement made of what the actual comparison should be between his last year's expenditure and our expenditure for the present time, and I think, when I get through with the matter, the House will be convinced of this one thing, that, whatever other merits the hon. gentleman may claim for himself, that of making an honest statement of the actual state of affairs in the last three or four years, is one to which he can lay very little claim. I believe it is quite true, that the hon. gentleman, in the year 1896, had gone out of office with an expenditure of $37,000,000, in round numbers. But it is not true, that the hon. gentleman had effected any permanent saving or reduction on the expenditure of the preceding year, which for 1895 amounted to $38,200,000, in round numbers. Sir, I hope my hon. friends will bear this fact in mind; I hope my hon. friends will take care, whenever appeal is made to the last year of the hon. gentleman's expenditure, to call the attention of their audience to the fact that, if ever there was a case of colossal cooking, it was the cooking that was practiced by that hon. gentleman for obvious party reasons in the year 1896. He made no permanent saving, he made no genuine reduction of the public expenditure. What he did was to throw over a million or more of expenditure properly belonging to that year, 1896, on to the shoulders of the year 1897. He did it for obvious party purpose; he did it, foreseeing that, in view of the perilous position in which the nest of traitors found themselves, the country was extremely likely to express an unfavourable opinion of men who did not respect the obligations imposed upon public men of holding up a high standard of public faith. He took all the care he could, so to arrange his accounts that he might appear to make a reduction, no matter at what cost or at what risk of demoralizing the public service. The methods he adopted were mainly these two: He totally neglected to call out the militia and give them any exercise in the various camps, thereby rendering almost the whole of the expenditure for the year for militia purposes absolutely useless; and in the case of public works, in like manner, he deliberately cut down the necessary expenditure, with the effect, as my hon. friend can show him, of involving for the succeeding year a great deal of additional and unnecessary expenditure, by reason of the parsimony—no, I cannot call it by so honourable a term, but by reason of the most improper reductions which he made in the service of that year. What would any railway company, having a similar income, say of a manager who came forward and claimed that he had made a reduction of $1,400,000 in expenses for a particular year, when it was shown in the preceding year he had spent almost precisely the same sum that was required to be expended for the succeeding year, and when, what is more, his own estimates, now in my hands, show distinctly that so far from effecting any permanent reduction, he contemplated in his first original estimate an expenditure of $38,359,000 for 1897. Sir, I say the hon. gentleman has no right whatever to come before this House and contend that the expenditure actually incurred in 1896 was in any shape or form a true proof of the extent to which he had reduced the expenditure. His real year with which comparison should be made is either the actual ascertained expenditure of 1895, which amounted to $38,200,000; or his own original Estimates, I will not charge him now with the Supplementary Estimates for that year, for the year 1896-97, which I have under my hand. And if the hon. gentleman wants to make comparisons with the Estimates now submitted by my hon. friend the Finance Minister, I am prepared to show him, and I shall be prepared to show this House after six o'clock, that for the identical services for which that hon. gentleman demanded $38,359,000, my hon. friend is asking less than $38,000,000. All the rest and excess I propose to show the House, is incurred for services and for purposes which will probably return into the treasury quite as much as we take out of it, but for which there was no shadow of equivalent in the Estimates brought down by that hon. gentleman. As it will take a little time to go into that comparison, and it is hardly worth while to repeat it after recess. I shall be obliged if you, Mr. Speaker, will call it six o'clock.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose, I had been calling attention to the statement made by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), and on which, as the House will have observed, a very large portion of his whole speech depended, that the present Government had been guilty, as compared with himself and his fellow-Ministers, of very great extravagance in the actual expenditures and Estimates for the years 1897, 1898 and 1899; and the hon. gentleman, as the House will remember, based that statement on the fact that he had succeeded, as he stated, in reducing the expenditure for consolidated fund account to $37,000,000 for the year 1896. Sir, if that reduction had been a genuine, bona fide reduction, if it had been one which the hon. gentleman or his friends beside him had the smallest ground for stating was a permanent reduction, I would have given him credit for it, and I would have felt that the present Government were called upon to enter into a very minute explanation of the causes which had compelled them to increase that sum. But when we examine the facts, we find a very remarkable state of things. We find that in 1895, when the hon. gentleman had no particular reason for in any way taking action so as to specially adjust his accounts, he expended $38,132,000. We find that for the succeeding year, 1897, in the first Estimate brought down by that hon. gentleman, and I need not tell the House, for the matter was explained to hon. members time and again, that the hon. gentleman had actually under consideration Supplementary Estimates which would have involved an additional charge of several millions—we find that the hon. gentleman brought down in his first and primary Estimate, charged under Consolidated Fund for the year 1897, no less than $38,359,000. Under these circumstances, I am justified in stating to the House and stating to the country that the expenditure of 1896 was purely illusive, that it was not a genuine substantial reduction, but it was, as I have already stated, a deliberate case of cooking the accounts by causing large amounts which belonged properly to 1896 to be transferred for political purposes and made a charge on the succeeding years, notably in regard to two large items, militia and public works. The House will recollect the hon. gentleman stated that in 1897 we expended $1,400,000 more than he did during the last year of his administration; that in 1898, the present year, we propose to expend $1,800,000 more than he expended in his last year; that for 1899 we propose to expend $2,500,000 more than he expended in 1896. Sir, I propose to show to the House that the actual expenditure made by the Finance Minister for 1897 was somewhat less, not much, than the first Estimate for that year laid on the Table of the House by the hon. member for York. I propose to show the House that, deducting certain expenditures for which there is no counterpart, the expenditure of the present year would barely equal the sum that he demanded for the services in 1897; and I further propose to show the House that for the services of 1899, the Estimates of which we are now discussing, the Finance Minister proposes for the selfsame services for which the hon. member for York estimated he would require $38,359,000, to ask $37,980,000. The remainder, as I will show to the House, is for services for which we may expect to receive a corresponding amount to put into the public treasury, and which had no counterpart whatever in 1897. The way to judge of the comparative economy of the two Governments is to judge of the charges for the selfsame series of services. If the Government have done wrong in asking for the additional amount, let them be judged on these additional amounts and let the House take into account the fact I have alluded to, namely, that with respect to these additional sums they have good grounds for believing the country will receive a return.

I will take, in the first instance, and after that I propose to go through the items in some little detail: I will take in the first instance the demands made by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) for 1899, and the demands made by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) in 1897. The House will remember that my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) is now asking for $39,125,000, in round numbers, for the services of 1899. In that $39,125,000 are included these three items: First, for the rental of the Intercolonial road into Montreal, $210,000, for which no corresponding sum whatever is to be found amongst the charges for 1897; next, a sum of $396,000 for the services of the Yukon district, for which, I need not say, not one farthing is to be found of a corresponding character in the expenditure for 1897 as proposed by the hon. member for York; lastly, for the running expenses of the Intercolonial Railway as extended into Montreal, a further sum of $560,000 for which there is no corresponding entry, making a sum total of $1,166,000 for which we expect to receive a return.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. How much did the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) say was for the extension of the Intercolonial into Montreal?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Five hundred and sixty thousand dollars extra is allowed for the expenses of that, including what is known as the Drummond County Branch. Now if hon. gentlemen opposite will do me the favour to deduct $1,166,000 from $39,125,000, they will see that after taking out these extra sums there remains $37,959,000, being the sum required by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) for the selfsame identical services for which the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) asked $38,358,000 in 1896-97. Therefore, my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) proposes to defray the expenses of the country, so far as regards these services, for $400,000 less than the hon. member for York thought was necessary two years ago.

It is worth while remembering also that the country has not stood still during the last two years, that the population has increased very considerably, more rapidly, than it did during the period the hon. member for York was administering the Government. I believe, from all the evidence which has come to our hands; from the evidence as to the increased immigration; from the evidence as to the diminished exodus, which I regard as even of more importance; I believe that the actual fact of the case is, that for the selfsame services, with 200,000 people more in 1899 than in 1896-97, my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), is asking for $400,000 a year less. I again call the attention of the House to the fact that there is good reason for believing that the whole, or at any rate by far the greater part of that $1,166,000 of extra expenditure, will be repaid into the treasury of this country in the shape of increased receipts from the Intercolonial Railway, and in the shape of increased receipts which we are even now receiving from the Yukon territory.

But, Sir, it is always well in these cases to go a little into detail. I have before me the Estimates laid on the Table of the House by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) for 1896-97, and here I may observe that doubtless owing to a clerical error the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) omitted a fixed charge of \$50,000 for a certain mail service under the heading of sums authorized by statute. The actual amount he demanded therefore was \$38,358,000, and not \$38,308,000 as is inaccurately put down. If the House will take the trouble to turn to the Estimates for 1899, and will compare them, step by step, as far as may be with the Estimates laid on the Table by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) in 1896, they will see how far he (Mr. Foster) is justified in asserting that our administration of the country is inferior in point of economy to the administration which he was prepared to give us had he been returned to office in 1896. Take the first item in the Estimates, I find that the hon. the Minister of Finance asks for charge of public debt, including sinking fund, a sum of \$12,853,000; and observe that our economical friend from York (Mr. Foster) two years ago, asked for that same service \$12,982,000, being a difference of \$130,000 on that item in favour of the present Ministry. I observe that on charges of management, he asked for \$165,000, and my hon. friend proposes to be content with \$152,000. In the item of civil government—that much disputed item—we ask for \$1,418,000, and my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster), two years ago, thought it was necessary to demand \$1,449,000. I note that in the administration of justice there is a small increase. Certain additional judges have been demanded by the several provinces, and the expense of the administration of justice is therefore, not by any act of our own but by the act of these legislatures, increased \$14,000. The police service is the same in both years. Now I come to another point, which will perhaps contrast as well as any other our relative economy. We demand for the service of the penitentiaries \$417,000 for the year ending July, 1899. The hon. gentleman, in 1896-97, demanded \$481,000 for the same service. We demand for the services of the legislatures \$705,000, and I observe that the hon. gentleman seems to have demanded \$754,000. For arts, agriculture and statistics—and to this item I call the special attention of the House—we demand a much larger sum than my hon. friend did. We demand \$322,000, but with respect to that item I have to say this. If the hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Foster), or any other of them, will choose to accept the gage which I have thrown down, and will choose to hold that the sums we are now appropriating for cold storage and for the development of agricultural pursuits in various directions are ill spent and will vote to reduce them, I shall be only too happy to undertake a discussion of that matter with them at any moment. In that matter which affects the well-being of the greatest class in the country, we are much more generous than our predecessors, but nevertheless we make savings in other respects, which will very much more than compensate for that increase. I observe that for the services of the militia, the next large item, we demand for 1899 \$1,397,000. I observe, and I am not condemning him for it, that the hon. gentleman in 1897 thought that \$1,478,000 was the least that he could get along with, which shows a considerable difference in favour of the present Government, I observe that on public works we demand \$1,650,000, and the late Government demanded \$1,576,000, being an increase on our part; and I have no doubt my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Tarte) will be perfectly able to give an excellent explanation of the reasons which require this vote. Now, a very large proportion of the remainder consists of what are known as fixed charges—charges for collection of revenue. I shall not weary the House by going through those in detail, but I repeat this fact, that for the identical class of services for which we ask a little less than \$38,000,000, the hon. gentleman thought it necessary, three years ago, on a population of nearly one-quarter of a million less, to demand something like \$38,359,000. Under those circumstances, it hardly becomes the hon. gentleman to speak too highly of the economies which he effected. Had these economies been effected by any genuine reduction in the expenditure, I would give him credit for them, but when we come to examine and see that they were effected by such means as refusing to drill our militia during an entire year, and by such other expedients as reducing the expenditure of public works to a sum \$400,000 below what the hon. gentleman himself expended during the preceding five or six years, and generally in such a fashion as compelled the present Minister of Public Works, the moment he came into office, in order to avert great public injury, to expensive and costly public works, to incur large additional expense, I do submit that there is no just cause whatever for the claim of the hon. gentleman, that because, under such circumstances, he did force the reduction to \$37,000,000 in 1896, he is therefore entitled to claim that he and his Government had really reduced the expenditure to that point. They are to be judged by their actual expenditure in a year when they had no temptation to curtail the expenditure improperly; they are to be judged by the estimates they themselves brought down for the service of 1896-97. I turn now from that to another important portion of the hon. gentleman's speech, and here I confess I was rather disappointed at the mode in which he handled the subject. He took a very great deal of exception to the reduction made by my hon. friend beside me in the rate of interest payable on Government savings bank deposits. That is a question on which there is a very considerable deal to be said on both sides, and I hoped that a man of his experience and occupying his position, and who himself had occasion to reduce the interest on savings bank deposits, would have put the House in full possession of the actual state of the case, and have given something like a fair resumé of the true position and of the causes which operated in inducing my hon. friend to make this somewhat large reduction in the rate of interest. The hon. gentleman spent a great deal of time in denouncing the Government because, as he said, we were reducing the rate at the expense of the small savers. He must have had in his possession or have had access to certain facts respecting the savings banks, which I myself caused to be brought down in a return to this House, some three or four years ago, and I may say here that the facts to-day are substantially as they were then, or, if anything, rather bear out our pretension more to-day than they did then. To listen to the hon. gentleman one would suppose that the whole \$50,000,000 now invested in the Government savings banks were held by small savers, poor people to whom it is a matter of very great moment indeed that they should receive a small additional return; and the hon. gentleman waxed warm and eloquent in depicting the injury to the cause of thrift which would be inflicted if we disturbed the rate of interest. It may be interesting to the House to know that at present, of those \$50,000,000 on deposit in the Government savings banks, something like two-thirds of the whole are held by rather less than one-sixth of the depositors. It may be interesting to the House to know that in 1894 something like \$25,300,000 of the then deposits, which amounted to about forty million dollars were held by 26,000 depositors, being as nearly as may be an average of one thousand dollars per head. Now, I do not think that men who are able, on an average, to deposit a thousand dollars per head, can be regarded as people deserving the paternal care of this Government. For the smaller depositors a great deal more may be said, but the smaller depositors at that time averaged something like \$100 apiece and no more. The larger depositors, as I have stated, those of \$500 and upwards, had an average of \$1,000; the smaller depositors had an average of very little over \$100. I have no doubt that, if it were possible for my hon. friend to have done so, he would have been very glad indeed to have divided this matter, and very glad indeed to have so arranged it that the small depositors, if possible, should have received a larger indulgence at the hands of the Government than he thought was fairly due to the persons who held the greater part of these deposits. But here again I have a little to complain of with regard to the hon. member for York. As a Finance Minister of some years' standing, he knew perfectly well when he stated that we were paying $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to money-lenders in Europe and only $2\frac{1}{2}$ to the depositors of this country, and consequently that the depositors were docked $\frac{2}{3}$ of 1 per cent, that he omitted the material fact that the people of Canada have to contribute a considerable additional sum for the management of those savings banks. It is not the truth to say that we went out of our way to give $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to English money-lenders, all expenses paid, while we reduced the rate to these people to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, because, as a matter of fact, the actual cost of management, raises the cost to us of the money we borrow of these people to $2\frac{1}{2}$, at any rate to $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. But there are other considerations which the hon. gentleman I think should, in all justice, have presented to the House in considering this disputed question. I think he ought to have told the House, what is obvious to every man of experience, that you cannot fairly compare the rate of interest which is obtained by parties who are entitled to withdraw their money at an hour's notice, or a few days' notice, with the rate of interest obtainable on loans having a period of years to run. Which of us, as a business man, would, if he were a business man, pay the same interest on a sum withdrawable at call as for money which was allowed to remain in his hands for fifty years? That is a point, I think, that the hon. gentleman ought to have considered well before he chose to make use of his position to stir up the minds of the people against the Government for a policy which, as I shall presently show, is likely to result in advantage to a large part of the community. More than that, the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well, and if he does not, there is no banker of standing but could have explained the matter to him, that in the last resort, the rate of interest all through this country depended upon the interest paid by the banks and the Government for money on call. That is so plain a proposition that I am astonished that the hon. gentleman should have overlooked it. What follows? Why, this follows—that if you desire to see the interest on the farmers' mortgages lowered, if you wish to see the interest on money used for manufacturers and by others engaged in various enterprises the development of this country lowered, you must consent to a lowering of the rate of interest on deposits. Unfortunately, tied up as we are, involved as our affairs are, it is not possible for the banks which control the larger part of the deposits in Canada, to reduce the rate of interest on their deposits unless the Government will do so too. I point that out to show that there is more than one side to this question. Every man here knows from his own experience that the rate of interest on good security has fallen extremely in Canada within the last ten or twelve years. It is only a few months ago that it was my duty to make inquiries, on behalf of certain parties for whom I am trustee, of certain trusts societies in Toronto to know what rates of interest they would guarantee, and all I could obtain was a statement that if the money was left in their hands for a term of years, they would guarantee 4 per cent. I need not tell this House that municipal corporations and almost all corporations of good standing, are able to borrow money in the markets of the world at considerably less than 4 per cent—from 3 to $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I desire to point out that, while we wish, as far as we can, to encourage thrift, as the hon. gentleman said, to protect the interests of the smaller depositors, we are called upon to consider the interests of all classes, to consider the interests of the farmer, to consider the interests of those who are carrying on industrial enterprises in our midst. More than that, I say my hon. friend beside me would have been false to his trust to the people of Canada as a whole if he had consented to pay a small portion of them, except for extremely good cause, more than the average rate of interest at which money was borrowed by the Government in the open market. I put it, under all these circumstances, whether any man could say that money on call, which could be taken out of the control of the Government on very short notice, is worth more than it costs the Government, that is, something like $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. And I think those who know the difficulty of finding good investments, those who look at the rate paid on stocks by banks in good standing and similar classes of investments, will admit that even if the reduction to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent does appear and be, so far as a certain small section of the taxpayers are concerned, a measure attended with some hardships—and I do not deny that it may appear or be so—they must grant that the Government had a duty to consider, and I think they will admit that there is a great deal to be said for the policy adopted by my hon. friend, first, of saving a very large sum of money to the country at large, which, as the hon. member for York truly said, must otherwise be made up by increased taxation, and, second, taking a course which probably, in the long run and not at a very distant day, may contribute largely to reduce the rate of interests on mortgages and in all probability raise the price of farm land. I may add that I do not think it was a good sign of progress in Canada to see what I and others have witnessed—farms by the score put up at auction in country towns where, to my knowledge, a million and more of money was lying on deposit, without obtaining a bid. I do not think we shall see that again as often as in the past, at least I hope not. I hope that, under these circumstances, all fair-minded men will agree that, even if my hon. friend was forced by the exigencies of his position to reduce this rate somewhat faster than he would have liked to have done, he had ground in the general interest for pursuing the ground he took. Now, I might add to that this consideration, which I think is worthy of a little attention on the part of the House. I do not deny, I have never denied, that it would be a matter of very great moment, of very great interest, and worthy of some sacrifice, if the people of Canada could be induced to invest in Government securities permanently. If these fifty millions had been invested in a Canada 3 per cent loan, I do not know that that would have been lightly disturbed by my hon. friend. If it had been invested in such a way that the money would not have been called upon at short notice, but invested for a term of years, shorter or longer, there would be a good deal to be said in favour of the argument of my hon. friend from York. But there is a wide distinction between borrowing money, as we are doing on call, which may be demanded from us at short notice, and borrowing money for terms of years, which is the best way that a Government can possibly borrow it.

That is a matter which might be very fairly brought up for debate. I offer no opinion upon it, one way or another. But I do call attention to the fact that it is, by no means, of equal importance or interest to a community that it should be a borrower to a large amount from the people at call, as that it should have a large amount of the people's money invested in the permanent securities of the nation. Now, I observe that another charge brought by the hon. gentleman was, that we had absolutely and actually gained, I think he said $1,200,000 more customs, and that we had done it under a reduced scale of taxation. I believe, Sir, that statement is true. I acknowledge the impeachment, I am proud of the crime, if crime it be, that we are getting more money, and we are getting it on a reduced scale of taxation. That is just exactly what we wanted to do. But I differ with my hon. friend on one point that he alluded to. He was pleased to declare that there was very little difference between the percentage on dutiable goods nowadays and the percentage on dutiable goods in former times, and he was good enough, I remember, to call attention to the fact that, during the year 1896-97, when, as he truly said, his own tariff system was in full swing—and on that I will have a word or two to say presently—there had not been any very appreciable reduction. I have here a statement of our principal dutiable imports entered for consumption during the first seven months of this year, and I call attention to the results. In the year 1897, which the hon. gentleman justly claims as his own, we appear to have imported $36,800,000 worth of dutiable goods, upon which we received $11,131,000. Apparently, the percentage on that amount, making the calculation roughly, amounts to something like 30·05. Now, for the first seven months of this year we appear to have received $40,438,000 of dutiable goods, and we obtained for them $11,932,000 duty. Well, Sir, on this $11,932,000 the percentage would appear to be 29·50. There is, therefore, quite an appreciable reduction in the rate of duty which now prevails under our present tariff—not nearly as much as I could desire to see, but I may remind the House that a good many goods which were absolutely prohibited under the late tariff, are now being imported under rates prescribed by us, that go to swell our revenue, whereas, in former times, they were excluded altogether. That is one thing, I may remark incidentally, which renders these calculations of percentages rather apt to be misleading, when you are comparing a tariff framed in the main for revenue with a tariff in the main protective. If you exclude the goods altogether, there is no doubt you get a diminished apparent percentage, but at an enormous cost to the consumer. I would remind the House that the hon. gentlemen claim the full merit of the year 1896-97 as being the year in which their policy culminated and bore its full fruits.

Now, I would like to call the attention of the House particularly to a number of the results of the policy of those hon. gentlemen from the year 1887 down to the present time. Sir, hon. gentlemen will recollect that our friends on the opposite side, in former times, had a monopoly of all the loyalty in this country.

Mr. TAYLOR. We have not got it all now.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No, I think not. Well, Sir, these ultra-loyalists in 1887 imported something like 45 million dollars worth of goods from Great Britain; in 1888 they fell to 39 millions; in 1889 they rose to 42 millions; in 1890 they imported 43 millions; in 1891, 42 millions; in 1892, 41 millions; in 1893, 43 millions; in 1894, 39 millions; in 1895, 31 millions; in 1896, they imported 32 millions, and in the year in which, according to the hon. member for York, their policy had attained its full and perfect maturity, they imported 29 million dollars worth of goods from Great Britain. Now, in those ten years, you will observe, their imports from Great Britain had diminished by 15 million dollars. In that interval, although the population increased far more slowly than we could desire, we had added, in all probability, at least 500,000 to our population. So it follows that in ten years, such was the excellent effects of their policy that our imports from Great Britain in 1897 were 15 millions less than in 1887 on a population half a million smaller. But we made up for it in another direction, for I see that in 1887 they imported 45 million dollars worth of goods from the United States; in 1888 they imported 49 millions; in 1890, 50 millions; in 1891, 52 millions; in 1893, 53 millions; in 1894, 58 millions; in 1895, 54 millions; in 1896, 58 millions, and in 1897 they imported 61 million dollars worth. While they diminished their imports from Great Britain by 15 million dollars, they increased their imports from the United States by 15 millions in the same period of time. Now, it may be true, that the steps which have been taken to increase our trade with Great Britain may not have as swift an effect as we desire; still, there are reasons for it. During the period of eighteen years in which these hon. gentlemen have worked their wicked will, they have reduced our imports from Great Britain to the figures that I have read to the House, and we cannot be expected to reverse all that in an afternoon; but I have very little doubt that, when the next decade occurs, and when my hon. friends on this side—where I have no doubt they will still be—have the pleasure of dilating on those figures to an attentive House, they will be able to show that the current of trade has been reversed, and that they will then be importing a very much larger quantity of goods from Great Britain than ever before. Now, I know that percentages are odious. I know they are very often unfair, and we have had experience of that time and again. But I will just call the attention of those economists to two or three patent facts pretty well known in history. The Liberal-Conservative economists became the custodians of the affairs of this country in 1867. In 1873, for reasons which I will not now stop to particularize, they were obliged to devote their talents to some other occupation. In the interval, however, they had added 11 million dollars a year to the annual expenditure of Canada. In 1873, Mr. Mackenzie assumed the reins of power, and in 1878 Mr. Mackenzie laid them down. He entered office with an expenditure of $23,313,000, and he left it with an expenditure of $23,519,000 or a difference of $200,000. Those hon. gentlemen during eighteen years exercised their own will and pleasure. They began with an expenditure of $23,500,000, and left off, as I have shown, with an estimated expenditure of $38,500,000, an actual expenditure in 1895 of $38,133,000. I cannot accept their statement for 1896, for the obvious reason I have given. But, Sir, it follows that the increased expenditure in those eighteen years amounted, giving them the most liberal construction possible, to close on $14,000,000. Now, $14,000,000 would represent interest on the sum of $560,000,- 000, and this may be taken as the sum their administration during eighteen years has cost the country, estimating it by a reasonable and fair standard. I will not insist, however, too much on that point, because there are some little reductions that might be made, but nevertheless substantially it is correct.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

The hon. gentleman entered on another subject as to which I desire to say a word or two, though I do not wish to weary the House by enlarging too much on matters already pretty well threshed out and which no doubt my hon. friends beside me will take up in more detail. The hon. member for York enlarged extremely on the fact, that acting in conformity with the conclusion arrived at by the British Government, we were obliged to abandon our original and more liberal treatment of nations that extended liberal terms to us. I may be a heretic and very unorthodox, but I have to say, that I do not regard the opinion of the British law officers as conclusive. They have the power, I admit, and they are able to enforce their views, and to decide what the favoured-nation clause shall mean; but I hold that the opinion of the British law officers is vastly different from an opinion given by a British court of high degree. They are the advisers of the Government, and they advise the Government substantially on the line of the Government's policy. It may be very true that it is not on the whole inconsistent with the policy of Her Majesty's Government to stand by the most-favoured-nation clause, for very obvious reasons; but I am far from being convinced, and it will require much better arguments than I have heard on that side or I have read in any of the despatches from Her Majesty's Government given by the Imperial officers that we are not right in maintaining, as I maintain, that a reciprocity treaty has nothing whatever to do with the most-favoured-nation clause. A reciprocity treaty is in the nature of a bargain between two nations, under which we give and obtain substantial considerations; while I maintain that the favoured-nation clause, rightly and properly construed, means that nations having the right to the favoured-nation clause should grant similar terms to those nations from which they expect to obtain special privileges. That is the new world contention as opposed to the old world contention, and I am not in the least degree disposed to abandon it, holding it as being the more logical, equitable and fair construction. We are not, however, an independent nation, but are dependent on the British Empire, and bound therefore in matters of this kind to obey the directions we receive from the home authorities; and when they tell us that for reasons of state and for reasons of policy they are obliged to maintain this particular construction as to the most-favoured-nation clause, we have no alternative but to obey them and abandon our better and more generous contention and accept the system as we now have it. But it was a very strong testimony to the substantial soundness of our view that while the British Government insisted, as I have said, for good reasons of state policy to their own particular construction as to the favoured-nation clause, they at the same did for the present Government what they had entirely declined to do on various occasions for previous governments—they denounced the German and Belgian treaties which prevented our extending a preference to British dominions. I say that that, rightly understood, was not only in itself a great and positive gain, but it was recognizing in such a manner as had not hitherto been recognized, the weight and importance which Canada has now attained in the councils of the Empire.

Sir, the hon. member for York, and I regret he is not able to be here to-night, was good enough to twit us with having turned our cheek to the United States and getting nothing for it. I have not in the slightest degree changed my opinion as to the enormous value and importance to both countries of extended trade relations with the United States, and I shall require very much better reasons than I have hitherto heard to induce me to abandon my position in that regard. But it takes two to make a bargain, and when the United States did not see fit to trade with us, it became our business to do the best we could for ourselves and extend our trade with the mother country and in other directions. That we have done, and if our action, as the hon. gentleman stated, is to be construed as turning the other cheek to the smiter, it is a new translation of the text to which the hon. gentleman referred. When the United States would not trade with us, we showed that country that while not disposed to retaliate on them in any way or to injure ourselves in order to inflict small injury on some portion of their population, at the same time we were masters of our destiny; that the gates were ours to open and to close; that we open them to the country that deals liberally with us and keep them closed to the country which refuses to trade with us, which is good policy, good business and good common sense. What the hon. gentleman may have meant by his allusion to those political methods which he imputed to my hon. friend beside me, to that malignant and malevolent action of holding all manufacturers in subjection, I do not know. He probably is better acquainted with the effective use of the political methods he alluded to for political purposes than we can pretend to be. We are his disciples in that matter, and we should be glad to receive from him or the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Charles Tupper) any useful instruction he may choose to communicate, for no doubt those hon. gentlemen are perfectly well versed in the art of applying those political methods to recalcitrant manufacturers under particular circumstances.

With respect to the general accusation brought by the hon. member for York, that the Government have not been able to economize to the extent they desired, and that certain of the hopes and expectations which were entertained by certain of my colleagues as to the extent of the saving that could be made, have not been verified, I have to say, so far as those hon. gentlemen are concerned, it practically amounts to this, that they have succeeded in doing a great deal more mischief and doing it more permanently than we had supposed possible. It is not so easy to undo the evil effects of their administration as some of my more sanguine friends would suppose. I call attention to the fact, that in all the attacks I made on hon. gentlemen opposite when I was on the Opposition benches, I was careful, knowing there were serious difficulties in the way, while I pointed out that we had an annual expenditure which I thought excessive and disproportionate to our resources, my chief burden of complaint was that the then Government had increased the permanent charges out of proportion to the revenue and it would be exceedingly difficult to reduce those charges. I am in the judgment of the House, as my hon. friend opposite would say, as to whether that was not on all occasions the burden of my attacks. It is my opinion still. The amount of our capital and fixed charges is enormously out of proportion to our income. If hon. gentlemen will go carefully over the present list of expenditures they will see that, after deducting fixed charges, which are wholly and entirely apart from collection of revenue and which amounts to a sum not far short of $20,000,000 a year in the items authorized by the statute, the amount left to cut and carve upon is exceedingly small. Deducting $19,000,000 and adding $11,000,000 required for post office, railways, inland revenue and customs and other matters, over which the Government has extremely little practical control from the nature of the case, deducting these sums from a total amount of $38,000,000 it will be found that there are not more than $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 in the form of expenditures under direct control of the Government, and no inconsiderable portion of this is devoted to expenditure for Indians, which is in the nature of treaty obligations, although not granted by statute. While not desiring to palliate any extravagance, if extravagance is committed, or withdrawing from the statement I have made that the amount of expenditure is very large in a country like ours, I point that out, not at all desiring to palliate any extravagance, if extravagance has been committed; not as at all withdrawing from the statement I have often made, that the amount of expenditure is very heavy for a country like ours; but as pointing out that the great fault which the people of Canada are entitled to complain of is, that permanent charges to such an enormous extent as I have indicated were inflicted upon them. These charges were not inflicted by the Liberals; they were inflicted against our advice and against our protest, and it is not fair to say at this moment, that if on coming into office we found it more difficult to reduce these than we had supposed, therefore we are to be held responsible—unless hon. gentlemen can show that the items which we are now demanding are excessive in amount. It does not lie in the mouth of hon. gentlemen opposite to make that charge, for as I have shown, we are actually asking less for the present services of the country with a considerably increased population, than they themselves proposed to ask two years ago. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was good enough to lay claim to all the results of the year 1896-97 as properly belonging to the policy of the late Conservative Government; and amongst other things he claimed that there had been an increase of $17,000,000 in our exports, the credit of which was due to the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party. Well, be it so for argument's sake. I find that in the first six months of this current year—to which he (Mr. Foster) will hardly venture to make claim—in the first six months which ended on the 31st of December, 1897, I find that we exported of home products a sum total of ninety millions odd, being an increase of $20,000,000 over the exports of 1896. Although I do not pretend to say that that is wholly and entirely due to the feeling of confidence, and the general feeling of rest and stability which has ensued on the expulsion of hon. gentlemen opposite from power and the installation of the present Ministry; it is at least good evidence that during our term of office the increase in the wealth of the people of Canada, which this evidences, has gone on far faster than it did before. The House will do well to recollect that there are new sources of wealth opening before us; the House will do well to recollect that there is every reason to believe that our population is decidedly on the increase, and that in a very considerable number of industries which in former times we did not reckon upon much—in all those connected with mines and minerals; in the wonderful development which appears likely to await the pulp and paper industry and in several others wholly apart from our staple agricultural industries, there is such promise of increased prosperity and permanence, that we have fair reason to believe that this extraordinary development is not likely to be merely ephemeral but will remain for a number of years. It is plain that Canada is entering on a new era of prosperity, and outside of hon. gentlemen opposite very few indeed will be found to question that the political position of Canada has likewise improved enormously. Sir, we have shown that while the Liberal party were not as fond of talking loyalty as non-gentlemen opposite used to be; we have shown how Liberal acts can outweigh Conservative promises and professions a thousand times over. We have set an example to the Empire, and if we have not done it in a huxtering spirit, if we have not endeavoured to obtain pound for pound and cent for cent, we have at any rate shown that when we were generously treated, we were willing to the best of our ability to treat our mother country generously in return.

I grant that we have not done all that some of us had hoped to do. It is not possible—the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) to the contrary notwithstanding—to undo in one single year, or even in two years, all that the Conservatives succeeded in doing during a period of eighteen years. If in a corresponding period we have no better record to show than they, I would be willing for one to submit to the severest censure and punishment which can be inflicted upon us, though probably by that time, it will not much concern either myself or my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) opposite. The truth is that we have found ourselves in the position of being heirs to a deeply mortgaged estate. There are two ways in which we can get out of that awkward position. We can reduce the rate of interest, and we are doing it in spite of the remonstrances of hon. gentlemen opposite, or we can do the other thing: we can improve and develop the productiveness of our estate. We can—and I think we will be able to in a short period of time—we can increase the population of Canada to such an extent that the same results will be attained as if we had been able to cut down the expenditure by even as many millions as we had hoped in our fondest expectations. We may not be able to reduce the expenses of the service, but we can get a better service. In all these ways we can increase and improve the efficiency of the Government of Canada. This we desire to do; this we hope to do. I think, Sir, that in that way, in all probability the real safety and the real advantage which Canada is likely to derive from the present period of prosperity is likely to remain with us. I cannot forbear saying one thing—and I think I am justified in saying it—I verily believe that if, eighteen years ago the people of Canada had been content to go on under the reasonable revenue tariff they then enjoyed, the manufacturers of Canada as a whole for whose benefit these enormous additional taxes were imposed, would have been infinitely better off than they are to-day. Their progress I believe would have been as great; I am certain it would have been infinitely solder and more permanent, and it would not have been attended with the disadvantages and inconveniences which have flowed from the system then adopted. I do not want to dwell upon these themes too long, but I do say—and I think I would obtain a pretty universal verdict from these gentlemen when I say it—that on the whole and all things considered a very grave error was committed when Canada turned her back on the well-known fiscal policy of Great Britain and took up with a system of protection, which was after all but the cast-off rags of Americanism. It may be that we have been to blame in some respects; it may be that we have not been able to live up in all respects to the expectations our friends formed, but I repeat that if it can be shown that in the Estimates we submit there is any undue extravagance, any undue expenditure that cannot be reasonably defended, we will not be afraid or ashamed to retrace our steps if good cause be shown. But I do protest that it is not right or fair or reasonable for gentlemen opposite, who laid burdens upon us which we are now endeavouring to liquidate, to complain of our course. With respect to the charge that we have increased the capital account, I may say that with one exception all the increased charges on capital account have accrued from obligations contracted by the late Government. All we have done has been as business men to hurry forward such enterprises as the completion of the canals, in order that they might become within the lifetime of the present generation of some little use to the people of Canada. The chief items of expenditure which the hon. gentleman complains of, I am quite willing to stand by, and abide the judgment of the people of Canada. But I may remind the House of one fact, which they very well know, that during last session, when we were proposing the policy of giving a large subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, there was no man in this House who was so anxious as the hon. member for York—unless perhaps it was his hon. friend beside him (Sir Charles Tupper)—that that measure should be brought forward and pushed through with all speed. If I remember rightly, the hon. gentleman approved of that measure, urged it, did not divide the House upon it, or vote against it in any way; and now, after having urged and approved of and agreed to it as a necessary measure, he turns round and reproaches us with broken promises and violated pledges, because we did the very thing he urged us to do. Sir, there should be some little reasonable fair-play in these matters. I do not object, it would ill become me to object, to any amount of criticism which hon. gentlemen opposite please to level against us. I am an old parliamentarian, and I am aware that Providence can temper the wind to the shorn lamb; and I am likewise aware that official hides acquire an extraordinary toughness and thickness under the strokes that come, sometimes from supporters and sometimes from opponents;—I say I do not object to any amount of criticism; but hon. gentlemen of their standing and ability, knowing the weight which properly belongs to their words, should be a little fair and reasonable, and not endeavour as the hon. member for York did, to argue on totally false premises, and to endeavour to bind us down by comparisons which do not fairly apply to the condition of things as they exist to-day. I thank the House for the extreme courtesy with which they have listened to me, and, as I promised not to be unduly long on this occasion, I now take my seat.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before dealing with some of the observations which have just fallen from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) I purpose in the first place to say that those who heard my observations on the Address, during the present session will not be surprised to learn that I have heard with great pleasure the announcement of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that the Government purpose to repeal the reciprocity clause in the Tariff Act of last session, and to adopt a policy of preferential trade towards England. I stated on that occasion that, in the position in which that question stood, I felt that the Government of Canada would be entirely discredited if they adopted any other policy; and I am therefore glad to find that the hon. Minister of Finance, at great cost to himself, at great cost to his party, at still greater cost to the leader of the Administration, has adopted the policy which he has announced to the House in regard to that important question. Those who heard my remarks on the occasion of the Budget discussion during the last session, will not be surprised to learn that I also approved most heartily of the policy proposed of restoring the West India trade to Canada. It will be remembered by gentlemen who were in the House then that I urged my hon. friend the Minister of Finance in the strongest manner not to allow that important trade to Canada to be entirely destroyed by the policy which he was propounding to the House. Although the hon. gentleman could not be induced then to adopt the views I suggested in regard to that important question, I need not say that I have heard with pleasure his announcement that he proposes now to rescue the West India trade from the position of depression in which it stands at present.

Before dealing generally with the subject of the Budget, I must pay a little attention to the remarks that have just fallen from my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. After the able and exhaustive exposition of the financial question by my hon. friend the member for York (Mr. Foster), I do not intend to weary the House by going over and discussing the figures which that hon. gentleman dealt with in such a masterly manner, and in a manner which has rendered it utterly impossible for the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce to offer any effective criticism that can to any extent modify it. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce admits the gravamen of the charge of the hon. member for York that during the present year the Estimates brought down to this House, and which this Parliament is asked to vote, exceed the average estimates for many years under the Liberal-Conservative party by $1,400,000; and that the Estimates which the hon. gentleman has submitted to the House for 1898-99, apart altogether from the Supplementary Estimates which will no doubt be brought down, will exceed the average estimates under the Liberal-Conservative party by $1,800,000. The hon. gentleman has not ventured to challenge the accuracy of those figures, although he has endeavoured in some respects to qualify them.

The hon. gentleman began his observations by saying that prophecy was a very dangerous ground, and that he would recommend the hon. member for York not to venture in future upon that dangerous ground. Well, Sir, I happen to have under my hand a prophecy made by the hon. member for York, to which I will for a single moment draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce; and he will find, I think, that my hon. friend was not so entirely astray when two years ago he ventured upon the prophecy that under the policy of the Liberal-Conservative Administration the tide had turned, that under that policy the public affairs of Canada had been conducted with such ability and such success that it had tided Canada over a period of depression that had affected most deeply and seriously many countries in the world, and especially the great Republic alongside of us, in a manner that reflected the greatest possible credit upon the Dominion of Canada. The hon. gentleman, on that occasion, which was two years ago, prophesied that the tide had turned, and that there was going to be an onward wave of prosperity which would give Canada a position of which every Canadian might well be proud. I draw the attention of my hon. friend to that prophecy—a prophecy that has already been realized. My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) thanked, in becoming terms, the hon. Minister of Finance for the glowing eulogium he pronounced that year, which my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce says may rightly and properly be claimed as a year of administration by the Liberal-Conservative party. I listened with close attention to the speech made by the Minister of Finance, but I listened in vain to find a single jot or tittle on which he could put his finger to show that this Government had contributed to that progress and prosperity. He frankly and rightly admitted that the only great progress and prosperity that Canada could hope to enjoy was with regard to her great agricultural industry. He admitted that the position which Canada occupies to-day was due, to a large extent, to that bountiful crop with which Providence had favoured her, and to what the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, on a former occasion, referred to as an incident connected with the crop, namely, the prices, which are beyond the control of Canada and are the result of the competition of other countries for food products. These, taken in connection with the enormous mineral development of this country, to which this Government has in no wise contributed—and other trade advantages to which no gentleman on the Treasury benches has ventured to make a shadow of a claim, account for the position Canada enjoys; and I listened, with unmixed pleasure, to the panegyric which the hon. gentleman pronounced upon the present progress and prosperity of our country. But these hon. gentlemen opposite enjoy an advantage to-day which we never did. They enjoy the inestimable advantage, which it is impossible to overrate, of having the Opposition benches occupied by men who are as ready to promote the progress and prosperity of Canada when the Government is in the hands of their opponents, as when they themselves had the administration of public affairs. But, in the many long years during which the Liberal-Conservative party governed this country, they were met by a continued wall of despair from hon. gentlemen opposite. Every one knows that, instead of joining in anything calculated to promote the progress and prosperity of the country, they did their utmost from their position—and a powerful and influential position it was—to deprive, and retard, and keep back everything that would facilitate the progress of this country. But that is not our vocation. We would feel that we were ill discharging the duty we owe to our great party and our great country, if we could, for a single moment, fail to sustain hon. gentlemen opposite to the utmost of our power in anything and everything that can contribute, in the slightest degree, to the progress and prosperity of Canada. The hon. gentleman referred to the denunciations of the Liberal party during the period they were in power by gentlemen on this side of the House, from 1873 to 1878. But the hon. gentleman did not state the facts. We never denounced the Liberal party as being the cause of the bad times, but what we denounced them for was, their refusal to come to the rescue of our sinking country. We denounced them because they refused to adopt a single measure calculated to assist our country out of the deplorable condition in which it then was. We charged them, rightly and properly, with failing in their duty to Canada, when they refused to come to the rescue of the country by adopting such means as were pointed out to them as undoubtedly calculated to promote the progress and prosperity of our country. But I will remind my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce of a very important fact, and that was, the confession which he made on the floor of this Parliament. What was it? It was, that he had become convinced that the policy propounded by the Opposition—then the Liberal-Conservative party—was a sound policy. He confessed that the policy of increasing the tariff and preventing the business of Canada being done in Boston and New York, the policy of remedying the paralysis from which every manufacturing industry in this country was suffering, was the only sound policy; and, having become convinced it was his duty to increase the tariff, the hon. gentleman determined to do so, and prepared a tariff providing for a large increase in duties, as pressed upon him by the Opposition. But he afterwards surrendered his judgment, and failed in what he knew to be his duty to his country, at the shrine of party and in order to retain power. When Mr. Jones, of Halifax, came, with the Scotia brigade, and told the hon. gentleman that if he came down with the tariff which he himself admitted he had prepared and was ready to offer to Parliament, as a means of staying the tide of disaster and ruin that was overwhelming the country, they would walk across the floor and vote against it, the hon. gentleman abandoned what he knew to be in the interest of his country, and accepted the policy dictated to him by one of his supporters, contrary to his own judgment.

Mr. MCGREGOR. What did the hon. gentleman do the same evening?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman has anything to say, I will give him the floor.

Mr. MCGREGOR. The hon. gentleman came that evening, as a moderate tariff reformer, in favour of a duty of 17½ per cent, and, before he went away, he was a full-fledged protectionist. He asked the hon. gentleman to withhold his speech and call it six o'clock at five thirty, and then came back, in the latter part of the evening, a full-fledged protectionist.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend is a Rip Van Winkle. I am sure he has been asleep for the last twenty years. Does he not know that that slander was buried long ago?

I will tell the hon. gentleman the facts, since he seems to know so little about the affairs of the country in that respect. I learned that the Minister of Finance of that day the Minister of Trade and Commerce today, had determined to raise the tariff, as the Opposition in this House had demanded and implored the Government to do. And I went down, the day before the meeting of the House, to consult with that great statesman, whose memory will never die in Canada, the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. I told him I had had news from a party point of view, that the Minister of Finance had made up his mind to adopt our policy and take our advice. And Sir John said: Well, what have we to do under these circumstances? I said: There is not a question as to what we should do. The moment that policy is propounded, from my position as financial critic of the Government of the day, I shall stand up and commend the Finance Minister and pledge the heartiest support of myself and party to his policy. And the right hon. gentleman said that that was the only course; and there and then we agreed that, as public men, injurious as we recognized this step on the part of the Government would be to the party to which we belonged, we owed to higher duty, our duty to Canada, and must commend that which was in the country's interest. And so, I tell the hon. gentleman that he has a little to learn before he undertakes to interrupt me in discussing these questions upon which I profess to know something.

Now, Sir, I was very sorry—because I like to carry on these discussions in a pleasant and agreeable manner—to hear the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce charge my hon. friend from York with cooking the accounts. No charge, in my judgment can be more grave than cooking the accounts. I say that any public man who is capable of cooking an account is capable of any deception which can be practised upon Parliament or upon the people. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) himself is a pastmaster in cooking accounts—he compels me to tell him so. Go back to the "Hansard" of 1874, when that hon. gentleman brought down his first Budget Speech, and you will find it not only alleged but brought home to the hon. gentleman that, for the purpose of turning a surplus into a deficit, he had actually transferred, by cooking the public accounts of this country, a sum of $500,000 voted by Parliament for capital expenditure and expended by the hon. gentleman's Government for capital to consolidated revenue expenditure. And when the hon. gentleman attempted to deny it, I told him that if he would move that the question be referred to the Committee on Public Accounts, I would put upon the witness stand some of the most trusted officers of the Government to establish my contention. And so I fastened upon him one of the most discreditable charges of cooking public accounts that ever was known in Canada.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman talks about increased imports from the United States under the Liberal-Conservative regime. Why, does he not know that that fallacy that that misstatement, that that attempt to delude and deceive the people of this country by the Convention of 1893, in which they charged the Liberal-Conservative party with adopting a discriminative policy in favour of the United States and against England, is as completely without foundation as any charge ever made by man?

Does not he know that during the five years of his regime from 1873 to 1878 the imports from Great Britain fell by thirty-seven million and a half dollars, while the imports from the United States increased. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that, if it be true that a large importation from United States and a smaller one from Britain establishes a charge of discrimination against the mother country by the Government, the public records fastens that charge upon himself. But the hon. gentleman knows that the character of imports from the United States the smaller duty they pay upon their imports than is paid by Great Britain happens, last year, as it happened years ago, to show apparent ground for the charge of discrimination, but that there was really no discrimination in the matter. I am astounded at the hon. gentleman should venture to trifle with the intelligence of the hon. members of this House by bringing forward such a question for a single moment.

The hon. gentleman says : It is quite true that we have increased the expenditure this year by $1,400,000 over the expenditure of last year, but that is only apparent, it is only a matter of book-keeping, and there is no real increase. And how does he account for it? He says that $210,000 of that is what was paid for the Drummond County Railway, and $560,000 is what is to be spent for operating the Intercolonial Railway over and above all that it has ever cost before, and so you have $770,000 accounted for. Accounted for! Why, Sir, I tell the hon. gentleman that he ought to be ashamed to name the subject of the Drummond County Railway in this House.

He knows that when that project was put before Parliament, the Minister of Railways and Canals was utterly ignorant of everything connected with that question, and was unable to present the slightest grounds for any hope that Canada could ever receive any benefit from it. The hon. gentleman knows that it was proved in that discussion that when that Drummond County Railway was obtained at this enormous cost in connection with the Grand Trunk Railway arrangements, increasing the debt of Canada by seven million dollars, the hon. gentleman knows that no man in the public service could be brought forward to give the shadow of a shade of ground for the expenditure, for the waste of this enormous sum of money. The Senate having rejected that measure, a new contract has been made, by which the Government admit, in their new arrangements with the two companies, that they are now prepared to submit to the Parliament a proposition a million dollars per annum better for Canada than before.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It was half a million before dinner, according to the member for York (Mr. Foster).

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The member for York was discussing the question of the Drummond County Railway alone, but I tell him there is another branch of that subject, and that is the Grand Trunk Railway. It will be remembered that I made another charge against this Government, a charge so damning to their judgment, to their position and to their character, that the ablest man they have got in the Senate, the moment that Bill was put before the Senate, said, That will have to be amended. Here it was all right, here the Government were prepared to brazen it out, and their supporters behind them were prepared to sustain them in this monstrous proposition that Canada should be chargeable with one-half of all the expenditures connected with the Grand Trunk Railway station at Montreal and to pay 5 per cent upon the interest of one-half of all that expenditure. That is the charge, and the Government have been compelled by the action of the Senate to reconsider and readjust their arrangement with Mr. Green-shields, representing the Drummond County Railway, and the contract with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, shows that the Senate of Canada have earned the confidence and support of the people of this country by placing at the credit of this country a million dollars in that one transaction, if it never goes any further. Now, I say if that is all the excuse the hon. gentleman has for this $1,400,000 that they are adding to the expenditure of this country, over and above the highest expenditure that has ever taken place before, it is a very poor and a very pitiable excuse. Let me state what my position was. I said: The late Government, my Government, Sir John A. Macdonald's Government, the Liberal Government, the present Government, are all pledged and committed to give substantial aid to the construction of a railway bridge at Quebec. I do not hesitate to say that in my judgment neither the late Government nor the present Government would hesitate to contribute a million dollars for the purpose of securing that great object, the construction of a bridge that would bring the Intercolonial Railway and Grand Trunk Railway from Point Lévis into Quebec. Then, Sir, what happened? Why, it has been shown in the most conclusive manner that the company, of which the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) is, I believe, president, or at all events, in which he has a deep interest, is prepared, with the aid of a million dollars from Canada, to secure the construction of that work. Well, my policy was this: I said, build a bridge, we are all committed to that expenditure, it will have to be done in the end, and then it will be useless in the one case and useful in another. Build the bridge and bring the Intercolonial Railway and Grand Trunk Railway into the city of Quebec. Then,

Sir, the Intercolonial Railway would be in a position to say to the Canadian Pacific Railway: We haul your traffic from St. John to Halifax, 276 miles, and we ask you in return, on the same terms as we take you into Halifax, to give us the right of way over your railway for 176 miles into the city of Montreal. Under those circumstances, this country would have enjoyed all the advantages of having the Intercolonial Railway brought into the city of Montreal without the expenditure of a single dollar outside of that one million dollars. But all that was lost upon these gentlemen who had got their own arrangements to make. I am afraid they had received the money and had to deliver the goods, that is what I am afraid was the matter with them. They were fast bound to Mr. Greenshields, they were slaves to be manipulated in his hands, and they were not in a position to listen to anything from this side of the House or from anybody else. That was the trouble. Now, what has happened? Why, I have consulted the ablest and best railway men in Canada, and they tell me that for that $770,000 which you have in this Estimate, as the hon. gentleman says to account for these increased charges, you will not have one dollar's worth of additional traffic for the Intercolonial Railway. And how could you have it when it is known that from Montreal to the city of St. John, by the Drummond County Railway, the distance is 248 miles longer than it is by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and how is it possible to compete with that disadvantage? What did the Minister of Railways and Canals tell the people of St. John? He said: I intend to compete, I am going to carry all the traffic over that 248 miles extra distance to St. John at the same rate as the Canadian Pacific Railway takes it over a route 248 miles shorter. Does any man with a head on his shoulders require to be told that if that be the case, instead of its being a business transaction, it is going to load us down not only with this three-quarters of a million dollars, as the hon. gentleman has pointed out, but with untold sums of money in order to retrieve the misfortunes in which we will find ourselves involved.

Now, I must notice a further remark that the hon. gentleman made about the savings banks. I was never more astonished in my life than when I heard the Minister of Finance explain to this House that he intended to cut down the interest on the loans of the thrifty depositors in the savings banks, who, as the hon. gentleman has said, are largely of the poorer class of people who are able to deposit any money at all. The hon. member for York pointed out to the House in terms that the hon. gentleman was unable to answer, that the very foundation principle of savings banks in Canada was to encourage thrift among the people. That was the policy, and it is all to be swept away. What does the hon. gentleman say? He says: Do you mean to tell me that you can get money at call, or on a short term deposit in the savings banks on the same terms that you can get a fifty-year loan? Let me ask the hon. gentleman: Can you get more from the capitalists of Europe for a thirty-years loan or a fifty-years loan? The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the longer the loan is the cheaper you can get the money. Every man who knows that money is steadily cheapening in the markets of the world, knows that all he has invested in this fifty-years loan is safe for $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent or $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent, which is what Canada has to pay for it. That is safe for fifty years, whereas, in all probability, before half of that fifty years has rolled round, the interest will be down to 2 per cent, if we are to judge the future by the past. Therefore, I say it is a miserable plea to say that they can get cheap money for a longer term, when every man who knows anything of finance knows that the longer the term the cheaper you can get the money. A deeper wrong in my judgment never was done in this matter, and I speak with confidence, because the Minister of Trade and Commerce will do me the justice of saying that I was the first Finance Minister who proposed many years ago to reduce the interest paid to savings bank depositors. I hold now, as I held then, that as money becomes cheaper the country has the right to pay a lower interest. But did any one ever before attempt in the history of this Parliament to offer to poor savings bank depositors a lower rate of interest than the Government are paying to foreign countries and to capitalists abroad. No such thing has ever occurred before in the history of Canada and I trust will never occur again. The Minister of Trade and Commerce gave his solution, however, of this extraordinary conduct on the part of the Minister of Finance, when he told us that the hon. gentleman had no alternative before him, for unless he took this sum of \$500,000 a year out of the pockets of the savings bank depositors he would have had to levy additional taxes on the people. It was one of those not statesmanlike actions, but one of those smart transactions of which alone the present Finance Minister seems capable, a transaction by which he wrings \$500,000 a year out of thrifty depositors, for the purpose of enabling him to expend \$1,500,000 over and above the expenditure of any other Government. That is the position of hon. gentlemen opposite, and it might as well be fairly and fully understood.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has shown me to-night that he has lost the high position which I credited him last session with occupying in the House. I knew that at the time of the general elections his name was regarded throughout the country as having a deterrent influence on his party, that his party had wisely muzzled him in order to prevent him going on the public platform and expressing his opinion. I knew that leading men managing the party had pledged themselves solemnly that if they got into power he would never occupy the position of Finance Minister; I know that as a fact, and I can give the hon. gentleman the names of men of high standing and character who so pledged themselves. Why did they do it? Because the policy propounded by that hon. gentleman in past years had been so utterly disastrous that Canada dreaded him. The reason he had to be deprived of the high position of Finance Minister, and why he came to be regarded as a man who should not occupy that position was because, while hon. gentlemen opposite were declaiming in favour of free trade, they were visiting all the leading manufacturers and saying to them: do not be afraid of us—we do not mean it. The manufacturers replied: That is all very well, but Sir Richard Cartwright has not said so, and he will be Finance Minister. Then they declared: He will never be Finance Minister; give us your support; get us into power and your position will be even better in our hands than it was before. That is the reason why the hon. gentleman was relegated to the back ground. But last session when I saw on the Journals this reciprocity clause, I thought he had asserted himself and had been too much for his colleagues, that those innocent gentlemen were altogether unequal to cope with the hon. member on financial questions, and that while he had been satisfied with having the name without the reality, the hon. gentleman was now taking sure and certain means of securing that free trade for Canada which he had so long declared was absolutely necessary. But I find the hon. gentleman has fallen from his high state. He has fallen so low that he absolutely stands here as the defender, as the protector of the man who has taken his place, who has swept aside with his right arm all the policy the Minister of Trade and Commerce had built up during the whole period of his political life, and the hon. gentleman has become simply his mouthpiece and defender, to apologize to this House for the entire change of front adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has been reminded by my hon. friend for York (Mr. Foster) that not only over Canada but in the United States and everywhere hon. gentlemen opposite for many long years have been declaring that all that was necessary to secure sympathy and peace between the two countries and satisfactory arrangements with the United States was to let the Liberal party get into power. What does the hon. gentleman tell the House now? He said they did not possess the Christian virtue whereby when slapped on one cheek they turned the other to the smiter, but that when for certain reasons the United States did not see fit to trade with us, the Government turned their attention to a country that would trade with us, that they opened the door to that country and closed it to the United States. I shall have something more to say on that subject later on. The hon. gentleman further stated that he hoped the time would never come when the party now in power would have no better record to show than the party that preceded it in power. What did the hon. gentleman mean? Is he blind; is he deaf; is he incapable of knowing what the universal sentiment of Canada is to-day? He ought not to be ignorant of it. Again and again the electorate have repeated in tones that were sufficient to reach even his ears and penetrate his mind, that the policy he propounded was a policy of ruin, and that the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party was one which had raised Canada from the very slough of despond into which the hon. gentleman and his Government had sunk it and had placed it in a proud position, making it the envy of the world. Do I use too strong language? Hon. gentlemen may search the world over to find another instance in which 5,000,000 of people have given such evidence of capacity to govern and elevate a country into the conspicuous and proud position which is occupied under the Liberal-Conservative Administration. The Liberal-Conservatives are not in power to-day, not because of any reversal in that regard of the sentiment of the people, but as the accident of an accident. Monseigneur Bruchesi gave the solution of the question on his arrival at New York, when he told those who interviewed him that the question of the Manitoba schools was more a political than a religious question. He said the Liberal party having declared they could not obtain power in this country by any other means, combined with the Liberals of Manitoba to raise this school question, as it was the only means by which declaiming in favour of free trade, they the Conservatives could be divided and displaced from power. To that conspiracy the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) owes his position to-day, and he knows it. Let him take the judgment of his own party on himself. Why did they chain him by the leg away up in Woodstock, and prevent him from going upon any public platform in Canada during that struggle. It was because they knew the policy that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) propounded was death to the Liberal party, and they knew they never could reach power in this country unless they started a side issue to divert the attention of the people.

He reproaches us about the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. Sir, that is an act of black ingratitude on his part. After he had denounced the Canadian Pacific Railway, in the most unmeasured terms for many years, in this House and out of it, the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) supported a policy with reference to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway which was objected to by a large body of his supporters behind him. I may tell him more; I tell him that the Opposition in this House, had they combined with the opponents of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway amongst the Liberal members, could have defeated the Government and prevented that measure being carried. Why did we not do it? I supported the measure.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Why?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) why. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) was determined to build the Crow's Nest Pass Railway as a Government road, and I knew what that meant. When the Conservative Government were in power, I had ascertained from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the terms on which they would build the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and I had agreed to those terms, because I felt then, as I feel now, that it was a matter of the most vital consequence, not to the Canadian Pacific Railway, not to that particular section of the country, but of vital consequence to the whole of Canada, that that railway should be constructed as promptly as possible. I knew that the construction of that road was the only means by which the trade of the East and West Kootenay could be saved to Canada. And, having come to that conclusion, I was prepared to give to the Canadian Pacific Railway one and a half million dollars; no, not a million and a half, because the half million dollars was a loan, and that would have cost the country absolutely nothing, less than nothing, in fact, because we should have received from the Canadian Pacific Railway more than the entire loan of $20,000 a mile. Our arrangement would practically have cost Canada $1,000,000, and, when this present Government came down with a measure involving an additional $2,000,000, why did I support it? I supported it because I considered it was absolutely necessary that that road should be constructed without any delay, because the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were the only parties who were in a position to accomplish that work at that time, and because, if the measure was not supported by Parliament, the Minister of Railways stood ready to undertake the construction of that road as a Government work. If that had been done, I knew it would utterly fail to accomplish the object which the country had in view; it was Hobson's choice; it was a choice of two evils, and of the two evils, I chose the least. After saving the hon. gentleman, and after the members on this side of the House came to his rescue, I think it comes with a bad grace from him to reproach us for having supported the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. I shall not detain the House farther with this, but I will draw attention to a cardinal fact which the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) seems to have lost sight of altogether.

It is not a question between the two parties as to whether the present Government can provide for the needs of Canada at a smaller expenditure than was made by their predecessors. That is not the question at all. The question is, that, for many long years, these gentlemen opposite have denounced the Liberal-Conservative party in this House and out of it, for wasting the public money by spending an inordinate sum in governing the country, and they have sworn, as far as people can swear by the most solemn declarations on the hustings and on the floor of Parliament, that if they got into power, they would govern this country for a comparatively small sum. They have declared, most solemnly, that they could save from one to three millions, and they have quoted the Minister of Justice, who is now one of their colleagues, as authority for the statement that they could govern Canada for four million dollars less than was expended by the Liberal-Conservative Government. Have they carried out that pledge to the people? No, Sir. They stand convicted, by their own estimates, of having played upon the credulity of the people of this country, of having trifled with the intelligence of the people, by making declarations which, I presume, they knew then, as they know now, had no foundation in fact. They talk about the Estimates of 1896, and they tell us that there were others to be brought down than those laid before the House. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) knows he is trifling with the intelligence of the House, when he raises such a question as that. He knows that, until an estimate has passed Council and received the imprimatur of the Governor General, it is merely an estimate, and can be reduced 50 per cent. or 60 per cent, or rejected altogether. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) knows that, but, I suppose, he has become accustomed to the idea that Council can do anything in its own sweet will with reference to the expenditure of the country, irrespective of the Governor General. Well, I do not blame him for that. There is very good reason for it, and I might give the House a striking illustration. You will remember, Mr. Speaker (Mr. Brodeur), that while you had the honour of occupying the Chair, I had occasion to make some animadversions upon a speech made by the Governor General of Canada, at Toronto. And, Sir, you very properly decided that I must hold Her Majesty's Ministers entirely responsible for that speech. Well, the moment I could get them to assume the responsibility, which they declined in the first place, I did so. The First Minister told us in the beginning: Oh, that is a speech of Lord Aberdeen's; Lord Aberdeen can say what he pleases, and I have nothing to do with it. But when he found that that was not constitutional, he reconsidered his position, and the Government assumed responsibility for the speech. Now, Sir, that was a very curious speech. It was a speech attacking the views of the Opposition in this country in reference to the question of preferential trade, and pointing out how impossible it was that preferential trade should ever be adopted in England. His Excellency came to the rescue of his Ministers, and his Ministers, as in duty bound, afterwards came to the rescue of His Excellency. Now, Sir, what was that policy? The policy of His Excellency was that there should be no countervailing duties adopted in reference to the West India trade. Well, Sir, we have now the policy of countervailing duties in reference to the West India trade brought down by the Finance Minister, with the approval of His Excellency. Who has changed? Has His Excellency become converted to the doctrine of countervailing duties, and thrown over that cardinal doctrine of the free traders of England? Or have the Government changed their position? Yesterday they adopted in this House the policy of His Excellency, that there could be no countervailing duties; and to-day they are the advocates of countervailing duties, brought down here with the approval of His Excellency.

But I am wandering from the subject. I say an estimate is nothing but an estimate. It is a thing that may be wiped out altogether, and no Government and no party can be held responsible for an estimate until it is approved in Council.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Even though the hon. gentleman should make it public outside?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No gentleman can make anything public outside, in the shape of an Estimate, unless it has received the imprimatur of His Excellency, and has been laid on the Table of the House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I can show that he made a statement that certain moneys would be provided which were not included in any Estimate approved by His Excellency and laid before the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman could produce an instance in which a Minister of the Crown, without the approval of His Excellency, and on the occasion of an election, stated to the electors that he was prepared to bring down an Estimate for a certain amount. I refer to the Minister of Railways and Canals in regard to the expenditure on the Trent Valley Canal.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My reference was to the hon. leader of the Opposition himself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite so; but the hon. gentleman need not go quite so far afield. He has an example close at home, in the Minister of Railways and Canals, who publicly declared that he was prepared to give $1,500,000, or whatever it was, for the Trent Valley Canal; there was a beautiful portrait, and under it the words, "Vote for the Trent Valley Canal and Mr. Baker," with the letter to Mr. Baker signed by Mr. Blair. I am not surprised that hon. gentlemen opposite should conclude that governors general have become somewhat obsolete, and that there is no particular necessity at the present time of paying much attention to what they say with reference to these matters one way or the other.

Now, Sir, I have told the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce that this is not a question of comparative Estimates or comparative expenditures at all. It is a question of public policy. It is a question of which the Liberal party for twenty years have been dinning into the ears of the people of this country, that the country could be governed for a much smaller sum than was expended by the Liberal-Conservative party. Mr. Laurier, at Lachute, in 1895, said:

The present Government expended $38,000,000. * * * Where does this $38,000,000 come from? Well, my friends, the Government has a magic wand which draws, quarters, half dollars and dollar bills out of your pockets.

Sir Richard Cartwright, as will be found in the "Hansard" of 1889, complained:

We find charges like these: Civil government, $1,316,000; charges for keeping these buildings and Rideau Hall in order, lighting and warming and repairing them, $300,000; pensions and superannuations, $400,000. That is the way our money goes.

Did that mean anything? Was the hon. gentleman serious when he was presenting that as an extravagant expenditure? If so, let him look at the present Estimates for 1898-99, and he will find civil government put down in these Estimates at $1,418,438, as against $1,316,000. For keeping these buildings and Rideau Hall in order, lighting, warming and repairing them, we are asked to vote $424,000 for 1898-99, as against the $300,000 which the hon. gentleman complained so bitterly against. For pensions and superannuations we are asked to vote for 1898-99, $434,000, as against $430,000 which the hon. gentleman complained so bitterly of. In 1896, during the Budget debate, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

I say it is a disgrace and a shame to the Government that have been entrusted with our affairs, that they come down to us and ask for an expenditure of $38,300,000 a year for federal purposes. Sir, the thing is utterly unjustifiable. That, Sir, was the language of the hon. gentleman when standing here; but we have different language from him now that he is standing there.

I want now to say a few words to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance on the question of preferential trade. He said a few nights ago :

We have made, if not all the reforms that we desired, we have made a very extended tariff reform, and one which I am sure the country will appreciate.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Has appreciated.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Has appreciated, my hon. friend says, and I accept the amendment. The most striking feature of the tariff policy of last session was the preferential tariff. That policy was destined to bring about preferential trade with the mother country, and I am sure the House will agree with me when I say that that portion of our tariff policy has been successful beyond measure, and has given Canada a world-wide fame. When I say this I do not forget that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, not many days ago, stated that that policy had been a complete failure. I do not know whether my hon. friend wished us to take that remark seriously.

One of the most disastrous and complete and thoroughly farcial failures that ever was presented to this House was that policy which the hon. gentleman presented last year. But I propose to deal first with the question of this extended tariff reform which the country, he says, will appreciate. What did the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) say in the county of Annapolis, after the Liberal party had held a convention in 1893 and published to the world the result of their deliberations? He said :

Well, gentlemen, I say no more. Whatever doubts and difficulties there may have been about our trade policy in times past, there is none now. Our platform is clear and definite. To-day the people stand face to face with such an issue, and the next contest is to be one between free trade and protection. A 17 or 20 per cent tariff was high enough to give protection to the manufacturer. If it were not, the manufacturers should go down.

What does the hon gentleman say to-day in the face of that declaration of his that the manufacturers should go down if a 17½ or 20 per cent tariff would not keep them up? If you want an answer, look at the tariff which the Finance Minister has brought down, and of which he boasts as one which ought to excite the wonder and admiration of the world. Hon. gentlemen opposite had plenty of time to consider their tariff. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said in the session of 1896 :

But when the tariff is to be brought down by men who are awake to their responsibility, by men who desire to do their duty by the immense and varied interests of the country, and who have weighed and understand how extensive and how intricate the complications are which are involved in any material change of the tariff, then, Sir, they would be false and recreant to their duty if they allowed any of this silly badinage—I can call it by no better name—to cause them to depart from their policy or to anticipate by one hour the time when they can lay a well-considered scheme before the Parliament and the people of this country.

That was the hon. gentleman's statement. He continued :

We must have time, and I tell the hon. gentleman we will take time—but the Government know their duty, and mean to do it. Moreover, the Government do not propose to be coaxed, bullied or humbugged into taking a step until they have well and maturely considered it.

Well, they took the ordinary period of nine months incubation, and brought forth their tariff at the end of that term. I am inclined to think, after the experience we now have had of that tariff, it would be no sin to worship it. It is said that we must not worship the likeness of anything in the heavens above or the earth beneath or the waters under the earth, and I believe it would be no sin to worship this tariff, which they brought down after nine months incubation, for it has no likeness to anything that has ever existed in the one place or the other.

We were treated a year ago to a reciprocity tariff—to a tariff that was open to the world. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, speaking of it, boasted : We are asking nothing in this resolution for England, nothing that is not opened to every other country in the world, and we invite, not only all the countries in Europe, but even the United States, to come in under that tariff. I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me when I say that that was a reciprocity tariff in the strongest and most emphatic sense of the term. It declared in so many words that any country in the world, which would give the same consideration to Canada that Canada gave to it, was in a position to claim that reduction at the hands of Canada. Great Britain was not specially meant, but the offer was open entirely, in the clearest terms, to the whole world. Well, what happened. The matter came before this House and the Premier said :

I told him a moment ago that the only country in the world which is entitled to this is Great Britain, and possibly New South Wales. The Government of Canada is not aware of any country in the world which is entitled to the benefits of the reciprocal clause.

What had these hon. gentlemen been doing during that nine months of gestation? They had had all the tariffs of the world under their hand. They had obtained these tariffs from the Customs International Bureau at Belgium and paid for them, and that right hon. gentleman had declared from his place that they had examined all the tariffs in the world, and that Great Britain was the only country which could take advantage of that reciprocal clause. That was the position taken by the Government last year, and the Minister of Finance tells us that that resolution created great excitement in England and was met with great acclaim by the press and public men of all classes. But that is not a very difficult thing to accomplish. All that the hon. gentleman had to do was to say, as he did, as Finance Minister of Canada, that Canada was giving a great boon to England, that he was putting the tariff of Canada in such a position as would greatly benefit the manufacturing and commercial interests of England, in order to excite this great acclaim on the part of public men and everybody else in that country. What they want is to sell their goods, and when they were told that the high tariff which the Liberal-Conservative party had imposed under the National Policy was to be lowered, that 12½ per cent of the duties was to be at once remitted, and that at the end of the year a reduction of 25 per cent was to take place, is it to be wondered at that this announcement was acclaimed by all classes in that country? But they were the most grossly deceived people on the face of the globe. The hon. gentleman knows well that before he left England, the people were waking up to the fact that they had been grossly deceived by this preferential tariff clause, and that under it their trade was decreasing week by week and month by month, until it dwindled to smaller proportions than it ever descended to before. The hon. gentleman said on that occasion—that is a year ago :

We do not by our resolutions offer anything to Great Britain alone. We recognize the fact that Great Britain, by her liberal policy, is in a position to avail herself of this offer immediately, but we make our offer not to Great Britain only, but to every nation willing to accept it. We make it to every country which is willing to establish fair and reasonable trade relations with Canada.

Is that the policy of the Government to-day? That was the policy they put before the people of Canada a year ago, not as one which was to last but a year, but as one which was the result of careful deliberation during nine months before it was propounded and was intended to be permanent. Well, it is as unlike the policy of to-day as black is unlike white. One of the most transparent, palpable delusions ever attempted to be palmed off on a great country was this preferential tariff. The policy of this Government a year ago—who knows what the policy of this Government will be for an hour? Nobody does. When I stood here a year ago and told the hon. gentleman: You cannot pass this Bill into law until you have changed it, you must add a clause recognizing all the treaties that England has made, the hon. gentleman laughed me to scorn. But he came down a month afterwards, when he found that what I told him was true, when he found that he could not get the Governor General to assent to his tariff, without a clause to provide for its extension to other countries which had treaties with England. That clause, as first introduced, was as follows:—

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the Reciprocal Tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce, or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be entered for duty, or taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada, at the reduced rates of duty provided in the Reciprocal Tariff set forth in Schedule "D."

The First Minister stated that this applied to England and to England alone, that no other country in the world could get in under it. They had examined—these wise-aces had examined—all the tariffs of the world, and they found that England alone could take advantage of this, and therefore it was a straight preference to England of 12½ per cent. I ventured to question that. I told that hon. gentleman that he would have to reckon with the German and Belgian treaties, and that under these treaties England could not accept what they proposed, but that to make that effective, they must bring down another clause which would extend to all the countries with which England had most-favoured-nation treaties. They found that they were wrong and I was right, and they brought down a clause in specific terms applying it to those countries. When I congratulated the hon. gentleman on what he had done, I was taken to task by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. And what did he say? He said :

When this resolution was tabled the hon. gentleman (referring to Sir Charles Tupper) declared it an illegal and unconstitutional resolution. Can he lay his finger upon a single paragraph published in any newspaper of weight in the world endorsing that extravagant statement of his? Can he produce the opinion of a prominent lawyer or even of a fledgeling lawyer endorsing the absurd and ridiculous statement made by him that the resolution was unconstitutional and illegal?

Well, Sir, he got his answer from the highest legal authority in the Empire, from the law officers of the Crown in England, who told them that the resolution as the Government brought it down and before they proposed the clause which made it apply to the countries having most-favoured-nation treaties was an unconstitutional and illegal clause. They found that it was illegal because the instruction of the Governor General would prevent his giving assent to it, and because Canada is part of the great British Empire, and was bound by treaties in which she had been included by the Imperial Government. He found that it was not a fledgeling lawyer, but the highest legal authority in the Empire that taught Sir Louis Davies and taught Mr. Edward Blake. What had Mr. Blake to do with it? These gentlemen had so little confidence in their own judgment, in their own knowledge of law, that they took the public funds of this country to employ Mr. Blake to plead their case before the law officers of the Crown. But the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) has found out who was the fledgeling lawyer who ventured to controvert my statement that the action they proposed was illegal and unconstitutional. Hon. gentlemen opposite generally found it out. They have not converted the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I believe that hon. gentleman studied the profession. I have not learned that he was able to reach the bar, but I suppose he may be regarded as a legal authority. He says, in effect: I consider my opinion much more valuable than that of the law officers of the Crown. I believe he is alone in Canada holding that opinion of himself.

Every position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite a year ago was shown to be untenable and had to be abandoned; every position taken by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House a year ago—maintained down to the present hour—has been shown to have the sanction of the highest legal authority in the British Government, and to that hon. gentlemen opposite have been compelled to bow.

Now, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a most extraordinary, and I think most impudent, attempt—and I do not hesitate to use the word—a most impudent attempt to mislead the Government, the manufacturers and the people of England, made in this House by the hon. the Finance Minister last session. How did he arouse this furore? How did he get all classes, the press, the Parliament, the people of England, excited with enthusiasm over the policy that he was propounding? He did it by the solemn declaration on the floor of Parliament, that the policy he was bringing down was a policy that would give a preference immediately to the industries of Great Britain in the Canadian market of 12½ per cent, as compared with the general tariff of Canada. Was that true? I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) if that statement upon which he caused this furore in the minds of English workmen and manufacturers, was true?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Does the hon. gentleman expect me to answer?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, I do.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Every statement I made was true.

Mr. DOBELL. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad to find that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) has one friend behind him to give him a cheer. That gentleman happens to be one of his colleagues. But where is the rank and file of the party? A high authority has said, "Oh, that mine enemy would write a book." You have written a book. You have brought down a tariff, tabulated it and put it in a Budget speech.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will please address the Chair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope I shall always address the Chair, but I wish the hon. gentleman to understand that I am speaking in reference to the views and statements of the Finance Minister. I am obliged now to go into particulars, and if I do not satisfy every independent man behind him, except the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) that my statements are true, I shall be deceived in my powers of argument.

I have here the tariff as brought down by the Finance Minister. One item of it says, "cotton fabrics, printed, dyed or coloured, n.o.p., 30 per cent, 35 per cent." What does that mean? It means that the hon. gentleman sought to delude the British public into the belief that he was taking 12½ per cent off the tariff of Canada. But before doing so, he added more than 12½ per cent to it. That is what it means, and the hon. gentleman knows it. And what is the result? Why, take the figures that the hon. gentleman himself has furnished. Instead of paying 30 per cent under this preferential tariff of 30th June, 1898, the English goods of this class have to pay 30½ per cent—so that the duty was actually higher than it was under the tariff which existed before these hon. gentlemen came into power, over the tariff as it existed when the hon. gentleman came into power. That may have been smart, it may have been very cunning, it may have been very illusory, but I ask him if it was honest. When the duty of adopting a tariff for this country rested upon your shoulders, and when you came to make such a tariff, after you had pledged yourselves to the people of this country, through long years, that if you got into power, you would strike down every root and vestige of protection, I ask, was it honest for you to raise the duty on that staple article of import, cotton fabrics, printed, dyed or coloured, from 30 per cent, under the old National Policy tariff, to a rate of 35 per cent? Was that a deception, was it a palpable deception? Why, the people of England seized with the wildest avidity the delusive statement of the Minister of Finance that he was giving them a great boon, but they came to realize the fact that, instead of a boon, he had added 5 per cent to the National Policy tariff.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Would the hon. gentleman say what statement I made that was not correct?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say, that on the floor of this House, the hon. gentleman declared, in stentorian tones, and when he went to England, he paraded it all over that country, that the policy of the Liberal party of this country was to reduce the high tariff on goods coming from England by 12½ per cent. Did he, or did he not, make that statement?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The statement I made was, that we had a general tariff, the rates of which were expressed, and that there was a preferential tariff which would give one-eighth reduction immediately, and a further reduction at a future date. I did not state as to any particular article the rate was to be one-eighth, or one-quarter, of the previously existing duty. It was to be one-eighth, or one-quarter, as the case may be, off the general tariff, which general tariff was read at the desk, every item of it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am in the judgment of the House, when I say that the statement made on the floor of this House by the hon. gentleman, in the most definite terms, was, that he was reducing the tariff to the people of England to the extent of 12½ per cent.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Would my hon. friend quote any such statement of mine. Instead of stating it in that manner?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am now saying what was understood by every man in this House, and by every man outside of this House. I say, there is not an intelligent man in Canada who did not understand this question as I am putting it to the House now.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Nobody understood it so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me, that the people of England would have been so delighted, if he had made an honest avowal to them, that, instead of giving them an advantage of 12½ per cent below the tariff of Canada, he was absolutely adding ½ per cent to the National Policy tariff of Canada, to the high tariff that the hon. gentleman and his party had spent twenty years in denouncing? I say, the hon. gentleman knows that he could not have created this furore and this excitement on the other side of the water. The people of England, the Government of England, everybody was deceived. Now, what do we find? Cotton fabrics, printed, dyed or coloured, n.o.p.—is that imported from England?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is selecting one or two items out of the tariff, and he is talking of these.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, I am selecting all the leading staple articles, staple imports from England.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There are only two or three items of that kind in the whole tariff, and he is treating these as if they were the whole tariff.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, cotton fabrics, dyed or coloured, is a matter of considerable importance to the English manufacturers. Does the hon. gentleman think he could have created a furore, if he had told the people of England: Gentlemen, I reduced that 12½ per cent to you, but I am going to put it up more than 12½ per cent. I say, it is one of the grossest delusions that was ever practiced upon an intelligent people, was this pretended preferential tariff that was brought down last session. Well, the old tariff, the National Policy tariff, was 30 per cent. The hon. gentleman raised it to 35 per cent; then he took 12½ per cent off for England, as a great favour, leaving England to pay ½ per cent more than the highest tariff that ever existed in this country till he came into power. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say, that, when he came into power, pledged as one of the strongest free traders in this country, the people expected that his first act would be to adopt, not only the National Policy tariff for Canada, but to increase it over and above what it ever was before? Because that is what he did, and that is what I am confronting him with to-night, and what he is unable to answer.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Why did the hon. gentleman say I am unable to answer it? I have pointed out that he is stating an exceptional item. On that very item, by the effect of that tariff, the duty will be 26 per cent and a fraction.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman had better possess his soul in patience. I am dealing with the present year.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The tariff deals with more than one year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, it does not.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The tariff distinctly dealt with two years, with two stages of reduction.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Now I come to curtains, when made up, trimmed or untrimmed, of which there is a large import from England. When the hon. gentleman came into power, after he had spent twenty years in denouncing the National Policy as an infamous robbery on the people of Canada, his first act was to raise the duty on this item to 35 per cent. Then he takes off his 12½ per cent, and leaves it ½ per cent higher upon English goods than it was when he came into power. I am now dealing with that tariff as it was presented to England during the past year.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Twenty-five per cent was the tariff presented to England. We are not changing the tariff this year; therefore 25 per cent comes off in July.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Minister of Customs seems to forget that they have repealed all that; they propose, in this very Act, to repeal the Act of last year. The first step they have taken is, to repeal that Act; therefore, we are dealing with that Act as it stood last year.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not on that point.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Certainly, the whole clause is repealed. The hon. gentleman, in his Budget speech, has declared that he repeals the Act of last year, because, if he does not repeal that Act, he finds that, when the Belgian and German treaties are removed, he is no nearer being able to give any preferential tariff to England.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentleman means to say that we propose to repeal the 25 per cent reduction, he is entirely wrong.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say, the whole clause that contains the 25 per cent is repealed.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Another clause is put in, in place of it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman may put what he likes in place of it, but I say, the clause that gave the 25 per cent reduction, is gone. Now I come to fancy goods, bracelets, corsets, fringes and tassels. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to get copies of this Budget speech, have them pasted up, show them to the people, because I thank the hon. gentleman from the bottom of my heart for putting in condensed form the evidence of this frightful delusion that he has attempted to practice upon the people of England. On these articles there was 30 per cent when he came into power; he increased it to 35 per cent when he prepared his tariff for Canada. Then, when you take off 12½ per cent, the English people find that they can send these same articles in here by paying ½ per cent more than they ever had to pay under the old tariff.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. How much will be paid when the 25 per cent is taken off?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then take flax, hemp and jute. The hon. gentleman said there were only a few articles. These are all articles in which England is most concerned. The tax was 30 per cent when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power; they raised the tax to 35 per cent. Twelve and a half per cent off would bring it down so that British manufacturers would have to pay only five-eighths more. Yet all England was put in a flame of excitement by the wonderful preferential trade that hon. gentlemen opposite declared they were prepared to give. Then take domestic linens, including bed covers and diapers. The duty was 25 per cent when they came into power; they raised it to 30 per cent. That is only one and a quarter to be paid by English exporters to this country over what they had to pay before. Then I come to flaxseed and linseed. The tax was 20 per cent; it was raised to 25 per cent by the hon. Finance Minister when he presented his free trade tariff. The allowances granted reduced it to 21½ per cent to be paid by English exporters instead of 20 per cent, or 1½ per cent more than ever before. Then on all fabrics, composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, &c., n.e.s., the tariff was 30 per cent; it was raised under the free trade tariff to 35 per cent, so that British exporters had only to pay ½ per cent additional.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. How much will have to be paid under the next stage?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Let the hon. gentleman possess his soul in patience, for I shall have something to say about the next stage in a few minutes. We come next to carpets, brussels and tapestry, on which the tax was 30 per cent. The hon. gentleman was not satisfied with that tax, but raised it to 35 per cent under the free trade tariff, and the English exporters were called upon to pay ½ per cent more than under the National Policy. I have satisfied hon. gentlemen opposite that not on two or three articles but on almost every single article exported from Great Britain the present tariff has increased the rate ½ per cent or 1¼ per cent and more. That is not the worst of it. We are told to-night by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that when they went, cap in hand to the United States, they said: Now, your Liberal friends are in power in Canada and we want to make a favourable arrangement with you. The United States gave them however, the cold shoulder, and told them that the sooner they went home the better, that the United States did not propose to change its tariff for them or for anybody else. What did hon. gentlemen do? They used brave words in this House. They said they were ready to make favourable arrangements with the United States, but when they found they would have nothing to do with us, we then determined to turn our face to old mother England. That was a curious confession for those ultra loyalists to make. These hon. gentlemen, we were told, were filled with burning loyalty to the Crown, that they wanted to come to the rescue of British manufacturers to whose interests they were devoted. That was the story; but to-night we have been told that they only turned their faces to the motherland when they met with a rebuff from the United States. I stand here to-night to say that the tariff as exhibited by the Finance Minister's speech is one that should be read by the people, and I hope the hon. gentleman will scatter as many copies as possible. Generally a Finance Minister has a very liberal issue made, covering 100,000 copies.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Is that the correct number ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I trust the hon. gentleman will send 100,000 copies of his speech all over Canada, for the reason that no speech was ever made by any man on the floor of this House, no speech can ever be made and no act ever accomplished that will damn this Government as will that speech when examined by the people. How great will be the astonishment of the Liberals ? Are there any Liberals in this country, are there any honest Liberals who believe in the principles of the Liberal party which during the past twenty years has denounced the Liberal-Conservative party and the National Policy ? If there are any such, they will turn in disgust from the party that has signalized their entrance to power by a tariff in which they have shown themselves not only prepared to abandon all their free trade theories and to throw them to the winds, but to take the National Policy tariff in its essential elements and add 5 per cent to the highest tariff ever enacted in this country. Under these circumstances there is no service that the Minister of Finance can perform to this country more important to the great party to which I belong than to scatter broadcast this damning evidence of having sacrificed and trampled under foot every principle for which the Liberal party has contended during the last twenty-five years in this country. But that is not all. How did hon. gentlemen opposite treat the United States which gave them the cold shoulder ? The tariff of last year was a pro-American tariff. It was not a British tariff, having preferential features in it, for it provided for increased taxation on British goods, and the result has been a large diminution in the imports from England. The hon. gentleman admitted that in the speech at Sheffield, although he had been loud mouthed in declaring in Parliament that it would be a boom to the mother country.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman has invented what I said at Sheffield.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will read in a moment to the hon. gentleman what he said, so that he may have the pleasure of hearing his own words. Corn was 7½ per cent under the National Policy. The Finance Minister made it free. Was that turning to the mother country ? It was going down on bended knees to the United States and when one cheek had been smitten, turning the other cheek to the smiter, and declaring that for the purpose of conciliating them we would take the duty off corn. The hon. gentleman was prepared to sacrifice all our agricultural interests, our farmers who on their poorer lands growing coarse grains, by allowing American corn to come in duty free. Did you do anything of the kind for England ? Nothing of the sort.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman should address the Chair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You will understand, Mr. Speaker, that I am always speaking through you.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is the rule that an hon. gentleman should not refer to another hon. gentleman in the second person, but in the third person.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I know you are right, Mr. Speaker, but at this stage of the evening one is sometimes likely to make a slip. I bow with all respect to your decision, but I am inclined to think you will find in the Reports of Parliamentary Debates in England, that occasionally parliamentarians do apostrophize the person of whom they speak.

Mr. SPEAKER. If it were only occasionally.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I want to draw the attention of the Finance Minister, the gentleman sitting just opposite, to the fact that he made corn free. I want to draw his attention to the fact that he reduced the duty on corn meal from 40 cents per barrel to 25 cents.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Judging from what my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) says, I did not think we reduced anything ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am showing the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) that he did nothing for England.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We did a good deal for Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will show that the hon. gentleman did nothing for Canada, except to increase the national tariff higher than ever it was before, by 5 per cent on a great number of articles. I want to draw his attention to the fact that he reduced corn meal coming from the United States alone, from 40 cents to 25 cents.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Why does the hon. gentleman use the word "alone" there ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Because it only comes from the United States and nowhere else.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We did it to please the people of Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Why was wheat reduced from 15 cents a bushel to 12 cents ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. To please the people of Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman think the farmers of this country are pleased with that ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They seem to be.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I contend, Sir, that the farmers of this country are not pleased at having their protection cut down. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) reduced the duty on flour from 75 cents to 60 cents a barrel. I could understand him if he had abolished the duty on flour, because his leader declared to the people that when the Liberal party got into power they would wipe out the duty on flour and coal. What does the Finance Minister say to that?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think it is a good thing to reduce it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then the hon. gentleman feels that the declarations upon which he and his friends attained power are to be treated as idle wind, and that the pledges of the head of the Government under whom he serves are to be taken as of no consequence whatever. He reduced stove plates, stoves of all kinds, sad or smoothing, hatters' and tailors' irons from 27½ to 25 per cent. He reduced iron pipe of every description from $10 per ton to $8. Iron or steel cut nails and spikes (ordinary builders') and railroad spikes from ½ cent per pound to ¼ cent per pound. Wire nails of all kinds, N.O.P., 1 cent to ¾ cent per pound. Files and rasps, n.e.s., from 35 cents to 30 cents. Adzes, cleavers, hatchets, from 35 to 30 per cent, saws from 35½, hammers, cant dogs, picks, mattocks, anvils, vices and tools of all kinds for hand or machine use, from 35 per cent to 30 per cent. Was it England that got the benefit of these reductions? Was the benefit given to that great country with which the hon. gentleman told us it was their object to promote trade. No, Sir. The benefit was given to the United States, that country which the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us had given Canada the cold shoulder. It was for the United States that these advantages were prepared, and the hon. gentleman knows it. Here is what is said by the "Iron Age," a paper published in the United States:

Of all the changes made in the general tariff, the most sweeping were those made in the duties on iron and steel and manufactures thereof. Large slices were taken off most of the old duties, and some of the most important articles of mining machinery and (next year) barbed wire, were put on the free list. What foreign country will receive most, if not all, the advantage of this? Clearly the United States. It is true Britain gets her goods in at a rate of duty now 12½ per cent, and next year 25 per cent less than the general rate, but nobody supposes, the Government least of all, that she can ship iron and steel goods into this country against United States competition. Looking over the whole list of Canadian imports of iron and steel goods, we find in nearly every article that the balance is enormously in favour of the United States.

Was that a pro-British or a pro-American tariff?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have not found any Englishmen to complain of that part of the tariff.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say you have all but strangled the iron industry in Canada, and you have done it, not in the interest of England but in the interest of the United States of America. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) knows that the United States have captured our iron trade, and the hon. gentleman knows that these reductions have seriously crippled the iron industries of Canada which have been built up by the expenditure of an enormous amount of capital.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not know anything of the sort.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You have swept away the tariff that gave them that protection which enabled them to carry on their operations in a manner advantageous to themselves, and which enabled them to give a suitable return to their employees. You have compelled them to reduce the wages they paid to their employees; you have injured Canadian trade and you have injured it to benefit the United States. On every platform throughout England the Prime Minister spoke of the glorious boon that Canada was giving England, and the people over there were wild with enthusiasm over the idea that Canada had come to the rescue of poor England, that in all their difficulties they had at last found a protector, and that the Canadian Finance Minister was coming to the rescue of the poor British manufacturers. And, Sir, the people of course were wild with enthusiasm. But when it was tried out, what did they find? Why, Sir, here is the statement of one of the most enthusiastic and devoted papers in support of the present Government to be found in London. It is headed:

The tariff in operation.—A startling result. And it says:

The Canadian preferential tariff has now been in operation for four months, and what is the effect? We published the official figures last week for the year so far as expired, and let us see how the record of British exports to Canada stands for the four months at the lower tariff. The result is at first sight a startling one.

The able and diligent secretary of the London Chamber of Commerce issued a circular, in which he said:

The expectations of the free traders have undoubtedly been disappointed by the extension to practically all countries except the United States of what was supposed to be an exclusive British preference.

Why did they suppose it was an exclusively British preference? You told them so.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Your Prime Minister said you had examined all the tariffs in the world, and found that England, and England alone, would be entitled to the advantage of the preferential tariff. Did you tell them that or did you not? Did you sit there silent or did you rise and tell the Prime Minister that he was making a mistake? You sat there and heard your Premier declare to the world that England, and England alone, would have the advantage of that tariff.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman asks and I will answer. If England did not get the advantage which Canada designed, it was not the fault of Canada, but it was due to the act of the English Government themselves. The hon. gentleman knows it, and he knows he is not stating the case fairly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will not lead me off the track of my argument in that way. He knows that I told him, from my place in this House, when he produced this tariff, exactly what the position was. I told him that he could not do what he proposed, and what was his answer. He said: "You must not tell me that we cannot do it—we have done it."

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not say that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. "To-morrow morning," he said, "every custom-house in Canada has the order to admit English goods at the reduction." I told the hon. gentleman that he was only rendering himself ridiculous, and that he would not only have to admit all these other countries to the benefit of his preferential tariff, but would have to pay them back every dollar of duty which they had paid, over and above that at which English goods were to be admitted. If the hon. gentleman did not know what the position was, it was not my fault, because I told him here and then that what he was attempting was to practice a complete delusion on the people of England, as he did. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman said:

I claim it was the direct outcome of the Canadian policy itself, those Belgian and German treaties would not have been denounced down to the present moment.

I ask the hon. Minister of Finance if that is what he told the people of Sheffield. Did he tell the people of Sheffield that it was Canada that had done this thing? No; he told them the very reverse. But I will give a better evidence than that of the Minister of Finance. I will give the evidence of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, who declared on the floor of the House of Commons of England what led to the denunciation of the treaties. He said:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The Premiers of the self-governing colonies unanimously and earnestly recommend the denunciation at the earliest convenient time of any treaty now hampering the commercial relations between Great Britain and her colonies. This was the unanimous wish of all the self-governing colonies, and it was accompanied by a most important and significant resolution, which was this: "That, in the hope of improving the trade relations between the mother country and her colonies, the Premiers present undertake to confer with their colleagues with a view to seeing whether such a result would be properly secured by preference given by the colonies to the products of Great Britain." On receipt of these resolutions the Government decided to withdraw their adherence to the treaties.

That gives the lie direct to the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is very harsh language.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must see, on reflection, that that is too strong.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw it. But I will say this, that it would be impossible, in stronger, more concise, or more complete terms, to contradict the statement made by the Minister of Finance.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman might say that it lacked the essential element. That is a famous phrase with us in Nova Scotia.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, I say that it lacked the essential element of truth, and that phrase was never more appropriately applied than it is on the present occasion. But I will give the hon. gentleman an authority that he will respect even more than that of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. I can give this House no higher authority than that of the Secretary of State for the Colonies; but I will give a higher authority for the hon. gentleman, and that is his own.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. A good authority.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What does he say? Standing in the presence of English gentlemen, who knew and understood this question, did he say that Canada had accomplished this thing? No; the very reverse. He said:

In conclusion, I have to say that the action of Her Majesty's Government, at the request of the Colonial Premiers—influenced possibly by the action of Canada—the action of Her Majesty's Government in denouncing those treaties, which seemed to be a barrier between the mother country and the colonies, is one which deserves and receives the profound gratitude of the people of Canada.

That was the statement he made—not that Canada had done it, not that Canada had forced it; but he confirms the statement made by the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, the Secretary of State for the Colonies on the floor of the House of Commons, that this was done, not by the action of Canada, but at the unanimous request of the Premiers of all the colonies there assembled, and in compliance with a resolution passed by them, that if this was done, they would endeavour to obtain favourable consideration for the trade of England in their various colonies. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman referred in most sneering terms to the question of preferential trade. He said :

It had been represented occasionally—and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has been particularly attacked on that score—that the Government of Canada, in return for concessions granted to Great Britain, could and should have obtained certain preferential advantages in the British market. I had quoted from my remarks of last session to show that the view which the Government entertained of that question was that owing to the strong opinion known to prevail in the mother country on the question of protective duties generally, but particularly on the question of protective duties affecting articles of food, there was no reasonable ground for believing any such preferential terms could have been obtained in the British market.

These are the terms in which, standing in his place here the other night the hon. gentleman referred to the question of preferential trade. Had he no respect for his leader? Had he no respect for the solemn declarations made by the leader of his Government and his party, in the presence of the electors of Canada, that if they gave him power, he would take up this question and press it to a conclusion? Let me, at the expense of wearying the House at this late hour, call his attention to what his right hon. leader said on this question, and to ask him whether he thinks it is respectful to this House for him to sneer at this question of preferential trade as one that is utterly outside of public consideration altogether. On the 17th of May, at London, Ont., Sir Wilfrid Laurier said :

In regard to this question of preferential trade, Mr. Laurier desired to say that Sir Charles Tupper was no more favourable to the idea than himself.

My hope is, nay, my conviction is, that on the 23rd of June the Liberal party will be at the head of the polls; and then it will be the Liberal party, with its policy of a revenue tariff, that will send commissioners to London to arrange for a basis of preferential trade.

Was that an attempt, Sir, on the part of the hon. gentleman's leader, to deceive and delude the people of this country? If there is any ground for the statement which the hon. gentleman made in this House the other night, then his leader stands convicted by him of a most disgraceful attempt to deceive the electorate of the country in order to get power. That is the position. I leave the hon. gentleman to take whichever horn of the dilemma he pleases. I leave him to say whether his leader, for the purpose of grasping power, was ready to lend himself to a palpable delusion, such as the present Government altogether repudiate, as outside any kind of probability, or whether he is the party at fault. What did the leader of the Government say at London, Ont. :

Now, the statesmen of Great Britain have thought that the governments of the colonies have come to a time when a new step can be taken in their development? What is that? That there shall be a commercial agreement between England and the colonies. That practical statesman, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, has come to the conclusion that the time has come when it is possible to have within the bounds of the Empire a new step taken, which will give to the colonies in England a preference for their products over the products of other nations. What would be the possibilities of such a step if it was taken? We sell our goods in England. We send our wheat, our butter, our cheese, all our natural products, but there we have to compete with similar products from the United States, from Russia, and from other nations. Just see what a great advantage it would be to Canada, if the wheat, cheese and butter, which we would send to England, should be met in England with a preference over similar products of other nations. The possibilities are immense.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the new and progressive Secretary of the Colonies, has declared that the time has come when it is possible to discuss that question. But, sir, if England is going to give us that preference, England would expect something from us in return. What is it she would expect? England would expect that we would come as closely to her own system of free trade as it is possible for us to come. England does not expect that we should take her own system of free trade, such as she has it; but I lay it before you, that the thing the English people would expect in return is that, instead of a principle of protection, we should adopt the revenue form of tariff, pure and simple. These are the conditions on which we can have that boon.

There is the declaration of the hon. gentleman's leader. That is the policy propounded in the face of the country, upon which these gentlemen got into power—not perhaps on that issue alone, but that was one of them. And I say that no Government is in a position, when obtaining power upon a declaration of public policy, to turn their backs upon it as the hon. members turned his back upon this principle of preferential trade the other night. What did Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the head of this Government say, when he got to England? To-night my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) said that when the right hon. gentleman left the shores of Canada, he left ready to advocate preferential trade in England. I do not agree with him, I believe that when Sir Wilfrid Laurier—and I say it with deep regret—left the shores of Canada, pledged in the most solemn manner to the policy of negotiating preferential trade with Lord Salisbury if he got power, he had pledged himself to somebody that he would defeat that policy. Why do I say that? I say it because you cannot read his speeches, his declarations, and promises without seeing that at that time he was sincere and believed that preferential trade was a practicable thing. But between that time and the time when he got power, I believe that he pledged himself for some purpose—I will not say what—that if he did get power, he would defeat that preferential trade policy which was calculated to injure the trade of the United States. Why is it that in that great struggle between the right hon. gentleman and myself, between the Liberals and the Liberal-Conservative party in this country, every newspaper in the United States was praying for the success of hon. gentlemen opposite? If he was prepared to go, the length that his speeches at London and Toronto bound him to go, there was no reason why the United States should wish for his success. But between that time and the time when he won the battle in the struggle between the two great parties in this country, I believe the hon. gentleman had bound himself to prevent that preferential trade, which was to interfere with the interests of the great agricultural population of the United States, that is the only conclusion at which we can arrive.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Perhaps my hon. friend would mention to whom he bound himself?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say that in my judgment, there is nothing clearer. You have the great organs of public opinion in the United States fighting his battle down to the last moment, you have the hon. gentleman himself pledged to preferential trade, but the moment he touched the shores of England we find him declaring that he would have nothing to do with such a policy. I leave it with the hon. gentleman himself to work out the problem. Well, Sir, he had no sooner touched the shores of England than he turned his back upon preferential trade. The man who had declared that Mr. Chamberlain was ready to entertain the subject. The man who had pledged himself as solemnly as man could pledge himself to man to go to Lord Salisbury and negotiate for preferential trade with England immediately he reached England, did all he could to prevent preferential trade being realized. This is what the right hon. gentleman said:

What we give you by our tariff we give you in gratitude for the splendid freedom under which we have prospered. It is a free gift. We ask no compensation. Protection has been the curse of Canada; we would not see you come under its baneful influence—for what weakens you must weaken us.

Mr. DOBELL. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Was that what he said in Canada? No, the very reverse. He pledged himself to the great electorate of Canada, that if he obtained power, he would negotiate preferential trade with Lord Salisbury. He knew what that meant—that

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

England should give Canada some consideration for a policy that would place her manufacturers and the result of her industries upon the market of Canada upon preferential terms. If he had wished to say to the people of Canada, in the clearest and most emphatic terms: I was deluding you; I had no intention of negotiating preferential trade with Lord Salisbury; I intended to kill it as soon as I got an opportunity—he could not have said it more clearly than he has.

Mr. DOBELL. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) says, 'Hear, hear.' Does he deny what I have said?

Mr. DOBELL. Perhaps, I may be allowed one word, as the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is not present. I say, there is nothing inconsistent with the statements that our Premier made on this side of the Atlantic with those which he made when he attended the banquet in Liverpool and spoke before the great merchants of that city. He said: We are giving you a preference of 25 per cent, and we give it to you without asking for anything in return. Why? Because this country has got to work out to a free trade basis before we can approach Great Britain to give us preferential trade. Mr. Chamberlain himself distinctly stated, at a dinner given by the Canada Club, that as soon as Britain saw that Canada was capable of entering into such an arrangement, then, the mother country would be only too glad to discuss with her the subject of preferential trade.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) had better have retained his seat. Did he hear me read the statement made by the Prime Minister before he went to England?

Mr. DOBELL. Certainly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Did the hon. gentleman hear me read the following:—

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the new and progressive Secretary of the Colonies, has declared that the time has come when it is possible to discuss that question. But, sir, if England is going to give us that preference, England would expect something from us in return. What is it she would expect? England would expect that we would come as closely to her own system of free trade as it is possible for us to come. England does not expect that we should take her own system of free trade, such as she has it; but I lay it before you, that the thing the English people would expect in return is that, instead of a principle of protection, we should adopt the revenue form of tariff pure and simple.

Mr. DOBELL. Quite so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, the right hon. gentleman declared that if he got power, he would go and negotiate preferential trade with Lord Salisbury. And, when he went to England, before he saw Lord Salisbury, the moment he touched the shores of England, he came out and took a position diametrically opposed to that which he had expressed here. I can understand the hon. member for Quebec West not understanding the subject, but I cannot understand any other hon. gentleman in this House not understanding it. The Prime Minister, from the hour he touched the shores in England, down to the hour he left it, did everything man could do to prevent Canada obtaining preferential trade with Great Britain. He took every step, adopted every policy, committed himself to every principle that could make against preferential trade. And what more? Why, he accepted the Cobden medal. The hon. member for Quebec West bows his head. On what terms did the Premier accept the Cobden medal? Does the hon. gentleman know?

Mr. DOBELL. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will sit down, and let the hon. gentleman tell us what those terms were.

Mr. DOBELL. I do not wish to detain the House, but I may say that I myself attended a dinner of the Cobden Club, and the first resolution on the order of the day was on the question whether it would be expedient for Great Britain to change her fiscal policy, even if the colonies were disposed to give preferential trade to the manufacturers of Great Britain; and, after discussion, in which most of the extreme free traders of Great Britain spoke, we gained the vote by a majority of one, that it would be expedient. Therefore, I say that our Premier was perfectly justified in taking the medal of the Cobden Club, as an earnest that we are going to work this country into a freer and better state of trade than she has had.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very glad to have heard the hon. gentleman's interesting account of that dinner. I am afraid it was a long dinner, and that the hon. gentleman enjoyed himself very much. But I wish to draw his attention to what Lord Farrar said, when he presented the Cobden medal. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) will understand the position of this question, when I read that. Lord Farrar said:

There is a party amongst us who would willingly discriminate against German and Belgian goods, and who look upon the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties as a step towards what they have been pleased to call the commercial federation of the Empire—a system under which commercial union in the different parts of the Empire will be fostered by laws excluding or discouraging foreign goods. If this were to be the consequence of what you have done, I need hardly say that we of the Cobden Club would not have been here. It is because we believe that your efforts are founded on the opposite principle, and will be followed by opposite results, that we, followers of Adam Smith and of Peel, of Bright and of Cobden, are here to congratulate and to thank you.

Now, I want to know what the hon. member for Quebec West will say, now that I have given him my evidence that the medal of the Cobden Club was given to Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the distinct declaration denouncing the exclusion of Belgium and Germany from the operation of the Government's new policy.

The policy of the Minister of Finance is one utterly fatal to the doctrine propounded by Lord Farrar. Lord Farrar supposed that the policy of a year ago was going to be the policy of Canada, he supposed so owing to the declarations of the Premier of Canada all over England, that, strong a free trader as he was when he came to England, he was a much stronger free trader then. But the policy propounded by the Minister of Finance makes it utterly impossible for the right hon. gentleman to retain that medal a single hour. The moment his Government declared that the very principles on which Lord Farrar delivered the medal into his hands, are gone, that the reciprocity which was open to all the world is repealed, and that in place of it a discriminatory tariff in favour of England only is adopted, and against Belgium, Germany and all these other countries. I say at that moment the principles upon which that medal was given, are swept away. I say if it was an ordinary transaction between men, the Cobden Club would have a right of action against the Premier for having abandoned the principles upon which he received the medal, and the moment this becomes law the Cobden Club would have a legitimate action against the right hon. gentleman for having received goods under false pretenses, and the criminal statutes of Canada could be made to apply to such a transaction.

Now, Sir, in conclusion, let me say that I regret from the bottom of my heart that the Government of Canada have been so lost to their duty to their country, so forgetful of the pledges made by the Prime Minister as to have treated this great and important question in the way that they have done. The Minister of Finance, in his Budget speech, made sneering references to this question. Why, Sir, what is preferential trade? It is the grandest, it is the greatest scheme that has ever been propounded or, in my judgment, ever will be propounded for promoting the unity of the Empire. It is a policy by which that most potent of all influences, whether as regards men or nation, can be brought into operation, the policy of self-interest. But this pretended policy of preferential trade that the hon. gentleman has offered us, this delusive policy that he has offered to England, is a farce compared with that great policy that would have made it the interest alike of Canada, of Australia, of South Africa, of all the great outlying colonies of the Empire, to take up this great question with a view of adopting a policy that would make self-interest a common bond between the colonies and the Empire, such a bond as can never be created in any other way. This proposal may be accepted, as any proposal would naturally be accepted, by Great Britain with the most effusive thanks, because it is a policy of giving everything for nothing. But the policy to which Mr. Chamberlain committed himself by his speeches at the great congress of the Boards of Trade of the Empire, was based upon the policy of binding England and her colonies together by motives of self interest. Now, I do not hesitate to say, having giving this subject the greatest consideration, having examined it from its inception down to the present time, that if the Government of Canada had said to England: We will give you a reduction of 25 per cent upon whatever the tariff of Canada may be at any time, in favour of England, if you will give a corresponding advantage to the agricultural products of Canada in your market, I say that in this Jubilee year it would have been done. Now, let me refer to the language of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in a report that he has laid upon the Table of the House of Commons. That language must convince any one that if there is a man living who has examined this question from top to bottom, and who was convinced that in it is contained the germ of a solution of the great question of the unity of the British Empire, that man is the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain. I will quote from a report of his speech at a conference with the premiers of the self-governing colonies, which report was laid upon the Table of the House of Commons:

I pass on, then, to another question, and that is as to the future commercial relations between this country and her colonies. How far is it possible to make these relations closer and more intimate? I have said that I believe in sentiment as the greatest of all the forces in the general government of the world, but at the same time, I should like to bring to the reinforcement of sentiment the motives which are derived from material and personal interest. But undoubtedly the fiscal arrangements of different colonies differ so much among themselves, and all differ so much from those of the mother country, that it would be a matter of the greatest complication and difficulty to arrive at any conclusion which would unite us commercially in the same sense in which the Zollverein united the empire of Germany. It may be borne in mind that the history of that Zollverein is most interesting and most instructive. It commenced entirely as a commercial convention, dealing in the first instance only partially with the trade of the empire, it was rapidly extended to include the whole trade of the empire, and it finally made it possible and encouraged the ultimate union of the Empire. But this is a matter upon which at the present time, rather than suggest any proposals of my own, I desire to hear the views of the gentlemen present.

In the meanwhile, however, I may say that I note a resolution which appears to have been passed unanimously at a meeting of the Premiers in Hobart, in which the desire was expressed for closer commercial arrangements with the Empire, and I think it was suggested that a commission of inquiry should be created in order to see in what way practical effect might be given to the aspiration. If that be the case, and if it were thought at the present time you were not prepared to go beyond that inquiry, if it were the wish of the other colonies, of Canada and of the South African colonies, to join in such an inquiry, Her Majesty's Government would be delighted to make arrangements for that purpose, and to accept any suggestions as to the form of the reference and the character and constitution of the commission, and would very gladly take part in it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

What does the hon. gentleman think of that?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Would my hon. friend like to read what Mr. Chamberlain said about this Government's policy? It would come in very nicely there.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think if the hon. gentleman had treated this House with sufficient respect when quoting from the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, he would have done what he said he would do, lay his despatch on the Table of the House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I instantly did so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad to hear it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Let me add a word. I laid it on the Table, and the Clerk of the House returned it to me that afternoon. I shall be glad to produce it again. I placed it on the Table of the House, knowing the rule.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman's statement, because having quoted from it he was bound to lay the statement on the Table of the House. I had not the pleasure of perusing it. The Colonial Secretary stated that if all the Premiers of the great colonies of Australasia, including New Zealand, passed a unanimous resolution asking for a commission to consider this question of closer relations with the Empire, and they did it with a special view to this question of preferential trade, and if Canada and South Africa were prepared to join in that request, he would be delighted to join and frame a commission in order to ascertain what could be done. Does the hon. gentleman pretend that Canada is not responsible for lack of action? South Africa had declared here at Ottawa that it was in favour of preferential trade. The hon. gentleman knows that under these circumstances Canada is alone responsible for having crushed out, as Sir Wilfrid Laurier showed from the first hour he landed in England down to the hour he left it he was determined to crush out every attempt to secure preferential trade between different portions of the Empire.

I now wish to turn my attention to the sugar duties. I have already told the hon.

Finance Minister that he will remember I endeavoured to persuade him last session to take up the question of the sugar duties. I find a very high falutin paragraph in the speech on the Budget about the hon. gentleman's anxiety to assist the people of the West Indies. A year ago the hon. gentleman took the great manufacturing interests of England under his wing, and he showed how determined he was to improve their condition by charging the exporters only $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent more than formerly. He found that England was not able to take care of the West Indies, and so he went to their assistance. A year ago I told the hon. gentleman he was destroying the West Indian trade with Canada. The hon. gentleman treated my suggestion with the amount of respect he usually gives to my suggestions.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What does the hon. gentleman mean by saying that my policy was destroying the West India trade?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The tariff of last session gave the final blow.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I say there is no foundation for the hon. gentleman's statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is another attempt, a most transparent attempt to delude the British public. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me that England has sunk to a position in which she requires to be grandmothered by the Dominion of Canada? Yet hon. gentlemen cannot read the Budget Speech without coming to such a conclusion. No doubt people in England will be delighted with the speech, and it will be generally commended there. Why? There is only one way of relieving the West India Islands, and every one in England knows it is by adopting countervailing duties. Such a system, however, would interfere with the policy of free trade, and Lord Farrer does not like it. So it is left for Canada to adopt those countervailing duties which England cannot adopt. It is all a farce. The hon. gentleman cannot convince me that England has anything to do with this West India policy. I will let hon. members into the secret. After refusing to adopt my suggestion, the hon. gentleman went to Halifax, where he received the cold shoulder from the West India merchants; they would hardly speak to him—leading merchants, who felt he had struck a fatal blow against their interests.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I never heard of it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Did the hon. gentleman never see George Mitchell, Alfred Jones or any of the great West India merchants after the close of last session? The hon. gentleman may tell me he never heard of this expression of opinion; but if so, he is the only man who did not hear it. The truth is the hon. gentleman found he had made a mistake, and that he must do something to retrieve his position. Instead of saying: I am in an awful hole with my friends in Halifax and Nova Scotia in regard to the West India trade and you must help me out, he manufactured this great Imperial policy, to come to the rescue of England as regards the West Indies. He has taken this action owing to compulsion on the part of West India merchants in Halifax, and I am glad he has done so. They are right and he was wrong. The West India trade is of the utmost importance. But if the hon. gentleman wanted to save the West Indies and to save the people from a protectionist tariff, why did he not adopt the plan proposed by the Toronto "Globe"? The hon. gentleman, however, as was stated by the hon. member for York, wished to wring out of the pockets of the people between $300,000 and $500,000 of additional taxation under the pretense of doing something very grand to help England out of the trouble as regards the West Indies. Why, I repeat, did the hon. gentleman not adopt the plan proposed by the Toronto "Globe," which was this:

Indeed, from the recent discussion regarding reciprocity with the West Indies, it seems not altogether improbable that he contemplates a rearrangement of the sugar duties, expressly excepted heretofore from the operation of the preferential tariff, a rearrangement that will give our sister colonies an advantage over foreign sugar producers in our market. This could, of course, be done in two ways; by an increase of the duty on sugar produced from beets, while that on cane sugar remains the same, or—and this is the more likely means—by a reduction of duty on all sugar imported from the British West Indies.

He had the opportunity of giving a preferential tariff to the West Indies without taxing the people of Canada.

If such a reduction were substantial it would doubtless lower the revenues from sugar as well as the price to the consumer.

This is a matter which the Finance Minister has wholly failed to consider.

There are many who think a mistake is made in such a country as ours, where fruit is plentiful and cheap, in seeking to raise heavy revenues from sugar instead of encouraging the preserving of fruit for exportation by making sugar as cheap as possible. If the Government has seriously entered upon the task of including the British West Indies in the Imperial preferential trade arrangement these questions will assume an importance not hitherto attached to them. A buoyant revenue is a very stimulating thing for the Finance Minister, and Tuesday's Budget may contain more than one project for improving our trade relations with the sisterhood of Britannic nations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask you, if the hon. gentleman's object was to assist the British West Indies, had he not an opportunity of doing it without taking three or four hundred thousand dollars a year of fresh taxes out of the pockets of the people. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) did this because his interests in the province of Nova Scotia compelled him.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Would the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) permit me to say, that I heard no complaint in the province of Nova Scotia respecting the sugar duty, except that we had not changed some duties which the late Government levied. The only complaint was, that the duty imposed by the late Government was unfairly imposed, and that the method ought to be changed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) did not hear the strongest denunciations of his allowing the West Indies trade to go to ruin, he is the only man in Halifax who did not.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I heard no complaint about our tariff.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has not only been deaf, but blind, because public men in Halifax expressed themselves in the press in the most positive terms, and deputations came from Halifax to the hon. gentleman, to whom he turned a deaf ear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Against the late tariff.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I tell the hon. gentleman, that that tariff has its foundation in the interests of Halifax, and that the pretense about the West Indies is merely a side issue to excuse the imposition of three or four hundred thousand dollars taxes. The Liberals used to talk a great deal about a free breakfast table, but the first attempt of this free-trade Government to give us a free breakfast table is to put three or four hundred thousand a year extra taxes on an article regarded as an essential of life. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) said, in his speech :

Never was a tariff policy submitted to Parliament, which was received with greater satisfaction by the people of Canada than that which was announced a year ago.

Well, I agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding). Never was there a tariff received with greater satisfaction by the people of Canada, except one, and that was in 1878, when the National Policy was announced. The second tariff of great satisfaction to the people of Canada was last year, when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) came down and adopted the National Policy almost in its entirety. Mr. Bertram explained why this wonderful satisfaction was exhibited by the people of Canada. He told us that the people of Canada were in a state of dread lest the Liberals would carry out their promises, and the people were so relieved to find that these free traders opposite had swallowed themselves, that there was the wildest delight throughout the country. We had, this year, the astounding declaration from the Finance Minister, that while this tariff had been received with the wildest delight, that while Canada had prospered in every way under its operation, yet the hon. gentleman threatens the most dire consequences unless every manufacturer in Canada is continually on his knees before him. The Government found something was necessary in order to terrorize the great manufacturing industries of this country, and so the Finance Minister made the most unblushing and shameless declaration that has ever emanated from a man in his position. In that declaration, the great manufacturing industries of this country are told that the Government have them by the throat, and that they would press them with a grip that would be fatal, if they did not respond to their wish.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Was that the old way ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That never was the old way, and you will have to search the parliamentary records in vain to find such a threat made by a responsible Minister of the Crown. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) closed his speech by reading an extract from Mr. Chamberlain's despatch :

"I desire," said Mr. Chamberlain, "to add, in conclusion, that the action of the Dominion Government and Parliament in this matter, although, unfortunately, its full effect will be temporarily postponed, has been warmly welcomed and appreciated by Her Majesty's Government and the people of this country, as a measure which cannot fail to result in material benefit to the mother country and to Canada, and to weld together still more firmly the ties which now unite them."

Well, Sir, when I read that despatch, the scriptural declaration at once rose to my mind : "There should be joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth more than over ninety-nine just persons which need no repentance." What was the reason of this outburst on the part of the Colonial Minister in favour of the action of this Government. Why Sir, it is to be found in the history of the Liberal party in Canada. There is no doubt that every intelligent man in the Empire has been greatly disturbed for many years by the action of the Canadian Liberal leaders. There is no doubt that great anxiety has been felt as to what role they were likely to assume, if they came into power. And it is no wonder, therefore, that the Colonial Secretary would be delighted to find such a display of devoted loyalty to the Crown and to British institutions from hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. Chamberlain knew that, only as late as 1891, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the present Prime Minister, said :

While they (the Conservatives) commit the mistake of basing their trade policy upon uniformity of allegiance and a mere sentiment, we of the Liberal party maintain that the policy of this country must be based not upon sentiment but upon business principles ; and, fresh as we come from the people, I say that the only policy which will benefit this country is unrestricted reciprocity and continental freedom of trade. Sir Charles Tupper says in an article published a few days ago in the "North American Review," that the delusion, as he calls it, of unrestricted reciprocity was dead and buried. Dead and buried! I am as good an authority on the subject as is Sir Charles Tupper, and I say that it is more alive than ever.

That was a very alarming statement coming from the head of a great political party. That was a very alarming statement for the head of the great Liberal party of this country to make in favour of continental free trade, a policy that would make the tariff of Canada manufactured at Washington, and that would turn the back of Canada upon England. Well, Sir, who is right? You cannot hire a man in the Liberal party now to admit that he ever was a supporter of unrestricted reciprocity. It is not only dead and buried, but it is past resurrection ; and why? It was because of that great statesman, the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, that devoted patriot, who laid down his life in defence of British institutions, who would have lived many more years, in my judgment, but for the fact that British institutions were attacked by the leaders of the Liberal party in this country. That is what led him into the battle ; and although he won it, everybody knows that before we were able to plant on the ramparts of the country a policy of standing by Great Britain and remaining true to British institutions to the death, that right hon. gentleman had sacrificed his own life to the struggle. It was on that occasion, when these hon. gentlemen adopted a policy so disloyal—when in combination with the Farrers and the Erastus Wimans and the traitors to every British sentiment in this country, they were defeated in that great struggle—it was on that occasion that British principles were established at once and for ever and will remain to the end of time. Mr. Chamberlain knew that. He knew the position these gentlemen occupied on that occasion, and therefore you can imagine the joy and delight with which he found them out-bidding the Liberal-Conservative party in their professions of loyalty and devotion to British institutions, though very hollow and insincere they were on most occasions. I will never forget to the last moment of my life that on that memorable occasion on which I went with Sir John Macdonald to London, Ont., and at the last meeting which we took part in together, he said to me, "Tupper, I am getting really terribly alarmed at the disloyalty of the leaders of the Liberal party."

An hon. MEMBER. Blake was the same.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Sir, did not Mr. Blake think the same? Why did he leave them? Why did he refuse to fight the battle side by side with those men on that occasion? Sir, it is a matter of history that he has put on record, and that will go down to his credit, whatever faults he had, that he refused to fight that battle with hon. gentlemen opposite because he would not fight under false colours, and because he believed the policy they had adopted was going to be fatal to British institutions. That stands on record in the London "Times" newspaper, in a letter published over his own signature, which to the last hour of his life will reflect credit upon him, but the most undying discredit on hon. gentlemen opposite. But I must not be led away from my story. I said to Sir John: "Well, Sir John, you have one great consolation." "What is that?" he asked. "Why, my dear sir," I said, "you have the consolation of knowing that at any moment you can change that disloyalty into the most loud and blatant loyalty you have ever heard." "How is that?" he asked. "Why," I said, "all you have to do is to resign and let them take your place, and they will outbid your loyalty; they will make the welkin ring with their shouts of loyalty."

We had Sir Wilfrid Laurier, at the St. Jean Baptiste Society in 1891, saying:

It has also been said that we should establish a line of steamers between England and her possessions, by virtue of which trade could be cultivated between Canada and the British Empire to the exclusion of the rest of the world. I have only to say, with regard to such an idea, that it is absolutely absurd. For my part, I prefer the Yankee dollar to the British shilling, especially when the dollar is so near and the shilling is so far away.

Mr. Chamberlain knew all that; and when he found that these gentlemen were out-Heroding Herod, and out-bidding the great Liberal-Conservative party of Canada in their loyalty to the Crown and their devotion to British institutions, he naturally came to the conclusion that the change was one that Her Majesty's Government might express the most profound satisfaction with, as he has done it. Well, Sir, I want to ask the hon. Minister of Finance, who has been very obliging, and I thank him very much for it, in answering my questions, why he has not extended this policy to all the colonies instead of to New South Wales alone. Will the hon. gentleman tell me that?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will consider that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says he will consider that. He has perhaps not thought that matter out. I can tell him why he did not do it, if he does not want to tell me.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman should not have asked me if he knew.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman knows that it is perfectly within the power of Canada to make any fiscal arrangement with any colony in the Empire, and he knows that under such an arrangement it is perfectly practicable to get a quid pro quo. He knows that, though Sir Wilfrid Laurier innocently thought that the abrogation of the German and Belgian treaties enabled the colonies to make fiscal arrangements with each other, that was provided for several years ago by an Act of the Imperial Parliament at the request of the conference at Ottawa; and under this power it is perfectly practicable for Canada to make any fiscal arrangement with any colony in the British Empire. He knows that under that power Canada did negotiate a treaty with New Zealand, which provided that if we admit the products of New Zealand on more favourable terms, we would secure the admission of our products into New Zealand on more favourable terms; but the New Zealand legislature, by a very small majority, defeated that treaty. The hon. gentleman knows that he has a good ground for arranging with all the British colonies, on terms mutually beneficial, a treaty under which, if they got the advantage of the reduction provided for in our legislation we would get the same from them. That is the reason the hon. gentleman says that he proposes to defer at present dealing with the other colonies of the Empire. But I want to ask the hon. gentleman, if he is so anxious to save the West India trade and come to the rescue of the West Indies, why does he not do it now? Will the hon. gentleman tell me why, if he is so anxious to come to the rescue of the West Indies, he delayed until the 1st of August next?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We will consider that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He is unable to tell me. I can tell him why. He wants to ring out of the people of Canada the increased taxation before he gives any remission. He has deluded everybody connected with the West Indies trade completely. He knows that by the first of August, the time will be passed for any substantial benefit to result from this policy, and he is going to get $300,000 or $400,000 by increased taxation out of the pockets of the people of Canada before he gives the remission.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Between now and the first of August? I am afraid my hon. friend is dreaming.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Let my hon. friend stand up and say why he does not bring this into operation on the first of July. Why does he not bring it into operation at once. The Belgian Treaty has nothing to do with it. The reason is because he wants to ring out of the people a large amount of taxation. Let me inform the hon. gentleman of the sentiment in Halifax which he appears to ignore.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I said that I knew the Halifax sentiment correctly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Here is what appears in the Halifax "Herald," as the result of an interview with Mr. George Mitchell, M.P.P.:

The tariff is a grand move in the right direction, said George Mitchell, M.P.P. In nearly every particular it is what the West India merchants of Halifax have been asking the Government to enact.

Why did he not do that a year ago?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What they have been complaining about is the tariff of my predecessors.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And when you got into power to remedy that tariff, why did you not do it?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Because we cannot do all things at once.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has done this for the West Indies without any quid pro quo, why should he do it? He has failed altogether in accomplishing what he proposed with reference to the West Indies, and for this reason. He knows that the United States is the great market for West India sugar, and he knows that the countervailing duties the United States have imposed, give to the West India trade a much greater advantage than anything they are going to enjoy under this tariff. Therefore, it looks to me as if the hon. gentleman, under the pretense of accomplishing much for the West India trade, is disposed to adopt a policy which is calculated to give him increased taxes without any material advantage to the people of the British West Indies.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend is quoting Mr. Mitchell to say that I do give an advantage.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Mitchell does not see, as I do, that it is in the power of the hon. gentleman to put this in operation at once instead of postponing it until the first of August. No doubt it would be beneficial, and I have already told the hon. gentleman I am very glad to learn that he has done it, but I regret deeply he did not do it before. I do not propose to occupy the attention of the House longer than to say that in my opinion the people of Canada will at no distant day say to this Government:

You obtained power by pledging yourselves to adopt a revenue tariff from which every vestige of protection should be removed. You have not only adopted the policy you had denounced but largely increased the duties on a number of staple imports from Great Britain and while pretending to give her preferential trade, made reductions in the tariff on articles upon which Great Britain cannot compete with the United States. You denounced the public expenditure of your predecessors as grossly extravagant, declaring that you would reduce it by several millions per annum. You have increased it beyond anything ever known before. You pledged yourselves to send a commission to negotiate preferential trade within the Empire with Lord Salisbury if you obtained power. You refused to consider the question when invited by the Colonial Minister and publicly denounced it as involving protection which you said would be "a curse." You enacted last session a policy of reciprocal trade with all the world and your Premier was decorated with the Cobden Medal in virtue of that policy. You now propose to repeal that policy and substitute a policy of discriminatory duties. The repudiation of all the pledges made to the electors when seeking power and the adoption of the policy you then denounced is the best evidence that by your own confession you are unworthy of our confidence.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I move that this House do now adjourn. I sincerely hope that the leader of the Opposition will be none the worse for his rather prolonged effort.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.30 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 13th April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 112)—(from the Senate)—for the relief of Edwin Heyward.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

IMMIGRATION OF WOMEN SERVANTS.

Mr. ROCHE asked,

Has the Government sent Mrs. Livingstone to the old country in connection with a scheme to bring women servants to Canada? If so, has the Government decided to prepay the passages of such servants?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Yes. 2. The department has arranged for a half rate, and will advance the amount to be repaid within six months.

MILITIA POINT, N.S., POST OFFICE.

Mr. GILLIES (by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked,

1. When was Daniel McIntosh appointed postmaster at Militia Point, county Inverness, Nova Scotia?

2. Was Daniel McIntosh dismissed from the position of postmaster of Militia Point, and if so, when, why, and at whose request?

3. Who succeeded Mr. McIntosh as postmaster at Militia Point?

4. By whom was his successor recommended?

5. Was there a petition lodged with the Postmaster General asking for the appointment of one Murdoch McLeod as postmaster at Militia Point? If so, what are the names to this petition?

6. Was there a petition sent to the Postmaster General by the people of Militia Point, asking that Mr. McIntosh be retained in office and that the post office be not removed from his residence?

7. If so, what are the names attached to this petition?

8. Why was not the prayer of this petition granted?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. Kenneth McIntosh was appointed postmaster at Militia Point on the 20th June, 1896. The inspector had reported in favour of an office at Mr. Murdoch McLeod's place, the site of the present post office, in January, 1896, but that report was disregarded and Mr. McIntosh appointed. 2. The Militia Point post office was removed to a more convenient situation on the 1st of March last on recommendation of the post office inspector at Halifax, and Mr. McIntosh then ceased to be postmaster. 3. Mr. Murdoch McLeod has succeeded Mr. McIntosh. 4. The residence of Mr. McLeod having been recommended as most convenient to public needs by the post office inspector, and Mr. McLeod's name having met with the approval of Dr. McLennan he was appointed postmaster. 5, 6, 7 and 8. Petitions in favour of Mr. McLeod and Mr. McIntosh, respectively, were sent to the department, and in the public interest Mr. McLeod was appointed.

MAIL COURIER—MILITIA POINT.

Mr. GILLIES (by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked,

1. Who is the mail courier from Militia Point to Marble Mountain, Inverness county?

2. What amount is now being paid for this service?

3. Was there a tender to perform this service for fifty dollars annually sent the department by Mr. Daniel McIntosh?

4. Was his offer to perform this service lower than the amount that is now being paid the present contractor?

5. If so, why was not his offer accepted by the department?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. The contractor for the Marble Mountain and Militia Point mail service is

Mr. Murdoch McLeod. 2. The rate of pay for the service is $72.50 per annum. The arrangement for this service was made under the following circumstances. The department had before it a recommendation made to the late Government by the post office inspector at Halifax on the 9th January, 1896, that a post office to be called Militia Point be opened at the residence of Mr. Murdoch McLeod, which the inspector represented as the most convenient site for the office in the settlement. This recommendation was disregarded at the time and the Militia Point post office was placed at the residence of Mr. Kenneth McIntosh, a less convenient site, and served twice a week from Malagawatch at $20 per annum. The facts were brought to the attention of the department in November, 1897, and Mr. Murdoch McLeod offered his residence for use as the Militia Point post office and undertook to serve it tri-weekly instead of semi-weekly in connection with his contract for the Malagawatch and Marble Mountain service for an addition of $10 per annum, though at his contract rate he would have been entitled to $66 per annum for the additional travel. The effect of the arrangement was that Militia Point was removed to the site originally recommended as the most suitable, was served tri-weekly instead of semi-weekly, and $10 per annum was saved as compared with the former arrangement. An offer was received from Mr. McIntosh to do the service for $50 per annum, but not until the arrangement with Mr. McLeod had been concluded.

FREE MINERS' CERTIFICATES.

Mr. MACLEAN (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

How many free miners' certificates were issued by the Government up to, and inclusive of March 31st: (a.) In the different cities of Canada; (b.) In Great Britain?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Up to the 31st March, 1898, 10,852 free miners' certificates were issued in Canada; and up to the 26th March, which is the latest date for which we have received returns from Great Britain, 23 have been issued there.

BANKING BUSINESS IN YUKON TERRITORY.

Mr. MACLEAN (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

1. What rate of compensation has the Minister of Finance or the Government decided upon to the Canadian Bank of Commerce for transacting Government banking business in the Yukon territory?

2. Has application been made to the Government by the Bank of British North America, or any other Canadian bank for permission to transact banking business for the Government in the Yukon territory? If so, what answer has been made to such request?

Mr. MULLOCK.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). In reply to the first question, I beg to say that the compensation to be paid to the Canadian Bank of Commerce has not yet been decided on. As regards the second question, there has been some correspondence between the Finance Minister and several banks, not so much with respect to their doing business for the Government, as to the conditions under which they might do a general banking business in the Yukon district. The banks have been assured that every possible assistance in the way of police protection, and whatever other assistance from the Government that can be extended, will be given to the various banks, and I have assurances that these representations have been received with satisfaction.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF YUKON TERRITORY.

Mr. MACLEAN (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

What arrangements does the Government or the Minister of the Interior propose making for sending geological surveyors or mining experts into the Yukon territory this year? Has the Government or the Minister of the Interior chosen any geologist or surveyors to undertake the work? If so, who are the officers so chosen?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The arrangements for geological work in the Yukon district are now under consideration. The details of the arrangement have not yet been settled, and therefore I am not in a position to say who the officers will be who will be placed in charge of the work.

GOVERNMENT WHARF AT ST. MICHEL.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked,

1. Were any repairs done to the Government wharf at St. Michel, county of Bellechasse, in the course of 1897?

2. If so, what was the cost of said repairs?

3. What were the daily wages paid to the foreman and to the labourers respectively?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Yes. 2. $295. 3. Wages of foreman, $2 per day; wages of carpenter, $1.25 per day; wages of labourers, $1 per day.

THE I. C. RAILWAY—STATION AT ST. MICHEL.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked,

1. Did the Government build a station on the Intercolonial Railway at St. Michel, in 1897?

2. If so, what was the cost of said station?

3. Was the work done by contract or by day work?

4. If by day work, what were the daily wages of the foreman and labourers respectively?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Yes, the Government did build a station on the Intercolonial ial Railway at St. Michel, in 1897. 2. The cost of the said station was $1,182. 3 and 4. The work was done by contract.

MAIL SERVICE OF ST. MICHEL.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked,

1. Have any changes been made in the mail service between St. Michel de Bellechasse and the station of the same name on the Intercolonial Railway?

2. What change has been made in the cost of such service?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Yes. 2. The original service was by stage from Lévis via Beaumont to St. Michel de Bellechasse, at a cost of $300 per annum. This route, at the request of the residents and on the report of the superintendent of railway mail service, was broken up and two services substituted. One from Lévis to Beaumont costing $160, and the other from the railway station of St. Michel de Bellechasse to the post office costing $70. By this arrangement the mails arrive earlier and a saving of $70 has been effected.

DISMISSAL OF POSTMASTER AT ST. ANNE DE LA PÉRADE.

Mr. MARCOTTE asked,

Whether Mr. Elzéar Lanouette, postmaster of Ste. Anne de la Péraide, has been dismissed?

If so, for what cause?

At whose request?

By whose influence?

Was an inquiry made?

By whom?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Mr. Elzéar Lanouette, postmaster at Ste. Anne de la Péraide, has been dismissed. A charge of undue political activity in the last general election having been made against Mr. Elzéar Lanouette, the matter was investigated by L. Lavergne, Esq., who reported to the department stating that the charges had been proven and recommending the dismissal of the postmaster, and accordingly the dismissal was made.

CHARGES AGAINST ASSISTANT INSPECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT QUEBEC.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

1. Has any action been taken on the charges made against the assistant inspector of customs for the province of Quebec on the 2nd March, 1898?

2. If so, what?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). No action has been taken in this matter.

THE FAST ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP LINE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Yesterday my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition called attention to the fast Atlantic steamship service, and wanted to have some information as to the condition this project was now in. I may say, as the House is aware, that the contractor, Mr. Petersen, in the carrying out of his contract, has met with very serious opposition and some severe difficulty; but he has been all along progressing favourably, and as an earnest of his good faith and his power to carry out this contract, he at one time deposited £5,000 sterling, and at a subsequent period gave a guarantee of a similar amount. We have now information which we consider satisfactory that Mr. Petersen is progressing favourably with the organization of his company. The capital has been underwritten and a very strong board has been organized; and, if our information is correct, and we have every reason to believe that it is correct, we have reason to believe that on the 1st of July the vessels will be under construction and under way.

THE PROHIBITION PLEBISCITE.

Mr. CRAIG. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask a question and to make a few observations on the plebiscite; and, to place myself in order, I will conclude with a motion. We all admit the importance of this subject, no matter what we may think about the question of prohibition, and I notice that there is a good deal of impatience in the country at the present time because this Bill is not yet brought down. This was one of the prominent planks in the platform of the Liberal party when in Opposition, and I suppose it is so to-day. They promised then to the temperance people of this country that if they succeeded in coming into power, they would introduce a Bill to take a plebiscite on this important question. Now, Sir, I am not going to say anything about the other pledges which they made; but the people of this country, and the temperance people especially, expect that this pledge will be kept, no matter what other pledges have been broken or may be broken. The first session of this Parliament was a very short one, called especially to pass the Estimates, and so that session was allowed to pass by without this Bill being brought down, and no particular complaint was made. It was expected, however, that in the second session this Bill would have been introduced; but because of the Premier having to go to England to attend the Jubilee celebration, the question was further postponed, and that session was allowed to pass without seeing the Bill. Now we are in the third session, we have been here over two months, and still the Bill is not brought down; and I think I am not exaggerating at all when I say that the temperance people are becoming very impatient indeed on this question. They are beginning to be afraid that the Government intend to postpone this Bill to another session, and to keep putting the matter off until they have no opportunity of fulfilling their promise. I do not say that I entertain that opinion at all. I believe the Government intend to bring down this measure. A short time ago I asked the Premier when this Bill would be introduced, and his reply was as soon as the decks were cleared. That answer was rather indefinite. I do not know what progress has been made since then in clearing the decks. I hope the decks are pretty well cleared now, and that there will be no further delay. It has been said that the reason for the delay is that the Government themselves cannot agree on a very important matter, that is, how the question will be put. The temperance people are urging very strongly that the simple question should be asked: Are you in favour of prohibition? Other parties contend that other questions should be asked as well. It is said that the question of increased taxation should be submitted, and also the question of compensation. We are told that on these questions the Cabinet is very much divided. How that is, I do not know, but I hope to hear from the Premier with reference to these questions. I notice in the "Templar," the temperance organ, in its issue of April 7th, the following:—

It is just about as certain as anything can be, that one of two things will happen with respect to the plebiscite Bill this session. It will either be submitted with the provision for questions upon direct taxation and compensation, as well as on prohibition, or it will be postponed.

If the Government can make sure of carrying the Bill through the House, in its present loaded-up form, and can make sure that the Prohibitionists will not repudiate the humbug and carry the question into practical politics, the Bill will be rushed through next week.

If the opposition to the riders is so serious as to threaten the existence of the Government, it will be laid on the shelf for another year, and the delusive bait will continue to dangle before the eyes of the Prohibitionists, diverting attention and activity from actual prohibition work.

These views are borne out by the statement of Sir Wilfrid to the representatives of the Methodist Church, who waited upon him recently. He took great care to tell these gentlemen that when he publicly promised that the question of prohibition would not be complicated with other issues, and that that was the reason why the Liberal party had adopted the plebiscite policy, he did not mean that the question would be separated from other questions which were inseparably connected with it.

Sir Louis Davies also wrote a letter recently, in reply to certain requests and interrogations of his constituents in Prince Edward Island, in which he very clearly intimated that it was not the intention of the Government to submit the single question of prohibition on the plebiscite ballot.

We are on the verge of some sensational developments in connection with the prohibition question, and it is the duty of advocates of the reform to arouse the public conscience, mobilize the temperance forces, and clear the decks for action.

Mr. CRAIG.

Those concluding words seem remarkable in view of what the Premier told me in his answer about this measure being brought forward when the decks were clear. I hope that the decks will soon be clear and that we may have a definite answer as to when this Bill will be introduced. I think it would be most unfortunate if an important Bill like this were postponed to so late a stage of the session that there could be no fair chance for discussion. I do not intend to say anything now about how the Bill should be prepared or the questions put. That is for the Government to settle, and when the question comes before the House, we can discuss it. But I rise to ask for a definite answer on the points I have raised if the right hon. gentleman is in a position to give it. I should like to know when the Bill will be brought down, and also what form it will take. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I have no fault to find with the anxiety of my hon. friend (Mr. Craig). I know that he is a temperance man both in precept and in practice. I have observed his course for several years on this question, and I am not aware that his anxieties have troubled him up to this moment. I have no fault to find on that point, however. I am glad to give him the information he is seeking. First, with reference to the answer I gave upon a former occasion that the Bill would be introduced as soon as the deck had been cleared, I may say that I consider the deck has been very considerably cleared since that question was put to me. It is almost absolutely clear now, and when we have disposed of the debate which is now engaging the attention of the House, I see no reason why the Bill should not be introduced almost immediately afterwards. I may say to my hon. friend that I am happy at this moment to relieve his mind as to his anxiety regarding the form of the Bill. I have reason to suppose, knowing his views, that he will find the Bill altogether satisfactory, and that he will have no hesitation in voting for it. And, moreover, with regard to the question itself, I am not prepared to say at this moment what shape the Bill will be in, but I may say to my hon. friend that he should not be too prone to believe newspaper statements as to divisions existing in the Cabinet. The Cabinet is united upon this question, and will deem it its duty to carry out the pledges which the party gave at the convention of 1893. Now, while I am on my feet, perhaps I may be allowed to say that I would submit to both sides of the House that the practice of moving the adjournment of the House at an early stage of the sitting is one which is becoming too frequent. I do not wish to make any objection, so far as the action of my hon. friend is concerned, but I would submit that in the interests of sound parliamentary practice, such motions should be made very, very sparingly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have listened with great interest and pleasure to the statements just made by the leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and, as the right hon. gentleman seems to be disposed to give us all the information touching this question that he properly can at this stage, I would like to ask him whether the Government propose, in introducing the Bill to submit to the people of this country the decision as to the question of prohibition, to accompany it with a declaration on the part of the Government that, if the public will is expressed in a clear and unmistakable manner in favour of prohibition they will give effect to that decision?

The PRIME MINISTER. I hope that my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) will be ready, when the will of the people has been manifested, to abide by it, and so will the Government.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) if he has yet laid on the Table the second or subsidiary agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway and the Drummond County Railway people?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I think that it has not yet been laid on the Table. I have given instructions that the copy be prepared, and it will be made immediately. I will see to it at once.

MINING AND DREDGING LEASES.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) if he is prepared to lay on the Table the return in answer to the Order of the House with respect to the mining and dredging leases made by the Government? It is very important that we should have them at an early date.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that two or three extra clerks have been working on this return for the last two weeks—ever since the Order passed. I think it will be ready in a few days.

OPENING OF THE CANALS.

Mr. MACLEAN. I would like to direct the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) to the fact that there are a number of vessels now in Lake Erie and a number in Lake Ontario wishing to get through the Welland Canal. Would he be good enough to tell the shipping interest when the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals will be opened?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have had several communications on this subject, but have not been able to give any assurance as to an exact date for the opening of the canals. The Welland Canal will be the later one opening, I fancy. We are doing everything possible to get them ready at the earliest possible moment. Night and day staffs are at work upon them, and no time will be lost. There is no object in delaying the opening, and it will not be delayed more than is absolutely necessary in the interest of the service.

GANANOQUE DRILL SHED.

Mr. TAYLOR. I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden). I am sorry he is not in his place, but perhaps the Prime Minister will be good enough to draw his attention to the matter. On the 14th March, I moved for a return of all correspondence between the corporation of Gananoque and the Government with reference to the moving of the drill shed, and I would like to know whether that correspondence will soon be brought down.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. colleague is not here, but if the hon. gentleman will send me a note, I shall be happy to call his attention to the matter.

BUOYS ON THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. BERGERON. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works about the placing of buoys on the St. Lawrence. I see that the gentleman who has the contract at Sorel, Mr. Monarque, I think, has given up the contract, and now it is to be given to a higher tenderer, a gentleman by the name of Paul. Last fall, there was a discussion between the Departments of Marine and Fisheries and Public Works as to which was in charge of the buoys. I need not tell the hon. gentleman that it is important to have these buoys placed in good position as soon as possible.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I quite appreciate the importance of the question, but am not in a position to make any statement just now, for the obvious reason that tenders were called for and were before the departments, and, as the hon. gentleman says, one of the tenderers, who was notified that his tender was accepted, has withdrawn. By to-morrow I hope to be in a position to make a definite statement, and I can assure my hon. friend that no time will be lost.

REPAIRING WESTERN BLOCK.

Mr. FOSTER. Might I ask the hon. Minister of Public Works, whether he has the written report I asked for on the ornamental defacing or refacing of the Western Block ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). There was no written report, as I stated at the time. The work which is going on is very easy. A part of the walls was simply bulging out, and we were obliged to restore it. It is not very expensive work.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it proposed to be continuous ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, the chief engineer came to my office this morning, and told me that there is only one small piece at the corner which will have to be rebuilt. Formerly, the road was not on the same level as now. It was made level, and a kind of second wall, which then existed, had to be taken down, and the wall which was rebuilt was, I am sorry to say, not built in a safe manner, and we consequently are obliged to do the work which is now going on. Very little remains to be done now.

Mr. FOSTER. That is encouraging.

HON. MR. TARTE AND THE SENATE.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) to a telegram published in the newspaper "Le Soleil" on the 30th March last, and which reads as follows :

The Hon. Mr. Tarte wires from Ottawa to "La Patrie" :

Ottawa, March 28, 1898.

To-morrow, Nebuchadnezzar de Boucherville the invalid Ross, the wise Pierre de Blois, the distinguished J. H. Bellerose—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can only ask a question. He cannot enter into a discussion, nor can he move the adjournment, because that has already been moved. If he simply wishes to ask a question, he can do so.

—the learned Armand, and a couple of other luminaries of the same stripe, are going to challenge the majority of the country, the representatives of the Canadian nation in the House of Commons.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand, this is the foundation of a question.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation). What do the names I have just mentioned signify from the standpoint of political and moral influence, from that of popularity and of the people's will ?

You may add to them Montplaisir, Bolduc, Landry, and ask the electorate of the country whether they are going to allow the will of their representatives to be overridden by a handful of irresponsible and insignificant Senators.

For over twenty years, the Tory party has crammed the Senate with their creatures.

Mr. FOSTER.

If, at least, they had always made good appointments, and if they had called to the Senate men who were able to give a fair and honest consideration to the questions of public policy brought before the Upper House.

There is to be found in the Senate more fanaticism, more blind partisanship than in any other public body of this country.

And who are the men of worth who sit in that House ? Let somebody single them out, if possible, in the ranks of toriyism.

The great majority of the seats in the Senate are occupied by men who can claim no other credit but that of having always slavishly endorsed whatever policy their leaders have thought fit to propound.

You know our Senators from Quebec, well, those from the other provinces are perhaps worth still less.

Is it true as stated by the newspaper "Le Soleil" that this article was wired to "La Patrie" by the hon. Minister of Public Works himself ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Translation). Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. gentleman, I may tell him that I read with a great deal of interest the article he has just read to the House. It is no doubt a most interesting and creditable article. I cannot say exactly who wrote it, though I could guess who it was.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation). Is it true as stated by the "Soleil"—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman says this is another question.

Mr. MARCOTTE (translation). Is it true, as stated by "Le Soleil" that this article was wired to the "La Patrie" by the hon. Minister of Public Works himself ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). (Translation). I have nothing further to say in addition to what I have just said. Even supposing that I had written that article, I have not to account for it to the House ; still, I do not agree to having written it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would like to draw attention to the fact that it is not quite proper to ask members of the Government about private matters of their own, but only about questions of public interest.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding, that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into Committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). In rising to reply to some of the statements made by the hon. leader of the Opposition last night, I desire, at the outset of my remarks, to heartily congratulate my hon. friend upon being able to be in his place in the House to-day after his great physical effort of last night. I am sure that I simply echo the sentiments of every member of this House, when I say that we rejoice to see the great vigour which the hon. gentleman displays, and to have this convincing evidence of the excellent condition of his health. I had feared, after the exhaustive effort he made last night, that, perhaps, when he reached his home and pondered over the rather harsh, and, I may be permitted to say, incorrect statements he made in his lengthy criticism, his night's rest might have been disturbed, and physical weariness, combined with uneasiness of mind and conscience, might have prevented his being with us to-day. I am very glad, however, to see him here, and shall all the more willingly endeavour to show the fallacy of many of the arguments and the incorrectness of many of the statements he made use of. I shall not, however, take up the time of the House with any reference to his criticism of the speech of my hon. colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) on the finances of the country. That statement was so clear, so fair, so satisfactory, that the House cannot have been surprised at the failure of the hon. leader of the Opposition to weaken it in any respect. I would have been glad had the health of the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) permitted him to have been present while that speech was being made, for I am confident he would have been forced to admit that it was an eminently fair and convincing reply to his attack on the financial record of the present Administration. I think he would have been forced to admit, as every one must be in candour, that if we compare the expenditure of one Government with that of another, the fair way to make a comparison is to take up the various items of expenditure under their different heads, and contrast these with each other, and not take the total expenditure in one lump sum, as the hon. gentleman did. The hon. gentleman knows that there is over one million dollars of expenditure for new purposes which this Government had to incur, and which the former Government never had to provide for at all.

That was the line upon which the Minister of Trade and Commerce proceeded, and I think he made it abundantly evident, even to the gentlemen of the Opposition, that the criticism that was levelled against the able speech of the hon. the Minister of Finance, was weak and was not really a fair statement. I dwell no longer upon that.

I proceed next to notice a statement that the hon. gentleman made that it was by an accident of an accident that the Liberal party are in power. I do not know what he means by that exactly. But if it were by an accident that the Liberal party attained power, then I am bound to say that every manifestation we have witnessed throughout the country shows the verdict of the people to be that it was a very lucky accident, for they have but strengthened the Government from that day to this. Then we were told, and I thought it rather a marvellous statement, that if success attended the efforts of the Liberal Government in legislation they were in a different position from that of the late Government, because, he said, when the hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury benches were in Opposition, they opposed the late Government and objected to its measures, while now the Opposition are lending their help and their aid to the Government in order to develop this country and promote its prosperity. Well, it is true that gentlemen now on the Government side, when in Opposition, did object to the actions of the then Government, but it was to actions they objected, and they gave reasons for their objection. But when hon. gentlemen opposite claim that they are assisting gentlemen on this side of the House to promote the prosperity of Canada, to help her onward and forward, I ask him what means are they taking to do it? Is it by attributing corrupt motives to the men who sit in the Ministry and lead the Liberal party to-day, insinuating charges against members of that Government that they have not the courage to formulate, trying to weaken the influence of that Government in the country by base and cowardly insinuations when no one has dared to prefer a charge? Is that the help the Opposition are giving to the present Government in order to carry on the affairs of the country? Ah, but the hon. gentleman points to an instance of it, and says it was a case of black ingratitude for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to have mentioned it, namely, that he had supported the Government in their Crow's Nest Pass Railway policy last year. What is he afraid of in that respect? He asked the question: Why did I do it? Well, I shall not attempt to give the answer, but I could not help thinking at the same time that he might have asked himself another question. If the gallant men from York had swept down upon him from the east and from the west, chaining him to their chariot wheel as they did on a late occasion, his question would not have been: Why did I do it, but, Why did I not do it. He did help us in that, it is true; but in another case in which he was convinced the Government were right, which he had advocated and supported, in that case when the two men of York, from the east and the west, brought their influence to bear upon him, they led him captive and made him, in the light of open day and in the face of Parliament, eat the words he had uttered. Then, Sir, I mention this, not as a reproach but I say it with pity for one for whom I entertain respect as a bold and a valiant leader—he said he failed to find anything the Government had done to promote the prosperity of this country. Let me tell the hon. gentlemen opposite what I believe with reference to the prosperity of the country. This very fact itself, that the Liberal Government attained power inspired confidence in the people of this country, gave them that confidence which is necessary to business and to business improvement; the very fact of the Liberal party being in power, and a stable, harmonious Government, a Government loyal to the country and loyal to one another, being in power—that very fact, I say, stimulated the confidence of the people of this country. Who doubts it? How could business enjoy any stimulus when, in the very legislature of the nation, the men directing its affairs were at daggers drawn? How could they have confidence that the affairs of the country would be carried on satisfactorily when they saw, at a critical time in this country's history, at a time when the peaceful relations that had existed so long between the motherland and the neighbouring land were actually endangered, how could they have confidence on an occasion like that, when they saw the gentlemen entrusted with the reins of Government bringing on a crisis, seeing the Minister of Militia and Defence, who might have been called upon at any moment to marshal his troops and send them out, gone out on strike, leaving that important department without any head? How could they have confidence when they saw the Minister of Railways and Canals, whose services might have been in demand at any moment to provide facilities for transportation, also out on strike, and that department without a head? How could they have confidence when they saw the Minister of Finance also out on strike, leaving the finances of the country without any control at a time when funds might be needed? They saw these gentlemen divided among themselves, a Government whose members were in open war with each other upon the floors of this Chamber. Scenes like that will go down to history, and form a black page in the otherwise bright annals of this country of ours. I say that when a Government such as that was displaced by a Government loyal to the country and loyal to one another, when the people saw the present Government seated in power, then a feeling of confidence revived throughout this whole Dominion, and from that day to this that confidence has gone on increasing. I think I am not using the language of exaggeration when I say that in the minds and in the breasts of the people of Canada there is to-day a feeling of confidence, an assurance of prosperity, and a hope of better things, stronger than have ever existed among them before.

Then, Sir, I come to notice another part of the hon. gentleman's speech in which he took up a good deal of time, and I will ask the patience of the House, or of those members who may be inclined to listen to me, while I deal in detail with some of the changes of the tariff. The hon. gentleman, in discussing this tariff, made several very rash statements. He said we had adopted the National Policy in its entirety.

Mr. MACLEAN. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But the leader of the Government did more than that; he outdid himself, for, after having made that statement, he said that in all the essential features of the National Policy we had added 5 per cent to it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman for the promotion he has given me.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not quite understand the hon. gentleman.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman refers to me as the leader of the Government.

Mr. BERGERON. It is coming; it is coming.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Well, if ever the party opposite attain to power I shall not begrudge that honour to the hon. gentleman, though I do not wish to see him enjoy it at the present time. If I made a mistake like that, I think he will understand that, with all my best wishes for him, I hope he will long continue to hold his present position. Well, now, the hon. gentleman dealt with the speech of the Minister of Finance, and he will have to pardon me if, though I unintentionally paid him a compliment just now, I am obliged to allude to his manner of dealing with that speech in words which cannot be complimentary. What do I find? The Finance Minister, in the able speech he had delivered, with a fairness that characterized his whole utterances, had given a list of articles, sixty items of the tariff, in order to show the changes that had occurred therein; and, in doing so, he did what was fair. Among those articles he selected and put in the list were articles that comprised nearly all in the tariff in regard to which it could be said that the general tariff of this Government was higher than the general tariff of the preceding Government. My hon. friend gave the preferential list with one-eighth off and with a quarter off, 12½ per cent in the one case, and 25 per cent in the other. The hon. leader of the Opposition did not do himself credit when, in criticising that statement, he took up eight of these articles which had been raised in the general tariff from 30 to 35 per cent, he read the reduction of 12½ per cent, and said that the British manufacturers had to pay ½ of one per cent more under this tariff than they had to pay under the old tariff. Is that true?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If it was true, it was not the whole truth, and that is what men are expected to say in fair debate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will perhaps allow me to tell him that I was not dealing with the case of the law as it would come into effect on the 31st July. I was dealing with the law which the hon. gentleman put on the Statute-book last year, and the position in which the British manufacturer and exporter, during that year, occupied under it. I would, therefore, have gone outside of the argument, when I was dealing altogether with that point, if I had embodied more than that which operated under the law as it stood on the Statute-book last year.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is where I wholly differ with the hon. gentleman. He is dealing with the tariff which this Parliament enacted last session, and, under the operation of that tariff, a 25 per cent reduction was made in the preferential schedule after a certain date. That was as much part of the tariff as the 12½ per cent reduction; it is the same tariff to-day as it was last year; it is not changed at all. But the hon. gentleman took the 12½ per cent reduction, and ignored the fact that part of the law provides for 25 per cent reduction after the 1st July. There, I say, was a suppression of truth in respect to this matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It was unworthy of the hon. member to do it. I tell the hon. gentleman that, when he expressed the desire that 100,000 copies of the speech of the Finance Minister might be circulated broadcast throughout this country, I re-echo his wish; but when 100,000 go out, it will be a fortunate thing for the hon. gentleman's reputation, if 100,000 copies of his own speech do not follow, for if the people read his speech, and read the speech of the Finance Minister, they will say, with shame on their faces: We did not believe it possible that the leader of one of the great political parties would read utterances and deal with statements of an opponent, and, in doing so, suppress the truth and garble it to suit his own ends.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should like, if the hon. gentleman would permit me, to ask him one question. Under that tariff as it stands to-day, dealing with it from the standpoint that the hon. gentleman is dealing with it, I ask him if that which the people of England were led to expect, namely that there would be a reduction of the duties as they existed in Canada, of 12½ to 25 per cent, when the whole tariff came into operation, was carried out, and if I did not demonstrate to the House yesterday, that, in respect to a large number of staple imports from England into this country to-day, under the operation of the 12½ per cent reduction, there are not duties over those which hon. gentlemen opposite found when they came into power? Instead of a reduction, the hon. gentleman knows, that, having raised the duties more than 12½ per cent over the whole list of articles referred to, as the duties stood when they came into power, the result was, that last year British manufacturers and exporters to this country were met with a higher duty, instead of a reduction of 12½ per cent, as they were led to expect; they were, in fact, met with ⅓ of 1 per cent higher duty than that which existed when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, and yet the English exporter was led to expect he would receive 12½ per cent reduction. To-day, with 25 per cent off on all these leading staple imports into this country, instead of there being a reduction of 25 per cent, it is less than 12½ per cent, because hon. gentlemen opposite, before they made the reduction, raised the tariff 12½ per cent, so that they have ⅓ of 1 per cent less than 12½ per cent in the proposed reduction, which they were led to believe would be 25 per cent. That was the position.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am not taking exception to that part of the hon. gentleman's speech. Out of sixty articles, he picked out eight, with his usual fairness—items on which our general tariff has been above the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite; but, in commenting on this, it must be considered as one tariff and one law; there are not two laws, one providing for a reduction of 12½ per cent on the 1st August, 1898, and another providing for a reduction of 25 per cent afterwards; one law was enacted, and the hon. gentleman is talking about the tariff law we passed. While my hon. friend the Finance Minister had given both columns, the hon. gentleman quoted only the 12½ per cent reduction with respect to those eight items out of the sixty on which the reduction had taken place, and he determinedly refused to take what the Finance Minister had stated and what was before his own eyes, that when the 25 per cent reduction was carried out, as it would be after 1st of July, the rate of duty would be materially below the tariff which hon. gentlemen opposite had adopted. That is the point to which we take exception in the hon. gentleman's statement.

A great deal has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to the present Government adopting the National Policy. Their tone has changed. We had criticisms made last year by the late Finance Minister. In what direction were they? He said that the present Government had taken the National Policy in some respects, and not in others. This year, the leader of the Opposition said the Government have taken the National Policy in its entirety; nay, more, they have in all essential particulars added 5 per cent. What did the late Finance Minister tell us last year, in criticising our policy? He saw the woollen schedule of imports, of which there are millions a year in value, and that it had been raised from 30 to 35 per cent, at all events in regard to some of its items; and he recognized the fact that England was a keen competitor in these lines, and we were enacting a law, not for a day, but a law which we thought would stand for years, and we enacted in that law that a year and a few months afterwards 25 per cent should come off, which would be a great reduction. The hon. gentleman knew then that in these items we had raised the general tariff 5 per cent; but his criticism at that time was that this would not save the great woollen industries of the country. He said, "Wait till your 25 per cent preferential tariff, or even your 12½ per cent preferential tariff, comes into effect, and you will wipe out the great woollen industries of this country." They do not say so this year—why? Because the predictions they made have been falsified by the returns from the woollen mills in the country. What do the papers tell them? Mill after mill reopened and running on full time, and other mills running overtime. We have heard nothing about the destruction of the woollen industries on this occasion. Now, this is a point which I want to have fully understood, because I believe there are people in the Liberal party who think we have not done quite as much, or who have not realized how much this Government has done in the way of tariff reform; and I will therefore ask your attention and the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to some tables which I have prepared in reference to this point. I have had prepared a statement of the articles entered for consumption in the six months ending December 31st, in the years 1896 and 1897. In the one six months the National Policy was in force; in the other six months the preferential tariff was in force to the extent of 12½ per cent. Hon. gentlemen should bear in mind that the imports referred to in this statement are not only the imports from Great Britain, but the imports from all countries, and therefore the reduction which I will show has been made on these lines is not a reduction on imports from Great Britain alone, but a percentage reduction on the total imports in the various lines I will mention. I have here an import of some $16,000,000 in round numbers during the six months ending December 31st, 1897, under the new tariff, and an import of $13,500,000 in round numbers in the six months ending December 31st, 1896, under the old tariff. Taking the total importations and dividing them by the duties collected, you get at the average ad valorem percentage, and I take the different ad valorem percentages and show the reductions that have been made in the duties on the articles which I enumerate.

Mr. SPROULE. But if the values are changed, it will spoil your calculation.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I was about to refer to that myself. Hon. gen-

Mr. PATERSON.

lemen will recognize that where the articles change in value, and you have a number of items of specific duties, you are not in a position to arrive at a correct conclusion, and that mode of calculation would be fallacious, because of the reason the hon. gentleman has stated. Therefore, I take those articles in which, except in the case of coal, the duties are ad valorem. Now, what are the facts? On bituminous coal, on the importation for those six months, the reduction in duty has been 4 per cent. Cotton and manufactures of, was an item on which one hon. gentleman said we had increased the duty; but these tables show that instead of an increase under the working of the new tariff, there has been a percentage reduction, as compared with the old tariff, of 6 2-5ths per cent. On glass, there has been a reduction of 5 7-10ths per cent. On hats and caps, there has been a reduction of 5½ per cent. On iron and steel and manufactures of, of which the imports for the six months are nearly $6,000,000, there is a percentage reduction of 14 per cent. On leather, there is a slight increase, but so slight that I have not worked it out. On woollens and manufactures of, of which there have been over $4,000,000 of imports during the six months—another of the items in which hon. gentlemen said we had increased the duty—instead of an increase there is a decrease of 4½ per cent. These are the great leading articles on which hon. gentlemen said we had raised the duties.

Mr. WALLACE. Would the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question which is pertinent? Are these percentages of reduction percentages of the cost of the article or percentages of the duties?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Percentages of the reductions of duty under the new tariff as compared with the duty under the old tariff.

Mr. WALLACE. That is, supposing cotton manufactures were 30 per cent before, they would be 23½ per cent now—is that what we are to understand?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. As I proceed with another table, you will see exactly the way I have worked it out.

Mr. WALLACE. I think we are entitled to a statement as to that right here.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. You shall have it, if you possess your soul in patience a little. Now, I want to deal with a few other items. Without desiring to be sectional or to recognize different interests in the community, we do recognize the fact stated by the Finance Minister that the greatest of all the industries of this country, without belittling any other industry, is the great agricultural industry of the country. We cannot look at the exports without that fact being impressed upon our minds, and you cannot converse with a business man in any of the business centres, the towns or villages, without finding that he recognizes that the great agricultural industry, without belittling any of the others, is the great preponderating interest of the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavoured, by statements devoid of truth in many cases, to lead the agriculturists of this country to believe that no reduction has been made in the rates of taxation that bear upon them. I am aware that in one or two or three articles, such as reapers and mowers and ploughs, hon. gentlemen opposite have sought to charge the Liberal party with having broken solemn pledges for a reduction of duties on these articles when they came into power.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Hon. gentlemen say, "Hear, hear." Whatever may have been the opinion of different members of Parliament or different individuals throughout the country in reference to the reduction of taxation which they would like, I have this to say, that while ideas no doubt differ somewhat with regard to different articles and while there may be disappointments and while some people may have understood from something that may have been said that there might be a reduction or a wiping out of certain duties to which the hon. gentleman has alluded, I fail to find that any direct pledge was ever given, such as the hon. gentleman sought to make us believe was given, by any of the members of the Administration. The hon. gentleman knows that the platform of the Liberal party was adopted at the great Liberal convention, and that in that platform we declared for the lessening of the burdens upon the people and a return to a revenue tariff.

Mr. DAVIN. I quoted the words of the Minister of Agriculture.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think, from my recollection of the words of the Minister of Agriculture, that he expressed the belief that the duty on agricultural implements was too high, as regards many of these articles, and he desired to see the duty reduced, but I do not think he declared that he would put reapers and mowers on the free list.

Mr. DAVIN. Was the duty reduced then?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, but the hon. gentleman wants to make out that the Minister of Agriculture promised that these articles would go on the free list.

Mr. DAVIN. I made that out, too, but now you use the word "reduced."

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Very well, let us look at this. I say there may have been an understanding and there may have been desires on the part of different individuals in this direction and that, but I wish to point out how the Government had to view this question. When this question of reapers and mowers came up before us for consideration, what did we find? We found that these articles had been taxed 35 per cent under the old tariff, and that in 1894, the late Government, departing from its principles and with the ulterior object in view of strengthening itself with the people, cut down the duty on these to 20 per cent, while they left other articles in the high dutiable list. We recognized the fact that there were duties in the tariff which were excessive and bore too heavily upon the farmer, and we determined to reduce them. Let me tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that the difference between the two political parties upon this question—and I do not intend to enter into a discussion of the question of free trade and protection—is this.

Mr. DAVIN. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to read what the Minister of Agriculture said?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, I will not. You can read it afterwards.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He does not want to hear it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Would the hon. gentleman like to be thus continually interrupted in an argument he is making?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, when an hon. gentleman charges in his place on the floor of this House that an inaccurate quotation has been made by another hon. member, he ought to be ready to hear that quotation read and allow the House to decide.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think there is no difference between us as to the accuracy of the statement. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the Minister of Agriculture did not promise that these would go on the free list. Does he want to read an extract in which the Minister of Agriculture said that mowers and reapers would be placed on the free list?

Mr. DAVIN. That is exactly what I want to do. This is it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Whose speech?

Mr. DAVIN. The Minister of Agriculture's.

Some hon. MEMBERS. When delivered?

Mr. DAVIN. At Moosomin in October, 1894, you will find it in the "Spectator." This is it:

As a farmer he was not satisfied with the reduction which had been made in the agricultural implement duty, because the United States Congress have made a standing offer of reciprocity in implements, and it was the duty of the Canadian Government to take advantage of that offer.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN (reading)—

Last year the farmers of Western Canada imported $120,000 worth of American implements,—

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN (reading)—

—on which they paid $40,000 duty. Referring to the Massey-Harris combine, he claimed that the fact that these people spoke of going to the States to fight the Yankees in their own market showed that Canadian manufacturers were able to get along without protection.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN (reading)—

Canadians were able to hold their own with the Yankees in any walk of life.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN (reading)—

Massey-Harris got protection, why should not the farmers ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. That holds out a clear promise.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I ask—and I am in the judgment of this House—if it is not a piece of impertinence for the hon. gentleman to rise and make a statement like that. He attempts to contradict me and when I gave him the opportunity of proof he utterly fails. I will show the hon. gentleman, before I am through, what it was the hon. Minister of Agriculture desired, but I want now to lay down the distinction that exists between the two political parties with reference to this matter. The principle of hon. gentlemen opposite is protection to the manufacturers, and if this brings any revenue, that is merely an incident. But the policy of the Liberal party is, first of all, revenue, and then what protection may be involved in that is the incident. That is the distinction between the two political parties, and when hon. gentlemen opposite quote expressions of Liberal speakers in favour of eliminating every vestige of protection from the tariff, they are quoting simply the policy of the elimination of the principle of protection, as the main feature of our tariff, and the substitution in its place of a revenue tariff in which protection is merely an incident. Hon. gentlemen know what the platform of the Liberal party was. It was formulated by the great Liberal party in convention assembled. In that convention the Liberal party declared what in their opinion was the best policy for this country, and this Government is determined, as far as it can, to carry out that platform.

Mr. DAVIN. I thought the hon. gentleman was going to explain—

Mr. PATERSON.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have no desire to be discourteous but I must protest against these interruptions.

Mr. DAVIN. I thought the hon. gentleman was going to explain what the Minister of Agriculture said and what he led the people of the North-west to understand.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. We have heard the hon. gentleman read already what the Minister of Agriculture said.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not wish that there should be any misunderstanding. Hon. members must understand that they cannot interrupt an hon. gentleman who has the floor, without his consent.

Mr. DAVIN. I have no desire to do it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He is willing.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, but not to be interrupted all day. In order to show that I have rightly understood the policy of the two political parties, and the distinction between them, let me quote from the ex-Finance Minister's speech in 1894, when he introduced his tariff resolutions. As I have stated, you can find the platform of the Liberal party laid down in the convention of its representatives assembled in this city, but you cannot find anything of the kind to show what the policy of the Conservative party really is. They never ventured to call their representatives together in convention, and I am forced therefore to take as an avowal of their policy a declaration of it from the mouth of the one best fitted to give it expression, namely, the Finance Minister, when he introduced his tariff in 1894. You will find it in the "Hansard" of 1894, vol. 1, page 207 :

I wish to state here that the Government of to-day, and the party which supports the Government of to-day, take their stand squarely and firmly upon the embodiment and upon the preservation of the principle of protection in the tariff, the degree of that protection to be according to the circumstances of the industry and the conditions of business and of trade at the present time.

In the same speech he lays down this proposition :

The tariff which was made in 1878—

He refers, undoubtedly, to 1879.

The tariff which was made in 1878 was a practical tariff, and the tariff which is to be arranged during this session must also have that feature, if possible, of being a practical tariff, and must take cognizance of the varying conditions of different industries, and must mete out to them, on the principle which we have stated, the protection which is reasonably due to them, and necessary in order to maintain possible industries in their position in this country.

That is the policy of the Conservative party, of which party the hon. member for West Assiniboia has been a most loyal member. Whatever they proposed in this House, they could count upon him not only to vote for it but to defend it. Or, even if he should speak against it, they could always rely upon his vote. Now, let me ask that hon. gentleman, as a member of the party. In the face of this declaration of policy of the party with which the hon. gentleman is connected, if they had been returned to power in 1896, instead of the Liberal party, and the agricultural implement manufacturers had made representations of the facts to the Government, what would the hon. gentleman have done? If the manufacturers had come and said to the Finance Minister: We want you to look at these figures taken from your own trade returns. What are they, he would say. They would answer: We beg to point out to you that in the year 1896, in the six months ending 31st December, 372 harvesters of a value of $37,071 were imported into Manitoba and the North-west Territories, to say nothing of the rest of the Dominion, while, for the corresponding six months of the three next years in which we have worked under a tariff reduced by you from 35 per cent to 20 per cent, there has been a marked increase. In 1895, for the corresponding six months the number of harvesters imported into Manitoba and the North-west alone was 760, in 1896 it was 803, while for the six months ending December 31st, 1897, the number of harvesters imported into Manitoba and the North-west alone was 1,432, representing a value of $144,289. And they would say to the hon. Minister of Finance—

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman asked me what I would say. I will tell him, if he will allow me.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) is very anxious to take every opportunity to rise. I could not know exactly what the hon. gentleman would say, but I venture to say that if the Government acceded to such a request on the part of the manufacturers and had put implements back to where they were, he would have supported them.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is my impression.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has pointed to me and has said he would like to know what I would do if my party had got into power in the last election and certain figures were laid before the Finance Minister. Do not you think, Mr. Speaker, that I should have an opportunity to tell the hon. gentleman what I would say.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid I must leave that largely in the judgment of the hon. member who has the floor to say whether he wanted a response, or whether he was only using a figure of speech.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If I have said anything wrong I am sorry for it. My argument is that if hon. gentlemen opposite had been returned to power in 1896 and the implement manufacturers had come to them and had shown, that since the reduction of the tariff the number and value of those machines imported was increased four times over in Manitoba and the North-west, and had demanded, in view of the party declaration that the tariff must be arranged with a view to protection of the industry regardless of revenue, that they should restore the duty to 30 or 35 per cent, if they were consistent with their principles, they would have been forced to concede that point. The manufacturers could have pointed out in addition that they were charged 30 or 35 per cent on all the machinery in their factories and that even the workmen were compelled to pay 30 or 35 per cent on the tools. All this being shown if the Conservatives desired to be consistent they would be obliged to grant the request. While it is true with regard to reapers and mowers that the rate of duty was not lowered, I contend that by the plan that was adopted by the Government in this matter of giving the agricultural implement manufacturers relief by reducing the duty on their raw material, substantial advantage resulted to the consumer. The reduction of the duties on the raw material enabled the Canadian manufacturers voluntarily to reduce the price of implements, I believe, by $5 apiece. And the Customs Department gave a ruling admitting at $92 each a large line of implements that, up to that time, had been charged duty on the value of $100. But I wish to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite these two or three items of which I have spoken, only a few among the items used by the farmer, as instancing a fulfilment of the pledge that was given by the Minister of Agriculture. I have here a list of sixteen agricultural implements, and I propose to show the rate of duty under the old tariff and the rate of duty under the general schedule of the Fielding tariff. I am not going to quote the preferential tariff, because I will be candid with the House and say that, so far none of the agricultural implements I am about to name have come from the old country. Some may come when the 25 per cent reduction is in force. No one can foretell how that will change the current of trade.

But I tell you frankly now that none have come in so far, and, therefore, I do not institute a comparison with the old National Policy rate and the preferential rate, but I institute a comparison between the old general rate and the National Policy rate, and the general rate that was enacted by the Fielding tariff. Notice what reductions have been made, and tell me whether they are substantial or not. I give the percentage of reduction, the difference in the rate of duty determines the percentage of reduction from the old rate of duty. Some may say: You take 25 per cent off; that is very little. People do not realize how much 25 per cent off the old tariff rate amounts to. If you tell a farmer in the North-west, or anywhere else: I will give you 60 cents a bushel for your wheat, when he has been getting 80 cents a bushel, and he should say to you: Why, that is a terrible reduction; then you may turn round and say, in the language of hon. gentlemen opposite: No, that is no reduction; that is only 25 per cent off. But they would think it was a reduction, just the same, and just so surely does this percentage of the reduction in the duty on the implements they use bear that relation to the taxes that were imposed upon them under the National Policy. Now, let us look at some of these articles:

	Percent- General age of Tariff, Tariff, reduction, 1894. 1897. 1897.
	p.c.	p.c.	p.c.
Axes	35	25	28½
Hay or straw knives.	35	25	28½

Now, then, to summarize, I have given you sixteen articles of agricultural implements used by farmers, seven of which have been reduced at the rate of 16½ per cent, one has been reduced 20 per cent, and eight have been reduced at the rate of 28½ per cent from the old tariff. I invite attention again to a statement I am going to make, that, in that table, I have a comparison of the reductions in the old rate under the National Policy, and the general tariff rate under the Fielding tariff—not the preferential rate, for if any came in under the preferential rate, there would be 25 per cent further reduction off the amounts that I have already given. Now, I am about to read a table which, I fear, will prove tiresome to you, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps to the members of the House. But I desire to get upon "Hansard" something which I consider valuable to the people, at the risk of making myself wearisome and tedious. I desire, also, to do it for the benefit of the ex-Minister of Finance, who, when he goes upon the platform, may not desire to give that close scrutiny to the facts of the case that might be desirable, and I am about to place upon the

Mr. PATERSON.

"Hansard" a statement from which he can see for himself the enormous reductions that have been made in the rate of taxation upon the farmers of this country. So, when he goes again upon the platform, he can tell the people: I said before that you have no relief under this tariff; but I find, upon closer investigation, that the reductions in taxation have been simply enormous, and it is my duty to lay the facts before you. I have given you sixteen articles under the general tariff, and I propose now to give you a list of 107 articles. There are about 447 dutiable items in the tariff and 200 free items, and I think I may say, speaking subject to correction—but I believe I am absolutely correct—that there is not one among all these items that, if a full preferential tariff were applied to it, would not show a lower rate of duty than that under the National Policy. Then, I want to point out that, under that tariff, the great bulk of the rates on goods coming in from all countries have been reduced. Why, Sir, the preferential rates, applied to articles that come from Great Britain will show a reduction greater, I think, than some people have been led to believe. Now, on those 107 articles I am about to give you, as I have verified by officers in my department, there are imports of all of them, though in some cases very few, that come in from Britain or that will come in under the preferential rate. I want to draw your attention to another point, concerning which my views differ a little, perhaps, from those of some hon. gentlemen, though, in a general sense, I am in agreement with them in this matter. I lay it down as a proposition that it would be difficult to controvert successfully, that, when you introduce an article into a country, its introduction under a lower rate of duty would, under normal circumstances, extra circumstances not coming into the case, have an effect, not only upon the article that was introduced, but upon a vast quantity of that same article that is produced and bought in the country. You, therefore, gain an idea of the amount of the reduction. Now, I do not propose to weary the House with the figures. I want to give them in detail sufficiently to bring me within the rules of the House and warrant me in placing this table in the columns of the "Hansard." I will omit the general tariff of 1897, which, as I said, reduces the duty on most of these articles coming from all countries. You will observe upon what articles the percentage of reduction does not amount to 25 per cent. I, therefore, will give the rate of duty under the National Policy tariff, and then the rate of duty under our tariff at the preferential rate of 25 per cent discount, which goes into effect on the 1st of July, and I give it on articles, not, as I said, all of which come from England, but some or all of which will come from England. And who will say that if these articles from England came in under the 12½ per cent reduction, what the increase will be when a reduction of 25 per cent is made? Every one of these articles is an absolute necessity, and is used by every agriculturist in the country in his house or on his farm. Among these articles, I ask attention to a long list of agricultural implements, over and above that I have already read; and I ask attention to the reductions as answering the question whether the Government has carried out its pledges to reduce the duty on agricultural implements and reduce the burdens on the farmers? The list of articles, with the new rate under the preferential duties, and the percentage of reduction under the new rates as compared with the old, is as follows:—

I leave it to hon. gentlemen opposite to say whether we have not advanced in the direction of tariff reform respecting agricultural implements.

Mr. DAVIN. Is that 27 per cent reduction on shovels and spades with the preferential allowance off?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. Hardly any of these articles come in from England.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I instructed my officers to carefully prepare the list. I have already said that some come in in larger and others in minor quantities; but they come in under the 12½ per cent reduction, and it is impossible to tell what the increase will be under the 25 per cent reduction. There is, at all events, that relief given. I have placed in this list, because these articles are needed by agriculturists as well as others, cottons, woollens and other items, just as the Finance Minister did, not selecting some articles that support my case, but dealing with the general staple articles that come in from Great Britain in large quantities and which the farmers have to buy. Now, I feel as great regret as hon. gentlemen do at my having to read this statement, which I know is not interesting, and which, if one wanted to make a speech at all interesting, he would eschew by all possible means. But I felt it desirable to put these figures upon "Hansard," and I invite criticism upon them. I know what the criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite will amount to. It will amount to this, that there are very few of some of these articles coming from England. I grant that in some few items; but, nevertheless, even in these some do come from England; and if some have come in under the 12½ per cent reduction, vast quantities may come in under the 25 per cent reduction. In this list I have included the great staple lines which are used by all classes in the community, which go into every household. I have shown that even in the items on which the least reduction has been made, it is a very great reduction in the burdens which the people have to bear. Now let me summarize. In these 107 items which I have read, we have made the following reductions:—

PERCENTAGE OF REDUCTIONS UNDER THE RECIPROCAL TARIFF.

1	reduction of	6½	per cent.
6	do	10	do
6	do	12½	do
2	do	16½	do
2	do	20	do
1	do	23	do
45	do	25	do
4	do	27	do
1	do	28	do
4	do	30	do
2	do	31	do
9	do	36	do
1	do	37½	do
1	do	38	do
1	do	42	do

9	do	46	do
1	do	50	do
1	do	55	do
1	do	60	do
7	do	100	do

Of these 107 articles, on which these reductions have been made, all or nearly all are articles used by the farmer, and many are agricultural implements and tools, on which there are reductions of from 36 to 45 per cent, while some articles, like binder twine, and wire for fencing, have been made free. Now, while I anticipate, and have anticipated, what the criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite will be, I shall want them, when criticising these figures, to demonstrate to the House, as they will be bound to do, that if articles have come in from Britain, it may be in small quantities in some cases, under the 12½ per cent reduction, under a 25 per cent reduction large quantities of these goods will not come in. If they are able to do that, they will have weakened my case.

Mr. DAVIN. That is asking us to prove a negative, which you know it is not right to do.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I know it will be difficult to do; but the hon. gentleman is sometimes able to prove a negative.

Mr. DAVIN. I say that according to the rules of logic it is impossible.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I invite the attention of the House to another thing. The full benefit of the Fielding tariff, which was introduced into this House last year, will not be experienced till after the 1st of July, and will not be experienced at once; for, while we were pledged to reform the tariff and lighten the burdens of taxation on the people of the country, we were business men, we knew that we had to recognize the conditions created under hon. gentlemen opposite, and we would not throw this country into a commercial panic, but would reach our end by safe means, and we believe it will be reached with perfect safety to those who have invested their money in industrial undertakings. Now, what do I find? I find, from a table I had prepared for me, taking the importation of goods entered for consumption into Canada under the reciprocal tariff, and the duty collected thereon during the six months ending the 31st of December, 1897, that the abatement of duty under the 12½ per cent reduction amounted to $521,451 during the six months. If you double that, you get the year's operations as fairly as we can estimate them now. I think you will be safe in doubling it, because trade does not all at once find its new channel. The Englishman realized that this was an opening greater than he has enjoyed before, but in many lines he had to make his arrangements, and so during the first few months you could not expect the trade to flow as freely through this new channel as it will later. Any business man can understand that. But if you double that trade of the first six months, what would that mean? It would mean that besides the reduction in the burden of taxation on the people, owing to our reduced tariff, owing to our general lowering of duties on the great bulk of the items, there is the further reductions under this preferential clause. I say double that and you will have $1,042,000 of relief. That is the relief in one year, under a reduction of 12½ per cent. I venture to say that there is not a man who will not admit that with this current of trade now established, and with the impetus which 25 per cent will give it as against 12½ per cent, a reduction of two million dollars of taxation will represent the reduction on the imports under that reciprocal tariff after a year from next July.

Mr. PATERSON.

An hon. MEMBER. Reduction?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, reduction. I say that under the 25 per cent reduction, in the face of the figures I have given, in the face of events that have actually transpired, it is small hazard to predict that when this preferential tariff is in full force for a year, with the 25 per cent reduction, there will be a reduction, not on the old rates of duty of the late Government, but on the reduced general tariff rates of the new Government that will equal three million dollars; and I ask any hon. gentleman in this House who ventures to say that there is no reformation in this tariff, that the pledge of the Liberal party to reduce the burdens of the people has not been carried out, how, when this takes place as we think it will, he can hope to maintain his position. What does it amount to? Let me illustrate. What is the equivalent of that reduction in the taxation of the people, so that we may grasp the amount of reduction that has been made? It will be equivalent to taking ten million dollars worth of imported goods, on which 30 per cent duty has been levied, and transferring that ten million dollars to the free list. That is what it means.

Mr. CLANCOY. Does the hon. gentleman mean by that statement that there will be a loss to the revenue of three million dollars.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There will be a loss to the revenue on that account, but that loss will be made up by the stimulus given to trade, and the wealth we hope to put into the people's pockets, which will enable them to buy more goods, and on a larger scale than they are doing to-day—buy millions of dollars more of goods and pay for them. They will have the money to do it. And by giving that stimulus to trade, every manufactory in the country will be running full time and over-time, too. That is what we hope to see.

I have been a little tiresome, I am aware, on that subject, and I now want to touch upon another point. My hon. friends opposite, the leader of the Opposition and the ex-Finance Minister, said last session, when the tariff was introduced, that it would have to be changed. They said that it filled them too with humiliation. Canada had been humiliated. They told us what an awkward position we were putting ourselves in.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. They told us how ignorant we were with reference to that matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. And the same mournful spirit is upon them yet. I could not help thinking, as I gazed upon my hon. friend, of the lines :

Talk not of grief
Till thou hast seen the tears of bearded men.

Their grief was so great over the humiliation which they said was brought upon Canada, so great at our having deceived and deluded the great British public.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That was the language of the hon. gentleman last year. He is still sad and lonely in his grief. But let me ask him to look at a bright picture, for I hate to see grief wasted. The hon. gentleman is wasting it. Let me ask him to look at a bright picture—not a fancy picture but a true one. Let him transport himself, in his mind, to the great throbbing centre of the Empire a year ago or less—London. Let him gaze upon the scene taking place there. Let him look upon the hundreds of thousands of English people and British citizens from all parts of the world assembled there. Let him look upon, the mightiest of earth's sovereigns, as she passes along those streets, lined with loving subjects, with "God bless you my people" falling from her gracious lips, and let him listen to the responses from the hundreds of thousands of loyal subjects "God save our gracious Queen." Let him contemplate that scene, as she winds her way to give grateful thanks to the King of Kings, who has so abundantly blessed her and her people, and let him grasp the fact that in that supreme moment the thoughts of the English people were stirred as they never had been stirred before. Who can conceive it possible that other thoughts or subjects of minor importance could even find a resting place in that scene. I ask him to gaze on that scene. But enraptured as the people were, entranced as they were, with the sight of their beloved sovereign, there was another sight in that procession that also arrested their attention. It was when they saw the carriage that bore Wilfrid Laurier, Canada's Prime Minister and representative. England's heart had been touched as it had never been touched by any colony before because of that very tariff that the hon. gentleman feels ashamed and humiliated that the Parliament of Canada should have passed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They did not realize the deception that had been practiced.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There, again, the hon. gentleman refuses to be comforted. "They did not realize the deception that had been practiced"—so he told us last night. Then the hundreds of thousands of Englishmen, the statesmen, the editors of the world's great newspapers, all the literary men, all the dwellers in that land are, according to the hon. gentleman, so obtuse, so devoid of intelligence that they could not understand that tariff, every particular of which, so far as the reciprocal clause was concerned was published not only in their dailies but in their other newspapers. And yet the hon. gentleman says that they could not understand it. Why, what contempt the hon. gentleman is pouring upon himself and upon the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). They spent hours last session, yes, days and weeks, before the Prime Minister went to England, demonstrating to their own satisfaction, that it was a fraud and pointing out to the English people that they would get nothing from it. Did not the English people believe what they said?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They did when they had it from the lips of the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), the confession made at Sheffield that no preference was given.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). No such confession was made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can prove to the hon. gentleman out of his own mouth that at the banquet at Sheffield he said that, though they had attempted to give a preference they had failed.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman knows that he is burlesquing what I said, and if he will read the words they will prove it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can establish what I have said. Then it was that the English people found that they had been deceived.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If we are to accept the statement of the hon. gentleman, though I would not want to do it for his own sake, all we are led to believe is that the English did not believe when he said it, but they did believe it when the Finance Minister said it. I spare him that. If he had been right in his statement, the English people would have believed him. They, no doubt, read what he said, read all his strictures upon the Finance Minister, but they saw what utter nonsense they were. Do you suppose that these men in England, whose goods have been coming over and getting the benefit of this preference—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, to the tune of a falling off of £171,000 for the first four months of its operation.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman must remember that £171,000 is not such a very great deal in the immense commerce of Great Britain. And does the hon. gentleman mean to say that statements of succeeding periods will not balance that and more? I need not argue that with the hon. gentleman. I know his ability, and I know that he knows better than he is saying now. The hon. gentleman says that we made a great mistake. There, again, grief and sadness overwhelmed him, because, when we gave this preferential tariff we did not demand better terms for Canada on the exports we are sending into that country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear. The mistake of your lives, as you will find out.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Well, I grant the hon. gentleman that we did not stipulate when concession was being given to Great Britain that they must give us a return for it. The hon. gentleman knows, I believe, that we could not maintain the tariff we have now and get that concession from Britain. He knows that British public opinion would have to be educated before that could be done. If these hon. gentlemen take the position that we ought to have sought a preferential tariff at all costs, they must mean that our tariff should have been so reduced as to make such an arrangement possible even with British public opinion as it is to-day, and, according to the principles that they themselves had laid down, this would mean such a reduction as to make it difficult for many of our manufacturers to live at all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. And I wish him to rise boldly and accept the logical results of his own reasoning. Mr. Chamberlain's statements have been read time and again, and I need not take up the time of the House by reading them. But hon. gentlemen will remember his statement as to what they would demand from us in return for a concession of preferential trade. And the hon. gentleman says that the Prime Minister did not do his duty to Canada in that he did not urge then and there the granting of this preferential arrangement. The Prime Minister knew that he could not do it with any hope of success, that even if they had been willing to grant it, they would have demanded terms, they would have demanded concessions that he could not possibly have given in the present state of the trade of the country. And while I am on that point, I would ask the hon. gentleman in all sincerity to explain one sentence of his. I have been charged with uttering some words that I myself did not realize. I would fain believe that one sentence that fell from the hon. gentleman's lips last night was a mistake—when he stated that the Prime Minister of this Dominion was bound—he did not say to whom—when he went over to England, to oppose preferential trade in the interests of the United States. To make a charge like that—

Mr. PATERSON.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman wish me to answer him now?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, give us your authority.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will answer the hon. gentleman. The statement I made was this, and I repeat it: The action which the Prime Minister took on that occasion was utterly at variance with the pledge he had solemnly given to the electors of Canada as to what he would do if he obtained power, that one of the first acts of his Government would be to send a commission to England to negotiate preferential trade with the Government of Lord Salisbury. There is the further fact that as soon as he got to England, before he had a word of discussion with any person, except the proposition made by the Duke of Devonshire opening the way to carry out this very project, he took the strongest ground against preferential trade, declaring that it would involve protection which had been a curse to Canada and would be a curse to England. This proved to me that before he left Canada, he had changed his mind, that he had determined to abandon, to violate the solemn pledge he had given to the people of this country. And taken in connection with the fact, that, in the struggle with the hon. gentleman and myself, he had the sympathy of the United States, the people there hoping he would come into power, I could arrive at no conclusion but the one I stated. I say I cannot arrive at any other conclusion until the hon. gentleman gives what he has never ventured yet to give to this House and to the people of this country, the reason for this volte face, the reason for this sudden change of the hon. gentleman from a pledged supporter—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has permission to answer a question, but he cannot enter into a discussion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman who has asked me, who has challenged me—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I asked you a question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And I am answering it, and before I take my seat—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman is abusing the courtesy of the Chair. I only asked the hon. gentleman a question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And I am answering it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, the hon. gentleman did not answer it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He is afraid to hear the truth.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman, having answered the question, has no right to go on and make a speech.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was asked to justify my statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman is abusing the permission that has been given him to answer a question.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am sorry. I do not wish at all to show the slightest discourtesy to the hon. gentleman opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Will any hon. gentleman say I have done so?

Mr. FOSTER. You did not want to hear him, when he was trying to answer you.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman placed a very serious statement upon the "Hansard."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And I am prepared to justify it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If I understood him aright, he said that the Prime Minister was bound in some way, in the interests of the United States, as I understood him to say, to parties in the United States. I thought he had said more than he meant to say, that he had said it in a sudden heat, and that he might wish to explain it or withdraw it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, no. The hon. gentleman said no such a thing. The hon. gentleman asked me to justify the statement I made, and I am prepared to do it now.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman has entered upon a course of reasoning by which, he says, he convinced himself that something was done. Very well. Let it go at that. But what I said was, that he had made a direct statement, so I understood him, and now he says he reached it by certain conclusions. I asked him if there was not a contradiction between the conclusions he had reached and a broad statement that that was the case. Now, with reference to what the Prime Minister did, what has been charged against him by the hon. gentleman who has just interrupted me, that has been up time and again in the House, and I do not intend to go into that at all at this time.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, you had better not.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The House is thoroughly conversant with that matter. But leaving that question, I desire to maintain the position that has been taken on this side of the House with reference to that preferential tariff. I venture to say that every one in Canada would hail a preference given to us in the British market, if it could be obtained on terms advantageous to both, and in the interests of both. What I want to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite is this, that, by the preferential tariff enacted by this Government, though no law has been placed upon the Statute-book of England to compel the people of England to give a preference to Canadian products in their market, the very fact that that Act was passed by this Canadian Parliament touched the British heart, and to-day, though there is no law compelling it, they are, of their own free will, giving a preference to Canada. But, Sir, our legislation did more; it accomplished the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties, which, so far as we can judge, would have gone on for many long years further, if action had not been taken by Canada. But the hon. gentleman takes exception to that. He says that the right hon. gentleman the Prime Minister and the Government and Parliament of Canada had nothing to do with the denunciation of those treaties. Well, it is a strange thing that the English newspapers, the English public, distinguished citizens of the British Empire, even in her remote colonies, recognized that our action here was the prime moving cause that brought about the denunciation of those treaties. I think it is in vain for the hon. gentleman to say that the Prime Minister, the Government and Parliament of Canada, are to have no credit for that result. Why, Sir, in the Conservative papers published in this city, no longer ago than the early part of this month, I find a report of an interview with Cecil Rhodes, a man whom, I think, hon. gentlemen opposite will admit has been an important figure in the history of South Africa, and this is what he says :

Mr. Cecil Rhodes arrived at Madeira to-day. In the course of a recent conversation he spoke warmly of the service Canada had rendered to the Empire by compelling the British Government to clear the German and Belgian treaties out of the way of future interimperial co-operation. Those treaties formerly were in his way in his tariff arrangements in South Africa. "Sir Wilfrid Laurier," he said, "has now got rid of them for us and the whole of the Empire."

That, at any rate, was the view of a distinguished man from an outlying British possession.

Mr. DAVIN. That is an opinion adverse to the policy of the Government.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What do I find in a special cable published in the Montreal "Star," a paper that is not, I believe, particularly friendly to the Administration or its acts? It is dated from London, England, and is as follows:—

The crises in Cuba and China almost fill the papers here.

The Budget of the Hon. Mr. Fielding, Minister of Finance, Canada, attracts a good deal of attention. I heard a Conservative member of Parliament say this morning: "Our Ministers jaw, jaw, jaw, and do little but jaw about the unity of the Empire, but Canada keeps on doing, doing, doing."

I said that the action of the Canadian Parliament in offering those terms to the British people, had touched the British heart, and that led them of their own motion to make inquiries respecting the products of this Dominion. What do we hear from shippers and merchants? To-day in the principal markets inquiries are made for Canadian goods; a trial is given them, and the result is seen in the widely increased exports to the English market. Let me give the House a statement of our exports to Great Britain during the first six months of the present fiscal year. We find that our exports, as compared with the corresponding period of the last fiscal year, increased by the large sum of $22,500,688. That is our total exports for the six months over the corresponding six months of the last year. I think it is a fairer way to leave out the foreign products, and if we do so, we find that during those six months our home products exported to Great Britain show an increase of $19,237,864 during the six months of the present over the corresponding six months of the previous year, which itself was a large year for exports. Where do I find the increases? Take the figures. Products of the fisheries, increase, $32,664; products of the forest, increase, $3,348,299; animals and their produce, increase, $6,564,942; agricultural products, increase, $8,640,134; manufactures, increase,

Mr. PATERSON.

$782,759. The exports of produce of the mines to Great Britain decreased during the six months by $108,648, and there was also a decrease in the exports of miscellaneous articles to the extent of $22,216. Deducting these decreases, the increase in the other line of home products during the first six months of the present fiscal year over the corresponding six months of the previous year amounted to $19,237,864. I desire to call attention to the fact that while our exports have shown an increase during those six months of nearly $20,000,000 as compared with the corresponding six months of the previous year, the total imports into Great Britain during that time had decreased nearly $90,000,000. Can anything speak louder for the position that Canada has taken in the British market even in the short space of time our tariff has been in operation?

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is very good preferential trade.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I had not intended to occupy the time of the House so long, but the reading of the tables took a longer time than I had anticipated. I have not attempted to deal with the financial part of the statement made by the Minister of Finance and offer any criticism thereon, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in his very fair and able criticism, gave an explanation and defence of the administration of this Government, which may disappoint some of our friends who may have anticipated that greater results would have been attained, but which will enable them to see clearly that the Government, so far as was consistent with the welfare and prosperity of the Dominion, have endeavoured, so far as in them lies, to economically carry on the administration of the finances of the country, while they are at the same time advancing its prosperity.

Mr. DAVIN. What about sugar?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It is just an element in the policy that has been introduced by this Government, that of binding together the colonies as well as the mother country. I would say to hon. gentlemen opposite that I have never claimed credit, nor has this Government ever claimed credit, that in our preferential tariff as regards England or English colonies we have acted solely and alone to benefit the motherland or the colonies. We are looking after our own interests as well as developing the interests of the motherland. The reductions in our burdens give advantage to Canada, and the preference accorded to England is an advantage given to her by Canada, and the same remark applies to the West Indies. What did the leader of the Opposition say with respect to the present sugar tariff? He declared we had adopted the right policy, that he had urged it upon us last year, that under the tariff as it existed our West Indian commerce had been destroyed. I was unable at the time to find or to remember where the hon. gentleman last year made that recommendation. He did not give us the time when he made it or the page where it could be found, and I am told by an hon. gentleman who has looked through "Hansard" that he failed in the hasty glance made at its pages to find the hon. gentleman's statement. I would be sorry to say that he did not make it, but he did not give the House the reference.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman's colleague can tell him.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman cannot now tell when he did it, because he did not do it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If the hon. gentleman did so, I will be willing to look it up in "Hansard." My memory wholly fails to recall it, if the hon. gentleman ever proposed anything such as we propose. I say I accept his word, but I have no remembrance of it. But if I accept his word, I ask him in what position he places the ex-Minister of Finance and the party who supported him. We left the sugar tariff last year on raw sugar as we found it left by the previous Government; and it is this question of raw sugar and not the refined that affects the West India trade.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend say that the question of refined sugar does not affect the West Indies?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, both affect the West Indies; but the question at issue is the raw sugar. The hon. gentleman knows that; if he does not know it, he ought to know it; but I suppose it is possible that he does not know, because his leader told us last night that under the tariff he had ruined the West India commerce.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Well, it was under the tariff as we found it and left it. All we did was to reduce the duty on the refined sugar, the protection to the refiner, 14 cents on the hundred pounds. We left the duty on raw sugar just as it was, and it is on the raw sugar that we are giving a preference to the West India planters, which the hon. gentleman admits will be a boon to them, but not to them alone, because he considers that it will revive a trade which will be profitable to the maritime provinces and to all parts of the Dominion. Now, I have spoken on sugar, as the hon. gentleman asked me to do, and I trust I have made myself plain.

Mr. BENNETT. Tell us about the English postage you announced at Toronto.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The English postage is something on the same line; it is coming. The hon. gentleman has alluded to that in the House before. He spoke, I think, of myself as having been treated somewhat unfairly, as he supposed, by the Postmaster General. Well, I have not felt very badly over that matter. I am told by people who were present that when the announcement of that reduction in English postage was made, it was well received by the audience. In fact, I was at the meeting myself. I am told that the announcement was made in clear and stentorian tones, and that the whole Massey Hall audience heard it. Being myself an eye witness, I can say that the statement was made in all good faith, and that the effect on the audience was electrical. It showed me that, although the Postmaster General has perhaps been delayed in the consummation of his wishes for a short time, as we have been in our desire to confine our tariff preference to the British Empire, yet the heart of the Canadian people was with him in that Imperial-Canadian movement; and when that comes about, then the hon. gentleman can have the satisfaction of knowing that still another act has, through the instrumentality of the Canadian Government, united still more closely and bound more firmly together the motherland and this the greatest of her possessions.

I have spoken of the postage, as requested. If there are any other matters on which hon. gentlemen would like to hear me speak, I would like to oblige them, though I must close my remarks, for I certainly will not continue them beyond the dinner hour. Let me note, in conclusion, that hon. gentlemen make serious charges against us. They charge that we have not fulfilled a single promise that we made to the people—that we have failed in all our pledges. Well, Sir, that is a serious charge. Is it true? Do the hon. gentlemen mean in earnest to make a charge of that kind? After the figures I have given, taken from official records, will they say that this Government have not been true to the pledge they gave to the people of this country to reduce the burden of taxation. In the light of the figures given by the Finance Minister, and dwelt upon more in detail by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, will they not say that in many of the branches of the public service economies have been practiced and retrenchments made? We promised that there would be increased prosperity, and do they mean to say that increased prosperity is not in the country to-day? The Prime Minister, two or three years ago, when standing before a distinguished audience of commercial men, after having listened to a vast array of statistics read by the ex-Minister of Finance, in order to convince them that they were prosperous, said to them: "If you put me and my party in power, we will not need to use this long list of statistics to prove that you are prosperous, for you will feel it in your pockets." Is that true? Hon. gentlemen have said that it was by an accident that we attained power—referring, I suppose, to a question that had created a sharp division among the people of Canada—a question involving religious feelings, feelings which are the deepest in the hearts of us all, and which ought to be recognized with charity and forbearance, and with a disposition to give to others the same privilege of liberty of conscience that we demand for ourselves. When those feelings were stirred up and aroused in the country, and a great deal of discontent was excited among the people, the hon. First Minister said: "I believe that if I were entrusted with power, I would be able, by different means from those employed by our opponents, by means that would commend themselves to all the fair-minded men of this country, to bring about a peaceable and happy solution of this question." Where is it to-day? Was the promise kept? I say that if there was nothing else that stood to the credit of the right hon. gentleman who leads this Government, that alone entitles him to a renewal of the confidence of the people of this country. What more did we promise?

Mr. BERGERON. The coal duty.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. We promised that we would wipe out the Franchise Act. We are at it now, though opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite. They demand economy on our part. We proposed to repeal that Act which, if it was carried out every year—as it ought to be in justice to the people of the Dominion—would entail millions of dollars of expense. These hon. gentlemen call upon us to economize, and then try to force that Act upon us, the carrying out of which, as it ought to be carried out, would entail millions of dollars of expense. We promised a plebiscite to ascertain the views of the people on the question of prohibition and intend to carry out that promise. We want also to readjust the boundaries of the constituencies and remedy the iniquity perpetrated by hon. gentlemen opposite in that regard. We have not taken up that matter yet. Will these hon. gentlemen, when we do, give us the assistance which the leader of the Opposition says they always give us on the other side? We have not been perfect, we have not been able to accomplish everything. In our tariff revision we have not been able to do all that every one expected, but bound as we are to look to all interests, recognizing that we had a country to govern under a condition of things that was prevailing through a course of eighteen years' legislation of hon. gentlemen opposite, we felt it was our bounden duty, as statesmen, to see that while lightening the burden of taxation we were careful to preserve the best interests of the country. That, I believe, we have done. It may be that we shall be able to do more in the future than in the past in the way of economy, but as my hon. colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out, a large part of our expenditure is fixed and uncontrollable, and is due to debts incurred by hon. gentlemen opposite. As regards the smaller portion, the controllable expenditure, we hope we may be able to effect economies perhaps in a measure greater than we have accomplished up to the present.

Mr. BERGERON. What about the coal duties?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The coal duties were lowered, as were the duties on almost everything else in the tariff.

An hon. MEMBER. What about biscuits?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. An hon. gentleman says, what about biscuits. You may sometimes find in newspapers that are not careful for their reputation statements and insinuations unworthy and untrue, but when a member of Parliament ventures to insinuate here a lie that has been published in the Tory newspapers, and, I suppose, will be republished time and again, namely, that there was in the revision of the tariff an advantage given to certain lines of manufacture in which I at one time was interested, which I at one time managed—when I find an hon. member so lost to decency, then language fails me to adequately describe his conduct and keep within parliamentary bounds. All I can say is, look at the tariff and you will find that these articles were imported, in large quantities, under the preferential clause, during the past year, and will be imported much more in the future, and you will find that these articles, the duties on which were not increased in the general tariff and are greatly reduced under the preferential clause, stand in the same position as many other articles, so that instead of extra protection being given to them, the protection is greatly reduced. I never care to touch upon matters that concern a business in which I was engaged myself. I can allow newspapers that care not for their reputation to repeat and reiterate their false statements and charges, but I did not expect that a member of Parliament, who has access to the records of Parliament, would throw out an insinuation such as has been thrown at the present time.

Let me say this, in the minute or two at my disposal. I have shown how we have redeemed our pledges. We all know that certain predictions were made by hon. gentlemen opposite before the last election. We all know that predictions were made by them which we may consider as their pledges, if they were honourable men, and believed what they said. What did they promise would happen if the Liberal party came into power? They predicted that trade would stagnate. Well, Mr. Speaker, every transportation line on land and water, endorsed by every bank and clearing house, proclaims that prophecy as false. They predicted that factories would be closed and manufacturing industries crushed. To-day the thousands of factories established throughout this Dominion and the many new ones that are springing up give flat contradiction to that prediction. They predicted that our artisans and mechanics would walk the streets in vain begging for work and no work to be had. Sir, the electric lights blazing in many of the factories throughout this broad Dominion, all through the long hours of the night, declare not only that our artisans, under Liberal rule, are not seeking for work and unable to obtain it, but that they are constantly employed and that more artisans have to be found to man those factories, night as well as day, in order to keep up to the demands of trade. They contrast the promises with the performances of the Liberal party. I would place before them their own predictions and the absolute failure of these predictions, and by the unanswerable logic of facts the Liberal party, at any rate, may well be content to abide.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THE KETTLE RIVER VALLEY RAILWAY.

The House proceeded to consider amendments made in Bill (No. 26) An Act to incorporate the Kettle Valley Railway Company.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I am very sorry indeed that, owing to illness, I have not been able to follow the debate which took place in the committee and in the House on this Bill. However, I have tried to get as much information as I could, and the result of my consideration of the subject, so far, is the conclusion that this Bill should not be sanctioned by the House. A wrong impression has prevailed as to the position of the Government in this matter. I may say, at once, that the Government has come to the conclusion that it was not necessary to have a policy, as a Government, upon this question. It is an open question, and all members of this House, on our side, at any rate, may rest well assured that they are perfectly free, from the Government standpoint, to vote just as they please on this Bill.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). We always do that, anyway.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend understands me, I am sure. This is not a Government question, and, so far as the Government is concerned, every member is free to vote as he chooses. The Bill is a very plain one. Mr. Corbin and his friends are asking for the privilege of building a road that starts in American territory and has its terminal point in American territory. I have the map of the scheme before me. Sir, I have been for a number of years a member of the Railway Committee and a member of the House, and I have always understood that the policy of this House has been not to give charters to two railways covering the same ground. When we have given a charter to a railway company, and that company has proven its ability to go on with the work undertaken, we have, so far as I know, never granted a charter over the same ground.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). They are asking to do it to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have no objection to being interrupted. This is a free question, and it is well to have a free discussion. What are the facts of the case? Last year, we obtained from this Parliament a unanimous vote in favour of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. The Crow's Nest Pass Railway was considered then, and is considered now, I hope, in fact I am sure, as a link in a great railway policy. The motto of both political parties in the House is, Canada for the Canadians, as much as possible. Well, I ask the House to consider the great interest that is at stake now. We have the pledge of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that, during the coming season, they will build a railway to Boundary Creek. That corporation is in a position to carry out that pledge. Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway line is altogether on Canadian soil, and I ask the House not to lose sight of this point. Is it not safer for us to have a line of railway built on Canadian soil, under the circumstances?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). No.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. One of my hon. friends, for whom I have the greatest respect, says, "No." I ask him to weigh the question, pro and con. The map that I hold in my hand is an answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Wood). The Northport smelter is a living answer to the hon. gentleman. The Northport smelter has been located but a few steps, relatively speaking, from the Canadian boundary. Why? Because its owners desired to locate it on American territory. Is it not a fact that if we permit the building of Mr. Corbin's road, we run the greatest risk of our Canadian ores being carried over the American frontier for treatment? And what does that mean? It means the building up of towns and the building up of trade on American soil with Canadian raw material. So far, I have not been able to reconcile myself to that view of the case. I have not heard any argument which would convince me that this is a sound policy. But, I am told, we must have competition. I again call the attention of the House to what we did last year. We obtained money from Parliament to build the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and, at the same time, we obtained control of the rates on that railway. Is it fair to give competition before we have reason for it?

Mr. MACLEAN. Yes.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am told, Yes. I suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) will say the reason for that is, that we do not want any monopoly. Is that it?

Mr. MACLEAN. Partly.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. "Monopoly" is a word that has been much abused. I am bound to be my own boss in my own house—

Mr. MACLEAN. They say you are the boss.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Will my hon. friend say that it would be a monopoly to have a Canadian line on Canadian soil, to have Canadian smelters on Canadian soil? Is this a monopoly? It cannot be a monopoly, it is simply national protection to national industries. I say that there is no danger that the Canadian Pacific Railway will exact undue rates, because we have got control.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend laughs, he laughs at what he has voted for. He has a perfect right to laugh at everything that may be sound and true, but I feel that I am standing by the policy that the Liberal party has propounded; more than that, I am standing by the policy that is supported by both political parties. We have built the Canadian Pacific Railway at an expense of millions and millions of dollars. I happened to be on the other side of the House when the Canadian Pacific Railway was originated, and I am on this side now, and I am a witness of the unanimous opinion of the House in reference to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I say that in my humble opinion it would be a grave mistake if we were to-day to go back on what we have done. We have control of the railway rates, there cannot then be any danger of undue rates being exacted. The Canadian Pacific Railway have pledged themselves to give running privileges during the running season. If we find next year that another railway is necessary, it will then be time to take action. I am told that we must have competition. I am told that the Grand Trunk Railway has an interest in that scheme. Now, Sir, the Grand Trunk Railway has no better friend in this House than myself, but I am a friend of that railway only so long as it is worked in the interest of Canada, and no longer. I cannot really see what interest the Grand Trunk Railway has. I suppose there is not much more to be said.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Oh, yes; there is lots more to be said.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I see my hon. friend is impatient. He may be a wise man, I have no doubt he is, but I do not know of any man of any age who has had a monopoly of wisdom. I have not the same experience, no doubt, as he has had, still I am giving to this House the result of my careful study of this question. I may be wrong, but still I think that I am consistent with the policy of my party which, as I said a moment ago, is Canada for Canadians.

Mr. MACLEAN. I was told to-night that we would see the kettle boil, and I think we have evidence of that already. I was told that this was to be a Government measure, and that the Liberal party were committed to the policy involved in this Bill, and would stand by that policy. I was surprised to-night to hear the Minister of Public Works repudiate what I took to be the policy of the Liberal party in connection with this Kettle River, as I shall endeavour to show. Now, if there is a project before the country that offers relief to it, if there is a project before the country that offers relief to British Columbia, and offers relief to the great North-west, it is that of allowing the Grand Trunk Railway to get into that North-west. All the Grand Trunk Railway asks to-day is to be enabled to get into the North-west and British Columbia, and it proposes in this instance to get in by the Kettle River Railway. If the Government had a policy last session it was to secure improved railway facilities for the people in British Columbia. We gave last year nearly four million dollars to the Crow's Nest Pass road, and we attached a most important condition to the contract whereby that bonus or that franchise was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and what was it? In that contract there is this clause, known as clause "f":

That the Railway Committee of the Privy Council may grant running powers over the said line of railway and all its branches and connections, or any portions thereof, and all lines of railway now or hereafter owned or leased by or operated on account of the company in British Columbia south of the company's main line of railway, and the necessary use of its tracks, stations and station grounds, to any other railway company applying for such grant, upon such terms as such company may fix and determine, and according to the provisions of the Railway Act and of such other general Acts relating to railways as are from time to time passed by Parliament.

Now Parliament declared last year that the Canadian Pacific Railway was to have this franchise and this bonus only on the condition that all other railways were to have running rights over it, and were given the use of the tracks, stations and everything else. The day has come when a most important railway in Canada asks to get the use of those provisions and of those rights. I am not breaking any confidence when I say that since I raised the question the other day in this House, I have been told that the Grand Trunk Railway have to-day filed an application with this Government asking for running rights over all railways west of Lake Superior, and over this road in particular. If we gave all that money last session, nearly four million dollars, if we gave all those coal lands, and gave that franchise to the Canadian Pacific Railway, it was that the Government should have control of the rates, and furthermore, that the Government should have control of the tracks, and should give running rights over those tracks to any railway asking for it. Sir William Van Horne came to the Railway Committee only a few days ago and told that committee and the people of this country that this was a most important provision, and it did secure for this country the control over that Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and especially did it secure it because they have given running rights over it. And it is because the Grand Trunk Railway to-day are asking to be made a competitor with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and because the Grand Trunk Railway to-day is asking for admission to British Columbia, that the Canadian Pacific Railway is here to-day with all their lawyers and solicitors to try to prevent the Grand Trunk Railway from getting access into the North-west and British Columbia. Furthermore, I am told that the Minister of the Interior is doing his very best to keep the Grand Trunk Railway out of British Columbia.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Will the hon. gentleman give his authority for that statement?

Mr. MACLEAN. Well, we will see later on. I wish the hon. gentleman had been in his place—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I tell the hon. gentleman that he is talking about something, as he usually does, that he does not know anything at all about.

Mr. MACLEAN. Yes, I know all I am saying, and the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity to set himself right. Only a short time ago we were trying in this House to get the Grand Trunk Railway into the North-west to serve his province, and to remove that monopoly that he and his party complained that the North-west was under, and he was not here to say a word in favour of the admission of the Grand Trunk Railway into the North-west. I challenge him to say to-night whether he will support the Grand Trunk Railway having running rights over the Rainy River when that subsidy comes down.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes, I will support it.

Mr. MACLEAN. The hon. gentleman has made great progress.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I will do it in a business-like way, not in such a way as to kill the construction of the only road over which the Grand Trunk Railway could get in, and that is what the hon. gentleman is doing.

Mr. MACLEAN. No, I am trying to secure running rights to the Grand Trunk Railway, both by the Kettle River Company and by the Rainy River Company. The hon. gentleman is a member of the Government that voted four million dollars of the people's money for the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and they are bound to vindicate that policy of last session and to come here and stand up by any Canadian railway that desires to get into the North-west by the Kettle River Railway. Surely they are not going to abandon that policy that they said last year was in the interests of the people of Canada. Now when the greatest corporation outside the Canadian Pacific Railway declares it wants no money or aid but simply asks a franchise to get into British Columbia, the Government are bound to stand by that policy and not abandon it, as the Minister of Public Works has done to-night. It is not a free question. It is a question on which the party is committed, on which the Minister of Railways very properly informed the House that it was in the public interest that the road should be built, and if he informed the House and the Railway Committee that this enterprise was in the public interest, then the Government are committed to it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He spoke for himself.

Mr. MACLEAN. The hon. gentleman spoke as Minister of Railways, and I call upon him to stand by his declaration. If he cannot stand by that policy, then it is time for him to go out of the Government. I believe, however, that he will stand by the policy, and that he will bring his colleagues into agreement with his view. The Minister of Railways is perfectly right in taking the position assumed by him this session in respect to this Bill. It has been said that his statement was out of harmony with his declarations last year. What I understood his position to be was that he, as Minister of Railways, desired last session to open that country and secure a Canadian line there. The hon. gentleman can obtain a Canadian line into that country and have it there this year. The people of that country come here and say:

We have given large sums for the construction of a railway by the Canadian Pacific Railway; give us competition against the Canadian Pacific Railway, and allow the Grand Trunk, which is coming in from the south, to furnish us with that competition. Getting railway competition is one thing, and keeping the trade for our own people is another thing. We can attain both, but in different ways. We can get competition by giving railway franchises, and I believe you can thus secure competition in this instance. If you want to keep the trade in the country, there is a good old rule by which it can be accomplished, by the National Policy, by the tariff, and by levying export duties. We keep the trade in our country and prevent the Canadian Pacific Railway, at various points where it crosses in the United States, from taking away our trade, by the action of the National Policy, and we can keep it still further here by imposing export duties. Hon. gentlemen opposite are adopting the National Policy more and more every day, and it would be no trouble to them, after the progress they have made on the line of the National Policy, to come to this House and ask this House to place an export duty on ores and keep the trade here. This result can be accomplished by the National Policy being extended in that direction, and increased customs duties could be imposed, if they were necessary to keep the trade in Canada, and at the same time we should secure to our people railway competition. Who asks for this competition as regards British Columbia to-day? The people of Ontario, who contributed the larger portion of the $4,000,000 voted last year. It is true the merchants of Toronto, notwithstanding the fact that they were hoodooed into refraining from passing a resolution in favour of the Kettle River road, demand entrance into British Columbia by way of Kettle River. They want that competition. When members of the Toronto Board of Trade attended a meeting the other day to pass a resolution in favour of this road, two or three Canadian Pacific Railway magnates induced the committee to postpone action; but the merchants of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec are to-day in favour of the Grand Trunk gaining free entrance into British Columbia by way of the North-west. Hon. members who spoke last session in defence of the Government's Crow's Nest Pass Railway Bill laid great stress on the advantage of competition and common trackage. The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) said:

The Government will regulate that matter; I do not have the control of it personally at present. Then, we have the running powers over the new road through the Crow's Nest Pass. That is a very important item. It is a very good thing to have, and I have no doubt that the privilege will be carefully conserved in the interests of the people of Canada by the present Government, which contains among its members some business men who, when they make a contract make it on business principles and in a business way.

That hon. gentleman considered last session that this Government when voting the large sum of money and giving this franchise to the Crow's Nest Pass road would accord common running rights over the railway, and give those running rights to any road asking for it. The Grand Trunk now asks to be allowed to enter that country and enjoy those rights, but the Minister of Public Works, who is a member of the Government, says they should not obtain them. Hon. gentlemen who supported the Crow's Nest Pass road pointed out the importance of giving running rights, and yet they are here to-day opposing a road which seeks to get into that part of the country. The Canadian Pacific Railway is posing as the all-Canadian road. To-day it crosses the boundary at a number of places, everywhere when there is an opportunity to obtain trade from the United States. Does the Canadian Pacific Railway give a single concession to the Canadian merchants? They give better terms to American merchants who will visit them at Montreal and obtain their rates across the continent. They have not granted liberal terms to any merchant in this country, but in everything they have been willing to sacrifice Canadian interests in the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway. When another company comes to this House and asks permission to build a railway, it appears as if it could not obtain it. It is all very well to secure for an American road entrance into our country if we cannot get there with our own roads; but if we are there, we can protect ourselves by customs duties and export duties. This, however, is not an American road, but it is the Grand Trunk; they do not ask for any aid, but the Canadian Pacific Railway get everything. Here are members of the Government opposing legislation, and opposing a policy on which they are on record by legislation passed last session. I do not propose to detain the House any longer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN. I see the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) in his seat, and I should like to hear him voice the opinion of his city on this question, and say whether the people of Ontario, in view of the money they have given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, not only in the North-west, but in British Columbia, are willing when a great railway company like the Grand Trunk simply asks for permission to get into the North-west, that the company should be prevented by members of the Government, who last session committed themselves to grant running rights over the very railway which they now seek to deny. I hope the Minister of Railways will maintain his position, and I can tell him that the Grand Trunk are in earnest and have placed on record their desire and intention to get into the North-west. The Grand Trunk know that the moment they can touch the Crow's Nest Pass road they will have secured entrance into the North-west, for they can easily reach Lethbridge within six months. Let the Grand Trunk Railway reach that point, and they will soon get eastward to Port Arthur by some route or other. All we have to do in order to solve the transportation problem as regards the North-west is to allow a certain amount of freedom. Liberals are, however, blocking freedom and competition.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN. Especially the hon. gentleman who professes to be a Liberal, but who is a restrictionist, and who has no desire that British Columbia shall have the benefit of railway competition. I take issue with him on that point. British Columbia, the North-west and Manitoba are looking to-day to the time when the Grand Trunk will enter those portions of the Dominion, and that day will be the first time in the history of this country when the Canadian Pacific Railway will meet with a rival that will compel it to do justice to the Canadian people.

Mr. HUGHES. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) appears to be very much interested in allowing the Grand Trunk to secure an entrance into the province of British Columbia, and he has dilated at great length on the necessity of allowing that road to reach Lethbridge. It is an easy matter for the Grand Trunk to reach Lethbridge to-day. That road could run directly from the United States and reach the Crow's Nest Pass, and then go down to the territory under discussion in this Bill. I fail to see what great benefit can accrue to the Grand Trunk by going over the twenty or thirty miles of this little railway which will be in Canada, seeing that they can reach the district over the Crow's Nest Pass Railway from Lethbridge. But this is not my main objection to this Bill. What I take exception to is, that this railway starts from American territory, enters Canadian territory, then skirts along the border for five or six miles, then runs back into United States territory, and then comes again into Canada, tapping the mines in the Greenwood Valley. Its advocates do not claim that there will be over 30 miles of it in Canada, and yet they have the assurance to come here and ask permission to build branch lines 20 miles long in any direction from these little spurs. I have told them, that if they will build their railway entirely in Canadian territory, I will support it. They tell us that, to do that, they will have to cross ranges of mountains. Well, others have to do that, and, in doing so, they would, no doubt, open up rich mineral districts which would be of great value to Canada, whereas the road they now propose to construct will not confer any benefit on Canada, but will tap Canadian mines and bring the ores to the smelter at Northport. It has been already pointed out how, as soon as the Bill passed the committee, its promoters, supposing that it had passed the House, telegraphed in haste to the Pacific Coast, and caused rejoicing in Spokane and other American towns along the border, showing that the object was to take Canadian ores to Northport and to make Canadian territory the back-yard. I will support the Bill, if its promoters will make this an all-Canadian road, but I will oppose it in its present form.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, it has given me particular pleasure to hear the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) address the House to-night, because, we all know, that he has not been very well lately; and when he talks of Canada for the Canadians, I recognize the old Conservative training under which the hon. gentleman was brought up, and I am perfectly willing to admit that, when he was serving a different party, he did it in a manner altogether in the interest of Canada. I agree with him to-night, as I agreed with him before he left the old flag and the old policy, and, if I may say so, the old man. At that time we believed that the building up of Canada depended on keeping Canada for the Canadians. In supporting the Kettle River Railway Bill to-night, I consider that I am helping to keep Canada for Canadians. I want to know how any hon. gentleman who takes an interest in Canada, can stand up to-night and say that, to enable the Grand Trunk to get into that country, would be hurtful to the interests of Canada. We know that the development of the mines of that country is dependent upon obtaining the cheapest possible transport for the ores. I would be the last man to do anything to prevent the Canadian Pacific Railway going into that country; but where is the cry of Canada for the Canadians, if you refuse the same privilege to the Grand Trunk, the pioneer railway of this country, when miners tell you that it is imperative for the successful development of the country that the low-grade ores produced there should be transported at the lowest possible rates? That is the reason I support this Bill to-night. Before that country was much known to the rest of Canada, Mr. Corbin and his friends went into that country and spent $1,600,000 to open it up. They believed in the future of the mining interests of that region, and they spent their money freely to promote its development. Is it reasonable, then, after they have shown this interest in our country, that we should turn our backs upon those people and say to them: You cannot come into this country, because the Canadian Pacific Railway is opposed to your scheme? I am one of those who took an interest in the building up of the Canadian Pacific Railway in Canada, and I think nobody can ever accuse me of having opposed the construction of that great work, which has so greatly developed the interests of Canada and made Canada what it is to-day. But, because we were successful in securing the co-operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway syndicate to build that railway, I, as a Canadian, believing in the future of Canada, am not prepared to say that we must halt now, and place the great undeveloped mineral lands of Canada in the hands of a monopoly. I do not want to keep the Canadian Pacific Railway out of that country, but I want to see the Grand Trunk have access to it, and I want to see those who believe in the future of Canada encouraged to invest their money, as Mr. Corbin has done, to develop the great mineral interests of the country.

The hon. Minister of Public Works has said that we wanted to keep that country in the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, from the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway were building the Crow's Nest Pass and were going to build a railway into that country, which would furnish all the service required. Those who were present in the Committee on Railways and Canals know perfectly well what the discussion there disclosed. We were told there that the Canadian Pacific Railway were going to build a railway equal to that which they built across the continent. Sir, the miner may be called upon to face this difficulty. This Canadian Pacific Railway may go to the Government and say: The building of our line cost us $25,000 or $50,000 a mile, how can we reduce the rates to accommodate the miners? If Canada wishes to be true to the great mining interest of that region, she will allow another railway to enter that country and compete against the Canadian Pacific Railway. She will allow the Corbin Railway, which will be the line on which the Grand Trunk Railway will get a foothold, to obtain this charter, and thus by competition force the Canadian Pacific Railway to charge reasonable rates. It is impossible for me to understand how in this free Parliament of Canada a voice can be raised to prevent a great corporation like the Grand Trunk Railway getting a foothold in that country. It is perfectly right that the Canadian Pacific Railway should have the same privileges as the Grand Trunk Railway or any other company, but if the great mineral interests of Canada are to be developed, that country must have railway competition and thus have facilities for the transportation of its ores at the cheapest possible rate from the mines to the smelter. Standing by the principle of Canada for the Canadians, as I have always done, standing up in the interests of what I believe will be a new era in the history of Canada, anxious to further the development of the undeveloped wealth in that part of the country. I propose to do all in my power to obtain for the Boundary Creek country all the railway facilities which are indispensable to its successful development. I am told that this new line is going to take away from Canada the trade and business which rightly belong to our people. I say it will not, for this reason. As my hon. friend from York has said, the Government of this country has got in its own hands the means of preventing the business of Canada from being removed into the United States. The Government has control of the tariff, it has all the means within its own hands of protecting Canada against the invasion of foreign goods; and in this district, which the greatest experts of the world believe is going to be one of the wealthiest mineral centres in the globe, it is our duty to let private enterprise have every facility to invest its funds in the building of railways and in every other means calculated to develop it. Sir, I am in favour of allowing every railway access into that country, and I think that in doing so I am serving the best interests of Canada.

Mr. OLIVER. I have no desire to put off taking a vote on this question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. But you are doing it.

Mr. OLIVER. I have no desire to do so if the House, in my humble estimation, properly understands the importance of the question on which it is called to vote. This is more than a question of building or not building thirty miles of railway. It is a question which, at one time, agitated the province of Manitoba, and with regard to which a rebellion was nearly caused in that province. It is the same question that it cost this country $15,000,000 to settle with regard to the North-west; and to-day this House is asked to absolutely give away for nothing what cost us so much in times past. I do not think that so far as the House appreciates the gravity of the situation. This is an attempt to re-establish by precedent, on the authority of this House, the monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway in western Canada—to establish that monopoly which was the principal objection on the part of the Liberals to the original Canadian Pacific charter; to repeat that provision which was the most objectionable one in that charter, and which the very Government that made the bargain had to buy out at a cost of $15,000,000. Surely this new Parliament, under a new Government, will not perpetuate, of its own motion, for no consideration whatever a condition of affairs that it cost the country already $15,000,000 to get rid of it. It is a question of more than millions. It is a question as to whether the country can be kept under the Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly or not.

That is the question before the House and the one on which as a resident of the North-west for many years I desire to speak. I say that however great have been the advantages of railway construction and railway extension in that region, the disadvantages of railway monopoly have to a very large extent destroyed those other advantages which cost this country so many millions of dollars. If the merchants, manufacturers and business men of this eastern country have not received those returns in extended trade in the North-west which they had the right to expect, they can thank the monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway. In British Columbia there is as great necessity for railway competition as there has been in the North-west. There is greater necessity, if that were possible, and I ask this House to pause and reflect before adopting a policy which will be one of absolute railway monopoly in British Columbia and thereby in the North-west Territories as well.

An hon. MEMBER. That will do.

Mr. OLIVER. No, it will not do. I wish to speak of the effect of competition in regard to the development of the Kootenay country, in which the constituency I represent is equally interested with the British Columbia coast cities, for which some gentlemen speak so loudly. Let me give one instance in regard to the development of the trade in the Kootenay country. There is a district there, known as the Sandon district, in which silver-mining is carried on. It is in that district that the greater part of the products sent from Alberta to the Kootenay are sold. There are in that district two railways, the Kaslo and Slocan and the Canadian Pacific under the name of the Nakusp and Slocan. Both of these were built into the Sandon country for the purpose of carrying the ores of that country to the smelters of the United States. The Kaslo and Slocan is practically a connection of the Great Northern. It is only by the competition of these two railways in carrying the ores to the smelters that the Sandon district is a paying proposition. The ores are chiefly carried, I believe, to Omaha, by both—

Mr. SPEAKER. The time for consideration of private Bills having expired, the House will resume the consideration of the Budget.

WAYS AND MEANS--THE BUDGET.

Mr. WALLACE. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the House was delighted this afternoon to find that the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), after a couple of years' resting, had recovered his usual vigour of utterance. I was much interested in a pleasant story he told about an English Conservative member of Parliament, who stated that in England it was jaw, jaw, jaw all the time. Now, if that English member of Parliament had been in this Chamber this afternoon, or if he had been within a mile of this Chamber this afternoon, he would have said there was jaw, jaw, jaw in Canada as well. I am quite sure that the statements made by the Minister of Customs were as utterly reckless and void of accuracy as they were loud and bombastic in utterance. They were a tissue of—shall I call them misrepresentations? I think that is quite parliamentary. Some of his statements call for an answer, and I shall endeavour to reply to some of them, at any rate, as briefly as I can. The hon. gentleman says that we insinuate base and cowardly charges against some of his colleagues. He did not give their names, but he looked upon the gentleman on his right, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), and pictured him as an angel of light. Well, that is not the opinion that his political friends have of that hon. gentleman. We read in the daily papers that down in Montreal, which, I believe, is the home of the Minister of Public Works, there are various Liberal clubs. One of these is called the Club Letellier, a good Liberal name. Its members have been spending their time pitching into the Minister of Public Works, and in no measured terms either. Then, there is the Geoffrion Club, another Liberal organization, named after one of the hon. gentleman's colleagues, whose members have been equally vigorous in attacking the Minister of Public Works. Then, there is the Bickerdike Club, named after a prominent Liberal, whose members have been also employed, not only in opposing, but in exposing, the hon. Minister. And I remember reading a speech, the other day, by Mr. Lebeuf, a very vigorous speech, which I have no doubt the Minister of Public Works has read.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It was very long.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, and very pointed; and it does not spare the Minister of Public Works, but accuses him of every political crime in the calendar, and proves them pretty well, I think. But there is still another club there, and it does not abuse the hon. Minister, for every member of it is an ardent friend of his. It is called the Tarte Club. There is nothing too good for the members of the Tarte Club, I am told, just as the Prime Minister said nothing was too good for Mr. Tarte himself.

Now, at the winding up of the speech of the Minister of Customs, he stated, as he has stated in Parliament before and on the hustings many times, that the Tories predicted all sorts of calamities if the Liberals should get into power. Well, I suppose we must plead guilty to that charge. And why did we make these predictions? Because we believed that these gentlemen were honest in proclaiming their programme, and that they would carry out in office what they had pledged themselves to when in Opposition. Have they done so? Not in a single instance have they carried out their programme. I challenge the hon. gentleman to state one single item of their programme in Opposition that they have carried into effect to-day, though their third session in office has nearly elapsed. Why, we all know what their programme was, for we read their speeches and the resolutions that were passed in the Liberal conventions. I have here the speech of an hon. gentleman who said:

In a farming community such as this we should be allowed to import agricultural implements free of duty. I know from personal experience, especially from what I saw in Manitoba, that the manufacturers in Canada do not take advantage of the high duty to improve their goods for the benefit of the people of Canada. They take that 30 per cent and put it in their own pockets, and that is the main result of the National Policy.

The gentleman who made that speech is now sitting on the Treasury benches.

Mr. SPROULE. Name.

Mr. WALLACE. That is the speech of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). What has he to say to-day? That he was overruled in the Cabinet, or that he has changed his views? Why, these hon. gentlemen, when they got into power, not satisfied with the protection which had been given to the manufacturers of agricultural implements by the Conservative protectionist Government, actually gave them further protection. They left the duty of 20 per cent on the implements untouched, and reduced the duties on their raw material.

An hon. MEMBER. Biscuits.

Mr. WALLACE. Just as in the case of biscuits where they have given more protection by reducing the duty on their raw material. It is true that now they have increased the duty somewhat, but as to the working out of that, the Minister of Finance is not able to express an opinion. There is another member of the Government who also, in addressing the electors, laid down what the programme of the party was to be. The present Prime Minister of Canada made a speech in Halifax in which he said, as reported by the Halifax "Chronicle":

In 1878, on the return of the Conservative party to power, flour was taxed 50 cents per barrel. Last year the tax was increased to 75 cents per barrel. What is the reason for that tax, and what is its effect? I suppose that every Conservative will agree that though we must pay taxes and levy a revenue, if there is an article which should be exempted from taxation it is bread. That is an article which should only be taxed when a country is driven to defend its territory and its honour. We in Canada are not in that position. If we were, every one would be willing to sacrifice his life if necessary. The tax cannot be necessary for the purpose of revenue, for we have more revenue than we want. If it is not for revenue, what is it for? The intention is to prevent American flour from coming into the country, to force you to buy Canadian flour, to make the article scarce, to prevent competition, and to make bread dear.

These were the evil results of putting a tax on flour.

Is that not the reason? In this province you do not grow wheat, and in our province we are obliged to import our flour; but in Ontario and Manitoba wheat is grown, and it is to put money into the pockets of the farmers of Ontario and of Manitoba at the expense of the people of Quebec and of this province that that tax is being imposed.

That was the statement made by the present Prime Minister. What is their position to-day? Why, Sir, 12 cents a bushel on wheat and 60 cents a barrel on flour is the tariff they have got this House to adopt. He made another speech in which he said, with regard to the question of coal:

You produce large quantities of coal in this province; in Ontario and Quebec we do not produce coal, but we have a cold climate and must have coal. In order to compel us to get it from Nova Scotia, and in order to put a profit into the pockets of the coal owners of this province a duty of 50 cents a ton has been put on the American coal that lies within a stone's throw of our borders. This may be politics, but it is not patriotism.

How does the Government stand to-day? They have increased the duty from 50 cents to 53 cents per ton. Of course, 50 cents was robbery, was unjustifiable and unpatriotic, but 53 cents is exactly right. What have these gentlemen to say as to that? What have they to say as to their broken pledges, as to their utter disregard of the promises they made to the electors when seeking their suffrages? So I say that when the Minister of Customs taunts us with a non-fulfilment of our predictions, these statements are an answer to him, because they prove that when these gentlemen were in Opposition they gave utterances to statements and to a policy which they were either dishonest in stating at that time, or, after they came into power, they were afraid to put their theories into practice.

Now, Sir, I have some remarks to make with regard to that elaborate statement made by the Minister of Customs with regard to the effect of the preferential tariff, and how it was going to reduce the prices of articles. Sir, I have this to say of it, that a more dishonest statement was never presented to this House, it is a statement misleading and untrue. The Minister of Customs said it was prepared for him. Well, I do not know or care who prepared it, but I shall prove that it is a dishonest and misleading statement. He starts out with saying that he is going to give a list of articles upon which there has been a decrease of duty under the new tariff. In that statement he quotes coal. There was a specific duty upon that, but he says there was 4 per cent of a decrease in the duty paid on importations; on cotton manufactures there was 6½ per cent of a decrease; gloves, 5 7-10ths per cent; hats and caps, 5½ per cent. I asked the hon. gentleman, was that decrease a reduction of the percentage of the cost of the article, or of the percentage of the duty itself. The hon. gentleman did not reply. Whether he could not reply, or whether he did not desire to, he knows best himself. Then he turns over the leaf and says: I will give you a list of 107 articles on which there have been reductions of some enormous percentages. He says: Here is a reduction on an article of 20 per cent, here is a reduction on an article of 46 per cent. Why, Sir, what is the truth of the matter? Take, for example, paris green, the first item that strikes my eye. The old duty was 10 per cent under the preferential tariff as applied to Great Britain, he says it will be 7½ per cent, that the duty paid for British importations under the new tariff after the 1st of July, will show a reduction of 25 per cent. Why, I say it is a reduction of 2½ per cent, just one-tenth of what he says. A more misleading statement never was presented to this House. Then he goes on to say that on bricks the old duty was 20 per cent, under the preferential tariff from Britain it will be 15 per cent, which, he says, is a reduction of 25 per cent. I say it is a reduction of 5 per cent and nothing more. The entire statement is misleading, whether it was intended to be or not, and is untrue as well.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). The statement is quite correct. What is the difference between $10 and $7.50? Is it not 25 per cent?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the hon. gentleman must take his hat off when he addresses the House.

Mr. WALLACE. No matter, there is nothing underneath it. Then the hon. gentleman says buckthorn fencing was 15 per cent, under this preferential it would be 11½ per cent, and he says there is 25 per cent reduction. I say it is 3½ per cent reduction, no more and no less. On one hundred dollar's worth of importations, under the old they paid $15 duty, under the new they pay $11.25 duty, or 3½ per cent on the one hundred dollars less duty. That is the sum and substance of it. Then there is another article, mushroom spawn. He says they were 20 per cent and they made that free, a reduction of 100 per cent. I would like to know how they could reduce it 100 per cent.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Because it was put on the free list.

Mr. WALLACE. The people will be delighted that mushroom spawn is put on the free list, and that is perhaps the most important reduction submitted for our consideration. Every farmer in this country will be delighted to hear that mushroom spawn is reduced 100 per cent. They can get it free.

Mr. BERGERON. On toast.

Mr. WALLACE. Here are files and articles the farmers use. The hon. gentleman did not tell the House that as regards agricultural implements nine-tenths of the articles remain the same to-day as they were before, that is 20 per cent. The reduction of one-fourth of the duty in favour of Great Britain will not affect the price of those articles one cent to the farmers. Take binders, mowers, ploughs and the whole list; they are not coming here from Great Britain, our opposition is the United States. We are sending them to Great Britain. The hon. gentleman said that there are a lot of other articles which Great Britain sends to us, and here he hands us a list of 107 articles used by farmers and largely imported from Great Britain. The hon. gentleman was bound to give us the information he had under his hand as to how many of those articles come from Great Britain and how many from the United States, so that we might be able to judge whether he was presenting the case fairly to the House. But the hon. gentleman has not done so. I have prepared a brief statement during the short time at my disposal, and I will read some of the returns of the articles quoted by the hon. gentleman, showing that as regards the articles so quoted when he said the duty was 35 per cent under the tariff, and that under the one-fourth reduction the rate would be 18½ per cent, the farmers will receive no benefit. Those articles are produced principally in the United States; the Americans are our competitors, and practically they are our only competitors. The hon. gentleman did not tell the House that fact. He stated that those articles are imported largely from Great Britain. Why did he not tell the House what quantities were imported from Great Britain and the United States respectively. Take the first article of agricultural implements. Of scythes there was imported from Great Britain $2,572 worth, and $15,200 worth from the United States. The hon. gentleman did not tell the House that those articles were imported almost entirely from the United States. Of post hole diggers and agricultural tools, the importation from Great Britain last year was of the value of $1,519; from the United States $38,000. The hon. gentleman had these facts under his hand, but he appears to have kept them back. About twenty-five times as much in value came in from the United States as from Great Britain. If the hon. gentleman takes another quarter off the duty our competitors will still be the United States, and Great Britain is not in the race. Shovels: the value from Great Britain was $1,601; from the United State, $20,340. Why did the hon.

gentleman not tell the House that fact. Clothes wringers: the value from Great Britain was $14; from the United States, $6,804. Yet the hon. gentleman talks of the benefits the Government are conferring on English manufacturers. The hon. gentleman said a short time ago when the leader of the Opposition stated that the preferential tariff was not understandable, that "all the papers in the United Kingdom everywhere have understood this tariff and understanding it have appreciated and admired it." Did they understand it, and do they know that there is a preference of one-fourth of the duties given on clothes wringers, of which $14 worth was imported last year from Great Britain as compared with $6,804 in value from the United States. Next we have farmers' pronged forks: from Great Britain there came the value of $3; from the United States, $8,065.

An hon. MEMBER. What percentage?

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. Minister of Customs is a good hand at reckoning percentages, and no doubt he will do so. Then there were of pumps imported from Great Britain the value of $1,085; from the United States, $85,506. Yet the hon. gentleman says, look at the immense benefits we are conferring on the manufacturers of England. It is an utter delusion. These goods will be made in Canada or in the United States; there will be no competition from Great Britain, and the figures show it. Pails, washtubs and so forth: from Great Britain the value of $82; from the United States, $13,545. Furniture from Great Britain the value of $26,559; from the United States, $249,754, or more than nine times as much. So the list goes on. I have not time to read all the figures, but no doubt these facts will be sufficient to show the House the true state of the case.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Give us woollens and cottons.

Mr. WALLACE. As regards woollens and cottons, I will speak of them a little later, and I will be able to demonstrate, that hon. gentlemen opposite, if they get their own way with respect to this matter, will destroy the woollen industry and badly cripple the cotton industry as well. There was to be an enormous reduction in price. But hon. gentlemen have increased the duty on cleaned rice. I have here a statement which I have received through the courtesy of the Minister of Customs; it is a statement of the imports for six months of the year 1896 and the corresponding six months of the year 1897. In the six months of 1896 there was imported $66,000 worth of rice, on which a duty was paid of $37,000, and in the six months of 1897 there was imported $147,000 worth, on which a duty was paid of $83,000. The duty in 1896 was 56 per cent, and in 1897 55½ per cent, notwithstanding the fact that there was a 12½ per cent reduction, not only for Great Britain, but for all the British possessions, including Burma and the other countries from which rice comes. Next year rice will not come from these countries at the same rate, because we are informed that British India will not be included in the preferential rate. Therefore, it is admitted that these goods have come in this year at a lower rate than they will be admitted at next year. It is the same with regard to all the other articles. On wood screws the duty was 35 per cent, and it is now 26¼ per cent, which the hon. gentleman says is a reduction of 25 per cent. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is a reduction of just about one-third of that—a reduction of 8¾ per cent. The duty on straw board was reduced from 25 per cent to 18¼ per cent, a reduction of 6¼ per cent; and yet the hon. gentleman makes it a reduction of 25 per cent. With regard to small agricultural implements, he claims a reduction of 46 per cent. Even with the tariff at the preferential rate, it would only be a reduction of 16¼ per cent; but, as a matter of fact, it is only 10 per cent reduction.

Hon. gentlemen say that a reduction in the duty means a decrease in price to the consumer. Does it, Mr. Speaker? I would like to ask these hon. gentlemen where they get their proofs of that. I will quote to them some figures which, I think, will entirely disprove their statement. You know that some years ago the Government of that day abolished the duty of 50 cents per ton on anthracite coal. It is a matter of fact that can be verified, and I make the statement because I have watched the course of events ever since, that the consumer never got one farthing of advantage from that reduction of duty. The transportation companies or the mine-owners, or both put together, have kept up the prices, so that they are higher to-day than they were when the duty was on. They have not reduced the price because the duty was taken off, and it will be the same with regard to other articles.

The hon. gentleman boasted that they had reduced the duty 100 per cent on binder twine. Well, Sir, I have a statement here, which I present as an accurate statement, showing that binder twine was sold by the Hobbs Company in 1897 as follows: Sisal, $5.25; standard, $5.50; and manilla, $6.25.

Mr. TAYLOR. And they got it at $4.

Mr. WALLACE. And the developments of the Public Accounts Committee showed that they got it at $4 from the Government of Canada. The Minister of Customs told us that 100 per cent was taken off the duty. You would think the farmers would get their binder twine for nothing. What are the facts? Here is the price list for 1898; Sisal, $5.75 against $5.25 when there was a duty on it; standard, which was $5.50 last year, is $6.25 this year, or 75 cents per hundred pounds dearer than it was when the duty was on it; manilla, which was $6.25 last year, is this year $6.87.

What does that show? It shows that, though the Government have taken off the duty, they have destroyed a Canadian industry without a single reason for doing so, because I say that if the farmer needs protection—and he does, and he gets it in abundance, and hon. gentlemen opposite are afraid to touch one single item of that protection, except one which I will refer to later—and if the manufacturers of other lines of goods are entitled to protective duties, then I say the manufacturers of binder twine are equally entitled to protection from the Government of Canada. They have destroyed a Canadian industry without cause, and the farmer is paying from 50 cents to $1 per hundred pounds more for binder twine than he was when there was a duty on it. The result that will inevitably follow will be that the American manufacturers, who have a combination, will raise the price as soon as they have destroyed the competition here. That is the history of American manufacturers, and it will continue to be so if we permit them to exploit in Canada and take possession of Canadian industries. The men who made binder twine have had to go to the United States to seek employment. It is an utterly indefensible proceeding, for the benefit of American manufacturers, and to the injury of the Canadian farmers.

Barbed wire was sold last year at 2½ cents a pound. This year, although the duty has been taken off or reduced 100 per cent, as the Minister of Customs tells us, the price is still fixed at 2½ cents a pound. The farmer does not get one bit of advantage, while the country loses the duty and the manufactures of this country are destroyed, and the workmen have to cross the line to seek employment which is denied them at home.

The Minister of Customs told us with a great flourish of trumpets that they had paid out for a half year $521,000 under this preferential tariff. To whom did they pay it? To people they intended to pay it to? Nothing of the kind. The present tariff law denies that privilege to nineteen-twentieths of the countries. They paid it out under a mistake; they blundered. I do not know how much of it would belong to Great Britain, and how much to other countries. Perhaps the Minister of Customs can tell us.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It was not paid out. It was that much reduction on the rate of duty, and the refunds that were paid on claims that came in under the reciprocal tariff.

Mr. WALLACE. The refund is paying out, I should think. You collected the duty and then the Government had to pay it back, because they collected it erroneously. The Minister of Customs refunded it to the parties who had paid it.

Mr. WALLACE. Why did the hon. gentleman say it was not paid out?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It would not have been paid out if the goods had been correctly entered.

Mr. WALLACE. That is, if the Government had done their duty, it would not have been paid, but it was paid because they did not.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not know that I can explain it so as to make it clear to an hon. gentleman who says that if an article is charged 15 per cent duty, and you then transfer it to the free list, you are only making a reduction of 15 per cent on the duty.

Mr. WALLACE. If on $100 worth of importation, the duty is 15 per cent, and you throw off 15 per cent, that 15 per cent which you throw off amounts to $15. You do not give $100 back, but only $15. The hon. gentleman thinks he is giving $100 back, but he does not. He has been refunding so liberally that he does not know whether he is giving back the principle or the interest. Hon. gentlemen laugh. It is very laughable, is it not, Mr. Speaker? The hon. gentleman has not answered my question as to how much of that $521,000 went to Great Britain—because he told us there was an abatement of that amount—and how much went to other countries.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have not the exact information under my hands. I suppose the hon. gentleman means how much went to other countries that shared in the preferential clause. I have not that under my hands at present, but, of course, he knows, from his knowledge of the Customs Department and of trade generally, that the great bulk of it would be an abatement of the duties on goods from Great Britain.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not so sure of that. They tell me to-day, and I know it is true, that German agents are going through this country selling goods that will benefit by the full reduction of 25 per cent between the first of July and the first of August. These goods are to be delivered here in July, and will get the benefit of that 25 per cent reduction. After the first of August they will not be entitled to it, but they are selling millions of dollars worth of goods for delivery in July, and it was never intended by this Parliament that German goods should be entitled to this reduction at all. But that is just due to the blunder of hon. gentlemen opposite, who would not take the views of the Opposition with regard to that matter.

Now we come to the speeches on the Budget themselves. The statements made by hon. gentlemen so far have been more remarkable for what they did not contain than for what they did contain. Why, there is the very important question of the duty on lumber. Parliament passed an Act last session giving the Government the power, if the Americans placed a duty on lumber, to put a corresponding duty on lumber of $2 per thousand feet. The American duty is $2 per thousand feet, and on lumber tongued, planed and grooved the duty reaches as high as $3.50 per thousand feet. What have the Government done with regard to that power which they received? They have not told us what conclusion they have come to. We are told that they are a business Government, attending to business all the time. I very much doubt it from what we saw to-night. We saw one Minister getting up on an important question of public policy—the question of the right of railways from a foreign country to come into Canada—and making a speech strongly in favour of allowing that right, and another Minister making a speech as violently opposed to it. I think that in a great question of that kind, the Government should have a policy, and should come down to this House as a unit. But we are told that this is the outcome of quarrels inside the closed doors, and that the gentlemen who aired themselves on the question settled their difficulties in Parliament when they could not settle them in the Cabinet. I think we are entitled to a statement from the Government with regard to the duty on lumber and with regard to the export duty on logs. They received the power last year to put an export duty on logs if the American Government put a duty on lumber. The American Government did put a duty on Canadian lumber. What has become of that law which these hon. gentlemen placed on the Statute-book a year ago. They have to-day no statement to make on that point. The Ministers of Finance and Trade and Commerce have made no declaration with regard to that matter, and we are entitled at this stage to know what the Government propose to do.

Then there is another matter. We know that negotiations were proceeding during the whole of last summer, fall and winter with regard to additional subsidies to the provinces of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and probably to other provinces as well. We ought to have a definite statement on that subject. Why have the Government not come down with one? If they are going to grant additional subsidies to those provinces, why have they not come down with a statement, or why, when those different provinces are looking after this matter, does the Government, in its financial statement, not say we are unable or unwilling to and refuse to give additional subsidies to the provinces. Why do they not come with a statement of that kind and relieve the country and relieve those provinces from the uncertainty under which they are labouring. If it is the intention of the Government to supply these additional subsidies, it was their bounden duty to inform the House of it in the Budget speech.

There is another matter and that is the coolness of the Government in assuming credit for everything to themselves. If there are prosperous times in this country, if the mining interests are booming, that is all due, according to the Minister of Customs at any rate—the others were a little more modest—to the administration of this Government. Why, they never moved their hand in these matters. They are not entitled to one particle of credit, because they have done absolutely nothing to promote the mining interests and industries of this country. But if the fisheries interest has improved, if the lumber interest has improved, it is not due to any action of the Government. In fact their policy has been injurious to the lumber interest of the country, and the Government ought to take the House and the country into their confidence now and tell us what they propose to do. But they have had good example for taking credit to themselves for everything. For do we not know that the Prime Minister of Canada himself, in a speech which he made in Montreal, and in another which he made in Toronto, distinctly took credit to himself for everything that had occurred within the last few years, even before he came into power? Why, he stated, in the city of Montreal, that it was found impossible for one colony to have a treaty with another colony. I protested against that, said he, and I had the law changed. Did the hon. gentleman know that that was done years before he came into power? Did he know that that was the outcome of the Ottawa Conference, at which a resolution was passed, demanding that Great Britain should give the colonies power to make treaties among themselves? The British Parliament, in response to that request, did give the colonies that power. And yet the hon. Prime Minister claimed credit for that, when addressing a meeting in Montreal. Another thing he said was, that the transportation problem was the great problem of the future, and that, if food could be carried cheaply from this country, they would be delivered cheaply in Liverpool, and so that we could control the trade of the English market. And he said:

With that object in view, we have commenced to deepen the canals, and it is, I am sure, an operation which must be welcomed in every part of Canada.

Why, you know, Mr. Speaker, for you have been in Parliament a long time, that millions of dollars had been voted every year for twenty years for the purpose of deepening the canals. The plan was to make a 14 foot canal system throughout, and the work was nearly completed when these hon. gentlemen came into power. It only required a year or two for its completion. The work was started by Mr. Mackenzie, more than twenty years ago. "We have commenced deepening the canals," said the hon. gentleman. Why, he was only carrying out the plan of a 14-foot system, which had already nearly been completed, but which could not be brought into use until the last link in the chain was finished.

Another statement that he made at the meeting in the city of Montreal was, that he had made Canada a nation—as though he had done it by the waving of a magic wand. Now, I do not believe that more unfair or more ungenerous statements could be made by a public man—unfair to every other colony of the British Empire. In Montreal the hon. gentleman said :

I was in Paris, in the land of my ancestors, when the telegraph wires flashed the news that England had denounced the treaties which she had maintained for twenty years and more with Germany and Belgium. What was Canada before that day? On the continent of Europe, what was it—in France, in Germany, and everywhere else? Simply a name, simply a blotch on the map, and nothing more. But when the day came that at the instance of Canada,—

At the instance of Canada, mind you.

—England, a great nation, denounced her treaties with Germany and Belgium, and signed to the German Zollverein and to the Belgium Kingdom that twelve months hence those treaties would cease, on that day I felt a proud citizen, because on that day my dreams were realized, and Canada became a factor among the nations of the earth.

What are the facts with regard to that matter? At a conference of the colonial Premiers, at a conference at which there were ten other premiers beside Sir Wilfrid Laurier, held on the 4th June, 1897, in the city of London, Mr. Chamberlain delivered an address, in the course of which he said :

Her Majesty's Government desires to know from the colonies whether, so far as they are concerned, if it be found that the arrangements proposed by Canada are inconsistent with the conditions of these treaties, they desire that these treaties shall be denounced. If that be the unanimous wish of the colonies, after considering the effect of that denunciation upon them, as well as upon us, because they also are concerned in the arrangements which are made by these treaties, then all I can say at the present time is that Her Majesty's Government will most earnestly consider such a recommendation from the colonies and will give to it the favourable regard which such a memorial deserves.

Well, Sir, in pursuance of that invitation from Mr. Chamberlain, the conference passed a resolution, in the following terms :—

That the Premiers of the self-governing colonies unanimously and earnestly recommend the denunciation at the earliest convenient time, of any treaties which now hamper the commercial relations between Great Britain and her colonies

There was the resolution passed at a meeting of the representatives of eleven distinct colonies of Great Britain. And yet, Sir, the Prime Minister of Canada coolly takes to himself the whole credit for it. I say, it is ungenerous and unfair—

An hon. MEMBER. And untrue.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, and untrue. Now, after the Canadian Prime Minister had ostentatiously refused to ask for a preferential treatment for colonial products in the British market, he made the excuse, in Toronto, that perhaps he was asking for too much, and was trying to delude the British statesmen. Why, there never was a greater injury done to Canadian interests than that done by the Prime Minister on that occasion. What does Mr. Chamberlain say? He made a speech the other day, which, the papers say, was one of the most important he ever delivered. He invites Canada and the other colonies to take the initiative to ask for what they want, and says that Britain will meet them more than half way. I will read only one or two extracts from his speech, as it appears in the Toronto papers of Saturday last :

There is another duty which, I think, is incumbent upon the British Government, and that is to draw closer to our colonies, to the sister nations of our race across the seas, and to seek in our own family the strength and support which we shall never find from foreign nations.

Again, he says :

What was it that struck every intelligent impartial observer? It was the growth of an over-mastering and a universal desire in favour of closer union. * * * Our policy is to bind the colonies closer to us by all means in our power, and, if not now, yet to pave the way for a future union which will be closer than anything that is now practicable. We shall not attempt—that would be foolish—we shall not attempt to put pressure upon our colonies to go one step further than they themselves desire to go. It is not for us to take the initiative. We would rather follow the lead; but what I think we have already accomplished is to convince them that wherever they live, however far their homes may be from the centre and from the motherland, we, at any rate, are prepared to meet them more than half-way in any approach which they may make to us, in any desire which they may express for their closer union. * * * In what form I know not—it would be foolish to attempt to predict. It may be in the shape of a commercial union, of the Imperial Zollverein, which I do not think to be so absurd as do some political economists. * * * But in whatever way it may be presented to us, we shall not be deterred either by the economic pedantries or the selfishness which is a virtue with some politicians, from giving favourable consideration to any proposals which our brethren across the seas may make to us. And in such a consideration I, for one, do not believe the English people will keep a strict account of profit and loss—that they will seek to be assured of a present pecuniary gain in return for so much concession on their part. * * * I have endeavoured to speak to you, and perhaps to indicate and suggest even more than I stated, about the policy which we think it right to pursue in reference to our colonial system, and to the attacks which are being made upon it. * * * We shall try to earn the confidence of our colonial fellow-subjects by making their interests our own.

In face of that speech the Minister of Finance told us the other day that Great Britain was wedded to the abolition of the corn laws, that they would never listen for a moment to a proposal to give a preference in their markets to the products of Canada or of any other British colonies.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I did not say they never would.

Mr. WALLACE. No, the hon. gentleman said the day was so far distant that it was useless to build upon it. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance what he has to say now to that statement made by the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain about the same day. I say that in view of that statement the immediate duty of the Government is to revive the question, to put aside the statement made by the Prime Minister when he was in England, and to say that the interests and views of the people of Canada are not as the Prime Minister stated them to be, but that it would bind the colonies to Great Britain in a more lasting union if they were conceded, and they can be conceded without injury to Great Britain.

Now, I must say that in my opinion the Government have been remiss in their duties with regard to opening up trade in the Yukon country. We know that last summer when the Government knew the enormous possibilities of that Yukon trade and what it was necessary to do in order to secure it, not a single step had been taken by the customs authorities to make arrangements with the United States so that we could have what we were justly entitled to with regard to that trade. They stood by with folded hands during the last session of Parliament, from March, 1897, because we were told that they then had information of the enormous discoveries in that Yukon country. But we find that there were speculators, that there were railroad contractors that knew all about this matter. They went up there, they sent their men up there, and they explored the route for getting into that country. The Government knew all about it, but they folded their arms and took no steps. Now we are asked to vote a sum of $396,000 to provide for the government of the Yukon. I venture to say that this is a totally indefensible proposition, there is no necessity for such an enormous expenditure. I remember when I was Controller of Customs that one of the managers of these transportation companies that carry goods up the Yukon River into the British Yukon country, told me that they would deliver provisions into the British Yukon for $1 per day per man, that they would buy the provisions and deliver them in Dawson City or any of those points for $1 per day, all the provisions a man would require. Well, that is not such an enormous expenditure. Anywhere else in Canada I presume the cost would be one-half of that. If you send up a number of the North-west Mounted Police for the preservation of order there, it will not involve such an enormous expenditure. Therefore, I say the necessity for expending $396,000 is altogether out of proportion to the necessities of the occasion. But when this Stikine Railway proposal came up we found that neither the Minister of Finance, nor the Minister of Trade and Commerce, nor the Minister of Customs had gone to Washington to make arrangements, but it was the Minister of the Interior who was sent. I would like to know what he knows about customs arrangements. He came back and said everything was fixed. He had been up in the North-west himself, and been through a portion of the country, and he had made up his mind that the Stikine River route was the proper route; yet in going to Washington he makes no negotiations regarding customs on goods going by that route. Arrangements were made for going up the Yukon River and by other routes, but not by this route where the Government propose to build a railway. Why, Sir, I say that the Customs Department was grossly negligent and remiss in their duties. I remember that when I was Controller of Customs, on the first notice that we had, I think it was in 1893, that gold was discovered there, we lost no time in sending up a customs collector. He was a member of the North-west Mounted Police, and was to receive, I think, 10 per cent on the collections, in addition to his pay as a member of the force, which was pretty fair remuneration for him. Now, the Government propose the enormous expenditure of nearly $400,000 for the North-west Mounted Police and carrying on the Government without having made the necessary customs arrangements with the United States. They are all at sixes and sevens with regard to that matter. I saw a statement in a paper the other day that the Americans were not carrying out the arrangements that the Minister of Customs announced to the House had been made. Is that correct?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not know what you may have seen in the papers, what I stated in the House would be correct.

Mr. WALLACE. What I saw in the papers was that the Americans refuse to carry out the arrangements that the Minister stated in the House had been made, because they said the Canadian customs officers were placed at a point they would not recognize as Canada, at Dyea and Skagway.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have seen that statement in the papers.

Mr. WALLACE. Has the hon. gentleman any knowledge of the correctness of that statement?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Well, that is the report just come down.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, we would next like to know if the Minister has taken any steps to verify that statement, has he done anything to protect Canadian interests and to see that some arrangements are made, not only there but on the Stikine-Teslin route? In my opinion the department have been grossly negligent in their duty in that regard, and have not looked properly after Canadian interests, and as a consequence, the business is being largely done through American sources. Again, the regulations which he has announced are drawn in such a loose way that I think the Government will not collect much of the revenue they are entitled to. I have here a copy of the regulations, and I think the Minister entirely misapprehends the whole position there. If settlers come to any part of Canada, bringing their wives, their families, their furniture and household goods with them, we bid them a warm welcome, because they come here to make Canada their home. We do not ask what country they come from or what religion they profess, we give them a warm welcome, and only require that they shall obey Canadian laws. But with those going into the Yukon country the case is entirely different. They are not settlers in any sense of the term. They are simply adventurers coming from all parts of the world into Canada to make what they can here, and to get out of it as quickly as possible. Yet the Minister in his regulations says:

Wearing apparel, articles of personal adornment, toilet articles and similar personal effects of persons arriving in Canada, may be passed free, without entry at customs, as travellers' baggage, under the provisions of the customs tariff, but this provision shall only include such articles as actually accompany and are in the use of and as are necessary and appropriate for the wear and use of such persons for the immediate purpose of the journey, and present comfort and convenience, and shall not be held to apply to merchandise or articles intended for other persons or for sale.

All those people going into the North-west we are told are taking their equipments with them; one year's or six months' provisions, together with blankets and goods of every description. Under the loose drawing of this clause all these goods may probably go in free. The Minister has no right to let them go in free.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Does the hon. gentleman say that six months' or one year's provisions will go in free?

Mr. WALLACE. It does not say that.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Why did you say it?

Mr. WALLACE. They are taking in six months' or twelve months' provisions.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Who told you that?

Mr. WALLACE. I read it in the papers. I have not made the statement that they have not paid duty on it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. You are quoting the articles given free admission.

Mr. WALLACE. I read the clause of the customs regulations.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is the regulation defining what is traveller's baggage under the tariff applicable to all parts of the Dominion. It is the ordinary regulation. But the hon. gentleman is leading the House to understand, whether intentionally or not, that six months' or a year's provisions are going in free.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not going to allow the Minister to misstate what I said. I said this, that these goods have free entry to go into the Yukon and Stikine districts; that this is a special regulation made for that country. The Minister now tells us that it is a regulation which prevails everywhere.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. For travellers' baggage.

Mr. WALLACE. Regulations that prevail everywhere else should not prevail in the Yukon district.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is a different ground.

Mr. WALLACE. The people did not go there as settlers or to remain in the country, but simply to make a haul and go out. Every one knows they will not remain there permanently. Under these regulations, drawn as they are and interpreted as the customs officers there will interpret them, and we have seen them interpret other regulations, the matters will be very loosely conducted, because I suppose the custom-house officers are men who have had no experience. Am I correct?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No.

Mr. WALLACE. Who is the officer?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Earle) will be able to tell the hon. gentleman that one of the most experienced custom-house officers in Victoria was sent there. He is aided in his work by members of the mounted police force there. At Skagway, in order to facilitate Canadian trade, we have had to put on one of our experienced officers from Vancouver, not for the purpose of collecting duties, but to help our Canadian trade.

Mr. WALLACE. Is the officer from Victoria at Dawson City or at the boundary line?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He was at Tagish. I know that the hon. member for Victoria will say that he is one of the best officers. His name is Mr. Godson.

Mr. EARLE. He is an experienced officer.

Mr. WALLACE. Under these regulations, loosely drawn as they are, which may be applicable elsewhere, it is questionable whether large quantities of American goods are not taken in. New regulations are needed, not old regulations. Every importation should be subject to duty more strictly than in any other part of Canada, because the people take in six or twelve months' provisions, and do not become settlers; and under this regulation they will be able to take in a large portion, if not the whole of their outfit, duty free. So the Government, from the beginning to the end, have not been doing their duty with respect to the interests of Canada in the Yukon country.

Another point to which I wish to refer is the injurious effect of this tariff. It can easily be demonstrated that this tariff is not one in the interest of the people of Canada. Take, for instance, Indian corn. Hon. gentlemen opposite announced with a loud flourish of trumpets that corn was to be made free. What effect has the change had? In 1897, and for eighteen years previous, very little American corn came into the Dominion. In 1897, 1,788,000 bushels were entered, of the value of half a million dollars; the year before there was a little more and the year before that a little less, but about 2,000,000 bushels annually came in. This corn was used by distillers, glucose manufacturers and corn starch manufacturers; in fact, it was principally consumed in those industries. The Government said they would make Indian corn free. I have here a statement furnished to me by the hon. Minister for the six months from 1st July, 1897, to 1st January, 1898, which shows that there was corn to the value of $3,153,000 imported into this country from the United States. If the same proportion should be brought in during the next half year, that would mean $6,300,000 worth brought in during a single year. I have here the prices for every month of those six months, and the price of corn at Chicago averaged 27½ cents per bushel. Taking it at that figure for the year, the importation would mean 22,900,000 bushels of corn imported for one year. There were during the first six months imported 11,500,000 bushels. The hon. gentleman has pointed to the increase in exports and imports. Here are $8,000,000 worth of corn imported into Canada during one year, displacing a like value of our coarse grains. We have therefore $8,000,000 worth more to export and find a market for in other parts of the world. The trade of the country, it is true, has increased by $12,000,000; but can any hon. member say it is for the benefit of Canada, for I believe it is to our distinct injury. I have here the prices of oats during those months. The prices in western Canada ran from 22 cents to 24 cents per bushel, the latter being the highest price according to the Toronto "Globe." through western and northern Ontario. But the price was down to 19 cents and 20 cents per bushel at different periods, and the Government by their action are compelling our farmers who grow oats, peas, barley and other coarse grains to send their produce away, and the produce during the past year was very abundant. We have ample of the coarse grains to feed all the cattle Canada has to-day, and far more; yet we are importing 22,930,000 bushels of corn in a year. We have actually imported 11,500,000 bushels in the six months from the 1st of July, 1897, to the 1st of January, 1898. That will displace 11,500,000 bushels of Canadian grain, which will have to find a market where it can. I say, that course is injurious. If these hon. gentlemen say it is right, why do they not take the duty off oats, peas, wheat and all other agricultural products? They dare not do it, Mr. Speaker. It is a wrong policy. The policy of protection is the only right policy in the interest of Canada; and, when the farmers of Canada learn that 11,500,000 bushels of American corn were brought into Canada in the last six months to displace the coarse grains which the farmers of Canada have grown, to please supposed farmers, like the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), and men of that ilk, they will rise in their might, and demand protection. It is the old story. In 1878, 7,300,000 bushels of free Indian corn were brought in. As soon as we placed a duty upon corn, the farmer grew more coarse grains to supply the Canadian market. The course then found to be wrong and injurious to the farmer, is equally so to-day. In other respects this tariff is injurious. It is not made on any definite plan or principle. It is not a free-trade tariff, because these gentlemen dare not adopt a free-trade policy. If they dared to do so, why do they not strike off all the protection to the farmers? They dare not do it. This is the only instance in which they have done it, and even this the farmers will pronounce to be injurious to them.

These gentlemen have undertaken to make a tariff, and how do they make it? One man comes and says: We want free trade. Another man comes and says: We want protection. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) told us how it was made. He is a protectionist. He came down here. He says he did, at any rate, and I suppose he told the truth. What does he say? He says:

I spent many an hour with the Finance Minister and with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, trying to impress upon them what duties should be imposed.

He took good care that there should be a pretty high duty on what he manufactured—a very good and substantial duty. He got better terms under this Government than he had before under the old Government. He said :

I was trying to impress upon them what duties should be imposed, and there is not a single article in these schedules that I did not go over, and send to the Government my opinion of what the duty should be.

That is the way the tariff was made. He went to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who, I think it is no disparagement to say, does not know very much about the tariff. He did not go to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, it appears, or to the Minister of Customs, but he went to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Finance Minister. He said :

I maintain that the improvement in a great many of the manufacturing interests of the city of Toronto is due to the work I did at Ottawa during the session as a humble member of the Liberal party.

That is the way the tariff was made. Then, when the tariff came down, the Minister of Customs said : We have given to its preparation whatever time we had to spare, the little time we had. They had nine months, it appears, from the time they came into power until their tariff was produced. That was on the 23rd of April. On the 25th of May, they came down with another tariff, and what did they say then ? "The tariff we presented to you on the 23rd of April was all wrong ; we made so many mistakes and blunders in it that we propose now to correct those mistakes and blunders." And they made a new tariff, which is the tariff now in force. They increased duties and lowered duties, but most of the changes were of a protective character. The Minister of Customs said : "We do not make a protective tariff ; that is only incidental." Yet the changes from the 23rd of April to the 25th of May were changes to a distinctly protective tariff. I have here the tariff, with all the changes marked in it. I will not go over them, but I think I have counted as many as seventy-four changes which they made in their own tariff of the 23rd April, 1897. Many of these changes are most important, and some of them are revolutionary in their character, showing, to my mind, that there is nothing stable about their programme or their tariff, and that they were simply acting without regard to any principle. One man was coming, wanting free trade, and another man was coming, wanting more protection.

Sir, during the eighteen years the Conservative party were in power, they made a tariff on one line, and one line only. It was a protective tariff, a tariff that would give proper protection, without giving too much protection, to the various industries of the country. They may have made mistakes ; they did make mistakes. In some instances, they did not give enough protection ; in others, they may have given more protection than was required. From time to time, changes were made, but they were all of a protective character. In 1894, the duties were reduced, because of a clamour that was got up, or a justifiable objection to giving too high a protection to some of the industries of the country. The result was a paring down of the tariff, which in some instances was pared too closely, because some of the industries of the country were injured ; but the intention was to have a tariff that would give adequate protection to the industries of the country. But what have hon. gentlemen opposite done further ? In woollen cloths the competition is most largely from Great Britain, some from Germany, very little, perhaps, from the United States. In that case I have no hesitation in saying that the products of the Canadian factories, made from Canadian wool, will be seriously injured, if not entirely driven out, by this one-quarter reduction. They will have a protection of 26½ per cent against British woollens. In my opinion, that will be injurious to the low-priced tweeds and cloths made in Canada from the coarse Canadian wools, the long wools of Canada, and in that regard I am quite sure the Government have made a very serious mistake. This is not felt so much now, as it will be when the other one-eighth is taken off the duty on British goods. Another point in that connection is this. Woollen clothing gets exactly the same protection as the woollen cloths from which they are made, giving no protection to the clothing manufacture in Canada. The last Government gave an advantage of 5 per cent. I think this Government should give that too, if we are to keep the clothing industry in Canada, and both the clothing industry and the woollen factories are very important, employing, as they do, many thousands of Canadians in their establishments.

Then with regard to cotton goods, the same argument will apply. All coloured cottons 35 per cent and the products made from them 35 per cent, with one-quarter off, will bring the protection, under the new tariff, down to 26½ per cent. That is not sufficient protection for the manufacturer of coloured shirts. There is no protection in that for those who make ladies wear, all those blouses and coloured cotton goods, the manufacture of which is being rapidly built up in Canada. That is a new industry and a very important one, and under this tariff it receives no protection. The reduction of one-quarter will be very injurious to these manufacturers, and to the manufacturers of cotton goods perhaps as well, but as to cotton goods I am not prepared to speak with any authority. All these matters are of such importance to the people of Canada and will be injuriously affected by the course of this Government.

There is just one other matter that I might mention, and that is tobacco. The excise duty on tobacco is 30 cents per pound. It was 25 cents before, and the Government have added 14 cents, making it 39 cents.

What has been the result? In the last six months under the old tariff, there were $60,000 pounds of tobacco leaf imported into Canada, but in the last six months, since this tariff came into force, only 250,000 pounds were imported, less than one-third, showing that the Government policy has entirely failed. The American excise duty on tobacco is 6 cents a pound; ours is 39 cents. A man can take a twenty-pound caddie under his arm, and cross the boundary line into Canada and clear $6.60. I am quite certain that the Government will be unable to check the smuggling which will take place, as it has been unable to check the smuggling which is evidently taking place extensively now. I believe the late Government reached the highest limit when they charged 25 cents a pound. They had got right up to the limit where the duty would supply a revenue and not be productive of smuggling.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Has the hon. gentleman noticed that the American duty is likely to be raised?

Mr. WALLACE. If the Americans have raised the duty that may be a protection, but I think our tariff is an unjustifiable increase of duty on these imports. You may call tobacco a luxury if you like, but to very many people, and people of limited means, it is a necessity, and the duty of 39 cents a pound on it is totally unjustifiable.

I do not intend to trouble the House much further, except to say that the duties which the Government are proposing and the reductions they are proposing to make—and to make not upon any defined lines—are going to be injurious in many ways. The proper course to take, in my opinion, if Great Britain is to have a preference, would be to give it a preference on these goods Canada has to import. Give it a preference over all other nations on such goods. Such a course would be just to Canada and generous to Great Britain. But this reduction of one-quarter on all the duties, without regard to how it will affect Canadian industries or Canadian workmen, is totally unjustifiable. It will deprive many thousands of Canadians of employment, and our first duty is to our own people. It should be our duty to provide them with employment and not deprive them of the labour they have to-day in Canadian industries. On those articles which we have to import, I would say give Great Britain the preference. Even in the case of free goods, we might impose duty against other nations, so as to give the preference to Great Britain. In the necessities of life, we could give Great Britain a preference, and on goods which we cannot, for various reasons, make ourselves, we could impose a duty which would give a preference to the mother country. That is a true solution of this problem of preferential trade.

Mr. WALLACE.

When this one-eighth added reduction comes into force next July, it will be found injurious to many of the best industries in the Dominion, but this Government will not listen to reason, they will listen to no objection. When we talked to them of the iniquity of the Drummond County Railway deal, that only made them the more anxious to put it through Parliament. When showed that we were paying for the Crow's Nest Pass Railway two million dollars, and I also contend, three million dollars more than necessary, without justification, they forced the proposal through the House of Commons, at any rate, and through the Senate as well. When this other proposal, which we disposed of this session, the Yukon Railway contract, came before this House, we pointed out conclusively that it was a totally unjustifiable bargain, that it violated every principle which the Reform party had advocated during the whole of their career, especially in Opposition.

They took the power to make a bargain without the consent of Parliament and without public tender in secret; they did not let the public know that they desired to have a railroad built there. There was only one firm of contractors, Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, that knew that the Government intended to build that road. They did not offer cash, but better have offered three times the cash necessary to build the road than this enormity of handing over to these contractors the most valuable mines, as we suppose, that the world has ever seen. But, the Government is going on in its course. They will be called to account at no distant day by the people of Canada. They will be called to account for their extravagant expenditure, exceeding anything that the Conservatives, whom they were so fond of denouncing as extravagant, ever reached when they were in power. They will be called to account for the wild schemes they have promulgated and carried through this Parliament. And they will be called to account for having violated every pledge that they made to the people of Canada when they were in Opposition.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I do not intend to detain the House very long.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I suppose that is good news to those who do not wish to hear the truth. I am somewhat surprised at the speech made by my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) who has just taken his seat. I will first refer to some of his remarks in connection with the corn question. I think, if I understood him aright, that he stated that we imported for the use of Canada something like seven millions of bushels of corn.

Mr. TAYLOR. Eleven millions.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I am sure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) did not wish to misrepresent the case when he said, if he said it, that corn to the amount of 11,000,000 bushels was imported for the use of the Canadian people during the last year. If he stated that, then, either the hon. gentleman is wrong, or the Trade and Navigation Returns, which I have before me are wrong. Let me inform the hon. gentleman from the Trade and Navigation Returns what we imported.

Mr. TAYLOR. When are they made up?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). For 1897.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) quoted the imports for the last six months of 1897.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I cannot help what he quoted. I wish to put him right. I have here the last statistics that we have and they are the proper ones to use in a discussion of this kind. If the hon. gentleman had not used the proper statistics that is his fault, and not mine. If he will look at page 46, under the head "Imports" he will find that we imported 9,190,000 bushels of corn, but only 1,788,000 bushels were imported for consumption in Canada. Now, if he is as far astray in other things as he has been in this, we cannot place much confidence in what he has told us.

Mr. WALLACE. Would the hon. gentleman permit me just a moment. I quoted the figures of our imports of 1897 at 1,788,147 bushels at a value of $512,000—giving the figure the hon. gentleman has just given. What I quoted in addition were the figures furnished for the six months from the 1st July, 1897, to the 1st January, 1898, furnished me by the Minister of Customs. These figures which I will hand over to the hon. gentleman show that there was imported on the free list, Indian corn, n.e.s., value, $3,153,017. I take the quoted prices of corn in Chicago for the first day of every month.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The prices have nothing to do with the objection I have taken. But the hon. gentleman, when he quoted importations of corn, did he at the same time, give the exportation of corn for Canada? For in that way only will he find what has been consumed in Canada. The rest represents a trade in the purchasing of American corn and sending it out to foreign countries to be sold.

Mr. WALLACE. This statement covers the importation for home consumption.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). It cannot be for home consumption at all. It is an unofficial document.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, this document was furnished me by the Minister of Customs.

Mr. TAYLOR. And so it must be correct.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I do not know whether it is correct or not, but I have here before me the official documents, and I am bound to hold the hon. gentleman to the last official document that we have at our disposal. I cannot take time to enter into a discussion—

Mr. WALLACE. I will ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Allow me to finish my sentence. I cannot enter into a discussion—

Mr. SPROULE. He is afraid to hear the facts.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) will please keep quiet. I cannot allow any hon. gentleman to discuss a question on the basis of unofficial documents—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Let the hon. gentleman understand that I am not prepared to discuss questions upon the basis of figures which are not official and are not in the hands of all the members. If he wants to make a point he must take the last official figures in the hands of the members, and in this case those figures are to be found in the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1897. I cannot be supposed to have examined every document that is to be read and placed in the hands of any hon. member.

Mr. BERGERON. But if he has it?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I do not know whether he has it or not. I have here what all admit to be the official document, and I cannot accept any other documents than those that are official. Basing my argument on the figures I have given you we have imported 9,190,000 bushels and have exported 7,247,000 of corn, the balance being all that is used in Canada for feeding purposes. Further, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) must bear in mind that, even if we do import a larger quantity of corn, we export a larger quantity of beef. If feeders of cattle did not believe it to be to their interests to import corn for the purpose, they would use the coarse grains of Ontario. But they find it more profitable to them to use imported corn. And this is more profitable to the country, because the more money they make the more money is kept in the country. Now, the hon. gentleman made another serious mistake, and I am sure he will admit it. He said that a reduction from a 20 per cent duty to 15 per cent duty was not a reduction of 25 per cent.

Mr. WALLACE. I said it was a reduction of 5 per cent duty.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). We will take the hon. gentleman at his word. Then, a reduction from 20 per cent to 10 per cent would be a reduction of 10 per cent, would it?

Mr. WALLACE. I think so.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Now, I want to draw attention to the principle on which the two parties differ. The Conservatives of this country are protectionists; we call ourselves free traders, that is, so far as it is possible to be free traders in this country. We all agree, on both sides, that the revenues required to conduct the affairs of the country must be raised on customs duties. Now, so far as customs duties go, there is protection in them; but there is quite a difference between a protective principle and a revenue tariff principle. Let me illustrate this to my hon. friend. Suppose that he sits down to consider a pair of shoes from a protective standpoint; he would reason somewhat after this fashion: There is a pair of shoes that can be manufactured in this country, the leather of which they are made can be manufactured in this country, but, in order to give a protection to the manufacturer, we must make the duty high, in order to prevent competition from abroad. That is his process of reasoning. Now, the Liberal will sit down and take up that very pair of shoes, and say: These can be manufactured in Canada, true, but they are an article that is largely used by everybody in Canada, particularly by the poorer people; so we must make this duty as reasonable as possible. In the first case, the Conservatives had in view the benefit of the manufacturers, while the Liberals had in view the benefit of the consumers. Now, there is the whole difference between what we call a protective tariff and a revenue-producing tariff. We have had in view the revenue, with the interest of the consumer; they have in view the revenue, with the interest of the manufacturer. Next, my hon. friend pointed out what he calls the blunderings of the Government with reference to the Yukon country. Sir, I think, if the Government is deserving of praise for anything which they have done within the last year, they deserve it with regard to the despatch and energy which they put forth in order to render the Yukon what it is to-day. The hon. gentleman opposite says the news came to the Government in March. The hon. gentleman knows very well it did not. It was well on into July before we heard very much about the discoveries of gold in the Klondike. True, we knew that there was gold in the Yukon district; we knew that for the last eighteen years. But there were no great finds until the finds were made in the Klondike about the middle of June. If we take the action of the Government after that, we must give them credit for putting forth every energy and taking every possible step to provide means for the preservation of law and order in that country. Again, the hon. gentleman finds fault with the Government in regard to the Yukon Railway question. He has already spoken upon that; we have all spoken upon it. I think he will find that the sentiment of the country, as I have found the sentiment in the country up west, both among Reformers and Conservatives, is strongly opposed to the action of the Opposition, and particularly opposed to the action of the Senate in this matter. Many go so far as to advocate a change in the constitution of this country, so as to do away with the Senate altogether. I believe that the rejection of that Bill has done a great deal to injure the trade of this country. I am sure that the manufacturers of the city of Montreal, of Hamilton, of Toronto and other cities, who were preparing to provide outfits and supplies for that country, are strongly condemning the action of the Opposition in opposing that Bill, and in causing it to be thrown out of the Senate.

Now, it may be asked: What is expected of the Liberal party? They were expected to carry out the promises that they made when they were sitting on the opposite side of the House. They have largely accomplished that. We promised to reduce, so far as the exigencies of the country would permit us, the high protective tariff that was inflicted upon it for so many years by the Tory Government. We have sought to do that; we reduced the general tariff very considerably, and then we made the large saving that has been spoken of, by the reduction of 25 per cent in the general tariff. Now, not a single individual on the opposite side will stand upon his feet and find fault with the Government with that line of policy. In 1892, when we offered that policy to the Conservative party, they refused to accept it at our hands, and they propounded a policy at that time, through a resolution moved in this House, that if England gave us something additional to what she is giving us at the present time, they would extend to her some preference in the Canadian market. That is as far as they would go. Let me read the resolution that was moved at that time, I think by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill), and voted for by every Conservative in this House. It is well to bring to their minds what they did offer on that occasion, and here it is:

That if and when the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland admit Canadian products to the market of the United Kingdom upon more favourable terms than is accorded to the products of foreign countries, the Parliament of Canada will be prepared to accord corresponding advantages by a substantial reduction in the duties it imposes upon British manufactured goods.

Is that the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party to-day? No person will volunteer an answer. Now, we did not borrow their clothes upon that occasion; we offered them an independent policy, a policy which we were willing to submit, and did submit, as soon as we came into power. But, previously to coming into power, we offered it to the Conservative party, but they rejected it, notwithstanding all that they said in regard to their loyalty, and their love for the old land, and their desire to benefit her as far as possible. Still, they rejected our resolution, and voted for their own. Now, let us see what it is that we promised to carry out when we came into power :

Inasmuch as Great Britain admits the products of Canada into her ports free of duty, this House is of the opinion that the present scale of duties exacted on goods mainly imported from Great Britain should be reduced.

That was our policy in 1892. Surely, we did not steal that policy from the Liberal-Conservative party. How can it be said, by speaker after speaker, that we have adopted their policy? Sir, I say that this same resolution has placed Canada in a more favourable position before the eyes of England than it ever occupied before. Our credit stands higher to-day, largely owing to that resolution, than it ever stood in the English market before. The people of the whole of the three Kingdoms are now more directly interested in Canada than ever before, owing to the offer we have made in that resolution. Consequently, we have taken a higher stand, as a colony, in the eyes of Great Britain to-day by the policy submitted in 1892 and carried into execution in 1897 by the Liberal party of this country. Notwithstanding all that, we hear many people tell us that we have borrowed the clothes of the Liberal-Conservative party, just as if their clothes were sufficiently large to cover the respectable Liberal party of this country. Now, there was another promise we made in Opposition. We promised to reduce the general tariff just so far as the revenue needs of this country would permit us. We did that. We came in at a time when the scale of expenditure was very high. It was not possible to cut down that scale of expenditure in one year to the point where we thought it ought to be. We have attempted to do so, and we are doing so to a certain extent, and, if the extraordinary expenditures of this last year were deducted from the total expenditure, we would have a considerably less expenditure under the ordinary heads than we had last year, showing that economy has been exercised, and is being exercised, by the Government in power, and that they are endeavouring to cut down the expenditure of this country as far as possible.

We found fault with the Government for an extravagant expenditure, nay more, for a corrupt expenditure, and we proved beyond cavil or doubt, by evidence under oath, that there were large corrupt expenditures made by the late Government. We promised that when we came into power our administration of public affairs would be purer and more honest than the administration of the late Conservative Government; and we have proved such to be the case. True, there have been charges made; but has a single hon. member had sufficient moral courage as an independent member of this House, to rise in his place and formulate any charge of corruption or maladministration against any single member or members sitting on this side of the House? No. Until hon. gentlemen opposite have the courage to do so, I take the loud mouthings on public platforms and from desks in this House as merely political clap-trap. When we were in Opposition we believed there were corrupt expenditures, and we formulated charges against the Government and asked for committees, before which we were prepared to prove them. Committees were given to us on some occasions, and in 1892 we proved corruption of a most extraordinary character against the Government; we proved it to such an extent that one Minister had to resign his position and take a back bench, another eminent man in that transaction was dismissed from the House, and others served terms in the prisons of the country; and we proved that many of these transactions were known publicly to a large circle of people who occupied leading positions in this country. When hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to formulate charges against an hon. member, they will show their honesty of purpose by reading those charges from their seats and asking for a committee of investigation as to the proof of those charges.

When we came into power there was a very disturbing question in the political arena, a question disturbing to a large extent owing to the negligence of the party that went out of power two years ago, a question that tore asunder, as it were, the different religious denominations in this country, a question which we promised to settle amicably, properly and rightly in the interest of all parties when we came into power. The Manitoba school question has been relegated where it should have been relegated before, and its removal from the arena of federal politics has been performed, and that question will not come into federal politics any more. For accomplishing that result the Liberal party deserve not only the admiration of the people, but the admiration of all parties, and they should receive the admiration and endorsement of the party now in Opposition for securing the settlement of that question. It was asserted that the question could not be settled in the way it was decided. We knew we could accomplish it, and we succeeded in accomplishing it, and thus promoting the interests of the whole country.

Another duty we discharged on coming into power was to frame a policy which would result in creating a large amount of trade, a policy which hon. gentlemen opposite have opposed. We propounded a policy which carries the marks of common sense on its face, a policy of extending the Intercolonial from a point opposite Quebec into the very mouth of competition, the city of Montreal. The object is to reduce as far as possible the transportation rates, and so far as we reduce those rates, we will give preferential treatment to Canadian goods in the foreign markets. We were charged with having paid nearly $7,000,000 to secure that privilege. Hon. gentlemen opposite know well that we have not added $7,000,000 to the debt of the Dominion for that purpose. It is true we have to pay $210,000 annually for running powers over the Drummond County and Grand Trunk roads and the use of the terminus in Montreal. If we earn $210,000 additional annually there will be neither gain nor loss; but if we obtain one dollar more it will be so much gain, and if we obtain one dollar less we shall be so much behind. It is the opinion of all railway and business men that it is altogether likely we shall earn a much larger proportion of money than before; so much so that not only will we be able to pay $210,000 annually, but there will be a respectable surplus to place to the credit of the country. If so, how can it be said that this policy deserves the opposition of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Another promise we made was that we would enlarge the canals for the purpose of facilitating transportation from the west. The canals on the St. Lawrence are only nine feet deep. We propose to deepen them to fourteen feet. This will give vessels on the upper lakes the opportunity of coming to Montreal and delivering their cargoes to sea-going vessels without breaking bulk till Montreal is reached, which will effect a large saving in transportation rates and give us a position which we do not now occupy as regards securing freight going by Buffalo to New York. We can more than compete with the Erie Canal, which has only seven feet of water, where boats are drawn by horses at four miles an hour, and have small tonnage, whereas our boats will carry 2,000 tons. Thus we will secure an advantage against which the Americans even cannot compete. That presents itself to me as a very wise policy, not to be condemned by the Opposition, but to be supported by every hon. member; and although we require to spend $3,500,000 for the purpose of accomplishing that work, we believe the expenditure is in the interest of the country, and will bring back in the form of returns far more than the interest on the amount of capital which the country will be called upon to pay. Again, we find that increased trade has come to us during the last year or last year and a half, I believe largely through the policy of the Liberal party. I do not say for one moment that all this prosperity has been caused by the advent of the Liberals to power, but after seventeen or eighteen years of corrupt Government and maladministration, the honesty of our Administration has given confidence, and that has added largely to the prosperity which prevails at the present day. It has spread into every class. The farmers, the labouring men, the traders, the manufacturers feel it, and at no time during the past fifteen or seventeen years have the manufacturers been in a more prosperous condition or have they employed a larger number of hands; nor was there a time during the last eighteen years when the people have been more contented and happy and have looked forward with greater confidence than at the present time. We predicted that result. We were not prophets nor the sons of prophets, but we knew that after eighteen years, when honest men were placed at the head of affairs, a greater measure of prosperity would flow to the people than they enjoyed before, and these results and fruits came just as we expected. Again, during the seventeen or eighteen years of the Liberal-Conservative regime our people were leaving us.

The flower of our country was leaving us. Our young men and fair young women, fairer than any other country possessed, were leaving us in thousands and going to the United States to add strength and dignity to that nation. To-day there is not one leaving to five who left before; but on the contrary many are returning; and Canada, which was formerly a nursery for the American nation, now becomes a nursery for our vast fields of fertile lands in the west. Hundreds and thousands are going to tenant our own lands and to add strength and dignity to our own country. When we consider all these things, we have reason to congratulate ourselves that the Liberal party came into power, and by wise policy turned the stream of population towards our own western country.

Another line of policy which the Liberal party supported was the development of the agricultural and mineral resources of the country; and, therefore, the Government last year concluded, and I think wisely concluded, that it would be in the interest of the country that the Crow's Nest Pass Railway should be extended from Lethbridge westward to the Kootenays. They decided, and I think wisely, to subsidize that road pretty freely, so that the settlers of the western country might find a market for their butter, cheese, flour and other products of their labour, where they would realize the highest possible price. The Government desired to preserve that market for Canada. We all know that that is one of the richest countries in the world. I suppose it is the richest gold quartz country in the world to-day; and it is rich, not only in gold, but in silver, lead, iron and other minerals, which will be developed in the near future and contribute largely to the wealth of this country. As a party we believed that as that wealth was ours, we had a right to develop it and retain the trade of the country as far as possible for Canada. The trade was going largely to the United States. Spokane was built up to be a large and prosperous town. Thousands of miners went into the country, carrying nothing with them but their brawny arms and their skill in mining, and they were forced to buy what they needed in the United States to the south. In other words, Canada laid the golden egg, but the golden egg, after being laid, rolled into the United States. We thought, and I think wisely, that it would be in the interest of Canada to spend $3,630,000 to aid the Crow's Nest Pass Railway for the purpose of preserving that trade as far as possible to our own country. We believed it was wise also because it would give us control of a large portion of the coal area which would otherwise be controlled by a private corporation. By that arrangement we obtained 50,000 acres of the best coal beds in America, which gives the Government a handle by which they can control the price of that product for all time to come, and thus prevent monopolies from interfering with the development of that country. In these ways, I think the Government acted wisely and discreetly and in the interest of Canada. We also obtained concessions from the Canadian Pacific Railway in the interest of Manitoba and the North-west, and in the interest of the eastern provinces as well. We obtained a reduction in the rate on flour and wheat to the extent of 1½ cents per hundred pounds in the first year, and 3 cents per hundred pounds in the following years; we obtained large reductions in the carrying rates from any point of Canada to any point of Manitoba or the North-west Territories. In fact, all parties agree that those reductions equal if not exceed $500,000 a year to the farmers of that country; and when we consider that we have enabled the farmers of the west, by that transaction, to keep in their hands no less than half a million dollars every year, we have reason to think that the Government acted wisely in adopting a policy of that kind and in carrying it out so effectively.

Then we agreed when in Opposition that if we ever came into power—and we had strong expectations of coming into power before very long, just as we have strong expectations to-day that the Canadian people will keep us here for a long time to come—we would reform the tariff. We contended, and I think rightly, that the higher duties were imposed on the people who were least able to bear them, being imposed on those necessary articles which the masses of the people had to purchase, and we did relieve the poorer classes to a great extent, and placed the heavier duties upon luxuries. In that way the burden will rest in a greater degree upon those who are best able to pay, and those who are less able to pay will be to that extent relieved. We have very largely done away with the anomaly in the tariff of specific duties, duties, which when reduced to an ad valorem basis, showed many of the duties to be extreme. This Government has removed these to a very large extent.

Again, when in Opposition we proposed that as soon as we got into power we would remove one of the most iniquitous acts which the Conservative party ever placed on the Statute-books, and that is saying a good deal. That Act we call the Franchise Act, an Act which has imposed an expenditure on the people of this country every time the voters' lists were revised of no less than $250,000. That expenditure will be saved by the repeal of that Act. One million, one hundred and sixty thousand dollars was spent on four revisions, and under it three elections were held, so that nearly $400,000 was spent under that Act every time we had an election. Now, that money can be saved to go to build up the country in some other way. Then we told you that when we came into power we would seek to readjust the constituencies.

Those members who were here in 1882 will remember that the redistribution or gerrymander took place that session just on the eve of a general election, and without imputing motives, the only object it could have was to strengthen the Conservative party in the coming elections. The Government had not sufficient faith in the National Policy at that time to go to the country on it without taking the preliminary of carving out the constituencies in such a way as to legislate rather than elect a large number of members to this House in the interests of their party. When I give you a few figures in connection with this matter, you will see how the members of the Conservative party were legislated into this Chamber by virtue of that iniquitous Act. In the election of 1882, 186,000 Conservative votes were polled in Ontario and 182,000 Liberal votes. You will see, therefore, that we should have reasonably expected a representation in this House from that province of about an equal number of members on either side—say, 45 Liberals and 46 Conservatives. Was that the way in which Ontario was represented here? No, Sir. There were 33 Liberals and 59 Conservatives returned from that province. How was it that 186,000 Conservative votes elected 59 Conservatives and that 182,000 Liberal votes only elected 33 Liberals? That result was due solely to the operation of the Gerrymander Act, and that shows conclusively how well that iniquitous Act which was placed on the statutes in 1882, worked for the Government that devised it. Let me give you another instance. For every 3,150 Conservative votes polled there came a Conservative representative to this House; but for every 5,550 Liberal votes polled, there just came one Liberal member. Can any reasonable person find any reason for such a discrepancy between the representation of the two parties other than the iniquitous Gerrymander Act, which had the intended effect of legislating members into this House.

I do not propose, at any length, to review what the Liberal party has done since it came into power; but will content myself with saying that in the section of the province of Ontario which I represent, the people are perfectly satisfied that the Liberal party has done a good work for the country. When we put together all that they have done during the two short years they have been in power, we cannot help finding it remarkable that the Government should have succeeded in doing so much in the interest of the country in such a short time. It is rather astonishing, as well as amusing at times, to find hon. gentlemen opposite accuse us of having stolen their policy and almost in the same breath tell us that we are all wrong in everything we have done and in this very policy that we have stolen. You must bear in mind, Sir, that absolute free trade in this country is out of the question. During Mr. Mackenzie's regime we had not free trade; and so long as we adhere to the principle of raising revenue by means of customs duties, we can never have it. The only question is how much we shall take from the people in the form of customs duties, and that must depend largely on the public works we undertake, on the expense of carrying on civil government and legislation, and on the other necessary expenditures entailed upon us as a Government. Therefore the only difference between the two parties is in the adjustment of the duties on our imports and in the end we each seek to attain. Two or three years ago, I discussed this question with the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) when travelling on the railway to this city, and I ventured to express the opinion that the article of tea was quite a legitimate object of duty. But, he said, do you not see that the Conservative party is opposed to putting a duty on tea, because that would not give any protection to any manufacturing industry in this country. There is the whole difference. We believe in putting a duty on these articles which will give us revenue, and which will not put it in the power of other parties to fleece the consumer by charging too high prices on the articles he consumes. That is all the difference between a protective and a revenue tariff.

I do not propose to weary the House by going over the ground that has been so well travelled by the hon. gentlemen on this side who have preceded me, and shall therefore draw to a close these somewhat rambling remarks. I must admit that I did not feel called upon, in the face of the prosperity which the country is now enjoying under the policy from which hon. gentlemen opposite predicted so disastrous results, to go very minutely into statistics and returns, and shall therefore resume my seat, after giving this expression of my confidence in the Government and approval of its policy, and thanking the House for its patient attention.

Mr. CRAIG moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The House is so exceedingly thin, that I do not see why we should object to the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In moving the adjournment of the House, I think I ought to make a little announcement, which possibly has not reached some hon. gentlemen, and that is that we have the pleasure of knowing that the district of West Prince, Prince Edward Island, has returned a Liberal member by a majority of about 150.

Mr. TAYLOR. How much did it cost?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Reaction, reaction.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 14th April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS WITHDRAWN.

Bill (No. 27) to incorporate the Cañon Railway Company.—(Mr. Frost.)

Bill (No. 33) to incorporate the Pacific and Yukon Railway, Navigation and Mining Company.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

THE GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 114) further to amend the Act respecting the Department of the Geological Survey. He said: The Bill is simply for the purpose of removing the effect of a change which was made by the Act of 1895 amending the Civil Service Act. Previous to that time the director of the Geological Survey was able, upon the order of the Minister, to employ persons having technical or special qualifications at a rate of pay exceeding $400 a year. Since that time he has not been able to do so, except as it has been provided from time to time in the Appropriation Act. This amendment is for the purpose of doing away with the necessity of making a special provision in each Appropriation Act for this purpose.

Mr. HAGGART. Is the Bill for the purpose of doing away with the tests required by the Act for those employed as temporary clerks in the Geological Survey ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Only those who are employed for their technical qualifications.

Mr. HAGGART. It leaves the head of the Survey to be the sole judge of the qualifications ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Certainly. He must make the recommendation, and upon his recommendation the Minister may employ.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COLOURED PORTERS ON THE I. C. R.

Mr. FOSTER (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

1. Have any coloured porters of Pullman or parlour cars been dismissed since Manager Harris took charge, from any part of the Intercolonial Railway service ?

2. If so, how many, and what was the date of the order for dismissal, and on what charges were they dismissed ?

3. Have any who were dismissed been since employed ; if so, how many ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No coloured porters of the sleeping or parlour cars have been dismissed from the service on any part of the railway since Traffic Manager Harris took charge.

CROW'S NEST PASS RAILWAY— AMOUNT PAID C. P. R.

Mr. FOSTER (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

What amount has been paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on account of the Crow's Nest Pass construction, and on what number of miles ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). $453,750 has been paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on account of the Crow's Nest Pass construction, for 42½ miles.

REVENUE FROM JUBILEE STAMPS.

Mr. FOSTER (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

What is the total amount received for Jubilee stamps, and what portion thereof, if any, is included in the revenue for 1896-97 ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Jubilee stamps having been issued concurrently with ordinary stamps, the department, without obtaining a special return from postmasters as to the respective quantities of each kind of such stamps still in their hands, is unable to state how much has been realized from the sale of Jubilee stamps alone.

I. C. R. BETWEEN MONTREAL AND LEVIS.

Mr. FOSTER (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

What number of passengers, local and through, have been carried on that portion of the Intercolonial Railway between Montreal and Lévis during the month of March ; also, what tonnage of freight, local and through ? What are the gross receipts and working expenses of this portion of the road for that period ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I am not in a position to give the hon. gentleman the information asked for. The returns for the month of March are not yet in and they will not be compiled until at earliest the 25th or 26th of the current month. That is the information I have. After they have been compiled it will be necessary that a further compilation should take place in order to give the specified information which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) asks for.

MR. OGILVIE'S SERVICES SINCE JANUARY, 1898.

Mr. FOSTER (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

Has Mr. Ogilvie, surveyor, of the Interior Department, been on salary since January, 1898 ? Is he now in England on any official business, and did he serve with Mr. Dan Rose in connection with the compiling and publishing of the Klondike Official Guide in Canada and the United States under instructions from the Government or any department ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Mr. Ogilvie, surveyor, of the Interior Department has been on salary since January, 1898. He is not now in England on official business, but he is under salary while in England upon leave of absence granted by the Governor General in Council according to the provisions of the law. The Government furnished the copy for the Klondike Official Guide, and Mr. Ogilvie, under instructions of the department, assisted in preparing the copy for the department, and read the proof to ensure the correctness thereof. The department is not aware that he had any connection with the compiling and publishing of the Klondike Official Guide other than what has been stated.

POSTAL MAIL CLERKS—NOVA SCOTIA.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

1. Have any of the postal mail clerks in Nova Scotia been moved from their former places of residence ?

2. If so, what are their names ?

3. Have those clerks who have been removed been allowed or paid anything for the transportation of their effects ? If so, what is the amount allowed or paid in the case of each individual ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. Yes. 2. Their names are Messrs. S. Hall, G. A. Hawkesworth, W. Bennett, J. D. Ross, A. Macdonald, J. P. Keating, F. N. McMillan and J. S. F. McLeod. 3. The following clerks were allowed moving expenses:—Messrs. S. Hall, A. Macdonald and J. P. Keating. Mr. S. Hall was paid the sum of $38.60, Mr. A. Macdonald, $34.40 and Mr. J. P. Keating $39.06. Messrs. W. Bennett and J. D. Ross, since first appointment, did not reside at the starting point of a route, and, therefore, were not entitled to moving expenses. Messrs. S. Hall, Macdonald and Keating resided at a point which formerly was the starting point of a route and therefore were entitled to moving expenses. Mr. G. A. Hawkesworth has not removed his family and does not intend doing so. Messrs. F. N. McMillan and J. S. F. McLeod are single men and no expenses were incurred in moving.

DEPUTY POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Mr. TAYLOR asked,

Who is the present Deputy Postmaster General? When was he appointed? What is his salary? What profession or calling did he follow previous to his appointment? What training did he have especially qualifying him for the position?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). R. M. Coulter was appointed Deputy Postmaster General on the 1st of August, 1897. Previous to his being appointed Deputy Postmaster General he practised medicine. The question as to salary was answered on the 14th day of February and the answer appears on page 475 of the "Hansard" of the present session. As to his qualifications for the position, they were such as were deemed satisfactory to the Government.

W. W. WILLIAMS, POSTMASTER.

Mr. TAYLOR asked,

Has W. W. Williams, postmaster at Seeley's Bay, been dismissed? Were there any charges preferred against him? Was there an investigation? Has Mr. Williams been postmaster for the last twenty years or more? Was the office conducted in a satisfactory manner? Was the office kept at a central point in the village? Has it been removed to the westerly limit of the village, where it is inconvenient for the public to get their mail thereat? Was a petition, signed by nearly all the residents of the surrounding district, presented to the Postmaster General protesting against any change being made? Was the change made on the recommendation of Mr. W. Fredenburgh, the defeated candidate? If not, on whose recommendation was the change made? Has C. C. Gilbert been appointed postmaster, and by whom was he recommended?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I might ask the hon. gentleman (Mr.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Taylor) to move for the papers in the case. The question is a very lengthy one.

Mr. McDOUGALL. But the answer might be a very short one.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) accept this as notice of motion for the papers?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In the ordinary way, according to the practice of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not think that the answer is too long to give in this form.

ABENAKIS INDIANS—AGENCY AT ST. FRANCIS.

Mr. BERGERON (by Mr. Dugas) asked,

Whether Mr. Wilfrid Conrad, notary, of Pierreville, has resigned the agency for the Abenakis Indians of St. Francis, and if so, when? Has his resignation been accepted by the Department of Indian Affairs? When does it take effect? Who has been appointed to succeed him in the position? Has no person as yet been appointed, and if so, why?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Mr. Wilfrid Conrad Boucher, notary, of Pierreville, who is probably the person referred to, resigned the agency on the 7th of February, 1898. The resignation was accepted, and took effect on the 1st instant. Dr. A. O. Comire, of St. François du Lac, has been appointed acting agent, pending his appointment as agent by Order in Council.

DEPUTY MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. BERGERON asked,

Who is the present Deputy Minister of the Interior? When was he appointed? What is his salary? What profession or calling did he follow previous to his appointment? What training did he have especially qualifying him for the position?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. James Allan Smart. 2. 1st April, 1897. 3. $3,200. 4. Mr. Smart was not in business at the time of his appointment. 5. His previous training qualifying him for the position of Deputy Minister consisted in the fact that he had been for five years Minister of Public Works for the province of Manitoba, in which position he displayed exceptional ability as an administrator.

ROCKLIFFE RIFLE RANGE—LAND VALUATOR.

Mr. BENNETT asked,

Who has been selected to act as valuator by the Government in acquiring the lands requisite for the Rockliffe rifle ranges? What remuneration is to be paid to such valuator?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). In the absence of the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden), I beg leave to answer

E. Wallace, Esq., was appointed to act as valuator by the Government in acquiring the lands requisite for the Rockliffe ranges. The question of remuneration has not been decided.

DISMISSAL OF W. W. WILLIAMS, POSTMASTER.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call attention to the questions which appear on the Order paper under my name, and to which the hon. Postmaster General has objected giving any reply. I merely wish to say a few words, and if necessary will conclude with a motion. I put a question on the paper which reads as follows:—"Has the postmaster at Seeley's Bay been dismissed?" In reply the hon. Postmaster General asked me to move for the papers. I have only heard by rumour that Mr. Williams has been dismissed, and want to ascertain whether he really has been or not, and I do not see why the hon. gentleman cannot give me the information, nor do I see what there is in the question that can involve the bringing down of papers. I propose now to read all the questions relating to this matter which I put on the paper, in order to get them upon "Hansard," and to show the House that the hon. Postmaster General had no right to answer me as he did. Of course, when a question is put on the paper which calls for the production of papers in reply, it is proper for the hon. Minister to whom the question is put to ask the questioner to make a motion for the papers. But in all these questions, which appear in my name, I simply ask for information that does not call for the production of papers at all, and I hold it is the duty of the hon. gentleman to give me a direct answer. These are the questions:

Has W. W. Williams, postmaster at Seeley's Bay, been dismissed? Were there any charges preferred against him? Was there an investigation? Has Mr. Williams been postmaster for the last twenty years or more? Was the office conducted in a satisfactory manner? Was the office kept at a central point in the village? Has it been removed to the westerly limit of the village, where it is inconvenient for the public to get their mail thereat? Was a petition, signed by nearly all the residents of the surrounding district, presented to the Postmaster General protesting against any change being made? Was the change made on the recommendation of Mr. W. H. Fredenburgh, the defeated candidate? If not, on whose recommendation was the change made? Has C. C. Gilbert been appointed postmaster, and by whom was he recommended?

There is nothing in any one of these questions that calls for a return, nothing which would warrant me in making a motion for the production of papers. They are plain, straightforward questions such as a Minister of the Crown, responsible to Parliament, should be prepared to answer after he had two days' notice of them. The hon. Postmaster General will have to learn to treat the members of the Opposition with some respect when they ask for nothing unreasonable. The Opposition have rights and intend to assert them. They are not to be bluffed, as the hon. Postmaster General has attempted to bluff me, by refusing to answer straight questions and asking me to move for a return. What return can I ask for to show that the postmaster at Seeley's Bay has been dismissed. If I were to move for a return, he would probably tell me that the postmaster was dismissed and that he had no papers to bring down. I do not know that this postmaster has been dismissed, but I put the question and am entitled to the information, and in order that this matter may be discussed, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I beg, first of all, to assure the hon. gentleman that in the answer I gave him, nothing was further from my mind than to be discourteous to him in any way. The reason why I suggested a motion for papers instead of categorical questions and replies, was because the production of the papers would put the House in a more satisfactory position to know the merits and demerits of the matter than would categorical answers, unaccompanied by proper explanations. For instance, the hon. gentleman asks—and I may be permitted to satisfy him to some extent even at this stage—whether any charges were made against the postmaster at Seeley's Bay. If I were to reply that there were none, it would then look as if he had been dismissed without cause, whereas the facts are that while Mr. Williams was dismissed, it was not because of charges made against him, but because Seeley's Bay is a long distance away from where he lives. If I remember rightly, he had moved to Smith's Falls and taken a position in some store there.

Mr. TAYLOR. By permission of the Government?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know whether by permission or not.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know that it was.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman evidently is not lacking in information, but I just offer that to the House as a fair ground for asking that the reasons for Mr. Williams' removal be laid before the House in a full and fair way. Then, the hon. gentleman asks whether there was not a petition signed by nearly all the residents of the surrounding district presented to me, protesting against any change being made. I do not know of any petition representing public opinion or signed by nearly all the residents of the surrounding district. On that point, I am not in a position to weigh the merits of this petition and to decide whether it was signed by all, or nearly all, the people, but the petition when produced will speak for itself, and the hon. gentleman will then be able to see whether it represents public opinion or not. I could point to other respects in which the House could be better informed by the production of the papers than by my merely giving categorical replies. I am extremely surprised, on reading these questions, to observe that they indicated to my mind—I do not say it is the case—a certain degree of familiarity or acquaintance with the proceedings that led to the vacating of this office, which I do not understand, and which enables the hon. gentleman to put these questions so pointedly—

Mr. TAYLOR. Name one of them.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL—these various questions, suggestive of more or less departmental information conveyed to the hon. gentleman. I do not object to his having it, but I certainly formed that impression, and I think that the proceedings of our department will afford good grounds for that impression. I have not the slightest intention to embarrass the hon. gentleman in the production of the papers. Quite the contrary, he is welcome to them, but on more than one occasion, when an hon. member has been asked to move for papers, it only led to confusion when the motion was interjected in the midst of other proceedings in order to get information in this way.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Every hon. gentleman on the Treasury benches, I assume, is anxious to forward the business of the House and to have as little time occupied in the matter as possible. The hon. Minister knows very well that one way of evading a question altogether and thus evading giving to this House the information it is entitled to, is to ask the hon. gentleman who puts the question to put instead a motion on the Order paper for papers, knowing that in many cases it is impossible for the motion ever to be reached. I think I can relieve the hon. gentleman's mind from the apprehension that any of the officials in his department are betraying their trust. Does he not know that every point in these questions is familiar to the parties who are interested? It is a very familiar practice, when the Government desire to get rid of one officer and put another in his place, to move the office, and it is a practice to which the hon. Postmaster General has again and again resorted when he could find no charge or no grounds for dismissal. In many cases he has moved offices in opposition to the wishes of the whole community, merely for the sake of getting one person out and putting another one in.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In this case, I may tell the hon. gentleman that the postmaster moved away to a point forty miles from where his post office was.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has often taken advantage of his position as Minister to answer questions by bringing down sheaves of papers and reading them to the House. He could have resorted to that expedient in this case, but he felt that he could not answer these questions without exposing himself to severe animadversion, and he suggested to my hon. friend that he could not get this information without putting a notice on the paper. No information is sought here that my hon. friend could not learn from the parties in the neighbourhood who are interested in this post office, and I am afraid, therefore, my hon. friend will find that it will hardly form a basis for making a vacancy in his own department, which is what he appears to indicate as likely to be done. Is this for the purpose of terrorizing the department, to tell the officials of this Government, that if they answer any questions, if they express any opinion, they are to be turned out? Is this the object of the scarcely-concealed threat of the Postmaster General? I think it is very unwarranted, and the hon. gentleman should have better grounds for it before he holds out any such threat. There are no grounds for it in this case. There is not a question asked there, but the information would necessarily come from any person connected with the Post Office Department, whether here or elsewhere. These are all matters known to the parties and to the people who are interested, and they have taken the only means they could take, when they failed to get justice at the hands of the Government, when they failed to get any information or any consideration, by coming here, and on the floor of Parliament, through my hon. friend, asking the questions in the manner in which he has asked them. I am glad that the Postmaster General has condescended to give a good deal of important information with regard to this matter, and I see no reason why he should not have answered, without the slightest information, every question that was asked.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If I may be permitted to say a word, I would say that it seems to me that the strictures of the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) upon my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) are unwarranted, are unfounded, in view of the statement made by the hon. gentleman who asked this question, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor). The postmaster who, it appears, was removed a few days ago, was postmaster at a point called here, in the question, Seeley's Bay. Some few years ago, as I understand from the statement made, this gentleman removed to Smith's Falls, a place 40 miles away from the place at which he was postmaster. He so removed himself, as I understood from the hon. gentleman (Mr.

Taylor), being allowed by the late Government to retain his office as postmaster at Seeley's Bay, and yet to reside at Smith's Falls.

Mr. TAYLOR. No.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is what I understood.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, you did not.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman stated that he had removed to Smith's Falls with permission from somebody. From whom? There was no one who could give him permission, except the Postmaster General of that time. I submit, that if the Postmaster General allowed that postmaster to retain the postmastership at Seeley's Bay, while he did not discharge the duties of the office, but resided at a place 40 miles away, the Postmaster General of that day committed a gross breach of the duties he owed to the public. I do not pretend to know the facts, but I gather them from information given by the hon. gentleman a moment ago. And, whether that statement is accurate or not, I think the case amply justifies the position taken by my hon. friend the Postmaster General, that this is a peculiar case, in which the only method of making known the facts, so that the public may fairly judge the matter, is to have the whole record placed before the House, as is suggested by the Postmaster General.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am not prepared to say whether this case came before the department when I was managing it or not, but it is quite evident that the information sought by my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) from the Postmaster General is information that should be placed upon the Table of Parliament as soon as possible. The Postmaster General, after refusing to reply to the question put, altered his mind and told us that the postmaster had been dismissed. Now, I would like to draw the attention of the right hon. leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to this fact, which has come under my notice on more than one occasion, as Postmaster General. It may be that the family of the postmaster were living in the place where the post office existed, and carried on the duties of the office. In that case, the public would not suffer in any way from the fact of the postmaster being absent. And I must say that, reading the question as it has been submitted by my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) to the Postmaster General, it is impossible for me to find any reason why a return should have to be brought down to give the information that is sought. I think that question, as it is put upon the Order paper, can very easily be answered without putting my hon. friend from Leeds to the trouble of preparing a motion for the return. Moreover, Sir, if notice were given, at this period of the discussion, it is very likely that it would not be reached this session, so that the Postmaster General would have until next session to frame additional excuses for having dismissed a public officer without any valid reason.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Are we to have any assurance from the Postmaster General as to when the papers will be produced, if a motion is made, instead of reliance being placed upon the answering of the question? We have had some experience which justifies us in supposing that we should not get the information this year, and perhaps not next year. Some motions that we moved last year, one of which I have particularly in mind at this moment, are not answered even now. They were for information which the House should have been in possession of at the very moment the Government had completed their work in the matter, the work in which was all ready, requiring only the copies of certain papers to be made and that the Minister could take the trouble to lay them on the Table—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Was that in my department?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The case I refer to related to the appointments which were made by the late Government just before they went out of office, and as to that class of those appointments which were approved by His Excellency.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was laid on the Table yesterday.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It appears, then, that it was laid on the Table yesterday, after a silence and inactivity of about a year.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There were so many recommendations that it took a long time to get it ready.

Mr. MONTAGUE. These were all figured out and gone over by the Government before the request was made that the papers should be brought down, and so, instead of any work being necessary in the preparation of the papers, all that was required was, that copies should be made and that they should be laid on the Table of the House. Now, if we are to allow questions not to be answered, in this way, and are put off with the statement that we can move for a return, I think we ought to have assurance from the Postmaster General that he will bring the papers down at once. He could bring them down to-morrow. It does not take long to prepare copies of papers such as these. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) is to drop the questions and give notice of motion, the Postmaster General should give a pledge to the House that the papers shall be brought down at once.

Mr. McMULLEN. It appears to me that if the hon. gentleman had made his question shorter, and had not made so many statements in it as he does, the Postmaster General might have been able to give an answer. But I appeal to fair-minded men on the other side of the House if it is possible for the Postmaster General to answer this part of the question :

Was a petition, signed by nearly all the residents of the surrounding district, presented to the Postmaster General protesting against any change being made ?

How is the Postmaster General to decide whether a petition that was presented to the department was signed by nearly all the residents of the surrounding district ? If the hon. gentleman had put his question in a manner that it could have been answered by the Postmaster General, I have not the slightest doubt he would have got an answer. But the hon. gentlemen should not fly in a passion over a matter of this kind. I would just ask them to remember the experiences of the hon. gentlemen now on this side of the House for the last 15 or 16 years. I have been frequently met myself in putting questions from the other side by the reply that I had better move for the papers in the ordinary way. It is not an uncommon thing to decline to answer questions of this kind. I admit frankly that it is the duty of a Minister of the Crown to give to the House all the information that can reasonably be expected. I say that as a rule when questions are put, they should be answered. But questions are sometimes put in such a way that it is impossible to give an answer, and I contend that this is just one of those questions. If the hon. gentleman had confined himself to points that could have been reasonably answered by the Postmaster General, the probabilities are that he would have got an answer. But how can he make an answer to that portion of his question I have just referred to ? It is utterly impossible, it would be a mere expression of opinion on the part of the Minister. The only way the House can judge with regard to the petition that was presented, is by asking for a copy of that petition to be brought down and laid upon the Table of the House ; and then hon. gentlemen who are acquainted with the people in that district, in reading over the names attached to the petition, will be able to decide whether the point the hon. gentleman makes here in his question, is correct or not, that a very large majority of the people in that district did or did not sign the petition. Unless the Postmaster General went out and took a census of the whole district and made an exhaustive inquiry as to how many did or did not sign the petition, and what was the standing of those who did sign it, it could not be possible for him to give an answer to that question. I do not think this is an occasion where hon. gentlemen opposite should allow themselves to fly off the handle because this question is not answered, because I can say that on several occasions I have been met in the same way. I am not going to say there was not a justification for the Minister in refusing to answer me. I am making no charge of any kind. But I maintain that the Postmaster General is fairly warranted in taking the course he has under the present circumstances.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has made an argument which is entirely destroyed by the reluctance of the Minister to accept this as a notice and bring down the papers. The hon. gentleman argues that the question was put in such a way that it cannot be fairly answered off-hand, and that it was necessary to bring down the papers in order to give a correct answer. If that be the only objection, and if the Postmaster General was willing to bring down the information, you would naturally expect that he would accept this question as a notice and bring down the papers forthwith, and that is the feature of it that attracted my attention. If there was no reasonable objection, why should he not offer to accept this as a notice of motion, knowing at this late stage of the session, with the number of notices on the paper, and with the days nearly all taken away from the private members, that it would be utterly impossible to reach this motion before the end of the session. That has been done with many other questions that have been put on this paper before, the question itself has been accepted as a notice of motion, and the Government consented to bring down the papers without going through the formality of putting another notice on the Orders for those papers.

Mr. TAYLOR. In reply to the Postmaster General and to the leader of the Government, and in justice to the civil service, against whom the Postmaster General has been kind enough to issue a veiled threat by saying that in view of my familiarity with this question, some person in the department must have furnished some information—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I did not say it.

Mr. TAYLOR—in the department or outside of the department, I would like to ask the Postmaster General to point out one question that was asked here that gives him reason to make that insinuation. I want to inform the hon. gentleman that Seeley's Bay is a village 12 miles from where I reside, and I hear of the happenings of that village every day when I am at home. Mr. Williams, who has been the postmaster, was appointed by the Mackenzie Administration. The Postmaster General and the leader of the Government have stated that he had moved 40 miles away from the point where the post office is kept. Such is not the case. Mr. Williams, the postmaster, has a business at Seeley's Bay where his wife and daughter reside. He comes home every Saturday night, and goes back to Smith's Falls. I do not know where my hon. friend resides, but I know that Mr. Williams visits his home every Sunday. His wife and daughter carry on a mercantile business and attend to the post office. Before he went to Smith's Falls he wrote me to ask if the post office authorities would have any objection. I went to the department and was informed that there was no objection as long as the office was conducted by his wife and daughter just as well as if he was there. The business there was not sufficient to allow him to make a profitable living, and he thought he could earn a little something at Smith's Falls, and he has been there for two or three years. I have so been informed by himself, and by leading Reformers in that section, because Mr. Williams was a Reformer, and is a Reformer to-day. I believe the principal charge against him is that he voted for me. Whether he did so or not, my hon. friend opposite does not know, but the chances are that he did. The office there has been closed, and a gentleman has been appointed living at the westerly limit of the village, so I am informed. A petition was got up, signed by Conservatives and Reformers, and I think it was presented to my hon. friend from North Leeds (Mr. Frost) to present to the Government, and even to Mr. Fredenburgh, the defeated candidate. Many in the neighbourhood, both Conservatives and Reformers, have told me that they signed it. The Postmaster General says there is evidence that points to information having been received by me from some official of the Government. I say this in my place here, that I have conversed with no official of the Government, either in the inside or outside service, in reference to this matter. What information I have I have gathered at home in conversation with people residing in the locality, and from that information I have framed these questions. There is not a question there to which the Minister could not say, yes or no. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who is always ready to come to the rescue of the Government, gets up and says, that the Minister was not able to answer the question whether there was a petition presented largely signed by the residents. It was not necessary to go into the details as to whether it represented the majority of the residents of the locality. He could have given the information, he could have said there was a petition. Now, I ask the Postmaster General, who, judging from what he has said here to-day, is conversant with the papers, whether he will bring them down and lay them on the Table of the House within a week or ten days?

An hon. MEMBER. To-morrow.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, to-morrow if he can have them ready then. But I am not particular for a day or two. But I will insist, if he will not promise me that he will give the information by producing the papers, as he has a right to do, and must do, that the House do not adjourn until we thoroughly discuss this matter. The questions there are plain questions that a Minister has a right to answer. Even the hon. member for North Wellington can not justify the Minister in refusing to answer all the questions that are on the paper, including the one referring to the petition. If the hon. gentleman will promise me to lay the papers on the Table during the early part of next week, I will accept the situation. But if he forces me to put a notice on the paper that will not be reached this year, I say this for myself, and I believe there are many hon. gentlemen sitting on this side of the House who will support me, that we will not accept any such treatment from the hon. gentleman occupying the Treasury benches.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I can only repeat what I told the hon. gentleman before, that my reply to him, when he asked the question, was in good faith, not for the purpose of delay, or for any purpose of withholding from the House any information.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, will you bring it down?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I must say to my hon. friend that I cannot, in self-respect, submit to any threat on the part of the hon. gentleman when he declares what he will or will not do. No Government, I think, can tolerate that, or submit to be dictated to under such circumstances. If the hon. gentleman will allow us to conduct the affairs of our departments in our own way, we will probably make as much headway. I will tell the hon. gentleman as much in regard to this question as he has a right to expect me to give here, and then we shall see whether this ought to be the subject of any further inquiry. I have told him twice what my object was, and I have only one object.

Mr. TAYLOR. I asked nothing unreasonable, when I requested the hon. gentleman to bring down the papers in a day or two.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL—

Has W. W. Williams, postmaster at Seeley's Bay, been dismissed?

You may call it dismissal or removal from office. He has been removed from office, or, at all events, has been ordered to be removed; and I cannot speak from memory, one way or the other. I believe the new appointee has been installed in office.

Were there any charges preferred against him?

I do not call it a charge against the man—it is a harsh term to use. My recollection is, that it was in evidence that he had left the place where the office was, that he neither discharged the duties nor exercised supervision over those who did.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is not correct.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That may not be correct, but I believe that is the opinion in the department, and the late Administration took the view—that, at all events, is my view—that, whilst these small postmasters are not required personally to discharge the duties, still, they are bound to be so situated that they can exercise a reasonable control over the exercise of the duties by those who are placed in charge. That is the course of procedure I have myself thought it proper to apply, and that officer was not in a position to exercise that supervision. I do not call that, however, a charge against the gentleman.

Was there an investigation ?

I believe the matter was reported to the inspector, and he reported as I have stated. I believe he also made a subsequent report, and that report is the report I had not seen, that I heard of to-day for the first time, when this question was brought before me. On 19th November last, on reading the report of the inspector, who found this postmaster was living at Smith's Falls, which, I am told, is 40 miles away, I deemed it a case calling for a change, and I directed accordingly. By some error in the department or act of authority, which was without authority, an officer in my department directed an investigation on a matter which was brought under the notice of the department, as to the proposed location of the new office not being convenient, and a second report was made by the inspector on the proposed location, regarding its convenience or inconvenience, the tenor of which I do not with certainty speak, but I think it was unfavourable as to the locality.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is that the old or the new locality ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The new locality. I say this, that the reference back to the inspector was without my knowledge or authority, and the second report was never brought to my knowledge, and I never knew of its existence until to-day, when I found it on looking through the papers with a view to making this answer. I think I have a grievance against some one in connection with that action.

An hon. MEMBER. Fire him.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not intend to fire them. I have received explanations and have accepted them. I do not wish to take that harsh view. There was a reference to the inspector ; there was this report made, put away, and I am told it was docketed up, and I did not know of it. I do not know how the contents of the report became public.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should like to direct the attention of the Minister to the fact that there is no reference to any report being referred back, or to a second report.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am giving all the information I can.

Has Mr. Williams been postmaster for the last twenty years or more ?

I really do not know, but it is not very material, I suppose. We might assume that to be the fact. The hon. gentleman lives so near the place that, no doubt, he is aware of the fact.

Mr. TAYLOR. He was appointed by the Mackenzie Administration.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Then, that would answer the inquiry.

Was the office conducted in a satisfactory manner ?

We may assume so ; he has not been removed because he was unsatisfactory.

Was the office kept at a central point in the village ?

I am unable to answer this point, but the hon. gentleman himself is familiar with the place.

Has it been removed to the westerly limit of the village, where it is inconvenient for the public to get their mail thereat ?

That is an argumentative question, and is irregular, and should not have been included in the question ; and Mr. Speaker would strike it out, if attention were called to it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You have answered it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Then, there is nothing more to be said about it.

Was a petition, signed by nearly all the residents of the surrounding district, presented to the Postmaster General protesting against any change being made ?

I do not know whether a petition was signed by nearly all of the residents or not.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is immaterial.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. On that point, I would say that, though a petition was presented, it was never brought to my knowledge until to-day.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, the hon. member for North Leeds did not do his duty.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL—

Was the change made on the recommendation of Mr. W. H. Fredenburgh, the defeated candidate ? If not, on whose recommendation was the change made ?

That is a matter for the guidance of the Government.

Has C. C. Gilbert been appointed postmaster, and by whom was he recommended ?

I do not know the name of his successor, but, no doubt, the hon. gentleman knows the name.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I desire to ask a question. If I remember rightly, the hon. Minister has stated that he has a report in his possession, which was pigeon-holed, showing that this office is now very inconveniently situated. Does the hon. gentleman intend to suit the public convenience?

Mr. WALLACE. The statements now made by the Postmaster General could have been very properly made when the question was asked by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). He had all the information under his hand, and, in my opinion, the papers brought down would not have given the information as to many of the inquiries. The questions that have been asked are very proper ones. I have looked them over. There was one referred to by the hon. member for North Wellington: "Was a petition, signed by nearly all the residents of the surrounding district, presented to the Postmaster General protesting against any change being made?" That could have been easily answered by the Postmaster General stating that there are 150 to 250 signatures, or whatever the number may be, to that petition, and allow hon. members and the public to judge whether that was the whole of the community interested or not. That question could be easily and fairly answered. With respect to all other questions, they were not, as the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said, statements. There is not a single statement there, from beginning to end. I believe the rules of the House prevent statements being inserted in questions. There are no statements made, but questions asked. Hon. members have rights in this House, and members of the Government have duties to perform, and this is not the only instance in which members of the Government have curtly dismissed questions that may have been inconvenient to answer. Taking my mind's eye back to the days when the Conservatives were in power, I know the late Sir John Macdonald recognized most fully the duty of the Government to furnish information to hon. members who might ask for it. It is true that a member may sometimes ask questions which he himself may think can be answered, but which the Minister finds can only be answered by a return, and in such case as that, the Minister has the right to ask that the return be moved for. But, Sir, in this case, the question could clearly be answered in the ordinary way. The Minister has told us just now that the report of the inspector was that the new location of the post office was unfavourable, but only a few minutes before that he told us that the location of the old post office was unfavourable, and that the new location is favourable. What are we to think when such statements are made by the Postmaster General? We are entitled to have the report of the inspector on that location, and we should have it. We have the statement of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) that he inquired from the post office authorities at Ottawa whether this postmaster might leave his wife and daughter to attend to his duties for a certain portion of each week, and the hon. member (Mr. Taylor) was answered that the postmaster could do so. It was a most high-handed proceeding on the part of the Minister to dismiss this man, when his family attended to the duties of his office and were well able to do so. It would be preposterous to suppose that in those country post offices where the salary is from $40 to $100 a year, the postmaster should give all his time personally to the duties of his office for that small sum. The usual course is that members of his family attended to his duties, and are duly appointed by the Government as his deputies. I hold that in the case of Mr. Williams, he complied with the law and it appears to me that the dismissal was totally unjustifiable. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has made threats against the officers of his own department. Well, there is not one single suggestion or question put by the hon. member (Mr. Taylor) which could not be based on the information which the late postmaster (Mr. Williams) could give, and the threat of the Postmaster General is entirely uncalled for. The Postmaster General also tells us that if the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) would permit the department to conduct its business in their own way, a good deal more headway would be made. Well, I do not know about that. Conducting business in his own way may produce good results or it may not, but we are bound to conclude that the Postmaster General conducts the business of the department according to law. However, in this case both the law and the regulations have been violated. The dismissal of Mr. Williams has apparently been made without sufficient cause and therefore the law has been violated. I hope that when the Postmaster General lays the papers on the Table of the House, they will include the report of his own inspector with regard to the location of the new post office at Seeley's Bay.

Mr. BENNETT. I think the Postmaster General might very easily have given all the information asked for in the question of the hon. member (Mr. Taylor). Why the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has not brought down this information is possibly open to the excuse that the Deputy Postmaster General is not conversant with the duties of his office, and that owing to the fact that the Postmaster General saw fit to dispense with the services of the late deputy, and took a novice into the office, who, beyond knowing the concession lines in the riding of North York and being very well conversant with the voters' list of that riding, he having aided the hon. the Postmaster General at all times and occasions in his elections, knew nothing whatever about the postal department of this Dominion. There is another good reason for the appointment of the present Deputy Postmaster General and that is, that he was an aspiring man, and the Postmaster General saw in him a probable candidate for the Liberal nomination in North York. That was one reason why that gentleman had to be foisted on the public service and the services of a very efficient Deputy Postmaster General dispensed with. I see, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. the Postmaster cannot give me his attention, but I suppose it is not necessary to remind him of the services of his present Deputy Postmaster General, because no doubt he is very well acquainted with all his deputy has done for many years past in the riding of North York.

Now, Sir, what is the position of matters? The Postmaster General has told the House that a report has been made by an officer of his department, made unknown to him and that this return was not brought down until to-day. Why, Sir, it seems very striking that in the Post Office Department there should be no regard for decency, and that the officers there do not consult their chief. I am glad that the Postmaster General is so deeply engrossed at present with the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron). Probably they are arranging the terms upon which the postmaster was expelled from the Goderich office a little time ago in order to let in the son-in-law of the hon. member for the riding (Mr. Cameron); or it may be, that there is a hiatus to-day, and that the Lieutenant-Governorship which is to go to the hon. member for West Huron is hanging in the balance, and he is endeavouring to enlist the services of the Postmaster General in that regard. I am only sorry the session of the House is on at present because I have no doubt that were it not, the Postmaster General would visit Seeley's Bay and make a personal inquiry into the matter. Why, Sir, if there is an hon. member of the Cabinet, who pays every possible attention to the duties of his office, it is the Postmaster General; for last year when there was a by-election in the riding which I have the honour to represent, there was to be found the Postmaster General of the Dominion; doing what? Attending public meetings and addressing them as any Cabinet Minister would? Why, not at all. He was visiting the country post offices; the Postmaster General of the Dominion running around from one country post office to another; imagine that, Sir! And the result was that the postmasters did not vote. Fancy; fancy, I say, Mr. Speaker, a Postmaster General whose estimate of his high position is, that in going into a campaign he should go around from one country post office to another, to see how the postmasters would vote. Fancy him doing that at the risk of having his conduct contrasted with the conduct of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who when Conservative Cabinet Ministers visited that riding. When the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) and other gentlemen of the late Conservative Administration came to the riding of East Simcoe during election times, were they to be found hanging around country postmasters to see now they would vote? Why, not at all. In the case of their visit the people beheld the spectacle of how high a Cabinet Minister could be, and in the case of the Postmaster General, they saw how low a Cabinet Minister can be. The contrast was marked.

Mr. BENNETT.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should confine himself to the point raised in reference to this particular post office. I cannot allow a general discussion on a particular motion for the adjournment of the House.

Mr. WALLACE. He is endeavouring to attract the attention of the Postmaster General to what he is saying.

Mr. SPEAKER. I will not allow any hon. member to interfere with a well-understood question of order. The hon. member who has the floor knows quite well, I am sure, that he should not exceed the general discussion of the question raised as to the answering or not answering of this question.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, Mr. Speaker, I, of course, have to bow in submission. I was endeavouring to extenuate the conduct of the Postmaster General in not going and inquiring into the details himself, because, with my knowledge of the hon. gentleman, I know that he does not deem it beneath the dignity of his position to visit country post offices.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Allow me to say to the hon. gentleman—of course, I cannot prevent him saying these things; but if he desires to give it out that on any occasion I called on a postmaster and directly or indirectly in the slightest degree, intimated to him or to any officer in the department or under me, how he ought to exercise his franchise, he is, of course, incorrectly referring to me. I never suggested to any postmaster how he should vote. On the contrary, when I have had occasion to take part in campaigns, which is my right and duty, I have studiously avoided any contact whatever with country postmasters; and I challenge any person to be able to cite one single case to the contrary.

Mr. BENNETT. Does the Postmaster General deny that he visited the postmaster in the Orillia post office in the month of February last? The hon. gentleman will not dare to deny it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will answer the hon. gentleman, because he indulges in a suggestion there. I was in Orillia for some days. I presume I have a right to use the mails, and some of the citizens of Orillia told me that there was some defect in the position of a partition in the office, so that the public had insufficient accommodation. I went into the post office in regard to that subject. That was all I went in for, and I had no conversation with any person except on that one point.

Mr. BENNETT. Will the hon. gentleman deny that he visited the postmaster in the post office at the village of Coldwater ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I never was there in my life.

Mr. BERGERON. I believe you. Coldwater is a bad place.

Mr. SPEAKER. The House will see how very irrelevant indeed subjects may be which are brought in on this question. What Coldwater has to do with the question it is difficult to see.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, Mr. Speaker, I shall take the occasion, when it is afforded to me, of calling the attention of the House to other post offices which the Postmaster General did visit during that campaign ; and if he does the riding the honour of visiting it in another election, I will produce "Hansard" with his denials of having been there, and I will produce witnesses who saw him there, and leave the constituency to judge as to his veracity. As to the question under discussion, as I understand it, the Postmaster General is justifying his conduct on the ground that this postmaster was not himself personally giving attention to the office. I can only say in reply that the Postmaster General knows very well that in the riding of East Simcoe many of the postmasters do not give their personal attention to the duties of the office. As for the question propounded by the hon. member for Leeds, I have only this to say, that the Postmaster General must have in his possession the report of the inspector of that division, and from that report there is not one of these questions which, to my mind, could not have been satisfactorily answered. To-day, after the discussion, the Postmaster General has practically answered nearly all the parts of the question that were formulated, and I think it is the duty of the Postmaster General, with a brand new Deputy Postmaster General, to give this trifling information which the hon. member for Leeds has asked.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

ADDRESS TO THE HOLY FATHER.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the House to an omission which I have discovered in the public records of the proceedings of this House. It will be in the recollection of hon. members of this House that I put a question to the Government on the eighth day of this session. That question was answered by the right hon. Prime Minister. But I found about three weeks ago that the question and the answer were omitted from "Hansard." I was called away suddenly to my home, and only returned last night ; and this is my first opportunity to call the attention of the House to the omission. The question was :

Has the Government or the Minister of Public Works any knowledge of a reply being made to the document addressed to the Holy Father and signed by forty-five members of the Senate and House of Commons, and which was read to this House by the hon. Minister of Public Works on the 30th March, 1897 ? If so, what is the nature of the reply ?

The right hon. First Minister replied that the Government had no knowledge, and the newspapers reported the question as having been put by myself and answered by the right hon. First Minister. As proof of that, I will read the reference made to it by the Toronto "Globe" of February 15th, on page 4, as follows :—

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in reply to Mr. McDougall, stated that the Government had no knowledge of a reply being made to the document addressed to the Holy Father and signed by forty-five members of the Senate and House of Commons.

My object is to ask that this question and the answer be restored to the public records of the proceedings of this House. I cannot see any reason for the omission of this question. I took the trouble of going to the "Hansard" room, and made the inquiry there, but I could not ascertain why it was left out. The question, as I said before, was put and answered.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I may observe that that question was answered, I think, by myself in the absence of the Premier.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. McDUGALL. I may say that on the same day I put the question in a little changed form on the Order paper, and put it to the House in this way on the 16th of February :

Has the Hon. J. Israel Tarte, a member of the Government, any knowledge of a reply being made to the document addressed to the Holy Father and signed by the said Hon. J. Israel Tarte and forty-four Senators and members of the House of Commons, and was read by the hon. Minister of Public Works on the 30th March, 1897 ? If so, what is the nature of the reply ? If not, does the hon. Minister of Public Works expect an answer ? If not, why not ?

You, Mr. Speaker, ruled that question out of order on that occasion, and an answer was not made by the Government. But the first time I put the question, in the first form, it was answered by the right hon. First Minister, after some little hesitation, I must say. His attention was called to it by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), who sat behind him, because he did not appear to notice at the time that I was putting the question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman speaks of correcting the records of the House. Of course, he understands that the "Hansard" is not part of the records of the House, but the Votes and Proceedings, and that the answers to questions do not go on the Journals of the House, but are only taken down by the "Hansard" reporters. As regards any question raised concerning the "Hansard," the Speaker and officers of the House have no control, but the Committee on Debates, appointed by this House; and I have no doubt that if any mistake has been made, they will look into it. I may mention to the hon. gentleman, however, that the remarks he has made to-day, on rising to a personal explanation, have, no doubt, been taken down and will go in "Hansard."

The PRIME MINISTER. I may say, that I have a vivid recollection of the hon. gentleman putting the question and of my answering it as the hon. gentleman said I did.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As "Hansard" is a very important record of the proceedings of this House, and is under the control of the Debates Committee, I think the attention of the Debates Committee should be drawn to what has taken place to-day. No doubt, they will investigate and report to the House why this important omission has occurred.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman could have taken a more expeditious way of having the matter corrected, by calling the attention of the committee to it, instead of bringing it before the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think he adopted precisely the correct mode. It is not the business of any member to hunt up the Debates Committee and draw their attention privately to a matter which is of public interest. The proper place for my hon. friend to raise the question is here. It is of vital importance to every member that there shall be a correct record in the "Hansard," which costs the public a large sum of money, and, when attention has been drawn to the fact that there has been an obvious neglect on the part of the reporters of the "Hansard," it becomes the duty of the committee appointed by this House to investigate the matter and let us know the result.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is exactly what I have been saying—that it is the duty of the committee to look into this matter, and that the hon. gentleman should call the attention of the committee to it.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to call the attention of the hon. Postmaster General to returns which I asked for during last session, and would like to know when they will be down.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I did not catch what the hon. gentleman said, but I gather from his remarks that he was calling attention to some orders of the House which, he says, have not been complied with. If the hon. gentleman would have the kindness to send me a memo. of the orders referred to, I shall at once give attention to the matter.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. CRAIG. I must confess that I resume the discussion of this subject with some hesitation, Mr. Speaker, because it is impossible for me to say anything new on this question after the speeches to which we have listened during this debate. I suppose, however, that it is only by discussion in Parliament on both sides of the House that the people of the country become informed on public questions, so that fair and thorough discussion is a very important element in the education of the people. I have no intention of speaking at any great length to-day, and I shall endeavour, in all I say, to treat the subject in a fair and reasonable manner.

I shall first give attention to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald). In closing his statement, he said that he was not prepared as well as usual, but I must say that I was rather surprised at the great number of subjects to which he gave attention. The first subject he noticed was the Yukon Railway. He thought it was most unfortunate that this Bill had been thrown out by the Senate, and expressed the opinion that the Senate was no longer a necessary part of the Government of this country. Well, I am happy to say that, not only the Conservatives, but a great many Liberals, and some prominent Liberals in this House, do not agree with the hon. gentleman. They think that the Senate discharged a most important duty in rejecting the Yukon Bill, and further, that the Senate did considerable service to the Government of the day by the course they took. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I entertain the same opinion myself. I thought that it would be a good political stroke for the Conservative party, if the Senate allowed this Bill to pass; but, at the same time, I, of course, felt that in so acting they would not be doing justice to the country and their own sense of duty.

Then the hon. gentleman went on to put the question: What was expected of the Liberal party? I may reply that a great deal was expected of them before they came into power, but, as to what is expected of them to-day, I would find it very difficult to answer that question. The hon. gentleman said they were expected to reduce the tariff, and did reduce it; and, in order to prove this, he instanced the 25 per cent reduction which will come into effect on the first of July on goods from Great Britain and some of the colonies. Well, I think that that 25 per cent preference was a most politic stroke on the part of the Government, and I think so for this reason. Most of the regular tariff has not been reduced very much at all. Most of the duties have been retained as they were under the Conservative Administration, and a great many Liberals were not at all satisfied. They are not satisfied to-day, but they console themselves with the reflection that the preferential clause makes a large reduction. In that way they reconcile themselves to the course of the Government, and try to make it appear that the Government has been consistent and has carried out its pledges. I must say that my hon. friend from East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) is very easily satisfied, if he thinks that the Government has fulfilled its pledges with regard to the tariff. I shall refer later to some of these pledges, but I repeat, he must be very easily satisfied, and that his party fealty evidently overrules his better judgment.

The hon. gentleman went on to say that the Liberal party had been accused of wearing the clothes of the Conservative party, but that that was not the case, because these clothes were not large enough for the progressive Liberal party. I think that the clothes of the Conservative party would be quite large enough, if the Liberal party had not only adopted, as they practically have done, the tariff of the Conservative party, but were willing to admit that they have. But, when we find that they want to travel in two directions, when we find that they have adopted a protective tariff, and yet want to make people believe that they are going in another direction, then the clothes of the Conservative party will not fit them at all, because the Conservative party, whatever else it may have been, has always been consistent on this question.

Then the hon. gentleman took up the subject of expenditure, and I was rather surprised to hear him say that the Liberal party had promised to reduce taxation, as far as the expenditure would allow. That would have been a very safe promise to make, because the expenditure can always be kept up or increased to any amount by the Government. But that was not the promise they made at all, and what do we find their performance has been? We find that the expenditure is not being reduced, but quite the reverse. We find that it is being increased, and I have no doubt that, if the revenue increases, they will contrive to likewise increase the expenditure, and then the hon. gentlemen will, no doubt, still pretend that they are really keeping their promise of reducing the taxation as far as the expenditure would allow. I propose to show that this was not what they promised at all. The hon. gentleman said, further, that the Liberal party had promised to be more honest and pure than the Conservatives had been.

And he said that they had not had any great scandals, and so on. Now, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) remarked the other day, they have only been twenty months in power. It certainly would be remarkable if during only twenty months of office there were any great scandals for us to point to. I think we must give them a little longer time in order to show what they can do and will do. I sincerely hope, as we all hope, that they will be honest and pure. I was a little surprised when the hon. gentleman went on to remark that some members of the Conservative party tried to pass slurs upon prominent members of the party opposed to them and made insinuations as to their honesty and political straightforwardness. He designated this as political clap-trap, loud-mouthing and that sort of thing, and he read a lecture to this side of the House on that subject. Well, it seems to me that he ought to read a lecture to his own side. If there ever was a party that indulged in abuse of political opponents it is the Liberal party of this country. When the late leader of the Conservatives, Sir John Macdonald, was alive, as we all know, the Liberals continuously abused him. Their great organ, the "Globe" newspaper, in Toronto, followed him with abuse of the very worst kind. And the present leader of the Opposition has been subjected to similar abuse. I am not in sympathy with this sort of thing; I do not believe in abusing men in political life; I believe in showing them up if they have done wrong, but I do not believe in making insinuations against them or slandering them. I hope that in this matter the Conservative party will not follow the example of the Liberals. Public men have enough to bear without being subjected to slanders and innuendoes.

The hon. gentleman went on to refer to what the Liberal party had done in carrying the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal. Whatever may be said about the merits of this question, I think we must all admit that the Senate did great service to the country in throwing out the Drummond County deal last session. The result has been that the Government has made a new bargain which saves hundreds of thousands to this country. This is a complete justification of the course of the Senate and of the Conservative party and a condemnation of the Liberal party for making any such bargain as they made last session.

Then the hon. gentleman went on to talk about the canal system, and said they proposed to spend three and a half millions in deepening the canals. Any person not familiar with the circumstances of the case would imagine that the Liberal party had inaugurated this policy of deepening the canals. As a matter of fact, it was the Conservatives who inaugurated this policy of deep waterways. I am glad that the Liberals are carrying out this part of the Conservatives' policy, as they have adopted so many other parts of it. I have no fault to find with them for pursuing this policy, but I do find fault with them for trying to lead the public to believe that this policy is original with them.

Then the hon. gentleman says that the Liberal party caused the prosperity of the country. I confess that I could not understand this part of the hon. gentleman's speech. I think it could be accounted for only in the light of what he said in his opening remarks that he was not so well prepared to discuss the question as he would have liked to have been. In this connection I may refer to the remarks of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning the exodus to the United States. We used to hear a great deal about the exodus. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that it has ceased. We have not the information before us, but we hope that what they say is true. The hon. gentleman says that our young men, instead of going to the United States, go to our great North-west. I wish to tell the hon. gentleman, that at the time to which he refers as having been marked by so great an exodus, our young men had no North-west to go to, and to find an opening in a new country they had to go to the United States. And who was it that opened the great North-west? Sir, it was the Conservative party, and further, the Conservative party opened the great North-west in the face of the strongest opposition of the Liberal party. So, for the hon. gentleman to claim credit for the exodus being stopped because our young go to the North-west is absurd. We claim credit for that, as we have a right to do.

The hon. gentleman cast a slur upon the Conservative party on account of what he called the gerrymander. I wish to say that the men who carried this Act in the Dominion Parliament were only apprentices to the business compared with the men in Ontario. Why, Sir, in the provincial gerrymander, the townships were cut up and the whole thing was arranged by the Ontario Cabinet in a most scientific manner. In this matter also the hon. gentleman had better turn his attention to his own side and give them the benefit of his lecture instead of directing it at us.

The hon. gentleman made one admission which I was not surprised to hear him make now, though I should have been surprised to have heard it when they were in Opposition. He said that free trade was impossible. We all know it, but many members of the Liberal party did not know it a few years ago. They used to talk loudly about free trade. The gentleman who opposed me in my constituency talked free trade and sought to make the farmers believe that they should have free trade if the Liberals were returned to power. He learned that lesson from speeches made in this House. While these gentlemen may have thought absolute free trade was impossible, they gave the people the impression, that if they were returned to power, they would bring about absolute free trade, or as near it as possible.

I do not intend to say more as to the speech of the hon. member, but I propose to address myself to some of the remarks made by the Finance Minister and also to speak upon two or three planks of the Liberal platform. I have no idea that I shall convert any member of the Liberal party or that I shall convince any of them that they were wrong before or are wrong now, but I may give them a few twinges of conscience and help them on a little in the right path. Now, first, as to economy. When the Liberal party was in Opposition they talked a great deal about economy and declared that the Liberal-Conservative party was most extravagant. If the Liberal party were returned to power, how economical they would be. They would not overtax the farmers or spend the money of the people extravagantly. They held up their hands in holy horror at an expenditure of thirty-eight million. They looked back to the time when Alexander Mackenzie was in power, and the expenditure was about twenty-three millions and asked the people to compare Conservative extravagance with Liberal economy. They forgot to say—that they are making an excuse now—that the country had grown in the meantime. They forgot to say that great public works had been undertaken by the Conservative party and carried out successfully. They simply declared: If you will put us in power, we will be economical and will guard the money of the people as carefully as if it were our own. Now, I will read some figures which have already been read in this House. We find that the average expenditure under the Conservative rule, from 1889 to 1896, was $36,800,000. In 1895 the expenditure was nearly $37,000,000.

Now, what did the Liberals say about this? The leaders of the party declared on many platforms in this country that if the Liberal party came into power, this expenditure could be reduced and would be reduced from 1 to 4 million dollars. Well, Sir, the people believed that, I think that had a great effect on the minds of many people. They said: Why, is it possible the Conservative party are wasting 1, 2, 3 or 4 million dollars a year? Is it possible that what these men tell us can be true, that if they are placed in power they will reduce the expenditure to that extent? If this is so, it is time we had a change. Many people thought that. But what do we find? We find that in this current year there is an expenditure of $38,750,000, or an increase over 1895-96 of $1,800,000. We find further that the first estimates for 1898-99 are over 39 million dollars. There is no sign of reducing the expenditure, the expenditure is increasing instead of diminishing. I wondered, as I saw the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) get up and speak a little while ago, whether he would get up and protest against this enormous expenditure, this increase to $39,124,000 for the current year, without any Supplementary Estimates at all. Why, if the Conservative party had brought down estimates of that kind, I do not know what the member for North Wellington would have said. He would have become almost frantic, the country would be on the verge of ruin. But everything is all right now, because the Liberal party bring down these estimates, and they are quite right. I do not think we will hear him raising his voice against these estimates at all. There is nothing said now about reducing these estimates, on the contrary, this is what the Minister of Finance said :

I think hon. gentlemen themselves will admit that it will not be possible to continue the expenditure on the figures of 1895-96.

Which was about 37 million dollars. He admits that there must be an increase over that amount. Then the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in his speech, made excuses for this. He said : The fixed charges are about 20 million dollars—now we cannot touch them. Well, I do not remember him saying anything like that when he was in Opposition. He used to blame the Conservative party although the fixed charges were about 20 million dollars. Now, he says that 20 million dollars is fixed absolutely, and they have no control over them. That is one of the excuses that he makes to-day for this increased expenditure. He turned round to the Minister of Public Works when he was speaking, and said : I find that in the department of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works there is an increase, but I have no doubt he will be able to give good reasons for that. How easily satisfied they are to-day. If there is an increase, we can give a good reason for it, they say. If there is a slight reduction, then they claim great credit for it. So you see it is all twisted round. Because their party is in power it is all right, but when the Conservative party was in power, it was all wrong. I think the people will see through this, they will see that there is not much sincerity in this sort of argument. It seems to me it would have been better for the Minister of Finance, and for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and for every member on that side of the House who says anything on this question, to confess honestly, either that they did not know anything about what they were talking when they complained about this expenditure in Opposition, or else that they were trying to humbug the people. But they won't admit that. They say now that these expenditures are all necessary. Well, we said they were necessary at that time, but they would not accept our excuse, what we said had no avail. We said these expenditures were necessary, and we showed they were necessary, but that did not matter with them. They went over the country insisting how extravagant these men were. But now, because they have brought down these estimates, which are a great deal larger than the Conservatives ever brought down, they can give a good reason for everything, and everything is all right.

There is another question on which I wish to say a word, and that is the question of reciprocity with the United States. I remember how the Liberal party talked about reciprocity, if they got into power they could get reciprocity in twenty-four hours. They said : It is no use the Conservative party trying to get reciprocity with the United States because the Conservative party have not been friendly to them, the Conservative party insisted on their rights in every dispute, and so they cannot expect to get favours from the United States. The Conservative party replied that they did not ask any favours, they asked for fair-play, they asked for a treaty which would be mutually beneficial. But the Liberal party said : Oh, well, you cannot get it, besides you are not trying to get it, you are only fooling the people. Now, I believe that they themselves were only fooling the people by this talk of theirs. Have they made any honest effort to get reciprocity? I do not think they have, or if they have, they have miserably failed. So every word they said to us on that question comes back on themselves, and can be quoted against themselves with ten-fold more force than they used it against the Conservative party.

There is another thing they said very often they would do, and that was to lighten the burdens of the people. How much they cared for the people in those days. They were always talking about the people of this country, how solicitous they were for their welfare, and how they pitied them for being under Conservative rule, how they were being taxed, how the Conservatives were bleeding them white, as one hon. member said. They promised to lighten the burdens of the people. Now, what does that mean? Well, I can only give it one meaning, and it is this, that they would take less money in taxes from the people of this country. But are they doing that? Let us see whether they are or not. I find that under the Conservative Government, from 1892 to 1896, inclusive, the customs receipts averaged $19,840,000. Now I find that under the Liberal Government, in the year 1896-97, the customs receipts were $19,891,000, or $50,000 more. But I find that in the year ending 1898 the Finance Minister estimates the customs receipts to be $21,000,000. I find in addition to that that there will be an increase of the debt for the year 1897-98, of $4,500,000. Now, Sir, I do not see how this is lightening the burdens of the people at all. I cannot understand how this pledge is being carried out. We find that instead of taking less taxes from the people, they are taking a million dollars more than the Conservatives did during the four years preceding the advent to power of the Liberal Government. Now, is that lightening the burdens of the people? If it is, I do not understand the meaning of that term. Moreover, instead of reducing the debt by any increase of taxes which they receive, they are going further into debt, the debt for this year will be increased by $4,500,000. If they were receiving more money in customs from the people as a result of improved business, of more goods coming into the country, and if they took the surplus to pay off the debt of the country, then I could understand what they meant by talking of lightening the burdens of the people. But they do not reduce the debt as the result of receiving more money in customs, but on the contrary they increase it. Then, I say, that instead of lightening the burdens of the people, they are increasing them.

Now I will say a few words about the reduction of the rate of interest in the post office savings bank. We are told that the people of this country have about 50 million dollars in these savings banks. Now, the Government a while ago, reduced the interest from $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to 3 per cent, and now they propose, beginning at the 1st of July next, further to reduce the interest to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. To my mind, there is not the slightest excuse for this. I have no doubt that the only reason, or the principal reason, why this is done, is because the banks of this country have brought great pressure to bear upon the Government to do this. We know that the banks subscribed for a large part of the recent loan at low rates. Perhaps they got more than they expected. They put in tenders, and I think they got about what they tendered for. The Government had to do the banks of the country a favour, and they have done a favour to them and not to the people by reducing the interest in the savings banks from 3 to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. What is the reason given by the Finance Minister for his action? The great reason given is that it will reduce generally the rate of interest throughout the country. But the rate of interest generally is being rapidly reduced, not in this way, but by money being brought into the country. It is coming in through the loan companies and the rates of interest are being reduced all the time, and I hold that it was striking a blow at thrifty and saving people by reducing the interest on their deposits from 3 to

Mr. CRAIG.

$2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I do not view this matter in a political light, but it is unfortunate that people who have small savings, perhaps \$100, \$200, \$300 or \$400, should have the rate of interest reduced, and I was surprised to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce state that people who had \$1,000 on deposit did not deserve any sympathy. That is not very much to have on deposit in the savings banks, and the depositor no doubt had earned it by hard work and by depriving himself of many luxuries and by practicing self-denial, by depositing perhaps one dollar at a time until \$1,000 was reached. Surely such a man is deserving of as much sympathy as the depositor who has saved \$100. While the depositor with \$1,000 at the present time receives \$30 annually, he will for the future receive \$25, and thus \$5 will be taken away from every \$1,000 depositor in the savings banks. It is a most unfortunate step for the Government to take, it will not be a popular step, and I venture the prediction that the people will not get money cheaper at the general banks of the country on this account. The Minister of Finance said the inner circle had already felt the benefit. I hold that the inner circle can take care of itself and look after their own interests, and that it is not the business of the Government to look after millionaires; but we do want the Government to look after depositors of small amounts, acquired by hard work and possibly privation, and on behalf of these people I protest against this reduction proposed by the Government. The Finance Minister said that the outer circle, and those who have not very good credit have not got the benefit of it yet. They are the parties, however, who need assistance, and instead of the customers getting any advantage, the banks will obtain it. I think the Government should take every precaution possible to assist the people in obtaining a proper return for their savings. It is a good thing to find workingmen and working girls saving their money instead of spending it and scattering it around, but unfortunately the inducements to save are less now than before the reduction in the rate of interest. The return on \$100 for the future will be only \$2.50 yearly, and some people may think it is not worth while to save in order to obtain such a return and will spend the money; and on this ground alone the action of the Government is unfortunate. I am satisfied that if the Government consulted the people they would find no general desire to make a reduction in the rate of interest paid at the savings banks, but rather that the working people, who wished to save money and deposit it in a safe place, should receive as much interest as the Government is able to pay. The Government can afford to pay 3 per cent. They obtain money abroad for $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, including all charges. The people have the first claim on the Government in this regard, and the step taken by the Finance Minister has been made, no doubt, at the instance of the banks, which are looking after themselves and do not think of the poor people who have money on deposit in the savings banks.

There is another unfortunate feature of this change. People will go to private banks and deposit money there or to loan companies, and run a great chance of loss. Suppose a man has $1,000 and he can obtain $5 more interest by depositing it with those who are in the inner circle, he may be led to do so, for this sum may appear to be an important amount to a poor man or woman. I do not suppose, however, it is any use to give the Government advice, but I think they should retrace the step they have taken and make the interest on money in the savings banks at 3 per cent.

I now proceed to another promise made by the Liberal party when in Opposition, and that is their promise to abolish protection. I was rather amused at the ingenious manner in which the Minister of Customs stated that they had fulfilled this promise. He said they did not promise to abolish protection, but the principle of protection. That was a good way to put it. I never heard hon. gentlemen opposite, however, state when in Opposition that they objected only to the principle of protection; they declared that protection should be abolished and entirely wiped out. I am glad they have not carried out their threat, for the sake of the country. I made the remark the other day to the effect that I was glad they had not fulfilled their pledges, and I did not blame them. I might have blamed them in a moral sense; but I was glad they have not fulfilled their pledge to abolish protection. The Finance Minister, in speaking on the tariff, said that sweeping changes are not desirable, and we must be guarded against tariff tinkering; but at the same time he said we must not regard this tariff as final. I can imagine the hon. gentleman turning around to protectionists and saying: tariff-tinkering is a bad thing, we must have a stable and permanent tariff, so that the people shall have confidence; and shortly afterwards turning around and saying: I do not mean that the tariff must be regarded as final; you free traders need not be alarmed. During the election in Toronto, the present hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) said that the tariff was fixed, in his belief, for ten years. He said further that it would be a good thing for the business men to have a friend at court rather than a member of the Opposition, who would have no influence with the Government, and that if he found the Government tinkering with the tariff or reducing it, he would take care to look after their interests, and he believed the tariff would remain as it was for ten years. The Finance Minister evidently does not agree with that opinion, although I believe in his heart he does so. I do not think there will be many changes in the tariff during the next ten years. I hope the party will not be in power that long, but if they are in power, there will not be many tariff changes or reductions. This session the only change made in the tariff—this is a horrible thing for me to say—is not a reduction, but an increase. Let hon. members think over the fact that this is the action of the Liberal party, which promised to reduce taxation. There is only one change in the tariff, and it is an increase, and it is an increase on an article used by people all over the country. It is horrible to contemplate a party so far lost to all sense of decency that, after all the predictions and promises made by them to make sweeping reductions, it makes only one change and that is to impose direct taxation. We have had protection applied so that the people did not have to pay increased burdens, but they are giving a bonus to refiners by their increase in the sugar duties, after a course of action which they condemned loudly when in Opposition. Then, the Finance Minister, in the course of his speech, proceeded to give the manufacturers a lecture. They are no doubt very much obliged to him, but I trust they will not take it to heart too seriously. He stated that if the manufacturers want protection they must fight for it, that eternal vigilance is the price of protection. Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to cast a slur on the manufacturers and made most undeserving reflections on their ability and enterprise. The hon. the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) said to the manufacturers of this country: During the last eighteen years, when the Conservative party were in power, you have been spending your time trying to get more protection. If instead of doing this, you had been perfecting your machinery and finding out how to make goods cheaper, you would have been far better employed. I hold, Sir, that the manufacturers of this country are not open to any such lecture from the Finance Minister. Our Canadian manufacturers have been perfecting their machinery and cheapening their products, and they have kept themselves abreast of the times. They have constantly watched the Government of the day, as they had a perfect right to do, but I maintain that, in doing this, they have not wasted their time; I maintain, Sir, that they are the equals of any manufacturers in the world. Any one reading the remarks of the Finance Minister, would draw the inference that Canadian manufacturers have been leaning entirely on protection, and that, were it not for protection, they would be completely wiped off the face of the universe. Well, I do not think that remark was intended for the manufacturers of Canada by the Finance Minister; I think it was rather intended for his free trade friends. The Finance Minister and his colleagues opposite, before they got into power, tried to please the manufacturers, and, now that they are in power, they have got to try and please the men who believe in a revenue tariff. Hence it is that their words and their actions are inconsistent. Be that as it may, as long as by their actions they maintain the policy of protection, I care very little how they talk.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word or two with reference to the question of binder twine. It is a most unfortunate thing that the Government have selected this article to discriminate against, and I do not believe they can give any reason why it should be so selected. They have not discriminated against agricultural implements, but true, there may be a reason for that. I suppose a good many of their friends are in that business, and that may be a reason why they have not discriminated against the agricultural implement business. Why, in the name of common sense, should this Government leave the duties on agricultural implements as they were before they came into power, and remove the duty on binder twine? That is a question I submit for the consideration of the Government, and I trust they will answer it, when they carefully think it over. An hon. member from the North-west told me that he did not want free binder twine, because, as he said, he believed the farmers should pay their fair proportion of the taxation and expenses of the country. There are gentlemen opposite who say, they do not believe in a protective tariff, but they do believe in a revenue tariff, and yet they allow American binder twine to come to Canada without paying a cent to the Canadian revenues. They allow this binder twine in free, and in consequence, although they get no revenue from it, the Canadians engaged in that industry either have to take low wages or to remain in enforced idleness during part of the year. I have always held that binder twine can be sold in Canada as cheaply as in any other country, and that fact is true to-day. These manufacturers in the States do not pay one cent to the Canadian revenue, and the men who work for them do not buy one dollar's worth of produce from Canadian farmers, or wear one dollar's worth of clothes made by Canadian manufacturers. The binder twine makers in this country did buy the produce of the Canadian farmers, and did contribute to the revenue, but their industry is wiped out without any apparent reason, to benefit foreign workmen from whom the revenue of the country receives no contribution whatever. I hope that even yet the Government will see their way clear to place a small duty of 12½, or even 10 per cent on binder twine, so that, if they do not do it by way of protection, they may at least collect a revenue tariff from the imported article.

I wish, Sir, to make a few references to the question of preferential trade, about which we have heard a good deal recently.

Mr. CRAIG.

The Minister of Finance, in his recent Budget speech, said, referring to the policy of the Government on this matter :

This was not brought about, and will not be brought about, by huckstering,— Mark the word, Mr. Speaker.

—or on the part of any of the colonies in making demands of an unreasonable character, but it will come as a result of a grand Imperial sentiment, which will override all questions of an economic nature.

Again, the Finance Minister says :

Government not demanding impossible conditions, not asking things which they knew or should know the British public were not prepared to grant, not raising any demands of an unreasonable character, not trying to have any huckstering or bargaining in the transaction.

Well, Sir, that sounds very high-toned, but it is a very simple way of doing business, when you give everything away for nothing. If you act in that way, you can do it without any "huckstering," to be sure, and, in fact, you can do it without any ability whatever. The Conservative party, when in power, were endeavouring to secure a real preferential arrangement with Great Britain—a preferential arrangement which would be mutually advantageous to Canada and the mother country—and I do not see that there was anything very disgraceful in that. The Conservative party are now taunted with bargaining, in the carrying out of their policy, and as asking something unreasonable. Well, the Conservative party, or any other party in this country, have a right to make a bargain for the benefit of Canada. This Parliament—not the Conservative party alone, but all this Parliament—is not sent here to look after Imperial interests. I hold that the Imperial Parliament can look after Imperial interests, but I hold that it is our duty, in this Canadian Parliament, to look after the interests of the Canadian people, who sent us here. And, while it may be right for us to do everything fair which will bring about this grand Imperial sentiment which we are told is going to override all question of economy, yet we must remember, in this Parliament, that we should not give away too much of what belongs to the Canadian people. There is no disgrace in a government trying to make a bargain for its country, and, in my opinion, it would have been far better if this present Government had bargained. It would have been better if this Government had tried to obtain concessions from the British Government—such concessions as the Conservative party demanded, when they were in power. The Finance Minister taunts us here with bargaining and with huckstering. Well, Sir, that is a very impolitic remark for him to make, but it seems to bear out the conduct of the Prime Minister in England, who forbore to make any demands on the British Government, and who, in fact, it would appear, would not take even all that was offered to him. The remarks of the Finance Minister, that the demands of the Conservative party were impossible and unreasonable, are, in my opinion, very unwise, because, Sir, I have hope that even yet, in spite of all that has been done by this Liberal Government to prevent it—even yet we may, by a bargain, secure a preference for Canadian products in the British market. I have the hope, that some day the British public will be so enlightened, and the British Government will be so enlightened, as to see that it is in their interest to give a preference to their own colonies which give a preference to them. I see nothing disgraceful in a bargain of that kind. I know, indeed, that men who are absolute free traders smile at anything that savours of protection. I notice my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Edwards) smiling at that. He believes in free trade, but he does not agree with the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), who does not believe in free trade. He does not agree with any other member on that side of the House. I do not believe there is any other member on that side of the House who talks such rubbish as absolute free trade. I call it sentimental nonsense, and nothing more. It is a very nice sentiment to talk about; but when you get down to practical business, there is no such thing as free trade on the face of the globe. Men talk of the British public having free trade. They have no such thing. They have a great many taxes, and customs taxes, too. They admit a great many articles free, because it is in their interest to do so. I believe the British public are not guided in these matters by Imperial sentiment, but by hard common sense. I do not blame them for that. I think that is the way our legislators should be guided, if they are to do all they can for the people of Canada, and not allow themselves to be carried away by grand sentiments which do not amount to anything.

The hon. Finance Minister spoke about helping Jamaica, a sister colony in distress. That is a very good sentence; it sounds very well, and I give the hon. gentleman credit for making it. He believes we ought to help this sister in distress. Well, how is he helping her? He is doing it by making the duty on sugar just about what it was before. After raising it to a certain point, he then says: "I will cut it down 25 per cent," and he brings it just about to what it was before. But in doing this he raises the duty on sugar from many other countries. And what does he do in order to help Jamaica, the sister colony in distress? He puts a tax on the sugar of the people of this country to the amount of about $300,000 a year. That sounds like a very nice contribution, but after all I do not think it is helping the sister in distress. I think the Government are helping themselves in distress. The Finance Minister told us the reason for putting on this duty. It is this: "When we take off the other 12½ per cent of duty under the preferential tariff, making the reduction 25 per cent, there will be a loss of revenue, which we must make up, and we do it by putting a tax on sugar." So he makes this plea of helping a sister colony in distress as an excuse for putting an extra tax of about $300,000 on sugar. I admire the Finance Minister's ingenuity. I think he shows that he is fitted for his position in this House. I hope, however, that the people of the country will not be humbugged by swallowing all this talk about helping a sister colony in distress; because it is the Government themselves who are in distress, and who want $300,000 more taxes to make up what they will lose by the preferential tariff. The Liberal Government are indeed a liberal Government. How are they liberal? They are very liberal with the people's money. I do not know that they are very liberal in other respects, but they are liberal in that respect. As one member suggests, they are liberal in giving away gold lands and coal fields. They are liberal in giving away something that belongs to the people. They have done that to a great extent. The preferential tariff shows that. This helping of colonies in distress reminds me of Artemus Ward in war time, when he was willing to sacrifice all his wife's relations for the sake of the country.

The Finance Minister goes on to congratulate the country and the Government themselves and the Liberal party on the condition of the country and on the results of the policy of the Government announced in April last. He also congratulates the Opposition on the failure of some of their very gloomy predictions made in 1896 and 1897. I may remark that the congratulations for those years were entirely due to the National Policy, and not to the present Government at all, and I am very glad on behalf of the Conservative party and on behalf of the National Policy to accept these congratulations and to thank the Finance Minister for giving them to us, because in 1896 and 1897 the National Policy was in force. Now, let me say something about the predictions of the Conservative party—those gloomy predictions which have not turned out to be correct. Well, Sir, on what were those predictions based? That is a very important question. I say those predictions were based on our faith in the sincerity of the Liberal party. We believed they meant what they said when they pledged themselves to do away with protection and reduce the tariff down almost to free trade, or tending towards free trade. We thought then, and we think now, that if they did that, it would be disastrous to this country. They themselves have been converted to our view. Why do they pretend that they have carried out their pledges and promises to the people of this country?

The Minister of Customs, in his speech yesterday, said that they had carried out those pledges, and were going to carry out everything else. Well, I cannot find that they have done it at all, and I am very glad they have not. He said they had carried them out, because they had done away in their minds with the principle of protection. Well, if they continue to do those things in their minds, and give us a new definition of the word, they may do what they like in their minds, so long as they do not interfere with the progress of this country. Now, I would ask the Minister of Finance a question. When he was congratulating the country on its continued prosperity and its increased prosperity since they have been in power, I would ask him what would have been the condition of the country if they had succeeded in carrying commercial union? I would ask the Liberal party that question, because they do not believe in commercial union to-day. They have entirely changed their ground on that question. But supposing they had carried commercial union, where would have been the country to-day? I do not think it would have been in the proud position it occupies. We might ask the same question about unrestricted reciprocity, with discrimination against Great Britain. Where would the country have been to-day if they had carried unrestricted reciprocity, which they almost carried, which they did their best to carry, and which was defeated only by the superhuman efforts of the Conservative party and its great chieftain whom we miss so much to-day? If they can congratulate the country, it is due to the Conservative party, and they ought to thank the Conservative party, who kept them from carrying out the designs they had at that time. I believe the sensible members of the Liberal party—and there are some sensible men among them—do thank the Conservative party that they were prevented at that time from carrying out the policy of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity; because it would have landed us, I believe, in great trouble and distress; and instead of having this sentiment of loyalty and the preferential tariff for Great Britain which they glory in to-day, we would have had a preferential tariff and almost free trade with the United States of America, with discrimination against Great Britain and all other countries in the world. Then the Minister of Finance pays high compliments to the farmers. Well, Sir, he cannot pay too high compliments to the farmers. I agree with everything he says about the farmers being the source of prosperity to this country. I am going to read what he says:

The general business of Canada has been prosperous because prosperity has come to the great agricultural class.

I am glad to hear that admission because in reading another part of his speech you would imagine that prosperity had come to this country because the Liberal party had come into power. But here he admits that it is because the farmers are prosperous. I suppose he does not claim that we have good crops because the Liberals have come into power. I know that the late Sir John Macdonald used to say, in a joking spirit, that the country had good crops just because he was in power. But we always looked on that as a joke, and I hope that this Liberal Government does not claim that because it happens to be in power and the crops are good, the one is the cause of the other.

Mr. CRAIG.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. (Mr. Fielding). Will you not allow us to have our joke?

Mr. CRAIG. Certainly I do. The hon. gentleman went on to say:

Let us remember that that prosperity is due chiefly to the success of the farmers, and let us see that by every reasonable and proper effort we shall endeavour to encourage the development of agriculture throughout the Dominion, and encourage the farmers to produce not only for the home market but for the markets of the world. Our farmers everywhere are applying themselves to their work with intelligence and skill.

Listening to the words or reading them, one would imagine that the Government had given some fresh encouragement to produce, not only for the home market, but for the market of the world. And here I may say that I am glad the hon. gentleman realizes the importance of the home market, for that is the great market after all for our farmers, the one which consumes the greater part of their products. But the Government have done nothing new. Our farmers have not been encouraged to further incentive by anything new in the policy of the Liberal party. Why, it was the Conservative party that encouraged the farmer to produce for export to the markets of the world. It was the Conservative party that inaugurated the system of cold storage, and the fast line, and the experimental farm. We did everything we could for the agricultural community, and I commend this Government for continuing that same policy, because I agree with the Finance Minister that the prosperity of the farmer is at the base of the prosperity of this country. The hon. gentleman went on to say: "Let us encourage the farmers." That is what we all say, and that is what we all intend.

An hon. MEMBER. By putting a duty on sugar.

Mr. CRAIG. An hon. member says that the Liberal party are encouraging the farmer by putting a duty on sugar. But perhaps the Finance Minister expects that that will encourage them to work a little harder. I remember in the old times their being told by the Liberal party to go home and work a little harder and eat a little less. We do not give the farmers that advice to-day, but we believe in encouraging them. Who was it opened Manitoba and the North-west and built the Canadian Pacific Railway, so that our farmers could settle in that country and produce wheat which is the admiration of the world? I need not say that it was the Conservative party which did all these things, and I am very glad indeed to know that the Liberal party are following in our footsteps in these matters. I commend them for so doing. I am glad that they know a good thing when they see it, and that even though they are aware that the Conservative party initiated these things to assist the farmers, the Government are willing to carry them out and expend money for the same purpose.

The hon. Finance Minister went on to say that the Government were gratified at the manner in which the tariff policy of last year was received by the country. Well, I think we were all gratified, but why was the country gratified? I know that the country was gratified with the tariff policy because the fears which the people entertained were allayed by the action of the Government. What did the country fear? The merchants and manufacturers all over the country feared that the tariff policy of this Government was going to be a radical change on that of the previous Government, and that protection to home manufactures was going to be taken away. They were justified in those fears by the speeches made in different parts of the country by the leaders of the Liberal party. Now, however, they find that their fears were groundless, and it is no wonder that they received with satisfaction the tariff policy of the Government, because it was not half so bad as they were afraid it would be. They were afraid that the business of the country would be entirely upset by the Government, and were gratified to find that the common sense of some members of the Cabinet prevented such a consummation. I believe that there are some members of the Cabinet who would have gone to extremes, I believe that some members of the Cabinet had talked so much on the subject that they succeeded in persuading themselves that they were right. But the common sense of the others prevented the Government taking an extreme course. What did we find in the formation of the Cabinet? We found that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who was looked upon as the coming Finance Minister, was not allowed to go out into the country at all to enunciate his well-known views on the public platform. I heard a well-known Liberal say, before the election came on, as I was travelling on the cars: If you want to succeed in the country, you had better keep Cartwright at home. He must have told the other members of the Government this, or they must have known it themselves. They must have recognized that the country was in favour of protection, and so they kept him at home, and when the Cabinet was formed he did not obtain the position people were afraid he would, but was given a position in which he could not do much harm. I congratulate the Liberal party on having discarded and thrown to the winds their former tariff policy. They found the country did not want it but that, as a whole, it is in favour of moderate protection. Of course I do not expect them to admit this in so many words, but they have admitted it by their tariff. I am glad that they have abandoned their former policy, and have practically adopted a policy of moderate protection. I hope with the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) that the Government will stick to that policy, and that there will be no reduction in protection and no serious tariff changes for the next ten years at least. I do not care what they say about abolishing the principle of protection, for that is a sentimental idea, so long as they do not abolish the thing itself. I hold that protection is necessary in this country and am willing to sustain in that the Government so long as they retain it. It is specially necessary because we lie along the United States which has a high protective tariff, and which has advanced very much in manufactures, and is always ready to dump into this country its surplus manufactures in order to keep up prices in its own. I do not object to the Government calling their tariff a tariff for revenue only, so long as it is in reality a protective tariff.

I was rather amused to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) say that luck has been with the Liberal party. He is perfectly right, and I thank him for that admission. Luck has been with it since it came into power. The right hon. First Minister himself was very lucky, to have just become Premier when the Jubilee celebration was at hand. He went to the old country and represented Canada in that celebrated fete of the Queen's Jubilee. He was lucky in that, and the party has been lucky since—lucky because the farmers have been prosperous, and have had good crops, lucky because mining development has assumed great proportions, and because business improvement has been moving along for these reasons. But I regret that this luck has not attended the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself, and I am moved to make this remark, not for any personal reason, but because of remarks which he made himself with reference to the ex-Minister of Finance. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said this:

Now, sir, it has been remarked by persons who take an interest in that kind of thing, that there are few sights dearer to God and man than to see a good man struggling with adversity.

I am bound to say that I, like the noted Scotch divine, feel a little compassion even for a naughty man under similar circumstances.

I remark how apt a description this hon. gentleman gives of his own position. We might say that he is an object for our compassion under these circumstances. I do not press the subject further, but merely mention it on account of the hon. gentleman making this remark about the ex-Finance Minister. I hope, however, the Government will not imagine that the good luck which has attended them will keep up for ever. I hope they will not depend upon luck, but will govern the country well and will keep out of such transactions as the Drummond County Railway deal, the Yukon deal, and all deals of that kind. I hope that the Premier will try to hold his followers in better check than some of them are held at the present time, and will not allow them so much liberty. I trust he will try to conduct the Government on strictly business principles. For eighteen years the Conservative party governed this country. Under Conservative rule the provinces were consolidated, the Canadian Pacific Railway was built—against great opposition from the Liberal party—Manitoba and the North-west were peopled up, and Canada was made a nation. We have heard a great deal about Canada becoming a nation in one night. It seems that the Premier went to bed one night, when Canada was only a speck on the map, and when he woke up, Canada was a nation. And he rejoiced. It was truly a wonderful transformation scene. Sir, Canada was being made a nation under the Conservative party, led by the greatest statesman of this country—I might say, the greatest statesman of this century—the late Sir John Macdonald. Under the wise, strong rule of himself and his successors for eighteen years, Canada became a nation, and was recognized as a nation, quite as much as today, by Great Britain and by the republic to the south of us. If the Liberal party were lucky, the Conservative party were unlucky. In five years, during one Parliament, this party lost three leaders, three Premiers. No party ever suffered such misfortune before. It is no wonder, under the circumstances, that the party became a little demoralized. Why, I can imagine the demoralization of the party on the other side, if their leader were taken away. I sincerely hope he will not be. But what would be the condition of that party, if he were taken away, and another leader, and another? I hold that, considering the circumstances, the Conservative party deserves the sympathy of the country, and that it struggled along in a way worthy of admiration.

I wish to say, in all sincerity, that I am not sorry the Liberal party came into power. And why? I will tell you why. I am glad because getting into power has made them loyal to the Empire. I do not say that they were disloyal before, as individuals, but I say that we never heard very much of their loyalty as a party. In 1891, when we were fighting the battle against unrestricted reciprocitiy, at a political meeting in my constituency, at the town of Port Hope, a gentleman, speaking on behalf of the Conservative party, spoke of the loyalty of that party. The gentleman on the Liberal side who followed, pooh-poohed the idea, said he was tired of this loyalty talk, and did not want to hear more of it. By such speeches as that, they were training the young Liberals of this country, not to be disloyal, perhaps, but not to be proud of a strong sentiment of loyalty. The Liberal party has become loyal to the Empire, as they were not loyal before. They had their eyes turned more towards the country to the south than towards the Empire, so far as trade relations are concerned, aye, and in far more than trade relations. To-day they are loyal, and it does us good to hear them talk of their loyalty; they cannot talk about it too much for me. I hope they will keep on being loyal and will do everything they can to forward the interests of the Empire. We hear no more about unrestricted reciprocity or of commercial union. But there is one more matter that is more important than loyalty to the Empire, and even a stronger reason why I am glad they have got into power—it has made them loyal to Canada. I maintain that they were not loyal to Canada while in Opposition. How do I prove it? In those days, as I remember, prominent members of the party talked about this country being ruined, about it going to the dogs, about the people leaving it, about the black flag floating over every farm, about every farm being mortgaged. I have before made the remark, that, if at that time I were a young man, living in Europe and intending to emigrate, and read all this about Canada, it would be enough to keep me from coming here. These gentlemen, for party purposes, were decrying this country; they were trying to make the country believe that the Conservative party were bringing the country to ruin, and they almost succeeded in persuading some of the people to believe it. I was speaking one day with a gentleman about the prospects of the farmers in my constituency. And what I told him was this: If you want to find a farmer who thinks things are going wrong, go to a Liberal. He has been taught by his leaders that the country is going to the dogs and that he is being oppressed and ruined by the party in power. The Conservative farmer, on the other hand, may not be making so much money as he would like to, but he is satisfied that things are going along pretty well. So, I say, the Liberals were not loyal to the country, because they were decrying it. They did this, not that they believed there was anything really the matter with the country, but because they thought it was good political tactics to make the people dissatisfied. And I said before, and I say now, that if there was an exodus, a great part of it was due to the speeches of such gentlemen as the hon.

member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who decried this country, who, instead of encouraging our young men to stay here, made them think it was a good thing to go away from a country governed by the Conservative party. And now we find that their eyes have been opened, and they can see what they could not see before. I do not know whether it is because they sit on that side of the House that things look different, but I suppose it is. At any rate, they do see things in a different light. The "Globe" newspaper, that used to be continually talking about ruin and disaster, says now that everything is prosperous. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) smiles at this. I do not think he ever ran down the country. He was too well trained, and is too good a Conservative for that. Hon. gentlemen are now sitting on the Government side of the House, and so they see things differently; everything is lovely, the country is prosperous, and I have no doubt they will continue to say so as long as they are in power. I hope the country will continue to be prosperous, even though they remain in power. Good times are more to me than any Government. If hard times are necessary to put these hon. gentlemen out of office, I hope the times will remain good for ever. I prefer the interests of the country to any party, and I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will do all they can to make the country prosperous. I hope they will look after the workingmen of this country, and will do everything they can to furnish employment. I hope they will see that articles are made in this country that can be made here. I hope they will do everything they can for the farmers of the country. In every well-considered proposal looking to this end, they may count on my assistance.

But getting into power has done more than make these gentlemen loyal. It has shown the people of this country how much these hon. gentlemen meant by all this talk about ruin and devastation; it shows the people how much they meant by all the promises they made.

Why, it shows that they were humbugging the people all the time. If they were honest they would get up and say so now. I think it would be a good thing for them to make a confession once for all, so that we could say no more to them about it. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was the chief sinner, would only get up and confess that after all what he said was not so, that he was guided by party exigencies, and that he had to talk as he did in order to get the Conservative party out of power, then I think we would be able to forgive him a good deal. It is a good thing after all that the Liberal party has got into power, because they have shown the people of this country that things before were not as they described them, that they did not mean what they said, and it is a good thing for the country to know that. Sir, I have sometimes thought that among the Liberal party there was a good deal of what might be called pharisaism. Why, Sir, they stood on a high plane, and the poor Conservative was looked down upon as a publican, he was down below, he could not do anything good at all, nothing was too bad to be said about him, but nothing was too good for the Liberal party to say about themselves. But they are now in a position where the people can judge them at their true worth, and the people are finding that they are just like ordinary men who. I have no doubt, are trying to govern this country as best they can, who are trying, under a Conservative tariff, to raise the public revenue, and I wish them success in that matter. But for the future I would commend to them, and I think they have already learned that lesson, to have a little more charity and a little more modesty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I rise to ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments to make a personal explanation. The Minister of Finance was anxious that I should give him the words in which he had declared that the British preferential tariff was not in operation last year. He did not feel inclined to take my view of it, and I shall now comply with his request by reading a single line of what he said at Sheffield.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Read a few more, please; do not confine yourself to a single line.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not want to take up the time of the House. The hon. gentleman challenged me for the proof, and in the fewest possible words I will state on what ground I made the assertion that he declared when in England that the British preferential tariff was not in operation. He said:

For the present, therefore, there is no preferential tariff in Canada for British goods.

That is the language used by the hon. gentleman in the speech at Sheffield, and I have quoted it verbatim from the papers which published that speech the next morning. I need not say another word on that subject. Now, a much more important question arose between the Minister of Customs and myself. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that I was mistaken in supposing that I had criticised the tariff with regard to the sugar question at the last session. Well, I referred him to the Minister of Finance, who surely could not have forgotten. But my hon. friend the Minister of Finance would give no support to my statement; he seemed under the impression that I was wrong in having adopted that position—in fact, both these gentlemen, I think, stated that the "Hansard" had been searched in vain to find any confirmation of my statement. Now, I will detain the House for a few minutes while I give them the ground on which I made my statement. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the "Hansard" of last session, page 4395, they will find the following:—

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

The House again resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

"All sugar above number sixteen Dutch standard in colour, and all refined sugars of whatever kinds, grades or standards, one cent per pound."

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) propose to make any change in this?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). No, we do not propose to make any change.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) if he has any information as to the effect of these sugar duties as now arranged on the West Indian sugar trade at Halifax? There is a very strong feeling there that a very serious injury will be occasioned by that duty.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is somewhat mistaken as to the position of the matter. The item in which the West India trade is more particularly interested is the first item in the schedule. Upon that item we have made no change. The item stands exactly as it was before. I am prepared to say that it is represented by the West Indian trade that the specific or flat duty of one-half a cent a pound on all grades of sugar does not encourage that trade; and that is well worthy of consideration. We have found some difficulties, however, at the present stage of the session in the way of reopening the question, and we are inclined to think that it is better that the matter should stand for a few months longer, during which we will consider the question of changing the form of the duty when Parliament meets again. The particular product in which the West India trade are interested is raw sugar, and on that we have not made any change.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But still the alteration made in the duties has struck a severe blow at the West India trade.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, I think that is hardly correct. It is not the alteration of the duty which they object to; but it is the flat duty, which my hon. friend inserted in his tariff, and which, like all specific duties, bears somewhat hardly on the lower grades. The sugar question is always a very difficult and complicated one; and, after full consideration, we have come to the conclusion that it is better to allow the matter to rest for the present than to attempt to make a change now which might meet the views of the West India trade, but might not on the whole satisfy all parties concerned.

The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) then made some remarks, and the Minister of Finance answered. In the present state of my voice I will not read these two speeches, but I will go to what I said in reply to the Minister of Finance:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend seems to think that the West India trade is alone affected by the duty on raw sugar, and that inasmuch as he has not changed that duty,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

he has not done anything to interfere with the West India trade. The hon. gentleman could wipe out the West India trade completely, and still leave the duty on raw sugar just as it is. What is to be done with the sugar after it is brought in is the question on which the subject turns; and, therefore, it is a mere evasion, in my opinion, to say that the West India trade is not seriously affected because the duty remains on raw sugar as it was before. I do not question the statement of the hon. gentleman that the West India trade may not have been satisfied with matters as they stood. My information is that since the change of tariff made by hon. gentlemen opposite the merchants of Halifax have sent to 140 parties with whom they were trading in the West Indies, directing them not to forward any sugar. In fact, they regard the change made by the hon. gentleman as not only having struck a severe but a fatal blow at the West India trade; and I do think there is a great deal of force in the suggestion of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) that, inasmuch as the hon. gentleman admits that after all the consideration they have given to this subject they have not yet made up their minds whether the policy they have adopted is one that it will be wise to continue to maintain, it would be reasonable to leave the question open, as it stood before, for consideration a little longer, and not thus, by a change which they themselves are not at all satisfied will be permanent, disarrange more thoroughly than before so important a trade as that between Canada and the West Indies. I really think that my hon. friend would be consulting the interests of the Government, and I am sure he would be consulting the interests of the country, if, until he is able to give this question such consideration as to leave no doubt in his mind as to what course should be pursued, he leaves matters as they were before. I submit to my hon. friend that it is not too late to adopt that course, and it would be a course perfectly consistent with the statement he has made to-day.

My only object in drawing attention to this matter is to justify myself, since it became a question of fact as to whether I had drawn the hon. gentleman's attention to this question of the condition of the West India trade, and to the belief on the part of the gentlemen connected with that trade that the change made last session was a serious blow, and increased the difficulties under which that trade had been. I think I have satisfied the hon. gentleman that I was not mistaken in the statement I made that I had drawn his attention to this important question in that discussion which I have just read. I have satisfied him that it was in the "Hansard," notwithstanding that he was unable to find it. I have only to thank the House for allowing me to make this personal explanation.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I must ask the consideration of the House while I add to the personal explanation offered by the hon. gentleman. The extracts he has read are very interesting, but they do not happen to be, for any earthly purpose, a defence of the position which the hon. gentleman took.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman mistakes me. I am not arguing the question. I am dealing simply with the question of fact raised by the Minister of Customs, that he had not found in "Hansard" evidence that I had referred to the question of the West India trade last year.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I also will deal with the question of fact and refer to the statement made by the Minister of Customs, which I confirmed, and which I shall show was absolutely correct. First, however, I will consider for a moment some remarks made by the hon. gentleman with respect to a speech delivered by me before a public gathering at Sheffield. The hon. gentleman pursued the somewhat extraordinary course of selecting part of a sentence from that speech—I doubt whether he selected even a whole sentence—out of a report which occupied a column and a half in a leading daily paper. What is the point at issue? The hon. gentleman had used an argument to the effect that we had practiced a tricky deception on the public of England with respect to the preferential tariff, and that the people only discovered the true character of that preferential tariff when I made what the hon. gentleman called a confession at Sheffield. I have stated to the hon. gentleman repeatedly that what I said at Sheffield was this: that the Government of Canada had designed to establish a preferential tariff that would affect the mother country, that we had put the tariff in operation, that it had been in operation for several months, and that when it ceased to be in operation, it ceased, not by any action of the Parliament of Canada or the Government of Canada, but by reason of a course taken by the Government of Her Majesty itself. Therefore, Canada did intend to give preference to England and did give preference to England, and when the preference ceased to exist, it ceased by reason of the action of Her Majesty's Government. How out of that statement and the causes so far as they exist the hon. gentleman can make anything in the way of a tricky deception is more than mortal man in this House can understand.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has entirely misapprehended the position. How did this question arise yesterday? The Minister of Customs was showing what was accomplished during the past year under the preferential rate.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, he was not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And I told the hon. gentleman it had no existence last year, and when he challenged the accuracy of that statement, I said the Finance Minister, at Sheffield, stated that the preferential tariff with England was not in existence last year, and I quoted the hon. gentleman's remarks. I did not require to quote a column of the hon. gentleman's speech to confirm that statement; all I wanted were the 'ipsissima verba' of the hon. gentleman, which I read, in which he declared that for the present, that is until subsequent legislation, there is no preferential tariff in Canada for British goods. That was the question between the Minister of Customs and myself, and nothing else. The question of the deception practiced on the English people I have gone into at length, and given evidence of it; but this was the special point—did or did not the Finance Minister at Sheffield declare that there was no preferential tariff for British goods? I have given the words out of his own mouth, in which he declared that there was no preference.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman might as well find a declaration made by me that his name is Charles Tupper. Everybody knew that the preferential tariff had ceased to operate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the whole question.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There has never been any question as to that in the mind of anybody who understands the matter; the hon. gentleman himself knows better, and he is simply trying to delude himself into believing anything else.

Mr. COCHRANE. If everybody knows it, why had it to be stated?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Many things have to be stated and restated, and they are none the worse for being repeated. Every one knows the Lord's Prayer, but he is better for saying it over and over again. Perhaps the hon. gentlemen opposite could not repeat it, and my remark may not apply. Passing from my speech at Sheffield, in regard to which it is stated that I said something that everybody knew, let me say a word or two with respect to the sugar question. What was the issue there? The Minister of Customs referred to something the hon. gentleman had said the previous evening; and what was it? I have not at hand "Hansard" for to-day, but I am sure my words will be borne out by the official report. The Minister of Customs said the leader of the Opposition had referred to some proposal he made for the benefit of the West India trade last year, that he had submitted some scheme with respect to the West Indies and we had not listened to his proposal. The Minister said: I do not know what the proposal was.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will tell the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am coming to what the hon. gentleman proposed. I am now only discussing what occurred between the Minister of Customs and himself. The point was that the Minister of Customs had called attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman had been endeavouring to convey to this House the idea that he had proposed some great measure of relief for the West India trade last year, and that we would not listen to it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will tell you what it was.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am coming to that. I know it. I have not "Hansard," but I remember every word of it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is here. I have read it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Let me state what occurred. The Minister of Customs said he was not aware of any proposal that the hon. gentleman had made, and he was informed by those who had looked through "Hansard" that they could not find any such proposal. That is exactly what was said.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Then the hon. gentleman said the Minister of Finance would tell him what it was. I said I did not know what it was, and that he could not tell what it was, for he had made no proposal. The "Hansard," if hon. gentlemen will turn to it, will confirm my words; and I have a fair memory for these things. Now, did the hon. gentleman make a proposal last year for the relief of the West India trade? The hon. gentleman complained that we had done—what? That we had reduced the duty on refined sugar 14 cents per 100 lbs. Was that the trouble with the West India trade at that time? If you give the refiner a protection of a dollar per pound, you do not thereby help the West India trade. So long as the refineries are running, and they have been running all the past year, the question of the protection to the refiner does not concern the West India importer. He is concerned with the method by which the duty on raw sugar is levied. The complaint in regard to the West India trade was on that point. The hon. gentleman—I am quoting his own words—said that our chances had struck not only a severe blow but a fatal blow at the West India trade. He said that was the complaint of the West India trade. I said they made no such complaint. The complaint was that the old duty, a flat specific duty of 50 cents per 100 pounds, had not been changed. The complaint was that we continued an injustice perpetrated by the late Government. So far as that complaint goes, we are willing to meet it. We continued that system for a year. I have already stated what the reasons were; but the point I wish the House to understand clearly is, that the change we made in the sugar tariff last year had no relation to the

Mr. FIELDING.

West Indies because it did not touch the duty on raw sugar. The hon. gentleman made no proposal. His contention was to leave things alone; his proposal was to leave the duty as it was. Was that meeting the complaint made by the people of the West India trade? They were saying that they wanted a change in the raw sugar duties; but the hon. gentleman said, let the duty alone and make no change. That was his position. The hon. gentleman declared that he made some sort of proposal which he urged on the House for the relief of the West India trade. No such appeal was made by him. I have stated that he made no such proposal. Let hon. members read the "Hansard" extract which he has read and they will find his suggestion was to let the duty alone. The West India merchants complained that the system was not a fair system, that under it the tax on high grade sugar was no more than on low grade, that we taxed 58 per cent on low grade and 22 on high grade; but the hon. gentleman said, let it alone, allow it to stay as at present. That was the hon. gentleman's proposal, if he made any proposal, and yet he dared to stand up in this House and state that he made a proposal for the benefit of the West India trade and that we would not do anything in regard to it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman had better regard the hour and not waste too much time in preventing any answer being given to the observations just made. I will tell the hon. gentleman what I proposed. I made a most important proposal, but the hon. gentleman was as ignorant of the subject of the sugar duties and the sugar trade a year ago as he is now. What was that ignorance? Why, Sir, the ignorance was this. The hon. gentleman did not leave the sugar duties as he found them. He made a change, and the proposal I made was not to make any change, but to hold his hand.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, that is correct.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What was the result? The result was that the change he made, as I have shown, induced the merchants in Halifax engaged in the West India trade to write to 140 of the parties from whom they had ordered sugar: "Do not send it."

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman has not shown it; he has only said it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman would not allow me to interrupt him, and now he must bear the infliction for a few moments. What did I show him? I showed him—and I have just read from "Hansard" my statement—that he could crush out and destroy the West India trade completely without touching the duty on raw sugar. That was what the hon. gentleman did not understand then, and what he pretends he has not learned since. But he has learned it. He has learned that the West India sugar trade was a trade which, without the slightest alteration in the duty on raw sugar, could be completely wiped out, and the change which the hon. gentleman made was one that was regarded by the West India merchants of Halifax as a fatal blow to that trade; and the proposal I made to him was to hold his hand and not make the change which he did.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I want just a word in reply.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Six o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand that while I was temporarily out of the Chair there was a sort of unanimous agreement come to that these two hon. gentlemen might be as much out of order as they liked. This is all out of order; but, that being the case, I think the hon. gentleman had better be allowed to continue.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am afraid the hon. gentleman went a little further in his remarks than the passage he has read. I think he rather conveyed the impression that last year he proposed some of the very things we have proposed this year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not at all. On the contrary, although I told the hon. gentleman that I was glad to have any measure adopted that was calculated to restore the West India trade to Halifax, I did not approve of the proposals which the hon. gentleman had made, and I do not approve of them now. They make a very bad case better than it was; but if he had adopted the policy which I read from the "Globe" newspaper in my speech the other night, he could have rescued the West India sugar trade of this country without adding one farthing to the taxation of the people of this country. But that did not suit the hon. gentleman. Under the pretense of restoring the West India trade, he wanted to wring out of the pockets of the people of this country some $200,000 or $300,000 of additional taxation.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend was so unsuccessful in saying these things the other night that I do not wonder that he wants to say them over again in the hope that by repeating them often enough he will get some people to believe them. I do not want to go into the discussion. It is simply a question of fact. The hon. gentleman has said that the West India merchants represented that the change made last year was a fatal blow to the West India sugar trade.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have read the evidence.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman has not read a particle of evidence that that change interfered in the slightest degree with the gentlemen engaged in the West India trade. I have conversed with gentlemen engaged in that trade, and I state now that that is not the fact, and that the hon. gentleman has not a shadow of foundation for the statement. The change desired was simply a change in the method of levying the duty on raw sugar. The hon. gentleman wanted it left alone. That is the only thing he proposed, and the statement that our tariff levelled a fatal blow at the West India trade is a statement for which there is not a shadow of foundation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The foundation, Mr. Speaker, is found in the fact—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must say that everything is out of order. I really cannot see that the understanding can be carried out, unless these two hon. gentlemen continue here by themselves.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will agree that the hon. gentleman shall finish it, and I will say nothing.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We will leave it where it is, then, Mr. Speaker.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a few remarks in reply to the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) who has addressed the House at considerable length this afternoon. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) made many charges against the Reform party; charges of omission as well as charges of commission, and he tried to prove three things, first, that the Reform party had stolen the clothes of the Conservative party; second, that the Reform party since they came into power have not kept their pledges to the people, and third, that instead of reducing the debt of the country since they came into power the Reformers have increased it. Now, with regard to the charge that we stole the clothes of hon. gentlemen opposite, I have but to say that it would be a sad hour indeed in the history of the Reform party of Canada, when they were compelled to clothe themselves in the filthy rags that have been worn by hon.

gentlemen opposite for 18 years. The history of the Conservative party of Canada has not been very creditable; their career has been much in line with the career of every Government that has adopted protection as a principle. Even the history of England shows that under protection, rottenness, corruption and debauchery of the worst type reigned. Protection brought the people of that great country almost to the verge of starvation. The landlords of England, Scotland and Ireland extorted from them heavy rents and declared that if the ports of the old country were open to free corn, the agriculturists would be virtually ruined. But after suffering from these conditions for a long period of years, the people of the motherland afterwards threw off the shackles of protection and adopted free trade. From that day down to the present, they have experienced continued prosperity, until to-day England is the most advanced, the wealthiest, the most progressive nation in the world. She has no equal. Now, Sir, the Liberals of Canada contend that although during the past eighteen years Canada has made considerable progress, yet, that she did not make that rapid progress which a new and richly endowed country like this should make; and we believe, too, that her lack of advancement is largely attributable to the policy and administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. But, Sir, these gentlemen take credit for everything; the hon. gentleman from East Durham (Mr. Craig) took credit to the Conservative party for the enlargement of the canals, and for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He surely must know that the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, when Liberal Prime Minister of Canada, let the first contract for the deepening of our canals, and as to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway the question which divided the Liberals and Conservatives was not as to the necessity of the work, but as to the manner in which it should be carried out. The Reform party at the time claimed that it would be better to build that road as the development of the country demanded, and if that policy had been followed out the probabilities are that it would have been all the better for Canada to-day. But hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to realize this, and the wonder to me is that amongst the claims made by the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) on behalf of the Conservative party, he did not claim that they built the Rocky Mountains. The hon. member (Mr. Craig) told us that the Liberals promised honest and pure government. So they did, and so they are giving it. I trust that hon. gentlemen opposite will set themselves vigorously to discover anything that is dishonest in the administration of the present Government. I assure them that they will get every opportunity of making a thorough and exhaustive investigation into the public expenditure of this country, and if they can prove that there is anything dishonest and corrupt, the people of Canada will appreciate their efforts in that direction. I earnestly hope and believe, as an humble follower of the present Cabinet, that hon. gentlemen opposite will not be able to show that there is anything dishonest in the present Administration. There is nothing more desirable in the interests of Canada than that we should have an active and efficient Opposition in this House, and I am glad to notice that gentlemen on the other side are developing in that direction. During the first and second sessions of this Parliament they appeared to be very much lost. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) this afternoon claimed for the Conservatives the credit of having inaugurated the system of cold storage, and be that as it may, the fact remains that these hon. gentlemen have evidently been on cold storage for the last two years. I am glad to say that they now seem to be getting reconciled to the changed conditions under which they exist as a political party. They no doubt fancy, as they have very good reason to fancy, that they will remain on the Opposition benches for many years to come, and I trust that during these many years they will be justly able to lay claim to an earnest discharge of the duties which devolve upon them as a loyal Opposition in this House. Now I hope we are going to have honest government, and I believe we are. I hope that the period of disgraces and scandals, of Curran bridges, of Tay canals, of Langevin blocks, is passed never to return.

Now, my hon. friend spoke at considerable length on the question of free trade. I am sure that it would be a delight to the majority of the people, yes, to all the people of this country, if Canada were in a position to adopt absolute free trade. But we know that we are loaded down with a national debt and with responsibilities that, in the meantime, absolutely preclude the possibility of our adopting the principle of free trade—that is, free trade as they have it in England. But, after all, we can commence to shape our policy to that end. While England adopted the principle of free trade in 1846, it has taken her a long time to reach the goal of her ambition in regard to free trade, and she has hardly reached it even yet. She has made progress towards it year after year until now you can count on your fingers all the articles on which she levies import duties. We have started in the right direction. We have declared that protection shall not exist in this country as the chief principle on which the tariff shall be levied. That declaration we intend to carry out. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim that we have protection still. I hope they may be able to convince the manufacturers that, even after the reduction of the duty on British goods after the 1st July next they are realizing all the advantages of protection that they realized under the late Administration. But I am satisfied that hon. gentlemen opposite will have very great difficulty in persuading the people of this country that the system that they inaugurated and which was enforced for so many years prevails now to the same extent as it did when they were in power. I think the people are already beginning to realize considerable advantages in the prices of every day commodities owing to reduced prices, and, from year to year, as duties are still further reduced, they will realize the more the results of the adoption of a policy by the efforts of this Government to secure to the people the necessities of life at the lowest possible cost.

Now, the hon. gentleman said further that we had promised economy. I believe that the members of this Government are anxious to economize as far as it is possible to do so; and while, in past years, we did point out that a very considerable saving could be made if the affairs of this country were properly handled, we realize that there are difficulties in the way of hastily bringing about the reform that I have no doubt will come, though more gradually. I know as do other hon. members, that since the present Government took office, when reductions are made in the civil service staff or in the number of employees on the Government railways or in the Post Office Department, hon. gentlemen opposite unite in a yell and wail that the Government are treating harshly and cruelly men who should be kept in the Government employ and allowed to draw Government pay, notwithstanding the fact that if they were discharged it would not be necessary to employ others in their places. We know that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals discharged some men on the Intercolonial Railway and immediately there was a howl, and it was said that he had done it to serve party ends and that it was wicked and cruel. We know also that in the Post Office Department men were dismissed who were considered unnecessary, and immediately an appeal was made to have them reinstated. In the face of these influences, it is hard for a Minister to make the reduction that I think should be made and that I earnestly hope will eventually be made. For my part, I do not believe that any member of the Cabinet will be able to reduce the civil service staff, inside or outside, to proper proportions except with the assistance of a civil service board of supervisors. If such a board were created, I believe it would be comparatively easy to make the reduction that should be made. I know very well that hon. gentlemen opposite look upon the civil service of this country as a little Tory preserve to be kept for the lambs of the flock; and so, when any others are appointed there is considerable complaint. But these hon. gentlemen must begin to realize that there are men in the employment of the country for whom there is little or nothing to do, that there are men who are absolutely inefficient; and if a Minister removes one of these men, they must recognize that it is in the interest of the country that it is done. And I earnestly hope that more will be done in the future than has been done in the past, because I believe that Canada today has a thousand civil servants more than are absolutely necessary.

Now, the hon. gentleman said also that the present Government had increased the annual expenditure. But had he taken the figures submitted by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, in which the new expenditures are shown by themselves, he would have found that in the old expenditures a very respectable reduction has been made. Nobody will say for a moment that it was not the duty of the Government to provide the necessary service for the Yukon district. Nobody will challenge the course of the Government, I think, in providing the necessary service for the Rossland district in British Columbia. Moreover, the Crow's Nest Pass Railway is responsible for a considerable increase of expenditure, and it met with the approval of hon. gentlemen opposite as well as of those on this side of the House; in fact, none of these questions were pointedly and determinedly opposed when presented by the Government. In view of these additional expenditures, I think it is hardly fair to put the whole volume of expenditure together and say that very large increases have taken place. The proper way is to take the several departments, as stated before these new avenues for the expenditure of money were opened up and make an honest and fair comparison. If hon. gentlemen will do this, I think they must admit that there has been considerable reduction.

Then the hon. gentleman said something with regard to reciprocity, that the Government had promised when they came into power that they would secure a reciprocity treaty with the United States, and would do everything in their power to bring about more friendly trade relations with the people to the south of us. But the hon. gentleman must remember that about the time we came to power, and the party in the United States that had introduced a tariff very considerably lower than the previously existing one was deprived of power and the Republican party gained control. This party it was that passed the Dingley Bill, which was even worse than the McKinley Bill, before it, and passed it without any reference whatever to what course Canada might deem it prudent to take. Since that there has not been any evidence of any desire on the part of the people south of us to do anything with regard to reciprocity. But I have not the slightest doubt that the Government is keeping its eye open to anything that may transpire which may lead to more friendly intercourse between us and them, and will be prepared to take advantage of it.

Then the hon. gentleman said that we promised to take less taxes from the people I contend that we are doing so. When you take into consideration, Sir, the very great increases in the exports of our products and the very positive evidence we have of the improved condition of our people under the present policy, you cannot help being convinced that the policy of this Government has been so far a success. Hon. gentlemen opposite attribute this success to luck. They say that the right hon. First Minister has been very lucky. Well, if he has, all the better for the country. The people are well satisfied with their present condition, they are well satisfied with the progress that has been made, they are delighted with the improved condition in which they find themselves, and after all taxes to a people who have the means to meet their obligations are not so serious as they are to people struggling with difficulties and embarrassments and trying to make headway against bad times, which was the condition of the people when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power.

The next thing my hon. friend spoke about was the reduction on interest in the Government savings bank deposits. For my part, I am anxious that every inducement should be given to the working classes of this country to lay by their savings, so as to have something for a rainy day; and I think it is good policy for the Government to offer them any reasonable inducement to do so. I should have been glad if in the adjustment of the rate of interest on deposits, there had been a sliding scale established, and that on very small sums the rate of interest had been kept higher than on larger sums, and I frankly admit that the country should be willing to pay its own subjects a rate equal to what it has to pay when borrowing in a foreign market. But at the same time, I do not think it is right that we should pay an excessive rate, and the action of the Government will, I believe, eventually prove an advantage because the banks have complained for years that the Government were borrowing local funds in competition with them, and thus prevented their extending accommodation at the reasonable rates necessary. If our manufacturing institutions are to prosper. I have no doubt that while the poorer classes may complain perhaps about not receiving as many cents on their few dollars as they otherwise would, when the whole mass of the people is taken into consideration, this change will prove an advantage, everything considered.

I had some difficulty in following my hon. friend, for he travelled up and down the record. He touched upon protection two or three times, and he twitted us with having abandoned our policy to abolish protection. I think, on the contrary, Mr. Speaker, that we have made rapid strides in that direction. When you come to consider the very considerable reduction, in addition to what has already been made, that will be made the first of July next on all goods imported from Great Britain, I think you must admit that the people of this country will experience very great relief indeed in this matter. I went over the items of the goods that we imported during the past year from Great Britain. Our entire imports of dutiable goods amountd to $21,338,661, on which the duty collected was $6,520,055. On the first of July next there will be another reduction on the duties, and should we import the same quantity of goods—and the probabilities are that we shall import considerably more owing to that reduction—we will have to pay $815,000 less than we did during the last year. I think that is making a very considerable reduction, when you take into consideration that fact that a reduction of one-eighth has already been made. But if you will take into consideration the whole amount of the reduction in the tariff from what was charged under the National Policy, our people will actually get these goods from Great Britain at $1,630,000 less than they paid for them under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite.

The leader of the Opposition said that there were increases in many cases. That may be true, but the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) admitted that levelling up the whole tariff, taking everything into consideration, the duty was a fraction of one per cent less than what it was under the old tariff. If that be the case, then the people will reap every dollar of the advantage I have just stated, because while in some cases the duties are slightly increased, on the whole there is a reduction, and the result now to the people will be the saving which will take place when the full benefit of the preferential clause comes to be realized.

My hon. friend (Mr. Craig) has stated that he hopes there will be no change in the tariff for ten years. If the people of this country are as well content under the existing tariff for years to come, as they now are, with very few exceptions, I shall not be surprised if the popular sentiment would point in the direction of leaving the tariff as it is. So long as it gives satisfaction, it will be the part of prudence for the Government not to make any change; but from year to year, I have not the slightest doubt that evidences will present themselves to clearly indicate what changes are necessary, and as from session to session the experience of the people is applied to the working of the tariff, any changes that are necessary will no doubt be made.

I venture to predict that every change made will be in the direction of lowering to the people of this country the commodities that they require, and in the direction of eliminating every vestige of protection that is left in the tariff. We claim that the present tariff is a revenue tariff. Now what is the difference between a revenue tariff and a protective tariff? Hon. gentlemen opposite, when they made their tariff, invited all the manufacturers of this country, every man that made anything from a needle to an anchor to present his reasons why he should have protection, and every advantage that he asked for himself under the tariff which he said was necessary in order to make his business successful, was willingly and cordially granted by the then Minister of Finance. Now was he in a position honestly and fairly to hold the balance between the consumers of this country and the manufacturers? He was not, for the simple reason that he required to be a skilled mechanic himself in all the different lines of manufacture in order to enable him justly to hold the balance between the producer and the consumer. But he was entirely at the mercy of the producers. They came here and presented their arguments, they gave their plausible reasons and they went away full of satisfaction. They got all they wanted, and the result was that year after year the tariff was increased and increased. One time it was raised to 22½ per cent, then to 25 per cent, then to 27½ per cent, and then to 30 per cent, and as they were able plausibly and cutely to present to the Minister of Finance their arguments why the tariff was not yet high enough, why they had not protection enough, why they could not make money enough, he was willing to accede to their requests. Under the application of that tariff combinations were formed, men were made wealthy simply because they were able to humbug the ex-Minister of Finance into the belief that they needed all that protection in order to enable them to make a living. Now what is this change, so far as our tariff is concerned? The hon. the Minister of Finance has declared that the great guiding principle which will prompt him in arranging the tariff, is that the necessities of the country shall be the first consideration, the amount of money to be raised shall be the leading feature of the tariff, and if there is any incidental protection at all in the application of a tariff of that kind, all right, we have no objection to it, we are perfectly willing that they should have it. We believe that is the true and honest principle. The people of this country have a right to expect that that principle shall be carried out. The Government has started in that direction, and I believe they intend to implement every promise that they made. Now, I hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will be able to distinguish between the tariff that they themselves lived under, and the tariff that has been adopted by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and I think that they will in time get educated to know the difference, and that they will not charge us any more with having stolen their clothes. From time to time we intend to see that combinations are not formed. For instance, my hon. friend from West Durham this afternoon asked why it was that the duty was taken off binder twine. Well, he has been a member of this House for quite a number of years, and I am rather surprised that he would virtually expose his ignorance by asking that question. Now, why was the duty taken off binder twine? Simply because a combination was formed in Canada, and only that there was a combination that was supposed to extend throughout the United States, and that combination was so powerful that it was considered absolutely necessary, in order to give the farmers of this country relief, that twine should be admitted free in order, if possible, to break up that combination. I hope that from year to year, as there are evidences of other combinations being formed, the Government will do with them the same as they have done with binder twine, place them upon the free list in order to relieve the people from the extortions to which they would otherwise be subjected.

Now, my hon. friend had a good deal to say with regard to preferential trade. I am sure there is not a member in this House who would not be rejoiced if we could persuade England that it would be to her advantage as well as to the advantage of the colonies, to consent to preferential trade. No doubt it would be quite a boon to the people of this country, and I am sure that every Minister and every member of this House would be glad if England were willing to make certain concessions in our favour. But up to the present there has been no evidence to show that England is to-day disposed to enter into negotiations with the view of giving to her colonies a preference such as has been spoken of in this House. There has been a very friendly feeling created between England and her colonies, and it is a good thing for us. The fact of the matter is that we look upon the denunciation of the Belgian and German treaties as a step in the direction of closer commercial intercourse between England and the colonies than ever existed before. I consider we will reap a great advantage from it. How will we do it? Why, Sir, the fact that Canada has, by her First Minister, offered to England advantages in our market that have never been offered by any colony before, has produced in the minds of the people of England a more friendly feeling towards Canada than has ever existed. I believe that if the people of England would only give Canada the advantage of a preference in her market, it would be a decided boon to this country. We would like to see this condition of things exist: A man goes into a shop in England to buy a quantity of cheese, and cheese of the different countries are placed before him on the counter. The customer says: What country is that from? And he is told that one cheese comes from the United States, another from Canada and another from some other country. Then he will say: Well, owing to the fact that Canada has shown a willingness to give us the preference in her market, I will try the Canadian cheese rather than the United States cheese, or any other cheese. I think that would be a great advantage to us, and I hope that we shall take steps by which we can secure such an advantage in the English market. I have in my hand a clipping, cut from an evening paper published in Toronto, which I will read:

ANGLO-CANADIAN TRADE.

Toronto, April 14.—The "News" cable from London states the Anglo-Canadian trade continues to improve. The exports to Canada during March increased six per cent, and for three months increased twelve per cent.

Exports to all countries decreased four and three per cent respectively. This remarkable contrast in Canada's favour is partly attributed to the new Canadian tariff.

Imports from Canada were stationary for a month, but increased fifteen per cent for three months. Imports from all countries increased seven and one per cent respectively.

The chief increases in imports from Canada in thousand pounds sterling for three months are: Animals, £19,000; wheat, £104,000; wheat flour, £9,000; bacon, £15,000; butter, £10,000; eggs, £2,000; fish, £63,000.

Chief decreases are: Hams, £5,000; cheese, £1,000; timber, £75,000.

The chief decreases are in hams, cheese and timber. That statement shows there is a very considerable and desirable increase in our trade with Great Britain, and I am sure we earnestly hope it may continue. No doubt the British market is the most stable market after all. While we may at times enjoy advantages in the American market, that is by no means so steady and progressive a country as England. The market is not so reliable as the English market, and we are glad we are making progress in reaching that market on a basis and under conditions that will undoubtedly be very advantageous to the people of the country. I look upon this largely as the result of the fortunate visit of the First Minister to England, of the manner in which he discharged the duties resting upon him as First Minister of Canada, of his creditable and noble record, and the appreciation by the people of that country and of Canada the manner in which the First Minister represented us, and he came away having embedded in the hearts of the people a feeling of appreciation and having furnished evidence that he is a statesman from head to foot and well fitted to promote the country's progress and prosperity, and no doubt the people of Great Britain felt as we feel, that if his health is spared, he will be a blessing to this Dominion.

The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Craig) spoke for a considerable time with respect to commercial union. The hon. member endeavoured to fasten on the Reform party their adoption of that principle as a party. He did not venture to produce any resolution of the convention held here in 1893 to show it was favourable to commercial union, and he did not attempt to produce evidence that any representative man in the party ever declared himself openly and fairly in favour of commercial union. We know that Mr. Wiman, of New York, is the father of commercial union, that he is a Canadian by birth, and at that time took an earnest interest in seeking to bring about what he deemed would bring about advantageous conditions between the two countries. But I deny that any prominent Reformer ever openly committed himself to the principle of commercial union. If any hon. gentleman wishes to produce the references of prominent men of the Reform party to this question, I should like him to do so. No doubt if commercial union, with proper restrictions and qualifications, had been established between Canada and the United States it might have worked beneficially.

Mr. MILLS. How about the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, who was my opponent?

Mr. McMULLEN. At the same time I am prepared to say that commercial union was never adopted by the Reform party as a principle. It was very much talked about, but never was adopted.

The hon. member for West Durham also said something with respect to good crops. We are glad we have good crops this year, and our people are unquestionably making progress financially owing to these good crops to a greater extent than previously. But I remember sitting in this House some years ago when hon. gentlemen opposite, who then occupied the Treasury benches, did not hesitate to take all the credit to themselves for good crops, and good prices. I heard an hon. member from Huron, who is not now in the House, say that he was prepared to vote for a Government that raised the price of wheat from 85 cents to $1.25, the price of eggs from 7 cents to 15 cents, and he was prepared generally to support a government and a policy that gave additional prices to the farmers. They did not hesitate to take credit then. I can remember when the Ministry of the day received with approbation statements made with respect to increased prices received by the farmers.

The leader of the Opposition, in the course of this discussion, made a discourteous attack upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He tried to point out that there was a feeling in this country in opposition to that hon. gentleman occupying the position of Finance Minister. I can honestly say this—and I believe I am inside of the secrets of the rank and file of the Reform party—that I never heard any insinuation in the party or from any member of the party regarding the Minister of Trade and Commerce not faithfully, efficiently and well discharging the duties of Minister of Finance, or expressing any opposition whatever to his appointment. I believe there is no man in the ranks of the Reform party to-day more looked up to and more highly respected and whose presence in the party is more appreciated than the Minister of Trade and Commerce. When the leader of the Opposition was making that statement, I thought it would have been very much better if it had been made by some other member of the party opposite. I acknowledge the hon. gentleman's great ability, and I am sure we are all glad to see the vitality and energy and devotion to duty that have been evidenced by the leader of the Opposition during the progress of this session, but after all the leader of the Opposition does not enjoy the estimation of the hon. gentlemen opposite and their followers in the country to the same extent as does the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the Reform party. I have heard some very discourteous remarks made with respect to the leader of the Opposition, and I would not have referred to them, except for the hon. gentleman's references to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have heard it said that hon. gentlemen opposite never expect to return to power while the present leader of the Opposition is leader of the party. I have heard it said that the country has already had enough Tupperism, and cannot stand it very much longer. Before the hon. gentleman insinuates anything of that kind against the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), he ought to recollect that he himself lives in a glass house, because the views I have stated are those entertained by a great many Conservatives in this country in regard to him.

Now, Sir, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) made rather a characteristic speech last night, and considering that he once occupied a distinguished position in this House, I was amazed to find that his statements were in many cases far removed from facts. He declared that the present tariff was unpopular, but that cannot be the case since we have heard no complaints about its operation except in one or two minor cases. We know that as a rule the tariff has been accepted as satisfactory by the people of Canada. He (Mr. Wallace) declared too that the tariff of the Conservative Government was a protective tariff. Well, Sir, the people of this country for 18 years had experienced sufferings, stagnation and poverty under that Conservative tariff, and if these gentlemen fancy that they will again return to power on the basis of a high protective tariff, they will find themselves a very long time in Opposition. Sir, the people of this country approve of the present tariff, and they regret that they did not make the change long ago. If it be true, as hon. gentlemen opposite assert, that the Reform party would never have got into power but for the Manitoba school question, then, Sir, it is a pity that question did not arise long ago, if it has brought about this change of Government, and this great prosperity in Canada which now prevails. My hon. friend from West York admitted that sometimes the protective tariff was too high, and then he said that sometimes it was too low. Well, it is a wonder that these hon. gentlemen when they were in power did not adjust the tariff more evenly. They certainly did a good deal of tinkering on it. At the last revision of the tariff made by the Conservatives, day after day we were asked by the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) to reconsider it because clerical errors had been made, and alterations were made from higher to lower, and from lower to higher duties; but notwithstanding all that the hon. gentleman from West York (Mr. Wallace) now admits that in some cases it was too high and in other cases too low. Well, I have no doubt my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) will admit that is a pretty hard thing to administer a protective tariff, and to hold the balance evenly between the consumer and the producer. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) told us that the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) had stated that the duty on Paris green was reduced from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent, and he (Mr. Wallace) said: Oh, that is only 2½ per cent of a reduction. I do not know where my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) went to school, but it is apparent that he has never been taught how to calculate percentages. It would appear to me that a reduction from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent is in reality a reduction of 25 per cent, and you will find a great many men in the country who in their simplicity have similar views to mine on arithmetic. Again, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) told us, that during the last financial year we had imported from 25 to 50 per cent more goods from the United States than we did from Great Britain. The hon. gentleman must remember that the Liberal party came into power only about 20 months ago, and he must not forget that a large part of the period covered by these imports to which he refers, was governed by the protective tariff of his own Government, and consequently that the tariff made by hon. gentlemen opposite was not any evidence of an overflowing loyalty to the mother country.

But it is needless to dwell on that, for we know that the loyalty of the Canadian Conservatives always ran in the groove that suited their own political interests, and when on the occasion of the introduction of the National Policy a Liberal member in this House told them that it might endanger British connection, a prominent Conservative supporter at once replied: Well if it is bad for British connection, all the worse for British connection. If the party interests of those gentlemen opposite are not served by loyalty, then we all know that they can afford to be somewhat else than loyal. The hon. member from West York (Mr. Wallace) told us that during the first six months of this year, we had imported into Canada free of duty, eleven and a half million bushels of corn, and that, as that corn had displaced the coarser grains of our farmers, it was a serious loss to them. I do not know where my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) got his figures, but I will give him the correct figures as I got them from the records of the department.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to tell him that I got them from the figures furnished to me by the Minister of Customs.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have the figures furnished from the Department of Trade and Commerce. The Indian corn brought in during the six months ending the 31st of December, 1897, amounted to 9,793,213 bushels. I want my hon. friend to note this point, that during the same time we exported of corn not the product of Canada 7,795,363 bushels; so that out of the entire importation of corn there remained for use in Canada only 1,997,850 bushels. And yet the hon. gentleman told this House of the serious injury the tariff caused to the farmers of this country because 11,500,000 bushels of corn had come in and displaced so many bushels of the coarser grains of this country. He did not state what we had exported; he only gave what we imported.

But I want to give the hon. gentleman some other figures. We have exported during the first six months of this year more oats than we have exported in the same six months of any former year. During that time we have imported 806,719 bushels; but during the same time we have exported of oats the product of Canada 4,984,735 bushels. The farmers of this country have been able to bring in corn at about half a cent a pound or a little over that; and any person* who has any knowledge of the feeding of cattle or milk cows or young stock will admit that corn is very much preferable to oats for that purpose. It is a better and stronger food; and if the farmers of this country have been able to import about two million bushels of corn at a very low price and use that for feeding their stock, and have exported in its place 4,984,735 bushels of oats, for which they received a higher price proportionately than they paid for the corn, that was a decided advantage to them. I contend that there never was a change made in the tariff of this country from which the farmers derived greater advantages than they have derived from that which made corn free.

Mr. SPROULE. What will the farmers in the west think of it?

Mr. McMULLEN. I will allow the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) to follow me when I am done; but if he has any question to ask, I will be glad to answer him. Canada is a great cheese country, and there is no food for cows from which you can obtain better cheese or butter than you can from a mixture of corn. You cannot produce the same quantity of milk, cheese or butter from cows fed on any other grain; and free corn has been unquestionably a decided advantage to the farmers during the last six months.

Now, let me give the figures of the exports of live cattle from this country. In 1896-97, in the full year, we exported 156,471 fat animals. In the first six months of the present year, since corn was made free, we have actually exported 137,584 fat animals, or within 18,000 of as many as we exported during the entire year previous. That shows that the farmers of this country are taking advantage of the privilege they enjoy of getting cheap food for their stock; and is it not a great benefit that we should be in a position to fatten our cattle, put them in first-class condition, send them across the Atlantic, and secure the top price on the market there, thus reaping the advantage of every dollar it is possible to reap? I hope that when my hon. friend from West York again undertakes to enlighten this House on any such question as this, he will try to keep within proper limits and not make such exaggerated statements as he has presented to this House with regard to corn. To give some little idea of the advantages reaped by our people from having Indian corn free, I will give the imports and exports for three years. I have already given those for 1897. In the year ending 30th of June, 1896, we imported 6,050,860 bushels and exported 2,489,315 bushels. In 1894-95, we imported 2,937,400 bushels, and exported 1,535,236 bushels. Now, I want to give you the quantity of oats. We are becoming very large exporters of oats, and the reason is simply this, that owing to the advantages our farmers are enjoying of cheap corn, they are selling their oats and buying corn, and in that way they are making a profit which they could not make if they had not that privilege. For instance, in 1896-97 we imported 1,090,860 bushels of oats, and exported 7,247,991 bushels. In 1896 we exported only 1,001,956 bushels, and in 1895 we exported only 935,814 bushels. This shows that under present conditions, with the decided advantages the farmers now enjoy, they are making very desirable headway: they are realizing the advantages of free corn; and I will venture to predict that after they have been in the enjoyment of that advantage for a number of years, hon. gentlemen opposite, if they should reach the Treasury benches and attempt to deprive them of the privilege, will meet with a vigorous and determined opposition on the part of the farming community.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? If it is because of the importation of free corn that they have been able to sell so much more oats, how is it that the figures he has given apply to a time when corn was not brought in free?

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend is mistaken. He evidently has not enough room in his caput to contain more than one idea at a time. But, Sir, in order to enlighten my hon. friend, if he will try and find a space in his cranium for enlightenment, I will give him the figures again. I told him that in 1897 we exported 7,247,991 bushels of oats.

Mr. SPROULE. That is the fiscal year of 1897.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes. Now I give him the fiscal year of 1896. Is that what he wants? In the fiscal year of 1896 we just exported 1,100,000 bushels, so that, in the fiscal year of 1897, we exported over 6,000,000 bushels more of oats than we did in 1896.

Mr. SPROULE. How much of the fiscal year of 1897 was the present tariff in force, allowing farmers to bring in free corn?

Mr. McMULLEN. This calculation I have not made, but, in order to give the hon. gentleman a basis upon which he can form a reliable opinion, I shall give him the six months from the 30th of June last to the 31st of December, and he will admit that the full tariff of the present Government was in force during that time. That ought to be satisfactory to my hon. friend. In the first six months of the year ending 31st December last, we exported 4,984,735 bushels of oats, and in the previous year we only exported altogether one million of bushels; so that my hon. friend must now see that, while the farmers imported corn and used it for feeding purposes, they exported their oats to advantage. They reaped a benefit by selling their oats and buying corn. Now, does the hon. gentleman understand, or does he want me to repeat the thing again?

Mr. SPROULE. This I do not understand, and perhaps he will make it plainer, that the year before there was only about one-third the crop of oats in Ontario that we had last year, and I presume that would account for the small export. The figures he has given for the last six months are also for that portion of the year when we export the bulk of our oats. During the next six months the exports will not be anything like that amount.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend says that the first year the crop of oats was not quite so good, and that is the reason why there was not such a large export. The crop of last year, he will admit, was remarkably good.

Mr. SPROULE. It was.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then, the farmers, instead of using that enormous crop for feeding purposes, found it more advantageous to use the privilege granted them, under the tariff, of importing free corn and exporting their oats. Notwithstanding their enormous crop of oats, they still imported corn, and evidently found it more advantageous to do so and sell their oats.

Hon. gentlemen opposite persist in repeating that the people of this country are subjected to as high a rate of taxation under the present tariff as they were before, and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), the other night, tried to point out that in some cases the tariff was not lowered, but increased. He tried, also, to belittle the statement made by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with regard to the reduction which the people are bound to realize under the full application of the present tariff. I went through the old tariff of 1894 and the new tariff of 1897, and, although the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) has referred to a good many of the items, I do not think it would be amiss for me to draw attention to a few more.

ple will reap substantial benefits in the form of lower prices for these goods. Now, I do hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will try to realize the advantages that are offered under this tariff. They say that protection is still in force. We are perfectly willing that those who are in the habit of benefit-

These are things that are largely used by the poorer classes, and I contend that, as the new tariff is applied to these commodities and the reductions take effect, the peoing by protection should try to persuade themselves that they are still in the enjoyment of these advantages. All we want is to supply the every day needs of the people, and particularly in those goods that are imported from England, at the lowest possible prices. We believe that by following out the course that hon. gentlemen on this side have adopted, instead of the enormous tide of smuggling on the border being from the United States into Canada, the tide will be turned and that the smuggling will be from Canada into the United States, that large quantities of goods brought into Canada under the cheaper conditions will be bought here and carried into the United States. We believe that the United States will begin to realize the difficulty of keeping up the enormous regiment of preventive officers necessary to prevent this smuggling, and that the best thing that they can do is to concede to Canada a fair system of reciprocity. For English goods are bound to be cheaper in this country. Goods that are imported into the United States at from 45 to 50 per cent will come into Canada at from 15 to 20 per cent and, as a result, these will be placed on the counters of our retailers at enormously reduced prices. The Americans are cute enough to see that they can make money by buying these goods, and so the tide of smuggling will run from Canada into the United States.

Sir, I have dealt with the different points I desired to bring before the House. I claim that we have a magnificent policy in force at this moment and that the future of this country, under the application of that policy is assured. Canada has turned the corner. We have got away from the principle under which our people were struggling in poverty, and under the new policy a brighter and better day is dawning for us. Increased development will take place, our mineral resources will be developed, our great Northwest will be filled up and the country will go on prospering and to prosper. I believe that it was the brightest day in the history of this country for a hundred years when the people intrusted to Wilfrid Laurier and the men surrounding him the management of our affairs, and that under their administration we shall have a period of development and prosperity such as was never experienced by any country upon the continent of America.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to follow the hon. member for North-Wellington (Mr. McMullen) in his lengthy address, but I may refer to some matters on which he has touched. First and foremost let me join with him in his congratulations to the Minister of Trade and Commerce on his honesty and ability, because I quite agree with what the hon. gentleman has just said. But I trust that the Minister of Trade and Commerce will not feel annoyed if I liken him to a celebrated character in romance—to Gulliver tied down by the Lilliputians. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a giant towering above the pigmies who surround him, but he is unable to break the bonds with which they have tied him. What do we see in our politics to-day? We have the spectacle presented in a civilized country of a great political party—for the Liberal party in Canada is a great political party—after nearly two score years in Opposition, and after having on each successive occasion when they appealed to the electorate denounced the principle of protection, denied that it was in the interest of the country, now that they have taken office endorsing that principle almost in its entirety and saying that while they believe it is wrong, they are driven by circumstances to adopt it. That is practically the position they take. For twenty years they preached from the house tops that the country with which Canada naturally should trade was the great Republic to the south of us. But to-day hon. gentlemen opposite say that Canada has no use for the trade of the United States, but that our great market, the natural market for Canada, is in Great Britain. Then we have been told for years and years past that the Conservative party was a party of political debauchery, that it was a party that dissipated the public funds, that if the Liberal party were but returned to power, there would be seen an era of economy such as Canada had never seen before.

Well, the hon. gentlemen are in power to-day, and after preaching for years that this country could be conducted on lines of economy, they have forced up the public expenditure by leaps and bounds, and have increased the public debt by upwards of five million dollars over what it was under Conservative rule. While these hon. gentlemen denounced an annual expenditure of thirty-four million dollars as being outrageous, they to-day have the temerity to come down and tell the House that with the Supplementary Estimates, the expenditure for the current year will in all probability be upwards of forty million dollars. Where are all the pledges these gentlemen made to the public? Do they not think their words are worth respecting? Did not the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the giant of the whole aggregation, when he sat on this side of the House, declare in his strongest tones that it was rascally to have so many members in the Administration? Yet to-day the Administration is greater in numbers than it ever was before, and I regret to say that the province of Ontario, the premier province, has the least number of members in the Cabinet. Why has not the province of Ontario one of the great spending departments? Where is the Minister of Public Works? Is he to be found in the strong man that should be the Minister of Public Works for the good of the country, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce? Not at all, but the master of the situation, the present Minister of Public Works, controls the Cabinet to-day. These gentlemen made these pledges that there should be a reduction in the number of Ministers, now we find that instead of a reduction, the same story goes on as before. Then these hon. gentlemen denounced, and the strongest denunciations were made by the hon. member for North Wellington, the number of civil servants as being too great, that they were excrescences, that men were walking about the corridors doing nothing, standing in each other's way. Yet there sits the hon. member for North Wellington, and he will vote acquiescence to every grant of money to increase the number of civil servants in this country. Why, what a spectacle was presented last year by the hon. member for North Wellington. He stood up and chided the Minister of Inland Revenue in this, that the expenditure in his department was too high, and while he was doing that, he was actually endeavouring to force another official into that department, and the hon. member for North Wellington cannot deny it. He nods his head, he did not dare to shake it last year. I can tell the hon. gentleman and I will tell him privately, the name of the party who applied to him for a position, and he was informed that he could not do anything for him because he had a friend of his own applying for the position. Then the hon. member says: Look at the Conservative party in the past, every one of them had lambs for offices. Well, the hon. gentleman had his lamb placed in office, he had a relative placed in the Kingston penitentiary. Surely the gentleman will not deny that. He nods acquiescence to that statement. It is not the fault of hon. gentlemen opposite if they have not got their friends in all the offices, because the greatest part of them, from the province of Ontario at all events, are themselves applicants for offices under this present Government. Last year when the Drummond Railway deal was before the House, the present Judge Lavergne was one of the men who stood up in this House with a judgeship in his pocket, and one of those who talked the loudest in favour of that infamous Drummond deal last year when statements were made against the interests of the city of Quebec, was the present Judge Langeller, who sat in his place and did not say a word in demur to expenditures that were not in the interests of the city of Quebec. Sir, I say to-day that next session we shall find that from the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite who a few weeks ago supported the Yukon deal, there are more than half a dozen of them who have their positions in their pockets to-day. Yet these hon. gentlemen stand up and chide the Opposition for the statements they make in this House. Why, Sir, if ever there was a party that had no record for decency, it is the hon. gentlemen who sit to-day on the Government benches. I noted the frank confession of the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day in debate, when he said: The fact of the matter is we minimized the expenditure of the country, we thought we would cut it down, but we frankly admit now that we were mistaken in our views. That is not the only reason. The reason is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce finds that there are so many importunate camp followers behind them that they cannot retrench the expenditure, that is the reason why it is going up by leaps and bounds. Now, the hon. member for North Wellington, who has just left the Chamber, expressed the hope that there would be honesty in this Administration. He expressed that hope with a great deal of fervour, but at the same time with a great deal of doubt in his mind. I can understand why that hon. gentleman should feel a little dubious. Did he not last year see a Minister under an obligation to a great railway corporation, under a pecuniary obligation, as the Minister of Public Works was, to the Drummond County Railway?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). It is not true. But say it all the same.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman says it was not true that he was under an obligation to the Drummond Railway Company.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Not one dollar.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, we have had the evidence of one gentleman that he owed them $20,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Not fifty cents. It is not true, and the hon. gentleman knows it.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, the hon. gentleman's dealings with the Drummond Railway Company are to-day before a committee. The statements made on all hands have been before the public, and if it should prove that the hon. gentleman was never a debtor for fifty cents, then he is right and I am wrong; but if, on the other hand, it should prove that he was their debtor for many thousand dollars, then the hon. gentleman must be wrong and the records to-day before the public must be right.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is no such record, and the hon. gentleman knows it.

Mr. WALLACE. The evidence of the court shows it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is not a word of truth in that.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman from North Wellington says he hopes there will be honesty. Perhaps it was the relations of the Minister of Public Works with the Drummond Railway that made him suspect there was something wrong, but if it was not that, he must have had the Yukon deal.

before him. Now, there is not a sane man in the Dominion of Canada to-day who believes that that matter was straightforward and honest in its entirety. It is true, there has been no charge made against any Minister of the Administration in regard to that, but we do know that the very best elements of the Liberal party to-day, some of them now sitting on the benches opposite, are heartily glad that the Senate disposed of that Bill in the way that they did. Time alone will tell the true inwardness of their dealings with it. Is it any wonder, therefore, that the hon. member for North Wellington standing up in the House with fear and trembling, says that he hopes and trusts that there may be honesty in the present and future of the Administration? Now, the hon. gentleman went over the political record of his party and claimed they had been consistent. He says that they were never a party to the doctrine of commercial union. Does he not know that the then leader of the Opposition, the Hon. Edward Blake, quit his party for the very reason that they had espoused that cause? Does he not know that the contest of 1891 was fought out on that line of commercial union with the United States? Does he not recollect the correspondence, I may say the treasonable correspondence, that passed between certain parties and his own leaders, in which it was openly advocated that it was better to make one bite of a cherry and to go at once for political alliance with the United States. As I said before, here is the spectacle presented of a party going back on every pledge they have ever made. When they found themselves last year in power, more to their surprise than to any person else, they looked about them to frame some financial policy for the country. Who framed the policy of the Government? Who framed the tariff as it exists, as it was brought down last year? With his innate modesty, the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) made the startling announcement that he was the gentleman who consulted, from time to time, with the Minister of Finance as to how the tariff should be formed.

But he was not the only hon. gentleman who had the honour of framing the tariff, for I am bound to believe that the hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost), representing a large agricultural implement establishment, had a hand in the framing of that tariff. What was the result? Those hon. gentlemen saw that the interests of their friends particularly were interests that would be affected by the lowering of the duties between Canada and the United States, and they at once looked about to get out of the dilemma that presented itself. True, the Minister of Trade and Commerce had the same honest idea he has always had, that trade with the United States was to be preferred. What was he to do? He was cribbed, cabined and confined; the pigmies had fastened him down; he was utterly helpless, because his ideas were not to prevail, but the ideas of such amateur tariff-makers as the hon. member for Centre Toronto and the hon. member for North Leeds. What did we find? We found the party announcing to the world that they would go in for a tariff on the lines promulgated last year. It was a tariff by which Great Britain was to get certain preferences, and the rest of the world was to be barred out and estopped from those privileges. When the hon. gentlemen enunciated that policy, they were told by hon. members on this side of the House, that, owing to international arrangements entered into by Great Britain with Germany and Belgium and other countries, those other countries would be entitled to the same benefit. True, they had some great and mighty legal opinions on the other side. They had the mighty legal opinion of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; but it all turned out as was predicted by this side of the House, and Germany and Belgium did come in, and we had the humiliation, month after month, of being forced to pay back to exporters from Germany and Belgium the rebate to be allowed to them under that treaty. What further? It was pointed out, in addition, that hon. gentlemen opposite were in this position, owing to treaty arrangements between Great Britain and many other countries, that all those other countries would be entitled to the preference, and this year the hon. gentlemen had the humiliation—that is, if there is any humiliation in their composition—of coming down and announcing to the House that an arrangement had been perfected by which our people would give to Great Britain a preference, and to Great Britain alone. Where do we find ourselves? We find ourselves brought to-day face to face with the arrangement with Great Britain, and Great Britain alone, which will seriously damage and impair some of our manufacturing interests, while, at the same time, it will not give to the mass of the people of Canada those benefits which hon. gentlemen opposite promised when they were so many years in Opposition. I am loyal to Canada, to England and to Great Britain, but I believe in loyalty, first, to Canada and to the people here who are endeavouring to build up this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite, so far in the debate, have endeavoured—and I will not say whether it was done deliberately or not—to place in their party press statements which would lead the readers to believe that this tariff is one which will be beneficial to the farmers, mechanics and artisans. Nothing could have been more absurd than the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Customs. Column after column of figures were read by the hon. gentleman by which he tried to lead the people to believe that great advantage would be derived by them from the adoption of the tariff. But all these assertions were exposed in the twinkling of an eye, when the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) showed that, as regards every article in which those reductions were to be made, the importations from England were practically nothing at all. Those hon. gentlemen, for years in this House, and particularly in the province of Ontario, were always to be found, on the platform and in the press, denouncing as foremost of all outrageous arrangements in the tariff, the duty on agricultural implements. There is not a man among them in Ontario but would point out this fact, that the Massey Manufacturing Company had made thousands and tens of thousands of dollars, drawn out of the pockets of the farmers of the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba, that other large establishments manufacturing similar articles were making untold thousands, and yet hon. gentlemen libelled all their past by retaining the duty on agricultural implements to-day. It must be a matter of great congratulation to the honest Liberal farmer, who believed that hon. gentlemen opposite were honest, to look over the tariff reductions and find how many advantages are accorded them. When the farmer complains that the price of a reaper and mower is too high, it will be a matter of great satisfaction to him to know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce announced that mushroom spawn was to be free. And, as the farmer toils day in and day out, paying what hon. gentlemen have always contended to be an enormous price for a reaper and binder, it must be a great satisfaction for him to learn that the duty on laces and silks has been reduced from 30 per cent by a considerable amount. If he is not satisfied with the reductions on mushroom spawn and on laces and silks, he will have the great consolation of knowing that he can buy a bicycle much cheaper from importers from England because the duty on bicycles has been very materially reduced. So far as regards those articles that come from the old country and enter into the consumption of the farmers, it is an absurdity to argue that there has been the reduction made which hon. gentlemen opposite promised. Where do those hon. gentlemen find themselves? They have framed a tariff policy which is not at all in the interest of the farmers, but which is in the interest of the wealthy people, and of the wealthy people almost exclusively. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) derived satisfaction from the fact that there is to be a high state of morality attained in Canada at last, that the honest, toiling artisan in the Dominion, deprived, probably, of work in the woollen mills and in many other manufacturing concerns, can at least turn into the profitable occupation of being a smuggler of goods from this country into the United States. It is to be regretted that the hon. gentleman should hold up such a code of morals, under which our honest labour may be turned into such channels, and our people become smugglers as between Great Britain, Canada and the United States. I have always held that an interchange of goods between Canada and the United States might prove of great advantage to both countries. How are we to hope to attain that end? Is it to be that, when we are importing into Canada in a month or so high-priced velvets, silks and the upper grades of cloths and clothing, we are simply to smuggle those goods into the United States? I always thought the hon. member for North Wellington posed as an exemplar of purity and honesty, and yet he encourages the young men of Canada to become law-breakers by smuggling goods from Canada into the United States.

Mr. BENNETT.

Where do hon. gentlemen find themselves on the question of expenditure? Those hon. gentlemen, year after year, spoke of the outrageous expenditure in this country, and they told the people that if they were once entrusted with the reins of power, there would be an end to all kinds of extravagance. There was to be, in every branch of the public service, a large reduction made, and that most outrageous expenditure in our system of government, the superannuation system, was to be at once, if not altogether eradicated, placed on an honest and fair basis. I perused to-day a return of the superannuations that have been made during the past year.

It will be news to the country, and it will be gratifying to hon. gentlemen opposite who have friends to place in the public service, to learn that last year superannuations were made to the amount of $64,200 per annum, which will be an increased charge on the public expenditure for many years to come. In addition to that, these gentlemen opposite last year gave no less than $12,850 in gratuities to solace disposed of officials. If new men had not been placed in these vacated offices it would not have been so bad, but I will be bound to say that in most cases the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) or some of the gentlemen beside him had friends whom they quickly placed in these positions. But, Sir, of all the sinners in this respect, the Postmaster General was the greatest, for notwithstanding all his protestations of honesty and economy for years, last year the Post Office Department was saddled with superannuation payments to the extent of $23,400 per annum, and the gratuities in the department amounted to $7,656. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) says that he has improved the efficiency of the public service. Let us see how he has done it. I regret that the Postmaster General is not present to hear this, but when his Estimates come up, I will take occasion to let him know. When he (Mr. Mulock) came into office he found installed there as Deputy Postmaster General Col. White, who for efficiency and for the knowledge of his duties had not his superior in the civil service. Well, Sir, we find that in order to make place for a political friend, the Postmaster General brought down from his own riding a practising physician and made him Deputy Postmaster General. The consequence is that to-day we are paying Mr. Griffin, a superannuated Deputy Postmaster General, $2,240 a year, we are paying Col. White, another superannuated deputy, $2,240, and we are paying to the present incumbent of the office $3,200. No wonder, I say, that in this regard the Postmaster General is the greatest sinner of them all.

Mr. WALLACE. And he paid Col. White a salary after superannuating him.

Mr. BENNETT. Yes, the beauty of the whole thing is, that after the Postmaster General and his newly found deputy were installed in office there commenced such a series of blunders—such as the reduction of the postage rate to England, which made us the laughing-stock of the world—that they actually paid extra for the services of the late Deputy Postmaster General, so that he might direct these two gentlemen as to the details of the department. Then, the Postmaster General went to the city of Kingston, intent, no doubt, on economy and efficiency of the service, and finding there an excellent postmaster, he dispensed with his services in order to put an older man in his place. The result is that to-day the country is paying and will pay for years, a superannuation of $680 a year to the late postmaster, in addition to the salary of the present postmaster.

Then, the Minister of the Interior, the young Napoleon as they delight to call him, the gentleman who shakes the whole aggregation by the head when the Minister of Public Works is not engaged in that playful pastime, he found an efficient officer in the service, Mr. Hayter Reed, and so the Minister of the Interior disposed of Mr. Hayter Reed, and charged the country with his superannuation of $1,024 a year. The Minister of Railways found a most efficient officer in Mr. Balderson, a man not forty years old, and he superannuated him at the rate of $680 per annum. I might go through the whole actions of these economic gentlemen over there and show that their object was the superannuating of competent officials and the placing of friends in their places at an extra charge to the country. I promise, Sir, that when the post office Estimates come down, I shall treat the House to some further facts in regard to that department, which will not redound to the credit of the Postmaster General.

Now, Sir, we find that these hon. gentlemen are boastful of the present condition of the country. True, they do give a little credit to the good crops of last year; true, they do admit that Providence dispensed favours with a bountiful hand; but their great argument is that the presence in power of a Liberal Administration has been the cause of almost all the so-called prosperity. I am not going to deny that we in this Dominion last year had a turn in the tide for which we are all thankful, but as far as these hon. gentlemen opposite having had anything to do with it, why, they have been simply as matches on the Niagara River, tossed about. Had it not been that up to last July every importer in this country was holding back his hand and waiting to see what the tariff policy of these gentlemen would be, the deficit of half a million dollars would have been very considerably increased. The Minister of Finance, in the most airy way, tells the country that next year we are going to have a large surplus. Well, that remains to be seen; time alone will be the arbiter of that; but it must be borne in mind that last year we had a bountiful crop, that good prices were obtained by the farmers, and that a great stimulus was given to trade in Canada owing to the unexpected development of our mining country. The Minister of Trade and Commerce told us the other night that we have an increased population. Well, Sir, if the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) can tell the House what section of the province of Ontario is having an increased population, then he will tell us something that no person knows. I can tell the Minister that in the northern towns of western Ontario there is certainly no increase in population, but rather a decrease. There is undoubtedly an increase of population in the Yukon district, but the hon. gentleman cannot think that the policy of his Government cuts any figure at all in that. Take the maritime provinces, and the experience of every hon. gentleman coming from there is that to-day the tide of emigration is westward from these provinces. Hon. gentlemen should not shout before they are out of the woods; they had better wait for next year and see what will be the result. I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) in detail, but I do ask the indulgence of the House while I endeavour to place before the Government a matter of very great importance to the northern part of the province of Ontario; I refer to the lumber industry. If there is one industry in Canada that is to-day being crippled and maimed by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, it is the lumber industry. Not only have we to contend against the prejudices of these hon. gentlemen, but we have also to contend against the prejudices of the Ontario Government in regard to that great industry. Last year these hon. gentlemen took to themselves the power to impose an export duty on logs. I do not altogether blame them for not putting that in operation, owing to the fact that the local Government have promised that they will do it. I myself would much desire to see that go into effect, and go into effect at once, instead of trusting ourselves to the tender mercies of the local government; and I do contend that, in the light of present events, the Government are acting in the most suicidal way, when they treat the question of the lumber duties in Canada as they are treating it to-day. Why, Sir, what do we see? We see all along the shores of the Georgian Bay saw-mill after saw-mill closed up, and the men who have been working in these mills for years regretfully wending their way to the United States of America. We see these hon. gentlemen and their friends in the government at Toronto, by the line of policy they are pursuing, permitting the exportation of millions upon millions of saw-logs from Canada to the United States; and to our mortification we find that if any man is loyal enough to lose some dollars, and endeavour to help the country by manufacturing lumber on the shores of the Georgian Bay, the moment his lumber goes to the United States, it is taxed with a duty of $2 a thousand. It is a most outrageous arrangement, and under it the whole business is being slowly but surely transferred to the United States. We see the logs leaving our shores and going to Michigan to be manufactured there; and we see these Canadian logs, converted, so to speak, into American lumber, brought back and sold in our own cities and towns, and our men at the same time thrown out of employment and leaving the country. There can be no justification for such a line of policy, save and except this, that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) says it must be so, and of course, if he says so, that settles it. I appeal now to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). In all fairness, is it honest to the province of Ontario, the great tax-producing province of this whole Dominion, that a great industry like the lumber industry should be paralyzed, simply that the Minister of the Interior may be able to go to the province of Manitoba and say, "See what my strong hand has done." I acknowledge the strength of the Minister of the Interior. He showed his strength a few weeks ago, when he dragged the whole party, the strong man of the Government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with the rest, into his Yukon deal; and I suppose he holds over them the threat that if they dare to propose a duty on lumber he will go out of the Cabinet, and fire the heather of Manitoba with the school question again. And so, the hon. gentlemen have to bow down and worship the Minister of the Interior, simply that he may be able to build up a reputation for himself in the province of Manitoba.

There is another matter which I intend to refer to, but not at great length, as interesting the constituency which I represent; that is, the question of the policy of the Government of the day on the Trent Valley Canal.

Mr. BENNETT.

The Government stand pledged to the performance of that work. In the recent local elections the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) wrote and sent a telegram that very much influenced the elections in the county of Hastings; and yet no provision is made in the Estimates for a continuation of that work. There is a small grant for some uncompleted sections; but the hon. gentlemen who represent constituencies adjacent to the line of that canal, and who give this Government a most unqualified and unstinted support, should stand up in this House and attempt to convince the Government of the merits of this project, and place upon them the responsibility of saying whether or not the work shall be carried to a consummation.

I do not propose to discuss the questions I have referred to at any greater length. I can only say that I trust and hope that there will be in this country for the next year, and for many succeeding years, an era of prosperity brighter even than hon. gentlemen opposite themselves have predicted; but I believe that the policy which these hon. gentlemen have inaugurated is not a policy that will bring about that fruitful result. The tariff they have framed is one that will strike the farmer, who is the greatest factor in the country's prosperity. Despite the theoretical reasoning of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) to the contrary, I say that the introduction of American corn into the province of Ontario—and I know that the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor) nods assent to this—has been and is a great deterrent factor against the farmer. I say that the introduction of cheap goods from England, under the operation of the preferential clause, will have a most deterrent effect on the farmer. To-day, in every little town and village in Canada, is to be found a small woollen mill, which is the best purchaser of the coarse wool produced by the Canadian farmer; and I contend—and time will prove it, and I am speaking by the authority of men in the business—that with the introduction of cheap woollen goods from England, every one of these small factories will be driven to the wall: and with the American tariff against Canadian wool, the only market for which is in the United States, the price of wool will be greatly depreciated in the next year in the province of Ontario and in the other provinces of the Dominion. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) yesterday afternoon talked about the woollen industry; but he was not talking alongside of the fact at all, when he stated that the woollen mills of this country were running night and day. As a matter of fact, they have been running at a great deal less than full time; and it is to-day the belief of every woollen-mill man in this country that with the reduction in the tariff on woollen goods, nearly every woollen industry in the country will be driven to the wall. In conclusion, I again reiterate the hope that Canada is to see an era of prosperity for a number of years; but if that prosperity comes, it will not be due, in my humble opinion, to any policy which these hon. gentlemen have formulated, but it will be due to the fact that the people of Canada have industry, thrift and frugality on their side, and that under the beneficent influence of the National Policy for the last eighteen or twenty years we have established the foundations of a strong manufacturing business, which I hope and trust the inroads which hon. gentlemen opposite are to-day making in the tariff will not be able to upset or throw down.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I would have spoken on this very important question except for one matter that has been brought prominently forward, that is, the statement that the importation of free corn into the Dominion of Canada is injuring the farmers and is deterrent to their prosperity, as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Bennett) has told us. I can congratulate that hon. gentleman upon the wish he expressed that the prosperity of this country would be greater even than we on this side of the House could anticipate. I believe that an era of prosperity has commenced, that it is running strongly in this direction, but I differ greatly from hon. gentlemen opposite when they say that none of that is due to this Government.

Let me say that a considerable part of the prosperity which the farmers of Ontario have enjoyed during the last twelve or eighteen months has been due to the action of the Minister of Agriculture in going to the United States and making an arrangement whereby the quarantine regulations were relaxed and a large number of our cattle allowed to go into that country. I had contended for this for years. Before 1896, I urged the Government to go to the United States and get these regulations removed, because their removal would be of great benefit to our farmers by allowing them to take their young cattle across, as they used to do in the days gone, before the McKinley Bill. During the last year some 50,000 or 60,000 head of young cattle went to the United States, and brought $7 to $8 per head more than they would have done had the regulations continued in force. They were a class of cattle which it was not in the interest of farmers of Ontario to feed themselves, but which it was in their interest to get rid of in the best possible manner, and by the removal of these quarantine regulations they did get rid of them. I am perfectly convinced that we sold over 518,000 head of cattle during 1897 or some 66,000 more than we did for a length of time, and 200,000 of those cattle brought $8 per head more than they otherwise would, putting $1,600,000 into the pockets of the farmers of Ontario, which they realized from selling their young cattle in the United States more than they would have got had the quarantine regulations not been removed. Our beef cattle also have, by the removal of these regulations, been allowed to go into the United States. The Americans purchase them in Ontario and give us a better price, and ship them to the old country market. All that is due to the action of this Government.

There is another direction in which prosperity has set in, and that is through the system of establishing cold storage in the different creameries through the country. To the Government and particularly to the Minister of Agriculture is due the credit for the establishment of cold storage in our creameries. For the first time in the history of Canada, in the month of March last, a creamery situated at St. Mary's sent a large shipment of butter into the British market, and that butter brought from one shilling to one and sixpence per pound higher than the best Danish butter on the market. This is due to the establishment of cold storage in our creameries, in which to put our butter and keep it in good condition before shipping it on the cars. I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite will say that none of the credit is due to the Government of the day, but that the late Government inaugurated the system of cold storage. They did inaugurate that system on the lines of railway and on ocean steamers, but not in the different creameries through the country, nor did they ever suggest doing so. Not only that, but a great many followers of the leader of the Opposition were not even aware, although it had been announced in this House, that the Government were offering a bonus of $100 to each creamery which would be fitted with a proper system of cold storage.

I was a little astonished at the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) asking how my hon. friend from East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) could have had the audacity to speak about gerrymanders, when one of the worst gerrymanders ever perpetrated, was made in the county of Huron. I grant that it was, but not by the local government. It was made by the Dominion Government, because in all the local gerrymanders that ever took place the local Ontario Government never violated county lines. But how does the county of Huron stand to-day, as regards the different ridings for representation in the Dominion House? Why, we have the township of Stephen, the town of Exeter and the town of Osborne. The township of Stephen is put into North Middlesex and so is Exeter. Osborne is put into South Perth, and all this was done to gerrymander the county. It was done for the purpose of giving the late Government two representatives from the county of Huron, and the first time I took my seat in this House I had to congratulate the leader of the Government on making me a member by Act of Parliament, because I represented the Liberal hive of the county riding of South Huron. As regards the local House, no more compact ridings can be laid out in any country than those of Huron. The ridings are compact, nearly equal in territorial limit and population, and very nearly equal in the number of voters in each riding. It is impossible to lay them out in any better manner—very different from what Huron was, when at one time a gentleman came from the county of Huron and said it would be no sin to worship that map, for it was not a likeness of anything in the heavens above or the earth beneath or the waters under the earth. Nothing of the kind was done by the Ontario Government in the county of Huron.

I was likewise very much amused at that hon. gentleman when he told us about the opening up of the North-west. He said that it was the Conservatives who inaugurated the Canadian Pacific Railway. When these hon. gentlemen talk so much about bribery and corruption, let them go back to that time when the Canadian Pacific Railway was inaugurated, and certainly its inauguration was no credit to the Conservative party. When they undertook to sell the charter to Sir Hugh Allan, they gave him $360,000, and when the House met after the elections, an hon. member for Manitoba stood up and said he had been approached on a Sunday and offered a certain amount of money to give his vote to sustain the Government. When they saw the cat had got out of the bag, after attempting to purchase the different constituencies, they attempted to purchase members on the floor of the House. That is the way the Canadian Pacific Railway was inaugurated, and I was therefore astonished to hear the hon. gentleman talking so much about the Drummond Railway. Is it not fresh in the memory of the gentlemen of this House that in 1891 there was over $90,000 bonuses given the Drummond Railway, that it was in the end of the month of February that the House adjourned before the general election, and before two weeks elapsed there were $9,000 of the bonus paid over, and before three weeks elapsed $70,000 of bonuses were paid over—that is within two or three weeks of the general election. Judging by the facts, even if there was nothing wrong in it, it looked very suspicious. Yet hon. gentlemen will tell us about bribery and corruption and hint that everything done in this House is done for the purpose of getting funds for the elections. Why, the hon. member for East Grey told us some time ago that he believed that out of a certain deal, there had come a certain sum to carry the Ontario elections. I am not astonished at the hon. gentleman making that statement because he judges us by the record of his own party. If we go back to the early days of confederation, we find that the Canadian Pacific Railway charter was sold to Sir Hugh Allan for $360,000 to assist Sir John A. Macdonald to carry the elections in 1873, and shortly before the late Government had to give up the reins of power, we find that Mr. Goodwin, a contractor on the Soulanges Canal, put in a claim of $210,000, which the Government first repudiated and then wanted to pay, but which the Opposition compelled them to bring before the Exchequer Court. And the judge of that court, in awarding $70,000, made the plain statement that he did so on account of the action of some of the officials of the late Government. I hoped not to hear so much talk about bribery and corruption, seeing that there was so much of it indulged in by the late Government, and so many cases of it brought home to them. They have not been able to bring home a single case to the present Government, and the same was true of the previous Reform Government that held office for five years.

Now, as to the importation of corn, the statement was made yesterday afternoon that 11,500,000 bushels of corn had come into this country in the last six months of last year. And it was stated that this corn had displaced an equal amount of our coarse grains. Now, I will accept the hon. gentleman's statements that this quantity of corn came in and that it displaced an equal quantity of our coarse grain. Any gentleman who knows anything about feeding cattle or hogs knows that if we feed corn, peas or oats, pound for pound, corn is a little the best feed. So, if 11,500,000 bushels of corn came in, it would require 18,941,176 bushels of oats to furnish an equal quantity in weight of feed. Take the quantity of corn at 27½ cents per bushel, which was the price the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) stated, and take the oats at 24 cents per bushel. What would be the gain or loss to the Canadian farmer in buying corn and selling oats? The gain would amount to the handsome sum of $1,440,882 to the Canadian farmer in this transaction. This is the way I want to see the Canadian farmers ruined all the time. Now, look at it another way. Suppose we take a steer, and put him up for 200 days and give him eight pounds of meal per day. What will be the result with these several feeds? It would take 26½ bushels of peas at 55 cents per bushel, or $14.63 for meal. It would take of oats 47 bushels at 32 cents per bushel, or $14.04. It would take of corn 28½ bushels at 37 cents or $9.54. This shows a gain by feeding corn, the gain over peas amounting to $5.09 and the gain over feeding oats $4.90. This would be the gain on each animal fed in the country. Now, we have stall fed $200,000 animals within the last five months. This means that about $1,000,000 has been put in the hands of the farmers more than they could have had by feeding their coarse grain. And yet hon. gentlemen who know nothing about the question will stand up and tell us that the Canadian farmer is injured, that he is ruined by having corn brought into the country. It was stated that in 1878 seven millions of bushels of corn came into Canada.

Take the report of the committee that was appointed in 1882 to investigate the effect of the National Policy, and note the effect that the National Policy had upon the agriculture of the country. In 1878, the very year when seven millions of bushels of corn came in to be consumed in Canada, oats were 9 cents per bushel higher than in the United States. That was before the National Policy came into force. But in the year after the National Policy was imposed, we find that only 1,700,000 bushels of corn was imported, and in Canada oats were only 3 cents per bushel higher than in the United States. I dare any hon. gentleman to controvert these facts. I have gone over the figures carefully and know whereof I speak. I say that no greater benefit was ever conferred on the farmers of Canada, and especially on the farmers of Ontario than by allowing corn to come in free. This year oats are selling well up to the price of corn. I see that the price is 33 cents per bushel in Toronto, while corn is only 37 cents, or a difference of only 4 cents as between 34 pounds per bushel of oats and 56 pounds per bushel of corn.

We sold and slaughtered in the province of Ontario in 1896, 436,451 cattle. In 1897 we sold and slaughtered 503,007 cattle. This shows an increase in one year of 66,556. This increase in fat cattle would not have taken place had it not been for the import of corn coming into the country in 1897, for we had not the coarse grains from the crop of 1896 wherewith to feed our cattle. So that the free importation of corn was a great and continued benefit. There is another reason in its favour; farmers want to make all the manure they can. Let us get all the corn we can into our own country, feed it with our own coarse grains and return everything we can to the soil.

Now, with respect to the prosperity of the farmer, I find that when we go back to the year 1882, the whole value of the farmers' field crop in Ontario was $155,000,000, or for each farmer, $789. When we come down to 1896, we find that the value of the field crops had fallen to $88,900,135, or for each farmer only the small sum of $400.50. But, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to state that in 1897 our field crops had again increased. Though there had been a steady decline from 1882 down to 1896, we find that in 1897 there is a rebound to $99,488,336. So that, instead of $400 for each farmer, the amount was $452 for each farmer. There is no doubt that an era of prosperity has set in in more ways than one.

Mr. SPROULE. Does not the hon. gentleman know that the crops were almost a total failure in 1896, while there was a very large crop last year?

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not know that. I know that in many places we had a fair crop in 1896, and last year oats were more of a failure than in 1896. The hon. gentleman is always interjecting remarks. I would advise him to keep his little soul in patience. He is so impatient at the prosperity of the country, at the success of the Government of the day that he cannot sit still while any other gentleman is addressing the House, without making some interruptions. Then we have been told that this Government is not opposed to protection, that they have adopted a policy of protection. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) told us that the Government have adopted the policy of protection, and then he told us that the woollen manufacturers of the country were going to be ruined by cheap woollen goods coming in from England. What is going to bring more cheap woollen goods in from England than have been coming in in the past? How can that be if the Government of the day has adopted a policy of protection? One statement of the hon. gentleman contradicts the other. If it is a fact, as he says, that a large quantity of woollen goods will come in from England, it shows that the duty must have been reduced, and that the farmers are going to get cheaper goods. Then the hon. member for East Simcoe told us that the woollen factories were nearly all going to be closed up. I remember being much astonished once, just before the elections of 1896. I had been in Almonte, where there are a number of woollen factories, and having been told a few days after that all these factories were closed down, and that the workmen were walking about, I was greatly surprised to find these factories in full operation. When I hear gentlemen make such statements as that in the House, I am not astonished at the extravagant statements they make when they go before the people of the country, if they think they can make a point by it.

Then they say the duty on farmers' agricultural implements has also been reduced. There is one thing that we always contended against. We complained that the late Government valued those implements coming in from the States higher than they ought to have done. There was a revaluation. We can all remember the discussions that took place in this House, when it was clearly proven that the manufacturers of the agricultural implements in Canada had sent an agent to the United States to visit a great many of the factories there, in order to find out what their implements were shipped at, and what they were costing. In the matter of reapers alone, they were valued at one time as high as $110. When the late Government went out of power they were valued at $100, with 20 per cent of a duty. But the present Government reduced the valuation to $92, which had the same effect as if the duty had been reduced 13-5 per cent. So that we have not been paying such an extravagant price for our agricultural implements as in the past. We find that on no less than fifty implements there has been a reduction from 35 per cent to 25 per cent, and from 30 per cent to 25 per cent, by the present Government. Here is a list that the Minister of Customs gave us last night, of agricultural implements on which there have been reductions:

	Tariff, 1894.	General Tariff, 1897.	Percent- age of reduction, 1897.
	p.c.	p.c.	p.c.
Axes	35	25	28½
Hay or straw knives	35	25	28½
Hand rakes	35	25	28½
Farm rollers	30	25	16½
Road or field rollers	30	25	16½
Windmills	30	25	16½
Horse powers	30	25	16½
Portable engines....	30	25	16½
Threshers	30	25	16½
Feed cutters.....	35	25	28½
Separators	30	25	16½
Potato diggers.....	35	25	28½
Grain crushers.....	35	25	28½
Fanning mills.....	35	25	28½
Hay tedders.....	35	25	28½
Manure spreaders...	25	20	20

All these are implements that the farmer uses upon his farm, and upon these large reductions have been made. There is another large class of implements also upon which there have been reductions in the interest of the farmers. But the farmers remember that there was a time when a previous Minister of Finance, making his speech in this House, attempted to hoodwink the farmers. Why, Sir, would you believe me when I say that the Minister of Finance at that time attempted to make the farmers believe that all their implements were made out of timber grown from their own lands, and that to the best advantage? I told him across the floor of the House that I did not know where he had been; I thought he must have been with Rip Van Winkle in Sleepy Hollow for the last 30 or 40 years when he made that statement. However, he came to know better, and he learned that the farmers were under a very grievous burden indeed with respect to the duty on agricultural implements.

Now in the matter of corn, I was sorry to hear the leader of the Opposition make a remark which showed that he had not made a very close observation of the subject, otherwise a gentleman of his ability and knowledge never would have made the statement he did the other day, that the introduction of free corn had wrought an injury to the farmers of this country, that upon their poor land they were growing coarse grains, and that corn was coming and supplanting those grains. He also found fault with the Government for reducing the duty upon wheat from 15 cents to 12½ cents a bushel, and the duty upon flour from 75 cents to 60 cents a barrel. Let me say that the duty upon wheat has not benefited the farmers of Ontario one cent. I stated to this House on a previous occasion this session that during the whole winter wheat had been 10 and 12½ cents a bushel higher in Detroit than it was in Toronto. I was told at the time that my statement was not correct, but I think I proved it to be correct. I repeat to-night, that wheat to-day, in both Buffalo and Oswego, is 10 and 11 cents a bushel higher than it is in the frontier cities of the province of Ontario. If the duty was swept away entirely, that condition of things could not continue to exist, because our wheat would go up equal with that of the United States, or theirs would come down equal with ours. So it is with flour. He says he was astonished that the Government had not taken the duty of 60 cents off flour, though he was not so much astonished at wheat. If they had done that, it would have injured our millers to a great extent. If the one is taken off, the other should be taken off, and most of our millers are willing that that should be the case. Now, with respect to agricultural implements, there are 107 articles given by the Minister of Customs, on 100 of which the rate of duty is largely reduced. The reduction is from 10 to 12½, 16, 20, 23, 25, 27, 28, and up to 55 per cent—all articles that the farmer largely uses upon his farm. And yet the hon. gentleman states that the Government have not reduced the price of the farmers' implements. The farmers of the province of Ontario know that that statement is not correct, and hon. gentlemen only discredit their own statements, when they try to palm off such a statement upon the farmers of Ontario.

Let me say that I was much pleased, the other day, when I came across the statement that our creamery butter was rapidly taking the position our cheese had taken in the English market. I do not say that no credit is due to the late Government for the advancement of our butter and our cheese industries; but I say the main part of the credit is due to the province of Ontario for what they have done in that direction. When the Government of Canada wanted a commissioner, where had they to go? They had to go to the Ontario Agricultural College, where they found a gentleman who is, no doubt, well posted with respect to dairying in all its different phases. There is no doubt in my mind at the present time that trade has taken a start in the province of Ontario, and all over the Dominion of Canada, and I believe that a great deal of confidence has been inspired into both the farmers and the manufacturers all over this country. When the reciprocal tariff was brought down a year ago, we were told that the manufacturers of the country would be all ruined, and that the factories would all be closed down. But for the last seven or eight years our farmers have not been so prosperous as they are at the present time. They are getting encouragement in every direction. They know that they are going to get better markets for their produce than they have ever had before. The late Government was always telling what they were going to do for the farmers. They talked about a preferential tariff. Were they favourable, when a preferential tariff was offered to them? I think it was in 1894 that the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries brought a resolution into this House to reduce the duty upon the classes of goods that were imported from Great Britain into Canada. But what did our friends opposite do at that time? Did one of them vote for it? Not one. Yet they kept on talking about encouraging preferential trade with Great Britain; they were always going to encourage, but it was these treaties with Belgium and Germany that stood in the way and kept us from getting these benefits that we otherwise would have obtained. They talked and talked, but they did nothing. But, when the present Government came into power, they immediately took action, and now we have a prospect of greatly improved trade relations, not only with Great Britain, but with every colony of the British Empire. This action of the Government has been admired by the people both on the continent of Europe and in the United States.

The people of England have come to understand that we have statesmen in Canada who have taken a step in advance of the representatives of any other British colony, and in advance of any position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in power. Those hon. gentlemen talked a great deal, but took no practical steps. They talked about reciprocity. The leader of the late Government almost became enamoured of reciprocity. Do we not remember when the hon. gentleman in 1888 came from Washington and stated that they were in favour of securing reciprocity with the United States in a large number of articles, that the United States had removed certain articles from their tariff schedule, and the Government decided to insert in the tariff measure a declaration that when the United States should remove duties from any or all of those articles or portions of the duty, then Canada would reciprocate? Was this carried out? No. The leader of the Government of that day told the House that the Government had passed an order to remove those duties which the United States had removed, but he finished by stating that the Canadian Government awaited the further action of the United States Government in the same direction. Did the Government remain true to their declaration? No. They violated the pledges they had given the United States and they violated their own declarations that they would enter into a reci-procuity treaty with our neighbours when opportunity offered. The people of Ontario are well pleased with the action of the present Government. I travelled over a large portion of the province last fall, and this preferential tariff was admired not only by Reformers, but by Conservatives. With respect to the Yukon Railway Bill, I desire to say that a very considerable number of respectable Conservatives consider that the Senate in rejecting that measure did an act that will not redound to their credit or for the benefit of the Dominion. In fact a strong Conservative told me that it was my duty to come to Ottawa and place a notice on the paper asking the Government what they propose to do in order to reform or abolish the Senate, or at all events make it responsible to the people. An irresponsible ruling body in a democratic country is an anomaly. That is the feeling among a good many Conservatives in Ontario. With respect to the changes in the tariff, while I am an out-and-out free trader, I consider it was the duty of the Government to make such changes as were necessary gradually, in order that private interests and the interests of manufacturing and other corporations and wholesale houses might not be injured; and if the Government continue to progress at the same rate as they have done since they came into power, the last vestige of protection will be buried in the dust at the end of ten years, and this result will be accomplished without materially injuring any interest. I was glad to hear the Finance Minister state that the manufacturers should not rest, but be prepared for other tariff changes. We believe such changes must come, and that when our reciprocity treaty with England comes into full play, the Government will be warranted in making still further reductions. The Government have the full sympathy of the country to-day, not only in regard to the tariff, but to the manner in which they are conducting public affairs; and when hon. gentlemen find fault with respect to the superannuation system they must remember that the Government have been in power only twenty months, while during the twenty years hon. gentlemen opposite were in power they had the opportunity of making the superannuation system self-supporting. It ill-becomes hon. gentlemen opposite to find fault with a Government that, although it has been only twenty months in power, has remedied many overt acts and abolished injurious measures put in operation by the Conservative party during the last twenty years. It would have been extraordinary if the Government had been able to accomplish everything, and I have been astonished that they have been able to do so much, and they can rest satisfied that they are receiving the hearty support of the country. I am convinced that Canada stands to-day, largely through the influence of the Premier and the noble band of men by whom he is surrounded, in the position of a nation and not of a small colony, as was the case formerly. Canada has been able to dictate terms to nations, if not directly, indirectly, in respect to treaties containing preferential clauses, which hon. gentlemen opposite declare could not be abrogated. Those hon. gentlemen never possessed the tact of statesman to go to foreign countries and make treaties. They talked about going to Washington; but I hope there will never again be a deputation that will secure a recognition lasting only three minutes, and come home without having any statement to make except that they were going to return. But we knew before they went that the whole visit was a farce, that they never intended to secure reciprocity, that they were not in earnest. I hold that the Government have acted up to their professions and have carried out as rapidly as possible their pledges, notwithstanding the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite placed all possible obstacles in the path. Not one of these gentlemen opposite has ventured to stand up and to say that the Franchise Act ought not be abolished, and yet they give a factious opposition to the excellent law which it is proposed shall take its pace. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House for the patience with which you have listened to me.

Mr. KLOEPFER. Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen supporting the Government have for the last few days been telling us that we never have had before such good times in Canada, and they have been good enough to tell us that this Liberal Government has been the cause of the good times. Well, it is clear to everybody that we have good times, but the Government have had nothing to do with it, and I propose briefly to outline what is the cause of our present prosperity. In the first place, Providence blessed us with good crops from one end of Canada to the other, and the farmers were able to sell them at good prices. In former years we used to have good crops in the east and bad crops in the west, or good crops in the west and poor crops in the east, but this year the crops have been good from one end of the Dominion to the other, and so our prosperity has been general. Then again, our mineral lands in British Columbia, in the Territories and in northern Ontario have been more developed than ever before in consequence of the gold discoveries. The people have been given confidence as a result, and when our people have confidence the times are better. It is also a fact that while the crops have been good in the Dominion of Canada they have failed in foreign countries, and so our exports have been larger and more remunerative. Another reason is that the merchants throughout Canada feared the tariff would be lowered, and for the year previous to this they consequently did not take in any stock. Neither did the manufacturers make goods, because they did not know what would become of them under the new tariff, and so this year both merchants and manufacturers are busy making up for lost time. The Government have also spent more money in constructing railroads, and the circulation of this money through the country has tended to make times better. It is also a fact that our neighbours to the south, as well as European nations, have spent a great deal of money preparing for war, some estimate it at £750,000,000 sterling, and the general circulation of that money throughout the world has tended towards prosperity for the time being. I can tell the Government that they had better be on the lookout, for if it should unfortunately occur that our crops would fail any year, they will find and the country will find to its cost, that their fiscal policy will not make things prosper. With the American tariff at 45 per cent and our tariff at 25 per cent, it is quite plain that when a normal condition of things arrive, we cannot compete with these people. Hon. gentlemen opposite have told us that the present Government are protecting the farmers better than did the Conservatives. Well, it is a peculiar way to do that, to reduce the duty on wheat from 15 to 12½ cents a bushel. It is a peculiar way to protect the farmers to reduce the duty on flour and on wheat and to let corn come in free. If this corn had not been allowed in free, I can tell the hon. member from Huron (Mr. McMillan) that no matter what he may say, we would get a better price for our oats and for our coarse grains in the districts where they fatten cattle. I acknowledge that the times are good, but I have given the reasons, and these reasons show that our prosperity is more due to a bountiful Providence than to a Liberal Government. If in view of the high tariff in the United States the Canadian Government does not raise the duty instead of lowering it, they will find, should there be a failure of crops, that the times will not be so prosperous as at present.

Mr. BROWN. We will have better times.

Mr. KLOEPFER. In what way?

Mr. BROWN. Things are going in that direction.

Mr. KLOEPFER. In what direction?

Mr. BROWN. In the right direction; lowering the tariff.

Mr. KLOEPFER. I want you to understand that if you do not protect the manufacturers you cannot protect the farmers. If you do not protect the manufacturers so that they can employ workmen, the Canadian farmers will have no home markets. Our workmen will go to the other side of the line, manufacture the goods for Canadians there, and there will be no population here to eat the produce of Canada. I state here, Sir, that I believe that there should be a higher tariff than we have at the present time. I believe in protecting our manufactures in order to afford a home market for our farmers. I believe in keeping our people in our own country, and I do not believe in putting the tariff down so low that the Americans can send their goods in here to displace the workmanship of Canadian artisans. I would not mind if the Americans would sell their goods in Canada at the same price that they do at home. But they make a Canadian slaughter market for their goods, and sell them here at about 25 per cent less than they do in their own market. If we could meet their tariff by shipping goods to the United States, matters would not be so bad; but they shut out our goods by putting a different value on them. That is all I have to say at the present time.

Mr. TAYLOR moved the adjournment of the debate.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is rather early for adjourning, but I had a little conversation with the hon. leader of the Opposition, and I understand that hon. gentlemen opposite will be prepared to close the debate to-morrow. On that understanding, we will put no obstacle in the hon. gentleman's way; but to avoid any trouble hereafter, I want to mention expressly that that understanding was arrived at, and I hope the hon. gentlemen will see their way to carry it out.

Mr. WALLACE. There are a number of members on this side who desire to speak in the Budget debate, and I do not think they know that any such arrangement was proposed.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That arrangement was proposed between the leader of the House and the leader of the Opposition, and I understood just now from the leader of the House that he had consulted with the hon. gentleman opposite, and he thought the debate could be closed to-morrow evening, which would be very convenient, for obvious reasons. If that is impossible, of course, we will have to sit a little later to-night; but I understood that the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) was aware that that agreement was come to. I think that with a little compression of the speeches the matter might be arranged.

Mr. WALLACE. I think very good progress has been made to-day. We have had a large number of speeches, and there are members who wish to speak and may not have an opportunity to-morrow evening. The hon. gentleman knows that many members return to their homes on Friday evening.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understood from the leader of the Opposition that it was the intention, if at all possible, to close the debate at to-morrow's sitting. It may be late tomorrow night; but I think that all the members who intend speaking on this side of the House can easily deliver themselves at to-morrow's sitting. I know it is the wish of the leader of the Opposition to close the debate to-morrow, and he fully expects that it will be done.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 15th April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 115) respecting the British Yukon Mining, Trading and Transportation Company, and to change its name to the White Pass Yukon Company.—(Mr. Wood, Hamilton.)

Bill (No. 116) to incorporate the Canadian Mining Institute.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

Bill (No. 117) to incorporate the Klondike and Dawson City Bank.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 118) to incorporate the Dawson City and Victoria Telegraph Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 119) to incorporate the Dawson City and Victoria Lighting and Tramway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved:

That from this date Government Orders shall have precedence on Wednesdays and Thursdays, after questions to be put by members, and that the Order of the Day on Mondays, after Private Bills, be the Order of the Day of Wednesdays under Rule 19.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very anxious to do everything possible to facilitate the business of the House, and at this period of the session I am not at all surprised at my right hon. friend making a motion of this kind; but I would like to ask him to make an exception with regard to going over the notices of motion, in order that all unopposed motions may be dealt with.

The PRIME MINISTER. I shall be very glad to accede to my hon. friend's request.

Mr. McMULLEN. I should like to ask what prospect there will be for reaching Public Bills and Orders if this resolution passes. On the last occasion when Public Bills and Orders were reached, I was unable to attend the House, and I should like very much to have the opportunity of moving the second reading of the Bills in my name.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend is aware that if this motion carries, Monday nights after six o'clock will be devoted to Public Bills and Orders. On two or three occasions when these were the Order of the Day, the Order paper was exhausted and the House adjourned before nine o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to make an appeal to my hon. friend the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. I am told that it adjourned until Monday next, and, as my hon. friend is aware that we have a very slim attendance generally on Monday, I would ask him if it would not be equally convenient to call that committee on Tuesday or some other day than Monday?

Mr. McMULLEN. I have much pleasure in complying with the request of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and shall give notice that the meeting will take place on Tuesday.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CRAIG. I regret that I have to ask the attention of the House for a very short time this afternoon to a personal matter, and it may be necessary for me to do what I agree with the right hon. First Minister we should as much as possible avoid doing, namely, move the adjournment. However, I see no other way of accomplishing what I desire. It may seem that the matter I wish to speak about is a very small one, but I think I shall be able to show that, after all, it is of some importance. Two or three days ago I took occasion to make a few remarks on the plebiscite and to ask a question, and I find that the Montreal "Witness," a newspaper which most of us receive during the session—comments as follows on my course:

Before the debate was resumed, Mr. Craig moved the adjournment of the House in order to ask the Premier when they might expect the plebiscite Bill. It was not necessary to move the adjournment of the House to do this, except that Mr. Craig, with that extremely narrow partisanship which characterises all his proceedings on the temperance question, desired to read an extract from the "Templar," of Hamilton.

I do not care very much, personally, what the Montreal "Witness" says about me and my course on this question, and I know that it does not make these remarks because it has anything against me but because I happen to belong to the Conservative party. The argument seems to be that if a man belongs to the Conservative party and is a prohibitionist or takes an interest in the temperance question, he must be a hypocrite. I cannot see that there is any other argument in it. They want to make out that I am not sincere. But if I belonged to the Liberal party, I suppose, according to the "Witness" opinion, I should be perfectly sincere in everything I said on this question. What does this lead to? It leads to this, that if there is any credit in belonging to the temperance party and advocating prohibition, as they claim there is, they want all the credit for the Liberal party. Now if the "Witness" were a party paper, or rather if it professed to be a party paper, I should not find fault, though I might bear a little grudge against it for making statements of this kind that are not correct. But the "Witness" poses as an independent paper. The management must have a strange idea of independence, because whenever they can do it, they take sides against the Conservative party, and condone in every possible way the sins of the Liberal party. I do not think that it is fair for them to take the position that they are independent and, under the guise of independence, do party work. As to my record on this question, as to my constituency, I am ready to leave that to the members of this House. When I sat on the other side of the House, I seconded the motion in favour of prohibition several times, and spoke in favour of it, though my doing so was not regarded with great favour by some who sat near me, and though the question was looked upon as an embarrassing one to a Government, as, no doubt, it is regarded still. But when the Conservatives were in power, I took the same stand as I am taking to-day. I am not going to say anything about the "Templar." The "Witness" says I moved the adjournment in order to read something from the "Templar." Well, the "Templar" is not my organ, it is the recognized organ of the temperance party in Ontario, and it is quite able to take care of itself. I do not know anything about their politics, but I read an extract from it, so that the Premier, in case he had not seen it might know what was said, and in hope that he would give an answer, as he did.

The "Witness" is a prohibition paper and has always taken that side. Well, the "Witness" may want prohibition, but it is taking the best course to hinder it. If the "Witness" wants to introduce party politics into this question, and to say to the Conservative members in this House: We do not want your assistance, leave that to us—then, we might as well give up all hope of getting prohibition. To see such articles as this in newspapers which claim to be independent and in favour of prohibition is enough to make one who sincerely desires prohibition almost despair of ever seeing it. Further, the "Witness" is a good moral paper—I will say that for it, and it is more, it is a religious paper. But, after all, I think it sometimes works in a good deal of party politics under the guise of religion. It is very well to preach about religion, but it would be a good thing for the management of the "Witness" to practice it as well. I will give the management a hint for its practice. They might try and keep one of the commandments—it might be hard for them to do it—that commandment that says "Thou shalt not bear false witness." That will be a very good thing for the "Witness" to do. And I will give them another text—"Judge not that ye be not judged." Why, Sir, the "Witness" is judging me. If they say I act from political motives, what are we to say about the "Witness" and the members on the other side of the House who have begun this imputing of bad faith to members on this side who advocate reforms of this kind. Let me give them another text which, I think, they could heed to advantage: "A house divided against itself cannot stand." I hope they will publish all these texts. If the prohibitionists are not going to be united on this question, we need never hope to see prohibition. I do not wish to detain the House, and so I conclude by saying that if the "Witness" wishes to be fair to me and the Conservative party, it will give a full report of what I have said to-day.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I purpose saying a few words only on the question now before the House. First, in reply to my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMILLAN), who was the last speaker on that side of the House. This hon. gentleman represents himself and has always represented himself in this House as a practical farmer. Now I want to ask the members of this House through you, Sir, is he? I have had the honour and pleasure of sitting with the hon. gentleman in this House for some sixteen years, for four or five and sometimes even six months every year. At the end of that time the hon. gentleman returns to his home to recuperate for a few weeks after his arduous labours of the session. Does he take off his coat then, and go to work upon his farm? Judging from the remarks he made last night, he visited every constituency in the province of Ontario except the constituencies of Nipissing and Algoma and spent two or three days in each constituency. I think that would consume the balance of the year. What is he doing while travelling? He is working for the Ontario Government for two dollars and a half a day and his expenses. It is evident that the hon. gentleman has found this better than farming, for he not only gives his own time to it but the services of his son employed in the same business—talking to the farmers.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not deny it, but that is more than the hon. gentleman himself (Mr. Taylor) could get.

Mr. TAYLOR. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMILLAN)—I could not get the pull on the Ontario Government that he has got. The hon. gentleman, I have no doubt, employs men at fifty or seventy-five cents per day to feed his cattle on American corn, while he is away earning two dollars and a half a day from the Ontario government for talking to the farmers about how to run their farms. But the hon. gentleman has talked so much that by this time, I think, judging from the remarks he made last night, he does not himself believe what he says. He made the statement last night that he was a free trader. He made the further statement that the protective duties on agricultural products were of no benefit to the farmers of this country. He cited the fact that during all last season wheat was 10 to 12 cents higher in Buffalo and Oswego than it was in the Canada markets on this side of the river. Now, I quote from the "Globe," because that is the hon. gentleman's bible, he won't believe anything he sees in any other paper. Here is what the "Globe" of Wednesday says, giving the Toronto market:

No. 1 hard, at $1.07½; Midland, $1.15, grinding intransit, and $1.12 at North Bay.

$1.12 at North Bay would be equal to $1.15 for No. 1 hard in Toronto.

Buffalo—No. 1 hard, $1.08. Oswego—No. 1 northern, $1.11 to $1.12; No. 2 hard, $1.05.

Eight or 10 cents a bushel less than it is in the Toronto market. Yet the hon. gentleman had the hardihood to get up in this House and say that American markets had led the Canadian markets by 10 or 12 cents a bushel on wheat.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. No. 1 hard is not a wheat that the Ontario farmer sells; that is wheat that comes from the North-west.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am not talking about the Ontario farmer; I am talking about Canadian wheat.

Mr. McMILLAN. Allow me to make a statement.

Mr. TAYLOR. There is no point of order there.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Huron cannot interrupt a member who has the floor, without his permission.

Mr. TAYLOR. He rose to a point of order, but he has no point of order.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have always understood that, when any member of this House made an incorrect statement, the member he was referring to had a right to correct the statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Huron said he rose to a point of order. The hon. gentleman's point of order, I am afraid, is not well taken, because no hon. member has a right to interrupt another, except with his consent.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) did as he usually does, as a great many members on that side of the House usually do, devote the greater part of his speech to eulogizing the statesmen who now compose the present Government; not only are they statesmen, but he says the present Government is composed principally of business men, as well. Mr. Speaker, compare the ability of the statesmen forming this Government with the ability of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition in this House. Where do they stand? If you talk privately with the hon. gentlemen opposite, they will admit that the right hon. leader of the Opposition has more ability and has shown it both in this House and out of it, than any other gentleman in the country. All you have to do is to refer to what he said last year, when the Government came down with their preferential tariff that was only going to apply to England. The right hon. gentleman the leader of the Opposition told us, with regard to that question, as he does with regard to all others, what would be the outcome, and he pointed out that, as soon as that proposition became law, nearly every country in the world would come in under it as well as England, and he was right. But the leader of the present Government and his colleagues said it would only apply to England. Then, as to the business ability of this Government; let us stand them up here, man by man, and see where the business ability is. Take, in the first place, my hon. friend who sits nearly opposite me, the Minister from the wild and woolly west, the Minister of the Interior. Is he a business man? Why, he is a lawyer, and who ever knew a lawyer to be possessed of very much business ability? This Government entrusted the Minister of the Interior, a lawyer, with the duty of making a business transaction with two sharp and shrewd business men, Messrs. Mackenzie &

Mr. TAYLOR.

Mann, and what sort of a bargain did he make for the country? Does it show any business ability in the Minister of the Interior, when he practically gave away a continent in order to get built 150 miles of tramway? Take the hon. Postmaster General, who sits alongside him; he is another lawyer. Is he a business man? The only business I know that was ever entrusted to him was his appointment as manager, or president, of the Farmers' Loan Society, and we hear to-day of the howling success he made of that business. Then we take the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He is a lawyer, too, not a business man. I have never known him to do any business but legal business. Has he business ability, practical business ability? Then we will take the hon. the Prime Minister, another lawyer. Has he ever been a business man? Why, the whole institution is a Cabinet of lawyers. I admit, as every man in this House and outside of it will admit, that as Prime Minister he makes a very good figure head, but what business ability has he ever shown? Then we will take my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a barrister. But where have we ever found his tracks in the business world of this country? Then we will take the Minister of Finance. Is he a business man? Why, the business of his life has been politics and writing for newspapers. They know something a little less, I think, than lawyers, do newspaper men. Then we will take the Minister of Agriculture. Is he a business man? Why, they had to have a farmer, and they picked upon him, and I must say that he has shown, at least, a great deal of prudence in the management of the Experimental Farm and the dairy business of this country, under the direction of Professor Saunders and Professor Robertson. He called these and the other heads of the department together, and I have no doubt he said to them: Gentlemen, I know nothing about farming or anything else. You run the business, and I will sign the papers that you present. These gentlemen were appointed by the late Conservative Government; they were the best men that could be selected in the country, and Professor Saunders, Professor Robertson and others are running the business on the old lines and following out the policy that the late Government left for them to carry out, in the way of cold storage and transportation. Then we have another business man, in the person of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, another lawyer. Where does his business ability shine? Surely, not in the deal that he made with business men in the purchase of the Drummond County Railway. Then we have another gentleman, the hon. Minister of Public Works, sitting alongside of him. Is he a business man?

AN hon. MEMBER. He is a notary, and signs notes.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, he is a notary ; but he knew how to deal or to have a finger in the deal, not for himself, but for the members of his family, when he admitted in his place here in the House, that his sons had got $20,000 out of the gentleman with whom the deal was being made in reference to the Drummond County Railway. But he said it was party funds that he was purchasing a newspaper for his sons. Then we have the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence. Is he a business man ? He has practised medicine all his life until he came in here as Minister of Militia and Defence. Then we have the Minister of Justice, another lawyer, the Solicitor General, another lawyer.—

The PRIME MINISTER. Do you want them to be farmers ?

Mr. TAYLOR—the Secretary of State, another lawyer—not much business in either of these gentlemen, nor in any other member of the Cabinet that I have named thus far. But we have three others; two of them are tax-collectors. The hon. Minister of Customs is a practical business man, and so is the Minister of Inland Revenue, but these practical business men have got to give their services for $2,000 a year less than their colleagues. Then we have a business man, in the person of the hon. Minister of the Exterior, the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Döbell). He is a business man, but possessed of such business ability that this Government think it best to keep this business man out of the House and trot him across to England, because every time he gets up in this House, he shows his ability, and the members in the House and the people in the galleries recognize that ability. The hon. gentleman is constantly travelling across the ocean in order to tell the people of England how to build a line of bottle-necked steamships, which will be the fast line of this country. The Minister of Finance made a great flourish of trumpets when he announced to the House that he had carried out radical changes in the tariff, and I must say this as regards the hon. gentleman, that he presented the case in much better form than the Minister of Customs, to whom I shall refer very shortly. The Minister of Finance made the statement that he had selected sixty items out of the tariff, the National Policy of his predecessors, and he pointed out the changes made in that tariff which were beneficial to the farmers. He enumerated the items under the old National Policy, the present tariff, and worked out the details under the preferential clause. How does the preferential tariff apply to the figures given ? I will read the old and the new, giving different columns :

The hon. gentleman in giving those figures worked out how the preferential tariff would apply, showing a large percentage of reduction in favour of the new tariff, and that the farmers would obtain their goods at a less price.

Furniture of wood, &c. 30 p. c. 30 p. c.

That is a specimen of the sixty items enumerated, and I point out that there are more increases than reductions. I want to ask that hon. Minister or any hon. member what quantity of furniture we will import from England under this preferential tariff? In what respect will this benefit the farmers? Again, what agricultural implements come in here from England by which the farmers will be benefited? My hon. friend will admit the fact that there is not an article in the list of agricultural implements which will come in from England for use by our farmers. What benefit will this preferential tariff confer on them? The same remark applies to carriages, axles and every article enumerated. The Canadian farmers use agricultural implements adapted to the country, and the English farmers do the same. If an Englishman comes here, he will not trust his life in one of the light carriages we use. So as regards the whole list of the sixty articles, the Canadian farmer will get no benefit from this preferential tariff, because there are only two items in the whole list that will apply, and those items are cottons and woollens. On those two lines the Government, before adopting the preferential tariff, increased the duty from 30 to 35 per cent. Under the preferential tariff the duty will be about 26½ per cent, and so the reduction will be only 3½ cents on the dollar's worth. The Government have admitted corn free, which in my opinion is a great injury to the farming industry, notwithstanding the opinion of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. McMillan). On the whole list of sixty articles the farmers will probably effect a saving of a few cents a year; but it will be more than counter-balanced by duties raised above the old tariff. Take the sugar duties, put on a few days ago. Every farmer uses sugar, and there is now an increased duty of ½ cent a pound. Then there is the increased duty on tobacco. So the farmer will pay on tobacco and sugar more than he will save under the preferential tariff. Another tax proposed is one on newspapers. The Postmaster General proposes to reduce the letter postage to 2 cents, but he intends to tax the newspapers to make up for the loss, and thus he will place another tax on the farmers. Another tax proposed by the Finance Minister applies to farmers and mechanics who save a little money, and it is to reduce the interest on deposit in post office savings banks from 3 to 2½ per cent. Then hon. gentlemen opposite point with pride to the reduction on coal oil, I wonder the right hon. Prime Minister is not afraid to use the word coal oil, after having promised the people to make it free and only reducing it from 6 to 5 cents per gallon. Hon. gentlemen opposite are also making a great outcry in regard to placing binder twine on the free list. What are the facts? The Government are manufacturing binder twine in the penitentiaries. They asked for tenders from their friends, and received offers from three firms, McCaul Bros., Wood & Valence and Hobbs Brothers. Hobbs Brothers' tender was 4 cents for sisal McCaul Bros., 4·40 cents. Hobbs Bros. having received notification amended their tender to 4·30 cents. Finding they had not reached the proper point, they sent a telegram to their agent here to increase the tender by 10 cents, making it 4·40 cents, which was the tender of McCaul Bros., and Hobbs' tender was accepted. We find in the penitentiary account the output is entered as having been sold at 4 cents instead of 4·40 cents. Now, at what price did Hobbs Brothers sell the binding twine? I made some inquiries last week of a large consumer who purchased from them last year. I asked the price, and they showed me the contract, and stated that the price was 5½ cents for the binding twine, which, as I have pointed out was obtained at 4 cents, leaving a pretty good profit. Do we find the Hobbs Brothers buying and selling binding twine to-day? I asked the same party where he bought his binding twine this year, and whether he bought it at as cheap a rate as last year. He said he bought it from a new concern, the Ontario Binder Twine Company. I asked him whether he knew who composed the firm. He replied that he would find out. I asked him whether he bought it at the same price. He replied that he was paying 5½ cents for sisal and more for higher grades. So the result is that the farmers will have to pay probably for their binding twine ¼ of a cent or 1 cent more this year than last, notwithstanding the fact that it has been placed on the free list. I wrote to a friend of mine in Toronto asking who the Ontario Binder Twine Company was, and here is his letter:

In reply to your letter of yesterday requesting to know who composes the firm of the Ontario Binder Twine Company, I beg to say that this is said to be merely a trade name for the Hobbs Hardware Company of London, of which T. S. Hobbs, ex-M.P.P., is the head and general manager.

The Hobbs people are said to have purchased a quantity of binder twine from the Ontario Government and did not care to dispose of it under their own firm name, and consequently adopted this trade name for the purpose.

I believe this information to be reliable as it is from the Mercantile Agency.

We therefore find that the Hobbs Company were ashamed to do business under their own name for this Government and the Ontario Government, and so they adopted a new name and called themselves the Ontario Binder Twine Company. I wrote to another person about it, and here is his answer:

I believe that the Hobbs Hardware Company of London run their twine business under the name of the Ontario Binder Twine Company, also the Independent Cordage Company.

They made two companies out of it so that they would be supposed to have a little competition, but the same people run the two companies.

And again I believe that the Plymouth Twine Agency in Canada is controlled by them.

Therefore, the American Plymouth Twine monopoly have appointed Hobbs their agent for Canada, and the Hobbs people control the whole thing. That is one reason why the farmers of this country will this year pay from $\frac{3}{4}$ of a cent to 1 cent per pound more for their binder twine than they did last.

The present Government talk about the reduction of the duty on barbed wire, and let us see how they have reduced it. Why, they have reduced barbed wire so that there is not a yard of it manufactured in Canada to-day. They have driven the Canadian manufacturer of barbed wire across the line to the United States. When I was home on Saturday I inquired from the people where they were buying their barbed wire this year, and they told me they had brought a carload of it in from Pennsylvania. They paid $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents for it last year and they are paying $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents for it this year. Where is the reduction? Some time ago we had a thriving manufactory of woven wire fencing in this country. There is a manufactory at Walkerville employing forty or fifty hands, and how is this Government serving that factory? That woven wire fencing is now largely used by all the railway companies; by the farmers in the North-west Territories, and all through Canada, and how is the manufacturer of it treated at the present time. Well, Sir, the article manufactured in the United States is admitted into this country at 15 per cent, in order, it was said, to reduce the cost of it to the farmers. How are the Government treating every Canadian industry engaged in the manufacture of that wire? Why, they charged them 20 per cent on the raw material that goes into the construction of that fencing. I have here in my hand a diagram of the fencing, and I find that there are ten wires used in the construction of it. One of the wires, "No. 9," is admitted free of duty, and all the other wires are charged a duty of 20 per cent, so that this industry is thinking of closing up to-day, going across the river, manufacturing the fencing in the United States, and sending it back to Canada, for by this means they will have 5 per cent margin. They will have 5 per cent better margin by manufacturing it in the United States than if they manufactured in Canada at the present time.

Then, Sir, the Minister of Finance, after making practically only one change in the tariff, that of increasing the cost of sugar to the consumers of Canada, wound up his speech by holding a club over the heads of Canadian manufacturers. He said, speaking of the manufacturer:

I am inclined to think, Sir, that he will find eternal vigilance to be the price of his protection.

By that threat the Minister of Finance elevates a club in his fist and says to Canadian manufacturers: If you want to continue your industry in this country you have to support the Government in power, or off goes your head so far as the tariff policy of this Government is concerned.

I regret that the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) has just left his seat in the House because I intend referring to some of his remarks. I stated a few moments ago that the Minister of Finance was more fair and more honest in his presentment of the case than was the Minister of Customs, and I repeat that statement. I have no doubt that the speech made by the Minister of Customs was for the purpose of influencing the opinion of the farmers, and the people of Canada, so as to make them believe that the Government under the new tariff had made great reductions, and that they were to be largely benefited by them. Now, such is not the case. In this speech the Minister (Mr. Paterson) was simply carrying out the policy of the Government since they came into power, in trying to delude the people. The Government promised to reduce taxation and they have not done it. They promised to reduce expenditure but they have increased it; and now the Minister (Mr. Paterson) tries to make the people believe that this Government have reduced the taxes and revised and remodelled the whole tariff. The hon. gentleman commenced his speech by words which bore the construction, that this Government had taken 25 per cent off the cost of every article used in this country. Here is what he said:

You take 25 per cent off; that is very little. People do not realize how much 25 per cent off the old tariff rate amounts to. If you tell a farmer in the North-west or anywhere else; I will give you 60 cents a bushel for your wheat, when he has been getting 80 cents a bushel, and he should say to you: Why, that is a terrible reduction; then you may turn round and say, in the language of hon. gentlemen opposite: No, that is no reduction; that is only 25 per cent off.

The Minister of Customs had no other object in view than to lead the people to believe that the Government had taken 25 per cent off, and that the reduction would have the same effect upon the price of every article they bought, as if a bushel of wheat cost 80 cents, and if 25 per cent were taken off, the cost then would be 60 cents a bushel. He said: Here is a bushel of wheat at 80 cents, but you take 25 per cent off the cost, and it will then be only worth 60 cents, and he tried to make the people believe that the new tariff would have the same effect on the cost of any articles the people bought. But the hon. gentleman must have known that that was not right. Here is how it would work. A farmer crosses the river to the United States and buys an article for $1. If he brought it under the old tariff of 30 per cent it would cost him $1.30 in Canada. Now, suppose the Government have reduced that tariff from 30 to 25 per cent, and a man goes across and buys an article at $1. When he pays the 25 per cent duty under the new tariff, the article will cost him $1.25 instead of $1.30, which is a reduction of 5 cents; and yet, in view of this, which is actually the case, the hon. gentleman told the people of this country that the cost of that article would be reduced to the same extent as the price of a bushel of wheat in the instance he gave, namely by 25 per cent on the total cost. Again, the hon. gentleman tried to mislead the people of this country when he quoted a list of some sixteen articles, and then said:

I have given you sixteen articles under the general tariff, and I propose now to give you a list of 107 articles. There are about 447 dutiable items in the tariff, and 200 free items, and I think I may say, speaking subject to correction—but I believe I am absolutely correct.

Now, Sir, I have looked over the tariff, and I find there are 447 items under the dutiable list, as the hon. Minister said. But he held out to the people that his Government had changed 107 of these items and given a reduction. Now, Sir, let us see if that is true. He named 107 articles on which he said there were reductions, but he quoted them so as to make them appear as if each article was an item in the tariff.

Adzes, cleavers, hatchets, saws, wedges, hammers, crowbars, picks, mattocks, tools not agricultural. Now, if you turn up the tariff, item 289, you will find that these ten articles are in one item; so that instead of ten items being changed, there is only one. Take the next item, 290: It contains nine articles—axes, scythes, sickles or reaping-hooks, hay or straw knives, edging knives, hoes, rakes, pronged forks, snaths, farm, road or field rollers, post-hole diggers, and other agricultural implements, n.e.s. He makes nine separate items of these, whereas in the tariff they are all included in one item. Is that an honest or fair way of putting the matter? I have the present tariff in my hand, and I have the changes marked in it. We will take up that tariff. On the first page of the tariff, which is page 7 of the pamphlet, there are seven items, and only one change made; so that six items on that page are left without change. On the next page there are two items and no change; these are liquors. On the next page there are twenty-six items, in some of the items seven or eight articles enumerated, and there are but two changes in the twenty-six items. On the next page there are twenty-seven items and not a change; on the next page twenty-five items and not a change; on the next page twenty-one items and not a change; on the next page eighteen items and not a change; on the next page nine items and five changes; on the next page fifteen items and three changes; on the next page fifteen items and one change; on the next page fifteen items and three changes. This gives us 179 items of the 447 that are dutiable, and in these 179 items there are only seventeen changes made. I might go through the whole tariff and show the same thing. The Minister of Finance put the matter fairly when he said that out of the 447 items, there were about sixty items changed. Yet the Minister of Customs held out to the people of this country that there were 107 items changed. Moreover, of these seventeen changes which I have mentioned, many are increases from 30 to 35 per cent, while others are slight decreases, such as 30 per cent reduced to 25 per cent; but there will be no practical reduction in the cost of the goods imported.

Then, the Minister of Customs made another misleading statement, and I ask my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Customs (Mr. Wallace) to pay particular attention to this, because I am quite sure he will corroborate the statement I make. The hon. Minister of Customs made this statement:

I find, taking the importation of goods entered for consumption into Canada under the reciprocal tariff, and the duty collected thereon during the six months ending the 31st of December, 1897, that the abatement of duty under the 12½ per cent reduction amounted to $521,451 during the six months. If you double that, you get the year's operations as fairly as we can estimate them now. I think you will be safe in doubling it, because trade does not all at once find its new channel.

Then he went on:

I say double that and you will have $1,042,000 of relief. That is the relief in one year, under a reduction of 12½ per cent. I venture to say that there is not a man who will not admit that with this current of trade now established, and with the impetus which 25 per cent will give it as against 12½ per cent, a reduction of $2,000,000 of taxation will represent the reduction on the imports under that reciprocal tariff after a year from next July.

If the hon. gentleman wanted to be fair and honest with the people of this country, he should have made out and presented a table showing the reduction in the duty on goods from England alone; but during the six months the reciprocal tariff allowed goods to come in at reduced rates of duty from almost every country in the world. A large proportion of these goods came from Germany and other countries that will be shut out from the preferential tariff after the 1st of August. Yet the hon. Minister of Customs says that after the 1st of August this trade will go on increasing, and will save the people of this country two or three millions a year. Is that fair or honest? When I was at home on Saturday last I was talking to a merchant, who showed me a box of collars and cuffs imported from Germany which he was opening out. He said to me: "A German agent was here a few days ago, and we made a large contract with him for goods to be delivered after the 1st of July next and before the 1st of August, so that they will come in under the preferential tariff." To-day there are German agents in many parts of the country taking orders for goods to be delivered after the 1st of July and before the 1st of August, to the great detriment of the Canadian manufacturer, while the consumers of these goods will not derive any benefit in reduced prices. When the Minister of Customs told us the saving that had been effected to the people under the preferential tariff for the six months ending the 31st of December, 1897, and said that that amount would be doubled in a year's operations, was that fair or honest, when he knew that the preferential tariff applied to forty or fifty countries? After the 1st of August the preferential tariff will not benefit the people of this country, except in the two lines of woollens and cottons, because it will only apply to England and it will not affect many classes of goods which the people of this country use very largely, such as wagons and agricultural implements. Therefore, I say, his whole statement amounted to a piece of deception, to humbug the farmers of this country and to make them believe that they were going to have reduced prices on the goods they imported under the preferential tariff. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the hon. Minister of Customs is not in his place, but I have not said a word during his absence that I would not have said were he present. The speech he made here was, in my opinion, nothing more nor less than an electioneering speech, such as was made by that hon. gentleman and other hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House previous to the election of 1896, for the express purpose of trying to deceive the electorate of this country.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has taken upon himself to give the Government of the day the benefit of his opinion on their tariff. He grew very facetious over the fact that the Cabinet is composed largely of that very poor and despised class of the community called lawyers. He never raised any objection to lawyers when his own party sat on this side of the House. He even found fault with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) being a farmer, while he knows very well that in his own Government a Minister of Agriculture was a physician; but that seemed to be quite satisfactory. Then, he made a charge against the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) because the Ontario Government had given him a fee of $2.50 a day to go about and attend farmers' institutes. The hon. member knows well that the Ontario Government employs every winter a large number of farmers, qualified men, to go about and discuss matters pertaining to farming, and they make no distinction between parties.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh oh.

Mr. FROST. That is quite true. I can give the names of a dozen gentlemen who last winter went about discussing farming questions at these institutes, and I can give the name of one gentleman, a most qualified man in my own constituency, who has been employed at this work for the last four years and who is a very strong Conservative. It is to the credit of the Ontario Government that it has been always perfectly fair in these matters, and has employed gentlemen on both sides, irrespective of political differences, so long as they were well qualified. And we know there that there is not a better qualified man in Ontario to discuss those practical questions than my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), who has been a successful farmer himself, and who is not only well known but is very acceptable at all the farmers' institutes throughout Ontario.

My hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) blows cold in one moment and hot in the next. He tells us that this Government has adopted the policy of the late Government, and then, almost in the same breath, condemns this Government for removing protection and destroying industries. Let me say that no Government could have greater reason to congratulate itself on the result of its management of public affairs than has the present one, and I am sure that no people have greater cause for congratulation in having such experienced, far-sighted and business-like men at the head of affairs than have the people of this Dominion. We know that under eighteen years of Conservative rule, hon. gentlemen opposite had, by their pernicious fiscal policy, by their persistent swelling of the public debt and expenditure, brought about a period of depression such as never before existed and such as was felt from one end of the country to the other. If there is any test of business qualifications it is in changing a condition of depression into one of prosperity, and can we not point to a change in twenty-two months that this Government has been in power from depression to prosperity, such as never previously took place in the history of this country. Let me call your attention, Sir, to what has been done. For many years prior to the advent of this Government, we know that farm lands became so depressed in value that it was almost impossible to sell a farm anywhere, and the prices of products fell so low that the farmers were at their wits' end to make both ends meet. We know that everywhere manufacturing industries were depressed, that the tall chimneys promised at the inauguration of the National Policy eighteen years ago did not materialize to any extent, and that from those which did very little smoke was coming. We know that thousands of men had to go to the United States for work, and all because of that boasted policy which was intended to build up the industries of this country. But what is the condition to-day. Looking about this country, we can point to the evidences of improvement everywhere. Why, the very town in which my hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) lives is more prosperous now than it ever was. Every factory in it is running, not only all day but half the night. The hon. gentleman knows that his own town has never been so thriving before. I know as a fact that only a few days ago the hon. gentleman himself stood in a carriage factory in a neighbouring town, in company with another prominent member of this House, and was told by the manager that he could not fill orders rapidly enough and that now they were turning out three carriages per hour when formerly they made but two, and proposed making arrangements to turn out four per hour.

Mr. TALLYOR. I did not make the statement that we could not fill our orders, for we can, and are making four carriages now in place of three.

Mr. FROST. I hope that the factory will be able not only to turn out four but five.

Mr. TAYLOR. We are not making any money, though.

Mr. FROST. The hon. gentleman has himself furnished an evidence of the improvement under the policy of the present Government. There is scarcely an industry in this country that is to-day able to fill its orders, and I call your attention to what is going on in the industrial world as an evidence of the success of the careful readjustment of the tariff by the Finance Minister. I propose to read to the House a few quotations taken from the last number of the "Canadian Manufacturer," a journal which every hon. member knows is the exponent of the protective interests of Canada. It is a journal which opposes the Liberal party, which at one time stated that if the Liberal party came into power every industry in this country would become stagnate and every interest depressed, and we would have practically to shut up shop and transfer our manufacturing business to the United States. Looking over the first of July number of that newspaper, I find the following:—

The Cobban Manufacturing Company, of Toronto, are employing a record-breaking number of hands, and report a good outlook.

The Gurney Foundry Company, of Toronto, sees extending trade ahead. February of this year has been a much better month for them than February, 1897.

The Abell Engine Works, of Toronto, are running up to their full capacity. They are filling $50,000 of orders for the North-west Territories.

Mr. FROST.

The Sydenham Glass Company, of Wallaceburg, Ont., has a contract for the manufacture of several carloads of lantern globes.

The Bertram ship-yards in Toronto are taxed to their utmost. Overtime is the rule, and everybody is so busy that he has scarcely time to eat his lunch.

The Canadian Pacific Railway is so busy that eighteen men in the paint shop at Toronto Junction, Ont., are laid off, as cars cannot be spared from the road to be overhauled, the traffic is so great.

The cut of logs on the Tobique River, N.B., is expected to reach 50,000,000 feet for the past winter. The cut on the Upper St. John will likely be twice as great as the Tobique cut.

The Metallic Roofing Company, of Toronto, have found it necessary to increase their floor space by one-third, owing to the fact that their sales for this year are already three times what they were during the same period of last year.

Menzie, Turner & Co., window-shade manufacturers, Toronto, report that their engines are running day and night, and so far this year they have doubled the business of the same months of last year. They are employing twice as many hands.

The Dyson-Gibson Company, of Winnipeg, manufacturers of spices, &c., are asking permission by way of letters patent to increase their capital to $100,000.

The Dechènes Electric Light Company, of Dechènes Mills, Que., is having plans prepared for a system of dams to develop 3,000 horse-power at Dechènes Rapids. A new power house will also be built.

John Hope & Co., bobbin and spool manufacturers, Lachute Mills, Que., report a very busy winter. They have just received large contracts from some of the leading cotton mills of Canada.

Two more 252-inch looms, for making felt, have been recently added to the plant of Hamelin & Ayers, Lachute Mills, Que. This makes six looms of this size now working in their mills.

I call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that the woollen industry is certainly upon a very prospering basis.

Milton Pulp Mill, at Milton, Queen's county, N.S., is putting out about 2,000 tons per month. The mill uses from six to eight carloads of wood per diem, and is working splendidly. Manager Hughes has reason to be proud of his factory.

The Canadian Pacific Railway will shortly have an 800,000 bushel elevator at St. John, N.B. They already have a 300,000 bushel elevator at this point.

There are scores and scores of applications here for joint stock companies, with capitals of from $50,000 to $500,000. This whole paper is full of evidence of the prosperity which has come to this country within the past year, and particularly since the introduction of the revised tariff by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I could quote a great many more, but I will not weary the House. The evidence is here that this country is upon the highroad of prosperity. And when we remember that under the boasted National Policy the country was stagnant from one end to another, that the industries of the country were so depressed that men were fleeing the country, I have reason to say, and reason to call the attention of the member for South Leeds to the fact, that what he says cannot be supported by the facts of the case.

Then, again, the Government has been very strongly accused of not carrying out their pledges. If these charges were true, the Government certainly would be culpable. But if we look at the work they have done in twenty months, to the unprejudiced mind it must appear something a little less than marvellous. What were the pledges they gave to this country when in Opposition? Did not the right hon. leader of the Government declare that, if he was placed in power, he would settle the Manitoba school question inside of six months, settle it for ever, and settle it to the satisfaction of the entire country? Has not that been done? Has not that question been settled to the satisfaction of the country? Why, that is the reason we have peace from one end of the country to the other. We were disturbed with race and creed difficulties for years. To-day you do not hear a word of these difficulties, but everywhere, instead of fighting over race and creed, people are devoting themselves to making money and building up a great nation here. Here, it must be confessed, is a pledge that has been fulfilled. The Government promised they would stop the exodus to the United States. Can we not fairly say that it has been stopped, that every man in this country who is able to and willing to work, has the opportunity to be employed? Cannot we say that the way in which the promise to reduce the tariff so as to fulfil the requirements of the revenue, and at the same time to enable the industries of this country to thrive better than they throve under the boasted National Policy, has been carried out in its fulfilment? What I have just read is ample proof of that. Did not the leader of the Government say that, if he were returned to power, the vacant lands of Manitoba and the North-west would be rapidly settled? And has not that been going on this year? Is there not an immigration into Manitoba and the North-west greater than ever was known before in the history of that country? I think that the members from Manitoba and the North-west will bear me out in that statement. Then, again, was not the promise given that, if the Liberals were returned to power, they would give freer trade with Great Britain? And is not the preferential tariff a sufficient fulfilment of that? We have heard something of what the preferential tariff was, according to the mind of my hon. friend from South Leeds. But has he stated the case with accuracy? Has not the preferential tariff of Canada been one of the greatest things that has ever been done to bind the Empire together? We have been told that in Great Britain they were deluded in this matter. If so, they are certainly a more stupid class of people than they are usually thought to be. The people of Great Britain have a trade and commerce outrivalling that of any other country on the face of the globe. For any hon. gentleman to tell us that such a people has been deluded on a question of business and finance, is certainly to make great demand on our credulity. We know that such is not the case. The right hon. leader of the Government went to Great Britain last year, and was received as no other representative of a colony was ever received. We were not only pleased and delighted, but we were astounded at the reception accorded to him. There was not a club, not a section of the people, not a representative statesman, but vied with the others in doing him honour. And the policy he has carried out, this preference accorded to Great Britain, has been greatly enlarged, to the benefit of a sister colony. And in this way our right hon. leader has been doing more to bind together the different portions of the Empire, and has done more to bring this country forward into the position of a nation and to make it prominent before the countries of the world, than was ever done before. Another pledge was, that there should be a revival in agriculture. Can any one deny that that pledge has been carried out? Has there not been an increase in prices; has there not been a great increase in exportation to the old country by reason of the policy of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher)? Have not the cold storage facilities, have not the increased transportation facilities which the Minister has been the means of securing since he became the head of the department, conduced to make a revival of agriculture and to make an increase of prices of all products? To-day we find there were sixteen millions of exports last year, more than the year before, and in the six months ending 1st of January last, there was a further increase of sixteen millions, making a total of thirty-two millions up to the 1st January last.

I think these things are evidences that the Government are keeping their pledges. They have improved the transportation facilities, they promised to stop deficits. Will any hon. gentleman deny that the deficits are stopped? They are certainly stopped, notwithstanding that the Government have given the mother country a preference in her market of 12½ per cent, to be followed by another 12½ per cent on the 1st of July. I think, therefore, that during the short time which the Government have been in power they have accomplished a great deal, and done it as business men. I do not care whether they are lawyers, or doctors, or what may have been their profession, I say that they have done enough during the 20 months that they have been in power to stamp them as business men. Moreover, the country supports them. I believe that every by-election that has taken place in this country since the general election, has gone in favour of the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FROST. Well, every seat that was held by a Liberal has been kept by Liberals, and we have gained a good number from the hon. gentlemen opposite. We are quite willing to give them one or two, I think only one. But on last Wednesday we had another evidence of the popularity of this Government, when in the county of Prince, P.E.I. the Government candidate obtained a majority of 289, while at the general election the Government candidate received only 81 majority, showing almost a three-fold increase since the general elections. Now, I think that is complete evidence that the popularity of this Government is permanently established, and as long as they handle the affairs of this country in the statesmanlike and businesslike way in which they are doing it now, I am satisfied they will be sustained by the people, and it will not make a particle of difference in the minds of the people whether the Ministers are lawyers, or doctors, or what their previous occupation may have been. But they have made other pledges, and it will not be long before these other pledges will be carried out. We have now before this House the Franchise Bill. A pledge was given to the country that the present iniquitous Franchise Bill would be abolished, and abolished it will be by a vote of this House, whatever may befall it in another House. Then there is the Superannuation Act, of which a good deal has been said in this House. We will see that Superannuation Act also abolished. Then there is another important matter; a solemn pledge was given by the right hon. the leader of the Government to the people of this country that a plebiscite would be submitted on the temperance question. A Bill for a plebiscite will be submitted, and the pledge will be carried out to the satisfaction, I think, of my hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig). Now, this and many other things have been accomplished by the present Government to promote the progress and advancement of this country. They show that this Government, strong in the affections of the people, are patriotic and determined to carry out the pledges they have given. Hon. gentlemen opposite have sometimes been found calling attention to their loyalty, and the Liberals have been, year in and year out, accused of being disloyal. Now, during the 25 years that the Conservatives have been in power since confederation, I would like any hon. gentleman opposite to point out one single thing they have done to entitle them to lay any special claim to loyalty as their distinguishing characteristic. The fact is that a great many things have occurred which show that the very opposite might be said of them with considerable truth. Yet the Liberals no sooner obtain power, than through the wise and conciliatory course of the right hon. leader of the Government, a position is secured for this colony in the Empire and throughout the world that it has never occupied before. We were told that it was impossible to secure the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties, because, forsooth, they were not willing to give us a quid pro quo for what we were giving. Yet this policy pursued by the right hon. leader of the Government not only brought about the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties, but it opened up all the other treaties between Great Britain and other countries, and in a very few months we will be placed in the position of a nation competent to make treaties as we like, and in accordance with our own desires and our own interests. More than this, 20 years ago when the National Policy was introduced, the then leader of the Government presented a resolution in favour of the development of the mineral resources of this country. Well, 20 years have rolled round, and no development of those mineral resources took place until the present Government came into power, and since they assumed the reins of power there has never been seen such a development as has recently taken place in the mineral resources of British Columbia and the Yukon district. Those resources are now attracting the attention of the whole world, and many thousands of miners are flocking thither in the hope of securing the gold and silver to be found in those regions. Millions and millions of dollars will be invested there within a short time in the development of those mineral resources. Why is all this? Simply because the Government have been alive to the great possibilities of that northern half of the continent, and have realized that it was necessary for them to take vigorous measures in the direction of developing those resources. I say there is no man in this country, no matter how obtuse he is, but will admit that no set of men could show greater business ability than has been shown by this Government in regard to the development of the mineral resources of Canada. Then the Crow's Nest Pass Railway is being built. The Government took that matter up boldly, and are carrying it through, and to-day we have a road running through the British Columbia mining district, and in connection with it an arrangement has been made for the reduction of the tariff rates that never could have been accomplished in any other way. The Canadian Pacific Railway has yielded to the Government the control of the rates, and we know that the rates all over the North-west Territories have already been reduced in accordance with the agreement that has been made, as well as the rates between the east and the west. Then this Government took hold of the Intercolonial Railway, a railway that has never paid us, a railway that has always been sinking from half a million to a million dollars a year. The late Government were unable practically to do anything with it, but this Government took hold of the matter, and to-day we have cars running into Montreal direct from Halifax over our own Inter-colonial Railway line. True, charges have been brought against the Government, and I heard to-day a charge brought against the Minister of Public Works. I heard that same charge made last night by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), and notwithstanding that the Minister of Public Works has stood up in his place in this House and denied that statement over and over again, that same charge bobs up.

Mr. FROST.

Mr. BENNETT. Certainly.

Mr. FROST. Then why don't you ask for a commission, and bring your charges before it in a manly and straightforward way? Why do you continue to make innuendoes here?

Mr. BENNETT. As the hon. gentleman has singled me out, let me tell him this—

Mr. FROST. I singled you out because I heard you make the statement.

Mr. BENNETT. I am rising by the hon. gentleman's courtesy, if he will allow me. If the hon. gentleman will consult the "Hansard" of last year, he will find the statement of the Minister of Public Works that he did obtain $20,000 from Mr. Greenshields. I believe him and you do not.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Permit me to say that the statement the hon. gentleman has just made is altogether untrue, and he knows it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FROST. It is an easy matter to deal in charges and slanders in this way, but it is not so easy to prove them. If any hon. gentleman thinks he can prove them, let him move for a commission.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order. The Minister of Public Works said that the statement made by my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Bennett) was untrue, and that he knew it to be so. Is that in order?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Perhaps the hon. member for Simcoe was also out of order in making the charge that I understood him to make last night against the Minister of Public Works, and the Minister of Public Works answered that the charge was not true. It is true also that the Minister of Public Works was out of order when he stated that the hon. gentleman made a statement that he knew was not true. But if that charge had not been made, perhaps the answer would not have been given.

Mr. CLANCY. I should like, Mr. Speaker, to know if your ruling is that one offence is to be offset against another. My hon.

friend called attention to a very important fact, that the hon. gentleman is out of order by making the statement that the hon. member for Simcoe had made a statement that was untrue and he knew it to be untrue. My hon. friend asks your ruling on that point.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). It is too late to raise the question because we have passed from that matter.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I submit that the Finance Minister is entirely wrong. We have not departed from that matter. The question has been raised by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin).

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It was not raised at the time the words were spoken.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, at the time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question was not brought up last night.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, because the words used last night by the Minister of Public Works were again stated to the House only a few minutes ago. The case is a very clear one, and every one who knows anything about the rules of the House is aware that the Minister of Public Works must withdraw his words. We have the statement made that the declaration of an hon. member was absolutely untrue and that he knew it to be untrue, and I submit that we cannot accept such a statement even from the Minister of Public Works. The dignity of the House must be maintained even if the dignity of the Minister of Public Works has to suffer for the moment.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I rise to speak on the point of order. When the hon. gentleman stated that last year I said that I had obtained money from the Drummond Counties Railway and that the statement would be found in "Hansard," I replied that the statement was untrue and that he knew it. I said it, and if my hon. friend stated that in the "Hansard" of last year it is recorded that I said that I got money from the Drummond Counties Railway, I say again that my hon. friend says what he knows is not true, because such words are not there. I maintain that I am perfectly in order, when a member of the House has before him the "Hansard," the official record, and he asserts that another hon. member has stated what he did not say, in saying that the hon. gentleman has said what is not true.

Mr. BENNETT. I desire to say a word on this point as I am the head and front of the offending. The Minister of Public Works did not catch exactly what I said last night. I did not, I think, say the statement was to be found in "Hansard." I said that was the statement, and he had to meet it. I have only this to say further to the Minister of Public Works, that I did not make the statement with a view to damaging him in the least in his position in the Cabinet, because I know he is so strong there it would not affect him one bit.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We should have the point of order decided.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have not spoken on the point of order, and I rise for the purpose, not of interposing at all in this discussion further than to say there is something more important in this matter than the exchange of opinions on a question of this kind between the two sides of the House. There is a fundamental question of order involved which will have to be decided by the hon. gentleman occupying the Chair. He knows from long experience in this House that if it is absolutely incompetent and in violation of the rules of the House for any hon. member to say, however great the provocation, however strongly he may hold the opinion—and it is never permitted by the Chair, and has never been permitted during the thirty years during which this Parliament has been in existence—that an hon. member made a statement which was untrue and he knew it to be untrue. That is contrary to the rules of order of this House, and I am quite certain that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would be the last man to change so important a rule of order. The hon. gentleman may have strong provocation, he may have good foundation for making his statement, but it is a statement which the rules of order absolutely preclude; and I am sure the Minister of Public Works will not hesitate, under these circumstances, to say that he withdraws the statement he has made, that the statement made by my hon. friend was untrue, and he knew it to be untrue, because that is not permitted under any circumstances.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. May I be permitted—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. May I be permitted to say a word?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman intends to speak to the point of order?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understood that the hon. gentleman had already made some remarks on the point of order. Perhaps I am mistaken.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has already spoken to the point of order.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I was interrupted, and was not permitted to finish my remarks on the point of order. I want to submit a point for the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BENNETT.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is in the recollection of the House—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The recollection of the House may not be the recollection of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It may be not.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am prepared to submit to the ruling of the Deputy Speaker, but I was interrupted in my remarks.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I ask your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on the point of order.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If you hold, Sir, that I have already spoken on the point of order, I am willing to bow to your ruling.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I thought the hon. gentleman had spoken.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I was interrupted.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I wish to say—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand the Minister of Finance wishes to speak to the point of order. I thought he had spoken to the point of order. I shall be obliged, of course, to apply the same rule in his case as in others.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I ask permission to say a few words, as I was interrupted before and had not an opportunity to finish my sentence. The point I take is, that objection to words that are offensive must be taken at the time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Order.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I wish further to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand the hon. gentleman is making a personal explanation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I submit this point—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. When the hon. gentleman speaks to the point of order I shall be obliged to call him to order, because he has already spoken on it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Order.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I submit that I have not spoken to the point of order, because I was not allowed to finish.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Chair has decided.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the Chair has decided, the Chair will say so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Chair has said so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Chair said so twice.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. Brodeur). I may perhaps be mistaken, but I understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) has expressed his opinions upon the point of order. Perhaps the interruption has prevented the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) from continuing to speak, but it is my belief now that he has already spoken. With the unanimous consent of the House the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) can speak again.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not ask for the consent of the House, Mr. Speaker.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I rise to a point of order—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say, Sir, that if, after the Chair—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order ; Chair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. How am I out of order ? I am speaking to a point of order.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has spoken already. He cannot speak again.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What I say, Mr. Speaker, is this—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. One point of order has been raised which has not been decided yet. That point of order I am ready to decide now. An hon. member can speak only once on that point, and I think the leader of the Opposition has already spoken, as has the Minister of Finance.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will you permit me to say a word, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, not one word ; you have spoken already.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I will be obliged to rule that the leader of the Opposition has already spoken.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will you allow me to explain.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am afraid I cannot, except with the unanimous consent of the House.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He cannot speak more than twice, any more than I can.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Except with the consent of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order ; Chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. A point of order has been raised, and the hon. member has already spoken on it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not intend to speak on that point of order at all.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, you have spoken already.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am willing to wait for the opinions of other hon. members on that point of order before I decide it ; but those hon. members who have already spoken cannot speak again.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is not the point of order I wish to speak on.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, there is no better understood rule of this House, than that one hon. member cannot say to another: that he made a statement in the House knowing it to be untrue. The hon. Minister (Mr. Tarte) made such a statement with reference to the hon. member (Mr. Bennett), and I understood, Sir, that you ruled the hon. Minister (Mr. Tarte) out of order, but you did not request him to withdraw the statement, nor has he done so. There is no palliation or excuse for the statement of the hon. Minister (Mr. Tarte). One offence is no justification for another, and although the provocation may have been great, that was no justification for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte). Before the debate goes on in the usual way, I think it is incumbent on you, Mr. Speaker, to insist that the hon. member (Mr. Tarte) should withdraw the offensive statement he has made.

Mr. CAMERON. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that two points of order were raised, and only one has been discussed. The first point was, that the hon. Minister (Mr. Tarte) made a statement that was unjustifiable and unparliamentary. I shall not question the rule laid down by the leader of the Opposition on that point, but there is another question before the Chair which you have not heard discussed, and I think the Minister of Finance was rather harshly treated in not being permitted to discuss it. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) commenced to discuss that other point of order, when he was stopped. That other point of order was this : It is clear that if offensive language is used by one member towards another, he is liable to be called to order for it, but he must be called to order at the moment he gave utterance to it. Instead of that being done, the hon. member who had the floor was allowed to proceed for at least four sentences before the point was raised.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CAMERON. Some time elapsed before the hon. member for West Assiniboia

(Mr. Davin) rose in his place and raised the question of order, and it is perfectly clear that the point could not have been raised then. It ought to have been made at the moment that the language objected to was used, and not having been so raised it cannot be raised at all. I do not think that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has been fairly dealt with in this matter.

Mr. MILLS. You contend that the expression was outlawed.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend (Mr. Cameron) is not quite correct as to the facts. What occurred was this: when the mistake was made by the hon. Minister (Mr. Tarte), I cried out "order," and looked to you, Sir, with that deference to the Chair which you know is part of every fibre of my frame. I waited for the intervention of the Chair, for I suppose a second, and when I saw, Sir, that it had escaped your attention then I arose and made the point of order. As to the time that elapsed my hon. friend (Mr. Cameron) is quite mistaken. I took the point of order promptly, and I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, to see the firmness and dignity with which you have maintained order in this Chamber.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I regret the occurrence of last night as well as the incident of this afternoon in the Chamber. I understand that last night a very serious charge was made against a member of this House, and I imagine, so far as I am concerned, that I will be obliged to be a little more severe in the future than I was then, for if I had been more strict last night, probably the incident of this afternoon would not have arisen. As I have said, a very serious charge was made last night against an hon. member of this House, and he denied it. Although the terms which he used may not have been absolutely in order, yet the statement made by the Minister should have been accepted by the hon. member who made the charge. However, the hon. gentleman who made the charge did not think it proper to do so. It was an unfortunate occurrence and I trust it will not happen again. However, as to what happened last night I am not called upon to give a decision to-day. My attention was not called to it then, and although perhaps I should have interfered of my own motion at the time, yet the matter passed off quietly, and I thought it as well to let it so pass without comment. Now, as to what occurred this afternoon. The charge of last night was repeated, although not in the same terms, and a denial came from the Minister (Mr. Tarte), and I understand that the denial has been accepted by the hon. member (Mr. Bennett). At all events there is no doubt that no hon. gentleman in this House has a right to say to another, that he made a statement which he knew was not true. Such an expression is not parliamentary. I beg to say again, that I trust in view of that good feeling which should prevail in the House, that no such charge as was made last night and repeated to-day, shall be made against any hon. member, except on the occasions and under the conditions permitted by the rules of the House.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. Speaker, in deference to your decision I withdraw the expression.

Mr. FOSTER. Then let us proceed, and have some more frost.

Mr. FROST. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, I really ought to apologize to you for the tempest that has been raised by these few observations which have been made. When I was cut short in my remarks I was endeavouring to show that charges were being preferred against leading members of this Government in an irregular and irresponsible manner, when it would be much better for all concerned if any hon. member who wishes to make such a charge should proceed in the parliamentary way by moving for an investigation, and such an investigation would, I am sure, be willingly granted by the Government. If the hon. members would take the trouble to call for a commission, I am very sure that commission would be granted at once, and everything would be investigated in a straightforward, honourable and manly way, and there would never afterwards be such a scene as we have witnessed this afternoon, with charges and recriminations bandied across the floor of the House. Let us hope we may never see such a scene in this House again.

Now, I am about through with what I have to say. The Budget speech, as a whole, must be very gratifying to this country. Let me, before concluding, invite the attention of the House to the outlook in the country at the present time. It is quite true that the Minister of Finance took an optimistic view of the trade of the country, and he had very good grounds for doing so. For instance, if we look at the revenue we find that, notwithstanding the preferential tariff, which has reduced the duty on goods from Great Britain, the revenue is increasing rapidly. We also find that the exports from the country are rapidly increasing. We find that the clearing houses show something like $126,000,000 more for 1897 than they did for 1896. We find that the deposits in our banks and savings banks have increased in the six months, from June to December, 1897, by over $21,000,000. We find that our bank stocks and railway stocks are increasing in value, the Canadian Pacific Railway stock having nearly doubled, and the Grand Trunk Railway stocks having increased in value something over $44,000,000 during the past year. We also find that the number of failures, which is a very good barometer of the state of trade and business throughout the country, show a very encouraging state of affairs. For the first quarter of 1898, that is the last quarter of which we have any information, there were only 423 failures in the Dominion, with assets of $2,365,388, and liabilities of $2,941,067, while for the corresponding quarter of last year there were 674 failures, or nearly 33½ per cent more, with assets of $4,100,571, and liabilities of $5,185,000. I think, Mr. Speaker, you will agree with me that we have every reason to be encouraged by the outlook when we look at the immense traffic of our railroads, when we look at the activity of our seaports, St. John and Halifax, when we know that at St. John there is not harbour room for the vessels coming there, when we look at our North-west filling up, when we look at our mining and agricultural resources being developed in every province of the Dominion, when we see every industry thriving, our workmen employed everywhere, and our farmers prospering. Look at the state of the butter trade. Three years ago only half a million dollars worth of butter were shipped out of the country, while last year over $2,000,000 worth was exported; and we may expect still greater improvement in the future. When we see all these evidences of prosperity—and these are evidences that are clear and palpable—I say we have good reason to believe that the change of Government which has taken place in this country is one of the blessings for which we are not yet sufficiently thankful. That change of Government has been for the best interests of this country; and as we have seen the various elections that have taken place since this Government came into power, going one after another in favour of the Government, with increased majorities everywhere, we have reason to conclude that it was not an accident of an accident that this Government came into power, but that it was the deliberate intention of the people that the Government should be changed and should be put into hands that were able to conduct the country's affairs in a straightforward way, and in a way that would redound not only to the greatness and importance of this country as a nation, but to the advancement and prosperity of the people who inhabit it. Therefore, I have to-day to express my thankfulness as a business man that we have such a Government, and I am heartily in accord with the Minister of Finance and his able associates in everything they have done for the advancement and progress of this great nation.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, in continuing this discussion, I wish for a few moments to direct attention to some of the statements made by the hon. member for North Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost). One of his last ones was to the effect that it was not by an accident of an accident that his party were in power to-day. Well, if that remark does not apply to his party, at least it applies to himself, because it is by an accident of an accident of the returning officer that he sits for North Leeds and Grenville in this House to-day. Had the return not been made too early, the probability is that he would never have graced the seat he does in this Chamber at the present time. One of the statements he made was to the effect that we had made such progress through the able instrumentality of the present leader of the Government that in a short time we would have the power to make our own treaties without interference. I wonder how much intelligence that hon. gentleman displayed when he made that statement, or what he knows about the rights and powers of this country to make treaties, or how far he was drawing on his imagination for his alleged facts. I am quite sure that neither the leader of the Government nor any other member of the Government would go so far as to make the statement the hon. member made; and to intelligent people in this country, it can only be regarded as the simplest moonshine. The hon. gentleman went on to say that all the by-elections went against the Conservative party; but he afterwards qualified his remark a little by saying not quite all, but nearly all. And why did they go against the Conservative party? Because he said his friends of the Reform party had kept their pledges—every one of them. I would like to ask him, if they kept that pledge which they made to the farmers of Canada when they told them that in the event of their coming into power they would take the duty off agricultural implements. No man knows better than the hon. member himself, because he is a manufacturer of those implements; and if we are correctly informed, he was one of the manufacturers who were instrumental in persuading the Government not to disturb the duty on agricultural implements, so that it remains to-day at 20 per cent, as it was before they came into power.

Mr. FROST. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that I never spoke to the Government in regard to the duty on agricultural implements, except on a deputation along with a dozen other agricultural implement manufacturers who waited on the Government.

Mr. SPROULE. That is a very innocent and very refreshing statement—as if he could not express his views as a member of a deputation as well as in any other capacity.

Mr. FROST. Would you deny me the right to go with other manufacturers on a deputation to the Government?

Mr. SPROULE. I do not deny that right at all, but it is the most refreshing innocence to try and persuade the country that the Government have kept their pledges, when they never touched the duty on agricultural implements, although they promised, most emphatically, the farmers that, in the event of their coming into power, they would reduce or take off the duty.

The hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost), who is one of the manufacturers so often spoken of by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, as the bloated manufacturers and wholesale robbers of the country, has, nevertheless, so much favour in the eyes of the Government that he was able, with the assistance of his friend the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), to persuade the Finance Minister not to disturb the duty. This is certainly a pledge which these hon. gentlemen did not keep.

Mr. FLINT. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question, if he will permit me. Do I understand him to say that the Government promised to remove the duty from agricultural implements?

Mr. SPROULE. I say, that members of the Government, before they came into power, told the farmers that this was one of the great injustices under which they were labouring, and that, if returned to office, they proposed to remove it. What other conclusion could we come to than that they would remove the duty? The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is one of the very men who gave this promise.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. If my hon. friend will permit me. He says that he will find a speech of mine denouncing the late Government for not reducing the duties below 20 per cent. He will not find any such speech, but he will find that I denounced them for not reducing it below 35 per cent. Will he produce any speech in which I denounced the Government for not reducing the duty on agricultural implements below 20 per cent?

Mr. SPROULE. I can only say that the hon. gentleman in enumerating to the farmers the disabilities they were labouring under, spoke of the duty on agricultural implements.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Which was 35 per cent.

Mr. SPROULE. And I am told—I do not know it personally—that in his letter to the Patrons we find the same expression.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman does not want, I presume, to misrepresent me.

Mr. SPROULE. Certainly not.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is quite true, that, when the duty was 35 per cent, I condemned it. But it is not true, that, when the duty was 20 per cent, I said anything about it.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. SPROULE. When the hon. gentleman condemned the duty before it was reduced to 20 per cent, he never said he would be satisfied with 20 per cent, or 10 per cent, or any other rate, but that one of the hardships under which the farmers were labouring was the high duty on agricultural implements.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Quite true.

Mr. SPROULE. And that this was a duty they should not be compelled to pay. The hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost) spoke about the revival of agriculture as a fulfilment of promises made by his friends. Does he mean to say that the revival in agriculture is due to his friends' accession to power? Does he mean to tell the intelligent farmers of this country that the very large crops they had last year—much larger than they have had for many years—was due to the election of his friends to office? Does he mean to say, that, because a kind and beneficent Providence gave larger returns last year to the husbandmen, Providence did so because his friends had come to power? If he does, he claims more than the members of the Government themselves have ventured to claim. I know that they have conveniently refrained from giving any credit to Divine Providence, and, by implication, take all the credit to themselves; but the hon. gentleman has outdone his leaders, and has given the Government direct credit for these things. He said that, before this Government came to power, hard times existed, the prices of products were low, and the farmers could not sell their lands. Does he mean to say that it was his friends who raised the prices of farm products? In what manner did they succeed in achieving this? Was it by getting better markets for the farmers? Was it owing to their influence and to their policy that a famine was created in India, and that there was scarcity of crops in foreign countries and large crops in this country? I scarcely think he would venture seriously to claim credit for these things, if he went into them in detail but he has not scrupled to do so in a general way.

The hon. gentlemen contended that our factories would not be working overtime, but that, on the contrary, every industry would have dwindled down, and every factory would have closed, if the Reform party had not come into office, and he tried to establish this proposition by reading some items from the columns of the "Manufacturer," a newspaper which deals particularly with the manufactures of the country. Well, Mr. Speaker, no one on this side pretends to say that we are not enjoying a fair measure of prosperity. We do not shut our eyes to the fact that prices are better abroad and also improved, in some respects, at home, and that we have had much larger crops than we have enjoyed for years past. No one here denies that there is improvement in the country; but the difference between hon. gentlemen on that side and this is, that they are inclined to attribute the good crops and increased prosperity to something done by the Reform party, while we consider them due to the accidents of life in other countries and the kindness of Divine Providence to this country. My hon. friend dwelt some considerable time on the competency and ability of the Government, and told us what great men they were in their various lines of life. As he thus dwelt on their great merits, I could not help thinking of the old saying: Ask my brother if I am a rogue. Could it be expected of the hon. gentleman that he would rise to tell us of their shortcomings? If he spoke of them at all, it would naturally be in the line of eulogy, and in this respect he has followed the example of many of his friends, by lavishing on the Cabinet Ministers the highest eulogium which one man could possibly extend to others. It would be, however, a little more in keeping with the situation, if he would give us some arguments to justify that they were, in some way or other, instrumental in creating prosperity, and then allow the electorate to judge the value of those arguments.

He said that the Ontario Government made no difference between political parties when selecting men to lecture to the farmers of Canada at the farmers' institutes. He ought to know that that is not correct. He can name but very few Conservatives who are employed by the Ontario Government to talk to the farmers of Canada at their institutes. I think I am safe in saying that they do not employ one Conservative to every eight or ten Reformers in that work. Why? Because this Reform Government has an opportunity to hire a few of their friends, who are doing work for them in other lines, and pay them out of the public funds of the province to go round and do a little talk to the farmers, and at the same time a little political work, so as to make the Government stand better with the people afterwards. The hon. gentleman would have done better to have let that subject alone, because the people of Ontario are well aware that the Ontario Government have not selected men from both political parties to do this work.

Mr. FROST. What political complexion is the Chairman of the Farmers' Institutes Committee—Mr. Hodge?

Mr. SPROULE. That was not the statement the hon. gentleman made, at all.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). He is a Tory of the Tories.

Mr. FROST. I said that few were Conservatives, but the great majority were Reformers.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman said that the Ontario Government made no distinction between parties, but selected these men indifferently from either party. He said he could name dozens of them who were Conservatives. I challenged him to name one dozen, or half a dozen.

Mr. FROST. I know quite a number in Eastern Ontario, and they are all Conservatives.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman will get it down, after a little, to something like reasonable proportions, but it bears a good deal of paring down yet before you get his statement to conform to the facts.

I regard the financial statement made to this House as an announcement to the people of the result of stock-taking for the year, as showing how we stand financially, and how our business is turning out. What does the statement of the present Finance Minister disclose? It discloses two or three things that I wish to call attention to. First, that there has been a larger expenditure than that of the previous Government for several years past; secondly, that there has been an increase in our debt, and, third, that there has been a heavier taxation. Yet these are the three very things which they told the people of Canada would, if they came to power, be reduced. They said, first, that the expenditure could be reduced by three million dollars or four million dollars.

Have they made it? Through the mouth of their Finance Minister, they have acknowledged that that reduction was not made. He tells us that the expenditure in 1896 was $36,000,000; in 1896-97 it was $37,829,000, and that in 1897-98 they expected it to be $38,750,000, that is, an increase every year since they came into power, instead of a reduction of three or four millions. Now, what have the people of Canada to say with regard to this? They must come to one of two conclusions. Either that these hon. gentlemen were dishonest or untruthful, when they made the statement and knew that this reduction of which they spoke could not be carried out, or else they must believe that these gentlemen believed what they said, and, therefore, were incompetent, in that they did not know what the requirements of the country were. Which horn of the dilemma will they choose; which view will the Canadian people take of their conduct? The Finance Minister now tells us that there is so little of the expenditure controllable that they could not be expected to decrease it, and that the service of the country demands an increase, instead of a decrease. I candidly confess that I agree with him in that. But what does he say in defence of himself and his friends, who said that the country could be run efficiently with an expenditure of three or four millions less than before?

His next statement is with regard to the taxation of the people, which he said should be less. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said, and in a very remarkable letter to the "Economist," in England, some years ago, that the people of Canada were bled white by taxation. And how much was then taken from the people of Canada? In that year the revenue was $38,579,310, being the amount taken from the people of Canada by customs and inland revenue and other taxes. How much was taken out of them last year by the same means? I find that the revenue in 1895-96 was $36,946,000. And the hon. gentleman told the farmers of Canada that they were bled white by taxation. In 1896-97, when the hon. gentleman and his friends were in power—it is true, they were in power only a portion of the year—the amount raised was $38,349,000. And for the present year they intend to raise $39,300,000, according to the statement of the Finance Minister a few days ago. If the farmers were bled white by taking $38,000,000 from them, with how much greater truth this may be said, when these hon. gentlemen take $39,300,000. And what will the people of this country think of the hon. member for South Oxford? They were charitable enough to believe that he knew what was required to run the country and that he was honest enough to state what he believed to be true, and, therefore, that when he said that the people were bled white by having so much money taken from them, when he came into power, he would take less. We see that he has not done so. We are sometimes told that he occupies the position he does because the people were afraid to have him made Finance Minister, that his own friends were afraid to give him control of the Finance Department. The hon. gentleman said, in this letter, that it was not merely that $38,000,000 was taken out of the country, but that far more was taken. When the then Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) drew his attention to the letter to the "Economist," and to the fact that he said that the system of taxation took something like $60,000,000 from the people, the hon. gentleman said that this was absolutely correct, and he repeated it, that the system of taxation took from the people, not $38,000,000 merely, but $60,000,000. But has he changed the system? No, they keep exactly the same system, and with that system they raise a larger amount. If the people of Canada were bled white before, they must be bled whiter still to-day. This is what he said:

I say that if ever there was a case which deserves special consideration at the hands of the Government, it is the case of the Canadian farmers, from one end of Canada to the other, to-day. The best that can be said is this: Many of our farmers must prepare for a total change of system, and I need not tell the House that you cannot change the system of agriculture in any country without a considerable expenditure of capital, nor need I tell my friends here that in the case of a vast number of our farmers it is utterly hopeless and impossible for them, as matters now stand, to raise that requisite capital.

Mr. SPROULE.

What is the condition of the farmers of Canada? At this present moment the policy of the Government is to pay huge bounties out of the people, out of the pockets of these very farmers, for the purpose of encouraging certain petted and special manufacturers.

Has he done away with these bounties? No, he has rather increased them in some lines. He goes on:

When the Minister of Finance stated that I compute the tax paid by the people of Canada at $60,000,000, he stated what is perfectly correct. We paid $30,000,000 into our national treasury for our national expenditure, and we are taxed, in all human probability, to a much larger amount for the purpose of promoting the interest of a couple of hundred favoured manufacturers. I will give but a few illustrations of this. Why, Sir, at this very moment the community of Canada are taxed to the tune of nearly $2,000,000 on the article of sugar alone, of which tax only a most insignificant fraction goes into the public treasury.

Has he taken away this bonus on sugar? Why, they have put more on this year. As he said it was a burden on the farmer, is it not reasonable that they should expect that, by putting the hon. gentleman in office, they would secure a reduction of that burden? But he has sat by and acquiesced, when the Finance Minister raised that tax on sugar, thus increasing, according to his own reasoning, the burden on the farmer.

If you look over his previous statement, and consider it in the light of what has taken place, and if you consider the statement made by the Minister of Finance a few nights ago, you can only come to one of two conclusions: either that he did not know what could be done, or he was dishonest, and attempted to mislead the people into the belief that this taxation could be imposed and the affairs of the country carried on if he and his friends were in power. But when they got into power they found it could not be done. The next matter upon which they dwelt was that the debt of the country was growing too rapidly, that it was becoming too great a burden upon the people. What was that debt when they came into power? In 1896, the net debt was $258,497,000. Have they reduced that debt since they came into power? The very next year the Finance Minister tells us that the net debt was $261,538,000, or an increase of $3,041,000 in one year. Now, is the burden any less on the people than it was then? Decidedly it is not. Then he went on to tell us that the net debt on the 30th of June, 1898, would be, according to his calculation, increased by $4,500,000; or, in the twenty months during which this Government have been in power, according to the Minister of Finance's own statement, or at the end of their first two years, they have increased the net debt of Canada by $7,541,000. Then, I ask: Was the hon. member for South Oxford correct when he told the people that the net debt of Canada should not be increased, and that if he and his friends were in power they would reduce it? I say that he could not have been correct then in his judgment, or else he was not honest in what he told the people of Canada. One thing or the other must be true, that he was not honest then, or else his judgment was very far astray. It is also pertinent to inquire: Have the Government carried out the lines of policy which they announced to the people as the correct ones upon which the affairs of the country should be carried on? The hon. member for Leeds and Grenville said they had carried out every one of them. I asked him with regard to one—the duty on agricultural implements, and I had no satisfactory answer, either from him or from any other gentleman on that side of the House. So I need not again draw attention to the fact that they did not reduce the duty on agricultural implements to prove to the Canadian people that they have not carried out their policy in that respect. Now, have they reduced the expenditure? I have shown they have not. Have they kept the public debt at the same point as it was before? I have shown they have not, that that debt has gone up. Have they reduced the taxation of the people of Canada? The Minister of Finance says no, we expect to raise more out of them this year than we did last year, and last year we raised more out of them than was raised for several years before.

Next, one of the promises they made was that we were to have freer trade with the world, or free trade as they have it in England. In the elections preceding the last, that was the great panacea which they held out for the ills of the people of Canada, we wanted free trade as they have it in England. That was what the hon. member for South Oxford said, and his friends. Now, they have got into power and have control of the destinies of this country. Have they given us free trade as they have it in England? Not at all, Sir. They have disturbed very few items indeed in the tariff of this country. They have not changed the system of raising the taxes, therefore, I say, they have not carried out their pledge with reference to that particular line of policy. They have neither give us freer trade, nor have they given us free trade as they have it in England. They also told the Canadian people that if they were entrusted with the duty of government, they would give us reciprocity with the United States. They talked about the Conservative party trying to get markets in every other country except with our neighbours. The great market to the south of us was the market for us. They said that while we were travelling through Europe, and Asia, and Africa, and every other foreign country for markets, we made no efforts to get reciprocity with the United States, which would be the best market for us, and that if they came into power they would give the Canadian farmer reciprocity with the United States. Have they done it? There is no person in this country but knows that there is no change in the situation with regard to reciprocity with the United States. They have done what their predecessors did, they have attempted to get reciprocity, they went to Washington, but were obliged to come back home and admit that they had no more power, no more ability to secure reciprocity with the United States than their predecessors had. Then, we were told by the Minister of Finance that the forebodings of evil of the late Minister of Finance and his friends had not been fulfilled, he said that the predictions they made with regard to what would happen if the Reform party came into power have not been fulfilled. I would ask him why they have not been fulfilled? Simply because the Reform party, when they came into power, did not carry out the principles which they advocated when they were in Opposition. In so far as they have departed from their own principles and adopted those of their predecessors, their Government was a success; but in so far as they have diverged from the principles of their predecessors and introduced new ones of their own, their Government has been a failure. Now, they have already diverged from the policy of their predecessors in some lines. They told the Canadian people that the duty on binder twine should be taken off because it was too dear, and they would get it much cheaper. Well, they did take the duty off, and what has been the result to the Canadian farmers? Did it bring down the price of binder twine? The statement made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and which I find on inquiry to be correct, is that although that duty was taken off binder twine, it is to be sold this year to the Canadian farmer at a higher price than it was when the duty was on. Therefore, I say that in having diverged in that respect from the policy of their predecessors, they have committed a blunder, they have not accomplished for the Canadian farmer what they promised him. What were the prices last year? Here is the price-list for 1898: Sisal, \$5.75, against \$5.25 last year when the duty was on; the standard, which sold at \$5.50 last year, is to be sold at \$6.25 this year after the duty has been taken off, or 75 cents dearer than it was last year when the duty was on; manilla, which was \$6.25 last year, is this year to be sold at \$6.87. If I take every one of these lines, I find that after the duty is taken off the price has been put up to the Canadian farmer by the Hobbs Company largely because it is under a combine in the United States, and they have put the whole trade in the hands of their friends here, and so it is practically under a combine here made up of their own friends, this Hobbs Company, but under another name, so that the farmers of Canada may not understand that it is sold by the same parties who sold it last year. When the duty was on, the lower price prevailed, when the duty is taken off a higher price to the Canadian farmer is the result. Then they took the duty off barbed wire, and they told the Canadian farmer what great results would be brought about. They said the Conservative party had kept that duty on to the detriment of the farmers, and that it had enhanced the price. Is barbed wire sold any cheaper at the present time than it sold last year? The hon. member for South Leeds told us, and I know it to be correct, because I made inquiry, that it is sold exactly at the same price now as it was last year. I have no doubt it will be sold this year at 2½ cents per pound, as it was last year, and after a while it is very likely it will be sold dearer, because they have killed out every manufacturer of barbed wire in Canada, and it will be entirely under the control of the Americans, who show themselves such great adepts at making combines in every line of life. Another respect in which they diverged from the policy of the old Government was in taking the duty off corn. They told the Canadian farmer what a blessing it would be to him if they took the duty off corn. We heard the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) last night say that the Canadian farmer was able to sell his oats, and use corn instead, and he told the quantity of oats that was exported last year after the duty was taken off corn. Now, I tried to remind the hon. gentleman that that duty had only been in operation two months of that year, and therefore the large importations of corn in the two months could not account for the very heavy exportations of oats that year. It was evidently absurd, because all the influence the duty could have had would not have operated to the extent the hon. member for Huron said, because the corn used was in the line of feeding cattle. And he went on to show how many cattle were slaughtered and exported, and that the number had increased largely by virtue of the policy inaugurated by the present Government, by which the duty was taken off corn, and under which Canadian farmers imported corn, which was cheaper feed than their own coarse grains. The hon. gentleman said that the Canadian farmers appreciated this change, and he did not think one farmer in a hundred would be willing to return to the previous duty. I have stated before, and I repeat it to-night, that such farmers as the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. McMillan) might benefit to some extent by the importation of free corn. Why? Because the hon. gentleman is not a grain farmer, but he makes his money out of feeding cattle, and his object, of course, is to obtain cheap feed. It does not matter to him whether the general value of feed produced by the Canadian farmers is reduced in value or not, so long as he obtains feed for his own cattle at a cheap rate. He is therefore in favour of importing corn free from the United States, irrespective of the price obtained by farmers generally for their coarse grains. The hon. gentleman said that the farmers sell their coarse grains and buy corn. How many farmers in his own county sold their coarse grains and bought corn last year? I venture to say not one in five hundred. While one farmer in every five hundred sold his coarse grain and bought corn, and was able to benefit by the exchange, free corn would be a distinct disadvantage to the other 499, who lived out of the money they obtained for the grain they produced. Thus, the tariff change would benefit one farmer while it injured 499 who were living, to a large extent, by the coarse grains they grow and sell, and who were not purchasers of corn. So far as hon. gentlemen opposite have departed from the policy of their predecessors, they have inflicted a distinct injury on the Canadian farmers, and such is the case to-day. I need only quote the figures given by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), showing that during the first six months of the present year, when the tariff was in full operation, large quantities of American corn were brought into this country, to prove the truth of my assertion. No less than 11,500,000 bushels were imported during the six months, and at the same rate, 23,000,000 bushels will be imported during the year. The corn thus imported will come into direct competition with the 25,000,000 bushels of corn produced in Canada, according to the bulletins of the Ontario Bureau of Statistics. This tariff change brings our farmers into competition with the farmers of the United States, who are now allowed to send in their corn free of duty. Statistics show that 24,466,000 bushels of corn were produced in Ontario last year, and there have been 11,000,000 bushels brought in from the United States free of duty during the last six months, and yet we are told that no injury is inflicted on the farmers who raise pease, oats and barley. This change is a distinct disadvantage to our farmers, who will be compelled to accept lower prices for their coarse grains, and who will be compelled to find for their coarse grains a foreign market, to reach which they will be compelled to pay the freight. So I am justified in saying that so far as hon. gentlemen opposite have diverged from the policy of their predecessors, it has been a disadvantage to Canadian farmers, and such will be the case so long as the present tariff is continued. It might be asked what the Government might have done to benefit the Canadian people which they have not done? They have twice within twenty months reduced the interest paid on poor men's savings in the Government savings banks. A year ago last July they reduced the interest from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per cent, and this year they are reducing it from 3 to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. If there is any class in the country requiring the greatest indulgence and support from a paternal Government it is the poor man, who, by economy, is endeavouring to save money for future needs. He is learning the lesson of economy by depositing his money in the savings banks, and should receive a fair rate of interest. If he makes money, he does not know how to invest it as does a broker or a note-shaver, and he is at the mercy of unscrupulous corporations, and when the Government devise means by which these savings can be deposited in a safe place, where they can yield a fair return, they are conferring a distinct benefit on him. They are placing a premium on his economical habits and desire to save money. When the present Government reduced the rate of interest at the savings banks for the purpose of allowing the general banks of the country to obtain money at a cheaper rate, and allow men in the inner circle to benefit, they are inflicting an injury on working people. It has been said that after a time the benefit would reach the inner circle. At what time will it reach the poor man? He is only allowed in the savings banks interest at the rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, but when he goes to a private bank to borrow money he will be charged 12 per cent. The poor man will be driven from the Government savings banks to private banks, which offer a higher rate of interest, and the consequence will probably be that some of the private banks, which are not inspected by the Dominion Government, will fail and the poor man will lose his savings, all this being due to the reduced rate of interest given in the Government savings banks, the depositor being driven to invest his money elsewhere in order to secure a higher rate of interest. But whom do the Government favour? The class of men who can always protect their own interests. The course of the present Government has throughout been to come to the defence and assistance of the rich men and corporations, but the poor man has been left to struggle alone with all the disadvantages incident to poverty and hardship; and this paternal Government has not only left him to struggle, but has added other burdens and reduced the interest on his deposits in the Government savings banks, which he has been able to make by practicing economy. I have always believed that one of the important duties of the Government was to offer as high a rate of interest as possible to the poor man who could be induced to save money and deposit it in the savings banks.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THE KETTLE RIVER VALLEY RAILWAY.

The House proceeded to consider amendments made in Bill (No. 26) An Act to incorporate the Kettle River Valley Railway Company.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, when the hour for the consideration of private Bills was concluded last Wednesday evening, I was speaking in regard to the mineral development of a section of the Kootenay country and as to how that mineral development depended upon railway competition. I spoke of the Slocan district, a district which food products exported to British Columbia and to which go the greater part of the food products exported to British Columbia from the district of Alberta. The Slocan district is now severed by two railways; one a branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the other practically a branch of the Great Northern. It is a matter of notoriety that the value of the mines of the Slocan district, and the consequent value of that district as a consumer of the food products of the Territories, depends, to a very great extent, upon the competition existing between the Great Northern and the Canadian Pacific Railway in that district; by means of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway, which is practically a branch of the Great Northern, and the Nakusp and Slocan Railway, which is a branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It may be worth while to let the House know that both these roads transport the ores to the smelters of the United States, Omaha being the point to which the greater part of these ores are carried by both the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Great Northern. We have there the greatest amount of prosperity existing in any part of the mining district of British Columbia, and consequently the greatest consuming centre for the produce of Alberta, in consequence of the existence of railway competition, competition directly to the United States smelters and competition in which the Canadian Pacific Railway (which seeks to exclude competition from the Kettle River country on the ground that it would take the ores to American smelters) shares. I will go further, Sir, and say that it was to enable the Canadian Pacific Railway to compete on more advantageous terms in the work of carrying Canadian ores to the Omaha smelter, that the demand was made upon this country for aid to build the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. The reason for the construction of that railway was not to have Canadian ores smelted in Canada, but it was distinctly for the purpose of carrying Canadian ores to United States smelters. If it is a fact—and we have it on the best authority—that it is necessary for these ores to be carried to United States smelters in order that the mines may be worked profitably, then I say it is in the interest of the people I represent, who supply food products to the miners of that country, that the ore should be carried to the United States and be smelted there rather than that these mines should not be worked at all and that there should be no miners there to consume the products of the North-west. What is true with regard to the Slocan district is equally true with regard to the Kettle River district. If it is impossible to have prosperity in mining in the case of the high grade ore of the Slocan district without railway competition and without smelting these ores in the United States, it is certainly much more necessary to have railway competition, (and possibly, for aught I know, to have the ores smelted in the United States) in the case of the low grade ores of the Kettle River country. If it be established that railway competition is necessary for the development of the mines of that country, then the question is: Can that competition be provided through any other source than that offered by the Kettle River Railway. It is within the knowledge of every member who has considered this question that any competition that is to be in British Columbia or the North-west Territories, must come from or through the United States, just as this Kettle River Railway comes from the United States. If it is held by this House that there shall not be railway competition in British Columbia or the North-west Territories, then we understand the position. But let there be no mistake about it; unless we are to be allowed to have competition from the United States or through the United States, there can be no railway competition in the North-west Territories or in British Columbia.

Either we are to have competition or we are not to have it. That is the question before this House in connection with this Kettle River Railway Bill. If anything were required to prove that that is the question at issue, the exertions of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to secure the defeat of this Bill would be ample evidence. There is no probability that that company would take the interest it does to prevent the construction of such a short length of railway unless something more was involved than the competition that would occur in the small section of country served by it. There must necessarily be something more involved, or we would not have the president, the vice-president, the secretary, and every other important officer of that company lobbying the members of this House as they have done for the past week or more. We would not have it announced in the papers that a special train would be run to-night to carry to their homes members of this House who would remain here to oppose this Bill.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. It is to carry any members, whether they are against the Bill or in favour of it.

Mr. OLIVER. The hon. member seems to be thoroughly posted on this matter. Perhaps he can give us some further information about the lobbying methods used by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I say that the evidences before the House and the country are that the question at issue is the large question of railway competition in Manitoba, the North-west and British Columbia, and not simply the question of competition in a small section of mining country. And it is not merely the question of railway competition. Within the past year the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has gone into the smelting business, having bought the Heinze smelter at Trail; and now they want not only the absolute monopoly of transportation in British Columbia, but also the absolute monopoly of smelter work in British Columbia. They drop the question of transportation out of sight in their arguments, but they put the question of smelter work forward. They say, we want the monopoly for the purpose of keeping the smelter work in Canada—in other words, for themselves. Therefore, I say this is not only a question of transportation monopoly, but a question of smelter monopoly as well. The experience of Manitoba, the North-west and British Columbia has shown that the natural industries of these districts cannot thrive under a monopoly of transportation, much less under a monopoly of manufacture; and when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company come to us and demand, as they are doing in their opposition to this Bill, an absolute monopoly not only of transportation, but also of the smelting of ores in British Columbia, they are asking something that this House cannot afford to grant, and for my part it shall not grant without having a knowledge of the facts. It is all very well to say we should smelt our own ores in Canada. There are many things that we should do in Canada, and that we would do in Canada if it paid us to do them. But if circumstances are such that it is not profitable to smelt our ores in Canada, then it is better to have them smelted somewhere else, and content ourselves with having the mining done in Canada, rather than that the natural resources of the country should be locked up and the country not developed. The position is this, that we have in the Boundary Creek country a large body of low-grade ores, the development of which depends on facilities being provided for cheap transportation and cheap smelting; and unless the conditions for smelting are just as favourable as the conditions for transportation, that country cannot be opened up to furnish a market for the agricultural producers of the west and the commercial men of eastern Canada. It is for this House to say whether it will consent to tie up the natural resources of that country and prevent the development of its trade for other parts of the Dominion simply for the benefit of the Canadian Pacific Railway in its transportation monopoly and in its proposed smelter monopoly.

It may be said that other capitalists have an equal opportunity to put their money into smelting industries in that country. I say that is not so. If you give the Canadian Pacific Railway a monopoly of transportation, they can have a monopoly of smelting if they desire it, just as they can have a monopoly of any other trade or manufacture. I do not suppose that they intend to go into any other trade or manufacture; but they do intend to go into smelting; and if you give them a monopoly in transportation, you ensure to them a monopoly of smelting as well, and you ensure that monopoly being worked for all it is worth in the interest of that company. Some people hold that what is in the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway is in the interest of Canada, and they take up the cry of Canada for the Canadians. I am a Canadian, and I believe in Canada for the Canadians; I am here to advocate Canada for the Canadians. But the question is what Canadians are to have Canada? Are they those Canadians at the head of the Canadian Pacific Railway, who ask a monopoly of transportation and smelting in British Columbia? Or the rest of the people of Canada, who desire to profit by the sale of their agricultural products in that country, the employment of their labour there, or the carrying on of trade with it? These are the people whom I desire to see profit from the development of that country. It may be that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would not, under such circumstances, make as much for themselves as otherwise, but still I say that is a policy of Canada for the Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, the argument has been used that the trade of the Kettle River country would be done by the United States if this road were built. One hon. gentleman, a manufacturer, the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), was very emphatic in his desire that Canada's trade should not be lost to the United States. That practically means that there should not be trade between Canada and the United States; and if so, I would ask that hon. gentleman how long would he run his foundries in Toronto if it were not for the coal he buys from the United States? Is he the man to say that there shall not be trade between these two countries? Here, in this city of Ottawa, which depends so largely on the lumber industry, we see railways and fleets of boats to carry Canadian lumber—where to? To the United States; and without the market of the United States, the lumber industries of the city of Ottawa could not be carried on. As circumstances exist, it is an absolute necessity for these Canadians to deal with the United States. Why should an exception be made in the case of the Boundary Creek country?

There is no reason from a national or Canadian point of view, there is only a reason from the standpoint of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which has at last, at long last, waked up the Grand Trunk Railway to active competition. And finding that the Grand Trunk Railway is ready to meet them at all points, they put forth every effort and use every argument to prevent that railway from competing with them. This proposed railway would be the means not only of developing the Kettle River country but of affording the farmers of the west, as well as the merchants and manufacturers of the east a good market for their products and of advancing the interests and industries of Canada as a whole. For, we all know that capital is shy of investment in any country in which it must depend for its returns upon the will of a single corporation. That is why north-western Canada has suffered so much for lack of capital for the development of its industries—simply that every man of money knew that if he put money into the North-west or British Columbia he placed it more or less completely at the mercy of the Canadian Pacific Railway. This would not be if there were no monopoly. Hon. gentlemen who represent the eastern part of the country talk very glibly about there being no monopoly and about competition being of no value. It is all very well for those who enjoy the benefit of both rail and water competition to talk in that fashion. But in this city of Ottawa or in the city of Toronto or eastern Canada generally would not have grown and developed to what they are but for railway competition. The people would not think for an instant of depending in such a matter upon clauses in railway charters or upon the General Railway Act to give them the advantages that they now enjoy from railway competition. If railway competition is necessary in this eastern country, it is just as necessary and even more necessary in that western country. And if we are to have competition, apparently the only company strong enough to give it to us is the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and the only way they can give it to us, is through the United States. So, if this House decides that this Kettle River Railway Bill shall not be granted, it decides that the North-west and British Columbia shall remain under railway monopoly, the right to which was bought out by the late Government for millions of dollars and which has been the greatest bar to the progress of the Canadian west.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, so far as I have been able to gather, the people of Ontario generally and the wholesale merchants and manufacturers generally approve of the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) and of the action of the Railway Committee in reporting this Kettle River Valley Railway Bill. I know that the Liberal papers of Ontario took hold of the sturdy, patriotic words of the Minister of Railways and flung them in the teeth of the newspapers that were accusing this Government of subserviency to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am afraid that these newspapers will learn that the hon. Minister of Railways is not privileged to speak for the whole Government. We have been informed that the hon. Minister of Railways spoke only for himself. I wish that more of his colleagues had spoken for themselves instead of for Sir William Van Horne and the autocrats of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I am as patriotic as the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), who always seems ready to get behind the breastworks of the Canadian Pacific Railway when Vice-President Shaughnessy throws up the semaphore and signals the friends of the Canadian Pacific Railway into active service. The hon. Minister of Public Works talks about keeping Canadian ore for Canadian smelters. There is an easy way, and the hon. Minister knows it, to do this. An export duty on Canadian ores will do that work, an export duty on Canadian ores will build up Canadian industries; but from all I can gather from the remarks of the Minister of Public Works, he is only in favour of building up Canadian industries when he can, at the same time, build up the fortunes of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Canadian Pacific Railway must surely be a hard taskmaster when this great national Government is afraid to come down out of the grand stand into the field and take a hand in the fight for the rights of the Canadians of the Boundary Creek country. The wing of the angel Government that the Minister of Public Works speaks for seems to be content to leave these Boundary Creek Canadians of ours at the mercy of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We are told, we have been told a dozen times, that the Canadian Pacific Railway is pledged to build the line into the Boundary Creek district. We are also told that the Canadians of the Boundary Creek country need have no fear that they will be oppressed. Oh, no. The Minister of Public Works tells these Canadians who ask them for their rights that the Government have the power to protect them, that the Government has the power to control and will control the freight rates. Why, Sir, it is a question in my mind whether this Government has entire control of its own actions, in cases where the interests of the country conflict with the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am trying to deal with this question as I would like to be dealt with were I a free miner in the Boundary Creek country instead of a free member of Parliament sitting in my place in this House of Commons at Ottawa. All I have to say is that I would sooner take my chances of letting Mr. Corbin regulate the Canadian Pacific Railway by a competing line than of waiting until a Government dominated by the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of the Interior regulated the Canadian Pacific Railway with any scheme for reducing freight rates. This cant, Mr. Speaker, about Canadian trade being diverted will have to be revised when the Canadian Pacific Railway breaks into Spokane, as it assuredly will on its own account. I am not a prophet, nor am I the son of a prophet, and I do not expect to sit in this Parliament for many years. But I do expect to sit here long enough to see the Canadian Pacific Railway build a line from the Kootenay down into Spokane and threaten to take the trade of this country into the United States by that route unless this Government extends its line to Vancouver with the country's money. I believe that the hon. leaders of the Opposition in this House are throwing great discredit on the good old Tory policy and principle of protection when they insist that this Boundary Creek district and its people shall be handed over body and soul to the tender mercies of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The resources of the Conservative trade policy would have been sufficient to smite the American smelter.

But now it seems to me as if it were part of the Canadian policy to smash the Canadian miner by any freight rates that the Canadian Pacific Railway may choose to exact. I am in sympathy with the Conservative trade policy. I believe in protection. But I also believe in justice, and if this measure of justice fails to secure the approval of this Parliament, such a result will, in my judgment, indicate that it will be useless for any one to come to Ottawa looking for justice from this high court of Parliament when the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway can be secured by injustice.

Amendments negatived.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has not voted.

Mr. TAYLOR. The chief whip of the Government and myself have standing pairs on all questions when either one is not present.

Mr. FLINT. The hon. member for North Wellington has not voted.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am paired with the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Livingston). He was in favour of the Bill; I am against it.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. Fielding) has not voted.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I shall be pleased to vote if I am allowed, but I entered while the vote was being taken.

Mr. FOSTER. We would like to have your opinion, then.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If my hon. friend wishes, I will volunteer the statement that if I had had the privilege of voting, I would have supported the Bill.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I am paired with the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell). If I had voted I should have voted for the Bill.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 34) respecting the Columbia and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (No. 44) An Act to confirm an agreement between the St. Stephen and Milltown Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. MacPherson.)

Bill (No. 45) An Act respecting the British Columbia Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 100) respecting the Hamilton and Lake Erie Power Company.—(Mr. MacPherson.)

Bill (No. 87)—(from the Senate)—for the relief of Robert Augustus Baldwin Hart.—(Mr. Landarkin.)

NICKEL STEEL COMPANY BILL.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton) moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 96) to incorporate the Nickel Steel Company of Canada.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Before this Bill goes into committee, I ask that it be reprinted, because it was so amended in the Private Bills Committee that I think the father of the Bill himself would not recognize his child. I do not think it would be fair to ask this House to consider this Bill without its being reprinted.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the hon. gentleman will not press that Bill in its present shape. It is utter chaos to one who has not been in the Committee, and it had better be reprinted.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I have no objection, but I have seen other Bills pass through committee having quite as many alterations. I think the alterations are very few.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend will get ahead just as fast if he has it reprinted.

Motion withdrawn.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed consideration of adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. SPROULE. When you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was dealing with one of the acts of the present Government, which I said would have been better left undone, that of reducing the interest on the poor man's deposits in the savings banks of the country. I said then, and I repeat now, that I regard it as one of the duties of the Government to hold out every inducement possible to the poor man or the labouring man, to economize and to save the proceeds of his labour. For that purpose it was decided many years ago that savings banks should be established where a reasonable rate of interest would be offered to the poor man who put his money there. This was done for two reasons, first, to induce him to save his money and work harder, and secondly, because he is always a bad financier, for after he has earned his money he does not know well how to invest it, to save it for himself or to get a proper return. For that reason the Government assumed the duty of looking after the financing of his money and giving him a fair interest on it. But this Government have seen fit on two occasions within the last twenty months, to reduce the interest upon the poor man's money, the first time on the 30th of last June, and the second time will be the 1st of the coming July. The first time they reduced the interest from 3½ to 3 per cent, and now they are going to reduce it from 3 to 2½ per cent; so that the depositor gets the magnificent return in the shape of interest upon his deposits of 2½ per cent, although if you went to any bank in this country to borrow money, you would have to pay at least 7 or 8 per cent. I believe that to be a unsound principle. But the Minister of Finance said that the depositors in the savings banks can in no sense be regarded as poor men, and he drew attention to the aggregate of those deposits to show that a great many of them at least were made by wealthy men instead of poor men. Now, in looking up the return I found that these deposits were made by a large number of people, that though the aggregate of the deposits was large, the amounts standing to the credit of the depositors individually were in the main very small. I have here a return from the Public Accounts, and I find that there are in this country 779 post office savings banks, the number of depositors is 135,737, the average amount deposited by each of these depositors is $238.55.

I respectfully submit that it must be regarded as evidence of the amount of deposits and that they are made by poor people, when the average amount at the credit of each of those 135,357 is only $238.55. This amount represents the small savings of poor people, labourers, servant girls, widows and orphans, who have endeavoured to save money which may prove useful in case of need. The number of depositors this year is 161,151, and I give the figures to show that the amount of deposits is very small and they must belong to the poor class, $51.02 being the average deposit. And yet the Finance Minister considers he is justified in reducing the interest on that amount deposited by labourers and servant girls and orphans to 2½ per cent. If he were in a similar position, would he act in that way? For what purpose was this reduction made? It was for the purpose of giving what he called the inner circle, or men who control large capital, the power to dictate terms to the banks in the country when they wish to borrow money. That is no justifiable defence, and this is one of the acts that will never redound to the credit of even the Finance Minister or the Government of the day, because as I have already explained these poor people are not so well able to invest their money as are capitalists and others. So it is necessary to provide some place where their savings will be secure and where they will obtain a moderate return on their deposits. This they do not receive at the present time, and this action on the part of the Government was one they had better have left undone.

There are some other things that the Government had better have left undone. They made two distinct free gifts of valuable rights to other countries and got nothing in return. What were they? They made concessions to Great Britain and to other countries coming under certain terms as regards the duties, but the principal concession was made in the interest of the mother country. England did not ask Canada to make this reduction in the tariff. She treated us no better than any other country with respect to our trade, and it was distinctly unfair to the people of the Dominion that the Government should make concessions without getting anything in return, especially when they were made in such a generous fashion. So long as they are custodians of the people's rights and control public affairs, it is not right for the Government of the day to give away anything belonging to the people of Canada without getting something in return or in lieu thereof. First, the Government made this concession to England and English colonies. They followed that up by making a free gift to the West Indies; they extended their charity to countries that did not want their charity. It is very well to be charitable with respect to your own goods, but when the Government are using the goods of the country it is a wrong principle to follow, and the electors of Canada will not justify this action when it is submitted to them, and they have the opportunity of expressing an opinion upon it. We have been asked by the Minister of Finance to extend the most-favoured-nation clause to our tariff as regards the West India islands. For what reason? Not because they have done anything for us, but because financially they have been rather in an unfavourable position, and England expressed a wish that something might be done for those islands. How do the West Indies treat us in trade matters?

We want to send our cheese there. Jamaica charges a duty of one penny per pound; Bahamas, 12s. 6d. per 100 pounds; Trinidad, 1d. per pound; Granada, 7½ per cent; Barbados, 8s. 4d. per 100 pounds. I find that one colony charges 8s. 4d., another 8s. 4d., another 15 per cent and another 2 cents per pound. We also want to send our flour there. The duties are 8s. per barrel, 2s. 6d., 3s. 4d., 4s. 2d., 4s., 6s., 5s., 4s. 6d. Bermuda, 15 per cent; British Guiana, $1 per barrel. On potatoes and butter and some other articles we are compelled to pay similar duties. The West Indies give us no advantages that they do not give to every country. Why, then, should we give them special advantages which the Finance Minister proposes by making a reduction of 25 per cent off the duty on sugar sent from the West Indies to Canada? We should not take this action, first, because we are giving away something that does not belong to us; and second, because we are giving a valuable consideration and receiving nothing in return. So with respect to the concessions to England. We have got no right to give away privileges unless we get something in return, and that is a principle which the Government should always keep in view.

There are some things which the Government should have done and which they have not done. Why did they not place an export duty on nickel? That is one of the lines in which we believe Canadian trade can be stimulated, and a very strong pressure was brought to bear on the Government to impose such an export duty, but they treated all these appeals with deaf ears and paid no attention to them, and that industry has been labouring under disadvantages during the last two or three years. This might have been done with great advantage, but it was left undone.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). They will do it all right.

Mr. SPROULE. We would have expected the announcement to have been made by the Finance Minister in his Budget speech, because that was the proper time to make it.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). It was not necessary.

Mr. SPROULE. The consensus of opinion, undoubtedly, would be that the announcement should be made when the Budget speech was delivered. It is true they may yet do it, but so far they have given no intimation that they intend to carry it out.

The Government might have imposed an import duty on lumber. The lumbermen of the country have been applying to them vigorously for the imposition of such a duty. They sent a memorial, which I hold in my hand, and it states the situation very plainly. It is as follows:—

Dear Sir,—The Lumberman's Association of Ontario has instructed me to send you a copy (printed within) of a petition presented by the western lumbermen of Canada, to the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, setting forth the injustice under which the lumbering trade of Canada is now labouring, on account of American lumber being allowed to come into this country free of duty, while the Dingley Bill puts a heavy tax on Canadian lumber going into the States.

The association of Ontario are in entire sympathy with the views expressed in the said petition, and they pray that you will use your influence to have the duty put on American lumber equal to that imposed by the Dingley Bill on Canadian lumber.

Yours respectfully,

(Sgd.) J. B. MILLER,

Sec.-Treas.

I expected to hear the Minister of Finance announce that the Government had decided to put a duty upon lumber, because I could hardly imagine that they would leave that great Canadian industry—great throughout Canada, and particularly great in Ontario—to struggle under its adverse conditions. We allow the Americans to take our logs out of our country free of export duty. We allow them to saw them in Michigan and send them back here, in the shape of manufactured lumber, free of duty. We allow the Americans to do all this to the detriment of our own country, and yet, while they put a duty of $2 a thousand on our sawn lumber, we allow their lumber to come free into Canada. I could hardly have believed that the Government could allow this condition of things to exist. This petition to the right hon the Premier says:

The peculiar condition of the lumber trade of Canada, suffering, as it now is, from unfriendly legislation by the neighbouring republic, is in an entirely opposite position from what it was when the lumbermen of north-western Ontario and Manitoba had the pleasure of appearing before the Tariff Commission at Winnipeg. Before that commission we stated that we had no grievance and no complaint to make against the tariff. Rough lumber and lumber dressed one side was on the free list, and this was fair and equitable, as the United States then had rough lumber on their free list, and our statement was, that so long as the United States admitted lumber free that the Canadian Government should do the same, but should the United States Government impose an import duty on lumber, it was the duty of your Government to impose a similar duty. The latter condition has arisen, the United States has passed an Act which not only imposes a duty on lumber but presumes to punish by imposing double duty on the lumber of any foreign country which may impose an export duty on logs. Under these circumstances we ask the Government to impose an import duty on lumber entering Canada.

Our position is not changed since appearing before the Tariff Commission at Winnipeg. We believe in free lumber if it is reciprocal, but we object to the one-sided condition of affairs that at present exists, and believe that by meeting them in the same spirit they themselves display the desired condition of free lumber on both sides of the line will be sooner reached than by giving them free access to our markets, which they are now allowed to enjoy. We believe that the vigorous policy of the Ontario Government, if supplemented by the imposition of an import duty on lumber, will bring to the front an influential and numerous body of men in the United States who will exert sufficient influence to bring about the desired condition of free lumber in both countries.

Some anxiety has been expressed that in Manitoba and the Territories a raise in the price of lumber would result from an import duty; this would not be the case, the price would remain as it is, but the trade which is now divided to a very large extent would then flow naturally to Canadian mills, giving employment to many thousands of Canadians (instead of, as at present, this labour going to foreigners), and give increased trade to Canadian merchants and manufacturers. If Canadians have any trade or calling which is capable of being called their national calling, we think it is that of producing lumber, and they can be depended upon to keep the prices at a reasonable rate through competition. Lumber is widely diffused, and no corner has ever been successfully formed in lumber either in Canada or the United States. It has been the experience of the trade that if lumber from any cause becomes scarce and the price abnormal, it springs from all points of the compass to fill the demand and reduce the price. It is quite generally accepted as a fact that large portions of the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories are treeless, but nature has provided within their own limits, extensive tracts of timber, which supply mills at Whitemouth, Selkirk, Winnipeg, Brandon, Dauphin, Rapid City, Calgary, Edmonton, Prince Albert, and numerous other points in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. To supplement these sources of supply are the inexhaustible forests of British Columbia. To the east are extensive mills at Keewatin, Rat Portage, Savanne, Fort William and Port Arthur, and further east are the mills on Georgian Bay, which are now shut out of the American market and anxious to ship lumber to Manitoba. We might say that many millions of Georgian Bay lumber have been shipped to Manitoba and the Territories. With all these sources of supply, operated by as enterprising lumbermen as any in the world, it would seem to us unreasonable to conclude that it is necessary to divide the limited home market of Canada with the United States lumbermen for fear of high prices, which cannot nor will not occur, except in the minds of men who do not understand the conditions. It is a great hardship to have the markets of the neighbouring republic shut to us, and besides have to divide our market with the United States lumbermen. We can compete with them, and do compete, but with Canada treated as a dumping ground, and foreign railways granting rates on traffic consigned to Canada much more favourable than they grant their own countrymen similarly situated, we cannot more than compete on even terms trade naturally divided. As further evidence that no attempt would be made to advance the price in Manitoba or the Territories, we would state that all lumber is sold at one price, and that price is the Winnipeg price, and although there are many points in Manitoba, and the whole of the North-west Territories, which cannot be reached by American lumber, owing to the fact that the American and Canadian railways do not pro rate their freight charges, and all this territory is entirely dependent on Canadian mills for their lumber. Still, each and every point so situated is supplied at the Winnipeg price, which is the centre of railway competition and the lowest price in the province.

The mills at Rat Portage and Fort William shipped lumber to the United States, and would have continued to do so had it not been for the imposition of the United States duty, in fact the mills at Savanne were built with a view to shipping to the United States. The mills at Fort William devoted all their attention to the American market, and last season, owing to the threatened impost of United States duty, the mills at Fort William were idle, the logs sawed in the United States, and to illustrate how the Canadian market is whip-sawed, as it were, the Fort William people, although sawing in Duluth, were able to market a portion of their lumber in Sarnia, Ont., thus proving that the Canadian market can be divided with ease by a country of pronounced antagonism to our lumber trade. These mills, like all Canadian mills, are shut out of the United States, and are besides forced to divide a limited home market with American lumbermen. There is twice as much plant in north-western Ontario and Manitoba as would suffice to supply the home market, which is a strong argument that competition will keep the price reasonable.

We also protest against lumber being the only important industry allowed to be subject to free trade, more particularly when there is no reciprocal treatment by the United States. Our market is divided with foreigners, and everything we use, such as machinery, belting, oil, pork, and food and farm products, &c., are highly taxed.

Much capital is invested in the lumber business which is now greatly impaired by the existing of tariff arrangements, and we ask for relief at the hands of your Government. So far as the mills of north-western Ontario, Manitoba and the North-west Territories are concerned, it is not more money per thousand that is required, it is more sales; this is in your power to grant, with great benefit to a large number of Canadians, and to the detriment of no citizen of our country.

Respectfully submitted on behalf of the lumber trade of western Canada.

(Sgd.) J. B. MILLER.

That letter expresses the wishes and the wants of the lumbermen of this country; it expresses the wishes of these gentlemen who control a great deal of capital and employ a large number of men. We know, by painful experience in the Georgian Bay district, what it costs to Canada that there is neither an import duty on lumber nor an export duty on logs. The logs are taken from Canada by the hundreds and thousands, sawn in the United States by American workmen, and our own labourers are deprived of the employment which rightly belongs to them. That vast amount of money is taken out of Canada, which should properly be spent at home. To-day we see the Georgian Bay mills idle by the dozen, and towns that were as busy as hives, a few years ago, are to-day as silent as the grave. The machinery is idle, the mills are closed, there are no workmen congregated there, and the raw material of Canada is taken away to enrich the Americans, while they, in return for all this benefit, impose a duty of $2 per thousand on our lumber. That, Sir, in my judgment, is wrong. The Government were willing to cater to the lumbermen before, but they now turn a deaf ear to them, and they allow the anomaly to continue, to the disadvantage of our country.

Now, Sir, when the Minister of Finance made his Budget speech, a year ago, he told us that the object of the Government was to attack the combines, and that, where it was made clear to them that an article was under a combine, they would take the duty off that article. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance why he does not take the duty off Spanish sole leather. That article is under a combine to-day. I have letters from gentlemen who are in the trade, and they tell me they are unable to sell one dollar's worth of that leather, unless they go into that combine. They have also told me that they sent a letter to the Minister of Finance, representing these facts, and asked him to take action for their relief. A year ago, the Minister of Finance stated that he would take the duty off any article that was under a combine, if it was brought to his attention. This matter has now been brought to his attention, and why does he not take the duty off? Several letters have been sent to hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. I think the gentleman who wrote to me said he sent one to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). That hon. gentleman was very vigorous in attacking these combines when he was in Opposition, and in declaring that when he got into power he would take the duty off and leave them to the open competition of the world; but now that he is in power, he fails to do it, and the fact is brought to his attention. I have on the Order paper a Bill to deal with these combines, but at this late stage of the session and with the limited time at the disposal of private members I do not hope to reach it unless the Government will be kind enough to take it under their wing. If they would, and help to carry it through, I think it would go a long way to break up these combines.

Mr. WALLACE. I think it would be a proper thing to ask here if the Ministers named have received these letters?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). You must not interrupt my hon. friend.

Mr. SPROULE. Before we part from that, it would be interesting to the House to know if these letters were received, because I have a letter from Mr. Smith saying that he sent them, one to the Finance Minister and one to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and asked for relief.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will not say that the letters have not been received. I have had a large mass of correspondence of late, some of which I have not yet been able to overtake. I have at present no recollection of receiving such a letter; but if the hon. gentleman says that it was sent to me, I certainly will not contradict him.

Mr. SPROULE. It has been overlooked or neglected or disregarded, and I do not know which is the greater crime. I made a statement before six o'clock with reference to the hon. member for South Oxford, and I referred to a letter written by him to the Patrons of Industry, which I had not in my hand at that time. I find that that letter was written by Sir Richard Cartwright to a Patron in the county of Lennox, and was dated the 1st of October, 1894. In March, 1894, the duty on agricultural implements was reduced from 35 per cent to 20 per cent, and the hon. gentleman represented that the tariff was still high on the farmers, and ought to be reduced.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). May I ask my hon. friend, does he say that the tariff was reduced in 1894 on all agricultural implements? It was reduced on some, certainly not on all.

Mr. SPROULE. I said that the reduction had been made on agricultural implements—I did not say on how many or how few; but I drew attention to the fact that his letter was written after the duty was reduced from 35 to 20 per cent, and he claimed that the taxes on the farmers should be further reduced.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. What I stated was a somewhat different thing. I did not ask for a further reduction in the case of those articles that had been reduced to 20 per cent. My objections always had been to the higher rates of duty.

Mr. SPROULE. That is practically what it was—a reduction of the higher rate of duty.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It was not reduced on all agricultural implements.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman did not say whether he wanted the duty reduced on few or many. He said in that letter:

I know, no man better, how enormously the real taxes paid by farmers and all wage-earners have been increased of late years.

That letter was written to show the farmers that the taxation they were paying was very heavy, and it was written after the reduction had been made from 35 to 20 per cent. Therefore, it must have applied to the tariff when it was at 20 per cent on agricultural implements as a general thing. I think it bears out the statement I made with regard to the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Not in the least.

Mr. SPROULE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to continue this debate much longer, because I have said about what I wished to say. I have only to repeat that so far as the present Government have disturbed the duty, they have done it in the wrong direction. As an example of that, they took the duty off barbed wire, closed up the factory at Lachine and threw 400 men out of employment, while they did not reduce the price of barbed wire one cent to the farmer, because it is sold at 2½ cents to-day, the same as it was before the duty was taken off. They also closed up, I believe, two other factories.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Does the hon. gentleman say that barbed wire is sold to-day at 2½ cents?

Mr. SPROULE. Yes. Only one week ago to-morrow, I inquired at the hardware store where I have bought barbed wire for several years, and I had to pay exactly the same price.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Well, it must be by the single pound, because barbed wire is a cent a pound less than it was last year.

Mr. SPROULE. That must be by wholesale.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. I am talking of the retail price. I have bought barbed wire for several years, and I know what I am talking about. It is the retail price the farmer has to pay, and that price is the same this year as it was last year, notwithstanding the fact that the Government by their act have thrown 400 men out of employment and destroyed the capital invested in the machinery of these factories. So far as they have left the tariff as it was, it has worked all right; no complaint is made to-day, and the greatest justification they can offer for their tariff is that it was much the same as you had it when your party was in power. The difference between their professions before coming to power and their practices after coming to power suggest one of two things: either that they did not know what was needed before they came to power, or else they were dishonest, and for the purpose of convincing the people of the country that a change was necessary they deluded them with promises to reduce the tariff in all these lines, and then failed to do it; or else they were not well informed, and when they came into power the new condition of things compelled them to leave the tariff as it was before. I say that in so far as they have made changes these were in the wrong direction; but in so far as they have carried out the policy of their predecessors, they have done right. The conduct of these hon. gentlemen has gone far to destroy the confidence of the people in the honesty and integrity of the public men of Canada. If these men did the same things in private life or in connection with private corporations, they would not be recognized as respectable in any part of the country; their word would not be taken as worth anything, and they could not be regarded as reliable men in any line of life. But they seem to think they can do these things with impunity in connection with the Government of the country. I say that is distinctly wrong. It tends to destroy at the fountain-head the respect which we ought to have for human integrity, honesty and truthfulness. If a public man can with impunity state one thing to mislead the electors or to induce them to support something that he does not believe in or intend to carry out, and then when he comes into power fails to carry it out, his conduct destroys the confidence we ought to have in humanity, and tends to lower our public men in the estimation of the people. That is the exact position of the present Government to-day. Many of their own friends, and their best friends, declare that they were either dishonest and untruthful in the past, or else they are ignorant and incompetent and do not know what the country requires when charged with the responsibilities of Government. I think they should take a lesson in time. Let them try to elevate, if possible, the standard of morality, honesty, integrity and business principle which should actuate every man—and no one more than the politician—who for the time being is charged with controlling the affairs of the nation.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). My hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Sproule) seems very positive that nobody in Canada has any confidence in the present Government. Well, Mr. Speaker, not later than the day before yesterday an election was held and the electors were called on to say whether they had confidence in us or not.

Mr. FOSTER. They voted confidence in public works.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They did the day before yesterday, as no doubt they will in future, vote confidence in our policy. Our friends on the other side took off their coats and fought the battle to the best of their ability, but as usual they were badly beaten.

Mr. MILLS. We cannot run an election on prayers.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That is not your fashion.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is not the only by-election we have had since the general election, and at every by-election our hon. friends opposite were defeated. My hon. friend is quite sure that everything we have done has been badly done.

Mr. SPROULE. Not everything.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, nearly everything. He says that our policy, as regards manufacturing interests, has especially been a very bad one indeed. Well, let the leaders of the Opposition go to the great city of Montreal and see what is going on there. Let them consider the great cotton industry, for instance, which was going, they said, to be destroyed by us. What has been the experience of that industry last year? In one mill at Valleyfield—and I have no reason to speak too kindly of that mill—the output was increased in one year by the amount of $200,000. What was the reason of that increase? Because by our policy we have stimulated their energy. We cut down the duty a little, and they started to work up foreign markets. I was told a few days ago by the manager that they have begun to export cotton, and that last year they sold $200,000 more worth of cotton than during the previous year. That is, indeed, not a very bad showing.

Mr. WALLACE. They have more protection to-day than they had previously.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They have less. I know there has been an increase of duty on American cotton, but our policy is Canada for the Canadians, and not for the Americans. I was just about to allude to the great iron industry.

Mr. WALLACE. Before the hon. gentleman goes on to iron, I would like an answer on the cotton question. I said that the duty was increased.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think I have already answered the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WALLACE. The duty was increased both on British importations and American.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I must protest, Mr. Speaker, against these interruptions. I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman when he spoke, and I expect the same courtesy from him. I was alluding to the great iron industry, which hon. gentlemen opposite also said our policy was going to destroy. What has been the result of our policy? Mr. McMaster, whom the ex-Minister of Finance knows well, and who is not one of our political friends, will tell him that last year they largely increased their output. Their works have been going day and night, and they are employing a very large number of men.

I see that my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) is very solicitous about the workmen from Montreal. Let me tell him that the workmen of Montreal have more work to-day than they ever had during the past twelve or fifteen years. The country deserves to be congratulated on its present condition. Our financial credit is as high, if not higher, than it has ever been. Our manufacturing classes are very prosperous, and our great agricultural community has had a very satisfactory year indeed. Our friends are aware of all that, and therefore have not ventured to grapple directly with our policy, but have tried side issues, and have done their best to belittle our railway policy. Of course, they could not pass by what they called "the Drummond County deal," and the leader of the Opposition went not only fully, but violently, into that matter. What did he say? He said that there was altogether too much Greenshields in it, that we were all sold to that gentleman. I am always surprised when I hear a gentleman of his standing rushing into such rash statements. I can understand irresponsible members of the House—there are some—saying anything that may come into their minds, but I am very much surprised that the hon. leader of the Opposition should have done so. I am sorry he is not in his seat, but I invite him to come up to the committee room upstairs, where he will be made welcome, and there repeat his statement. We all know that he is not very scrupulous in his statements, that his words are always big, his sentences always very long and sounding, and his gestures always very sweeping. Well, there is one thing which I invite him to do. I invite him to come upstairs to the committee, and there bring forward the proof of what he has said. I see that my hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) is smiling. I like him when he smiles; he does not smile every day. I invite him also to attend that committee, because he also made statements concerning that Drummond matter which he cannot prove, and which he knows he cannot prove. He made them outside this House; he has been sufficiently prudent not to make them free. Well, I challenge him—he is now face to face with me—to make these statements. He dare not do so. Nobody will do so except irresponsible men. O'Connell, speaking one day of one of his opponents, said: "I think that he is a worthy heir-at-law of the blasphemous thief and liar who died on the cross." Of course, it would not be parliamentary for me to apply those expressions to any member of this House, not even to the one I see before me to-day, but I would call the attention of the House to this fact. There is nothing easier than to slander. Any man with no ability, any villain, can slander any public man; but when it comes to proving his statements, that is a little more difficult. An hon. gentleman who spoke yesterday—I allude to the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett); perhaps I should not pay attention to him, but the "Hansard" is there and the people may not always know with whom they have to deal—made a statement that aggravated me. I replied that it was not true, and that the hon. gentleman knew it was not true, and I of course was out of order, and had to withdraw the charge, because it was not parliamentary. What the hon. gentleman said is this:

Did he not last year see a Minister under an obligation to a great railway corporation, under a pecuniary obligation, as the Minister of Public Works was, to the Drummond County Railway?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). It is not true. But say it all the same.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman says it was not true that he was under an obligation to the Drummond County Railway.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Not one dollar.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, we have had the evidence of one gentleman that he owed them $20,000.

It was a definite statement. I immediately told him:

Not fifty cents. It is not true, and the hon. gentleman knows it.

Well, now, certainly he has repeated this very statement in another form, and it is not more true in that form than it was in the other. He stated that, in the "Hansard" of last year, I had admitted that I was indebted to the Drummond County Railway for $20,000. I spoke on this question on the 2nd June, last year, and I have the "Hansard" here containing what I said. Let any hon. gentleman of good faith read what I said, and I am sure he will say that there is not one word there such as the hon. gentleman has stated. But, in his statement yesterday, he said that one witness before the Drummond County Railway said that I was indebted to that company for the amount of $20,000. The only gentleman who was heard on that point before the committee up-stairs, was Mr. Greenshields. Allow me to quote a few words of what he said:

In regard to the "La Patrie" statement, I may premise by stating that in no instance was one single dollar ever, either directly or indirectly, either of the Drummond County Railway or my own, given to Mr. Tarte himself or to his sons, or "La Patrie" or anybody else.

Well, Sir, that is a very clear statement, and, in the face of such a statement, I want to know how any gentleman worthy of being a member of this Chamber can dare to slander me any more. There are two committees appointed, one by the House of Commons, and one by another branch of this legislature, and I challenge any member of this House to go before either of them and prove that what Mr. Greenshields has said is not true. I will not say anything more on that question. I will only add this: Why can we not in this House discuss public questions without slandering each other? We may differ among ourselves; we cannot all hold the same opinion. But I want to know why we should not discuss questions like gentlemen, without trying to damage each other's reputation. I have found this out, Sir, that the newspaper men and the public men who do not speak the truth, do not improve their reputations or their positions very much. I am an old newspaper man, and I have learned to fear the newspaper when it speaks the truth. But, when it says what is not true, I do not fear it, for truth, like water, will find its level. There is no public man who has been more slandered than I have, but I have not been killed. My hon. friends on the other side do not gain very much by the work they have tried to do against me. They have lost a good deal. I made up my mind—and I will make up my mind in the future, as I have in the past—I have made up my mind, that when I am right, I am not to be put down. I have made up my mind, that I have a right to my reputation, and that nobody can take it away from me. Well, Sir, enough of personal matters.

The leader of the Opposition has spoken very fully of our railway policy. I was very much surprised indeed to hear him say that the Intercolonial Railway could never compete with the Short Line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Is that a correct statement? If so, on whom does the responsibility rest? In 1887 the Conservative party were in power, and I was with them then. What did our party do? We voted a subsidy of $250,000 a year for twenty years to build the Short Line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Then, if the hon. leader of the Opposition is right, that the Intercolonial Railway cannot compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway Short Line, the Conservative party is responsible for it—they have simply voted to destroy that national property. But I hold that the leader of the Opposition is altogether astray. The hon. gentleman speaks of distances, and says it is 247 miles longer by the Intercolonial Railway than by the Canadian Pacific Railway. But distance is not everything. Is it not a fact? Does not my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) know, having been a party to the vote, that this $250,000 a year to the Canadian Pacific Railway was for the purpose of building up the port of St. John, as against the port of Portland? That cannot be denied. And still, there is a longer distance from the port of Montreal to St. John than from Montreal to these American ports. Now, the argument of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is altogether wrong, and the best evidence of it is that, during the last winter, the port of St. John has had more trade than it ever had. They have trebled their trade, and we hope in the future to have it a great deal more. But the leader of the Opposition takes a deep interest in the fine old city of Quebec. I remember very well the magnificent speeches he delivered to us at Quebec, particularly about the bridge. The hon. gentleman was then High Commissioner. He started from London to come to the old city of Quebec to promise us the bridge. That was ten years ago. My hon. friends from Quebec will remember, I am sure, that one of our opponents, Mr. Chateauvert, gave a promissory note before the election that the bridge would be built immediately, the Government being ready to vote a million dollars for it.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. But he never paid the note.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, Sir, ten years have gone by, and the hon. gentleman, who came to Quebec and made that speech, has repeated it to-day. He is ready, now that he cannot do anything else, to make big speeches, and make big promises; he is ready to vote a million for the Quebec bridge. In a former speech I said what I will repeat to-night—that I have every confidence that the Liberal party will celebrate its victory in the next general election on the Quebec bridge. By extending the Intercolonial Railway to the city of Montreal, we have in no way interfered with the prospects of the bridge. We have simply secured direct communication between the west and the east.

I need not say much more, as the question before the Chair has been threshed out thoroughly by many members of the House before me. I only wanted to put myself right once more in respect to these personal matters to which I have been obliged to allude. I dislike very much to allude to myself, but I am accused in such a free way that at times I feel it is due, not perhaps to myself, but to my friends, who have confidence in me, to put myself right before Parliament. I cannot complain of the support which has been given me. My hon. friends opposite have been after my scalp during the last six years because I thought proper to part company with them. Well, I parted company with them because I thought it was time for me to do so. I am very sorry that they have taken it so much to heart. I think we might continue to be good friends. I am not the only political man in the world who has changed his opinions, men much more able than I have done so. But it appears that in the Conservative party to-day we must either believe or die. Well, Mahomet is no more, and his maxim has no chance of surviving here. I shall not die. I will try to live as long as possible, in spite of all attempts of the hon. gentlemen opposite to kill me.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not think that the debate on the Budget makes many converts, at least in the House of Commons, but I do think that it makes many converts in the country at large. When Pope wrote his remarkable essay on Critics, and said:

'Tis with our judgments as with our watches, none

Go just alike, yet each believes his own.

I believe he must have had in his mind the two political parties in England, and it may apply to the two political parties in Canada as well. I regret, indeed, my inability to speak fluently the language of the majority of this House, and I will ask the indulgence of the members, if I occasionally refer to some notes I have before me.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear. Vous le parlez bien.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It was reported, not long ago, Mr. Speaker, in a now famous correspondence, that there existed in this Dominion such a province as "ambitious Nova Scotia." I feel, certainly, that there will be no dissenting voice this evening, when I say that Nova Scotia might well be called ambitious, after the array of brilliant and distinguished sons she has given this country, on both sides of the House. Indeed, inordinate ambition must be restrained; but ambition, which is a desire to excellence, of superiority, when based upon talent, upon patriotism and true loyalty, is not only legitimate, it is praiseworthy. This was my first thought the other day, when listening to the masterly speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance, and when joining with this side of the House in the hearty cheers that greeted his eloquent peroration. His Budget speech, Mr. Speaker, must have been a relief for the unfortunate readers of the Conservative press, who, for the last twenty years, have been taught by hon. gentlemen on the other side, that the banner of the Liberal party was nothing else but the signal of distress and ruin. Sir, let us be fair. True it is, that under the Mackenzie Government there were deficits, for the occurrence of which our party suffered defeat at the polls. But it is also a matter of history that the deficits of that eventful period were not caused by the unwise administration of public affairs. Impartial history will declare, that, on the contrary, they were due to the great commercial depression which at that time was felt, not only in our country, but throughout the world.

The veteran leaders who for twenty years stood bravely the brunt of the battle have been completely vindicated by the great success achieved by the Liberal policy during the past two years. Sir, what is the record of the present Government for the two last fiscal years? In 1896-97, for which we are only partly responsible, there was a deficit of $519,981. In 1897-98 there is a surplus of $551,000, making in all a net surplus of $31,000. I will not venture to compare these two years with the administration of public affairs by the Conservative party. Comparisons, we all know, are very often, if not always, odious, and I would rather be cheerful than sad. Nothing, I am sure, would convey more melancholy to the hon. gentlemen opposite than my reference to the various deficits incurred by them from 1878 to the 23rd of June, 1896. Suffice it to say, that in 1894-95 there was a deficit amounting to a little over $4,153,000; in 1895-96 there was another of $330,000, making in all a total deficit of $4,484,000. The hon. gentlemen opposite cannot explain these figures, unless they admit an extravagant expenditure during their tenure of office. One can hardly understand their vituperations against this party, when we all know their methods of government and their reckless administration of the public funds. It has been said, during the debate on the Yukon Railway Bill, that the party opposite was the happy possessor of that indisputable quality called the instinct of government. That my hon. friends opposite have enjoyed too long the confidence of Canadian electors, I am ready to admit. Granted also, that during the last twenty years they have displayed, to a certain degree, their so-called instinct of government; but, on the other hand, they have displayed to a much higher degree the instinct of expenditure and taxation.

Mr. DAVIN. And now you exceed us.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend reminds me of the garrulous and gossiping old lady, of whom the Latin poet said: "Lassata necdum satiata."

At the end of the financial year 1878, when Mr. Mackenzie went out of office, the net debt of the Dominion was $140,362,069.91.

At the end of the Conservative regime in 1896, the national debt stood close upon $250,000,000, an increase of nearly $110,000,000.

The expenditure which in 1878 amounted to $23,503,158, had reached nearly $40,000,000 in 1896.

On the other hand, if we look at the net taxes paid by the Canadian consumer during that same period of time, we find that in 1877 the total taxation amounted to $17,841,938—whilst in 1896 it amounted to $28,000,000 in round figures.

This is, Sir, the record of the Conservative party during their eighteen years uninterrupted lease of power. I charge the hon. gentlemen with having advocated and maintained a policy, which, in the language of the resolutions of 1893, did not only tend to promote extravagance, but which decreased the value of farms, oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few, checked immigration, caused a great loss of population, impeded commerce, and above all discriminated against Great Britain, the mother country.

The Liberal party has not yet unrooted all the evils which during that time flourished in our political soil. Reformers, in all times, in all countries, did not remove obstacles, did not wipe out abuses at one fell swoop. The effort of to-day calls forth the effort of to-morrow, and nothing is perfect until the ideal is attained.

Yet, Sir, imperfect as we are, as all human associations are, the Liberal party can claim some credit for the many reforms it has accomplished in such a short period of time.

The tariff has been reformed to the general satisfaction of the country and to the great benefit of industry and employment.

The fiscal freedom of the country has been greatly widened by the denunciation of the Belgian and German treaties.

A customs preference has been given to Great Britain, which admits $70,000,000 of our products absolutely free.

A cold storage service has been set in motion that will undoubtedly revolutionize the exportation to Britain and elsewhere of perishable products. The hon. Minister of Agriculture deserves special credit for this great innovation, and whilst speaking on this subject I might add en passant that in the maritime counties, and especially in Gaspé, there is a strong feeling in favour of this cold storage system and of the advisability of applying it not only to the exportation of our butter, our cheese, our eggs, &c., but also to the exportation of our fresh lobsters, which could command a good price on the English and French markets.

The question of canal deepening is now being earnestly considered and the hope is expressed that the task will be completed at no distant time. I am not an optimist, but, Sir, I venture to say that before the new century dawns, the passage of vessels of fourteen feet draught from Port Arthur to the sea will be a fait accompli, thus transporting through Canadian territory the whole of the enormous traffic coming from the west of the United States and our own North-west.

The fast line project is definitely arranged for, at a price $250,000 a year less than Conservative Administrations had offered to pay for it.

This Government has also brought to terms the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Arrangements have been made by which the agricultural products of the prairies would be greatly served. Such concessions have also been obtained as to bring the manufacturer, the merchant and the workman of the east into commercial relations with the consumer of the west. This vexed question of freight rates has been debated long ago in the press and here in Parliament, but with no practical result. I do not say that it is altogether settled, but the Government must be cordially congratulated for having struck the first blow at the railway monopoly.

The mineral lands of British Columbia and the gold rivers of the Klondike existed forsooth, long before our party came to power, but the new problems which these remarkable discoveries of the west raised.

were energetically dealt with. The Yukon Railway Bill, it is true, was defeated in the Upper Chamber. Sir, I am one of the young members of this House, and I would not dare to pass judgment upon the extraordinary vote given by the Senate when this most vital question came before them. I will venture to say this, however: We live in a country where the true principles of popular government is becoming more and more fully appreciated. We live also in a century where irresponsible bodies, the remnants of a distant past, are apt to disappear in the conflicts which may arise, when they will stand in direct defiance to the popular will.

The Manitoba school question is now practically settled. Conciliation has at last prevailed where racial and religious quarrels were threatening the peace of the Dominion.

Much as I admire the hon. leader of the Opposition for his energy, his vigour of mind and his endurance, yet, Sir, he fails to convince me that his present policy is wise and worthy of support. His power of exaggeration cannot help his cause. I ask this House, what confidence can he inspire when he deliberately prophesies ruin, bankruptcy and national dishonour as the outcome of the Government's policy? Sir, prosperity and welfare are no mere idle words in this Dominion, and we have unmistakable evidence that they exist. There is a revival in trade and commerce; wheat is firm; the working classes generally receive good wages. Speaking for the province of Quebec, I can state that never in the history of colonization has there been such a rush of settlers as at present. Our people are coming back from the United States, not only to reach the Yukon gold fields, but in order to settle quietly upon Canadian farms. In the annual report published last year by the Colonization Department of Quebec, I observe that from September, 1896, up to June, 1897, 3,905 French Canadians came back to Quebec. These figures were given by the agents of the Fichburg Railway Company alone, whereas I am informed four other large United States railway companies can show similar results.

The general agent of "La Société de Colonisation de Montreal" gives in his annual report the following figures:—

THE RESULTS OF A YEAR'S LABOUR.

(Translation.) For the twelve months of the year 1897, the total number of immigrants who have settled down in the various regions of the province, through the instrumentality of the society, was 2,146. In 1896, it was 1,994, which leaves a small increase in favour of 1897, in the number of immigrants registered at our offices. As a matter of fact, a considerable increase has taken place in the general business of the society.

After having given those figures, Dr. Brisson predicts most encouraging results for next year.

(Translation.) We find that the prospects of immigration are more promising than ever, and they are grounded, first, on the prosperous condition of our agricultural industries and on the fact that business is improving in all directions; and further, on the crisis that is prevailing to such an extent in the manufacturing centres in the New England States, where so many Canadians, who were formerly prosperous farmers, are threatened with starvation and ruin in the near future.

Several parties have already come back to Canada, and by availing ourselves of the present favourable conditions and vigorously promoting immigration, an impetus could be given to the repatriation movement altogether unprecedented in the annals of colonization.

From the 1st of July, 1896, up to the 3rd of June, 1897, 2,528 immigrants registered at the Immigration Bureau in Montreal. On the other hand, from the 1st of July, 1896, up to the 30th June, 1897, 3,108 immigrants were registered at the Quebec harbour. There has also been great activity in real estate, a fact which will be pleasing to my hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Quinn), as it is to me. During the last month of March, there were in the city of Montreal and in the town of Westmount 191 real estate transfers recorded at the registry offices, amounting to $1,457,395. During the corresponding month last year the transfers recorded amounted only to $670,761.81. Another evidence of welfare is the diminution in the number of failures. Let us take the number of failures in the month of March, 1898. There were 516 failures, with liabilities amounting to $3,840,495. If we take now the corresponding month of 1896, there were 781 failures, with liabilities amounting to $5,753,586.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say that we are entering into a new era with a progressive, originating, prompt and capable Government.

I have read somewhere that at the time when Addington was called by the King to succeed William Pitt as Prime Minister of Great Britain, the people assembled near Westminster at the opening of Parliament. When the King appeared he was cheered and cheered again. Suddenly, a poor workman emerged from the crowd, holding in his hands a petition which he presented to His Majesty. It contained the following brief yet significant sentence: "We want peace! We want bread! No war! No war! No Pitt." This historical reminiscence, Mr. Speaker, is suggestive of another petition which undoubtedly was made by the Canadian electors when Parliament was dissolved in 1896. And would they not tomorrow, if Parliament was again dissolved repeat, with a slight change, the brief yet powerful sentence: "We want peace! We want prosperity! No war! No Tupper."

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, I am sure no one can have any fault to find with the hon. member from Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux). He has given the House a capital essay, one to which no doubt he has devoted much attention and he has delivered it in admirable style. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) concludes that during the period the Liberal party have been in power, they have done sufficient to warrant his belief that they have fully redeemed their promises. Well, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) is very easily satisfied, and while we may admire the excellence of his essay, many will be inclined to have but a poor opinion of the sentiments he in many instances announced. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) has discovered for the first time that the Fast Atlantic Line was a new thing, and that it was an invention of the Liberal party.

The cold storage project has given great satisfaction to that hon. gentleman, and also the deepening of the canals. Well, Sir, these are matters that engaged the attention of the former Government, and I congratulate my hon. friend from Gaspé, who has been so long asleep and never discovered that these great works were undertaken before the present Government came into power. Even when the fast line project was mooted for the first time in the session of 1896; there was a good deal of rebellion against it on the Liberal side of the House, many of the members stating openly that they would not support the Government on that scheme. But my hon. friend is so thoroughly convinced that he is satisfied with everything the Government has done.

Now, I have just a word to say with regard to the very short, but very significant, speech that was made by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). We were told, the other evening, I think by the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), in very solemn tones, that we should discuss public questions with fairness, that we should not seek to gain any political advantage by our manner of discussing these questions, that nothing could be gained by slandering Ministers or other public men, and that charges of corruption and misdeeds on the part of the Government of the day were not the best means of helping along this country. I quite agree with that; but let me ask the hon. Minister of Public Works—I am sorry he is not in his place just now—if he has not invited a good deal of hostile criticism in this country. Let us be perfectly fair. The people are an intelligent, newspaper-reading class, who keep abreast of public questions. Is there an intelligent newspaper reader in Canada who has not watched with some anxiety, and with a great deal of interest and curiosity, the actions of that hon. gentleman? Let me call attention to two occasions on which the hon. gentleman, while perfectly within his legal rights, refused to answer certain important questions, the answers to which might have entirely emancipated him from hostile criticism—if he had given those straightforward answers which innocence alone would enable a man to give.

Mr. CLANCY.

The hon. gentleman on those occasions refused to give those answers. The hon. gentleman, I repeat, was quite within his right. Let me come to a very recent case. When an examination was being made in the committee appointed to inquire into the Drummond County matter, he characterized Mr. Greenshields as his friend, and said he would stand by him because he had been his friend. The public are anxious to know to-day why he is Mr. Greenshield's friend, and why he should stand by him. It is idle for the hon. gentleman to say: You cannot prove it. That does not mean anything. We often know the misdeeds of individuals from a chain of circumstantial evidence, though we may be unable to bring them home to them. I am not making a charge against the hon. Minister, but I say that his conduct has been such as to invite hostile criticism, and if he receives it, let him not complain.

Now, I desire to take up as little time as possible, and I wish to call attention to only one or two matters. I am glad to see the Minister of Customs in his place. He made a very admirable speech, from his point of view—one of great force, and one that he expects, very justly, to be read in this country, and to carry influence and weight, as the words of a Minister always do. If they are wrong, it is the more serious to the country, if they are believed, and the more serious to the Minister who utters them. I am not going to charge the hon. gentleman with intentionally or deliberately making these statements, but I will say that, if he had, in the most cold-blooded manner, tried to practice deception on the people, he could not have succeeded more admirably than he did when he made some of the statements he made the other evening. Let me refer to one or two of them. The hon. gentleman has a very strange mode of making calculations. In "Hansard" I find a table giving his figures. When the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) questioned this mode of calculation, the hon. gentleman and many of his friends on that side of the House joined in a sort of sneer at him for doing so. But I say, that there could be nothing more deceptive than the arrangement of those figures. The hon. gentleman stated that the figures were prepared for him, but he used them, and so far he is just as much to blame as if he had made the calculation himself. I will not go over this long table, but I will rest my case on a single item in it, which may be taken as a guide to the accuracy of the whole statement. The hon. gentleman gave us a classification of 107 items, for the purpose of showing how the farmers had benefited from the changes in the tariff. He heads his table in this way: In the first column, he gives the duties of 1894-95, as left by the Conservative Government; in the next column, he gives the duty as arranged by the present Government; in the next column, he gives the decreases and increases made by the Liberal tariff, as compared with the Conservative, and, in the last column, he shows the percentages of decrease in applying the preferential tariff. Now, I desire to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the extraordinary percentages he was able to arrive at in this last column. I will refer to wire nails. In the table, the hon. gentleman states that, under the old tariff, wire nails bore a specific duty of 1 cent per pound, and in the next column he states that the duty was reduced by the present tariff to $\frac{2}{3}$ cent per pound, specific duty. That seems to be correct; but what conclusion does the hon. gentleman reach from that? That there was a reduction of 40 per cent. Then, applying the 25 per cent reduction under the preferential tariff to Great Britain, there will be a further reduction of 9-20ths of a cent per pound, specific duty, making a further reduction of 55 per cent, according to the hon. gentleman. In all making 95 per cent reduction, if the hon. gentleman is correct. Now, let me see what follows. Why, since the tariff came into force there was imported last year \$14,405 worth of nails, the duty paid on which was \$4,860, or 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. Now, what have we? We have, according to the hon. gentleman's own statement, 95 per cent reduction, and yet still we have a duty paid on these nails to the extent of 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. I leave the hon. gentleman to settle that with the country. I ask him if he intends it to go to the country that there has been a sweeping reduction first of 40 per cent, because that is what is put here in plain figures, and then 55 per cent, or 95 per cent altogether. He says he means something else, but he has allowed it to go to the country that there was a reduction of 40 per cent, and then a reduction of 55 per cent. And yet there is still a duty, even if the preferential tariff were applied, of nearly 30 per cent. The people are not so dull in this country that they are going to be deceived by that kind of thing.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I agree with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CLANCY. It is a great pity he did not come to that conclusion before he made the speech.

Mr. DAVIN. Pity he made the speech at all.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend says it is a pity he made the speech at all. I desire to call the hon. Minister's attention to this fact. How is he going to explain that he has made a reduction of 95 per cent on the duties, because that is what he said, and still have this amount collected on nails.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Where did the hon. gentleman see that?

Mr. CLANCY. I read it over to the hon. gentleman once. Will the hon. gentleman say that he did not state that there is a reduction of 40 per cent, being the difference between 1 cent a pound and $\frac{2}{3}$ of a cent per pound?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY. Very well, will the hon. gentleman say that in applying the preferential tariff, which reduces the rate from $\frac{2}{3}$ of a cent per pound to 9-20ths of a cent, he has not made a calculation showing a still further reduction of 55 per cent? Will he deny that fact?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Does the hon. gentleman mean a further reduction or an additional reduction?

Mr. CLANCY. He has put it down in this table as a 55 per cent reduction.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is what it is. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I do not wish, out of sympathy for him, that it should go before the country that he has made such a palpable mistake. If an article costs a cent per pound and is reduced $\frac{2}{3}$ of a cent per pound, is not the percentage of reduction 40 per cent. Then, in the second column, I show that, under the preferential tariff, the cost is reduced to 9-20ths of a cent per pound, which shows a reduction of 55 per cent. Surely every man ought to understand that. It is the simplest, plainest calculation that can possibly be given, and any man who takes exception to it only places himself in a ridiculous light.

Mr. CLANCY. There are reductions here in percentages of 40 per cent and 55 per cent. I desire to say to the hon. Minister of Customs that the whole calculation upon percentages is one that is most palpably misleading. Let him take the case of a 30 per cent duty. Is there any little boy in school who would not receive the condign punishment he deserved if when he put on 30 per cent and then took it off again, he were to say that he took off more than he put on. I say it is juggling with figures to do that sort of thing. This calculating of percentages and percentages is misleading. We charge 30 per cent on goods, and that means adding 30 per cent to their value; and when you take off that 30 per cent, to make an honest statement, you should show that you have taken that proportion off the value.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). The hon. Minister was not dealing with the values of goods at all, but with the percentages of the tariff.

Mr. CLANCY. Now we have finally got a solution. My hon. friend is as blind as the Minister of Customs. He closes his eyes and tells the House—and I am glad now that he is on record—that he is not dealing with the tariff as applied to the values of the goods, but only dealing with percentages on percentages. But what the people want is not percentages on percentages, and the hon. gentleman's way of putting things is misleading. I will do the hon. gentleman the justice to say—without offering him the sympathy he was kind enough to offer me for what he thinks was my stupidity—that he did not see the consequences of making such a statement or he would not have committed himself to it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I assume all the responsibility for these figures. I did not give them to the House without knowing what I was doing, and they are correct. If the hon. gentleman will run down the column, he will find that I not only give the percentages of decreases, but also the percentages of increases. The percentages of increase is against the Government, as far as the hon. gentleman's argument goes. If he will look, he will see that there are many items in which the rates of duty have been increased over what they were under the previous tariff. Take, for instances, linen and jute manufactures, n.e.s. They are charged a duty of 20 per cent under the old tariff. Under the general tariff of this Administration the duty is 25 per cent. According to the hon. gentleman's theory, we should show as the percentage of the increase 5 per cent, but he will find that we are giving the percentage of increase as 25 per cent, the duty having been increased by that percentage. It would have been impossible for me to have made a perfect statement to the House and have put it in any other way. When I say that an article on which 15 per cent duty was charged has been placed on the free list, and that consequently there is a reduction of 100 per cent in the duty, according to the hon. gentleman's argument we not only have thrown off the duty, but are giving the goods to the consumer for nothing.

Mr. CLANCY. I am afraid that the hon. gentleman has not made his case any better. I have not found fault with the hon. gentleman for having in some cases counted against himself. True, he has put out a few decoy ducks as a sort of justification, but he is quite as erroneous in calculating against himself as in calculating for himself.

Now, Sir, I appeal to the hon. gentleman and ask him, in applying the rates of ad valorem duty, what is it based upon? It bears the same relation to one hundred as the whole duty does to the value of the goods. That is our mode of calculation of percentages. Any school boy could tell the hon. gentleman that and no person can be misled. When the hon. gentleman states that he in wiping off a duty and making goods free, takes off one hundred per cent, it is only true that he takes off one hundred per cent of the percentage, but he only takes off 10 or 15 or 20 per cent upon the goods. I am willing to leave it go to the country as the hon. gentleman has explained it, together with my own calculation. I feel quite sure that there is not a man outside of this House that will take the view of the matter as he has taken.

Now, the hon. gentleman gave 107 items showing the great interest the Government had manifested in making reductions. He applied the preferential tariff in every case. I copied from this table 31 or 32 items relating to the requirements of a class for whose welfare hon. gentlemen opposite just now manifest great solicitude, I mean the agricultural class. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) paid special attention to that. I do not find fault with that, for I think they are on the whole the greatest class in the country. They are the greatest producers and upon their prosperity depends largely the prosperity of the country. I may be a little tedious in reading these items, but I desire to place them upon the "Hansard" as an exhibit, side by side, with the statement the hon. gentleman has made. Now I will take the importations from Great Britain to which the preference would apply and also the importations from the United States alone. The comparison would be more favourable if I included all the other countries, but I give the figures only of imports from the United States as against Great Britain :

	$156,260	$2,098,922

Less than 7½ per cent came from England.

Now what does the hon. gentleman's carefully prepared table mean so far as these items are concerned? It means that the preference will apply to importations to about $156,260 as against importations of about $2,098,922 to which it would not apply.

Mr. FLINT. Would my hon. friend say for what period he is quoting his figures? Was it 12 months or 6 months?

Mr. CLANCY. I will give my hon. friend a civil answer, because I think he has asked it in that way. It has been for 12 months. The hon. gentleman surely does not think that any member of this House could make a statement of that kind for 6 months, and leave the House to believe that it was for a year. I tell the hon. gentleman that it is for the year 1896-97, as I stated at the outset. I find those particulars in the Trade and Navigation Returns that are open to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FLINT. I asked the question in perfect good faith. I had the misfortune not to hear the opening remarks of the hon. gentleman when he introduced that table.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me for one moment? I suppose the hon. gentleman has taken these, as he says, from the Trade and Navigation Returns up to the 30th June, 1897. Well, it was on the 23rd of April, 1897, that the preferential tariff went into effect, so it was only for two months instead of 12 months that the goods came in from England under the preferential tariff. The hon. gentleman, I am sure, has overlooked that, I know he would not do it otherwise.

Mr. WALLACE. I am quite sure that he has not overlooked the fact, and the House will not either, that these goods will not be made in Great Britain under any circumstances. They are made and will continue to be made in the United States, who will continue to be Canada's only competitor.

Mr. CLANCY. The application of the argument I am now making, as the Minister himself will admit, is not altered in any sense. The hon. gentleman will see that in applying the preferential tariff we are bound to take as a basis the last imports for 1896-97. Any other mode of calculation would be entirely speculative. The hon. gentleman's reasonings were capital, but his conclusions were drawn from false premises. The hon. gentleman assumed a certain state of things and then proceeded to reason thereupon. Now, what did the hon. gentleman say? He said: These goods are not imported largely now, but we are bound to say these goods will be imported largely in the future, and the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite are closed unless they are able to prove that these goods will not be imported. I may tell the hon. gentlemen that with regard to all the goods I have mentioned just now, England never did and never will manufacture them. Take the case of scythes, axes, all the implements that we use in the country. We do not use any of the goods that the English people manufacture for the wants of their own country. Every one acquainted with the condition of affairs knows that the English people do not manufacture a class of goods suited to our Canadian people. Take farming implements, buggies, carriages, ploughs, and implements of that kind. The English people do not now and never will manufacture for the Canadian people in those lines. My hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood), who is a very successful merchant, and can speak with authority on this question, will not say that he has been a purchaser of English goods. He will say that he has been able to buy from the United States to better advantage but the real reason is that the English people do not manufacture those goods for the Canadian trade. To apply the preferential tariff to a large class of goods which the hon. gentleman has put in his list, is perfectly idle and will be barren of results in the future as it has been in the past.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question in good faith? My hon. friend will admit that England is a great manufacturing country. He has referred to a list of goods which he says we should not consider in connection with the preferential tariff because they are not likely to be made in England, which is a fair argument. Will he tell me what class of goods manufactured in England are going to be excluded from the benefit of the preferential tariff? England makes something, I presume, as a manufacturing country. Will he show me the particular class of goods that England makes which is going to be excluded from the preferential tariff?

Mr. WALLACE. That is begging the question. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) quoted the articles that were brought to the attention of the House by the Minister of Customs and was commenting on them, and the Minister of Finance wants to draw a herring across the trail, and brings up another question.

Mr. CLANCY. I will candidly answer the hon. Minister of Finance. The question now being discussed is not as to whether England is excluded or not. But the Minister of Customs put forth his argument, he wished it to be understood in this country, because it would be beneficial to the party in power, that the Canadian people would derive as consumers immense advantages by having such goods placed upon the preferential tariff. What I am pointing out is this, not that any goods are excluded, but that English goods will never come into this country for the reasons that I have stated, and therefore the people of this country will derive no advantage such as has been suggested by the Minister of Customs.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We will have to submit to time, the great arbiter.

Mr. CLANCY. Yes, that is the last resort. If my hon. friend can gain any comfort in that prospect, I will not deny it to him. But I repeat that the hon. gentleman has put forth a false proposition. The hon. gentleman, if I may be pardoned for using a rather vulgar phrase, has been kite flying, he has been blowing bubbles. He has held out to the people of this country the prospect that they were going to receive enormous advantages from this preferential tariff, when the facts of past experience are a standing witness that the hon. gentleman is entirely wrong, and no one can hope for the realization of any such results in this country. Now, I desire to say a word with regard to the action of the Government in lowering the rate of interest. This seems to me to be a very important question, and it must be treated seriously in this country. The argument is made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that you cannot compare money borrowed that may be demanded on call with money borrowed for fifty years. I leave it to the judge to which the Finance Minister referred—the arbiter of time. Experience shows that every money contract made in the past has been in favour of long periods, and the person who has money at call has always been the sufferer, for there has been a steady decline in the rate of interest. The Government is always in a position to reduce the rate of interest. They have perhaps $50,000,000 to-day on deposit in the shape of savings of the people. The people are to-day in the hands of the Government. The Government have placed a loan for fifty years at a good rate of interest, 2½ per cent. The interest on savings bank deposits is reduced to 2½ per cent, the hon. gentleman was not able to state how much the cost of management would be but, leaving that aside, it would even then amount to something less than 2½. It is perfectly plain to every depositor, I do not care how small his means may be or how slight his ability may be at making calculations, that the Government may reduce the interest on the deposits in their hands, but they cannot reduce the rate of interest on the loan for fifty years on which they have undertaken to pay a certain percentage. The duties of the Government are largely parental. We owe a duty to the people. There are certain cases where in our treatment of foreigners we owe them nothing but business courtesy and on business principles. It is unfair, however, to take such ground as regards our own people. What the people require is greater encouragement in saving surplus means, and joined with that, a place where their savings may produce some return to them from year to year. I wish to point out what the effect of this policy with respect to the interest paid on savings banks deposits will be. It will have an effect on every labouring man. Life is short, and men are compelled to invest their money in two or three channels. What are they? Some people, especially those with small means, deposit their money in the savings banks. Others go into life insurance and pay premiums. Others again join benevolent societies. Millions of dollars are invested in life insurance through different societies. I will now ask the Minister of Finance a pertinent question. Is it not a fact the moment you have reduced the rate of interest, because the Government is all powerful to reduce the price of money, certain results must follow. Every one acquainted with life insurance in the United States and in Canada is aware that the rates the companies charge are infinitely less than in Great Britain. Why? Because the interest on money from investments in England is very low, and they are obliged, in order to give cheap rates, to secure profitable investments in this country, and this operates as a tax to a larger or smaller extent on people who are endeavouring to make provision for their wives and children. What will be the result? Every life insurance company will be obliged to increase its rates or go to pieces, because in order to secure an equal return it will be necessary to impose higher rates. As regards the price of money, every man has an interest in the shrinkage that will be caused by the action of the Finance Minister. The hon. gentleman stated that in order to have cheap money in the banks we must give the banks the means of borrowing money cheaply. I need not call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that when the Government were paying 4 per cent interest on deposits in the savings banks, the banks were complaining that the rate of interest was entirely disproportionate to that charged by the bank rates, and that the Government were paying a higher rate of interest to depositors than the rate charged for money borrowed abroad. The hon. gentleman will see that he is simply correcting a complaint on the part of the banks. You cannot meet a gentleman in financial circles but will declare that the Government have equalized the interest for the first time the Savings Banks and Chartered Banks, when they have placed it at 2½ per cent, and all the banks stand on even footing at that rate. We cannot hold out the hope that people will get cheap money, and I put it to the hon. Minister whether he can hold out any such hope.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, I do.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman stated that unfairness prevailed, that there are different financial circles, that those in the inner circle obtain money cheaper than those in the next circle, and they again obtain money cheaper than those outside. I call the attention of the hon. Minister to the fact that there will always be circles in money matters. The hon. gentleman is perfectly well aware that money can be borrowed on gilt-edge securities at a lower rate than in other cases. If I am charged 6 per cent, and another man, who is in the inner circle, gets money at 5 per cent, he is able to offer better security than I. There is no sentiment in the banking business; they lend it at low rates when they have the best possible security, and they lend it at low rates when they lend in large sums. If the Finance Minister were to reduce the rate to 1 per cent, it would not alter the condition of things which exist.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There will be always the circles; they will always come down a shade.

Mr. CLANCY. The Finance Minister will have to show that the lowering of the rate has improved the condition of borrowers generally throughout the country, and he must not forget that a borrower at one time may be a lender at another. My hon. friend has wisely not attempted to put forth the proposition that this lowering of the rate will confer benefit on all the people generally, and I say that no act of the Government will be more unpopular in the country than this. Much as I should desire to see the present Government displaced, yet the price is too high and the welfare of the country will suffer too much to cause me to rejoice to see them out of office because of such an ill-advised policy as this.

Now, Sir, with regard to the position taken by the Government on the tariff. I regret that the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) is not in his place, but I notice, with pleasure, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) is here. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) gave the idea that he did not at all agree with the conclusions reached by the law officers of the Crown in regard to the most-favoured-nation treaties applying to Canada. He, no doubt, in order that he may let the Government down easily on the defeat of their preferential policy, will still hold that the Canadian Government were defeated, not because they had not right on their side, but because the law officers of the Crown were wrong. Well, that is not consistent with the position of hon. gentlemen opposite. Last year, when the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) tabled his preferential resolutions, he told us that, on a certain day, the custom-houses would be open to admit British goods at the preferential rate; but he told us, at the same time, that the idea was founded on a much broader principle, and that the intention was to apply the preferential rate to the whole world, as well as to Great Britain, when other nations complied with the conditions specified. Here is what the Minister of Finance said:

I stated that the tariff I am about to read to you is the general tariff, but that before I conclude I shall be prepared to make a statement in relation to a special tariff, that will apply to Great Britain and any other country which is prepared to accept the conditions that that tariff imposes.

It is clear here, that the Finance Minister was trying to make the Canadian people believe that the preferential rate would not only apply to Great Britain, but that it would apply to every other country that would comply with the conditions. He again said:

We do not by our resolutions offer anything to Great Britain alone. We recognize the fact that Great Britain, by the Liberal policy, is in a position to avail herself of this offer immediately, but we make our offer not to Great Britain only but to every nation which is prepared to accept it. We make it to every country which is willing to establish fair and reasonable trade relations with Canada.

It is well that the country should know in what position the Government stood when they introduced this preferential tariff. Here is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

But I say with respect to that offer we now make, that it is not a preferential offer at all, in the true legal sense of the word. That offer is open to all the world. The Americans may avail themselves of it, and so may the Germans and the Belgians. The whole world are welcome to avail themselves of it on the same terms and on the same conditions on which England may take advantage of it.

We had the Minister of Marine telling us:

The Premier thoroughly understands it. The Premier took that stand which the Minister of Finance took what every member of the Cabinet took and hold to-day, that these treaties did not apply and did not bind Canada. The Premier took the stand which is now carried out in every custom-house in Canada: that these treaties do not bind Canada, and that German and Belgian goods are not entitled to preferential treatment because of these treaties.

The right hon. the First Minister, replying to the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), said:

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) surely cannot suppose that we propose to place upon the Statute-book that law without looking in advance as to where it would lead us. We had to look around in the world so as to see what countries would be admitted under the preferential tariff, and having looked over the world from the one pole to the other, we saw only one nation in a position to take advantage of that tariff, and that was Great Britain.

It is quite clear, from these utterances, that the Ministers, having pledged themselves to the people of Canada that there would be a general reduction of the tariff, sought to delude the people into the belief that this low preferential tariff would apply to all countries, as well as to England. And then again, these very same gentlemen sought to deceive the people of England by making them believe for the time being that this preferential tariff was solely in favour of England. These very same gentlemen to-day have changed their policy on this important matter, and now they tell the people of Canada that this favoured tariff is only to apply to England. I ask the Finance Minister, what has brought about this change of heart? Why have they abandoned that part of their reciprocal tariff which applied it to all the nations of the world that would comply with the conditions they named, and why do they now say that it shall only apply to England? I would like to ask the hon. Finance Minister, why the Government have abandoned in toto that reciprocal portion of their tariff, which they put on the boards last year and held out as a boon to the country, and now confine the preference to Great Britain. I think I have a right to demand, on the part of the people of this country, why that change has taken place, and why the hon. gentleman has practically excluded all other countries than Great Britain from the reciprocal tariff.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend has given such close attention to the Budget speech that he must have discovered that I discussed that question at very considerable length, and I do not think I should interfere with his speech to discuss it at length now. I showed that we had abandoned no principle, but had maintained the principle of our tariff as far as the condition of the treaties made it possible to do so.

Mr. CLANCY. I admit that the hon. gentleman discussed the subject of the preferential tariff at considerable length, but I think he did not discuss the question I now bring to his mind. This is not a matter involving treaty rights or having any relation to them. The question I raise is this. Last year two things were stated; one was that there was a reciprocal tariff under which every country in the world complying with the conditions of that tariff might export goods to Canada at certain reduced rates of duty—one-eighth reduction last year, and one-fourth reduction this year; and, owing to Great Britain having a free trade policy, it was held out as a boon that all goods coming from Great Britain would at once come in under the reduced tariff. The question I ask the hon. gentleman is why was that position abandoned, and instead of having reciprocal relations with all other countries, they confine themselves now entirely to the preferential tariff with Great Britain. That is the question I ask the hon. gentleman—what trade reasons he can give for that change of policy. I do not mean what reasons may have been present in the mind of the hon. gentleman—I would not like to inquire into that; but I mean the reasons which the country is asking why the reciprocal tariff of last year has been abandoned for a preferential tariff this year. I think the hon. gentleman should answer that question.

Mr. CLANCY.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I wish to be courteous to the hon. gentleman. I answered the question so fully in the Budget speech that I cannot think the hon. gentleman did not understand it. If he looks over the Budget speech, he will find that I answered it so fully, clearly and forcibly that the ordinary wayfaring man could understand it, and I cannot believe that there is any doubt about it.

Mr. CLANCY. I read the hon. gentleman's speech with great care, and I had the pleasure of being in the House when he delivered it, and I paid all the attention to it that my meagre abilities would allow me. The hon. gentleman says he discussed that question very fully. He discussed the change which he made, but he did not discuss the reasons for making the change.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, I did.

Mr. CLANCY. I will not dispute the question with the hon. gentleman; but I tell him that the people of this country, who read the newspapers, will see that he made no such statement, that he made no reference to the change of front on that particular point, and he very wisely refuses to make any statement now. The people of this country have not lost sight of the attitude of these hon. gentlemen in the past. The hon. Minister of Customs told us that there was a magnificent convention held in the city of Ottawa some years ago, at which the Liberal party laid down certain planks of their platform. The whole country knew the reasons why the Liberal party were called together on that occasion. The hon. gentlemen know that they were utterly discredited throughout this country. They know that they went to the country with a policy that was rejected, and they were discredited from one end of this country to the other. The charge against these hon. gentlemen was that they had advocated the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, which in essence was a synonym for commercial union, and both of them were synonyms for political union with the United States. I am not putting that too strongly, because I have the interpretation placed upon their acts by their own friends as meaning that, and meaning no less. The hon. gentlemen met in convention and laid down a new platform, and they did not at that great meeting utter a single sentiment in favour of the policy on which they had gone to the country and tried conclusions with the Conservative party. They went there to cast off every particle of their clothing and to be rehabilitated in a new dress, and to make a new platform. I have here an open letter which was written by Sir Oliver Mowat to the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie on the 12th December, 1891, after the election, after hon. gentlemen had been not only beaten but discredited; and it shows that they had beyond all doubt committed themselves to unrestricted reciprocity. This is what Sir Oliver Mowat had to say with regard to that :

As a remedy for existing evils, the Liberals in the Dominion Parliament, including yourself, adopted as a plank of the Liberal platform unrestricted reciprocity of trade in the products natural and manufactured in Canada and the United States. This was a substitute for the so-called National Policy, the McKinley tariff, and other unfriendly devices on the part of the two countries respectively in relation to their mutual intercourse. The adoption of this article of the Liberal platform was approved of by the party generally, including those who had the strongest attachment to British connection.

The hon. gentleman went still further. We have here the evidence of the acquiescence of the right hon. leader of this House, for this is what Sir Oliver Mowat says :

Again, in the address to the electors of Canada by Mr. Laurier in the last election campaign, he pointed out that "in the present contest nothing is involved which in one way or another can affect the existing status of Canada." He placed unrestricted reciprocity in the front as the object of the Liberal party.

He went on further to say :

In behalf of the Liberal party of Canada, I hasten to say that the one thing of all things which we at this moment hold to be of the utmost importance is, that the relations between the United States and Canada should be made as friendly and as close as become the dignity and interest of two nations of the same kith and kin on this continent of America.

In fact, the first article at this moment in the programme of the Liberal party is, if possible, to establish absolute reciprocal freedom of trade between Canada and the United States for all products of the two countries, whether natural or manufactured.

Then the hon. gentleman went further. He had this to say because there was no doubt about his attitude :

In the very nature of things, from the sole fact that Canada is growing, developing and progressing, the interests of Canada and the interests of England must be divergent, and whenever the interests of Canada are on one side and the interests of England are on the other, the only consideration for me is what is best for Canada, leaving it to the people of England to consider and do what is best for England. This is not a question of sentiment, and for my part, I am firmly convinced that the economic interests of Canada lie with this continent, and it is on the basis of continental freedom of trade that I place the question.

Now, there could be no possible doubt of the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite in that respect. They were forced to call a convention, and at that convention they adopted a new platform. The people have not forgotten, in any sense, the record of those gentlemen, and are not blind to the fact that these hon. gentlemen, by their conduct during the past two sessions and the present one, have shown that they are sitting here under false pretenses. They held out to the people hopes which they do not intend to fulfil and what they dare not fulfil. They came into office without the slightest realization of the responsibilities attaching to power. They came in without any settled policy, and were forced to continue a shifting policy of deception to England on the one hand, and to Canada on the other. We heard the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce tell us, not that the pledges of the Liberal party have been redeemed, but that in some items the expenditure of this Government is less than that of the former Government. I tell the hon. gentleman that that is not an answer. They were pledged to reduce the expenditure, and instead they have increased it. They were pledged to reduce the public debt, but instead have made it still greater. They pleaded that they could carry on the affairs of the country with a good deal less money, and at the same time give us better service, but they have not made a single attempt to redeem that pledge and they know perfectly well that they never can redeem it.

It was stated in this House that these hon. gentlemen came into office on a mere accident. What was the accident? Although they adopted a policy in 1893, I challenge them to show that they won a single seat in the whole Dominion on that policy. They know perfectly well that they won on another question altogether, and a question which should never have entered the political arena, and concerning which the conduct of the Liberal party does not reflect credit on it. They were not content to appeal to the electorate on their platform of 1893, but turned their back completely on it, and donned a new suit. They were satisfied that had they adhered to that platform, they would have been defeated, and so took hold of a vexed question to help themselves out. I appeal to the hon. Minister of Public Works and to the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) to say if there was one seat won in the province of Quebec on the great political issues that divided the two parties. They must admit that these issues were completely overshadowed by another question that was hatched out by certain members of the Liberal party, and by a brood of conspirators against the public peace. They succeeded in Quebec, where the Government got three-fourths of their majority, and when they contend that they represent the opinion of the country on the trade policy, I challenge them to show one seat in that province which was carried upon any other issue than the one to which I have referred. My hon. friend who is smiling opposite (Mr. Bourassa) came here pledged to do certain things, he signed a pledge in fear and trembling, and so did the hon. Solicitor General, and neither of these gentlemen can say that he was elected here on legitimate political issues or have fulfilled their pledges.

What has become of these hon. gentlemen who in Opposition were so wont to declaim against the extravagance of the late Government? My hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) in particular achieved rather an unenviable record for his searching criticisms into every small detail of expenditure. He was even credited with counting the napkins at Rideau Hall, and some hon. gentlemen have gone so far as to say that he looked into the pots there to see if they were cracked. Nothing was too small to escape his attention, but now his role is changed. When a man makes it a habit of investigating small things, he is apt to descend to just as small a level when he undertakes to plead on the other side and defend his own friends. The man who goes to extremes on the one side may be expected to go to extremes on the other. These hon. gentlemen, however, may make as many excuses and pleas as they like, the people are looking to the Government for an honest fulfilment of their pledges. I should hope, in the interest of the country, that they will not carry out all their pledges.

I say it would be a great calamity to this country if they had carried out their policy. They say that the factories are running. I challenge them to show a single case where they have changed the tariff in accordance with their promises to the people with a result benefiting the industry affected. The factories are not running under a policy proposed by hon. gentlemen, but under a policy that was in force before they took office and that they dare not change. They were drunk with unexpected success. None were more surprised than they when they got into office. They found that they had made promises that they could not fulfil, that they dare not fulfil. Such changes as they had made in the tariff were made on a scale and in a way not creditable to them. We were told that specific duties were the bane of this country and that it would be the duty of the Liberal party—and this was very clearly explained by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce—to abolish specific duties. There were 190 cases of specific duty in the old tariff. Of these there are 108 that they never touched at all; twenty they lowered slightly; ten were raised, thirteen were done away with and higher ad valorem duties substituted, thirty-five were replaced with ad valorem duties at a lower rate, and three were abolished. Is that an honest fulfilment of their duties.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. WALLACE. In one case an ad valorem duty was put in place of a specific.

Mr. CLANCY. I have no doubt that there were some cases even of that kind. And now, with regard to another important feature of the tariff. I do not desire to be offensive to hon. gentlemen personally, but I say that their policy was a policy of deception and concealment. They held out to the people of England the hope that they were going to get special advantages. But, as was pointed out in the clearest possible terms by the leader of the Opposition an evening or two ago, the tariff was prepared for this reduction by an increase in the duties on those lines of goods that were especially imported from England, while, if any reductions were made, it was on those lines that were imported mainly from the United States. Taking the importations in 1895-96, which was the last report before the change of the tariff, we find that these increases applied to $10,687,880 worth of goods coming from England. On the other hand, the goods from the United States to which these increases would apply amounted to only $2,707,344. Could there be a clearer case of deception? Take, on the other hand, the goods that were selected for a reduction of duty, and you find that they made the same invidious selection. The goods coming from the United States, which under the new tariff amounted to $4,421,825, as contrasted with $1,009,823 from England. Now, Sir, the loyalty of the Canadian people to the Empire is undoubted. We can say that of both political parties. I should be sorry to charge hon. gentlemen opposite with being less loyal than the Conservative party. I am bound to say that they have given evidence in some cases that would lead us to believe, if we were inclined to be critical, that they were not so loyal as we should like to see them. But I am going to take it for granted that they are as loyal as the Conservative party. Yet I do not believe in putting forward what I may call silly sentiments. I do not believe that we should seek to show our allegiance to England by striking a severe blow at our manufacturers and turning our workmen out of employment. England is not so unfair as to ask us to do that. But when hon. gentlemen say that we have struck a tender chord in the hearts of the English people by such means as this, I ask if it is not a contention unworthy of a great political party. If this tariff works out as hon. gentlemen say it will and the customs revenue is greatly decreased, our workmen must be taxed to make up for that loss, and this at the same time that their chances of employment are made less—and all to carry out the visionary policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. Minister of Customs says that all this will be made up by great extension of trade. How will it come? We reduce the opportunities afforded to our workmen and manufacturers in this country, and this will certainly react upon agriculture, because the two interests are so closely interwoven that you cannot dissociate them. I leave the people of this country to judge the hon. gentlemen and the visionary schemes they have put forth, and let the hon. gentlemen take the consequences when they go again before the tribunal of public opinion.

Mr. DAVIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No.

Mr. FLINT. I think the hon. gentleman ought not to ask for the adjournment of the debate.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend is aware, I suppose, of the distinct agreement that was made, so far as such agreement is possible, by the leader of the Opposition, that the debate should close to-night. If the hon. gentleman is not aware of that, let him ask the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), who is aware of that officially.

Mr. DAVIN. I believe no member from the west on the Liberal side has spoken, and the west has not been heard from on this subject. I appeal now to the leader of the House not to press us to go on.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I must say to the hon. gentleman that I must distinctly refuse. It was agreed, in as positive a manner as possible, with the leader of the Opposition, and with the ex-Minister of Finance, as well as incidentally with the Whip, that the debate should close to-night. We cannot possibly allow an adjournment to take place.

Mr. WALLACE. There was no agreement understood across the floor of the House in any way. The first intimation we had of that arrangement was from the acting leader of the Government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce; but I stated then that it was an unfair proposition, if there were members who were desirous of speaking, from British Columbia, from the North-west Territories, and from Manitoba, who have not been heard on this subject. Yet the leader of the House proposes that the debate should be closed to-night. We are now at the hour of midnight, and I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce will admit that there has been no attempt on this side of the House to prolong the debate unnecessarily. I do not care what arrangements have been made that were not known to the members of the House, because they were not known to the members of the House until they were stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, last night. I am sure those hon. gentlemen who expected to speak on this question were greatly surprised. It is unreasonable to ask us at this hour to go on with the debate, to say that the debate must go on, no matter if it takes until next Sunday morning. Are we going to revert to the old style?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I must point out to the hon. gentleman, who is an old parliamentarian, he knows very well that there are hardly any cases in which, after the leaders of the House have formally agreed, and the thing has been notified the night before, an attempt has been made to break an agreement of that kind. There is the hon. member for North Leeds, at whose instance I allowed the House to be adjourned at a very early hour last night, and he agreed that we should close to-night.

Mr. WALLACE. These arrangements, so far as I remember, are usually made across the floor of the House between the leaders, and with the approval and consent of the members on each side; because, if a number of members get up and say they will not approve of these arrangements, they have to be dropped. But this arrangement that has been spoken of, was made between the First Minister and the leader of the Opposition; it was unknown to the members of the House, and therein it differs from the usual arrangements made across the floor. Every member has a right to concur in the arrangement made by his leader, or to object to it. But no such opportunity was given to us. I think we can fairly appeal to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has always acted generously in these matters, not to force the question.

Mr. TAYLOR. Reference having been made to myself, I will just quote what was said last night. About 11.30, I moved the adjournment of the debate. Some objection was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he referred to an arrangement that had been made between him and the leader of the Opposition. I made these remarks:

Mr. TAYLOR. I understood from the leader of the Opposition that it was the intention, if at all possible, to close the debate at to-morrow's sitting. It may be late to-morrow night; but I think that all the members who intend speaking on this side of the House can easily deliver themselves at to-morrow's sitting. I know it is the wish of the leader of the Opposition to close the debate to-morrow, and he fully expects that it will be done.

I made that statement, and the hon. members on this side of the House could have closed the debate, and would have closed the debate, I think, if it were not that two Ministers, followed by one of their own supporters, occupied the time that ought to have been allowed to the Opposition. However, I know that was the wish of our leader last night. I know it is his wish to-day, and it is the wish of the members on this side of the House. But they should receive fair treatment, and they should have been allowed the time remaining, or, at least, two men from this side to one on the other side. The debate has not been unusually long. I think, certainly, that the North-west and British Columbia should be heard from.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is quite impossible to accept the motion to adjourn.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

Mr. DAVIN. I have to speak mainly on the subject that was dealt with so disingenuously by the present leader of the House (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. gentleman has a right to speak. The hon. gentleman has made a motion to adjourn, and I see, by Dr. Bourinot, page 418 :

If a member should move the adjournment of the debate and the House should negative that motion, he will have exhausted his right to speak on the main question.

Mr. BENNETT. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has already spoken on the subject.

Mr. McDUGALL. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before you put the motion, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) moved the adjournment of the debate simply for the purpose of not going on to-night. I do not think the rule read by you will apply in this case.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has the right to dispute the ruling. There can be no doubt about it ; and perhaps the hon. gentleman has not understood exactly what I meant. An hon. gentleman has the undoubted right to move the adjournment of the debate, and if his motion carries, he has the right to speak at the next sitting. If the motion is not carried, it is well understood, as I showed by a quotation, that he has no right to speak again.

Mr. DAVIN. I will speak to the motion for the adjournment of the House, and I intend to bring before the House the subject raised to-night by the Minister of Public Works, the subject of his own exploits. First, I will bring before the House an article from "Le Reveil," which reads as follows :—

LA RAISON.

Un article de notre dernier numéro, intitulé : D'où est venu le magot ? a inspiré la note suivante à un lecteur :

MONTRÉAL, 23 mars 1898.

MON CHER "RÉVEIL" :—

Vous dites, dans votre dernier numéro, que les Tarte ont payé vingt mille dollars à Beaugrand pour "La Patrie" et qu'en sus, ils ont trouvé une somme au moins égale pour "renipper" cette même "Patrie" quelques jours plus tard.

Mr. BOURASSA. I should like to know if the Italian language is allowed in the House of Commons of Canada ?

Mr. DAVIN. I suppose the hon. gentleman does not think I pronounce French in the Parisian style, or as the hon. gentleman pronounces it.

Mr. BOURASSA. Not exactly, but the hon. gentleman has such a melodious pronunciation that I supposed he was speaking the tongue of Dante.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. DAVIN—

Est-ce tout ce que les Tarte ont payé pour la "Patrie" ? Oui. . . Alors, vous n'y êtes pas du tout. Vous ignorez donc qu'ils ont payé, de plus, quinze mille dollars à Beaugrand ? Greenshields a bien juré qu'il avait donné son chèque pour vingt mille piastres, et que les Tarte avaient couvert ce chèque dès le lendemain ; mais il n'a pas dit qu'il avait, en outre, endossé des billets au montant de $15,000, que ces billets étaient signés par les Tarte en faveur de Beaugrand, et qu'ils ont été payés à échéance par les Tarte. . . .

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. It is very amusing no doubt, but the people of Canada had to pay the piper for it, and although hon. gentlemen are full of laughter about it they may be perfectly satisfied that when we go before the people they will dance to that tune, even more gracefully than the Minister of the Interior dances, and that is saying a good deal.

Si vous voulez de plus amples informations adressez-vous donc à M. Alphonse David, avocat, qui a fait la collection des billets pour M. Honoré Beaugrand, pendant l'absence de ce dernier.

Je pense que M. Téléphore Beaugrand, frère d'Honoré, pourrait aussi vous donner quelques renseignements sur ce point.

Maintenant, que dites-vous de l'achat de la nouvelle presse, $25,000, que les Tarte viennent de faire pour imprimer la nouvelle Patrie ? C'est depuis que le coup du Yukon est en marche que cet achat a été fait. Il y a toute une mine de déductions à exploiter et vous n'en parlez pas.

Enfin, je ne veux pas vous chicaner, vous le seul journal qui fasse son devoir, et Dieu merci, vous le faites bien. Continuez : les libéraux ont les yeux sur vous, et, tôt ou tard, votre mérite sera reconnu.

Votre vieil ami,

LIBÉRAL.

Before I proceed to translate this article for the benefit of the House—

Mr. TALBOT. Read it in French first.

Mr. DAVIN. We who speak English as our native tongue do not show such hyper-criticism when hon. gentlemen whose mother tongue is French, speak in English ; and I may tell those hon. gentlemen who consider they are descended from grand seigneurs and wonderful fellows from old France, that they do not show that politeness which is supposed to be hereditary in French people. Nor need they be too certain that in point of accent they have any advantage of me, for all or most of them speak French with what Edmund About would call "un accent déplorable." That may be accounted for by ancestral peculiarities that perhaps are not to be linked with the seigneurial people to whom I have referred a moment ago. There is a reference in that letter to a $25,000 press, and the Minister of Public Works declared in our hearing in this House that he had no property in the press of "La Patrie." But he himself or some of his friends circulate the paper called "La Patrie," and here is a picture of the press, and on the press is written : J. Israel Tarte.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is christened that way.

Mr. DAVIN. So this paper rather contradicts the statement made here. I will now translate that letter :

Montreal 23rd March, 1898.

My dear "Reveil,"—You say in your last number that the Tartes have paid $20,000 to Beaugrand for "La Patrie," and that in addition they have found another sum at least equal for "reniffer" the same "Patrie" a few days after.

Is that all the Tartes have paid for "La Patrie" ? Yes ? Then you are not acquainted with everything. You forget then that they have paid still more $15,000 to Beaugrand ? Greenshields has well sworn that he had given his cheque for $20,000, and that they covered this cheque on the morrow, but he has not said that he had further endorsed paper to the amount of $15,000.

That he had still further endorsed paper to the amount of $15,000, and that these bills were signed by the Tartes in favour of Beaugrand, and that they had been paid by the Tartes. If you wish further and ample information, address yourself then to Mr. Alphonse David, advocate, who has made the collection of those notes for Mr. Honoré Beaugrand, during the absence of this last person. I think that Mr. Téléphore Beaugrand, brother of Henri, can also give you some information upon this point. Now what do you say of the purchase of these new presses for the $25,000 that the Tartes have bought to print the new "Patrie" ? It is since the coup de Yukon—

Mr. BENNETT. What ?

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know that I can translate that.

Mr. BENNETT. Steal.

Mr. DAVIN. Not exactly. We say coup de main, coup de grace, and so coup de Yukon.

Mr. BENNETT. Scoop.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, it is the scoop of the Yukon.

It is since the coup de Yukon that this purchase was made. There is a whole mine of deductions from that, and yet you are silent. I find I do not wish to trifle with you—you, the only journal who make its duty to expose these things, and, God be thanked for it, you do it well. Continue. The Liberals have their eyes upon you, and soon or late your merit will be recognized.

Now, Sir, this is the comment of "Le Reveil" :

Notre correspondant a raison ; il y a là toute une mine à exploiter. De fait, quand nous dirigeons la loupe sur l'évolution matérielle de "La Patrie," nous trouvons sans cesse des mines à exploiter. Des mines plus riches en surprises que ne le sont celles du Yukon en déçoivent nous pour les gens qui aiment les affaires droites et claires.

Si nous avons l'air de refuser d'aller jusqu'au fond du gisement, jusqu'au bout du filon, c'est qu'il nous prend un écoeurement insurmontable. Constater sans cesse que le parti libéral ne se soulève pas en bloc à la vue de ce qui se passe au soleil ou se découvre après enquête, c'est, à la fin, si pénible que sans nous sentir découragés, nous éprouvons un impérieux besoin de mettre rapidement un point final à nos articles sur ces sortes de sujets.

LA DIRECTION.

That is signed "La direction" and La Direction is the editorial staff. In order to edify the House and in order also to be just to the requirements of this House, because the two languages prevail, I shall translate it, and it will no doubt afford a certain amount of amusement to these classical and highly educated gentlemen on the other side. There is my friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) whom the French members of his own party used to call the "tape worm," and who used to get at the inside, as we know, and work about the inside of the Auditor General's Report, but who now does not do anything like that now, and has become a vermicular ossification, a sort of fossilized tape worm. He will be amused at this: I think it would be better, Mr. Speaker, if we had a little courtesy to-night ; I think I will teach that Treasury bench before I am done with them to-night that it would be much better if we had a little courtesy from them. Here is the translation :

Our correspondent is right. There is a whole mine to work upon. In fact, when you direct the lens upon the material development of the Patrie you always discover mines to work (exploite), mines more rich in surprises than are those of the Yukon in deceptions, for gentlemen who love matters clear and direct. If it appears that we refuse to go to the bottom of this matter, to the end of the lode, it takes us with an insupportable heartache. It is a difficult thing to go on stating clearly without a pause, that the Liberal party does not raise itself—

Here now I have come to a part that I cannot translate very well.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Bring it over here and I will help you.

Mr. DAVIN. No, I do not want your help. Remember I am translating it off-hand.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Come along and I will help you.

Mr. DAVIN. I will translate it in this way :

—At the sight of that which passes in open day or which is discovered as a result of inquiry, it is in the end so painful that, without feeling ourselves discouraged, we experience the imperative need to bring rapidly to a close our articles on this sort of subject.

Now, Sir, this writer who signs himself "Vieux Rouge" has an article on the 2nd of April, 1898, which he entitles "Simple Reflexions."

SIMPLES RÉFLEXIONS.

Après la crise, ou si on le veut, le caucus, il importe d'étudier la situation nouvelle qui est faite au parti. Assez de jours se sont écoulés depuis pour en parler avec une juste mesure. Qu'on se note bien : nous n'avons à revenir sur aucun de nos écrits. Ce que nous pensions hier, nous en sommes aussi intimement convaincus aujourd'hui. Toutefois nous sentons qu'il n'est que naturel d'essayer de saisir, d'analyser la vraie philosophie qui s'échappe du bruyant événement.

The translation is this :

After the crisis, or if one wishes, the caucus, it is necessary to study the new situation which is made to the parti Liberal. Enough of time has rolled away since to enable us to deal with this question justly. Let it be noted, we have not to recede from one of our writings. That which we thought yesterday we are also profoundly convinced of to-day. However, we feel it is only natural to attempt to analyse the true philosophy which escapes from this disturbing event.

Tout d'abord, à César ce qui appartient à César.

Deux hommes ont tout particulièrement donné, au caucus, la note juste. Dans un langage non moins énergique dans le fonds que modéré dans la forme, ils ont en face des ministres recité des griefs, interprété le sentiment du parti, désigné et touché l'endroit malade.

And to begin with: to Cæsar that which belongs to Cæsar. Two men have quite particularly given to the caucus the true note, in a language not less energetic and profound than moderate in form. They have, in the face of the Ministers, recited the griefs, interpreted the sentiment of the party—designated and touched the diseased spot.

Au risque de se rendre impopulaire en "cour," de s'attirer la défaveur de Jupiter et, peut-être, de ne recevoir qu'un appui platonique des autres collègues présents, ils ont extrait la vérité du puits.

At the risk of rendering themselves unpopular at the court, and of attracting upon themselves the disfavour of Jupiter—

This refers to the leader of the Government.

—and perhaps not to receive but a Platonic support from the other colleagues present, they have drawn the truth out of the well.

D'autres ont voulu continuer la plainte discrète, la bouderie prudente et improductive, enveloppant sans cesse dans un pli de rose les représentations trop amères.

Others, however, wished to continue the discreet complaint, the prudent murmur and unproductive, unceasingly enveloping in a fold of the rose—enveloping in rose leaves too bitter representations.

Les endormeurs sont de tous les temps, et, si nous en croyons l'histoire de tous les partis dans tous les pays, cette gent n'a jamais prévenu ni préparé une catastrophe.

The wheedlers are of all kinds, and if we believe the history of all parties in all countries, these gentlemen have never foreseen nor repaired a catastrophe.

Mais il s'est trouvé deux hommes bien décidés à mettre fin à ce système de laisser-faire, qui n'était, en réalité, que de la couardise badigeonnée de discipline mal entendue.

But two men have been found thoroughly decided to put an end to this system of go-as-you-please which is in reality but the miserable cowardice of an ill-understood discipline.

Nous voulons parler de MM. Préfontaine et Beausoleil.

We wish to speak of Mr. Préfontaine and Mr. Beausoleil.

Déjà, une effluve de reconnaissance, partant des rangs du parti, monte jusqu'à eux; déjà on parle d'assouplissement chez certains ministres: déjà quelques injustices sont réparées.

Already a flood of thankfulness, bursting from the ranks of the Liberal party, has come to them. Already one speaks of softening, of bending with certain Ministers; already some injustices have been repaired.

Le Réveil est donc certain d'être l'écho de la grande masse des libéraux en félicitant et remerciant les députés de Maisonneuve et de Berthier.

Mr. DAVIN.

"Le Réveil" is therefore certain to be the echo of the great mass of the Liberals in felicitating and thanking the deputies of Maisonneuve and Berthier.

Et nous ne craignons pas d'ajouter que si le chef est encore l'homme de cœur et de grande intelligence que l'on a connu, il saura avant longtemps reconnaître que le cri d'alarme lancé par ces deux représentants, vaut plus pour le parti que les flatteries, les duperies et les "à-quat'pâtissemets."

And we do not fear to add that if the chief is still the man of heart and of great intelligence that he is known to be, he will know before long time to recognize that the cry of alarm thrown out by these two representatives values more for the party than the flattery, the dupery of others.

Peut-être est-ce déjà fait.

Perhaps it is already done.

Depuis le caucus, des organes ordinairement hostiles et réticents, dévoilent leur pensée. Seul, et pour cause, le Temps et la Patrie font les carpes.

Since the caucus the organs ordinarily hostile and reticent express their thought. Alone and for cause "Le Temps" and "La Patrie" carp.

Ce franc parler n'est pas un des moindres résultats de la réunion.

This frankness of speech is not one of the least results of the caucus.

Puissent les autres députés libéraux secouer également leur torpeur et ne pas craindre de mettre les points sur les i.

May the other Liberal deputies equally rise from their torpor and not fear to place the dots on the "i's."

C'est pour le parti; c'est aussi pour le pays.

It is for the party; it is also for the country.

Il ne faut ni casser les vitres, ni demander l'impossible.

It is not necessary to break the crockery, nor to demand what is impossible.

That refers to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. BENNETT. He is china.

Mr. DAVIN (reading)—

Exiger justice, fustiger les traîtres, abattre les petits états qui s'érigent dans l'Etat, c'est-à-dire les coteries bâtardees qui s'établissent dans le parti, l'absorbent, l'épuisent, l'encanaillent, voilà le programme.

To demand justice, to flog the traitors, to beat down the small bodies which erect themselves in the state—that is to say the bastard coteries which fasten themselves on the party, absorb it, destroy it, "l'encanaillent"—dogify it; that is our programme.

To whom is it they refer when they say "l'encanaillent"—dogify the party?

Si on l'eût suivi dès le commencement, on ne verrait pas aujourd'hui le spectacle à la fois comique et attristant que nous offre nos clubs, nos caucuses, nos journaux. Quand on pense qu'à peine trois mois après la victoire notre parti était déjà en proie à des divisions intestines d'une nature, d'une gravité telles que l'on ne peut en trouver l'équivalent à aucune époque et dans aucun pays.

If one had followed this programme from the commencement, one would not see to-day the spectacle at once comical and sad that our clubs, our caucuses, our journals present. When one thinks that scarcely three months after the victory, our party was a prey to intestine divisions of a nature and a gravity that one could not find an equivalent for in any other epoch or in any country.

Mark this, Mr. Speaker :

Si jamais parti devait être assuré d'un long règne c'était bien le nôtre. Tout nous était donné, tout nous souriait. Situation vraiment inélite dans les annales de a politique.

If ever a party could have been assured of a long reign, it was ours. Everything was given us, everything smiled on us. It was a situation truly unknown in the annals of politics.

Hélas ! on a débuté par de grossières erreurs. Ingratitude a présidé à la confection du cabinet.

Alas ! we began by gross errors. Ingratitude presided at the making of the Cabinet.

You remember, Mr. Speaker, that in the first session after this Government came into power, I told my right hon. friend that he had been guilty of injustice to his party in forming his Cabinet, and that he would have to justify his conduct to his party in this House and the country. Well, Sir, the Nemesis of what he did on that occasion, in committing that injustice to his party now confronts him. He brought in seven new men ; he turned his back on the men who had stood by him on those benches for eighteen years, and brought in seven new men. What has been the result ? These are the men who have brought all the trouble upon him.

Nous fâmes néanmoins, pour l'amour du pays, du parti, et du chef, disposés à fermer les yeux sur cette tache originelle.

Sans doute, disions-nous, les aubains, à qui les portefeuilles sont donnés de préférence à nos vétérans, vont s'efforcer de faire oublier cette injustice ; ils seront plus dévoués, plus sympathiques, plus justes, plus courtois. Enfants adoptifs auxquels on a donné la meilleure place au foyer, ils vont doubler la dose d'affection et d'abnégation.

Ingratitude presided over the formation of the Cabinet. We were, nevertheless, disposed, out of our love for our country, our party and our chief, to close our eyes to this original sin. Without doubt, we said to ourselves, these foreigners to whom portfolios have been given in preference to our veterans, will endeavour to make us forget this injustice. No doubt they will be more devoted, more sympathetic, more just, more courteous. Adopted children, to whom we have given the best place at the hearth, they will double the dose of affection and abnegation.

Quels naïfs nous étions de nous bercer de cet espoir.

Ce sont précisément ceux-là qui, depuis, ont, comme à plaisir, été la cause directe et indirecte de tout le mal. Dans la haute administration ou dans la régie interne, ils ont commis ou fait commettre bêtise sur bêtise.

What innocents we were to cradle ourselves in this hope ? It is precisely those who since have made it a pleasure to be the direct and indirect cause of all our trouble. In the higher administration, as well as in the internal economy of the party, they have committed or caused to be committed folly upon folly.

Et ce que nous leur reprochons le plus, c'est d'entraîner d'une façon habile, sournoise, systématique, l'honorable M. Laurier à l'impopularité.

And what we reproach them with is to have dragged down, in a skilful, underhand, systematic manner, the Hon. Mr. Laurier into unpopularity.

The writer is speaking in this paragraph of the right hon. leader of the Government.

Cet homme n'est déjà plus le même. Ceux qui l'ont vu en ces temps derniers ont peine à croire qu'il soit le Laurier diplomate, attentif, flegmatique, méticuleusement courtois de jadis.

The man is no longer the same. Those who have seen him in these latter days have difficulty in believing that he is the diplomatic, attentive, phlegmatic, scrupulously courteous Laurier of other days.

Est-ce bien le Laurier de 1895 qui dans le dernier caucus disait à peu près ceci ?

" Vous, députés, dites-moi ce que vous voudrez ; ayez raison ou ne l'ayez pas ; il reste certain que je ferai à ma tête."

Un peu plus, à un prochain caucus, il s'y rendrait éperonné, cravache en mains et il n'aurait plus qu'à parodier le mot de Louis XIV : " L'Etat, c'est moi !"

Is it, indeed, the Laurier of 1895, who, in the last caucus used language to this effect : You deputies, you may say what you like, whether you are right or not ; one thing is certain that I will have my way. Let him go on, and we will have him at another caucus, spurred and with whip in hand, and ready to parody the saying of Louis XIV : " L'Etat c'est moi."

So that we have to go to a leading French journal of the Opposition to learn what a transformation power has wrought in the gracious personage whom we were accustomed to respect and like when he led the Opposition. It seems that he feels now somewhat as Cassius described Cæsar when he exclaimed :

Upon what meat does this our Cæsar feed, that he hath grown so great ?

And Cassius adds :

Why, man, he doth bestride the narrow world,
Like a Colossus ; and we petty men
Walk under his huge legs, and peep about
To find ourselves dishonourable graves.

Mais non, chassons ce pessimisme ; qu'on nous permette de croire que le chef a su depuis quelques jours bien saisir la portée de ce qui vient de se passer,

But no, let us banish this pessimism ; let us permit ourselves to believe that our chief has learned since some days to appreciate well the tenor of what has just taken place.

Il ne nous insultera pas, espérons-le, en croyant rétablir la paix grâce à quelques nominations semées dans la province, autrement dit en nous jetant quelques os.

He will not insult us, it is to be hoped, in believing to establish peace with some nominations scwn in the province, otherwise throwing a bone to a dog.

Non, ce qu'il faut c'est, d'une part, une plus grande prudence dans la transaction des hautes affaires administratives et, de l'autre, une réforme radicale dans l'économie interne du parti.

No, that which is necessary is, on one part, a greater prudence in the transaction of high administrative affairs, and, on the other, a radical reform in the internal economy of the party.

Cette réforme doit commencer en haut, dans le cabinet, en passant par les départements pour aller aboutir dans les succursales du gouvernement sur tous les points de cette province.

This reform ought to commence in the high places in the Cabinet, not passing by the departments for to go—

Now mark this.

An hon. MEMBER. Never mind it.

Mr. DAVIN. Ah, but it relates to my hon. friend, and I would like to translate it with correctness. At any rate, the sense of it I may say is this: Clean out the Augean stable of the Cabinet and, in cleaning the Augean stable the Minister of Public Works would go rapidly before the broom.

Le cabinet n'est pas un dogme, une arche d'alliance.

The Cabinet is not a dogma or an arched alliance.

L'honorable M. Laurier n'a pas craint d'y toucher quand pour elaguer un invalide et réparer une injustice, il a donné congé à l'honorable M. Mowat et appelé M. Mills.

The Hon. Mr Laurier had no fear to touch it when, for the retiring of an invalid and the repairing of injustice, he has taken the portfolio from Sir Oliver Mowat and called upon Mr. Mills.

Que le chef n'écoute pas seulement une cloche: qu'il recherche encore la collaboration de ceux qui pendant dix, quinze, vingt ans ont été ses meilleurs amis, ses plus loyaux compagnons. Il leur doit beaucoup, puis, ce sont eux qui constituent le bone and marrow du parti. Qu'ils lui retirent leur appui, et le chef, qu'il nous laisse le lui rappeler, sera toujours bien dans la piètre position du meilleur écuyer du monde auquel il ne manquait qu'une chose: la monture.

Let the chief not listen to a clock, let him still seek the aid of those who, during ten, fifteen or twenty years have been his best friends, his most loyal companions. He owes them very much, since they are those who constitute the bone and marrow of the party. Let them draw him to their support and let the chief that leaves to us to regulate it, be always still in position of the best of his party.

Que les hommes auxquels nous objectons dans le ministère reçoivent ailleurs une récompense honnête sagement mesurée, nous en sommes. Que le chef ne veuille pas être tenu en tutelle, nous en sommes, mais il y a tout un océan entre une mise en tutelle et une rationnelle interprétation des droits et des devoirs d'un leader de parti.

Let the men to whom we object in the Ministry receive further the honest recompense we will measure out. We agree to that. Let the chief now not wish to be held in tutelage. That is our opinion. But there is an ocean, there is a whole ocean between the situation, in which the chief is in tutelage, and a rational interpretation of the rights and duties of the leader of the party.

I see that somebody has sent me Webster's dictionary. I am very glad that it has been sent to me, because it is an English work to which I attach very great importance, and, by and by, if there is any word that needs elucidation at the hands of Webster, I will thank the hon. gentleman and read the definition he has given of that word.

En voilà assez pour un second jet. Il nous secuit supérieurement agréable de n'avoir plus à revenir là-dessus, ce qui signifierait que tout est remis en l'état désiré. Quoi qu'il en soit, nous ferons, qu'il en coûte peu ou prou, ce que nous croyons être de notre devoir de bon et loyal partisan. Il nous est impossible de flagorner ou de mettre une sourdine à notre plume.

Mr. DAVIN.

Ah! Ce n'est pas par plaisir que le Réveil dit des vérités parfois pénibles; pas plus que ce qui s'est passé au caucus n'a été appris par nous avec une joie égoïste.

Mais le Réveil a cru et croit encore que c'est aimer le pays, le parti et le chef que de crier: Gare! quand il en est encore temps.

Pendant de longs mois on a pu penser ou essayer de convaincre les autres que notre journal était isolé, qu'il exagérait, qu'il mentait. Le caucus nous a bien vengé, mais notre satisfaction serait bien maigre si, de ce concile, ne devaient pas sortir pour le parti libéral, les éléments d'une ère nouvelle.

Une reconnaissance, quoi?

It will be supremely agreeable not to find it necessary to return any more to this subject, and it will signify the establishment of a state of things much to be desired. Whatever may happen, we will do, let it cost what it may, that which we believe to be our duty as good and loyal party men. It is impossible for us to behave in a manner otherwise than loyal to our chief and to our party. And it is no pleasure for the "Reveil" to speak painful truths, any more than that which has passed at the caucus has been learned by us with egotistic joy, but the "Reveil" believed, and believes still, that it is love of country, of party and the chief to cry: "Take care!" while there is still time. During the long months one has been able to think and attempt to convince the others that our journal was isolated, that it exaggerated, and that it lied. The caucus has well avenged us, but our satisfaction will be very meagre if, from this assembly there will not emanate for the Liberal party the elements of a new era. A renaissance. What?

I am very sorry that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has left the House, but, as he no doubt reads the "Hansard," I will, for his edification, call his attention to an article that appeared in the Montreal "Star," entitled "Sir Richard's Repentance." When I think of what the hon. member for South Oxford was when on this side of the House, and what he is now, when I think of the lion-like way he used to behave here, as financial leader of the Opposition, and there he is now, like one of those lions we read of, in Algeria, with his claws blunted and eyes taken out, and trained to do nothing but to hold a timber bowl in his mouth and beg alms for certain religious bodies. That, Sir, is the position he is in now for that godly, or that ungodly, body that makes up the Government of Canada. He is that blind and maimed lion, with that little bowl in his mouth. This writer says:

SIR RICHARD'S REPENTANCE.

There will be—at least, there ought to be—an interesting ceremony in Ottawa shortly. Sir Richard Cartwright will do—or ought to do—public penance for his grievous and public offences against his fellow-countrymen generally and against the members of the several Conservative administrations in particular. With ashes on his head, with sackcloth around his shoulders, with a lighted taper in his hand, the humble and honourable gentleman will kneel, or ought to kneel, before the front Opposition benches and ask the pardon of the men whom for years he has calumniated.

While Sir Richard, as the chief offender, is in this becoming attitude, Sir Wilfrid, Mr. McMullen, Mr. Charlton and Mr. Mills, and nearly all their political friends will—or ought to—chant penitential psalms.

It is not to be expected that Sir Richard will remember all the wicked things he said about the men whom he has so persistently maligned. He may recall with remorse that he impugned their honesty and questioned their veracity, that he called them ignorant and mischievous charlatans; that he accused them of failing in everything except heaping up debt, making scandals and plotting and conspiring among themselves; that he accused them of exacting millions of dollars per annum from the people of Canada in the shape of unnecessary taxation; that he pledged his knightly word that when the Liberals got into power they would relieve the country of this burthen of excessive and unfair taxation, that they would reduce the tariff to the needs of honest economical and efficient administration. It must add a pang to Sir Richard's bitter repentance to think that he not only slandered the Macdonalds, the Tupper and the Bowells himself, but that he seduced many other Liberals into committing the same heinous offence.

While reading his recantation he ought to read the amendment to the Supply Bill for 1894-95, which he moved, and which contained the following:—

“That inasmuch as enormous sums of money are exacted from the people of Canada which are not paid into the Treasury, and inasmuch as the burdens of the people are hereby unnecessarily increased, and as it is of the utmost importance to the well-being of the community that not only should the present extravagant expenditure be diminished but that the said burdens should be reduced as largely and speedily as possible, it is expedient that in making provision to restore the equilibrium between revenue and expenditure, as recommended in the Speech from the Throne, the existing tariff be so modified that it may be made a tariff for revenue only.”

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to ask the hon. member for West Assiniboia if, in the resolution he read, the Minister of Trade and Commerce was applying that to the present financial year? It appears to me that it exactly suits the present occasion, and I supposed the Minister of Trade and Commerce was applying it to the present year.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Might I be allowed to ask if it will apply to the worm that crawls up the tree and leaves a trail behind.

Mr. DAVIN. I am afraid the hon. gentleman knows more about the worm that dieth not than the worm that crawls up the tree. I quoted in a former debate, which I do not want to refer to improperly, the language of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That is a prophecy.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That refers to the antiques.

Mr. DAVIN. The Government is doomed to destruction:

When he has read this he will—or ought to—explain that the estimates for that year only amounted to $38,517,152. Then he might go on and read the following little table, showing the revenue and expenditure of each year from 1888 to 1896:—

	Revenue.	Expenditure.
1888.....	$35,980,463	$36,718,495
1889.....	38,782,870	36,971,835
1890.....	39,879,925	35,994,031
1891.....	38,579,311	36,343,568
1892.....	36,921,872	36,765,894
1893.....	38,168,609	36,814,053
1894.....	36,374,693	37,585,026
1895.....	33,978,129	38,132,005
1896.....	36,618,591	36,949,142

He will then, or should then, acknowledge that in 1896 he declared that an expenditure of $38,000,000 was too large for Canada to afford, that it was a disgrace for the Government to ask the people of Canada for that sum to be expended for federal purposes.

At this point it is to be hoped that Sir Charles Tupper will assure the repentant Minister of Trade and Commerce of his forgiveness, and authorize him to divert himself of his sackcloth and ashes.

It would be too humiliating, too crushing, too cruel, besides being unnecessary, to allow poor Sir Richard to go on and repeat the confessions made in Mr. Fielding's Budget.

Do not ask the man who called it a disgrace for the Government to ask for $38,000,000 in one year, who said that the sum was too much for Canada to afford, to admit that the Government of which he is a member expects to take $39,000,000 out of the pockets of the people of Canada this year, and to spend $38,750,000 of it!

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. gentleman is reading his speech.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is transgressing the rules of the House and is reading his speech. I have listened to the hon. gentleman very carefully since he began his speech, and I have noticed that he has been reading all the time, and not simply referring to the notes.

Mr. DAVIN. I can assure you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I am simply reading extracts, brief extracts.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I prefer to have the hon. gentleman give the House something original.

Mr. DAVIN. I am reading an extract from the Montreal "Star."

Do not ask him to acknowledge that he and his colleagues have been scheming to extract $40,500,000 from the pockets of the people of Canada in the year 1898-99, and that they have actually planned to spend $39,124,000 of that amount. The Conservatives can afford to be generous, the economy of their financial policy has been vindicated by the deeds of the very men who maligned them, their tariff has been vindicated by its adoption by the very men who abused it. Let them not triumph unduly over fallen foes—(fallen into a good thing, no doubt, with good salaries and good perquisites)—but fallen from their high estate of purity and from the lofty elevation which enabled them to call their opponents rogues, thieves and liars; fallen in their own estimation and fallen in the estimation of their fellow-countrymen. Mr. Fielding should vary his estimates (not increase them) so as to include provision for a home for fallen men.

I desire now to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to a certain point.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He is not here.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman is generally absent, but I am glad to say he is here now. The hon. gentleman quoted the bank clearances, and he made it out that the revenues of Canada too were an indication that his policy had been successful, and I suppose he meant to indicate that his tariff which according to his contention, is somewhat lower—though I do not think it is—than the tariff of his predecessors, and it was owing to that fact that the returns of the clearing-houses had been of such a satisfactory character. The statements of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs as to the signs of prosperity that obtained, lead palpably to the inference that for eighteen years the country has been governed so admirably, that now when these gentlemen come into power they have reaped where the Conservative party sowed.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Cabinet of antiques.

Mr. DAVIN. No. The difference between this Government and the Government I called a Cabinet of antiques is, that while that was a Cabinet of "antiques" this is a Government of "anties." This is what the Minister of Finance said :

The volume of the general business of the country was such as to very markedly increase the aggregate bank clearings of the five principal cities—Montreal, Toronto, Halifax, Winnipeg and Hamilton. The total clearings for the three years, 1895, 1896 and 1897, according to the "Monetary Times," were :

1895.....	$1,039,967,000
1896.....	1,025,960,000
1897.....	1,151,906,000

or an increase of $126,000,000 in the clearings of 1897 over 1896. For the four weekly periods—ending Thursday—in January, 1898, the total clearings were $108,509,673, against $89,901,000 for the similar periods of January, 1897, or an increase of over $18,000,000. For February last, the total clearings for the five cities mentioned were $198,385,302, as compared with $74,612,552 for February, 1897, an increase of $33,772,750.

Now, if I mistake the argument of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), I trust he will correct me ; his argument was that because of the lower tariff introduced by the present Government these happy phenomena occurred in the various clearing-houses of Canada. Now, the improvement in Canada is only 12½ per cent, while under the Dingley Bill, which is a far higher tariff, I find from the New York "Commercial" for Saturday, 2nd April, 1898, that this is what occurred from the various clearing-houses in the United States :

It would be interesting to know what the grand total of March bank clearings throughout the country would have amounted to had it not been for war prospects during the past month. As it is, the grand total of March clearings of about

Mr. DAVIN.

$5,700,000,000 is only 1.1 per cent larger than those for February, notwithstanding that March had 31 days and no holidays, as compared with February's 28 days and two holidays. Clearings for January amounted to more than $6,000,000,000, and very naturally fell off to $5,581,000,000 in the short month which followed. The rule is for March clearings to heavily exceed those of February, but this year they almost prove an exception. January bank clearings this year were about one-third larger than those for January, 1897, those of February were nearly 50 per cent larger than those for the like month last year, while bank clearings for the month just ended exceed those for March, 1897, by a little less than 33 per cent. In these totals and percentages is found the story of the ravages in business circles due to prolongation of the prospect for war.

MARCH TOTALS OF CLEARINGS.

	1898.	1897.
•New York.....	$3,418,019,442	$2,387,110,544
Boston	454,098,000	396,984,043
Chicago	439,308,827	336,343,377
Philadelphia	310,404,163	247,737,435
St. Louis	120,343,884	108,121,600
Pittsburg	85,535,027	62,553,241
Baltimore	72,236,992	61,047,615
San Francisco...	69,948,407	55,003,425
Cincinnati	53,132,800	49,280,750

The total for all the great cities of the United States was, in 1898, $5,674,090,729, and in 1897 it was $4,236,875,620. What becomes, then, of the argument of the hon. gentleman ? The clearings showed an increase of 12½ per cent in Canada, and in the United States an increase of 33½ per cent. The statement of the hon. gentleman as to the prosperity of the country did not reflect upon the efficiency of his Government, but it did tell as to the efficiency of the previous Government, because if the previous Government had managed the affairs of the country badly, if they had kept house badly, then when the new tenant came in he would have found it uninhabitable, and not at all so comfortable as this Government found it. I see that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has come back to the House, and I have no doubt that like other great minds his intellect works best at night. I will ask his attention to this—

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, to us who do not smoke it is really most offensive that a gentleman opposite is smoking in the Chamber. It is disgraceful. Let us have a little decency anyway. It is the first time I ever saw it permitted.

Mr. DAVIN. Who is the offender ? Who is smoking ? It is most improper. In defending the action of the Minister of Finance in lowering the rate of interest, here is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said :

It may be interesting to the House to know that in 1894 something like $25,300,000 of the then deposits, which amounted to about $40,000,000, were held by 26,000 depositors, being as nearly as may be at an average of $1,000 per head.

He therefore tried to give the House this impression that the average deposit was $1,000.

Now, I do not think that men who are able on an average to deposit a thousand dollars per head can be regarded as people deserving the paternal care of this Government.

In order to defend the action of the Finance Minister, he laid it before this House that the persons who were using the Government savings banks were persons having $1,000 to their credit, each one. Again I say it was a most extraordinary thing. We say in regard to some things done by hon. gentlemen opposite that they are done either wickedly or ignorantly. But it is hard to suppose that this was done ignorantly, because I think the hon. gentleman said he had the return in his hand—a return that he himself had called for. This is the return :

Return to an Order of the House, dated the 25th April, 1894, for a return, showing :

1. The total number of depositors in the Dominion and Post Office Savings Banks.
2. The number of said depositors having deposits of $1,000 or upwards, and the total amount held by them.
3. The number having deposits of $500 and over, not exceeding $1,000, and the total amount held by them.
4. The number of depositors having deposits of less than $500 and the total amount held by them.
5. The number of depositors not residing in Canada, and the total amount held by them.

Well, Sir, here is a return—

Mr. LANDERKIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman to defer his remarks till the reporters come in. They have all gone out.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. DAVIN. Here is a return to an Order of the House for certain information respecting the depositors in the post office savings banks. It gives: first, the total number of depositors—114,275. Then it gives the number of depositors having deposits of $1,000 or upwards, and the total amount held by them—the number, 5,418, and the amount held by them, $7,419,615.94. The number of depositors having $500 and over, but not exceeding $1,000, and the total amount held by them—the number, 9,200, and the amount, $6,421,018.96. Now, mark this: the number of depositors having deposits of less than $500 and the total amount held by them—the number, 99,657, and the amount, $10,312,558.76. There is a note here :

Note.—Many of the large balances belong to accounts transferred from the Dominion Government Savings Bank and were created many years ago when deposits could be made beyond the limits fixed for the Post Office Savings Bank.

We have also here a statement of the Dominion Government savings banks, showing the number of depositors having deposits less than $500, the number having $500 and not exceeding $1,000, and the number having $1,000 or upwards. Here you have the number and amount of the depositors having from $1 to $500: in Nova Scotia, 19,905 depositors with $2,395,285; in New Brunswick, 12,822 depositors with $1,796,141; in Ontario, 1,327 depositors with $173,784; in Prince Edward Island, 5,227 depositors with $675,125; and so on, making a total of 45,305 depositors of from $1 to $500, having a total of $5,502,848. Then, those having from $500 to $1,000 in all these provinces were 5,127 in number, having to their credit $3,517,030.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How many millions have you in there?

Mr. DAVIN. Then, with $1,000 or upwards the number is 4,607 and the amount $6,676,586. Now, I have here a return of the business of the post office savings banks taken from the Public Accounts, from the 1st of April, 1868, to the 30th of June, 1897. I will not go over all these statements; but I will take the information for 1897. The number of post office savings banks at the close of the period was 779; the number of deposits received during the period, 161,151; the total amount of the deposits received during the period, $8,223,000; the average amount of each deposit received during the period, $51.02; the amount of depositors' accounts transferred from Dominion Government savings banks during the period, $1,856,474; the number of withdrawals during the period, 91,398; the total amount withdrawn during the period, $7,656,086; the number of accounts remaining open at the close of the period, 135,737; and the total amount, $32,380,829. And what do you think is the average amount standing at the credit of each open account at the close of the period? The average amount is $238.55. And yet, with the return in his hand, the hon. gentleman said what I read from his speech. Why, Sir, it would be scandalous in any member of the House; but in a man who has occupied such a high position, and who has enjoyed such great respect, and until the last few months such well-deserved respect, it is a scandalous thing to try to palm off on the country a statement having so little foundation as he has done. I have here the average deposits from 1891 to the last year. In 1891 the number of depositors having from $1 to $10 was 53,217.

Mr. WILSON. Out of a total of how many?

Mr. DAVIN. Out of a total that year of about 144.

		1890-1	1891-2	1892-3	1893-4	1894-5	1895-6
		Depositors	Depositors	Depositors	Depositors	Depositors	Depositors
From	1 to 10	53,217	52,891	53,219	53,093	53,314	58,841
do	11 to 20	26,427	25,141	24,906	24,249	23,941	26,065
do	21 to 50	37,561	36,457	37,444	36,375	35,411	37,982
do	51 to 100	17,685	17,589	18,610	17,927	16,918	17,920
do	101 to 200	7,965	7,405	8,380	7,941	7,824	8,029
do	201 to 400	4,091	3,628	4,026	3,788	3,740	3,962
do	401 to 600	407	987	1,228	1,240	1,206	1,428
do	601 to 800	147	357	420	474	454	538
do	801 to 1,000	172	468	635	673	787	993

Thus we see that in the year 1893-94 the percentage was :

		Depositors.
From 1 to 10	36.370
11 to 20	16.620
21 to 50	25.060
51 to 100	12.280
101 to 200	5.440
201 to 400	2.600
401 to 600	0.850
601 to 800	0.330
801 to 1,000	0.460

You see by these figures that the contention made by the hon. Minister of Finance, and buttressed up by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, had not a tittle of foundation, and those banks are used by the poor people, as I have demonstrated from these official figures. I am not done with this subject, because I think that the feature is the worst and blackest of the most miserable financial statement that was ever made in any Parliament.

An hon. MEMBER. Go on.

Mr. DAVIN. I intend to, and so is the Conservative party going on, and there is another party going on, but in a different direction, down that Laurier Avenue which leads to a graveyard. I have in my hand the forty-third report of the Postmaster General of England, and what, Sir, do you suppose is the rate of interest paid in the post office banks in England?

Mr. BEATTIE. I rise to a point of order. There is liquor being drunk in the House by members, and there are members interrupting the speaker, who appear to be intoxicated. That, I say, is out of order.

Mr. FRASER (in the Chair). I am new to this position, but it seems to me that the hon. member who has raised the point of order is bound to name the person to whom he refers.

Mr. DAVIN. There he is, Sir, on your right hand.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. DAVIN. I believe it is the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) to whom my hon. friend refers. However, I do not know whether, under the influence of beer, he is much worse than when in his sober senses. It will be hard to make him much worse than he naturally is. I was proceeding to point out the rate of interest paid to depositors in the Government savings banks of England. A rate of 2½ per cent interest is paid them, as you may see by page 14 of the forty-third report. I am sorry the Finance Minister has gone because I intended this for his benefit. He argued that the rate of interest in the post office banks should be lowered in order to correspond with the rates paid by the chartered banks and the average rate of interest paid in the country. Well, in the North-west, the interest which people have to pay on very good paper is 10 per cent. I believe it is 8 per cent in Manitoba, and if it will interest any person to know, although my paper, I do not suppose is gilt-edged, I have always in the North-west been able to discount it at 8 per cent. I suppose they took my character as eking out my meagre balance, but the fact is that where other persons had to pay 10 per cent, I always could discount at 8 per cent. When you go east, you pay 6 per cent and 5 per cent. Let me call attention to the monthly summary of finance and commerce of the United States which I hold in my hand. It gives the rates of interest in New York and London. In 1898 the rate of interest in London was as low as 2 per cent. In the months of January and February, and in the previous September and October it was 2½ and 2 per cent. So that in England, the Government savings banks paid 2½ per cent on deposits, when the average rate in the chartered banks was 2 per cent. Yet the hon. Minister of Finance, shedding crocodile tears about the bankers and financial men and the inner circle and gilt-edged paper, told us that it was to provide a safe place of deposit that the post office savings banks were inaugurated.

Mr. DAVIN.

He told us that it was for safe keeping that the saving banks were inaugurated. That was unpardonable ignorance—for I will not accuse him of more than ignorance. He is a journalist by profession, he has been an editor of a paper and now occupies a great position in the Government. And yet he is so ignorant of the history of England and of Canada that he is not aware that in 1861, when Mr. Gladstone established the savings banks, he stated emphatically that it was to encourage thrift. And if the hon. gentleman goes back to the establishment of these banks here in Canada, he will find that the men who occupied seats on the Treasury benches at that time had hearts far different from those of himself and his colleagues. I have here the Life of a Postmaster General of England, Henry Fawcett. We read at page 439 of that life :

Fawcett was more profoundly interested in the various institutions by which the post office endeavours to—

To do what, guard their money for them? No, Sir——to stimulate thrift. In his first year of office, he took up the question of the Post Office Savings Bank. They had been in action since 1861, when Mr. Gladstone had introduced a measure embodying the scheme suggested by Mr. (now Sir W. C.) Sikes and Mr. Chetwynd, of the post office. The measure was signally successful. The Post Office Savings Bank thrived and became more popular than their old-fashioned rivals, the trustee Savings Bank. A considerable deficiency meanwhile had arisen in the old banks, owing to the fact that too high rates of interests had been allowed on the deposit. * * * * In his report of 1884, Fawcett gives some information which he had collected to show the needlessness of the jealousy which had been aroused.

That was the same jealousy as here. Fawcett would not yield to the chartered banks; Gladstone would not yield to the jealousy of the banks; but our Finance Minister makes himself their humble servant and dog Tray, ready to fetch and carry for them.

He pointed out that in Cambridgeshire, a population of 190,000, had only ten places provided with a bank, whereas there were forty-seven towns provided with a post office savings bank. He inferred that the post office banks might attract savings, where private enterprise would not offer the necessary facilities.

And, Sir, do we not know that the man who wears a corduroy coat and has the soil of his day's labour upon him does not want to go into the grand private bank with the fine brass fittings and to rub shoulders with millionaires and high officials and Ministers of State and the acolytes and emissaries and mandatories of Ministers of State. He likes to go into a little savings bank where he knows the postmaster and where he can feel that he is putting his little savings into an institution that belongs to him. But what is the analysis of these deposits? I forgot to give that. An analysis of the figures shows that 87 per cent of the deposits at this moment are under $500, 8 per cent between $500 and a $1,000, and 5 per cent only over $1,000. Now, I give these facts, and they are unanswerable facts, and if you give me an opportunity I will demonstrate that 50 per cent of the accounts amount to less than $100. So much for the attempt to make this sage means whereby the great leaders of the Conservative party meant to encourage thrift in this country, following in the wake of the wise and noble men in England, who had founded these institutions an attempt not a help to the poor but to make the savings banks a darkey engine for the financial and speculative, and so much for the position of this Government with regard to it. On page 431 of this Life of Fawcett you will find something which I wish we could imitate here.

He described, however, a scheme which had been suggested to him by the late Mr. Chetwynd, Receiver and Accountant General of the Post Office. It had been fully worked out, and Fawcett resolved to try it as a mode of meeting the various difficulties which had arisen. This is the now familiar scheme of "stamp slip deposits," which would have rejoiced the heart of Benjamin Franklin. Bank slips issued at every post office may be filled up with twelve stamps and will then be received at the savings bank as a shilling deposit. The plan was first tried in certain selected districts in September, 1880, and succeeded so rapidly that on November 15, Fawcett decided to extend it to the whole country. By the end of March, 1881, 576,560 slips had been received and now 223,000 new accounts were estimated to have been opened in consequence. In his report of 1882, Fawcett states that the daily average of receipts was 2,481. In 1884, he remarks upon the great increase in the number of children who are depositors. In four years the total number of depositors had increased by a million, of whom not less than a quarter were young persons. By thus encouraging the habits of saving in early life, the post office, he remarks, is probably doing more to assist than to retard private enterprise. The clauses for investment contributed to the popularity of the savings banks. The total amount invested in Government stocks at the end of the financial year, March 31, 1884, was £1,519,983 held by 20,767 persons.

How completely that answers the statement of the Finance Minister that it was only for safe keeping that these banks were established. The scope, the object, the aim was thrift. These wise statesmen saw that, even if the Government gave to its poor depositors a slight advance on what the banks gave, it did not interfere with the banks or lower the rate of discount, as proven unmistakably by Fawcett, and it encouraged habits of thrift and gave to the community a solidarity and force that it could not otherwise acquire. You will, remember, Sir—I thought for the moment that I was addressing your predecessor (Mr. Deputy Speaker) in the Chair, who belongs to the great French race. But you (Mr. Fraser, Guysborough) are a reading man and will recollect how when France was beaten by Germany and a most overwhelming indemnity, an indemnity of milliards was exacted by the conqueror, in a short time France rose to the occasion and paid off the indebtedness. And how did she do it? By calling out the thrifty hoardings of her peasants and labouring class whom she had encouraged to thrift by means not unlike those I have described as taking place in England to encourage thrift even, paying them a higher rate of interest than the banks would pay. But it seems we have got into a different rut, are under a different regime and have different men to deal with. Fawcett, in the management of the post office was full of schemes for the purpose I have described to you, and he was eminently successful.

Now, Sir, I am very sorry indeed that the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) has gone. I am sorry the Minister of Finance has left the Chamber, because I want to refer to a feature of his Budget speech. It is a most peculiar thing, because he gives you an Imperial reason for legislation in this Chamber. This is the great statesman who is now Minister of Finance, because we have not only the most wonderful crew we ever had in Ottawa, but we have also the greatest statesmen that have ever sat on the Treasury benches. Never was Ottawa so gay as it is now, with balls, parties and dinners. Some hon. gentlemen, when they come in here, after their revelings and junketings, remind me of a senator in Washington, who, before he went there, was a member of a church, and he used to scorn the waste of time at social entertainments. A friend who used to see him with his shirt front all exposed, like a vast plain of snow, after these junketings, and dancings, and terpsichorean exercises, used to say of him: "What an extraordinary man he is, what a change has come over him since he went to Washington; the society at Washington has completely bedevilled him. Formerly, he did not care very much how often he changed his linen, but now he is the shirtiest man in all Washington." So, we have amongst the supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite some of the shirtiest men in all Canada. Now, this is what that great statesman who was described by the organ of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) as a cross between a white-linen draper and an inspired alderman. This is what the hon. gentleman said:

Whether we are successful in doing so or not, one thing is certain, namely, that the present condition of the West Indies and the Canadian West India trade demands that some effort should be made on these lines, and we think the best gift we can make to the people of the West Indies is to say: We will give you the benefit of our preferential tariff, without bargain or anything else, and we do not expect you to make any very great concessions to us; but if any means can be devised whereby obstacles to Canadian trade can be removed in that quarter, we have no doubt that you, our brother colonists, will meet us in the same spirit as we desire to meet you.

Mr. DAVIN.

Now, there we have an Imperial reason given for an Act in this colonial Parliament, and it raises the question whether the Imperial Parliament under which we live, has done its duty in the premises. It is a curious thing, that, while Mr. Chamberlain had made it perfectly clear that he intended to do the proper thing, and put on a countervailing duty to help our West Indian colonies and to meet the bounty system on the continent, a very narrow politician, one of those men without breadth or originality, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, has had the best of it, evidently, in the Cabinet in this matter over Mr. Chamberlain, and he has turned Mr. Chamberlain down. Now, when the Minister of Finance was over in England, he had a conversation with Mr. Chamberlain, and he heard what Mr. Chamberlain intended to do. Then he thought he could see a way out of the difficulty and a danger which confronted him in his own province. After the Minister of Finance went to Halifax, leaving behind him his tariff of 1897, none were so poor as to do him reverence. Not a soul called on him, not a soul invited him to dinner; he had offended the West Indian merchants in Halifax, to whom he had made promises concerning sugar, and they would have nothing to do with him. When they did see him on the street they gave him a bit of their mind. Here was the Minister of Finance of a powerful Government, with all these budding honours on him, going back to the city where he had conducted a great paper, and not a soul, not one of those leading men, would look at him. Ah, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the Minister of Finance has come in. Now, when the Minister of Finance had this conversation with Mr. Chamberlain, it occurred to him that he saw a way by which he could accomplish what he desired for his West Indian friends in Halifax, and at the same time sugar-coat the pill of raising more money by sugar for his colleagues, and, as his so-called preferential clause had such vogue in England, he thought that a second edition of it might go very well, and, no doubt, it took the fancy of the Prime Minister the moment he suggested it to him. So, we have this most extraordinary thing, because I could easily demonstrate that it will not do the West Indian colonies very much good. But I will tell you what it will do. Raising the duty on sugar will do what is perfectly consistent for the men now in power, it will be one other act by which they swallow all their professions. For, if there was one thing they were loud, and long, and eloquent, about, it was this, that they would not tax the sugar of the poor man. Now, they tax it.

Sir, you remember the story told by the Puritan divine, how a great Israelitish warrior met Elisha, and the man of God looked at him and wept—not those tearless tears, which I attributed to the Finance Minister a few moments ago—the tears streaming down his rugged cheeks. And the warrior said to him: Why doth the prophet weep? Elisha said: I fear what thou wilt bring on the people, thou wilt destroy their kings, their warriors, their women, and even their children will not be spared. The captain said to Elisha: Is thy servant a dog to do this thing? But the Puritan divine said: The dog did it after all. So might the Finance Minister say: Is thy servant a dog to do this thing, to impose higher duties on sugar? But the dog did it after all. It was a cardinal plank in the Liberal platform that they would not tax sugar, but they have taxed it, and have come forward with a petty excuse that it is to help the West India colony. I wish to say a few words to form an imperial standpoint, for I hope my words will go across the Atlantic.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. They have been heard there before, and their echo will be heard again. I am going to show how the only argument against Mr. Chamberlain's original proposal can be disposed of. I do not ask mockers to pay attention, but I ask the attention of the statesmen and those who aspire to be statesmen, to the subject of the sugar duties. In 1874, I remember it well, Sir Stafford Northcote had a surplus of $30,000,000, and of course he asked what he had to do with it. That chancellor of the Exchequer, imitating Mr. Gladstone, thought of Mr. Gladstone's method of reducing taxation; and I must say this, that often the best thing a Finance Minister could do with a surplus, and Sir Stafford Northcote should have done it, was to apply it to the reduction of the national debt.

Mr. BENNETT. Could he not have bought a Drummond County Railway?

Mr. DAVIN. Sir Stafford Northcote was not a man of that sort. One of the things he determined to do was to reduce the duty on sugar. At that time there were in Scotland and England flourishing refineries. The duties on sugar were from 2s. to 2s. 10d., or 48 cents and 68 cents per 100 pounds, according to quality, and on refined sugar 72 cents per 100 pounds. At that time the British imports of sugar were as follows:—Sugar from British colonies, 245,000 tons; sugar from foreign countries, 335,000 tons; beet sugar, 125,000 tons; refined sugar from foreign countries, 146,000 tons, or an aggregate importation of 831,500 tons. Cane sugar was at that time imported in the raw state, principally from British West Indies, Cuba and the East Indies, and refined in England and Scotland. But the bounty system began to work its evil effects on the continent. Let me say here in regard to a man who in some respects was the greatest parliamentarian ever sat in any Parliament, that great and astonishing as were his marvellous powers of verbal resource and facility and fertility of expression, William Ewart Gladstone had not the logical faculty, and in his whole career, and this is true of nine statesmen out of ten in England and Canada, you will not find a new idea. He was, as Disraeli said of his great leader, Robert Peel, a burglar of other men's ideas; and having sat at the feet of Adam Smith, he thought only of carrying out the ideas of Adam Smith, without regard to the conditions that were before the minds of that author when he laid down the propositions contained in his great work. Sir Stafford Northcote, who was secretary to Mr. Gladstone at one time, was a most estimable and honourable man, but was essentially a mediocre man, and was not able to cope with the situation; and those bounties, which violated every doctrine of political economy, and were an offence to political economists, were accepted by free traders, who were prepared to say, let this device work its way and give the people cheap sugar, not thinking that the refiners were being ruined by it, just as Mr. Gladstone took the duty off silk in order that fine ladies might obtain cheap silken gowns, and left Coventry with scarcely a factory running, as silent as a city of the dead and scarcely a single thread to weave in it. That was the result of following Adam Smith's doctrine. England could not impose countervailing duties. I do not think, under present treaties, England could tax continental beet directly, and that is no doubt where a point was made against the policy enunciated by Mr. Chamberlain. I will show, however, how the difficulty could be surmounted. A classification could be adopted without infringing treaties. Let raw cane sugar pay a stipulated duty, raw beet the same, plus the continental bounty, and manufactured beet plus the additional bounty again. Then let the rate be fixed to bring in the amount received from tea, and abolish the duty on that commodity; because the chief argument against Mr. Chamberlain's proposal is that you tax food. Tea is as much food as sugar. They get from tea $18,000,000, speak roughly, and they can give that back. That is the way I would meet and overcome the difficulty. But to speak more particularly in regard to the matter, I find there are ninety pounds per capita of sugar used in England per annum. This quantity is not used individually, because the breweries consume 114,000 tons.

Then a small amount is used by the confectioners, so that fully one-third is used up in that way, leaving about 60 pounds per capita used by individuals. There is only six pounds of tea used per capita. As I say, give them the duty on tea, which makes up $18,750,000. For the year ending 31st December, 1896, there was imported into the United Kingdom 385,000 tons of cane sugar, 400,000 tons of raw beet and 740,000 tons of refined. Look how that import has gone up. Of refined beet in 1874, there were only 126,000 tons imported. Remember tons; multiply that by 2,240 and you will see the number of pounds. It is a very difficult thing to get at the average rate of bounty, but so far as it can be made out, the exporting countries of Germany and France, pay about 30 cents per cwt. on the raw beet and 42 cents per cwt. on the refined. Take the 385,000 tons of cane sugar at 36 cents per cwt., and you get $2,722,000; and take the 400,000 tons of raw beet at 36 cents per cwt., plus 30 cents the amount of bounty, and you get 66 cents per cwt., or $5,280,000. On the 740,000 tons of refined beet at 36 cents, plus 42 cents, you get 78 cents per cwt. or $11,544,000. You get in all $19,596,000. You give them the tea free and you put a duty on the sugar and you get rid entirely of the argument. Sugar is an article used more by the rich than by the poor. Excepting those families that use alcohol, tea is the great stimulant of the poor all over England, but for the rich there are light wines and various stimulating drinks and the rich do not use tea as much as the poor. The rich use sugar in various ways, much more so than the poor, so that this would be a poor man's policy and in another way it would confer a great benefit on the people. The only harm in tea is that when you allow it to be overdrawn, the tannin is brought out of it and it becomes injurious. If you draw it for five minutes or so, you get the pure liquor, and the result of this policy would be that while there would be more tea bought there would not be more of the liquor drunk. It would be the pure liquor of the tea and not the tannin that would be used, and in this way such a policy would have great advantages to the health of the English people. Once more let me show the havoc which has been wrought in that trade amongst the refiners. In 1874 there was imported cane from the British possessions 245,000 tons as against 155,000 tons in 1896. There were imported from foreign countries in 1874, 335,000 tons as against 230,000 tons in 1896. There was imported from foreign countries 125,000 tons of raw beet in 1874, as against 400,000 tons in 1896, and there was imported of refined beet from foreign countries 126,500 tons in 1874 as against 740,000 in 1896. The aggregate amount in 1874 was 831,500 tons as against 1,525,000 tons in 1896. This shows what havoc has been wrought amongst the refiners in England and Scotland. I say here, that if the British sugar-growing colonies could be helped by countervailing duties, you would not only be helping them by taking the course I suggest, but you would be helping to deal a deathblow to the bounty system on the European continent. The moment it would be seen that the bounty was going into the pockets, not of the manufacturers in Germany or France, but into the pockets of the English exchequer, that moment you would find they would think twice before they would adhere to the bounty system. Now, Sir, that I am not wrong in my surmises as to what took place in England, I have here the "Saturday Review," of the 19th of March, and it says:

It is currently supposed that in matters colonial Mr. Chamberlain has pretty well his own way; his sugar speech on Monday last goes far to weaken any such supposition. That the man who, less than two years ago, made bold and enthusiastic declarations in favour of a Customs Union, proclaiming loudly his contempt for the timid politicians and model-headed economists who feared to put duties on imports, should be running away, as he is now doing, from the harmless, necessary countervailing duties on bounty-fed sugar is fair presumptive evidence that Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's voice is as potent in the Cabinet as the Colonial Secretary. The spectacle is rather pitiful. With swelling breath Mr. Chamberlain declared that he would never desert the West Indies, while all the time he was conscious of his own fearfulness or inability to bring forth the only just and satisfactory measure for the relief of the West Indies.

That mysterious remedy which he hinted at in the Liverpool speech, which threw us into sceptical wonderment has now been disclosed in the House of Commons. It is a poor thing. Reciprocity with America is its name. How will it set the colonial staple industry on its legs again? Already America is the West Indies' best customer, now that the mother country has abandoned itself to the German beet stuff, and it is not in the least likely that the United States will take more of the West Indian sugar because of any reciprocity arrangements. As a matter, as a serious fact, they will take less than that in future; for they also are going in heavily for cultivating sugar themselves. The United States are the last market which the West Indies can look to for the future sale of their sugar. Instead, they will ere long have to face severe competition from the United States, both in America and in England as well, unless England adopts a preferential tariff.

You know very well, Mr. Speaker, that this journal is considered one of the most enlightened in the Empire, and certainly for a long time—and I doubt if it has changed its opinion—it was a devoted disciple of the financial and economic principles of Adam Smith; but yet, the logic of events has brought them to see that the time has come when they must break away from the pedantry of free trade, and do something for Great Britain and her colonies. I have here what is called the Jubilee Report of Mr. Chamberlain, and it contains statements from all the colonies, including one from the Minister of Trade and Commerce of Canada. In reading these reports you come to the conclusion that the trade along the whole line is slipping away from England, and I shall read the comments of that most enlightened man who edits the "Pall Mall Gazette." I think it is still Mr. Greenwood, and if it is, I know him, because he at one time was editor of a paper of which I was one of the staff, and he is a thoroughly enlightened man. He says:

According to this journal, the Dingley tariff ought to incite Great Britain to perfect the scheme for preferential trade within the Empire.

I am reading this for the behoof of the Finance Minister. We remember how he told us that the time was distant when England would entertain preferential trade, if at all; and yet we find the "Saturday Review" attributing to Mr. Chamberlain the views we know he had and expressed. And here we have the "Pall Mall Gazette" advocating preferential trade, as follows:—

The other lesson taught is the need of cementing and furthering trade relations within the Empire. The United States have made it plain that they intend as far as possible to be a self-contained commercial unit. Other nations are following the same path. Let England—Greater England—do likewise. Let her federate her magnificent Empire in a customs union, and she can afford to go her own way, heedless of the tariff walls which other countries build around their borders. Whether we like it or not, it is a fact that in the future we shall have to look to the colonies, and not to foreign countries, for extended trade, and seeing how great are the prospects of growth in the colonies, commercial as well as patriotic considerations must incline us to regard the prospect with pleasure. At the same time we have no guarantee that even those markets will be ours. Mr. Chamberlain's Jubilee Blue-book demonstrated that the foreigner was steadily and in some cases swiftly creeping into the markets of Greater England. Yet we can stop the encroachment. It can be done to some extent by the adoption of better business methods on the part of our own manufacturers and merchants, but only completely by the founding of a customs union for preferential trade with the Empire.

And yet we are told here that there is no movement whatever in England in favour of preferential trade. Sir, was it the way to get preferential trade, to go over to England, and when it is mentioned to flout it? Is it the way to get preferential trade when we give a preference like this, not to say one word about getting any advantages in the mother country—the first step in the right direction; but to say to them, "We give it to you as a free gift, but we will be very glad if you will do anything for us out of gratitude." That, I think, is poor statesmanship, and I would be very glad if any argument I have used to-night would get these gentlemen out of that rut.

Now, the Minister of Trade and Commerce made an extraordinary appeal to us on this side of the House when the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) was moving the adjournment of the House. He appealed to us to ring down the curtain as quickly as possible upon the miserable play; he said, as it were, the Government was a spectacle for gods and men, and he appealed to us for heaven's sake to ring down the curtain: "I feel uneasy; do not suppose that my position is a pleasant one; I do not like the task of defending all the petty—I suppose I cannot say villainies—of their conduct, and throw the fading skirts of my vanishing respectability over their nakedness; I do not want to have to do that;" and with a naivety that was refreshing, the hon. gentleman appealed to us to close the debate as quickly as possible. But, Sir, we cannot do that. We have a duty as an Opposition to perform—to expose any blunder that this Government may commit; to show the weaknesses in any measure they propose. As Lord Randolph Churchill said, the duty of an Opposition is to oppose. Our duty is to show where their measures fail, and if possible to keep them in the right track. But there is another duty on our part which dwarfs completely the duty I have described; and that duty is to hold up in all its hideousness before the people of Canada the fearful betrayal of the people's interests and their own opinions made by these gentlemen in power. Let them not suppose that we will allow the people of Canada to forget their words. Let them not suppose that if—

A marcfiful Providence fashioned them holler
A purpose that they might their principles swallow.

—that we will not show the people how hollow all their professions were in the past, or how unworthy they are of the seats they occupy. The Minister of Public Works has denied in a sort of way the charges of boodling. There are some men that you cannot touch but they reek all over with boodle. Some things may be perfectly certain that you do not see. Now, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is a reading man, and I know he is a great student of Shakspeare. He will have some reminiscences of his Trinity College days, and I suppose he used to dip into Aeschylus. Well, the scene in "Macbeth," when Duncan is being murdered, and Lady Macbeth feels all the horror of the crime, is supposed by many critics to be the greatest scene in all dramatic literature to inspire horror. But there is a scene that dwarfs the scene in Macbeth; and that is the scene in "Agamemnon." Just after Agamemnon has come back to Mycænae, and has gone into the palace, Cassandra, seated in the chariot at the gate, cries out, "blood, blood," and she smells the blood, and says the cow is striking the bull—

Mr. FLINT. No, she said "ber-lud."

Mr. DAVIN. This is not for you; it is for the classical members of the party. I can recognize a gentleman who has only had a dragged-up culture; but I am not speaking to him, I am speaking to the scholars on the other side. She is perfectly certain of the deed taking place in the palace; she is perfectly assured of what that deed is, although she does not see it. And so, since this Government has come into power, we have seen evidences of corruption. First, it was vermicularly small—business is business; but the worm grew to be a serpent, and the serpent swelled into a python; and there it rises and grows and swells, and is pouring out of malign jaws the slaver of corruption all over Canada. The Minister of Trade and Commerce need not make any admisericordiam appeals to us, for if we have to make any exposures, it is our duty to do so. Was there a profession made by them like their profession of adherence to the independence of Parliament? We all remember what denunciations we had from the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) against a party that could tolerate any one of its supporters holding a seat in this House and at the same time having a promise of place in his pocket. But these gentlemen had hardly got into office, when we had Mr. Langelier, whom we used to regard as a Simon Pure, sitting here with the promise of a lieutenant-governorship from the Prime Minister in his pocket. And we have other members, with promises of lieutenant-governorships and judgeships, sitting in this House to-day, supporting the Government, and these hon. gentlemen, who were wont to so vigorously denounce such abuses, are now like the dumb dogs of Jupiter—they cannot bark.

I am sorry that that dulcet-voiced gentleman, the Minister of Customs (Mr. Pater-son), is not here, for I love to hear him.

Mr. COWAN. He is here.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, I see he is asleep. He is turning his face to the wall. Absit omen, again. What is the omen of a street re-baptized "Laurier," which leads to a graveyard, compared with the omen of a gentleman holding so high a position as the hon. Minister of Customs turning his face to the wall? We know that that is a sign of death—the death I mean, of course, of the Government.

The hon. Minister of Customs, trying to meet a statement which I made, concerning the Massey-Harris Company, quoted how many implements had come in during the last year, and he made a very peculiar argument, for a free trader. He said:

If the manufacturers had come and said to the Finance Minister. We want you to look at these figures taken from your own trade returns. What are they? he would say. They would answer: We beg to point out to you that in the year 1896, in the six months ending 31st December, 372 harvesters of a value of $37,071 were imported into Manitoba and the North-west Territories, to say nothing of the rest of the Dominion, while for the corresponding six months of the three next years, in which we have worked under a tariff reduced by you from 35 per cent to 20 per cent, there has been a marked increase. In 1895, for the corresponding six months, the number of harvesters imported into Manitoba and the North-west alone was 760, in 1896, it was 803, while for the six months ending 31st December, 1897, the number of harvesters imported into Manitoba and the North-west alone was 1,432, representing a value of $144,289.

Mr. DAVIN.

The hon. gentleman is, not only literally, but figuratively asleep, because the North-west has made great progress, and that number of harvesters would be but a mere flea-bite compared with what they use. In one town, Indian Head, the agent of the Massey-Harris Company, Mr. Van Patten, told me a few months ago that they had sold $50,000 worth in that one little place of the large implements this year. Apply that to all Manitoba and the North-west, and you will find that the number thus imported was only a flea-bite. But who was making that argument? It was a good free trader, who used to denounce protective duties, and who was one of the loudest denouncers in 1892 and 1886 of the increased duty on sugar. I have here a letter from the Massey-Harris Company, the whole of which I will not read, but in which they say, writing to the Mayor of Toronto, and wanting, I suppose, a good site for their premises:

For some years, as is pretty generally known, our company has had a steadily growing foreign trade. We have expended a very large amount of capital and energy in recent years to get our European business established, and, as a result, are now receiving very large orders from our London, England, office.

I remember telling you, Mr. Speaker, at a previous period, that they were doing a large business in Australia, and they now tell us that they are doing a large business in Europe. I am glad to see that our policy has brought them to that position, just as it has brought this country to the position it now occupies, and for which these hon. gentlemen have the effrontery to claim credit. But this shows how completely the fact that I have given with regard to Indian Head is an answer to the statement made by my hon. friend. Practically, only very few came in, and my own belief is, that, if you were to take away the duty altogether, so excellent are the machines that the Massey-Harris Company are making—because they have been making them for a quarter of a century and have brought to such perfection that they can compete with McCormack or any other competitors in any market of the world—they would still hold their own against the foreign article.

I wish to say a few words with regard to that precious feature of the tariff which shows—if I may use an inelegant expression, though I hate to be inelegant, in case I might shock the fine and delicate nerves of some hon. gentlemen opposite—that in this portion of the Budget the hon. Postmaster General has had his paw. I refer to the tax on newspapers. I propose to speak only for the North-west papers. There is not a paper in Moosomin, Indian Head or any prominent town of the North-west Territories that does not circulate further than 10 miles, and five or ten dollars will hit these little papers very hard. They have a hard struggle as it is, and, as the hon. leader of the Opposition has said, you can do a community no greater harm than to strike at its newspaper, because the newspapers, small and great, in this country have been brought to such excellence that, if a man were to take such a newspaper, for instance, as the "Mail," or St. John "Sun," and read it carefully, and use Webster's Dictionary, when necessary, and look up the geographical references, and occasionally aid his imperfect knowledge by reference to the encyclopedia, at the end of six or seven years he would be an educated man, with a good knowledge of politics, contemporaries, history and a large amount of mental discipline. I regard that tax as a small and petty thing, but, of course, I do not, for a moment, place it side by side with the reduction in the rate of interest on deposits, or with this miserable make-shift policy, devised solely to square the Finance Minister with the West Indian merchants in Halifax, by taking $500,000 out of the pockets of the poor sugar-eaters, in order to stand well with Mr. Jones and others in Halifax, and then coating the pill in order to make his leader, colleague, guide, philosopher and friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, swallow it without a wry face. I notice, that the day it was propounded, the Minister of Trade and Commerce came in, looking unusually pale, and I knew that the pill had disagreed with him, even though it was coated. But the real reason is, as I have said, an electioneering one. To make himself square with these powerful men in Halifax, $500,000 is to be taken at the breakfast table out of the poor people of this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a good deal more to say, but it is growing late, I think.

An hon. MEMBER. Go on.

Mr. DAVIN. The night is young. For my part I never speak to "Hansard," I always put my arguments as tersely as I possibly can, because my main object is to carry conviction, to make as many converts as possible. For, I may say, I do not entirely despair of all the hon. gentlemen opposite. Some of them are very young, they have only been in the House for twenty months, and, as members of Parliament, might be called fledglings.

Mr. McMULLEN. They have been here long enough to measure you up.

Mr. DAVIN. They might be here for a hundred years and not measure my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) for it would be impossible to measure the height and depth and length and breadth of the political meanness embodied in his carcass.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. member is not nearly so deep.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Reply to that.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not want my hon. friend to reply to me. He has the advantage of me. He can see a good deal more than I can just now.

Mr. Speaker, this Budget has gone forth to the country. It has been criticised with great ability from this side of the House. Its weaknesses are patent. It is an attempt to befool the people. But that attempt will fail, and it will be known as one more of the many acts of this Government, in the brief time they have been in office which marks them as at once incompetent as disingenuous and dishonest.

Mr. ROCHE. I regret that I am obliged at this hour in the morning to undertake the delivery of a two hours' speech—more or less. Still, I am compelled to do so by the stubbornness of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. WALLACE. I would suggest that the hon. leader of the House (Sir Richard Cartwright) consider the question of adjournment.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that I cannot accept the motion for adjournment. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) and also the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), who are supposed to represent the Opposition, respectively and together assured me that they would agree to the closing of the debate to-night. And the leading Whip of the party, as the hon. gentleman knows, corroborated that statement. Now, I would say to my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) that I have never before known an agreement of that kind entered into by the leaders of the party, to be utterly repudiated. It is not an affront to us, but an affront to them. I am very sorry that neither of them saw fit to remain here in order to explain the situation to their friends. I must say to hon. gentlemen opposite that they would show more reasonable respect to their leaders and also to the usages which have always prevailed in this House, if they would bring the debate as agreed to, to a close. Of course, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Roche) desires to deliver himself of speech, we will remain here and listen to him. But I think we must carry the thing through to-night. There is an end to all possible arrangements unless we live up to these we make. I may remind the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) that contrary to the usual practice, we gave two whole days, Tuesday and Wednesday of last week in order to oblige the leader of the Opposition, in view of the indisposition of the ex-Minister of Finance. I think that that conduct on our part might be met with some better return than this.

Mr. ROCHE. I thank the Minister of Trade and Commerce for expressing his intention of stopping here and listening to my speech. But I feel confident that I am expressing the idea of every member on this side when I declare that I do not think it at all necessary for that hon. gentleman to lecture hon. members on this side on the duties we owe to our leaders. We owe a duty to our leaders, but we owe a duty also to our constituents, and I propose to discharge that duty, even though I take up a few minutes more of the hon. gentleman's time, and though I, like the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, would like to be in my bed. And while I shall cut my remarks as short as possible, I think that even if this debate went on for another twenty-four hours it would be as short a budget debate as ever was known in this House. It is usual not to end the budget debate in less than a week to two weeks. We have not yet been a week upon it. Instead of drawing it to a premature conclusion, members who make up their minds to say something should have time afforded to them to express their opinions. To say that the budget speech of the hon. Minister of Finance, delivered on the 5th April was the tamest affair of the kind, both in matter, and manner of delivery, as well as in its reception by even the Government supporters, is to put it very mildly. And were it not for the revival of trade that has taken place in Canada in common with every other country in the universe, a revival which by the way had been predicted by the ex-Finance Minister, the hon. member for York, before he left office, which prediction was met with the usual amount of scepticism by our Liberal friends, were it not, I say, for that fact, the Budget speech of this year would have been devoid of almost a single feature of interest either to this House or to the country at large. The only portion of it that seemed to infuse even a moderate amount of enthusiasm into the hon. gentleman's supporters was the type-written peroration, the delivery of which caused a sardonic smile to pass over the features of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, though I must admit the Finance Minister read it very nicely. Had any of the Government's political opponents predicted two short years ago that within so short a period the leaders of the great Liberal party, with the responsibilities of office on their shoulders, would go back so thoroughly on their old-time traditions of the past, would relegate to the back-ground their theoretical professions of free trade which they have preached throughout the length and breadth of Canada for the past twenty years, would turn so complete a summer-sault not only on the trade question, but on almost every other question of public policy, he would have been laughed to scorn by the Liberal party as being a person "non compos mentis."

It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that a great sense of disappointment and chagrin should pervade the ranks of the Government supporters because of the falling from grace of those whom they had been taught to look up to as the prospective saviours of their country, as master hands in statescraft, honest, upright and consistent, who were imbued with so fine a sense of political morality as to make it impossible for them to preach one code or doctrine to-day and practise a diametrically opposite one to-morrow. I say, therefore, that under the circumstances it is quite excusable on the part of the Government supporters to display the amount of apathy which they did during the delivery of the Budget speech of the Finance Minister, though party fealty will not permit them to do their duty to their constituents by denouncing from their places in this House the deception which had been practised on the electors by those political friends of theirs in authority, who to judge them in the light of their post-election performances, had utilized any and every cry to cajole and hoodwink the people for the sole purpose of gaining the Treasury benches. Those hon. gentlemen had become so inured to the cold shades of Opposition for so many years, that on each successive occasion that the people were appealed to for their verdict, they as a party became more and more reckless in their charges, more profuse in their pledges, more fickle in their ideas of political economy, and more determined to gain the ascendancy by hook or by crook, that having at last gulled the people in sufficient number to gain their point and being brought face to face with all those past professions, they may well recoil from their self-imposed task and thus stamp themselves as designing and unscrupulous politicians. While we rejoice to know that even at the eleventh hour our opponents have seen the error of their ways, and have become converts from the advocacy of that policy which had it been put into operation would have resulted disastrously to the best interests of this country, still it would be beyond human nature to expect us to condone the offence committed against the public by the Liberal party in having obtained the support of the electors under false pretences, by making pledges which they never intended to fulfil, by posing as political moralists while at the same time they were political hypocrites, by wrapping themselves in a mantle of superior virtue and expressing thanks that they were not as other men, while their moral stamina in the political line was rotten at its foundation. It would, I say, be too much to expect us to excuse the duplicity which our righteously indignant electors now see was practised upon them by a desperate party in their endeavours to secure the loaves and fishes. And still we find some of those hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches true to their past record in blowing hot and cold in the same breath, even at the present time, preaching free trade while practising protection, and thus trying to pander to both elements, but thus far the free traders have had to content themselves with the shadow while their opponents obtained the substance, and it is but paying a poor compliment to the intelligence of the people if the Government imagines that after the experience of the past those electors will be satisfied with vain promises and empty professions. No party of men who ever had charge of the political affairs of this country have in so short a time become so utterly discredited as have the political pirates who now misgovern the country, except the same party during the years between 1873 and 1878. And as the people of Canada at the first opportunity in 1878, meted out deserved punishment to those in power, so I venture to say will history repeat itself and a similar verdict be pronounced by the great electorate on the very first occasion the Government affords the opportunity. It would be amusing were it not so absurd to hear some of those hon. gentlemen trying to square themselves with their promises, attempting to convince this House that they have kept their plighted faith with the electors, when as a matter of fact there is scarcely a beneficial feature of their policy that they have not stolen from their political opponents, and scarcely a principle which they have adopted that did not formerly meet with their condemnation. Why, Sir, who does not remember the ridicule that was heaped on the tariff commission appointed by the Conservative Government, by the Liberal Opposition at that time, who declared that such a commission was entirely unnecessary, that all the facts and the iniquities, as they were pleased to term them, incident to a protective policy were already well known and it was entirely superfluous and an unnecessary expense to have that roving commission travelling round the country for the purpose of gaining information to assist them in making a proper tariff revision. But what was one of the very first acts of the Liberal Government on this question? Not content with the evidence produced before the first commission, they, too, appointed a commission to travel from city to city and from town to town to learn something about that which they had declared they were already cognizant of. This act on the part of the Liberal Government constrained even that partizan organ supporting the Administration, the "Winnipeg Tribune," edited by the hon. member for Lisgar, to say the following:—

It would be unfair to prejudge the Dominion Government in the matter of tariff reform, but to those of us who have entertained a deep conviction that the advent to power of the Liberal party meant sweeping reductions in the tariff and the placing of a large number of important articles upon the free list, the action of the Government in sending a committee of its Cabinet about the country to take evidence as to the tariff has a rather disquieting effect. One would have thought that the leaders of the Liberal party knew enough about the tariff and its myriad of iniquities to effect a reformation without going to the manufacturers and say, in effect: Will you tell us just what you can stand in the way of reductions. It seems to us that while no harm may probably be done by the inquiry, it is not calculated to inspire the confidence of the people who felt confident that tariff reform of a sweeping character would follow in the wake of the advent to power of the Liberal Government. It may be that the Government will redeem the pledges made so profusely in the speeches of the Liberal leaders for the past five or ten years, as well as the promises contained in campaign literature. We can only await the meeting of the House next February when the Tariff Bill will doubtless be produced. There is no denying the fact, however that there is considerable uneasiness felt in many quarters that the Government will not go as far in the matter of reforming the tariff as the country had been led to expect that it would go if the Liberals were returned to power.

So that we find condemnation from a member of their own political household for Act No. 1 in connection with the Government method of tariff revision. And while on this question of commissions, I might just mention that it was the declared intention of the Prime Minister to effect a settlement of the Manitoba school question by means of a commission to investigate into all the facts and circumstances in connection with that question. He blamed the Government of Sir Charles Tupper for having acted with undue haste, without having a full knowledge of all the facts, and pledged himself that one of the first acts, if he were elected Prime Minister, would be to appoint a commission to obtain this necessary information, and on the strength of the report of that commission he would effect a settlement that would be satisfactory to everybody. Who ever heard of this promised commission having been appointed? If Parliament was not seized of all the information in the first instance, what further information did this Government obtain, and from whom was it obtained? Sir, that promise was made by the Prime Minister for the express purpose of deceiving the people. That question was kept open year after year by the provincial government, and made a political football to assist the Liberal party. Twice in provincial campaigns it had proved the salvation of that party; so, it was decided to play it for all it was worth in the Dominion election, and, having worked successfully on that occasion, the Premier was brought face to face with his promise of a commission to investigate, and as usual, went back on his promise. But, fearing it might act as a boomerang on the Liberal party, he and Mr. Greenway put their heads together and effected a settlement, not by keeping faith with the electors, but to suit political exigencies, and to-day we see Mr. Greenway conceding on the instalment plan that which he had refused to a Conservative Government. So, Mr. Speaker, commission promise No. 2 went by the board. Again, the Premier declared in the city of London, Ont., during the election campaign, that he was as ardent an advocate of preferential trade as Sir Charles Tupper, and pledged himself, that, if his party was returned to power, one of his first acts would be to send a commission over to England to negotiate with Lord Salisbury to obtain such a boon. We all know, Sir, how the promise of this third commission has been kept. Instead of advocating or trying to promote such a policy, he did everything in his power to kill preferential trade in the speeches he delivered while in England. Why, Sir, it has almost become an established fact now, that, if the people of this country desire to inform themselves as to the proposed policy of the Government on any particular thing, all they have to do is to obtain the pledge of the Prime Minister for a certain line of action, and they then make up their minds that a directly opposite policy will be adopted, so exceptional is the case that the hon. gentleman adheres to his pledges. The hon. Minister of Customs, in his explosion in this House the other evening, and since becoming a member of this House—I can readily understand how appropriately the hon. member has been named "Little Thunder," for what he lacks in force of argument, he makes up in lung force—he, in stentorian tones, enumerated the reductions that would take place in the duties on a number of articles under the preferential clause with Great Britain. Unfortunately for the Minister, though, his little bubble was pricked by the hon. member for West York, who showed how hollow were those pretensions and how insignificant was the amount of importations of many of those articles from England, the major portion of which came from the United States. The hon. Minister of Customs is a self-deceived man, if he really believes the assertion he made in the House, that there is a feeling of satisfaction in the country because of the confidence people had in the Government, and he loudly asserted, that the Ministry did not go out on strike, were loyal to each other, and were, in short, a happy family. Why, Sir, I have too much respect for the intelligence of the hon. gentleman to think that he has not observed abundant evidence to prove the contrary. What mean those articles in the Independent press, in the Liberal press, those murmurings, long and loud, from the Government supporters, those deputations innumerable who have visited the capital to seek redress, to obtain changes in the tariff to save them from ruin? And, while the Ministry preserves an outward semblance of unity it has not been all peace within. We could not expect those hon. gentlemen, after wandering in the wilderness for eighteen years, hungering after the spoils, to resign their positions, though disagreements were numerous and bickerings frequent. Self-interest compels those gentlemen to hang on to their seats at all hazard, though we may see resignations more frequent in the future, since the Bruneau episode. And still, methinks, we have heard of the Minister of the Interior leaving the Council board in the sulks on more than one occasion; of the endeavours made to knife the Minister of Railways in his own political household, and, as for the Minister of Public Works, he who runs may read, and he who reads cannot have failed to see the love which he has inspired in the breasts of his fellow-countrymen in Quebec, and the so-called harmony that exists in the clubs and Liberal associations of that province. What did "La Patrie" say, the organ of the Minister of Public Works, in discussing the defeat in the by-election for the Magdalen Islands of the Liberal candidate:

Those behind the scenes know the attitude of the Senate last session was due to certain persons who called themselves followers of the Laurier Cabinet, but would not hesitate at anything to destroy it. The Ministers have most complete proofs of intrigues which took place recently and which led Sir Mackenzie Bowell to believe he could precipitate a new appeal to the people, with a chance of a Conservative victory. We make these observations to put the Liberals on their guard against the acts of certain malcontents who are ready to adopt any pretext to sow disunion in our ranks.

On this same subject the Edmonton "Bulletin," the organ of the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), comments as follows:—

As in the case of the vote on the fast Atlantic service, several of the strongest and most bitterly partisan Liberals considered it necessary to oppose the Government, showing that the gulf between Opposition promises and Government performances must be very wide indeed when they could not jump across it, even to support the Government.

Again, we heard from the Huntingdon "Gleaner," one of the ablest Liberal papers in Quebec:

The session of Parliament which is about to end at Ottawa is not looked back upon with satisfaction either by the Liberals or by the electors generally. The new Government has failed to realize the expectations of those who placed it in their power in three regards: in the tariff, in not reducing the expenditure, and in granting of subsidies.

It deals at length with the derelictions of the Government under each of these three heads, and concludes:

We stand aghast at such a revival of a system we hoped was dead, and see nothing before the country save a continuance of high taxes, of deficits, and increases of the debt. It was not for this that the Liberals were chosen a year ago, and unless speedy change is made in their policy they will lose that independent support to which their success at the polls was due.

Even the Winnipeg "Tribune," edited by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), partisan organ as it is, was constrained to say as follows:—

Viewed from a western standpoint we must admit in perfect frankness that great disappointment exists owing to the failure of the Government to meet western expectations in the revision of the tariff.

Last but not least, we read in the Montreal "Witness," an organ that gives a very hearty support to the Government of the day, the following:—

The heavy extra expenditures carried through Parliament this session have been a subject of a good deal of jeering and jibing. In opposition the Liberals strongly objected to the growing tendency of Government to take all sorts of industries and projects under its wings and foster them with subsidies. They held that steamship lines, railways, manufacturing and other industries, as well as other commercial enterprises, should cease to be dependent upon the Government, and should be left to individuals and corporate enterprises founded upon a pure business basis. That was the theory and policy of the Liberals in Opposition, and yet this session, with a Liberal Government in power, new and costly lines of railway have been heavily subsidized, new steamship lines have been given large annual grants, cold storage warehouses and transportations have been undertaken at a considerable cost, increased expenditures upon canals proposed, and for other projects considerable sums voted. Liberals who have been and are strong supporters of the Government have objected to the Government's course; indeed they have been perhaps the most strenuous all-round opponents of extra expenditure this session. These Liberal critics are for the most part the old guard of the party, who have through seventeen years of extravagance been the champions of economy and of free trade, and of purity of administration. They hope that the victory of their party meant the immediate radical reform of every abuse, the immediate curtailment of every abuse, the immediate curtailment of every extra expenditure. They have been disappointed, and have taken no pains to conceal the fact.

Are these, Mr. Speaker, the evidences that the Minister of Customs referred to of the peace, quietness and harmony that is supposed to exist in that well-regulated household? And these are but a tithe of the evidences that might be produced in the same line to show the nature of the smouldering volcano over which the hon. gentlemen are whistling to keep their courage up. If this is the Minister's idea of political quietude and contentment, what a Donnybrook fair it must be when, in his opinion, there is a row in the camp. The record of the present Government since assuming office is so diametrically opposite to their past professions, that one is struck with amazement to hear any hon. member on that side of the House attempt to justify their actions on the ground that these pledges have been fulfilled. It shows what arrant humbugs those political acrobats have been. What became of their promise to reduce the expenditure of the Government? We all remember how the financial critic of the then Opposition (Sir Richard Cartwright) denounced the expenditure of the Conservative Government as being most extravagant, and in his criticism of the Budget speech of the then Finance Minister, declared that $38,000,000, let alone $40,000,000, was in his judgment a monstrous sum for the people of Canada to provide for. And still, we find that whereas the ordinary expenditure for the last year of Conservative rule was $36,949,142, it had increased to $38,335,086 for the year ending June 30th, 1897, while the public debt was increased during the first year of Liberal rule by $2,791,000. This is rather a unique method of fulfilling pledges of economy. Now, while we rejoice in the returning wave of prosperity that Canada in common with other countries is participating in, we of the Conservative party are not of the blue ruin variety of politicians, and will not be found decrying the fair fame and name of our country in order to gain a paltry political advantage, as did our opponents; still, it was rather amusing to see the Finance Minister enumerating the various examples of this prosperity, following in much the same line as his predecessor, the hon. member for York, but a practice which was condemned by the then Liberal Opposition as being an entirely misleading one. Take, for instance, the deposits in the Government savings banks. The Minister of Trade and Commerce formerly scouted the idea that this was an evidence of the country's prosperity, and declared on the other hand it was an evidence that money could not find investments and was therefore locked up. But now that the Liberals are in power it is pointed to as an indication that the country is booming. Consistency thou art a jewel.

Is it not a significant fact, Mr. Speaker, that, whereas the Liberal party, a few short years ago, proclaimed from the housetops that the only salvation for Canada was in adopting a policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, to-day you cannot find a man amongst them to even give utterance to the name, unrestricted reciprocity? I am glad to see, they are all so thoroughly ashamed of their actions on that occasion, and to find that the responsibilities of office have had so beneficial an effect on their party, that they are now vieing with their opponents as Imperialists, though their ultra-loyalty is of so recent a date. The leader of the Government, at a banquet given in the city of Boston in 1891, when referring to the question of Imperial federation, declared that he wanted no European interference in Canadian affairs, and pronounced as absurd the idea that Canada would establish a line of steamers with England, by reason of which trade would be cultivated between Canada and Great Britain. "For my part," said Mr. Laurier, "I prefer the Yankee dollar to the British shilling, especially when the dollar is so near and the shilling so far away." Thus spoke the American, Mr. Laurier, but what a wonderful change in his time to-day. Now he is an Imperialist, but only after he met with a rebuff at the hands of our American neighbours to the south. And at Valleyfield, Quebec, he said:

We will get a treaty with the United States if we can, and if England objects we will consider her objections. Let Lord Salisbury take care of the interests of England and we will take care of the interests of Canada.

You will see the veiled threat of the Premier in that paragraph to Lord Salisbury, practically telling him to mind his own business. Again, at Toronto, the First Minister said :

Every great reform has cost the reformers years of labour, and those years of labour I am prepared to give. Though the Democrats may be defeated in the United States and the Canadians may grow faint-hearted in Canada, the Liberal party, so long as I have anything to do with it, will remain true to the cause of unrestricted reciprocity until that cause is successful.

Has the Premier remained true to that cause? Did he keep his word and adhere to that policy? We all know different, and if these are still the sentiments of the hon. gentleman, he is now again deceiving the people in his pro-British utterances in this House and in the country. The Premier is too fickle to be trusted by the people of this country; he has the unfortunate habit, which may pass for the moment, of trimming his utterances to suit the particular audience he may be addressing, and, when confronted with his contradictory statements, it shows him up in anything but a favourable light. The man who then scoffed at the idea of Imperial federation, now pretends that, were he somewhat younger, his supreme ambition would be to sit in an Imperial Federal Parliament at Westminster. The man who then ridiculed the idea of a fast Atlantic line, is now giving enormous subsidies to Petersen & Tait for the purpose of securing one. The gentleman who then sneered at the British shilling, has now accepted a British title, though a Democrat of the Democrats, and a Cobden medal. And still we are told that these hon. gentlemen are consistent and have fulfilled their promises. What have they done for the farmers of this country? They have reduced the protection on wheat from 15 cents to 12½ cents per bushel; on flour, from 75 cents to 60 cents a bushel; on cornmeal, from 40 cents to 25 cents per bushel; on corn from 7½ cents a bushel to the free list; but they have taken good care to go back on their pledges in reference to the duties on agricultural implements, coal oil, lumber, fruit, and a host of other articles which the people were led to expect would be placed on the free list or sweeping reductions made on the duties. And now, to cap the climax, we find an additional tax being placed on sugar, to assist those sugar barons, who formerly came in for so much abuse at the hands of the Liberal party. The Finance Minister notwithstanding the fact that taxation is yearly increasing, that our expenditure is going up every year, that our national debt is increasing by leaps and bounds, that we are still having deficits, coolly tells the House that it is his intention to levy three or four hundred thousand dollars of additional taxation on sugar, a necessary of life, in order that Canada may pose as a philanthropist, and do the charitable act to our fellow-colonists in the West Indies though the mother country has given no special privileges to those colonists. Oh, but say they, we
